

Biographical Dictionary of Central and Eastern Europe in the Twentieth Century

Edited by

Wojciech Roszkowski

and Jan Kofman

Biographical Dictionary of
Central and Eastern Europe in the Twentieth Century

Biographical Dictionary of
Central and Eastern Europe in the Twentieth Century

Edited by

Wojciech Roszkowski

and Jan Kofman

M.E. Sharpe

Armonk, New York

London, England

English-language edition copyright © 2008 by M.E. Sharpe, Inc.
Published by arrangement with the Institute of Political Studies, Polish Academy of Sciences

All rights reserved. No part of this book may be reproduced in any form without written permission from the publisher, M.E. Sharpe, Inc., 80 Business Park Drive, Armonk, New York 10504.

The EuroSlavic fonts used to create this work are © 1986–2002 Payne Loving Trust.
EuroSlavic is available from Linguist's Software, Inc., www.linguistsoftware.com, P.O. Box 580, Edmonds, WA 98020-0580 USA
tel (425) 775-1130.

Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication Data

Słownik biograficzny Europy Środkowo-Wschodniej XX wieku. English.
Biographical dictionary of Central and Eastern Europe in the twentieth century / edited by Wojciech Roszkowski and Jan Kofman.
p. cm.
Includes bibliographical references and index.
ISBN 978-0-7656-1027-0 (cloth : alk. paper)
1. Europe, Eastern—Biography—Dictionaries. I. Title: Biographical dictionary of Central and Eastern Europe in the 20th century. II. Roszkowski, Wojciech. III. Kofman, Jan. IV. Title.

CT765.S59 2006
920.0409171'70904—dc22

2005031305

Printed in the United States of America

The paper used in this publication meets the minimum requirements of American National Standard for Information Sciences
Permanence of Paper for Printed Library Materials,
ANSI Z 39.48-1984.

IBT (c) 10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1

Contents

Preface	vi
About the Editors	viii
List of Contributors	ix
List of Institutional Abbreviations	x
List of Source Abbreviations	xi
Biographical Dictionary (A–Z)	3
Index of Entries by Country
Albania	1173
Belarus	1174
Bulgaria	1175
Czech and Slovak Republics	1177
Estonia	1180
Hungary	1181
Latvia	1183
Lithuania	1184
Poland	1185
Romania and Moldova	1190
Ukraine	1192
Yugoslavia and Its Successor States	1194

Preface

This biographical dictionary has its own history. I started working on it nearly two decades ago, when the collapse of the communist empire in Central and Eastern Europe appeared imminent. The idea was born out of my reflection on the poor knowledge of the history and culture of Poland's neighbors in the "Lands Between"—the name given to the region between the uniting Europe and the Russian core of the Soviet empire by British historian Alan Parker. At that time, ignorance of the history of Central and Eastern Europe was evident not only in the West but perhaps even more so in the nations of the region, which were neighbors and belonged to one political bloc but were nonetheless isolated from one another. The thought of an increasingly likely political reorganization of the Lands Between occurred to me as early as the 1980s, partly under the influence of interwar "Promethean" ideas (decay of the Soviet Union into nation-states) and partly as a result of my observations of the deepening crisis of the Soviet empire. I believed that this kind of dictionary might play an important role in filling the information gaps and providing the knowledge necessary to build bridges between these nations—and between them and the rest of the world—in the future.

As the pace of history accelerated in the late 1980s and the early 1990s, I had many other things to keep me busy. Nevertheless, in the mid-1990s I decided to fulfill my original plan to make the twentieth-century history of the region more accessible to people through biographical notes on its key figures, because what interests me most in history, even in macro-scale history, is the fate of individuals. I was assisted in my work by the Central and Eastern Europe Department (Zakład Europy rodkowej i Wschodniej) of the Institute of Political Studies of the Polish Academy of Sciences (Instytut Studiów Politycznych Polskiej Akademii Nauk [ISP PAN]) and some of its other staff. We gradually secured the cooperation of additional authors from outside the Institute, and even outside Poland. Their names are given in alphabetical order, regardless of how many entries they wrote—some contributed over a hundred entries, and others wrote only one or two.

It was a great challenge to form a team of competent authors who would abide by the formal requirements and keep the deadlines. Editing the texts was another challenge. It is well known that the quality of dictionaries and encyclopedias to a large extent depends on careful attention to detail in terms of content and form. In the case of such a complicated matter as the modern history of a dozen or so nations using well over dozen languages, it was a very difficult task indeed. I had the first go at editing and was aware that I needed assistance in finding errors and mistakes in terms of substance, style, and form. Despite initial hesitation because of the size of the dictionary and numerous traps in the submitted texts, Professor Jan Kofman, Ph.D., known for his thoroughness and conscientiousness as well as for his excellent eye for linguistic abuse, finally agreed to be the second editor. The scale of Professor Kofman's editorial contribution to the final shape of the texts led me to persuade him to accept the role of co-editor of the whole dictionary.

We initially planned to establish a network of authors and editors from all the countries of the region, but that proved impractical; therefore, with some noteworthy exceptions, this dictionary was compiled and written mainly by Polish authors. Of course, the Polish perspective might seem one-sided, particularly in the case of countries that are Poland's neighbors. Therefore, objective presentation of the history of particular nations was another great challenge to the authors and editors of this dictionary. We might not have reached the ideal but it is worth keeping in mind how difficult the task was. We may not have satisfied proponents of radical views, but we believe that extreme views in historiography sow discord and are dangerous.

Preparing the list of entries was yet another challenge. There are numerous biographical dictionaries for particular countries of the region, varying in size and the degree of detail, so it was difficult to follow any particular model. We decided to focus on politicians, but we could not omit the main representatives of culture, because the social role of eminent artists or clergymen often surpassed that of politicians. However, we did not include sport or pop culture celebrities, except for representatives of art cinema. The reason for this was that we could not just add only a few representative figures of this kind from each country, and if we had included them all, the dictionary would have become even vaster.

Proportionate coverage of various countries was another question. We agreed that the larger countries should have more entries; however, irrespective of their population, we adopted a certain minimum for nations with their own statehood, even if only transitional. Some characters were linked with more than one country: the dictionary includes Hungarians from Transylvania and Slovakia, Ukrainians from Galicia, Albanians from Kosovo, and Jews from various countries and of varying degrees of assimilation. The size of each biographical entry depends on the importance of the person, but we often allowed some adjustments, taking into account the span of their life or the availability of biographical sources.

The term “Central and Eastern Europe” must be explained. It has been and still is interpreted in various ways. In fact there is no consensus as to its geographical or political extent, and the understanding of this notion has also changed quite a bit over time. In this dictionary we adopted the broadest definition, the concept of the “Lands Between,” which generally corresponds to the European territory under communist rule after 1945. We excluded Germany, Austria, Russia, Finland, and Greece; we included the European countries that after World War II became satellites of the Soviet Union, as well as the European Soviet republics, which, in our opinion, differ from Russia culturally. The region covered in the dictionary is thus immensely varied historically, socially, economically, ethnically, and religiously; yet, it is precisely this diversity that defines the specific character of the area.

In this dictionary we tried to minimize evaluations. Nonetheless, the reader will certainly notice our critical attitude toward authoritarian, and particularly totalitarian, regimes. The authors and editors of this work cherish the rule of law, human rights, and the rights of national minorities, and value consistency of words and deeds. We also appreciate justified national interests. However, this biographical dictionary is neither a critical study nor a polemic; what the reader will find here is a reference work.

It is difficult to discuss in this short preface all the editorial principles adopted for the entries. The formal principles need no explanation. However, the use of some terms should be explained. For example, the reader may notice that the term “politician” is used for political figures in pluralist, or even authoritarian, systems, whereas in the case of communist regimes we generally use the term “political activist.” We believe that the great majority of such persons served as functionaries of the system rather than as independent politicians. The term “post-communist” is to be understood as denoting affiliation with a movement or party that historically is rooted in a communist party and chose to preserve most of its communist legacy in the new situation after 1989.

Work on this dictionary lasted about five years. It could never have been completed without the support of the ISP PAN. In its research plans, the ISP PAN always provided funds for salaries and small fees for the authors, and the directors of the ISP PAN were invariably supportive of our work. Thus, credit for the completion of the dictionary in large part goes to the ISP PAN. However, I should also mention my two years with the Chair of Polish Studies at the University of Virginia in Charlottesville (2000–2002), where I compiled much material for the dictionary and wrote and edited a few hundred entries. Our thanks also go to Ms. Jolanta Kowalczyk, the Polish editor of the dictionary; to Rytm, the Warsaw-based publishers that took up the difficult task of publishing the work in Poland; to Ms. Marzena Zamłyńska, who translated most of the biographical entries into English; and to Dr. Marek Chodakiewicz, who is a contributor to the dictionary and assisted me in my work while I was in the United States. Our special thanks go to Professor Aleksander Manterys for his help with the East European type fonts used in the dictionary.

Wojciech Roszkowski

About the Editors

Wojciech Roszkowski is Full Professor of History at the Institute of Political Studies, Polish Academy of Sciences (IPS PAS), and the Warsaw School of Economics. He is also a Lecturer at the Collegium Civitas in Warsaw. He earlier served as Prorector of the Warsaw School of Economics (1990–93), Director of IPS PAS (1994–2000), a Wilson Center Fellow (1988), Visiting Professor at the University of Maryland, College Park (1989), and Kościuszko Chair of Polish Studies at the University of Virginia (2000–2). He is a specialist on the recent history of Poland and East Central Europe. Among his publications are Landowners in Poland 1918–39 (East European Monographs/Columbia University Press, 1991), Contemporary History of Poland 1914–1993 (in Polish; PWN, 1995; first published underground 1982–86), and (with Jan Kofman) Transformation and Post-Communism (in Polish; IPS PAS, 1999). Since 2004 he has been a member of the European Parliament.

Jan Kofman is Full Professor of History at the Institute of Political Studies, Polish Academy of Sciences, and the Uniwersytet Podlaski in Białystok. He is also a Lecturer at the Collegium Civitas in Warsaw. Dr. Kofman was Editor-in-Chief of the underground quarterly Krytyka (1982–94) and a participant in the Round-Table Talks in 1989. He served as Editor-in-Chief (1990–99) and Director (1998–99) of the Wydawnictwo Naukowe PWN Press in Warsaw. A specialist on the contemporary history of Poland and East Central Europe, he is the author of Economic Nationalism and Development. Central and Eastern Europe between the Two World Wars (Westview, 1997) and coauthor (with Wojciech Roszkowski) of Transformation and Post-Communism (in Polish; IPS PAS, 1999).

List of Contributors

Signed entries were authored by the following contributors:

AB	Adam Burakowski, M.A., IPS PAS
AF	Andrzej Friszke, Professor, IPS PAS
AG	Aleksander Gubrynowicz, Ph.D., IPS PAS
AGr	Andrzej Grajewski, Ph.D., Institute of National Remembrance, Warsaw
AO	Agnieszka Orzelska, Ph.D., IPS PAS
AP	Andrzej Paczkowski, Professor, IPS PAS
AS	Alena Stryalkova, M.A., Belarus
ASK	Alicja Sowińska-Krupka, Ph.D., IPS PAS
AW	Artur Wołek, Ph.D., IPS PAS
BB	Bogusława Berdychowska, M.A., Centre for Eastern Studies, Warsaw
DP	Duncan M. Perry, Ph.D., University of Scranton, PA
DT	Dariusz Tołczyk, Professor, University of Virginia, Charlottesville, VA
EJ	Eriks Jekabsons, Ph.D., Riga, Latvia
EM	Eugeniusz Mironowicz, Professor, University of Podlasie, Białystok
FA	Florin Anghel, Ph.D, Bucharest, Romania
GG	Grzegorz Gromadzki, M.A., Centre for Eastern Studies, Warsaw
GM	Grzegorz Motyka, Ph.D., IPS PAS
IS	Inka Słodkowska, Ph. D., IPS PAS
JD	Józef Darski, Ph.D., Warsaw
JH	Joanna Hyndle, M.A., Centre for Eastern Studies, Warsaw
JJ	Jerzy Jackowicz, Professor, IPS PAS
JK	Jan Kofman, Professor, IPS PAS
JS	Jerzy Stańczyk, Ph.D., IPS PAS
JT	Janós Tischler, Ph.D. former Director, Hungarian Institute in Warsaw
JW	Yordan Vasiliev, Professor emeritus, Sofia, Bulgaria
LW	Lech Wojciechowski, M.A., IPS PAS
MC	Marek Chodkiewicz, Professor, Institute of World Politics, Washington, D.C.
MG	Mateusz Gniazdowski, Ph.D., Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Warsaw
MK	Miryna Kutysz, M.A., Centre for Eastern Studies, Warsaw
MS	Maciej Szymanowski, Ph.D., Director of Polish Institute, Budapest, Hungary
PC	Paulina Codogni, M.A., IPS PAS
PK	Paweł Kowal, M.A., IPS PAS
PU	Paweł Ukielski, M.A., IPS PAS
SA	Siarhiy Ausiannik, M.A., Belarus
TC	Tadeusz Czekalski, Ph.D., Jagiellonian University, Cracow
TD	Tadeusz Dubicki, Professor, University of Łódź
TS	Tomasz Stryjek, Ph.D., IPS PAS
TSt	Tomasz Strzembosz, late Professor, IPS PAS
WD	Waldemar Dziak, Professor, IPS PAS
WDj	Vera Deyanova, Lecturer, University of Sofia, Bulgaria
WR	Wojciech Roszkowski, Professor, IPS PAS
ZS	Zbigniew Stawrowski, Ph.D., IPS PAS

Institutional Abbreviations

ASSR	Autonomous Soviet Socialist Republic
CC	Central Committee
Cheka	Extraordinary Commission for Combating Counterrevolution and Sabotage
CMEA	Council for Mutual Economic Assistance
CPSU	Communist Party of the Soviet Union
CSCE	Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe
DEMOS	Democratic Opposition of Slovenia
GRU	Main Intelligence Administration (Military)
KGB	Committee for State Security (from 1954)
MGB	Ministry for State Security (from 1946)
MVD	Ministry of Internal Affairs (from 1946)
NATO	North Atlantic Treaty Organization
NKGB	People's Commissariat for State Security (3 February 1941–20 July 1941; and 1943–1946)
NKVD	People's Commissariat of Internal Affairs (1934–1946)
NSZZ	Self-Governing Trade Union (Solidarity)
OGPU	Unified State Political Directorate
OSCE	Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe
PRL	People's Republic of Poland
RKP(b)	Russian Communist Party (Bolshevik)
RSDWP	Russian Social Democratic Workers' Party
RSFSR	Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic
SSR	Soviet Socialist Republic
UN	United Nations
USSR	Union of Soviet Socialist Republics
VKP(b)	All-Union Communist Party (Bolshevik)

Source Abbreviations

Annuario Pontificio	Annuario pontificio per l'anno (Pontifical yearbook) . Rome: Tipografia poliglotta vaticana.
Biographisches Lexikon	Biographisches Lexikon zur Geschichte Südosteuropas , eds. Mathias Bernath and Felix v. Schroeder, vols. 1–4. Munich: Oldenbourg, 1976–1981.
Bugajski	Janusz Bugajski, Political Parties of Eastern Europe. A Guide to Politics in the Post-Communist Era . Armonk, N.Y.: M.E. Sharpe, 2002.
ČBS	Český biografický slovník XX století , Encyklopedický institut CSAV. Prague: Akademia, 1999.
EL	Encyclopedia Lituanica , vols. 1–4, Boston: J.Kapočius, 1970–1978.
Kunert	Andrzej Krzysztof Kunert, ed., Słownik biograficzny konspiracji warszawskiej 1939–1944 , vols. 1–3. Warsaw: PAX, 1987–1991.
Lazitch	Branko Lazitch, ed., Biographical Dictionary of the Comintern , Stanford: Hoover Institution Press, 1973.
MERSH	Joseph L. Wiczynski, ed., Modern Encyclopedia of Russian and Soviet History , vols. 1–59. Gulf Breeze, Fla.: Academic International Press, 1976–1996.
Mołdawa	Tadeusz Mołdawa, Ludzie władzy 1944–1991 . Warsaw: Wydawnictwo Naukowe PWN, 1991.
Polacy w historii . . .	Polacy w historii i kulturze krajów Europy Zachodniej. Słownik biograficzny . Poznań: Instytut Zachodni, 1981.
Posłowie . . .	Posłowie i senatorowie Rzeczypospolitej Polski 1919–1939. Słownik biograficzny , vol. I, Warsaw: Wydawnictwo Sejmowe, 1998.
PSB	Polski Słownik Biograficzny .
SBS	Vladimír Mináč et al., eds., Slovenský Biografický Slovník: Od roku 833 do roku 1990 . Martin: Matica Slovenska, 1986–1994.

Note: Names mentioned in boldface type have their own entries in the dictionary.

Biographical Dictionary of
Central and Eastern Europe in the
Twentieth Century

A

ABAKANOWICZ Magdalena (20 June 1930, Falenty, near Warsaw), Polish artist. Abakanowicz studied in Gdańsk and Warsaw, where she graduated from the Academy of Fine Arts in 1954. She took part in the First Tapestry Biennial in Lausanne, Switzerland, in 1963, which helped her get a scholarship from the French government. While in France she studied the traditional art of weaving in the Gobelin style. After returning to Poland she started to create and exhibit original spatial tapestries, soon called the abakans. A gold medal at the Second Tapestry Biennial in Lausanne and a grand prix at the São Paulo Biennale in Brazil in 1965 opened the way to an international career. From the late 1960s Abakanowicz exhibited in the most prestigious galleries throughout the world, from Amsterdam and Stockholm to Venice and New York. In the early 1970s she concentrated on sculpting human figures (“Heads,” 1973, and “Alterations,” 1974), in the 1980s she partly returned to traditional sculpting (“War Games,” 1987), and in the 1990s she developed the idea of “arboreal art,” aiming at a transformation of the human habitat. In 1999 she received the prestigious Leonardo da Vinci Award, granted by the World Cultural Council. (WR)

Sources: Wielka encyklopedia powszechna (PWN), vol. 1 (Warsaw, 2001); Contemporary Artists (Chicago and London, 1987); The Dictionary of Art, vol. 1 (London, 1996); Barbara Rose, Magdalena Abakanowicz (New York, 1994); Magdalena Abakanowicz (Warsaw, 1995).

ABDIĆ Fikret (29 September 1939, Dolni Vidovec, Bosnia), Bosnian political and economic activist. Born into a Muslim family, Abdić made a career in the Communist Party. In the mid-1980s he was involved in a huge financial scandal, when it appeared that Agrokomerc, the company of which he was the director, had drafted unprotected bills of exchange. The collapse of “Agrokomerc” cost the Yugoslav economy the equivalent of about half a billion dollars. Arrested and sentenced to a lengthy imprisonment, Abdić was released in 1990, and owing to his old connections and accumulated wealth, he became an influential politician. In the first presidential election in Bosnia in 1990 he gained most of the votes (868,000) but ceded the presidency to Alija Izetbegović in exchange for the position of minister of interior. In 1993, during the war among the Serbs, Croats, and Muslims and after prolonged discord with Izetbegović Abdić established the Autonomous Province of Western Bosnia in the region of Bihać. This led to further fighting against Muslim forces loyal to Izetbegović. In August 1994 Abdić’s troops were defeated and retreated from the Bihać pocket, but returned there in November 1994 thanks to the support of the army of the Serb Republic of Kraina and the Bosnian Serbs. NATO air raids on Bosnia forced Abdić to flee to Croatia in August 1995. Considered by many Bosnian Muslims to be a traitor, Abdić did not return to the political arena of Bosnia-Herzegovina after losing in the first post-war parliamentary election of 1996. Accused by the Hague Tribunal of war crimes in the former Yugoslavia, he went into hiding, where he remains. (WR)

Sources: K. W. Banta, “Financial Scandal Turns into Political Bombshell,” Time, 28 September 1987; Hrvoje Sosić, Treće pokriće “Agrokomerc,” (Zagreb, 1989); Ante Čuvalo, Historical Dictionary of Bosnia and Herzegovina (Lanham, Md., 1997); Željko E. Šuster, Historical Dictionary of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Lanham, Md., 1999); Bugajski; www.rulers.org.

ABETSEDARSKY Laurentsi (12 July 1916, Gorki–6 July 1975, Minsk), Belorussian Soviet historian. In 1946 Abetsedarsky graduated from the Belorussian State University in Minsk, where he began his scholarly and pedagogical career. He was head of the Department of Soviet History between 1950 and 1958. For the following ten years he headed the Department of History of the Belorussian SSR. In 1966 he became a full professor of history. Abetsedarsky treated the history of Belarus strictly as a part of the history of Russia. According to him, the peasant movements in Belarus in the middle of the seventeenth century were a manifestation of the Belorussian peasants’ aspirations to incorporate a part of the territory of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania into the Muscovite state. He described the mass displacements of the population of eastern Belarus to the territories beyond the Urals in 1654–55 as actions corresponding to the will of those people, and resulting from their desire to escape the reign of the Polish nobility. He considered the unification of the eastern Slavic lands under Moscow’s dominance as a natural process that served the vital interests of the populations of Belarus and the Ukraine. He emphasized the right of tsarist Russia to possess these lands. He considered the Grand Duchy of Lithuania an alien state structure imposed on the Belorussian people by external forces. He considered the twentieth-century Belorussian national movement a nationalist degeneration. Abetsedarsky authored many supplementary materials for teaching the history of Belarus in the secondary schools; they were published in thirteen editions (1960–74). He also wrote a textbook that was reissued eleven times (1975–87). He was one of the authors of a five-volume official history of the Belorussian SSR. His works contributed to the Sovietization and Russification of the Belorussian intelligentsia. (EM)

Sources: “L. S. Abetsedarski: Niekroloh,” Viesnik BDU, 1975, no. 2; Entsyklapiedyia historyi Bielarusi, vol. 1 (Minsk, 1993); Bielaruskaia entsyklapiedyia, vol. 1 (Minsk, 1996); Rainer Lindner, Historiker und Herrschaft. Nationsbildung und Geschichtspolitik in Weissrussland im 19. und 20. Jahrhundert (Munich, 1999).

ABRAMCHIK Mikalay (16 August 1903, Sychaviche, county of Vileika—29 May 1970, Paris), Belorussian émigré pro-independence activist, publicist. In 1920 Abramchik graduated from a Belorussian high school in Radoszkowice. In 1924 he won a scholarship from the Czechoslovak government and the opportunity to study in Prague. (Such scholarships were funded to assist Belorussian youth and the Ukrainian citizens of Poland.) When the headquarters of the Belorussian People’s Republic was moved from Berlin to Prague in 1925, Abramchik became a close associate of the leaders of the Belorussian government-in-exile, Vasil Zakharka and Pyotr Krecheuski. At the beginning of the 1930s Abramchik went to France to organize Belorussian groups that were dispersed there. However, the Union of Belorussian Working Émigrés, which Abramchik established, did not play any major role. The day before the outbreak of World War II he left for Berlin, obtaining the consent of the government of the Third Reich to publish Ranitsa, a weekly in the Belorussian language. Initially addressed to Belorussian émigré circles, the weekly was later distributed in all the countries subjugated by Germany. As the editor of the weekly between 1939 and 1944, Abramchik promoted the idea of building a Belorussian state allied with Germany. In 1940 he established Belorussian committees in the Third Reich, Bohemia, and occupied Poland. The committees were to be rudiments of the Belorussian government if Germany was victorious in the expected war against the USSR. In mid-1944, in the face of the defeat of the German armed forces, he left Berlin for Paris. In 1945 he became involved in organizing help for Belorussians who had worked as forced laborers in Germany or who had been released from concentration camps and for refugees from the USSR. At a conference in Paris on 28 November 1947 Abramchik was elected president of the Council of the Belorussian People’s Republic, an émigré government that was in conflict with the Belorussian Central Council of Radaslau Astrouski. He held the position until the end of his life. In 1950 he published a brochure I Accuse the Kremlin of the Genocide of My Nation. In the 1950s and 1960s he also presided over the League for the Liberation of the Peoples of the USSR. (EM)

Sources: Entsyklapiedyia historyi Bielarusi, vol. 1 (Minsk, 1993); Bielaruskaia entsyklapiedyia, vol. 1 (Minsk, 1996); Nicholas P. Vakar, Belorussia: The Making of a Nation (Cambridge, Mass., 1956); Jan Zaprudnik, Historical Dictionary of Belarus (Lanham, Md., 1998).

ABRAMOWSKI Edward (17 August 1868, Stefanin, near Vasilkov, Ukraine—21 July 1918, Warsaw), Polish philosopher and social activist. Abramowski was born into a landowner’s family. After his mother died the family moved to Warsaw where he had private tutors; one of them was the famous poet Maria Konopnicka. At fifteen Abramowski published his first article in Zorza. In 1885 he began natural science studies in Kraków, and in 1886–89 he continued his studies in Geneva. There he became active in the Socialist movement, co-founding the Library of a Polish Socialist. At the beginning of 1889 Abramowski returned to Kraków, from where he went to Warsaw. In Warsaw, he was a co-founder of the Second Proletariat Party. In 1891 he established the Workers’ Union (Zjednoczenie Robotnicze), promoting Socialist ideology among workers. He wrote a series of brochures, such as Rewolucja robotnicza (The workers’ revolution; 1892), and an extensive sociological study, Społeczeństwo rodowe (Ancestral society; 1890). After the death of his new wife, Stanisława, in 1892 Abramowski suffered a nervous breakdown and returned to Geneva, where he took part in the formation of the Polish Socialist Party (Polska Partia Socjalistyczna [PPS]) and joined the party central (Centralizacja). He was the author of a proposed PPS program that set the independence of Poland through class struggle as a party goal. At that time, however, this program was not accepted.

Abramowski settled in Paris, but at the request of the Russian police he was expelled from France in January 1893. He went to London, and then to Zurich, where he wrote a brochure Wszystkim robotnikom i górnikom polskim na dzień 1 maja—socjaliści polscy (For all Polish workers and miners on May 1st Day—From Polish Socialists). Socialists-Internationalists held back the distribution of the brochure because of the independence aims it outlined. In 1894 Abramowski moved to Geneva, where he conducted sociological and psychological research. He worked out his own concept of Marxism, linked with sociological phenomenalism. In Pierwiastki indywidualne w socjologii (Individual elements in sociology; 1899) and Zagadnienia socjalizmu (Issues of socialism; 1899) he called for a revolutionary dictatorship of the proletariat, and stateless socialism based on a “moral revolution.”

In 1897 Abramowski returned to Warsaw and began to establish “spiritual societies.” Many radical intellectuals, including Stefan Żeromski, were influenced by these societies. In 1905 from the underground, Abramowski published Zmowa powszechna przeciw rządowi (General conspiracy against the government), where he proposed a general boycott as a way to struggle against tsarism. After the revolution of 1905 Abramowski exerted important influence on the development of the Polish cooperative movement and ideology. In 1906 he organized the Cooperative Society (Towarzystwo Kooperatystów). In his works Nasza Polityka (Our policy; 1906) and Idee społeczne kooperatywności (Social ideas of cooperativism; 1906), he presented the theory of the movement. Between 1908 and 1910 he worked on the theory of memory in Brussels and Paris. It was then that he joined a Masonic lodge called Wielki Wschód (Great East). After his return to Warsaw in 1910 he organized the Psychological Institute, conducting practical experiments. In 1915 he was appointed professor of psychology at the revived University of Warsaw, where he lectured on “experimental metaphysics.” The results of his work were: Badania doświadczalne nad pamięcią (An experimental study of memory, 3 vols.; 1910–12) and Źródła podświadomości i jej przejawy (Sources of the subconscious and its aspects; 1914). Because of deteriorating health, Abramowski was not politically active during World War I. However, he supported the policy of Józef Piłsudski and the Polish Military Organization (Polska Organizacja Wojskowa). (WR)

Sources: Andrzej Walicki, “Stanisław Brzozowski i Edward Abramowski,” Studia Filozoficzne 1975, no. 5; Maria Dąbrowska, Życie i dzieło Edwarda Abramowskiego (Warsaw, 1925); Kazimierz Krzeczkowski, Dzieje życia i twórczości Edwarda Abramowskiego (Warsaw, 1933); Oskar Lange, Socjologia i idee społeczne Edwarda Abramowskiego (Kraków, 1928); Bohdan Cywiński, “Myśl polityczna Edwarda Abramowskiego,” in: Polska myśl polityczna XIX i XX, vol. 2 (Wrocław 1978).

ABRANTOWICZ Fabian (14 September 1884, Novogrudok [Navahrudak]–1940?), Belorussian priest and social worker. Abrantowicz was educated in Novogrudok and graduated from the Catholic Theological Academy in St. Petersburg. Ordained in November 1908, in 1910–12 he studied at the Catholic University in Louvain, Belgium, where he received a Ph.D. in philosophy in 1912. From 1914 to 1918 he lectured in philosophy at the St. Petersburg Theological Academy. In May 1918 he co-founded the Belorussian Christian Democratic Union in Petrograd and co-initiated a congress of Belorussian Catholic clergy in Minsk. In 1918 he became rector of the theological seminary in Minsk and, along with Bishop Zygmunt Łoziński, he offered the first Catholic Holy Mass in Belorussian. In 1921–26 Abrantowicz was prelate of the Pinsk chapter of the Roman Catholic Church. In 1926 he moved to a monastery of the Marist order in Druya, where a number of Belorussian Catholic priests had gathered to support lay Catholic publishing activity. Abrantowicz published a lot, demanding a wider use of Belorussian in the Novogrudok (Nowogródek) region and Polesie. In June 1928 he was sent by the Vatican to Harbin to carry on missionary activities among Russian émigrés. In the fall of 1939 he returned to the Soviet-occupied area of prewar Poland, but he was arrested by the NKVD. For a few months he was kept in the Lwów (Lviv) prison. Later Abrantowicz was deported deep into Russia, where he disappeared. (EM)

Sources: Encyklopedia katolicka, vol. 1 (Lublin, 1973); Entsyklapedyia historyi Belarusi, vol. 1 (Minsk, 1993); Bielaruskaya entsyklapedyia, vol. 1 (Minsk, 1996); Vitaut Kipel and Zora Kipel eds., Byelorussian Statehood (New York, 1988); Skazani jako “szpiedzy Watykanu” (Ząbki, 1998).

ÁCHIM András Liker (15 March 1871, Békéscsaba–15 May 1911 Békéscsaba), Hungarian politician. Born into a rich peasant family in the region that became the cradle of the radical peasant movement, Áchim graduated from high school; from 1894 he managed a five-hundred-acre farm. A member of the county council in Békéscsaba and of the provincial assembly, in August 1904 he became a member of the Reformed Social Democratic Party and headed its local organization. In March 1906 he founded the Independent Socialist Peasant Union, which attracted farm workers, and became its leader. At the same time he became editor-in-chief of the party weekly, Paraszt Újság. Áchim was elected to the parliament three times (1905, 1906, and 1910–11), but in 1906 the electoral court annulled his mandate on account of electoral abuse (voters had been bought off with food and alcohol). Áchim advocated protection of the village poor, state redemption of entailed estates and church property and their lease to the peasants, abolishment of the upper house of parliament (House of Lords), free education for country folk, and electoral laws for secret ballots. Beginning in 1906 Áchim presided over the All-National Trade Union of Farmers, Smallholders, and Lifters. More than six hundred delegates from four hundred villages took part in its congress in June 1908. In April and May 1911, in gatherings and in his writings Áchim vigorously attacked local politicians, mainly his chief opponent, Endre Zsilinszky. On 14 May 1911, a quarrel with Zsilinszky’s sons, Endre (Bajcsy-Zsilinszky as of 1925) and Gábor, in Áchim’s home turned into a fight. Áchim was shot and died the next day. The case was widely publicized, but a few months later the court in Budapest acquitted both brothers, stating they had acted in self-defense. (JT) (Budapest, 1958); József Domokos, Áchim L. András (Budapest, 1971); Joseph Held, ed., The Modernization of Agriculture: Rural Transformation in Hungary 1848–1975 (Boulder, Colo., 1980).

Sources: Biographisches Lexikon, vol. 1; Magyar Nagylexikon, vol. 1 (Budapest, 1993); Új Magyar Életrajzi Lexikon, vol. 1 (Budapest 2001); János Tibori, Az Áchim L. András-féle békéscsabai parasztmozgalom

ACZÉL György (31 August 1917, Budapest–6 December 1991, Budapest), Hungarian Communist activist. After the death of his father Aczél was brought up in an orphanage. While still at school he began to work in construction. He took part in the youth Zionist movement called Somér. In 1935 he joined the illegal Communist Party. In 1936 he studied in a theater academy for half a year and later performed as an amateur actor. At the beginning of 1942 he was arrested and incorporated into work service, but he managed to quit. Under the German occupation (after March 1944) and the rule of the Arrow Cross Party (after October 1944) Aczél was active in the resistance, saving several hundred Jews. After the war he worked in the Budapest organization of the Hungarian Communist Party (HCP). From August 1946 he was the secretary of the party of Komitat Zémlen and from May 1948, of Komitat Baranya. In 1947–49 he was a deputy to the National Assembly. He was a member of the Central Committee (CC) of the Hungarian Workers' Party (HWP), which was formed at the “unification congress” of two workers' parties in June 1948. In June 1949 he was arrested and sentenced to life imprisonment in one of the trials accompanying the fake proceedings against László Rajk. Released in August 1954, he was rehabilitated a few weeks later. In the fall of 1954 he became the director of a building company.

On 3 November 1956 Aczél became a district organizational secretary of the Hungarian Socialist Workers' Party (HSWP), which was founded after the dissolution of the HWP. On 4 November he joined János Kádár. On 11 November, at a meeting of the executive of the HSWP, Aczél opted for a Yugoslav-style neutrality and insisted on the continuation of talks with Imre Nagy. During a debate on the resolution of the “four causes of the counterrevolution,” which went on at the beginning of December, Aczél represented the “softer line”; therefore in February 1957 he had to carry out a self-criticism. Between April 1957 and February 1958 he was a vice-minister of culture and then until April 1967 the first vice-minister of culture. He had a much greater influence on Hungarian cultural policy than his formal powers would suggest. He owed this to his frequent personal contacts with Kádár. Aczél was the creator of the guidelines for the cultural policy, which were later referred to as “the three Ts” (támogatás—support; tűrés—tolerance; tiltás—forbidding). He had direct influence upon most decisions concerning cultural life, behaving like a one-man state patronage. The majority of society and the elite approved, while outstanding writers and poets dedicated their works to him.

At the Ninth Congress of the HSWP in 1966 Aczél joined the Department of Agitation and Propaganda of the CC, and in April 1967 he was elected secretary of the CC, supervising the work of the Department of Science, Education, and Culture. In March 1969 he became the director of the Department of Agitation and Propaganda of the CC. At the Tenth Congress of the party in November 1970 he joined the Politburo. From 1971 he was a member of parliament again. In April of the same year Aczél became the president of the Working Group for Cultural Policy Affairs, which was created at that time within the CC. He held the post until 1975. In 1968 he began to take part in the implementation of “the new economic mechanism,” and when the process was stopped in 1974, he was dismissed from his post in the CC. However, he retained his membership in the Politburo and became deputy prime minister and president of the State Educational Council. He held that post until 1976 and in 1980–82. In 1975 his book-interview, Entretiens avec György Aczél, was published in French and then in many other languages. In it, he argued with the French rightist politician Alain Peyrefitte. In 1979 Aczél submitted a resolution to the Politburo of the HSWP, denouncing the Hungarian signatories of Charter 77. At the beginning of the 1980s his heated discussions with the minister of culture, Imre Pozsgay, led to the resignation of both. In June 1982 Aczél ceased to be vice-premier and again became the secretary of the CC for cultural affairs. At the Thirteenth Congress of the HSWP in 1985 he was dismissed from most of his posts and then was appointed director of the Institute of Social Sciences of the CC. Between 1985 and 1990 he was again an MP. At the national conference of the HSWP in 1988 he did not run for the Politburo but retained his membership in the CC. At the meeting of the CC in June 1989 Aczél played a major role in the overthrow of Károly Grósz and the exchange of one-man leadership for a four-person executive board. (JT)

Sources: Bennet Kovrig, Communism in Hungary from Kun to Kádár (Stanford, 1979); Miklós Molnár, From Béla Kun to János Kádár: Seventy Years of Hungarian Communism (New York, 1990); Magyar Nagylexikon (Budapest, 1993), vol. 1; Sándor Révész, Aczél és korunk (Budapest, 1997); A magyar forradalom és szabadságharc enciklopédiája, CD-ROM (Budapest, 1999).

ADAMEC Ladislav (10 September 1926, Frenštát, near Radhošť), Czech Communist activist. The graduate of a trade academy, Adamec joined the Czechoslovak Communist Party (CPC) in 1946, and in the 1950s he worked in the political and economic apparatus in his hometown.

Between 1960 and 1962 he was deputy chairman of the Provincial National Council in Ostrava. In 1961 he graduated from a higher political school of the CPC Central Committee (CC), and in 1967 he received a Ph.D. from the Higher Economic School in Prague. From 1963 to 1969 Adamec was chairman of the CPC CC Industry Commission, from 1963 to 1971 member of its Economic Commission, and from 1966 member of the CPC CC. During the Prague Spring of 1968 he stood aside. From 1969 to 1990 he was a member of the Czech National Council and from 1969 to 1987 deputy prime minister of the Czech government. He reached the top rungs of Communist power when communism began to erode. In 1987 Adamec became a member of the Presidium of the CPC CC, then prime minister of the Czech Republic, and from March 1987 to October 1988 he was deputy prime minister of the federal government. After the resignation of Lubomir Štrougal, on 12 October 1988 Adamec became prime minister of Czechoslovakia. Despite the growing social tensions, he stubbornly resisted reforms. It was only after 17 November 1989 that he tried to save the system by reaching a compromise with the democratic opposition, and he entered into talks with the Civic Forum (Občanské Forum [CF]). At first, the CF delegation, as well as its Slovak equivalent, Public against Violence (Verejnost' Proti Násiliu), offered Adamec the position of president, but the evolution of a new system accelerated. On 24 November 1989 Adamec was dismissed from the CPC CC Presidium, and on 7 December, from the position of prime minister. From 21 December 1989 to 1 September 1990 he presided over the CPC, and in the first free elections in June 1990 he won a mandate in the Federal Assembly. After his term was over in June 1992, he retired. (PU)

Sources: ČBS; Kdo byl kdo v našich dějinách ve 20. století, vol. 1 (Prague, 1998); Českoslovenští politici 1918/1991 (Prague, 1991); Who's Who in the Socialist Countries of Europe, vol. 1 (Munich, London, and Paris, 1989).

ADAMKUS Valdas [originally Adamkavičius] (3 November 1926, Kaunas), engineer and politician, president of Lithuania. Born into a white-collar family, Adamkus started high school but had to quit owing to the Soviet invasion of 1940 and the German invasion of 1941. During the German occupation he published and distributed an underground periodical, Jaunime, budek! In July 1944 along with his family he left for Germany. In the fall of 1944 he returned to join anti-Soviet guerrillas. He took part in a battle against the NKVD troops at Seda, but seeing the hopelessness of the situation, he came back to Germany. He graduated from high school in Munich and entered university there. He worked at the YMCA, organizing sports events for displaced persons from various countries. He was an athlete himself and won several gold medals at the Olympics of Captive Nations in 1948. In 1949 his family, along with the family of former president Kazys Grinius, left for the United States. Adamkus worked as a blue-collar laborer in an automobile factory in Chicago and as a draftsman in an engineering company, and he organized cultural events for Lithuanian émigrés. Among other things, he presided over the Lithuanian Student Center, Santara. In 1960 he graduated in engineering from the Illinois Institute of Technology. From 1958 to 1965 he was deputy chairman and from 1967 chairman of the Lithuanian cultural and political federation Santara-Sviesa, and he organized protests against the Soviet occupation of Lithuania. For instance, he handed a petition on this matter to U.S. President John F. Kennedy and to the UN secretary general.

In the 1970s Adamkus worked for the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency (EPA), among other positions as head of the EPA Great Lakes ecological project. He was also active in the Republican Party. Starting in 1972 he visited Soviet Lithuania within the framework of ecological cooperation. He supported the construction of waste treatment plants and the development of environmental monitoring, making contacts with opposition circles and bringing émigré literature. He helped Lithuanian specialists come to study in the United States, cooperating with Vilnius University, especially during the perestroika period. In 1988 he received an international ecological award and in 1989, an honorary doctorate from Vilnius University. In 1991 he supported efforts for the international recognition of Lithuania's independence, and after the fall of the USSR and reconstruction of a sovereign Lithuanian state, he increasingly was engaged in its public life. In the presidential campaign of 1993 he supported Stasys Lozoraitis Jr., who nevertheless lost. In 1996 Adamkus participated in the parliamentary campaign of the Lithuanian Center Union (Lietuvos Centro Sąjunga). In 1997 he became a member of the city council of Šiauliai.

In the first round of the presidential elections on 21 December 1997, Adamkus came in second, but in the second round (4 January 1998), thanks to the support of Vytautas Landsbergis, he won by a narrow margin of fourteen thousand votes (50.4 percent). He was sworn in on 26 February 1998. He gave up his U.S. citizenship, but making use of his American contacts (in 1993 President Bill Clinton personally thanked him for his work in the EPA), he promoted pro-Western policies in Lithuania, striving for its entry into NATO and the European Union. He supported settling accounts with the Soviet and German past, establishing a special commission for the investigation of Nazi and Communist crimes in 1940–91. He developed contacts with Scandinavian countries and European Union members; he normalized relations with Russia and Poland. In January 2003 he ran for re-election but lost to Rolandas Paksas. After Paksas was impeached, Adamkus was again elected president on 27 June 2004. (WR)

Sources: Wielka encyklopedia PWN, vol. 1 (Warsaw, 2001); Lietuva, Žengiantij XXI amžiu. Valdo Adamkaus rinkimų programa (Vilnius, 1997); Eastern Europe and the Commonwealth of Independent States 1999 (London, 1999); Bugajski; Piotr Łossowski, Litwa (Warsaw, 2001); www.president.lt; www.rulers.org

ADAMOVICH Ales (3 September 1927, Kaniukhy, near Kopylsk–26 January 1994, Moscow), Belorussian writer and literary critic. Between 1943 and 1944 Adamovich was active in the Soviet underground in the region of Bobruysk. After the war he studied at the metallurgical technical college in Leninogorsk in the Altai krai (region); between 1945 and 1950 he studied in the Philology Department of the Belorussian State University in Minsk, and then in 1954–62 and 1967–83 he worked at the Institute of Literature of the Academy of Sciences of the Belorussian SSR. Between 1964 and 1966 he lectured on Belorussian literature at Lomonosov University in Moscow. In 1987 he became director of the Cinematography Institute in Moscow. He was a deputy to the Supreme Soviet of the USSR and from 1989 a member of the Belorussian PEN club. He began his literary activities as a critic. His theoretical considerations of literature and his analyses of the literary works of the main representatives of Belorussian literature appeared in Belorussian and in Russian. He authored such works as Kultura tvarchosti (The culture of creation; 1959), Haryzonty bialoruskoi prozy (Horizons of Belorussian prose; 1974) and Vaina i vioska u suchasnai literatury (War and the countryside in contemporary literature; 1982). He made his debut as a writer with a two-volume novel, Partizany (Partisans; 1960–63), which was devoted to the Soviet resistance movement in Belorussia. In all his works, fitted into the official current of Soviet culture, he dealt with war issues. His greatest fame came from his works Khatynskaia apoviests (Khatyn story; 1972) (from which the script of the film Idi i smatri [Come and see; 1985], by Elem Klimov, was based) and Vybiery zhyttsio (Choose life; 1986), which warned against the destruction of civilization. (EM)

Sources: Wielka encyklopedia powszechna, vol. 1 (Warsaw, 2001); Bielaruskiya pismienniki 1917–1990 (Minsk, 1994); Bielaruskiya pismienniki: Biiabibliahrafichny slounik, vol. 1 (Minsk, 1995); Bielaruskaia entsyklopedyia, vol. 1 (Minsk, 1994); New York Times, 31 January 1994.

ADAMOVICH Anton, pseudonyms “Birych” and “Zabransky” (26 June 1909, Minsk–12 June 1998, New York),

Belorussian émigré historian and theorist of literature. Adamovich studied at the Belorussian Pedagogical and Technical Institute in Minsk and, beginning in 1928, at the Belorussian State University. Arrested in 1930 for being a member of a nonexistent organization, the Union of Liberation of Belorussia, he was held in Glazov and in Viatka. In 1938 he was allowed to return to Minsk, where he completed his university studies. During the German occupation he took part in the formation of the structures of the Belorussian administration. In 1941–43 he was a member of the leadership of the Belorussian People’s Mutual Aid, and then he joined the Belorussian Central Council, which was created in December 1943 and aspired to be a state government allied with Germany. Adamovich was active in the Belorussian Scientific Society and cooperated with the editorial offices of the newspapers Mienskaia Hazieta, Bielaruskaia Hazieta, and Ranitsa (Berlin). After the war he was in West Germany, where he edited the magazines Viedamki, Batskaushchina, Sakavik, and Konadni for émigrés from Belorussia. He was co-founder of the Munich Institute for Research on Problems of the USSR and first director of the Belorussian section of Radio Svaboda. In 1960 he emigrated to the United States. In his historical works, Balshavism na shliakhakh stanauliennia kantrolu nad Belarussiu (Bolshevism on the way to establishing control over Belarus; 1954) and Balshavism u revalutsynym rukhu na Belarusi (Bolshevism in the Belorussian revolutionary movement; 1956), Adamovich demonstrated that the Bolshevik ideology did not have any traditions in Belorussia and was alien to the inhabitants of the Belorussian land and that Communist rule had been brought on the bayonets of the Red Army soldiers. In America, Adamovich was involved in analyzing the literary works of such Belorussian poets and writers as Natalya Arsenneva, Maxim Bahdanovich, Ales Harun, and Yakub Kolas. He wrote prefaces to anthologies of their works. Adamovich was the author of Opposition to Sovietization in Belorussian Literature 1917–1957 (1958). (EM)

Sources: Entsyklopedyia historyi Bielarusi, vol. 1 (Minsk, 1993); Bielaruskaia entsyklopedyia, vol. 1 (Minsk, 1996).

ADAMOVICH Yazep (7 January 1897, Borisov–22 April 1937, Minsk), Belorussian Communist activist. Adamovich came from a working-class background. At ten he began to work in factories in Borisov, Minsk, and Tiflis. Drafted into the tsarist army in 1914, he fought on the southwestern front and on the Romanian front. In 1916 he joined the Russian Social Democratic Workers’ Party, and he agitated among soldiers. After the February 1917 revolution he worked in the staff of the Red Guards in Smolensk. In July 1918 he became head of the Smolensk garrison of the Red Guards and also a Bolshevik commissar of the guberniya (province) of Smolensk. He led the struggle against anti-Bolshevik groupings in Smolensk, Vitebsk, and Homel Provinces. In September 1920 he was appointed commissar for military affairs of the Belorussian SSR, and in 1921 he assumed the post of commissar of the interior and deputy president of the Council of People's Commissars of the Belorussian SSR. He was responsible for the persecution of the opponents of Bolshevism. As a representative of the Communist Party (Bolsheviks) of Belorussia, he took part in the formation of the USSR. In 1924 he became president of the Council of People's Commissars of the Belorussian SSR. He participated in the policy of Beloruthenization of public life, which was conducted on a large scale. Educational and cultural institutions, the press, the administration, and party structures were obliged to use the Belorussian language only. However, as 1927 saw the gradual abandonment of the nationalist policy, Adamovich was removed from his post. Another reason for his removal was his support for the New Economic Policy (NEP). Adamovich was initially transferred to work in the Soviet central administration, and he served, for example, as head of the USSR sugar industry department. In 1932 he was sent to Kamchatka, where he organized the fisheries. With the wave of persecutions of the nationalist elite of the Soviet republics, he was accused of Belorussian nationalism and of supporting the kulaks when he was head of the administration in Belarus. According to official information, Adamovich committed suicide. (EM)

Sources: MERSH, vol. 1; S. Shamardzin, "Staronki z biihrafii Yazepa Adamovicha," Polymia, 1966, no. 4; Ivan S. Lubachko, Belorussia under Soviet Rule, 1917–1957 (Lexington, KY 1972); Entsyklapiedyia historyi Belarusi, vol. 1 (Minsk, 1994).

ADAMSKI Stanisław (12 April 1875, Zielona Góra, near Szamotuły–12 November 1967, Katowice), Polish Catholic bishop. One of seven children of a trackwalker, in 1896 Adamski graduated from high school. He studied at a theological seminary in Poznań and Gniezno, and in November 1899 he was ordained. He worked as a curate in Gniezno. Politically active, from 1904 to 1910 Adamski was secretary general of the diocesan Union of Catholic Societies of Polish Workers (Związek Katolickich Towarzystw Robotników Polskich). He established educational, cultural, and mutual aid societies in the dioceses of Gniezno and Poznań. He founded and edited the weekly Robotnik (The worker). Adamski worked together with cooperative activists rallied around Reverend Piotr Wawrzyniak. In 1906 he became a member of the board of the Association of Commercial Cooperatives (Związek Spółek Zarobkowych i Gospodarczych) as a member of the patronage and in 1910 as the patron of the association. From 1906 he worked at the St. Wojciech Printing House and Bookstore (Drukarnia i Księgarnia św. Wojciecha); in 1911 he became its general manager and in 1923 president of its supervisory board. In 1919 he was a founding member of Poznań University, and he lectured on the cooperative movement at the Department of Law and Economics.

After the outbreak of World War I Adamski became involved in pro-independence activities. In 1916 he became head of a secret organization that was preparing for the revival of Polish statehood in Poznań. In 1918–19 he was a member of the commissariat of the National People's Council (Naczelna Rada Ludowa). From April 1918 he belonged to the National Workers' Party (Narodowe Stronnictwo Robotników [NSR]), and as a representative of the party he entered the Constituent Sejm (1919–22). When in 1919 the NSR split, Adamski became head of the Polish Christian Democratic Party (Polskie Stronnictwo Chrześcijańskiej Demokracji [PSCChD]). Between 1922 and 1927 he was senator. After the coup of May 1926, disappointed with the rule of the sanacja regime, he withdrew from active politics. In 1930 he became the first general manager of the Institute of Catholic Action. On 2 September 1930 he was appointed ordinary bishop of Katowice. Co-founder of the statute of Catholic Action, in 1932 he became president of the executive committee of the Press Committee of the Polish Episcopate. He contributed greatly to promoting the use of the mass media in evangelical work.

Under strong pressure from Nazi authorities after 1939, Adamski was an advocate of hiding one's true national convictions from these authorities. He sent two lengthy memorials on this issue to the Holy See and to the Polish government in France. The government of General Władysław Sikorski initially accepted such activities with reservation but finally rejected them. In the fall of 1939 Adamski privately advised Silesian believers that they should submit declarations "leaning toward the German identity"; Adamski, however, declared himself Polish. He developed charity activities with the assistance of Caritas, which existed officially, and he also developed unofficial actions of sending parcels to internment and concentration camps. He informed the Holy See about the persecutions of the clergy of the Katowice diocese. In June 1940, because of blackmail by German gangs, Adamski instructed priests to restrict the use of the Polish language in pastoral work, with the exception of the confession box. He repeatedly intervened with the German authorities on behalf of imprisoned priests. Recognized as an enemy of the Third Reich, in February 1941 Adamski was displaced from the Katowice diocese to the General Gouvrenment (the official name of a Nazi-occupied area in central Poland). He arrived in Warsaw, where he lived with his family. He got involved in underground activities—for example, he became honorary president of the Civic Council of the Western Territories, which was established by the West Office of the Delegation of the Polish Government-in-Exile for the Homeland. During the Warsaw Uprising he was the only bishop to perform pastoral services. After the fall of the rising he went for a short time to Jasna Góra, and then in February 1945 he returned to Katowice.

In the fall of 1945 Adamski allowed clergymen whom he had chosen to work in the national councils at different levels. He intervened with local and central authorities against the abuses that took place during the response to the results of the so-called Volksliste (German national list) in Upper Silesia. His argument—expounded, for example, in his work Pogląd na rozwój sprawy narodowościowej w Województwie Śląskim w czasie okupacji niemieckiej (A view on the development of the nationalist issue in the Silesian Province during the German occupation)—was adopted by the governor (wojewoda) of Dąbrowa Silesia, Aleksander Zawadzki, who was able to convince the central authorities to moderate their restrictive policy toward the Polish-speaking natives of Upper Silesia. Adamski was involved in restoring a ministry in the Wrocław diocese; for example, he proposed the creation of a separate vicariate-general for Opole Silesia (Śląsk Opolski). From 1947 he repeatedly campaigned for the freedom to teach religion, which had been reduced by the authorities. In October 1952 he called on Catholics in the Katowice diocese to collect signatures for a petition to the Council of State demanding the restoration of religion classes in schools. Around seventy thousand signatures were collected. Communist authorities considered this action as anti-state. It demanded that the Episcopate condemn Adamski's activities. Since the Episcopate refused to do so, on 7 November 1952, under a decree by the Special Committee for Struggle against Fraud and Economic Sabotage, Adamski was expelled from the diocese for five years. He went to an Ursuline convent in Lipnica near Otorowo, county of Szamotuły. He was under constant surveillance by the secret police there. He returned to Katowice on 5 November 1956. He published over three hundred works. (AGr)

Sources: Wielkopolski słownik biograficzny (Warsaw and Poznań, 1981); K. Szaraniec, Ks. Stanisław Adamski, parts 1–3 (Katowice, 1990–91); Księża społecznicy w Wielkopolsce 1894–1919. Słownik biograficzny, vol. 1 (Gniezno, 1992); Andrzej Grajewski, Wygnanie (Katowice, 1995); Słownik biograficzny Katolickiego Duchowieństwa Śląskiego XIX i XX wieku (Katowice, 1996).

ADY Endre (22 November 1877, Érmindszent, Transylvania–27 January 1919, Budapest), Hungarian poet. Ady came from an impoverished Calvinist gentry family. He started writing as a student at a Calvinist high school in Zilah (1892–96). During his law studies in Debrecen and Budapest, which he failed to complete, he mixed the writing of poems with that of columns and articles for the local press. In 1903 he met Adél Brüll, the wife of a wealthy merchant. His passionate love for her made a strong impact on his future life. In 1904 he followed her to Paris and to Bavaria and Italy, where, among other things, he studied the poetry of Charles Baudelaire and Paul Verlaine. Enchanted by their poetry, he translated it into Hungarian. In 1906 Ady published his first volume, Új versek (New poems), which was a breakthrough in his career and made him one of the champions of Hungarian literary life. Apart from passionate love poems, the volume included a poetic vision of the Hungarian past and present. Ady also expressed his prophetic fears of turmoil and defeats that Hungary was soon to experience. After returning home, he settled in Budapest, where in 1907–12 he published five other volumes: Vér és arany (Gold and blood); Az Illés szekere (Chariots of Elijah); Szeretném, ha szeretnének (I would like to if they wanted); A minden titkok versei (Poems of all secrets); and Menekülő élet (Passing life). Apart from developing earlier motifs, including fears of a revolution, these volumes recorded the existential struggles of the author and his longing for a wider presence of God in the world. At this time Ady drew closer to the literary vanguard centered on the periodical Nyugat (1908–41).

In 1912 Ady became a member of a Masonic lodge in Martinovics. He broke off his romance with Brüll, entering into correspondence and then marrying a landowner's daughter, Berta Boncza. His subsequent volumes—A magunk szerelme (Our own love; 1913), Ki látott engem? (Who saw me? 1914), A halottak élén (In the van of the dead; 1918), and the posthumous Az utolsó hajók (Last ships; 1919)—reflected the perplexities of a man torn apart by a growing fear of death (he suffered from advanced syphilis) and a declining enthusiasm concerning his own future and that of his country, a man fearfully watching the development of the war and the emerging European order. In November 1918 he took part in the parliamentary session, at which the Hungarian Republic was proclaimed. He became chairman of the literary association Vörösmarty Akadémia. His funeral turned into a large patriotic manifestation by the residents of Budapest. His literary greatness consisted in the symbolism and personal nature of his lyrics. At the same time he largely influenced the Hungarian national consciousness by mythologizing its past problems and by preaching the hopelessness of individual struggle against the Hungarian “wasteland” and the fragility of independence aspirations of the small Central European nations. (MS)

Sources: Biographisches Lexikon, vol. 1; Aladár Schöpflin, Ady Endre (Budapest, 1934); Watson Kirkconnell, The Poetry of Ady (Budapest, 1937); Guglielmo Capacchi, La poesia di Andrea Ady in una nuova traduzione (Bologna, 1957); Mary Gluck, Endre Ady: An East European Response to the Cultural Crisis of the Fin de Siecle (New York, 1977).

AFTENIE Vasile (14 July 1899, Londroman–10 May 1950, Bucharest), Romanian Greek Catholic bishop, martyr for faith. Aftenie graduated from high school in 1918. In 1917 he was drafted into the army and spent a couple months on the front, mainly in Italy. In 1919 he started theological studies in Blaj and continued them in Rome, where he received a Ph.D. in philosophy and theology in 1925. After returning home, in January 1926 he was ordained, and the following month he became professor at the Theological Academy in Blaj. In 1939 he was appointed rector of this school, and in 1940 he was nominated auxiliary bishop of the Greek Catholic metropolis of Blaj (diocese of Alba Iulia-Făgăraș) and vicar general of Bucharest. After the war, the Communist authorities began the persecution of Greek Catholics and their priests and bishops; on 28 October 1948 Aftenie was arrested along with all five other Greek Catholic bishops and about six hundred priests. The official reason for his arrest was the possession of a letter from Iuliu Maniu. Together with the other bishops, Aftenie was imprisoned in a monastery in Dragoslavele, a summer residence of the Orthodox patriarch of Romania converted into a prison. On 1 December 1948 the Greek Catholic church was banned, and its structure was integrated into the Romanian Orthodox Church. At the end of February 1949 all the bishops were moved to the Căldărușani Monastery near Bucharest. Aftenie was accused of maintaining contacts with partisans resisting the Communist power in the Transylvanian mountains. Interrogated many times in the Ministry of Interior headquarters in Bucharest, he was put in a villa in Sinaia, where Gheorghiu Gheorghiu-Dej and Patriarch Justinian tried to make him agree to join the Orthodox Church and offered him the position of Metropolitan of Iași. When Aftenie refused, he was put in the Jilava prison. At the beginning of 1950 he was again interrogated and tortured in the Ministry of Interior headquarters. Moved to Văcărești Prison in Bucharest, he was murdered there particularly brutally on the orders of General Alexandru Nicolschi, and he was buried in the Catholic Bellu Cemetery in Bucharest. (LW)

Sources: Józef Darski, Rumunia: Historia, współczesność, konflikty narodowe (Warsaw, 1995); Paul Caravia, Virgiliu Constantinescu, and Flori Stănescu, The Imprisoned Church of Romania, 1944–1989 (Bucharest, 1999); Denis Deletant, Communist Terror in Romania: Gheorghiu-Dej and the Police State, 1948–1965 (New York, 1999); www.bru.ro.

AKEL Fredrich Karl (5 September 1871, Kaubi, near Pärnu–3 July 1941, Tallinn), Estonian politician and doctor. Born into the family of a rich stockbreeder, Akel could afford medical studies at the University of Dorpat (Tartu) in 1892–97. Afterwards he worked in its hospital (1897–99). After a short practice in Ujazdów, near Warsaw, he continued his studies in Berlin, Prague, and Leipzig (1901). For a short time he worked in an ophthalmological clinic in Riga, and then he continued his own practice in Tallinn (1902–4 and 1905–12). During the Russo-Japanese War he served in the tsarist army. In 1912 he founded his own ophthalmological clinic. Respect and popularity, which he had gained as a doctor, helped him win election to the Tallinn City Council. For many years he was also a justice of the peace in Tallinn-Haapsalu. In 1920–22 he was a lay deputy chairman of the consistory of the Estonian Lutheran Church and one of the leaders of the Christian People’s Party (Kristlik Rahvaerakond [CPP]). On its behalf he won mandates in the second and third parliamentary terms. Despite moderate support (8–10 percent of the vote), the CPP, in which the Protestant clergy played an important role, had a significant influence in the fragmented Estonian parliament. In 1922–23 Akel was ambassador to Finland and then foreign minister (1923–24). From 26 March to 16 December 1924 he was the head of state (riigivanem). His was a minority government, which nevertheless tried to deal with inflation and problems with foreign payments (among other things) caused by the collapse and closing of the Russian market. Reforms carried out by the minister of finance, Otto Strandmann, though temporarily painful, were successful in the long run and helped to accelerate economic development in the late 1920s.

At first a supporter of parliamentary democracy, Akel gradually accepted authoritarian rule. In 1926–27 he was foreign minister again, and later he served as ambassador to Sweden (1928–34); after the Konstantin Päts coup he became ambassador to Germany (1934–36) and a member of the Upper House of parliament (1938–40). In 1936 he became head of diplomacy again, developing a pro-German line in which he saw a chance to maintain independence in case of Soviet aggression. He also continued rapprochement with Sweden but failed to gain its engagement in the defense of Estonia. He supported the idea of an alliance of the Baltic states with Poland and pressed Lithuania to improve its relations with Poland.

During the Lithuanian-Polish crisis of March 1938 he called on President Antanas Smetona, supporting Polish postulates of normalization, and he helped in bilateral negotiations that were mostly held in Tallinn. Akel sat on the boards of the Northern Baltic Association of Doctors, the Tallinn Society of Folk Education, the Tallinn Loan and Insurance Company, and the Kreditpank. He also presided over the Society for Construction of the Estonia Theater and the Estonia Society in Tallinn. From 1907 he was chairman of the sports association Kalev in Tallinn, and he was the first chairman of the Estonian Olympic Committee (1923–31). In 1927–32 he was the Estonian representative to the International Olympics Committee. Arrested by the NKVD on 17 October 1940, Akel was shot. (AG)

Sources: Evald Uustalu, The History of Estonian People (London, 1952); Tõnu Parming, The Collapse of Liberal Democracy and the Rise of Authoritarianism in Estonia (London, 1975); Piotr Łossowski, Stosunki polsko-estońskie 1918–1939 (Gdańsk, 1992); Matti Laur, Tõnis Lukas, Ain Mäesalu, and Ago Pajur Tõnu Tannberg, History of Estonia (Tallinn, 2000); www.eok.ee/olympialiikumine.php?view;www.president.ee/eng/riigipead/FriedrichAkel.

AKINCHITS Fabiyan (20 January 1886, Akinchitse, near Stolbtsy [Stołpcę]–7 March 1943, Minsk), Belorussian politician. Between 1906 and 1913 Akinchits studied law at St. Petersburg University. In 1906 he became a member of the Russian Socialist Revolutionary Party. Having completed his studies, he worked as a defense attorney. In 1917 he joined the Bolsheviks. In 1923 he returned to his native land, which at that time was incorporated within Poland. He started working as a teacher in Zasulye, and he opened an office providing services in application writing and legal advice. In 1926 he allied himself with the Belorussian Peasant and Worker Hromada, and he became a member of the party executive. As defense attorney, he represented Hromada activists during political trials, and he coordinated the work of Hromada's parliamentary club. In November 1926 he became president of the Vilnius branch of the party, and he was the leader of the so-called nationalist current, which vied with the pro-Soviet and Communist current for influence in the organization. In January 1927 Polish authorities arrested Hromada leaders on charges of conducting activities aimed at separating the Eastern Borderland (Kresy) from Poland. The Vilnius court sentenced Akinchits to eight years in prison.

In July 1930 Akinchits was the last member of the Hromada leadership to leave prison, and he refused at the same time to go to the USSR. He joined the Central Council of Belorussian Cultural and Economic Organizations (Centrsayuz), a movement led by Anton Lutskievich. As a rival organization to the Communist movement, it was supported by the Polish government. Akinchits became a member of the leadership of the movement and he edited its newspapers, Napierad and Bielaruskii zvon. In 1931 he published Chamu tak stalasia? (Why did it happen?), in which he proved that the Communist ideology was disastrous to the Belorussian movement. Soon he left the ranks of Centrsayuz, accusing Lutskievich of leftist leanings. In May 1931 he created the Vilnius Belorussian group called Revival, with a pro-Polish orientation. In 1933, along with Władysław Kozłowski, he began to publish the magazine Novy shlahk, which initiated the consolidation of the Belorussian nationalist movement. In 1937 he formed the Belorussian National Socialist Party (BNSP). The party, whose ideas bordered on German fascism, was banned by the Polish authorities. In June 1939 the congress of the BNSP was held in Gdańsk. At the congress it was decided that the future of independent Belorussia would be built in alliance with the Germans. From June 1939 Akinchits worked in the Belorussian Bureau of the Ministry of Propaganda of the Third Reich. At the beginning of 1940, within the framework of the Reich Ministry for the Occupied Eastern Territories, he became president of the Belorussian Committee in Warsaw, and a year later he was appointed head of a Belorussian school for propaganda workers near Berlin. He was assassinated during one of his visits to Minsk; the assassination was probably inspired by a rival group of Belorussian activists who collaborated with the Germans. His death was later announced as a success of the Soviet underground in the struggle against collaborators. (EM)

Sources: Entsyklapiedyia historyi Belarusi, vol. 1 (Minsk, 1994); Wielka Encyklopedia PWN, vol. 1 (Warsaw, 2001); Nicholas P. Vakar, Belorussia: The Making of a Nation (Cambridge, Mass., 1956); Y. Vapa, "Fabiyan Akinchits i iahony chas," Niva, 1993, nos. 38–41.

AKSYONAU [Aksyonov] Aleksandr (9 October 1924, Kuntarovka, near Homyel), Soviet party and state activist in Belorussia. In 1941–42 Aksyonau worked in a kolkhoz. In 1941 he graduated from the Higher Pedagogical School in Homyel, and in 1942–43 he served in the Red Army. From 1944 he worked in the apparatus of the Lenin Association of Communist Youth of Belorussia in Orenburg, Baranavichy, and Hrodna. From 1945 a member of the CPSU and from 1956 a member of the Central Committee (CC) of the Communist Party of Belorussia (CPB), in 1957 he became first secretary of the Komsomol in Belorussia and a member of the CPB Politburo, and he graduated from the Higher Party School in Moscow. In 1959 he became deputy chairman of the KGB of the Belorussian SSR, and from 1960 to 1965 he was minister of interior of the Belorussian republic, supervising repression against people not loyal enough to the Soviet system. In 1965 he became first secretary of the CPB District Committee in Vitebsk and in 1971, secretary of the CPB CC. From 1978 to 1983 he was prime minister of the Belorussian republican government and from 1983 to 1985 Soviet ambassador to Poland. In 1985 he became chairman of the Soviet State Television and Radio Committee, and in 1989 he retired. (EM)

Sources: Belaruskaya SRR. Kratkaya entsyklopediya, vol. 5 (Minsk, 1982); Entsyklapedyia historyi Belarusi, vol. 1 (Minsk, 1994); Borys Lewytzkij, ed., Who's Who in the Soviet Union (Munich, 1984); Leonard Geron and Alex Pravda, eds., Who's Who in Russia and the New States (London, 1993).

ALAPY Gyula [originally Alapi] (18 December 1911, Komárom–18 February 1982, Fonyód), Hungarian Communist activist. Alapy was the son of the chief archivist of Komárom and of an heiress of the Frank-Kiss family, which owned many factories in town and in the neighborhood. After the Treaty of Trianon (1920) the family stayed in Czechoslovakia. In 1930 Alapy joined the Social Democratic Party and took part in leftist student group activities. He graduated in law from Brno University in 1934, and then he worked as an defense attorney in Érsekújvár (Nové Zámky). During World War II Catholic priests saved him and his Jewish mother from deportation and death. In 1945 he moved to Hungary, where from mid-1948 he belonged to the Hungarian Social Democratic Party, then to the (Communist) Hungarian Workers' Party, and from 1956 to the Hungarian Socialist Workers' Party (HSWP). In 1945–46 Alapy worked in the public prosecutor's office in Győr, and from 1946 to 1948 he was its chairman. From July 1948 to February 1949 he was a member of the Chief Prosecutor's Office (CPO) in Budapest, and in January 1949 he was the chief plaintiff in the trial of Cardinal József Mindszenty. For his role in the trial he was nominated CPO chairman. He was a ruthless tool of the Mátyás Rákosi dictatorship, passing numerous death sentences, and he frequently repeated that “there is only one way to get rid of mad dogs—they must be killed.” He was the chief plaintiff in many political show trials, such as those of László Rajk, József Kóvágó, police and army officers, and many others. All together he passed about twenty death sentences in political trials. In 1956 he was dismissed and left for the USSR. He returned to Hungary in March 1958 and worked at the Institute of Law of the Hungarian Academy of Sciences. Later he worked as a legal adviser in a power and gas meter enterprise. In 1972 he retired. The only punishment he suffered was expulsion from the HSWP for the abuse of “socialist law and order” in 1962. In a state of depression he probably committed suicide. (JT)

Sources: Új Magyar Életrajzi Lexikon, vol. 1 (Budapest, 2001); Magyarország 1944–1956, CD-ROM (Budapest, 2001).

ALDEA Aurel (28 March 1887, Slatina–17 October 1949, Aiud), Romanian general. After graduating from the War College in Bucharest, Aldea steadily rose in the ranks of the army. As one of the closest advisers to King Michael, in May 1944 he took part in the first meeting of the king with representatives of the opposition to Marshal Ion Antonescu; the purpose of the meeting was to effect the withdrawal of Romania from an alliance with the Germans. He also took part in a crucial meeting of the king with Antonescu on 23 August 1944, during which the dictator was removed from power and arrested. Aldea became minister of the interior in the government of General Constantin Sănătescu, which was established after the coup, and he held the post until the beginning of November. Next, he was commander of territorial defense until 24 March 1945. Removed from this position, in the summer of that year he started to cooperate with the anti-Communist underground, and he soon became head of the National Resistance Movement (Mișcarea Națională de Rezistență), which included such armed groups as the Haiduks of Avram Iancu (Haiducii lui Avram Iancu) and the Grey Greatcoats (Graiuul Sangelui). In May 1946 Aldea was arrested on the grounds of plotting to “destroy the unity of the Romanian state.” He was accused of directing the anti-Communist resistance movement and was also falsely charged with supporting Hungarian separatism in Transylvania. On 18 November 1946 he was sentenced to hard labor for life. He died of heart disease in prison. (WR) Sources: Ivor Porter, Operation Autonomous: With S.O.E. in Wartime Romania (London, 1989); Dennis Deletant, Communist Terror in Romania: Gheorghiu-Dej and the Police State, 1948–1965 (New York, 1999).

ALEKSA Jonas (25 December 1879, Kumetiškiai, Samogetia–20 April 1955, Tomsk), Lithuanian politician. Aleksa studied sociology and the natural sciences at Moscow University (1900–1907) and agronomy at the Agricultural Academy in Warsaw (1914–15). In 1902 he was temporarily arrested for anti-tsarist activities. During World War I he worked in Voronezh and was co-founder of the Populist Democratic National League of Freedom (Demokratine Tautos Laisves Santara), in brief called Santara. In 1918 he returned to Lithuania and became head of a department in the Ministry of Agriculture. From June 1920 to February 1922 and from February to June 1923 he was minister of agriculture. In 1925, along with Petras Leonas and Vaclovas Sidzikauskas, he was a founder of the Lithuanian Peasant Party (Lietuvos Ūkininkų Partija [LPP]). From 1925 he lectured in agrarian economics at Kaunas University. After the Nationalist coup of December 1926 the LPP supported the new government of Augustinas Voldemaras, and Aleksa became the minister of agriculture again. When the Nationalists dissolved the parliament in 1927, the LPP withdrew its support for the regime, but Aleksa stayed in the government as head of a new group called Peasant Unity, which enjoyed the support of rich peasants from southern Lithuania. As a result of the Great Depression, in September 1935 the group stopped supporting the government, so Aleksa gave up his position. He became chairman of the Agricultural Chamber and director of a cooperative bank.

After the Soviet invasion of June 1940 Aleksa was arrested, and his family was deported to Siberia. He was released after the German invasion in June 1941. Together with former president Kazys Grinius and former minister of agriculture Reverend Mykolas Krupavičius, he signed a memorandum to the German authorities protesting the expropriation of Lithuanians and the extermination of Jews. In the fall of 1942 he was arrested by the Gestapo and deported to Germany. After the end of the war he returned to Lithuania to reunite with his family, but in 1948 he was arrested and sentenced to forced labor in a camp near Krasnoyarsk. In 1952 he was allowed to reunite with his family in Tomsk, but he soon died. He authored the following among other works: Lietuvių tautos likimo klausimo (On the fate of the Lithuanian nation; 1925); Ūkininkai ir jų jėga (Peasants and their strength; 1929); Mūsų žemės ūkio reikalu (On our agricultural situation; 1930); and Lietuviškųjų gyvenimo kelių beieškant (In search of a Lithuanian way of life; 1933). (WR) Sources: EL, vols. 1 and 6; Piotr Łossowski, Kraje bałtyckie na drodze od demokracji parlamentarnej do dyktatury 1918–1934 (Wrocław, 1972); Wojciech Roszkowski, “Litewskie partie chłopskie (1905–1970), in Krzysztof Jasiewicz, ed., Europa nieprowincjonalna (Warsaw, 1999).

ALEKSA-ANGARIETIS Zigmās (25 June 1882, Obelutšiai, near Vilkauiškis–22 June 1940, Moscow), Lithuanian Communist activist. Born into a peasant family, after finishing secondary school, Aleksa-Angarietis enrolled in the Warsaw Veterinary Institute, and he took up revolutionary activities. In 1904 he was expelled from the institute and arrested. Released in 1905, he joined the Social Democratic Party of Lithuania. Between 1908 and 1909 he published the newspaper Darbininku zodis. Arrested in Marijampole in 1909, he was held in prison for two years, and then he was sentenced to deportation to the region of the Angara River in Siberia. After the February 1917 revolution he arrived in Petrograd and joined the leadership of the Lithuanian Bolsheviks. He also published the newspaper Tiesa. He took an active part in the Bolshevik coup in November 1917, and he started working in the Commissariat of Nationalities of the Council of People’s Commissars. In November 1918 he arrived in Vilnius to conduct underground Communist activity. After the invasion by the Red Army at the beginning of 1919, he was appointed commissar of the interior of the Lithuanian-Belorussian SSR. He became notorious for his atrocities against “the enemies of the people.” After the collapse of the Lithuanian-Belorussian SSR he worked in Smolensk, writing articles and brochures. In 1921 in Smolensk he published, for example, Lietuvos revoliucinio judėjimo ir darbininkų kovos istorija (History of the revolutionary movement and of the workers’ struggle in Lithuania, 2 vols.). From 1920 he was secretary of the Foreign Office of the Communist Party of Lithuania Central Committee, and from 1924 he was a member of the Politburo of the party. He also represented Lithuania in the Communist International. In the 1920s he supported Stalin in his struggle against Leon Trotsky. Between 1926 and 1935 he was secretary of the International Control Committee of the Comintern. Arrested by the NKVD in Moscow on 17 March 1938, he was held on remand for over two years, and then he was executed by firing squad. (WR)

Sources: EL, vol. 1; MERSH, vol. 1; Lazitch; Saulius Sužiedelis, Historical Dictionary of Lithuania (Lanham, Md., 1997); R. Šarmaitis, “Zigmās Angarietis,” Kommunist, no. 7 (Vilnius, 1956); Alfred E. Senn, The Emergence of Modern Lithuania (New York, 1959).

ALEKSANDROV Todor (14 February 1881, Štip–31 August 1924, near Melnik), Macedonian revolutionary and politician. Very early on Aleksandrov got involved in the Macedonian revolutionary and nationalist movement, and he was one of the leaders of the Internal Macedonian Revolutionary Organization (Vnatrešna Makedonska Revolucionerna Organizacija [IMRO]). At first he opposed Turkish rule, and during the Balkan Wars (1912–13) he represented a pro-Bulgarian option. After the defeat of Turkey he opposed Greek and Serb interests in Macedonia. After World War I, in opposition to the leftist federalists in the IMRO, who wanted to associate the organization with the Kingdom of Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes (SHS), he suggested an autonomous Macedonia with Salonika as its capital. Tensions between the IMRO factions led to sharp conflict and a split in the organization. Along with General Alexander Protogerov, Aleksandrov assumed command of the right wing of the IMRO (the so-called autonomists), also in opposition to the Bulgarian Populist government of Aleksandur Stamboliyski. Aleksandrov's troops controlled Pirin Macedonia and organized attacks into Vardar Macedonia, inside the SHS Kingdom. In 1922 the Bulgarian authorities arrested him temporarily for his actions against the Stamboliyski regime. Aleksandrov took part in the coup that overthrew and killed Stamboliyski in June 1923. The new Bulgarian prime minister, Aleksandur Tsankov, supported Aleksandrov and his autonomists. As he failed to accomplish his goals, Aleksandrov began to cooperate with Croat nationalists and with the Young Turks who ruled in Istanbul. Finally he drew closer to the Communist International. In May 1924 he signed an agreement of cooperation with the leftist faction of IMRO federalists, but in practice he remained mistrustful of them. He also got involved in a conflict concerning the cooperation of the IMRO with the Soviet Union. As a result of this conflict, his comrades murdered him. There are several theories concerning his death. In 1994 his Dnevnik i korespondencija ot prvata svecka vojna, 1915–1918 g. (Diary and correspondence from World War I, 1915–1918) was published. (MC)

Sources: Biographisches Lexikon, vol. 1; Mercia MacDermott, For Freedom and Perfection: The Life of Yané Sandansky (London and Nyack, N.Y., 1988); Zagovorut protiv Todor Aleksandrov po dannii na Vutreshnata makedonska revoliutsionna organizatsiia (Sofia, 1991); Todor Aleksandrov. Zhivot-legenda: Avtobiogr., spomeni, interviuta i dr. materialii: Biblioteka Arkhiv (Sofia, 1991); Decho Dobrinov, Posledn'i'at 't'sar na planinite: Biografichen ocherk za Todor Aleksandrov, 1881–1924 (Sofia, 1992); Irena Stawowy-Kawka, Historia Macedonii (Wrocław, 2000).

ALEKSIYEVICH Svyatlana (31 May 1948, Ivano-Frankovsk), Belorussian journalist and writer. After graduating from high school in Kopytkovichy in Polesie in 1965, Aleksiyevich worked as a tutor in a boarding school, a teacher of history and German, and a journalist for the local press in Naroulja and Byaroza. In 1972 she graduated in journalism at the Belorussian State University in Minsk. She worked at Syelskaya gazeta (1972–73) and at a literary monthly, Nioman (1973–84). She made her literary debut in 1975. In 1985 she published her first novel, U vayny nye zhenskoye litso (War has no female face), which garnered a lot of criticism for downplaying the heroic image of Soviet women during World War II, for “nihilism,” and for spreading “pacifist” views, but as a result of perestroika, about 2 million sold copies made her famous in Soviet literary circles. She won more fame and international recognition for another novel, Tsynkovye malchiki (Tin boys; 1989), which described the cruelty of the Afghan war, but Aleksiyevich was sued for slandering the honor of Soviet officers and soldiers. Her next book, Chernobylskaya molitva (The Prayer of Chernobyl; 1997), showed a world endangered by the accumulation of the technical means of extermination. Her books have been published in nineteen countries, and she has received a number of prestigious national and international awards. Since 1989 Aleksiyevich has been a member of the Belorussian PEN club. (EM)

Sources: Bielaruskiya pismienniki. Biyabibliyahraficzny slounik, vol. 1 (Minsk, 1992); Bielaruskiya pismienniki 1917–1990 (Minsk, 1994); Kto iest kto w Respublike Belarus (Minsk, 1999).

ALEXANDER I Karadjordjević (16 December 1888, Cetinje, Montenegro–9 October 1934, Marseilles, France), king of the Kingdom of Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes and king of the Kingdom of Yugoslavia. Alexander I spent his youth in Geneva and St. Petersburg. In 1903, after the overthrow of the Obrenović dynasty, his father, Peter I Karadjordjević, became king. In 1909, when his elder brother renounced his right of succession, Alexander came back to Serbia. A successful commander in the Balkan Wars of 1912–13, he was appointed regent on 24 June 1914. During World War I he served as commander-in-chief of Serbia's armed forces. On 31 October 1918 he triumphantly entered Belgrade, and on 1 December, as prince regent, he proclaimed the creation of the Kingdom of Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes. On 28 June 1921 there was an unsuccessful attempt on his life. On 16 June 1921 he succeeded his father as king. As the main representative of the Greater Serbia orientation, he belonged to the opponents of federalism.

The main sources of conflict in the Kingdom of Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes were the issues of a centralist versus a federal model of state and ethnic strife. On 20 June 1928 a Radical Party deputy shot dead two Croat Peasant Party deputies in the parliament and injured three others, among them Stjepan Radić, who soon died. This caused a very serious national crisis. On 6 January 1929 Alexander dissolved the parliament, abolished the centralist constitution of 1921, rendered all political parties illegal, dismissed communal self-government, introduced censorship, and established a royal dictatorship. On 3 October 1929, by decree, he changed the previous name of the country to the Kingdom of Yugoslavia. He also introduced an administrative reform, replacing the former thirty-three departments with nine banovine. They were headed by a ban nominated by the king. Alexander's intention was to put an end to the historical division into nations and create a unified Yugoslav state, which, he believed, would help suppress the constant ethnic conflicts. The Great Depression of the 1930s added to the domestic problems, and social discontent increased. On 9 September 1931 Alexander promulgated a new constitution that sanctioned dictatorship. However, neither the opening of the new parliament nor frequent government changes by Alexander helped to relieve the tensions in Yugoslavia. The Croatian Peasant Party insisted on the reorganization of the state on the basis of the equal rights of the nations. Also, the Slovene People's Party joined in criticizing the existing form of government. The authorities responded by repressing the politicians of the opposition parties. In December 1933 the Croatian Ustaše carried out an unsuccessful attempt on Alexander's life.

In foreign policy Alexander opted for maintaining the Versailles order. An alliance with France was of primary importance. Part of the pro-French policy was to include Yugoslavia in the Little Entente, created in 1920–22, whose members were also Czechoslovakia and Romania. Alexander engaged his country in the Balkan Entente (comprised of Greece, Turkey, and Romania), formed in February 1934, and he managed to improve relations with Bulgaria. During a visit to Marseilles, Alexander and the French foreign minister, Louis Barthou, were shot dead by Vlada Makedonski vel Velicko Georgijev-Kerin, a Macedonian linked with the Croatian Ustaše who was lynched on the spot by the crowd. (AO)

Sources: Biographisches Lexikon, vol. 1; Waclaw Felczak and Tadeusz Wasilewski, Historia Jugosławii (Wrocław, 1985); Barbara Jelavich, History of the Balkans, Twentieth Century, vol. 2 (Cambridge, 1983); Mark Biondich, Stjepan Radić, the Croat Peasant Party, and the Politics of Mass Mobilization, 1904–1928 (Toronto, 2000).

ALEXANDER Obrenović (14 August 1876, Belgrade–11 June 1903, Belgrade), king of Serbia, son of Milan and Natalie, née Keško. After his father's abdication, on 6 March 1889 Alexander ascended the throne, although the real power was exercised by three regents: Jovan Ristić, Kosta Protić, and Jovan Beli-Marković. In April 1893 Alexander declared himself of age and, against the terms of the constitution, he began to reign. In January 1894 his father returned to Belgrade to prevent anarchy and to support Alexander in his struggle against Radical Party leaders. The latter represented peasants and part of the lower middle class, and at that time they showed a sympathy toward socialism. In May 1894 Alexander suspended the relatively liberal constitution of 1888 and restored the conservative constitution of 1869. Inter-party strife intensified in the country. The splits were deepened by a conflict between Milan and his wife, Queen Natalie, who was backed by the Radicals. Alexander sometimes obeyed his father and sometimes followed his mother's advice. In 1899, after an unsuccessful assassination attempt on Milan, a state of emergency was declared, and radical leaders were arrested. In 1900 Alexander caused a scandal by marrying Draga Mašin, the widow of a Czech engineer and a former lady-in-waiting to Queen Natalie, and by rejecting proposals to marry the Princess of Montenegro. This led to a conflict between Alexander and his father, who soon broke off relations with his son, left Serbia, and died in Vienna in February 1901.

On 19 April 1900 Alexander accepted a new constitution, which slightly increased the importance of the parliament (Skupština). Some Radicals became reconciled with the king, but not for long. He introduced an absolutist reign. In March 1903 he again suspended the constitution. As a result, an anti-royalist demonstration took place in Belgrade, organized by Dimitr Tucivić, the founder of the Social Democratic Party. During the demonstration several people were killed. Alexander restored the constitution, but he soon dissolved the parliament and ordered new elections. On the night of 10–11 June 1903 a group of officers staged a coup, killing Alexander, his wife Draga, her two brothers, and three ministers. The next day the army proclaimed the accession to the throne of Peter Karadjordjević. Such was the end of the Obrenović dynasty, which had ruled in Serbia from 1815. Simultaneously, there ended a period of subordination of Serb interests to the interests of Austria-Hungary, and the balance of power in the Balkans changed substantially. (AO)

Sources: Biographisches Lexikon, vol. 1; Vladan Georgevitch, Das Ende der Obrenovitch: Beiträge zur Geschichte Serbiens 1897 bis 1900 (Leipzig, 1905); Chedomille Mijatovic, A Royal Tragedy (London, 1906); Slobodan Jovanović, Vlada Aleksandra Obrenovicia, vols. 1–3 (Belgrade 1934/36); Wayne S. Vucinich, Serbia between East and West: The Events of 1903–1908 (Stanford, 1954); Michael B. Petrovich, A History of Modern Serbia 1804–1918, vols. 1–2 (New York, 1976); Waclaw Felczak and Tadeusz Wasilewski, Historia Jugosławii (Wrocław, 1985).

ALIA Ramiz (18 October 1925, Shkodër), Communist leader of Albania. Alia came from a poor Muslim family. Between 1939 and 1940 he belonged to a Fascist organization, the Albanian Lictorian Youth, and in 1942 he joined the Union of Communist Youth. In April 1943 he joined the Albanian Communist Party and became the leader of a party unit in Berat. After the collapse of the Italian occupation he joined the National Liberation Army, serving as political commissar in the Seventh Partisan Brigade and at the end of the war in the Fifth Division. Under the patronage of Enver Hoxha he rose rapidly in the government hierarchy. From 1944 to 1948 he was secretary general of the Communist youth organization, the Union of Working Youth of Albania. He completed shortened studies in a party school in Moscow, becoming a Stalinist apparatchik.

Beginning in February 1948 Alia worked in the Office of Propaganda and Agitation of the Communist Party's Central Committee, and from September 1948 he was a member of the CC. From 1950 he was a deputy to the People's Assembly. Between 1955 and 1958 he was minister of education; in 1958 he was again a deputy to the People's Assembly, and in 1961 he became a member of the Politburo of the CC of the Party of Labor of Albania (PLA). From 1960 he was also a member of the Secretariat of the CC. In 1965 he headed the Albanian delegation at the congress of the Communist Party of China in Beijing. As chair of the Commission for Foreign Affairs of the People's Assembly, Alia followed the pro-Chinese policy of Hoxha. After breaking away from Beijing and after the removal of Prime Minister Mehmet Shehu, in November 1982 he became president of the Assembly, thus the titular head of state. In fact Alia advanced to the second-highest position in the government hierarchy and was jointly responsible for the policy of terror in the country. After Hoxha's death, on 13 April 1985 Alia took over the post of first secretary of the CC of the PLA. In November 1986 the Ninth Congress of the party decided to maintain the "revolutionary legacy" of Hoxha, realized by Alia. In 1990 he was also appointed president of the republic.

When the Communist government in Albania collapsed in February 1991, Alia began to clear the vestiges of Hoxha's rule and tried to anticipate events by making personnel changes at the highest levels. These were meant to ease mounting social tensions but proved ineffective. Yielding to opposition pressures, on 21 December 1991 Alia fixed a date for by-elections, which were held in March 1992 and brought victory to the opposition Democratic Party of Albania. On 3 April 1992 he resigned as president. Soon after the delegalization of the Communist Party he was arrested and sentenced to ten years' imprisonment for embezzlement and corruption. In July 1995 he was released under amnesty, but in February 1996 he was arrested again. After one year of preventive arrest he stood trial. He was accused, among other things, of sending thousands of people to forced labor camps and of giving orders to shoot people who had illegally tried to cross the border. When the Communists came to power in 1998, Alia was released from prison. (WD, WR)

Sources: Alia Ramiz: Ditari i burgut (Athens, n.d.); Unë, Ramiz Alia: Dëshmoj për historinë (Tirana, 1993); Who's Who in the Socialist Countries of Europe (Munich, London, and Paris, 1989); Stavro Skendi, Albania (New York, 1956); Jerzy Hauziński and Jan Leśny, Historia Albanii (Wrocław, 1992); www.rulers.org

ALIJAGIĆ Alija (20 November 1895, Bijeljina–8 March 1922, Zagreb), Bosnian Communist. Born into an impoverished Bosnian Muslim family, Alijagić worked as a carpenter's apprentice in Sarajevo, where he joined a trade union in 1912. Mobilized into the Austro-Hungarian army, he was temporarily arrested for disloyalty. In 1919 he joined the Socialist Workers' Party of Yugoslavia (from June 1920 the Communist Party of Yugoslavia) and in March 1921, the organization Red Truth (Crvena Pravda), which organized terrorist attacks against the authorities of the Kingdom of Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes. On 21 June 1921 he murdered Minister of interior Milorad Drašković, who, in reply to Communist terrorist attacks, had dissolved Communist organizations and banned revolutionary propaganda. Alijagić was captured and tried. Despite the efforts of his defense team, which argued that he had acted for political reasons, he was sentenced to death in October 1921 and executed. In Communist Yugoslavia he was remembered as a revolutionary hero. (WR) Sources: Enciklopedija Jugoslavije, vol. 1 (Zagreb, 1955); Hrvatski biografski leksikon, vol. 1 (Zagreb, 1983); Ivo Politeo, Politički delikt (Zagreb, 1921).

ALITI Abdurahman (1945, Zhelino, near Tetovo), Macedonian Albanian politician. Aliti graduated in law from Ss. Cyril and Methodius University in Skopje in 1969. From 1970 he worked in the City Council of Tetovo. In 1990 he was elected a delegate of ethnic Albanians to the government of the Socialist Republic of Macedonia. From the first free elections of November 1990, he served as MP. He was also head of the Party for Democratic Prosperity (Partija za Demokratski Prosperitet/Partia ë prosperiteti demokratike [PDP]), founded in 1991. Aliti was presiding over the party when, in 1994, Arben Xhaferi broke away with a faction. Vice-president of the Macedonian parliament (Sobranie) from 1994 to 1998, Aliti has been a centrist and has supported integration but not assimilation. He has been active in the pursuit of equal rights for Albanians in Macedonia. Owing to the vagaries of Albanian politics in Macedonia, he was eclipsed and replaced by Imer Imeri in the mid-1990s. In 2000, he stood against Stojan Andov for Speaker of the Parliament but lost. Imeri resigned in 2002, and Aliti once more became head of the PDP, albeit in a controversial election. (DP)

Sources: Duncan Perry, "Republic of Macedonia: On the Road to Stability or Destruction?" Transition, 25 August 1995; Valentina Georgieva and Sasha Konechni, Historical Dictionary of the Republic of Macedonia (Lanham, Md., 1998).

ALIZOTI bey Fejzi (September 1874, Gjirokastra–March 1945, Tirana), Albanian politician. Alizoti studied administration and finance at university in Istanbul. From being an Ottoman official in Lebanon, he advanced to the position of governor (mutesarraf) of Libya and Anatolia. In 1904 he returned to Albania, becoming prefect of Korça.

For his contacts with the Albanian national movements he was removed to Kurdistan, and during the Italian-Turkish war he was interned for a few months. After release in 1911, he became governor of Prizren. In 1912 in Vlorë he signed the Albanian declaration of independence and became minister of the interior in the government of Is-mail Kemal. When Prince Wilhelm von Wied came to Albania, Alizoti became secretary general in the Ministry of Interior. When in July 1915 Montenegrin troops entered Shkodër, he was arrested, but during the Austro-Hungarian occupation of Shkoder he helped to create an Albanian administration and became prefect of the town. When in 1918 a pro-Italian government was established in Durrës, he became its minister of finance. His pro-Italian sympathies were the reason for his arrest by the authorities of the Albanian state during the aggravation of a conflict over the control of Vlorë with Italy in 1920. Aliti returned to public life at a time of renewed Albanian-Italian cooperation. In 1926 he was on the board of directors of the National Bank of Albania, and in 1927 he became minister of finance. He was the author of spare budgets in the early 1930s. He wrote economic articles for leading government periodicals. It was then that he began to be accused of taking payoffs from the Italians. After the Italian invasion of April 1939 he was among the highest-ranking politicians who cooperated with the Italians. He was ranked among the “professionals of Gjirokaster”—that is, those experienced in state administration. A member of the Albanian Fascist Party, he also edited its organ, Fashizmi. In the first collaboration government of Shefqet bey Vërlaci (12 April 1939–3 December 1941) Aliti was minister of finance. In August 1941 he was appointed civil commissioner of New Albania (Kosovo). Captured by the Communist partisans and tried as the main defendant in a show trial in Tirana, on 1 March 1945 Aliti was sentenced to death and soon executed. (TC)

Sources: Jacomoni di San Savino Francesco, La politica dell'Italia in Albania (Rocca San Casciano, 1965); Pepa Pjeter, Dosja e diktaturës (Tirana, 1995); Gaçe Bardhosh, Ata që shpallën Pavarësinë Kombëtare (Tirana, 1997); Bernd Fischer, Albania at War 1939–1945 (London, 1999).

ALLIK Hendrik (15 March 1901, Abja–8 May 1989, Tallinn), Estonian Communist activist. From 1916 Allik worked in a textile factory in Tallinn and was active in the trade unions. In 1917 he joined the Bolshevik party. In 1923 he was coopted to the Central Committee (CC) of the Communist Party of Estonia (CPE) and to the CC of the Estonian Komsomol. For participation in the December 1924 Communist rebellion he was sentenced to twenty-five years in prison. Released due to an amnesty in 1938, he became a member of the CPE Politburo. After the incorporation of Estonia into the USSR, from mid-1940 to mid-1941 he was the Soviet commissioner for industry. In 1942–43 he served on the front as political commissar, and then he was deputy prime minister of the Estonian SSR. After the restoration of Soviet control, in 1945–46 he was also minister of agriculture. In 1948 he graduated in economics from the Tallinn Polytechnic Institute. From 1947 he was a member of the Supreme Council of the Estonian SSR. At this time he married the widow of the former prime minister of the Estonian SSR, Olga Johannes Lauristin. In 1950 Allik was accused of “bourgeois nationalism” and sentenced to twenty-five years in prison. Released in 1956, he was reinstated in his previous positions. In 1961–73 he was head of the Planning Commission of the Estonian SSR; from 1958 to 1976 he was a member of the CPE CC; from 1966 to 1970, a member of the Supreme Council of the USSR; and from 1959 to 1967 and from 1971 to 1975, a member of the Supreme Council of the Estonian SSR. His son, Jaan, rejected his father’s Communist stance and sympathized with the democratic opposition. (AG)

Sources: Eesti Entsüklopeedia, vol. 14 (Tallinn, 2000); Rein Taagepera, Estonia: Return to Independence (Boulder, Colo., 1993); Romuald J. Misiunas and Rein Taagepera, The Baltic States: Years of Dependence 1940–1990 (Berkeley, 1993).

ALLIKSAAR Artur (15 April 1923, Tartu–12 August 1966, Tartu), Estonian poet and playwright. In 1942 Alliksaar graduated from high school. During the “thaw” after Stalin’s death he wrote poems combining irony and the surrealist grotesque with reflections on contemporary life in a world of coercion. It was only in 1966 that his play Anonüümne saar (Island with no name) was published; in it reality was absurd, and absurdity became reality. Although known only to a narrow artistic circle, Alliksaar became a champion of nonconformism in the Estonian culture under Communist rule. From a formal point of view his works were characterized by a flexible and musical style, as well as by semantic experiments. He also translated into Estonian the works of Reiner Maria Rilke and Sergey Yesenin. Alliksaar died prematurely of cancer. Two of his major collections were published posthumously: Olematus võiks ju ka olemata olla (Nonexistence cannot exist; 1968) and Luule (Poems; 1976). His works had a very strong influence on Estonian literature in the last stages of communism. (WR)

Sources: Eesti Nõukogude Entsüklopeedia, vol. 1 (Tallinn, 1985); Wielka encyklopedia powszechna, vol. 1 (Warsaw, 2001); Romuald Misiunas and Rein Taagepera, The Baltic States: Years of Dependence 1940–1980 (Berkeley, 1983).

ALSHEUSKI Anatol [originally Yurka Pruzhynski] (4 July 1904, Bereza Kartuska [Byaroza]–1937, USSR), Belorussian Communist activist. In 1919 Alsheuski volunteered for the Red Army. In 1920 he began to study at Sverdlov Memorial Communist University in Moscow, and then he worked in the Bolshevik party apparatus in Ryazan and Nizhny Novgorod. In 1925 he was sent to work in Poland. He was (among other things) secretary of the Communist Youth Association of Western Belorussia, a member of the Central Committee (CC) of the Communist Youth Association of Poland, a member of the CC of the Communist Party of Western Belorussia (CPWB), and editor-in-chief of its press organs, Balszavik and Chyrvony stsiakh. Arrested by the Polish authorities, he was kept in a Warsaw prison, and in 1929 he was exchanged for Soviet political prisoners. He returned to Belorussia and worked as the CPWB representative at the headquarters of the Communist Party (Bolshevik) of Belorussia in Minsk. He published a lot in the Soviet press, mostly propaganda articles on the situation of the “working classes” in Poland. In 1937 he was arrested on the grounds of alleged spying for Poland and was executed by firing squad. (EM)

Sources: U. Kalesnik, Paslanyets Prameteya: Dakumentalnaya apovests (Minsk, 1984); Entsyklopedyia historyi Belarusi, vol. 1 (Minsk, 1993).

ALTER Wiktor (7 February 1890, Mława–4 December 1941, Kuibyshev), Polish-Jewish Socialist politician. Alter was the son of a rich merchant. While at Wojciech Górski High School in Warsaw, he was arrested by the Russian police for organizing a school strike in 1905. At that time he started secret work for the Bund. From 1906 to 1910 he studied in Liege, Belgium, where he qualified as an engineer. In 1912 he returned to Warsaw but was arrested and deported to Narym, in Siberia, in April 1913. He managed to escape and spent 1914–17 in Belgium and Great Britain, where he belonged to the British Labour Party. In March 1917 he returned to Russia. After the Bolshevik revolution he was elected to the Central Committee of the Bund. In late 1918 he returned to Poland to represent the Bund in the Warsaw Council of Workers’ Delegates. He urged the stop of Polish military operations in the east and called for a strike in Polish military works. Nevertheless, during the First Congress of the Polish Bund in Kraków in April 1920, he opposed the party’s access to the Comintern. In mid-1921 he was sent to Moscow to negotiate the Bund’s cooperation with the Comintern but was arrested by the Cheka for contacts with the Social Revolutionaries. Soon released, he returned to Warsaw, where he even more vigorously opposed the Bund’s cooperation with the Comintern. For some time he favored the Vienna International, but in 1930 he moved a resolution in favor of the Bund’s access to the Second International. Along with Henryk Erlich, Alter represented the Bund in it. From 1934 he favored a united front of Communists and Socialists in Poland. He represented Jewish unions in the Central Committee of Trade Unions (Komisja Centralna Związków Zawodowych). In 1937 he was in Spain. He published many articles in the Bund press—for example, “Folks-Tsaytung,” “Nowe pismo,” and “Myśl socjalistyczna.”

When the Third Reich invaded Poland in September 1939, Alter went eastward. Arrested by the NKVD in Kowel, he was released and agreed to organize an international Jewish anti-Fascist committee in Great Britain and the United States. After the Polish-Soviet agreement of July 1941 he got in touch with the Polish Embassy in Kuibyshev and was appointed the embassy’s delegate to Sverdlovsk. During the recruitment of Polish citizens to the army of General Władysław Anders, he opposed Jewish nationalists who wanted separate Jewish troops. On 4 December 1941 he was arrested by the NKVD, along with Erlich, on the grounds of alleged cooperation with Nazi Germany. Both men were soon killed by the Soviets despite the energetic protests of the Polish embassy and the Allied governments. The accusations were absurd, and the whole Alter-Erlich affair remains a political enigma. Alter’s sister, Estera Iwińska, was a Polish lawyer, and his brother, Issak Arens, was a Soviet diplomat. Alter authored several works, including Socjalizm walczący (Militant socialism; 1926), Tsu der Yidnfrage in Poiln (The Jewish question in Poland; 1927), Antysemityzm gospodarczy w świetle cyfr (Economic anti-Semitism in the light of data; 1937), and Hiszpania w ogniu (Spain on fire; 1937). (WR)

Sources: Encyclopedia Judaica, vol. 1; Słownik biograficzny działaczy polskiego ruchu robotniczego, vol. 1 (Warsaw, 1979); Henryk Erlich i Wiktor Alter (New York, 1951); The Case of Henryk Erlich and Wiktor Alter (London, 1943).

AMBRAZEVIČIUS-BRAZAITIS Juozas [originally Ambrazevičius] (9 December 1903, Trakišliai, near Marijampolė–28 October 1974, New York), Lithuanian historian of literature and politician. After graduating from high school in Marijampolė, in 1922–27 Ambrazevičius-Brazaitis studied literature at Kaunas University, and then he started working as a teacher in a high school for girls in Kaunas. In 1931–32 he studied in Bonn, and after returning to Lithuania, he taught in the same high school. In 1934 he began lecturing in Lithuanian literature and folk culture at Kaunas University. He authored several textbooks on the theory of literature and on the history of Lithuanian and world literature. He worked in the Catholic cultural movement, editing the dailies Lietuva and XX Amžius. During the first Soviet occupation (1940–41) he kept his job and engaged in underground activities. After the German invasion, on 23 June 1941 he headed the Provisional Lithuanian Government and was its minister of education. For six weeks he tried to win German acceptance but in vain. His government issued about one hundred decrees regulating property rights, administration, and education. On 5 August 1941 he finally gave up his mission but continued to work as head of the political commission of the secret Chief Committee of Lithuanian Liberation (Vyriausiasis Lietuvos Išlaivimo Komitetas [CCLL]) and editor of its underground periodical I laisvę. In the summer of 1944 he left for Germany, and in 1948 for the United States, where he edited a Catholic daily, Darbininkas, and continued his work in the CCLL in exile. He published a number of leaflets illustrating German and Soviet crimes in Lithuania and the Lithuanian resistance—for example, In the Name of the Lithuanian People (1946) and Appeal to the United Nations on Genocide (1951). In 1964 he published Allein, ganz allein (Alone, all alone) about the Lithuanian armed resistance. The Kremlin actively opposed his activities. In the 1970s he became a subject of interest for the Soviet media and American hunters of Nazi collaborators, who accused him of having worked for the Third Reich. In reply, he published an extensive dossier of his World War II activities. (WR) Sources: EL, vol. 1; Saulius Sužiedelis, Historical Dictionary of Lithuania (Lanham, Md., 1997); Algirdas Budreckis, The Lithuanian National Revolt of 1941 (Boston, 1968).

ANDERS Władysław (11 August 1892, Błóń, near Kutno–12 May 1970, London), Polish general and politician. Anders studied at the Polytechnic College in Riga, where he belonged to a student organization called Arkonia. During World War I he was drafted as a reserve officer in the Russian army, and in 1914–17 he served as a cavalry lieutenant. In 1917 he completed studies at the Academy of the General Staff in St. Petersburg, gaining first place, for which he received a golden sword from Tsar Nicholas II. Anders took part in the formation of the First Polish Corps, which was created by General Józef Dowbór-Muśnicki in Russia in 1917, and he served in the first regiment of the Krechowce uhlans (cavalrymen) of this corps. After its dissolution Anders returned to Warsaw. He took part in the disarmament of Germans in Poland. In 1918 he served in the Polish Army. He participated in the Great Poland (Wielkopolska) Uprising (1918–19). In 1919 he was the chief of staff of the Operational Unit of the command-in-chief of the armed forces in the former Prussian sector of partitioned Poland (Wielkopolska army in Poznań). He fought in the Polish-Bolshevik war (1919–21), commanding a regiment. In 1921 he left for Paris, where he graduated from the War College (École Supérieure de Guerre) in 1923. In 1924 he returned to Poland as a colonel and started work as director of a course for higher commanders. Later, he worked in the staff of the inspector general of the cavalry. During the coup of May 1926 he became the chief of staff of the government forces. However, after the coup he remained in the army. From 1928 to 1937 he commanded two cavalry brigades. In 1937 he became the commander of the Nowogródzka Cavalry Brigade within the “Modlin” Army of General Emil Przedzimirski.

Anders commanded this brigade during the war with Germany until 12 September 1939. He then took command of the Cavalry Operational Group, fighting against German and Soviet forces. After the seizure of the Polish Eastern Borderland by the Soviets, the Polish authorities, which had evacuated to Romania, ordered Anders to get to Romania or Hungary. After severe battles, during which he was seriously injured, Anders was taken captive by the Soviets near Turka. For twenty-two months he was held by the NKVD in various prisons, including the ill-famed Lubyanka Prison. After the German attack on the USSR and the signing of the Polish-Soviet treaty on 30 July 1941, Anders was released. He assumed command of the Polish Army, which was forming in the USSR among Poles deported from the territories seized by the USSR. When in 1942, as a result of a British-Soviet agreement, this army had to leave the USSR and move to Iran, Anders became the commander of the Polish Army in the East (1942–43). From 1943 to 1946 he was in command of the Second Polish Corps within the Polish Armed Forces in the West (Polskie Siły Zbrojne na Zachodzie). This corps, consisting of two infantry divisions, one armored brigade, and an artillery group, took part in the battle of Monte Cassino, finally capturing the monastery in May 1944. This success opened the way to Rome for the Allies. At the end of the war the Second Corps also fought in the battle of Ancona, on the “Gothic line,” at Bologna, and in the Apennines. In February 1945 Anders took a critical stand on the Yalta decisions. While General Tadeusz Bór-Komorowski was being held in captivity, from February to May 1945 Anders served as the commander-in-chief and inspector general of the Polish Armed Forces in the West.

Next, Anders assumed command of the Second Polish Corps, which after the end of the war was around 110,000-strong, posing a serious political problem to the Allies in the face of the Sovietization of Poland. The soldiers and officers of the corps, as well as their adored general Anders, wanted to maintain the corps as an independent military unit, capable of supporting the Polish cause after the war. However, in March 1946 the efforts of the British led to the dissolution of the Polish Armed Forces, including the Second Corps, and their integration into the Polish Adaptation and Resettlement Corps (Polski Korpus Przynosobienia i Rozmieszczenia). Anders left for London, where he continued to play a major political role. On 26 September 1946 the Communist government in Warsaw deprived him of his Polish citizenship, which was restored to him posthumously by the government of the Third Republic of Poland. From 1946 to 1954 Anders held the titular post of commander-in-chief and inspector general of the Polish Armed Forces in the West. He co-organized the National Treasury and from 1949 was its president. On 8 August 1954 he joined the Council of the Three, a substitute head of state in exile. In 1954 he became lieutenant general. He authored Bez ostatniego rozdziału (Army in exile; 1949), in which he depicted the fate of the Poles in the USSR in 1939–41. The work was translated into nine languages. He also wrote Kłęska Hitlera w Rosji, 1941–1945 (Hitler's defeat in Russia, 1941–45; 1952). In accord with his last will, he was buried at the Polish war cemetery in Monte Cassino. For thousands of Polish soldiers who had been saved from the USSR, Anders was the symbol of a common fate and patriotism. He was a kind of savior because of the protection he gave not only to his subordinates, but also to their families and to Polish orphans, who were evacuated along with them. (JS)

Sources: Marian Hemar, ed., Generał Anders: życie i chwala (London, 1970); Zdzisław Stahl, Generał Anders i 2 Korpus (London, 1989); Juliusz L. Englert and Krzysztof Barbarowski, Generał Anders (London, 1990); Ewa Berberyusz, Anders spieszony: "Aneks" (London, 1992); Krzysztof Szmagier, Generał Anders i jego żołnierze (Warsaw, 1993); Piotr Stawiecki, Słownik biograficzny generałów Wojska Polskiego, 1918–1939 (Warsaw, 1994); Piotr Zaroń, Armia Andersa (Toruń, 1996); Henryk Piotr Kosk, Generalicja polska: Popularny słownik biograficzny, vol. 1 (Pruszków, 1998).

ANDOV Stojan (30 November 1935, Kavadarci, Macedonia), Macedonian politician, former Communist. Andov graduated in economics from Ss. Cyril and Methodius University in Skopje and the University of Belgrade. In the 1970s he supported market reforms in Yugoslavia. He served as the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia's ambassador to Iraq in the 1980s and spent much of his career in Belgrade and abroad. A member of the Federal Executive Council of Yugoslavia in the 1980s, he served for a time as the vice-president of the Yugoslav Federal Assembly. In November 1990 he was elected to the Macedonian

National Assembly (Sobranie), becoming its speaker in January 1991. He headed the Liberal Party, founded in 1993 as a coalition between the Alliance of Reformist Forces of Macedonia and the Young Democratic Progressive Party. Its members have been overwhelmingly ethnic Macedonians who support a free market economy. From October 1995 to the beginning of 1996 Andov acted as the president of Macedonia following an assassination attempt on Kiro Gligorov. Andov resigned the parliamentary speaker's post in 1996, joining the opposition when Prime Minister Branko Crvenkovski reshuffled the cabinet and dismissed members of the Liberal Party in a dispute involving industrial privatization. Andov ran unsuccessfully for president of the republic in October 1999. He regained the parliamentary speakership in November 2000 and held it until October 2002. He has opposed reforms meant to accord ethnic Albanians greater rights but is believed to be a staunch supporter of Macedonia's good relations with the United States and the European Union. Andov joined a coalition including the Internal Macedonian Revolutionary Organization-Democratic Party for Macedonian National Unity and the New Democracy Party in the September 2002 elections. (DP)

Sources: Valentina Georgieva and Sasha Konechni, Historical Dictionary of the Republic of Macedonia (Lanham, Md., 1998); James Pfeiffer, ed., The New Macedonian Question (London, 1999); RFE/RL Newswire; Bugajski; OMRI Daily Digest; www.rulers.org

ANDRÁSSY Gyula, Jr. (30 June 1860, Tóketerebes [Třebišov, near Košice, Slovakia]–11 June 1929, Budapest), Hungarian politician. The son of Prime Minister Gyula Andrássy, Andrásy began his career as a royal minister and MP on behalf of the Liberal Party (Szabadelvű Párt). In 1892 he became undersecretary of state in the Ministry of Interior, and in 1894–95 he was minister at the imperial court in Vienna. He supported the Austro-Hungarian compromise of 1867, but he increasingly competed with the leader of his party, István Tisza. During the parliamentary debate on the budget and military draft in February 1904, Andrásy belonged to the opposition against Prime Minister Tisza. The parliamentary conflict resulted in a new election. Under social pressures the right to vote was extended, so the Liberal Party lost. In 1905 Andrásy founded the Constitutional Party (Alkotmánypárt), which also supported the Austro-Hungarian compromise, and entered a new government coalition. In the Sándor Wekerle government Andrásy was Hungarian minister of interior from April 1906 to January 1910. He elaborated on a draft of the new electoral law, including universal but not fully equal voting rights in Hungary. Owing to the opposition of the left, the law did not come into force. He advocated a sharpening of the Magyarization policy and restrictions on the use of native languages in public life, elaborated by the minister of education and religious denominations, Albert Apponyi (“lex Apponyi”). Andrásy was an excellent parliamentary orator. During World War I he fully supported Hungary’s engagement but remained in opposition to the subsequent government of Tisza (1913–17). In late October 1918 he was appointed foreign minister of Austria-Hungary, with the task of engaging in the peace talks with the Entente. On 3 November 1918 he concluded the armistice with the victorious coalition on its terms.

During the Hungarian Soviet Republic in 1919 Andrásy was one of the key organizers of the Anti-Bolshevik Committee in Vienna. In 1920 he was elected to the parliament again. In 1921 he presided over the Christian National Union. As a convinced legitimist and conservative, in October 1921 he took part in a futile attempt to enthrone Charles IV as King of Hungary and offered to become his foreign minister, for which he was arrested for a couple of weeks. After his release, he was one of the main opponents of the policy of national consolidation of Prime Minister István Bethlen, and until the end of his life he preached Austro-Hungarian legitimism. From 1904 Andrásy was a member of the Hungarian Academy of Sciences. He authored many articles and books, including Az 1867-es kiegyezésről (On the Compromise of 1867; 1896), A magyar állam főnnmaradásának és alkotmányos szabadságának okai (Constitutional freedoms of the Hungarian state, 3 vols.; 1901–11), A királykérdés jogi szempontból Budapest (Legal grounds of royal power in Hungary; 1920), and A világháború előzményei (Circumstances of the outbreak of World War II, 2 vols.; 1925–26). (MS)

Sources: Biographisches Lexikon, vol. 1; Steven Béla Varga, Historical Dictionary of Hungary (Lanham, Md., 1997); Paul Count Teleki, The Evolution of Hungary and Its Place in European History (New York, 1923); Sándor Pethő, Andrásy Gyula és ellenfelei (Budapest, 1924); Albert Apponyi, Andrásy Gyula emlékezete. MTA Emlékbeszéddek (Budapest, 1930); Nicholas Horthy, Memoirs (Paris, 1954); Michael Karolyi, Faith without Illusion (London, 1956); Paul Ignatus, Hungary (London, 1972); István Diósegi, A magyar külpolitika útjai: tanulmányok (Budapest, 1984); Jerzy Kochanowski, Węgry (Warsaw, 1997).

ANDREESCU Gabriel (8 April 1952, Buzau), Romanian dissident. In 1976 Andreescu graduated in physics from Bucharest University. He taught physics in Buzau, and in 1980–89 he worked at the Meteorological and Hydrological Institute in Bucharest. In 1982, through a school friend living in the United States, he issued a couple of letters criticizing the rule of Nicolae Ceaușescu and his clan. In 1984 Radio Free Europe began to broadcast excerpts from his diary. In December 1987 he was arrested and accused of high treason. Despite brutal interrogation, he did not disclose his collaborators, and he was released in accord with the amnesty of January 1988. Soon, Andreescu, Doina Cornea, and Mircea Dinescu sent a letter to the participants of the International Conference on Human Rights in Kraków, Poland, in which they delineated the violations of human rights in Romania and appealed to the Romanian society not to collaborate with the regime. In June 1989 they led a several-week-long hunger strike in defense of human rights in Romania. Andreescu’s letter to the subsequent conference on human rights in Paris in 1989 raised a debate about Western interference in the internal affairs of Communist countries. Despite constant surveillance by the political police, Securitate, Andreescu gave a couple of interviews to the Western media. Starting in October 1989 he was in house arrest. He was imprisoned on 22 December 1989 but released the next day owing to the fall of the Ceaușescu regime. From January to May 1990 Andreescu belonged to the Council of the National Salvation Front, and then he worked with the Group in Favor of Social Dialogue (Grupul pentru Dialog Social). He is a leader of the Romanian Association for the Defense of Human Rights. (WR) Sources: “Curriculum vitae Gabriel Andreescu” and Radoslaw Doru, “Gabriel Andreescu”; manuscripts in the archives of the Karta Center in Warsaw.

ANDREI Stefan (29 March 1931, Podari-Livezi, Oltenia), Romanian Communist activist. In 1956 Andrei graduated in engineering from the Higher School of Building in Bucharest. From 1960 to 1963 he belonged to the Executive Committee of the Union of Student Associations, and in 1962–65 he was a member of the Central Committee (CC) of the Union of Working Youth. In both organizations he was responsible for foreign relations. From October 1965 he was deputy head of the Department for Relations with Socialist Countries of the CC of the Romanian Communist Party (RCP), and in April 1972 he became CC secretary for foreign affairs. From November 1974 he belonged to the Standing Presidium of the RCP CC Political Executive Committee, the highest party organ. In February 1978, during a conference of party secretaries of Communist parties in Budapest, Andrei held talks with the leaders of the Hungarian party on the burning issue of the Hungarian minority in Transylvania. He was one of the chief executors of Nicolae Ceaușescu’s foreign policy decisions. Andrei was famous for a pompous way of life and corruption. From March 1978 he was foreign minister. He accompanied Ceaușescu on many foreign trips. During visits to Budapest (March 1983) and Bonn (March 1984) he discussed the problem of national minorities in Romania. During the Thirteenth RCP Congress in November 1984

he was dismissed from the Standing Presidium. Ceaușescu charged him with the special protection of his youngest son, Nicu. In theory Andrei was to prepare Nicu for future rule; in practice Andrei tolerated his scandalous conduct. At the end of 1985 Andrei left the Foreign Ministry and became RCP CC secretary, this time responsible for the ailing economy. The end of the Ceaușescu regime was also the end of his career. (PC)

Sources: Juliusz Stroynowski, ed., Who's Who in the Socialist Countries of Europe (Munich, London, and Paris, 1989); Robert King, History of the Romanian Communist Party (Stanford, 1980); Martin McCauley and Stephen Carter, Leadership and Succession in the Soviet Union, Eastern Europe and China (New York, 1985); Ion M. Pacepa, Red Horizons (New York, 1987).

ANDRESEN Nigol (2 October 1899, Vanamoisa, near Haljala—24 February 1985, Tartu), was an Estonian writer and Communist activist. In 1918 Andresen graduated from a training school in Rakvere, and then he worked as a teacher. In 1928 he was elected MP on behalf of the Estonian Socialist Labor Party but he left it, recognizing its program as too moderate. He founded the Marxist Union of Working People (MUWP); the group was attracted to the Communist International, which was seeking a chance to restore influence in Estonia after the Communist Party of Estonia had failed to overthrow the democratic government in 1924. In 1935 Comintern representatives signed an agreement of cooperation with the MUWP in the struggle against “fascism”—i.e., the Konstantin Päts regime.

At the time of the Soviet invasion in June 1940, Andresen belonged to a group of most trusted aides of the Communists. In the Johannes Vares government (June–July 1940) he became commissar of foreign affairs, and in the Johannes Lauristin government he was appointed deputy chairman (deputy prime minister) of the Council of People's Commissars of the Estonian SSR and commissar of education (1940–44). Supervising the transformation of the Estonian Foreign Ministry into the People's Commissariat of the Estonian SSR, he was responsible for personnel purges and the promotion of Soviet activists. However, there is evidence that he hoped to maintain remnants of the former diplomatic apparatus. As commissar for education, he implemented Soviet instructions, which meant the transformation of the education system along Soviet lines, the introduction of Marxism-Leninism into schools, purges among teachers, and the abolition of teacher and student organizations and their replacement by the Soviet Komsomol and pioneer organizations. He was also responsible for censorship in 1940–41 and 1944–46. After the restoration of Soviet power in 1944, Andresen was acting chairman of the Council of Ministers of the Estonian SSR (1946–47) and deputy chairman of the republican Supreme Council (1946–49). In 1947 he graduated from a party school at the Central Committee of the Soviet party, and in 1948, from Estonian studies at the University of Tartu. In 1940–49 he was a member of the Supreme Council of the Estonian SSR, and in 1940–46, a member of the Supreme Council of the USSR. With the wave of purges that affected the Estonian party in 1950, Andresen was accused of “bourgeois nationalism” and deported to Siberia. After his return he withdrew from political life and worked as a teacher. He published biographies of Friedebert Tuglas (1968) and Paul Kuusberg (1976). He also translated works by Maksxim Gorky, Ilya Ehrenburg, and Arnold Zweig, as well as Das Kapital, by Karl Marx, and the Communist Manifesto. (AG)

Sources: Eesti Entsüklopeedia, vol. 14 (Tallinn, 2000); Pravda, 13 May 1950; Erik Nørgaard, Mændene fra Estland (Copenhagen, 1990); Toivo U. Raun, Estonia and the Estonians (Stanford, 1991); Matti Laur, Tõnis Lukas, Ain Mäesalu, Ago Pajur, and Tõnu Tannberg, History of Estonia (Tallinn, 2000); www.okupatsioon.ee/english/overviews/index.html; Mike Jones, “How Estonia Became Part of the USSR and” “Revolutionary History”; www.revolutionary-history.co.uk.

ANDRIĆ Ivo (10 October 1892, Dolac, near Travnik, Bosnia—13 March 1975, Belgrade), Yugoslav writer and diplomat. Andrić was born into a Catholic family in Bosnia. His father died when he was two years old. Andrić spent his childhood in the Bosnian town of Višegrad on the Drina River. In 1910 he began his education at the Great Gymnasium in Sarajevo. He was active in Mlada Bosna (Young Bosnia), a revolutionary youth movement that aimed at the unification of the south Slavic nations into one state and that was in opposition to Austria-Hungary. With the radicalization of Mlada Bosna, Andrić started to distance himself from this movement. In the fall of 1912 he began studies in philosophy in Zagreb. After one year he moved to Vienna, but for health reasons he left for Kraków, where in 1914 he studied at the Jagiellonian University. After the assassination of Archduke Francis Ferdinand (June 1914) by Gavrilo Princip, a member of Mlada Bosna, Andrić arrived in Split, where in July of the same year he was arrested. He was held in prison until mid-1917. After the end of World War I he got a job at the Ministry for Religious Affairs in the newly created Kingdom of Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes. In 1920 he entered the Yugoslav diplomatic service. In 1924 he completed his studies and obtained a Ph.D. from the university in Graz, Austria. He then continued his work in the diplomatic service. He served at diplomatic missions in Rome, Bucharest, Marseilles, Paris, Madrid, Brussels, and Geneva. In 1939 he was appointed ambassador to Berlin, where he stayed until April 1941, when the Third Reich invaded Yugoslavia. After World War II he joined the Communist Party. He also became president of the Yugoslav Writers' Union and deputy president of the Society for Cultural Cooperation of Yugoslavia with the USSR. In 1949, as a representative of Bosnia and Herzegovina, he was elected to the Yugoslav Federal Assembly.

Andrić was a representative of the so-called great generation, an avant-garde movement after World War I. His literary output belongs to three literatures: Croatian, Serbian, and Bosnian. He published his first literary work in 1910, under the title U sumrak (At twilight). In 1914 he issued a collection of poems, Hrvatska mlada lirika (Croatian young lyric poetry). He was an editor of the literary magazines Književni Jug and Yugoslavenska njiva. During his studies in Vienna he became acquainted with the literary works of the Danish philosopher Søren Kierkegaard; these exerted an influence on his writing that could be seen, for example, in his volumes of lyrical prose, Ex ponto (1918) and Nemiri (Unrest; 1920). In 1924, 1931, and 1936 collections of his short stories were published; each collection was entitled Pripovetke (Short stories). In 1925 he received an award from the Serbian Royal Academy for the first of these collections, and in 1938 he was honored with the Order of St. Sava. During the German occupation (1941–45) he lived in Belgrade, and he wrote three novels; these were published in 1945 and are considered his most important works. In 1961 these novels won him the Nobel Prize for Literature. In the first novel, Na Drini ćuprija (The Bridge on the Drina; 1959), Andrić presented the history of the small town Višegrad, which was created at the beginning of the sixteenth century, after the building of a great stone bridge. The bridge symbolized union and durability. His next novel, Travnička hronika (Bosnian story, 1959; also translated as Bosnian chronicle, 1963, and as Days of the consuls, 1992), was strongly set in the historical reality of 1807–14. Consul Daville, presented in the book as the personification of the civilized West, is helpless in his efforts to understand “wild,” multinational, and multicultural Bosnia, ruled by laws that are beyond his comprehension. The third novel is titled Gospodjica (The woman from Sarajevo; 1965). Andrić's most important works also include Nove pripovetke (New stories, 1948), Prokleta avlija (The damned yard; 1954), Zapisi o Goji (Conversations with Goya; 1960) and Omerpaša Latas (Omer Pasha Latas; 1976). (AO)

Sources: Biographisches Lexikon, vol. 1; Wielka encyklopedia PWN, vol. 2 (Warsaw, 2001); Marek Klecel, ed., Ivo Andrić: W dziesiątą rocznicę śmierci (1975–1985). Materiały sesji Zakładu Jugosławistyki Instytutu Filologii Słowiańskiej Uniwersytetu Warszawskiego (Warsaw, 1988); Celia Hawkesworth, Ivo Andrić:

Bridge between East and West (London, 1984); Radovan Popović, Ivo Andrić: Život (Belgrade, 1988); Jan Wierzbicki, Ivo Andrić (Warsaw, 1965); Kazimierz Żórawski, Ivo Andrić (Warsaw, 1988).

ANDRZEJEWSKI Jerzy (19 August 1909, Warsaw–19 April 1983, Warsaw), Polish writer. In 1931 Andrzejewski graduated in Polish philology from Warsaw University. He made his debut in the Warsaw daily ABC in 1932. In 1935–37 he wrote for the weekly Prosto z mostu, where he edited a literary column. His first novel, Ład serca (Order of the heart; 1938), whose hero, a priest, finds a moral grounding in faith, won him wide recognition. In 1939 Andrzejewski won the Award of the Young of the Polish Academy of Literature. During the German occupation he was active in the underground cultural life of Warsaw. He presented his wartime experience in the collection of short stories Noc (The night; 1945). In 1946–47 he was chairman of the Kraków branch of the Trade Union of Polish Writers. In 1948 he published Popiół i diament (Ash and diamond), in which he presented postwar reality in a way acceptable to the Communists. The book, which was compulsory reading in the schools, became a part of the literary founding myth of communism in Poland and was made into a film by Andrzej Wajda.

In the early 1950s Andrzejewski declared himself a Marxist. This was, among other things, expressed in his collection Partia i twórczość pisarza (The Party and the work of a writer; 1952). In 1950–52 he was deputy chairman of the Association of Polish Writers and chairman of its Szczecin branch. In 1952–54 he edited Przegląd kulturalny; from 1955, the weekly Twórczość; and later, the weekly Literatura. From 1952 to 1957 he was MP. During the “thaw,” starting in 1955, he was increasingly critical of the regime, for which Stefan Żółkiewski and Jakub Berman attacked him. His new approach was expressed in Ciemności kryją ziemię (Darkness covering the earth; 1956). In 1956–57 he co-authored the idea of a literary periodical, Europa, but the Communist authorities disapproved of it. In November 1957 he left the Communist Party, as a result of which his works were temporarily banned. This happened again in 1964 after he co-initiated and signed the “Letter of 34” intellectuals to the prime minister criticizing censorship and government cultural policies. In March 1968 he spoke up in defense of protesting students, and in August 1968, against the Polish participation in the Warsaw Pact invasion of Czechoslovakia. As a result, he was refused a passport, and his works were banned again. His accounts of communism are in the novel Bramy rajy (Gates of paradise; 1960) and a pamphlet on contemporary culture, Idzie skacząc po górach (He comes jumping over the mountains; 1963).

Andrzejewski published in Twórczość, but in 1972 his novel Miazga (Pulp) was withdrawn from publication. As a signatory of the “Letter of 101” in January 1976, he protested against amendments to the constitution regarding mono-party rule and Poland’s dependence on the Soviet Union. In 1976 he sent a letter to those persecuted after worker riots in Radom. He co-founded the Committee for the Defense of Workers (Komitet Obrony Robotników) and let the speaker of the parliament know about its creation in October 1976. As a result, his works were banned again, and he became the subject of a hostile press campaign and false accusations. He began to publish in underground periodicals and became a member of the editorial staff of Zapis. His Miazga appeared in an uncensored publication in 1979. Seriously ill, he took part in the First Congress of Solidarity in September 1981. (PK)

Sources: Literatura polska. Przewodnik encyklopedyczny, vol. 1 (Warsaw, 2000); Opozycja w PRL. Słownik biograficzny 1956–1989, vol. 1 (Warsaw, 2000); Maria Bursztyn, Katarzyna Rodymińska and Jerzy Eisler, List 34 (Warsaw, 1993); Tadeusz Drewnowski, Próba scalenia (Warsaw, 1997).

ANGYAL István [originally Engel] (14 October 1928, Magyarbánhegyes–1 December 1958 Budapest), one of the leaders of the Hungarian revolution of 1956. During the war Angyal finished high school, but because of his Jewish origins, he was not allowed to take the final exams. In the summer of 1944, along with his mother and one of his sisters, he was deported to the Nazi concentration camp in Auschwitz-Birkenau, from which he returned alone. The Nazis shot his sister in his presence. After the war he was accepted into the Department of Humanities of Budapest University. In 1949 he spoke up in defense of György Lukács, for which he was fired from the university. He worked as a mechanic, and in 1951–55 he participated in the construction of the new town of Sztálinváros on the Danube; later he worked in a construction company in Budapest. On 23 October 1956 he took part in a demonstration at the Józef Bem monument, at the parliament building, and in the storming of the radio headquarters. On 25 October he joined a demonstration against Soviet intervention. On his initiative the demands of the demonstrators were proclaimed in front of the embassies of “people’s democracies” and not in front of the U.S. Embassy. The next day he took over lead of the insurgents in Túzoltó Street and took part in the defense of the Ninth Quarter of Budapest. On 29 and 30 October he negotiated conditions of armistice with Prime Minister Imre Nagy. When these were implemented, Angyal maintained peace and order and defended the idealized vision of a “Socialist society” against Stalinist restoration and “capitalism.” After the second Soviet intervention on 4 November he continued the armed struggle. He also wrote and distributed leaflets and proclamations. He tried to get in touch with the new government of János Kádár, but in vain. Angyal was encouraged to leave Hungary but refused. Arrested on 16 November 1956, on 17 April 1958 he was sentenced to death on the grounds of initiating and leading a plot against “the power of the people.” On 27 November 1958 the Supreme Court upheld the sentence, and he was executed. (JT)

Sources: Magyar Nagylexikon, vol. 2 (Budapest, 1994); A magyar forradalom és szabadságharc enciklopédiája, CD-ROM (Budapest, 1999); Új Magyar Életrajzi Lexikon, vol. 1 (Budapest, 2001); András Lukácsy, Felismerem-e Angyal István. Levelek fiának (Budapest, 1990); György Litván, ed., Revolucja węgierska 1956 roku (Warsaw, 1996).

ANIELEWICZ Mordecai, pseudonyms “Aniołek” (Little Angel) and “Malachi,” (1919, Wyszków, Poland–8 May 1943, Warsaw), activist of the Zionist left in Poland. Anielewicz came from a Jewish lower-middle-class family. He attended a Hebrew secondary school, where he established ties with Betar, a youth organization of a radical faction of Zionists-Revisionists. The outbreak of World War II caused an ideological breakthrough in his life. In September 1939 he found himself under Soviet occupation. While trying to cross the border into Romania, he was arrested by the NKVD but was released. He returned to German-occupied Warsaw, and then he went to Wilno (Vilnius), which was under Lithuanian rule. In January 1940 he came back to Warsaw and joined a leftist youth organization, Hashomer Hatzair (Young Guard), derived from a revolutionary wing of the Poale Zion Left. The Zionist program of the party was anti-German and pro-Soviet. The party was in favor of a Jewish kibbutz state in Palestine and recognized the annexation of the Polish Eastern Borderland by the USSR. Such an orientation was represented by Neged Hazerem, an underground newspaper founded by Anielewicz, who was also its editor-in-chief. Anielewicz was also involved in clandestine teaching and in party propaganda.

In March or April 1942 Anielewicz co-established the Anti-Fascist Bloc, an alliance of leftist Zionists and Communists. He traveled secretly throughout German-occupied Poland, organizing units of the bloc. He was away from Warsaw at the time of mass deportations from the ghetto in the summer of 1942, when over 250,000 Jews were transported to the extermination camp in Treblinka. After his return, in November of that year he co-founded the Jewish Fighting Organization (Żydowska Organizacja Bojowa [ŻOB]), which aimed at armed resistance to the Germans. The ŻOB was a union of units of the Socialist Bund, leftist Zionists, and Communists from the Polish Workers' Party (Polska Partia Robotnicza [PPR]). He soon became commander-in-chief of the ŻOB. He managed to obtain some help from the Home Army (Armia Krajowa [AK]): weapons, ammunition, and instructions on how to fight. The first ŻOB action against the Germans took place on 18 January 1943 and lasted four days. The ŻOB resistance successfully prevented a German-planned deportation to Treblinka. The actual uprising in the ghetto began on 19 April and lasted until 16 May 1943. During the fighting, Anielewicz commanded the ŻOB but also tried to coordinate resistance by the rightist Jewish Military Union (Żydowski Związek Bojowy [ŻZB]) and the so-called wild insurrectionists. After two weeks of fighting, encircled by the SS in a bunker in Miła Street, Anielewicz, along with other leaders of the uprising, committed suicide. After the war a kibbutz named after him was created in Israel, Yad Mordecai, and one of the main streets of the former Jewish district in Warsaw was named Anielewicz Street. (MC)

Sources: Kunert, vol. 1; Wielka encyklopedia PWN, vol. 2 (Warsaw, 2001); Emanuel Ringelblum, Kronika getta warszawskiego (Warsaw, 1983); Tomasz Szarota ed., The Warsaw Ghetto: The 45th Anniversary of the Uprising (Warsaw, 1988); Hanna Krall, Shielding the Flame: Intimate Conversations with Marek Edelman (New York, 1986); Yitzhak Zuckerman, A Surplus of Memory: Chronicle of the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising (Berkeley, 1993); Marek Jan Chodakiewicz, Żydzi i Polacy, 1918–1955: Współistnienie, Zagłada, Komunizm (Warsaw, 2000).

ANTALL József, Jr. (8 April 1932, Pestújhely–12 December 1993, Budapest), Hungarian politician. In 1950 Antall graduated from a Piarist high school in Budapest. He was interested in politics and gained wide knowledge in this field. He graduated in history and Hungarian studies (1954) and in archive, library, and museum studies (1962) from the University of Budapest. In 1968 he earned a Ph.D. in history. From 1954 he taught in the József Eötvös High School in Budapest. During the 1956 revolution he chaired a revolutionary committee in this school, organized passive resistance against the János Kádár government, and reorganized the Independent Smallholders Party (ISP). After the revolution he was temporarily arrested and interrogated. Reprimanded and released, he was moved to another school. Owing to his political stance, in 1959 he was banned from teaching. In 1960–62 he worked as a librarian. In 1964 he got a job in the Ignaz Semmelweis Memorial Museum of the History of Medicine. First he was its deputy director (1964–74), then acting director (1974–84), and finally director (1984–91), upgrading the role of this institution.

In the 1970s and 1980s Antall worked as a scholar.

Among other things, he was deputy chairman of the International Association of the History of Medicine (1968–90) and chairman of the Hungarian Association of the History of Medicine (1982–90). In 1988 he entered the political scene. For family reasons he initially considered joining one of the historic parties: the ISP or the Christian Democratic People's Party (CDPP). Realizing that these parties would not take a leading role in systemic transformation, in the fall of 1988 he joined the Hungarian Democratic Forum (Magyar Demokrata Forum [HDF]). In the spring of 1989 he took part in the Round Table Talks of the Hungarian opposition, and in mid-June 1989 he became the HDF delegate to the Triangle Table Talks with the Communist leadership, aiming at a peaceful transition of power. During the talks (June–September 1989), Antall became one of the leaders of the opposition, gaining authority thanks to his knowledge of constitutional law and to his negotiating skills. In October 1989 he was almost unanimously elected chairman of the HDF and transformed it into a party that won the first free election in March and April 1990, gaining 42.5 percent of the vote and 165 out of 368 seats in the parliament.

Antall concluded a coalition of the HDF with the ISP and CDPP, and on 23 May 1990 he became prime minister. He strove for a stable parliamentary majority, which was all the more important as a result of the Triangle Table agreements, by which the range of laws requiring a two-thirds parliamentary majority was widened. This is why Antall also reached a compromise with the Alliance of Free Democrats (AFD). As a result, the parliament elected the AFD candidate, Árpád Göncz, president. Antall enjoyed substantial respect in the West and kept Hungary out of the Balkan conflicts. During his term Hungary was accepted into the Council of Europe as the first country from the former Soviet bloc (October 1990). He initiated cooperation with Czechoslovakia (later the Czech Republic and Slovakia) and Poland with the Visegrad Triangle (February 1991). At this time Soviet troops were evacuated from Hungary (June 1991), the Warsaw Pact was dissolved (July 1991), and Hungary signed an association agreement with the European Community (December 1991). Antall also initiated steps toward Hungary's entry into NATO. In the fall of 1990 it turned out that he was seriously ill. From that point he struggled with time, directing government work with great determination. He was, nevertheless, unable to resolve conflicts in his own party, although in 1993 he excluded from it the radical nationalist faction of István Csurka. With the maintenance of social order in mind, Antall advocated gradual transformation and abstained from more radical economic reforms. He was not a particularly skilled orator and the social costs of transformation eroded his initial popularity, but his death moved the whole country, and his funeral was attended by hundreds of thousands of people. (JT)

Sources: Magyar Nagylexikon, vol. 2 (Budapest, 1994); Nagy Képes Milleniumi Arcképcsarnok (Budapest, 1999); Új Magyar Életrajzi Lexikon, vol. 1 (Budapest, 2001); Europa Środkowa i Wschodnia, 1991, 1992, and 1993; Steven Béla Varga, Historical Dictionary of Hungary (Lanham, Md., 1997); Jerzy Kochanowski, Wegry (Warsaw, 1997); Rudolf L. Tókes, "Party Politics and Political Participation in Postcommunist Hungary," in Karen Dawisha and Bruce Parrott, eds., The Consolidation of Democracy in East-Central Europe (Cambridge, 1997).

ANTALL József, Sr. (28 March 1896, Oroszi–24 July 1974, Budapest), Hungarian politician. Antall came from a middle-class family with patriotic traditions. During World War I he was a POW in Russia (1915–18). After returning home, in 1923 he graduated in law from Budapest University. Later he worked in the Ministry of Finance (1928–32), the Ministry of Labor, and the Ministry of Interior (1932–44). In 1931 he joined the Independent Smallholders Party (ISP) and was close to the so-called folk writers who opposed social and national values in favor of Socialist internationalism. From 1939, as head of the Department of Social Affairs of the Ministry of Interior, Antall coordinated Hungarian aid to war refugees. Along with his collaborators, he provided accommodations, supplies, and safety to thousands of Poles; to Allied soldiers (French, British, and Soviet) who escaped from POW camps; to persecuted Jews and Yugoslavs; and, in the course of the westward movement of the eastern front, to refugees from Transylvania and Bukovina, as well as to those from bombed German towns. He saved thousands of lives. He collaborated with the Hungarian and Polish resistance, personifying these circles, which opposed Hungarian engagement on the side of the Axis. After the Third Reich occupied Hungary, on 19 March 1944 he resigned, was arrested, and spent half a year in prison.

From May 1945 Antall was undersecretary of state in the Ministry of Reconstruction, and from November 1945 to July 1946 he was minister of reconstruction in the governments of Zoltán Tildy and Ferenc Nagy. In March and April 1946 he was temporarily minister of finance. In the parliamentary elections of November 1945 he won a seat on behalf of the ISP. In 1946–48 he chaired the Hungarian Red Cross, in the summer of 1947 he headed the ISP electoral commission, and in August 1947 he won a parliamentary seat again. In the elections of May 1949, when only one list from the Hungarian People's Independence Front was submitted, he won a seat again but was soon forced to give it up. At the end of 1949 he withdrew from public life. During the revolution, on 30 October 1956 he returned to the ISP's top leadership. After the revolution was suppressed, he was interrogated as a witness. He was awarded the Great Cross of the Order of Merit of the Hungarian Republic (1947) and the Polish Commander's Order of Polonia Restituta, as well as French, Israeli, and British orders. In 1981 a street in Warsaw was given his name. His memoirs, Menekultek menedéke: Emlékek és iratok (Refugee camp: Memoirs and documents; 1997), were published posthumously. His son, József Antall, Jr. (1932–1993), was a Hungarian prime minister. (MS/JT)

Sources: Magyar Nagylexikon, vol. 2 (Budapest, 1994); Új Magyar Életrajzi Lexikon, vol. 1 (Budapest, 2001); Magyarország 1944–1956, CD-ROM (Budapest, 2001); Endre Várkonyi, "Antall József," Magyarország, 1974, no. 36; Ágnes Godó, Magyar-lengyel kapcsolatok a második világháborúban (Budapest, 1976); Helena and Tibor Csorba, Ziemia węgierska azylem Polaków 1939–1945 (Warsaw, 1985).

ANTANOVICH Ivan (3 April 1937, Domashe, near Lyahavitsi), Belorussian Communist activist. Antanovich graduated from the Pedagogical Institute of Foreign Languages in Minsk in 1960. He worked in the Institute of Philosophy and Law of the Belorussian Academy of Sciences, publishing typical propaganda works such as Amerikanskaia burzhuaznaia aksiologia na sluzhbe imperializma (American bourgeois axiology in the service of imperialism; 1967) and two volumes on "bourgeois sociological theories" (1981–82). In 1977 he became professor. He was one of the authors of the Belorussian Soviet Encyclopedia. In the early 1970s he was the Belorussian representative to UNESCO. In 1977 he was sent to the party apparatus. From 1979 to 1987 he was secretary for culture of the Central Committee (CC) of the Communist Party of Belorussia (CPB); from 1987 to 1990, deputy rector of the Academy of Social Sciences at the CPB CC; and in 1990–91, secretary and Politburo member of the CC of the Communist Party of the Russian Federal SSR. As late as 1990 he published Sovremennyy kapitalizm: Sotsy-dinamika vlasti (Contemporary capitalism: Social dynamics of power). After the fall of the USSR he returned to Belorussia. From 1993 to 1995 he was director of the Belorussian Research Institute of Information and Forecasting; in 1995–97, deputy minister; and in 1997–98, minister of foreign affairs. He made futile attempts to lead Belorussia out of international isolation that had been caused by the policies of President Alyaksandr Lukashenka. (EM)

Sources: Jan Zaprudnik, Historical Dictionary of Belarus (Lanham, Md., 1998); Kto iest kto v Respublike Belarus (Minsk, 1999).

ANTCZAK Antoni (15 May 1890, Wolenice–31 July 1952, Wronki), Polish politician. The son of a laborer, Antczak completed four grades of a country grammar school and supplemented his knowledge through self-education. In 1914 he began political activity in the Polish Trade Union (Zjednoczenie Zawodowe Polskie [ZZP]), a Christian organization in Westphalia, Germany. In 1918 he joined the National Workers' Association (Narodowe Stronnictwo Robotnicze [NSR]) in Poland, and in 1921 he became a member of the Supreme Council of the National Workers' Party (Narodowa Partia Robotnicza [NPR]). In 1923–27 he was president of the Pomeranian board of the NPR; from 1929 to 1930 he was MP on behalf of the NPR. In 1937 he became a member of the board of the Labor Party (Stronnictwo Pracy [SP]). After the German aggression in 1939, he served as the government delegate to Pomerania. Fearing arrest, in July 1941 he moved to Warsaw, where he continued his activities as government delegate. Deported to Germany after the Warsaw Uprising, in March 1945, he returned to Poland and presided over the underground SP until the return of Karol Popiel. From November 1945, Antczak was treasurer of the party's Executive Committee and one of Popiel's trusted co-workers. In December 1945 Antczak became a deputy to the Communist-controlled National Home Council (Krajowa Rada Narodowa [KRN]). After an upheaval within the SP, caused by the pro-Communist activists of Zryw, Antczak, along with six associates, gave up their KRN seats in September 1946. Antczak cooperated with Tygodnik Warszawski (Warsaw Weekly) and unsuccessfully attempted to legalize the Christian Labor Party. Arrested by the secret police in August 1948 and sentenced to fifteen years in a rigged political trial on 6 April 1951, he died in prison. (WR)

Sources: Posłowie . . ., vol. 1; Dzieje Zjednoczenia Zawodowego Polskiego 1889–1939 (Katowice, 1939); Słownik biograficzny działaczy polskiego ruchu robotniczego, vol. 1 (Warsaw, 1979); Karol Popiel, Na mogiłach przyjaciół (London, 1966).

ANTONCHIK Siarhey (1 April 1956, Pleshchenitsi, near Lahoyks), Belorussian trade and political activist. After high school Antonchik was a blue-collar worker in a Minsk tool factory, Belvar. In the late 1980s he was associated with the opposition Belorussian Popular Front (Belaruski Narodni Front [BNF]) and established structures of independent trade unions. In 1990 he was elected deputy to the Supreme Council on behalf of the BNF. As a member of the parliamentary anti-corruption commission, during the Supreme Council session of December 1994, he accused the Alyaksandr Lukashenka group of corruption, causing the first political crisis after the presidential elections.

His report, titled Krainay kiruyus mafyoznyia klany (The country is run by Mafia clans), pointed to corruption at the top echelons of Belorussian power. It was published in the paper Svaboda, thus becoming known to wider social circles. Antonchik was one of the deputies who went on a hunger strike in April 1995 to protest a referendum to change the state symbols initiated by the Lukashenka regime. In 1997 Antonchik established the Fund to Support the Unemployed, gathering funds for people fired for political reasons. (EM)

Sources: Narodnyia deputaty Respubliki Belarus: Dwanattsataye sklikannie (Minsk, 1992); Siergiej Owsianik and Jelena Strielkova, Władza i społeczeństwo: Białoruś 1991–1998 (Warsaw, 1998).

ANTONESCU Ion (14 June 1882, Pitești–1 June 1946, near Jilava), Romanian marshal and dictator. Antonescu graduated from the military academy and soon afterwards took part in the suppression of the Moldavian rebellion of 1907. During World War I he was first the operations chief of the Northern Army, then chief of the operations office of the general staff, and he planned the resistance of the Romanian army against the Germans. In 1922–27 he served as military attaché in Paris, Brussels, and London. In 1933–34 he was chief of the general staff, and in December 1937 he became defense minister in the government of Octavian Goga. The cabinet failed to reduce tensions in the country and suppress disturbances caused (among other things) by anti-Semitism. In February 1938 King Charles II removed the ruling coalition and established a “government of national unity” with Patriarch Miron Cristea as its head. In fact this was a royal coup d'état that destroyed the appearance of democracy. In March 1938 Antonescu resigned his post in protest at the use of the army for domestic repression. He found himself in opposition to the king and became involved with the Fascist Iron Guard, supported by the Third Reich.

After the USSR annexed Bessarabia and northern Bukovina from Romania in June 1940 and Hungary took a part of Transylvania as a result of the Viennese arbitration of 30 August 1940, and also since Bulgaria claimed southern Dobrudja, King Charles had to resign. After a failed attempt by the Iron Guard to seize power on 4 September 1940, Antonescu established a dictatorship with the help of the armed forces. As premier of a “National Legionary State,” he began a complicated game with the Third Reich and the Iron Guard. Under German pressure, the leader of the Iron Guard, Horia Sima, became deputy prime minister. On 6 September, Antonescu reached an agreement with liberals and royalists and forced the abdication of Charles in favor of his son, Michael I. Once in power, one of Antonescu's first acts had to be the recognition of the Viennese arbitration by which Hungary gained a part of Transylvania and of the annexation of Bessarabia and northern Bukovina. The guardsmen unleashed a wave of terror and in November 1940 murdered the former premier, Nicolae Iorga, and an outstanding economist, Virgil Madgearu. This was followed by an attempted coup, to which Antonescu responded with force. Despite German support for the Iron Guard, the army suppressed the incidents and pogroms instigated on 21–23 January 1941 in the streets of Bucharest, and Antonescu forced Sima and other leaders of the Iron Guard to leave for Germany. Although the head of state was formally King Michael, henceforth Antonescu governed Romania integrally as premier, marshal, and commander (conducatorul) of the nation. However, the reward for the suppression of the “fifth column” by the Germans was concessions toward Hitler. In the fall of 1940 German troops came to the country under the guise of “protectors” of the Romanian petroleum fields and the country’s industrial centers.

The treaty of 4 December 1940 with Germany subordinated the Romanian economy to the Third Reich, even though it temporarily promised favorable conditions. On 23 October 1940 Antonescu signed the anti-Comintern Pact, but in April 1941 he refused to take part in the war against Yugoslavia, with whom Romania had traditionally had good relations. Instead, in order to gain back Bessarabia and Bukovina, he ordered thirty Romanian divisions to support the German invasion of the USSR in June 1941. After his aim had been achieved, which added greatly to his popularity, he submitted to German pressure on 14 August 1941 and sent his troops beyond Dniester. This drew Romania into war against the Allies for good. Antonescu found himself under pressure from public opinion, which mistakenly expected that German support would help to regain the rest of Transylvania. Despite German pressure, he did not agree to the mass extermination of the Jewish population of the Old Kingdom and southern Transylvania, whereas in Bessarabia and Bukovina the authorities organized deportations and the annihilation of Jews accused of supporting the Soviet regime in 1940–41.

The collaboration policies of Antonescu depended upon two factors—the current power of the Third Reich and calculations as to who was going to win the war eventually. Under the influence of Foreign Minister Mihai Antonescu, Antonescu tried to enter into closer relations with Italy; by improving cooperation among the Romance-language countries—Romania, Italy, France, Spain, and Portugal—he intended to bring about a joint withdrawal from the war against the Western powers. These plans failed. Despite many indirect contacts, the Allies did not agree to a separate peace treaty with the German satellite governments without the consent of the USSR. In February 1944 Antonescu sent a special emissary, Prince Barbu Știrbei, on a mission to prepare the capitulation of Romania to the Allies, but the Kremlin, which wanted to enter the defeated country, blocked even this attempt.

The Romanian army suffered heavy losses in the USSR in 1944. Antonescu failed to side with the Big Three. It was only King Michael who was able to take the initiative in the overthrow of the dictatorship (23 August 1944), when the Red Army stood at the borders of Romania. Antonescu was arrested by Michael during his visit to the royal palace. He was interrogated for a long time, and, after the events of February 1945, he was handed over to the Russian Communists and the Soviet authorities. During his trial, which began in May 1946, the history of an extremely difficult political situation in Romania in 1940–44 came to light. German witnesses confirmed the caution with which Antonescu had acted toward Hitler. To the end Antonescu maintained that he had tried to prevent the subjugation of Romania by the USSR. During the trial even the leader of the peasant opposition, Iuliu Maniu, did not hesitate to shake hands with him. Antonescu was sentenced to death and executed. (WR) Sources: Biographisches Lexikon, vol. 1; Andreas Hillgruber, Hitler, König Carol und Marschall Antonescu (Wiesbaden, 1954); Andrzej Koryn, Rumunia w polityce wielkich mocarstw 1944–1947 (Wrocław, 1983); Jipa Rotaru, Octavian Buran, and Vladimir Zodian, Maresalul Ion Antonescu: Am facut “razboiul sfânt” Împotriva bolșevismului: Campania anului 1941 (Oradea, 1991); Gheorghe Barbul, Mamorial Antonescu: Al treilea om al Axei (Iași, 1992); Ioan Dan, “Prosesul” Maresalului Ion Antonescu (Bucharest, 1993); Keith Hitchins, Rumania 1866–1947 (Oxford, 1994); Iosif C. Dragan, Antonescu: Marshal and Ruler of Romania, 1940–1944 (Bucharest, 1995); Gh. Buzatu, ed., Maresalul Antonescu În fata istoriei, Documente, marturii și comentarii, vols. 1–4 (Iași, 1990–1995); Denis Deletant, Communist Terror in Romania: Gheorghiu-Dej and the Police State, 1948–1965 (New York, 1999).

ANTONESCU Mihai (18 November 1904, Nucet–1 June 1946, Jilava), Romanian lawyer and politician. Antonescu studied law at Bucharest University (1922–26). In 1927 he successfully defended a Ph.D. in law, and in 1931 he achieved the rank of assistant professor. In 1940 he defended General Ion Antonescu, who, on the orders of King Charles II, was being held prisoner at the Bistrița monastery. It was then that Antonescu first established contact with Ion Antonescu, with whom he had no family ties. After the takeover of power by Ion Antonescu, from November 1940 to January 1941 he served as justice minister in the government formed in coalition with the Iron Guard. When, after an unsuccessful coup by the Guardists, Ion Antonescu liquidated the Iron Guard and became head of the government (27 January 1941), Antonescu was appointed deputy prime minister and minister of foreign affairs. After the attack against the USSR in June 1941 he acted as premier on several occasions, replacing Ion Antonescu, who was on the eastern front. Antonescu was also responsible for foreign policy, except for relations with the Third Reich, which were handled by Ion Antonescu himself. Antonescu had a positive attitude toward Polish refugees in Romania, and despite pressures he protected them from Germans. The Polish government in exile, acting within the framework of the so-called Tripod Action, got in touch both with Antonescu and with the Romanian dictator in order to withdraw the country from its alliance with Germany. This initiated Romanian involvement in secret negotiations with the Allies; between 1942 and 1943 these were held in Cairo, Ankara, Stockholm, Madrid, Lisbon, Geneva, and the Holy See. A separate secret initiative of Antonescu was to maintain contacts with Italy, Vichy France, Spain, and Portugal in order to establish a "Latin Axis," directed against the USSR and Hungary. Another goal that Antonescu pursued between 1941 and 1943 was to create a new "Little Entente" of Romania, Croatia, and Slovakia, which would be directed against Hungary.

In 1943 these activities, conducted with the knowledge of Ion Antonescu, were discovered by German intelligence in Turkey; as a result, Hitler demanded the dismissal of Antonescu. However, Marshal Antonescu did not agree to that. Antonescu continued his efforts to come to an agreement with the Allied countries through the diplomatic missions of neutral countries in Bucharest, especially through a Swiss envoy, Maurice de Weck, but in the face of a Soviet veto his attempts came to nothing. On the morning of 23 August 1944 Marshal Antonescu sent a wire to the diplomatic mission in Stockholm, trying to conclude peace with the USSR. The same day, however, a coup was staged, and Antonescu was arrested, along with the head of state. At the end of August they were both handed over to the Soviets and taken to Moscow, where they stayed until April 1946. Some sources state that they rejected a Soviet proposal to reassume power in Romania in exchange for close cooperation. In May 1946 their trial was held in Bucharest. At the trial, an amnesty proposed by King Michael was rejected, and the terms of the 1923 constitution and the Romanian penal code, which did not provide for the death penalty, were disregarded. Antonescu was executed by firing squad in the garden of the Jilava prison, along with Marshal Antonescu and two generals. Antonescu was the author of, among other works, Organizarea păcii și a Societații Națiunilor (The establishment of a peaceful order and the League of Nations; 1929) and La Roumanie (1933). (FA/TD)

Sources: Biographisches Lexikon, vol. 1; Gheorghe Buzatu, ed., Mareșalul Antonescu în fața istoriei, vols. 1–4 (Iași, 1990); Gheorghe Barbul, Mamorial Antonescu: Al treilea om al Axei (Iași, 1992); Andreas Hillgruber, Hitler, Regele Carol și Mareșalul Antonescu: Relațiile româno-germane în 1940–1944 (Bucharest, 1994); General Ion Gheorghe, Un dictator nefericit: Mareșalul Antonescu. Calea României spre Statul satelit (Bucharest, 1996); Ion Calafeteanu, "Mihai Antonescu și ideea "Axei latine," in România și politica de alianțe: Istorie și actualitate (Bucharest, 1993); Florin Anghel, "O alternativă de colaborare în interiorul Axei: Spre o nouă Mică Înțelegere, 1941–1944," in Revista Istorică, 1996, nos. 3/4.

ANTONESCU Victor (3 September 1871, Antonești–24 September 1947, Bucharest), Romanian lawyer, diplomat, and politician. Before the agrarian reform of 1921 Antonescu was a large landowner. He had no family ties with General Ion Antonescu. He studied law at the university in Bucharest (1888–91) and at the College of Political Sciences in Paris (1891–94), where in 1895 he defended his Ph.D. in law. Between 1897 and 1900 he was a professor at the College of Political Sciences in Bucharest. From 1900 until his death he was a member of the National Liberal Party (PNL). In 1901 he was elected to parliament. He held various diplomatic posts—for example, he was minister of the legation in Paris (1917–20) and a member of the Romanian delegation to the Paris Peace Conference (1919–20), where he played an important role in advancing the stance of Romania. In 1922–26 he represented Romania at the League of Nations in Geneva. On behalf of the PNL he served as justice minister in 1914–16 and 1933–35, finance minister in 1916–17 and 1935–36, and minister of foreign affairs between August 1936 and 1937. His efforts led to a rapprochement with Poland; as a result the diplomatic missions of both countries were elevated to the ranks of embassies (June 1936). He adopted a conciliatory stance toward the policy of Charles II. He authored, for example, Economie politique (Political economy; 1895). (FA/TD)

Sources: Șerban N. Ionescu, Who Was Who in Twentieth Century Romania (Boulder, Colo., 1994); Dov. B. Lungu, Romania and the Great Powers 1933–1940 (Durham, N.C., 1989); Historia dyplomacji polskiej, Piotr Łossowski, ed., vol. 4 (Warsaw, 1995).

ANTONIADE Constantin (16 August 1880, Bucharest–1954, Sighet), Romanian diplomat. In 1902 Antoniaade graduated in law from Bucharest University, and in 1907 he received a Ph.D. in philology there. From 1919 to 1921 he worked as secretary of the Romanian delegation to the peace talks with the Central Powers, and from 1922 to 1927 he served as a judge at the League of Nations Court in Geneva. In 1928–29 he worked as a representative to the League of Nations, and then until 1933, as a member of the League of Nations committee preparing an international conference on security and disarmament. From 1936 to 1939 he was minister plenipotentiary in the Romanian Embassy in Switzerland. After the takeover of power by General Ion Antonescu in 1940, Antoniadu went into opposition against the regime and its foreign policy. He was a sophisticated intellectual, and he authored Les ambassadeurs de Venise du XVIème siècle (Ambassadors of Venice in the sixteenth century; 1934), as well as essays on Henri Bergson, Thomas Carlyle, and Niccolò Machiavelli. Arrested by the Communists in 1950, he died in prison. (FA/WR)

Sources: Șerban N. Ionescu, Who Was Who in Twentieth Century Romania (Boulder, Colo., 1994).

ANTONOV-OVSEYENKO Volodymyr [originally Ovseyenko] (21 March 1883, Czernichów–8 February 1938, Moscow), Bolshevik officer and diplomat. Antonov-Ovseyenko came from the family of an officer of the tsarist army. Although from the end of 1902 he was a member of the Russian Social Democratic Workers' Party, in 1904 he graduated as a second lieutenant from a Vladimir infantry school in St. Petersburg. At the turn of 1904/1905 he was assigned to military service in Warsaw and took part in the preparations for a military insurrection in the Kingdom of Poland. In the spring of 1905, after receiving a disciplinary transfer to the Far East to fight in the war against Japan, he left the army to continue revolutionary activities. Having allied himself with the Mensheviks, he was active in (among other places) St. Petersburg, Moscow, and Sevastopol, where he was captured and sentenced to death in 1907. The sentence was commuted to twenty years of penal servitude. He escaped soon after the sentence was passed and continued his activities. In 1909 he emigrated to France, where he assumed the name of Antonov. From 1910 he resided in Paris, and from 1914 he co-edited the magazine Golos. After the outbreak of World War I, in 1915 he expressed his support for the internationalist stance adopted by Lenin. At the end of 1915 he broke off with the Mensheviks and in May 1917 returned to Russia.

Antonov-Ovseyenko aligned himself with the Bolsheviks and conducted revolutionary agitation in Finland and Latvia, and in 1917 he became a member of the Military Revolutionary Committee in Petrograd. He took part in the Bolshevik coup in the capital, and at the All-Russian Congress of Soviets (8–9 November 1917) he was elected a member of the Council of People's Commissars for war and sea affairs. On 8 December 1917 he became commander of the armed forces for the struggle against counterrevolution in southern Russia (the Don, the Ukraine, and the Caucasus). Between December 1917 and February 1918 his units, attacking from the northeast, conquered the entire left bank of the Dnieper River in the Ukraine as far as Kiev. In March 1918 the Ukraine passed into the hands of the Germans, so between May and November 1918 he held various command posts in central Russia. In November 1918, with the collapse of the German occupation, he was appointed commander of the armed forces of the Kursk section (the so-called Ukrainian Front). From early December 1918 to early February 1919 he again seized the left bank of the Ukraine, including Kiev, this time pushing out the armed forces of the directorate of the Ukrainian People's Republic from this territory.

In the summer of 1919 the Ukraine passed into the hands of General Anton Denikin. Antonov-Ovseyenko was transferred to administrative work in the guberniya (province) of Povolzhye (middle and lower Volga region), which was suffering from famine and peasant insurrections. He was active there between 1921 and 1922. From 1917 he was a co-worker of the people's commissar for defense, Leon Trotsky, and between 1922 and 1924 he held the post of head of the Political Executive of the Revolutionary Military Council of Russia (Revvoiensoviet). As a Trotskyite, he was removed from his executive posts by Stalin. He was assigned to diplomatic work and headed a special negotiation mission to Canton (February–April 1924); he was subsequently a Soviet envoy to Czechoslovakia (1924–28), Lithuania (1928–30), and Poland (1930–34). In June 1934 he was suddenly recalled from his post and was appointed prosecutor of the RSFSR, but in July 1936 he was sent to Barcelona as consul general of the USSR. He was again recalled in September 1937 in relation to preparations for the trials of the Trotskyist opposition. On 12 October 1937 he was arrested and on 8 February 1938 sentenced to ten years in prison. According to recent findings, he was murdered in Lubyanka Prison the same day his sentence was rendered. He was rehabilitated at the Twentieth Congress of the CPSU in 1956. Between 1924 and 1933 four volumes of his memoirs of 1914–19, Zapiski o grazhdanskoi voine (Notes on the civil war), were published. They remain a valuable source of information on the course of revolution in Russia, although they are not free from propaganda, which gave prominence to the role of Stalin and diminished the role of Trotsky. (TS)

Sources: MERSH, vol. 2; A. V. Rakitin and Robert V. Daniels, Red October: The Bolshevik Revolution of 1917 (New York, 1967); Wladimir A. Antonov-Owseienko: Istoriko-biograficheskii ocherk (Moscow, 1989); V. A. Antonov-Ovsieienko, V semnadtsatom godu (Kiev, 1991).

ANVELT Jaan (18 April 1884, Võisiku–11 December 1937, USSR), Estonian Communist activist. Born into a peasant family, in 1907 Anvelt joined the Bolshevik party. He graduated in law from St. Petersburg University in 1912 and edited the Bolshevik magazine Kiir. During the February 1917 revolution he was head of a revolutionary committee and the head of the soviet in Narva. After the October 1917 revolution he was president of the Bolshevik Executive Council for Estonia. He came to Petrograd at the beginning of 1918, and at the end of the same year he returned to Estonia as head of the Council of People's Commissars and commissar for military affairs. After the failure of the revolution and after Estonia gained independence, he fought as the commander of the Red Army on different fronts of the Russian civil war. In 1921 he returned to Estonia and headed underground activities. On 1 December 1924 he led an unsuccessful Communist coup in Tallinn. After his return to the USSR he became commissar of a military academy in Moscow; between 1929 and 1935 he was head of the Central Council of Civil Aviation of the USSR, and later, a Comintern worker. Under the pen name "Aadu Eessaare" he published a number of works. Arrested during the Great Purge, he died in prison. In the 1980s some of his works and letters were published in Estonia. (WR)

Sources: MERSH, vol. 2; Eesti Nõukogude Entsiklopedia, vol. 1 (Tallinn, 1985); Jaan Anvelt, Valitud teosed (Tallinn, 1982); Jaan Anveldi kirjavahetusi aastaist 1904–1914 (Tallinn, 1984).

APOR Vilmos (29 February 1892, Segesvár [now Sigişoara, Romania]–2 April 1945, Győr), Hungarian bishop, victim of Communist terror. The sixth child of a noble family, Apor was deprived of his father at a young age and was brought up by his mother. He completed theological studies at a Jesuit university in Innsbruck, where he received a doctorate. Ordained in August 1915 in Nagyvárad (now Oradea, Romania), Apor worked as a priest and lecturer in theology. For a short time he served as a chaplain in the army. From 1916 he was chaplain and in 1937–41 parish priest in Gyula. As he was especially devoted to the poor, Apor was called the "presbyter of the poor," and on 21 January 1941 Pope Pius XII consecrated him bishop of Győr. In October 1944, along with other Hungarian bishops, Apor appealed to Ferenc Szálasi to withdraw Hungary from the war in order to prevent a national catastrophe. In December 1944 he personally intervened on the issue with the head of the Hungarian Nazis, protesting against the deportation and extermination of Hungarian Jews. After the invasion of the Red Army many women took refuge in his residence, fearing rape by Soviet soldiers. Apor, who came to the defense of three girls, was seriously wounded, and he died in hospital. In May 1986 he was buried in a basilica in Győr, where his grave was a place of pilgrimage and prayer of the faithful. On 9 November 1997 he was beatified by Pope John Paul II as a martyr. (WR) Sources: Magyar Életrajzi Lexikon (Budapest, 1967), vol. 1; Fifth Interim Report of Hearings before the Subcommittee on Hungary of the House of Representatives Select Committee on Communist Aggression (Washington, D.C., 1954); Osservatore Romano (Polish edition), 1998, no. 1.

APOSTOL Gheorghe (17 May 1913, Tudor Vladimirescu, near Tecuci), Romanian Communist activist. The son of a railway worker, after primary school Apostol attended a railway trade school, and then he worked as a switchman. In 1930 he joined the Communist Party of Romania (CPR), participating in its youth organization. In 1936 he was arrested for Communist activities and sentenced to a lengthy imprisonment. He was released only after the coup of 23 August 1944. As the Communist dictatorship consolidated, he advanced in the trade union apparatus. In 1944 he became secretary of the General Confederation of Labor, and from 1945 to 1952 he was its chairman. From 1945 he was a member of the Central Committee (CC) of the Romanian Communist Party (RCP; renamed in 1943); from 1948 to 1969 he was a member of the Politburo of the CC of the Romanian Workers' Party (RWP; its name in 1948–65), and then a member of the RCP again. From 1946 to 1974 he was MP. In 1948, 1950–51, and 1952 he was the parliament speaker. From May 1952 to January 1953 he was third deputy prime minister, and then until April 1954, deputy prime minister. From October 1953 to April 1954 he was also minister of agriculture and forestry.

Apostol was closely connected with the first secretary of the Communist Party, Gheorghe Gheorghiu-Dej. After Stalin's death, as a result of Soviet pressures to introduce "collective leadership," on 20 April 1954 Gheorghiu-Dej gave up the party leadership to Apostol and took the helm of the government. Having realized that this may deprive him of control over the state, on 30 September 1955 he dismissed Apostol from the position of first secretary. In 1955–61 Apostol was chairman of the Central Council of Trade Unions (CCTU), and from March 1961 to January 1967, first deputy prime minister. From 1965 to 1969 he was a member of the Presidium and of the Executive Committee of the RCP, and in 1967–69, chairman of the CCTU again. In 1968–70 he was a member of the National Council of the Front of Socialist Unity. As he consolidated control over the party and state by removing the clients of Gheorghiu-Dej, in 1969 Nicolae Ceauşescu dismissed Apostol from all these positions. From 1969 to 1975 he was director general of the State Reserve Fund, and from 1975 to 1977 he was sales director of the Semanatoarea enterprise in Bucharest. From 1977 to 1983 he was ambassador to Argentina, and in 1983–89, to Brazil. Probably from the early 1980s he stayed in touch with party leaders who had been fired by Ceaușescu. In 1989 Apostol was among six signatories of a letter criticizing Ceaușescu of the violation of human rights; the letter was broadcast on Radio Free Europe. According to one theory, this was a step toward toppling the dictator, which came to an end on 22 December 1989. Later on Apostol played no significant role in public life. (LW)

Sources: Klaus-Detlev Grothusen, ed., Rumänien (Göttingen, 1977); Who's Who in the Socialist Countries of Europe (Munich, London, and Paris, 1989); Ionescu Ghiță, Comunismul în România (Bucharest, 1994); Józef Darski, Rumunia: Historia, współczesność, konflikty narodowe (Warsaw, 1995); Ion Alexandrescu, Ion Bulei, Ion Mamina, and Ioan Scurtu, Enciclopedia de istorie României (Bucharest, 2000).

APPONYI Albert (29 May 1846, Vienna–7 February 1933, Geneva), Hungarian politician and diplomat. Apponyi started his political career in 1872, when, after graduating from law studies at the universities in Pest and Vienna, he became an MP. Except for the years 1875–1877 and 1918–20, he remained in the parliament, representing various conservative and nationalist parties until the end of his life. Without denying the necessity to conclude the Austro-Hungarian compromise of 1867, he strove to extend Hungarian autonomy. From October 1901 to November 1903 he was the speaker of the Hungarian parliament. From April 1906 to January 1910 he was minister of education and religions in the second government of Sándor Wekerle, authoring a controversial law demanding instruction in Hungarian in all primary schools in Hungary (the so-called lex Apponyi of 1907) and a 1909 decree on the compulsory teaching of religion in Hungarian. After the fall of the Wekerle government Apponyi was one of the most radical leaders of the opposition to the governments of István Tisza. From August 1917 to October 1918 Apponyi was minister of education in the third cabinet of Wekerle.

After World War I Apponyi presided over the Hungarian delegation to the peace talks; on 16 January 1920 in the Trianon Palace in Versailles, the delegation was informed about the results of the peace conference, which deprived Hungary of the bulk of its prewar territory. In protest Apponyi resigned. In the spring of 1920 he was suggested as a possible regent of Hungary, but he failed to gain wider support. He changed his political orientation and became one of the top leaders of the revisionist movement and of the Hungarian legitimists, who demanded the return of the Habsburgs. From 1925 to 1933 he was representative to the League of Nations. He was the author of several books on the interdependence of Hungarian domestic and foreign policy, including the following: A magyar nemzet természetszerű elhelyezkedése a világpolitikában (The objective situation of the Hungarian nation in world politics; 1915); The American Peace and Hungary (1919); Hungarian Foreign Policy (1921); Emlékirataim (Memoirs, 2 vols.; 1922–34); and Élmények és emlékek (Experience and reflections; 1933). (MS)

Sources: Biographisches Lexikon, vol. 1; Steven Béla Varga, Historical Dictionary of Hungary (Lanham, Md., 1997); Apponyi emlékkönyv (Budapest, 1926); Imre Jósika–Herczeg, Apponyi és Amerika (New York, 1926); Sándor Pethő, Gróf Apponyi Albert (Budapest, 1926); József Kerekesházy, Apponyi (Budapest, 1943); Nicholas Horthy, Memoirs (Paris, 1954); Harold Steinacker, Austro-Hungarica (Munich, 1963).

APRÓ Antal [originally Klein] (8 February 1913, Szeged–9 December 1994, Budapest), Hungarian Communist activist. Brought up in an orphanage, after primary school Apró worked as a house painter in Makó and Budapest. In 1930 he joined the All-National Union of Hungarian Construction Workers (AUHCW), and a year later, the illegal Hungarian Communist Party (HCP). In 1935 he co-organized a strike of construction workers and was active in the United Trade Union Opposition. In 1936–44 he was arrested seven times. Elected to the national leadership of the AUHCW in 1938, in September 1944 he became a member of the Central Committee (CC) of the Party of Peace, founded in June 1943 by János Kádár as a cover for the Communist Party. From 1945 Apró was a member of the HCP CC; from 1948, a member of the CC of the Hungarian Workers' Party (HWP); and from 1956, a member of the CC of the Hungarian Socialist Workers' Party (HSWP).

For more than thirty years Apró stayed in the top leadership of the Communist Party and the state. From May to October 1946 he was a deputy member and then until June 1948 a member of the HCP CC Politburo; until 1956 he was a member of the HWP CC Politburo (except for the period from June to October 1953), and until 1980 he was a member of the HSWP CC Politburo. In 1946–52 he worked in the Organization Department of the HCP and HWP CC. In 1948 he was a member of the joint Organization Committee of the HCP and the Social Democratic Party; the committee's aim was to merge both parties under the control of the Communists. From 1945 to 1989 he was MP; from August 1948, secretary general of the National Council of Trade Unions; from August 1949 to January 1952 and from July to November 1953, a member of the Presidential Council; from the beginning of 1952 to July 1953, minister of the Ministry of Building Materials, and then deputy minister of building. In November 1953 he returned to the party Politburo and became deputy prime minister (until 31 October 1956) and permanent delegate to Comecon (until 1971). From the end of 1954 he belonged to the CC commission for the rehabilitation of unjustly sentenced party members, and in June 1956 he was elected chairman of the National Council of the Patriotic Front. On 6 October 1956 he made a speech during the funeral of László Rajk and his comrades.

Close to Kádár, Apró represented his political position. At the beginning of the revolution, on the night of 23 October 1956, he was elected to the CC Military Commission. From 26 October he was deputy prime minister and minister of building in the government of Imre Nagy. On 28 October he was co-opted to the HWP CC Politburo. On 1 November he turned up at the Soviet command in Tököl, near Budapest, and on 4 November he entered the Revolutionary Workers' and Peasants' Government of Kádár as minister of heavy industry. In December 1956 he became head of the Economic Commission of the HSWP CC. From May 1957 he was deputy prime minister, and from 1961 he headed the government's International Relations Committee. In May 1971 he was relieved of these duties and became speaker of parliament until December 1984. From 1976 to 1989 he was chairman of the Association of Hungarian-Soviet Friendship. In 1980 he was dismissed from the Politburo and in 1988 from the HSWP. In May 1989 he gave up his parliamentary mandate and retired. (JT)

Sources: Magyar Nagylexikon, vol. 2 (Budapest, 1994); A magyar forradalom és szabadságharc enciklopédiája, CD-ROM (Budapest, 1999); Új Magyar Életrajzi Lexikon, vol. 1 (Budapest, 2001); Bennet Kovrig, Communism in Hungary from Kun to Kádár (Stanford, 1979); Klaus-Detlev Grothusen, ed., Ungarn (Göttingen, 1987); Miklós Molnár, From Béla Kun to János Kádár: Seventy Years of Hungarian Communism (New York, 1990).

ARB NORI Pjetër (18 January 1935, Durrës), Albanian writer, political prisoner, and politician. Born into the family of a Catholic prewar gendarme killed by the partisans during the war, Arbnori attended school in Shkodër. In 1949 he joined a secret youth organization that distributed anti-Communist leaflets. He graduated from high school with distinction but because of his family background he could not study abroad (there were no universities in Albania at that time). He worked as a teacher in a small school in the mountains. After military service, he worked as a farmhand in Xhafzotaj near Durrës. When the University of Tirana was established, thanks to false documents, Arbnori managed to start philological studies. In 1960 he entered into contact with a small secret Social Democratic organization in Durrës, and he was the author of its program. Arrested in 1961, he was sentenced to death. His sentence was commuted to twenty-five years in prison and in fact spent twenty-nine years in prison.

Released in August 1989, in January 1990 Arbnori joined the opposition against the Communist Party. He co-organized the Albanian Democratic Party (Partia Demokratike e Shqipërisë), and he became its first chairman in the Shkodër region, from where he won mandates in subsequent parliamentary elections. In 1992 and 1996 he was elected speaker of the parliament. An officer of the Security Service (Segurimi), identified Arbnori as an agent of the Segurimi who supposedly used the pseudonym Koromanja although these allegations were never confirmed by actual documentation. The only document that was preserved was Arbnori's agreement to cooperate with the Segurimi, and it is believed by his followers to be forged. Nevertheless, the case deeply divided former political prisoners. In August 1997 Arbnori went on a hunger strike to protest attempts by the ruling Socialists to block access of the opposition to public media. The independent Albanian press called him "an Albanian Mandela." As a result the parliament amended the constitution on this matter in 1998. Arbnori continued to work in the parliamentary human rights commission. He is the author of popular novels, including Kur dynden Vikingjët (When the vikings come; 1992), Mugujt e mesjetës (The darkness of the Middle Ages; 1993), and E bardha dhe e zeza (The black and the white; 1996). He has also translated French historical works. (TC)

Sources: B. Hamilton, Albania—Who Cares (Grantham, 1992); Elez Biberaj, Shqipëria në tranzicion: Rruga e vështrise drejt Demokracisë (Tirana, 2001).

ARCISZEWSKI Tomasz (14 November 1877, Sierzchowy—20 November 1955, London), Polish Socialist politician. The son of a participant in the January Insurrection (1863), after his father's premature death Arciszewski was brought up in poverty. He completed a primary education and a course for locksmiths, and from 1887 he was a laborer. In 1896 he joined the Polish Socialist Party (Polska Partia Socjalistyczna [PPS]). Fearing arrest, he left for England but in 1900 returned to Sosnowiec, where he rebuilt a Socialist unit. Temporarily arrested in August 1900, Arciszewski resumed his underground political activities. During the 1905 revolution he was a member of a Socialist council in Józefów and co-organized the PPS Fighting Organization. Later, he carried on underground Socialist agitation in Siedlce, Białystok, and Kraków, where he trained members of the PPS Fighting Organization. When the party split in 1906, Arciszewski sided with the PPS Revolutionary Faction. Hunted by the police, he constantly had to change his place of residence. In September 1908 he was one of the organizers of an expropriation action at Bezdany.

In August 1914 Arciszewski joined the Polish Legions, and in 1915 Józef Piłsudski sent him to the German-occupied territories of the former Kingdom of Poland. There he was active in the Polish Military Organization, organizing its units in Warsaw, Łódź, and Lublin. He directed the trade union of metal workers, and when the occupation ended, he organized the Central Committee of Trade Unions in resurrected Poland. On 7 November 1918 he became minister of labor and social welfare in the government of Ignacy Daszyński, and on 17 November of the same year, minister of post and telegraph in the government of Jędrzej Moraczewski. In January 1919 he was elected an MP to the Constituent Assembly. During the Polish-Soviet war he organized the workers' Committee for the Defense of Independence (Komitet Obrony Niepodległości). In independent Poland he was uninterruptedly a member of the Chief Council of the PPS and of its Central Executive Committee. He was elected an MP representing the PPS in 1922, 1928, and 1939 and was active in the parliamentary committee for social issues. After the May 1926 coup, he joined the opposition against the Piłsudski regime, and in 1930 he co-organized the center-left opposition (Centrolew). As a member of the right wing of the party, in the mid-1930s he opposed its "united front" tactics and closer links with the Communists.

After the defeat of September 1939 Arciszewski was one of the leading organizers of the underground Polish Socialist Party-Freedom, Equality, Independence (PPS-WRN), and from the beginning of 1944 he represented the party in the Council of National Unity (Rada Jedności Narodowej). At the end of July 1944 he was secretly taken to London by plane. He opposed compromise with the USSR. After the resignation of Stanisław Mikołajczyk, on 29 November 1944 Arciszewski became prime minister of the Polish government in exile. In that capacity, in February 1945 he submitted a protest of the Polish government against the Yalta decisions of the Big Three concerning the Polish question. President Władysław Raczkiewicz appointed Arciszewski his successor but later changed his mind in favor of August Zaleski. In June 1947 Arciszewski resigned as prime minister in protest. From December 1949 he directed the works of the Political Council, which competed with Zaleski. Arciszewski became a member of the Provisional Council of National Unity, which was formed in July 1954, and along with General Władysław Anders and Ambassador

Edward Raczyński he joined the Council of the Three, which from 1956 served as the presidency of the Republic of Poland. At the same time, until his death, Arciszewski held the post of president of the Central Foreign Committee of the PPS. (WR) Sources: The International Who's Who 1950 (London, 1950); Posłowie i senatorowie RP, vol. 1; Encyklopedia historii Drugiej Rzeczypospolitej (Warsaw, 1999); Zygmunt Zaremba, Wojna i konspiracja (London, 1957); Adam Ciołkosz, "Tomasz Arciszewski," Kultura, 1956, no. 1.

AREKHVA Mikalay, pseudonyms "Pyotr," "Klyshka-Malinouski," "Mikulich," and "Barysevich" [in Poland known as Orechwa] (24 November 1902, Boruny, near Oshmiany [Oszmiana]—16 July 1990, Minsk), Belorussian Communist activist. Having joined the Red Army in 1919, Arekhva fought against White Russian forces and against the Polish army. Between 1920 and 1924 he was in the Komsomol apparatus. From 1924 he served as the first secretary of the Central Committee (CC) of the Union of Communist Youth of Belorussia, and in January 1925 he was assigned to work in the northeastern territories of the Second Republic of Poland. He served as secretary of the Vilnius district of the Communist Party of Western Belorussia (CPWB). Arrested in 1926, he spent more than five years in a Polish prison. In 1934 he became head of the State Secretariat of the CPWB, and from 1936 he was a representative of the CC of the CPWB to the CC of the Communist Party of Poland (Komunistyczna Partia Polski). In 1939–44 he was in the USSR. In 1944 he was seconded to the Polish Army and then, on behalf of the Kremlin, he co-organized the Polish security apparatus. From July 1944 he was head of the Personnel Section, between March 1946 and December 1954 he served as director of the Personnel Department of the Ministry of Public Security of the Polish People's Republic, and between January and May 1955 he was director of the Personnel Department of the Committee for Public Security. As he flaunted his superiority as a Soviet officer, he was generally hated, even among the employees of the Polish security apparatus. In 1956 he left for the USSR. Between 1956 and 1984 he worked at the Party History Institute of the CC of the Communist Party of Belorussia. He was mainly involved in propagating the party's successes in the "struggle for the social and national liberation of Belorussians in Western Belorussia." He was the author of propaganda books—for example, Revalutsyinyi rukh u Zakhadniai Bielarusi u hady bielpolskai akupatsyii (The revolutionary movement in Western Belorussia during the years of White Polish occupation; 1958) and D'ela i ludi KPZB: Vospominaniia (Issues and People in the CPWB: Memoirs; 1983). (EM)

Sources: Entsyklapedyia historyi Belarusi, vol. 1 (Minsk, 1993); Edward Jan Nalepa, Oficerowie Armii Radzieckiej w Wojsku Polskim, 1943–1968 (Warsaw, 1995); Bielaruskaia entsyklapiedyia, vol. 1 (Minsk, 1996); Mirosław Piotrowski, Ludzie bezpieki (Lublin, 2000).

ARGETOIANU Constantin (3 March 1871, Craiova–1950, Sighet), Romanian politician and lawyer. The son of a general, Argetoianu studied law in Paris between 1888 and 1892, and in 1899 he received a Ph.D. in physics at the Paris Polytechnic. From 1898 to 1913 he worked in the diplomatic service, as secretary of the legation and as attaché. In 1914 he was appointed senator, representing the Conservative Party. He frequently changed his political orientation; for example, he was a member of the National Liberal Party and the National Democratic Party. Between January and March 1918 he was minister of justice in the government of General Alexandru Avarescu. In this capacity, in Buftea Argetoianu signed peace preliminaries unfavorable to Romania with the Central Powers; this led to the resignation of the cabinet and to the government of Alexandru Marghiloman. From March to June 1920 Argetoianu was finance minister, and then he served as minister of interior until December 1921. Between June and November 1927 he held the post of minister of agriculture. He had a good relationship with King Charles II from the moment of the king's accession in 1930. In the government of Nicolae Iorga (April 1931–June 1932) Argetoianu served as both minister of agriculture and minister of interior; in fact he was in charge of the work of the cabinet. At that time he tried to implement legislation that would cancel the debts of the peasants. However, the legislation did not come into force. After the introduction of the royal dictatorship in February 1938 and the dissolution of political parties, he was one of the first politicians to support the king, and he became a member of the Government of National Unity of Patriarch Miron Cristea. Until March 1938 Argetoianu served as minister of industry and trade, and then he was one of the leaders of the Front of National Rebirth, which was established in December 1938.

After the assassination of Prime Minister Armand Călinescu, on 28 September 1939 Argetoianu became the head of government and held the office until 28 November 1939. After the abdication of Charles II in September 1940, he went into political exile in Switzerland, where he remained until 1944. After the coup of 23 August 1944 he returned to Romania and formed a new political party, the Labor Party, which was supposed to take part in the elections of November 1946 but did not. Arrested by the Communist authorities in 1948, Argetoianu died in prison. He was the author of, among other works,

Problema constituțională (Constitutional problem; 1923); Naționalism și internaționalism (Nationalism and internationalism; 1929); Statul agrar (The Agrarian state; 1933); and a famous diary, titled Pe urmele trecutului: Memorii (Tracing the past: Memoirs; 1938), it was published in part in the 1930s, and the entire work appeared in the 1990s as Amintiri de azi pentru azi de mâine (Memoirs from today to tomorrow; 1990–92). (FA/TD)

Sources: Biographisches Lexikon, vol. 1; Juliusz Demel, Historia Rumunii (Wrocław, 1986); Larry L. Watts, Romanian Cassandra: Ion Antonescu and the Struggle for Reform 1916–1941 (Boulder, Colo., 1993).

ARGHEZI Tudor [originally Ion Theodorescu] (21 May 1880, Bucharest–14 July 1967, Bucharest), Romanian writer. Arghezi came from a peasant family that moved to Bucharest. In 1896 he graduated from high school and made his debut with a series of poems in the periodical Liga ortodoxă. Then he published his poems and prose in the periodicals Revista modernă and Viața nouă. In 1899 he entered the Cernică Monastery. A year later he became a deacon and soon secretary of the Bucharest metropolitan. He edited the periodicals Revista de idei and Linia dreaptă, but fearing church sanctions, he used his friend's name, Vasile Demetrius, as a pseudonym. In 1904 he left for Fribourg, Switzerland, to study, and in 1906 he broke with the church, moved to Geneva, and started studying in an evening school of handicrafts. He also worked in a watchmaker's shop. In 1910 he returned to Bucharest, doing both literary work and journalism in the daily Viitorul and in the periodicals Viața socială, Facla, and Rampa. In 1913 he became editor-in-chief of the daily Seară, where he published political columns, articles, and reviews.

During World War I Arghezi lived in Bucharest. After the war he was accused of writing for the pro-German press and imprisoned with eleven other writers in the Văcărești Monastery. After his release, in 1920–27 he wrote for various periodicals, editing Cugetul românesc and, from 1927, the weekly Națiunea. In 1928 he founded the periodical Bilete de papagal, which introduced a sort of allegorical pamphlet into Romanian literature, the so-called tablet. He published his first volume of poems, Cuvinte potrivite (Selected words), in 1927. His lyrics, combining tradition and modernist tendencies, garnered mixed feelings. His next volume, Icoane de lemn (Wooden icons; 1929), had anti-clerical overtones. In Poarta neagră (The black gate; 1930) he presented his memoirs from the Văcărești prison, and in Tablete din Țara Kutu (Tablets from the Land of Kutu; 1933) he criticized Romanian society and its political elite in a grotesque way. He also published a volume of poems, Cărticica de seară (The evening booklet; 1935), and the novel Cimitirul de Bună-Vestire (The Annunciation Cemetery; 1936). He was critical of the Ion Antonescu regime. For a pamphlet on the German ambassador—Baronul (Baron)—in 1943 he was sent to the Tîrgu Jiu camp, where he wrote an anti-Fascist comedy Seringa (Syringe).

After his release in August 1944 Arghezi published pamphlets on collaborators of the regime, memoirs, and a new volume of “tablets,” Manual de morala practică (Handbook of practical morality; 1945). On the fiftieth anniversary of his literary work in 1946, he received a state award. During the peak of Stalinism he chose to keep silent. In 1954 he resumed work with the daily and literary press. He published a volume of poems, Prisaca (Apiary), and a cycle of poems about the peasant rebellion, 1907. In 1955 he became a member of the Romanian Academy and an MP. In 1956 he wrote a philosophical poem, Cîntare omului (Human song), and then new volumes of poems, including Frunze (Leaves; 1961). On his eighty-fifth birthday he received the title of Hero of Socialist Labor, and the University of Vienna gave him the prestigious Herder Award. (ASK)

Sources: Wielka encyklopedia PWN, vol. 2 (Warsaw, 2001); Halina Mirska-Lasota, Mały słownik pisarzy rumuńskich (Warsaw, 1975); Dumitru Micu, Tudor Arghezi (Bucharest, 1965); Serban Cioculescu, Tudor Arghezi (Bucharest, 1971); Nicolae Balota, Opera lui Tudor Arghezi (Bucharest, 1997); Pavel Tugui, Arghezi necocoscut (Bucharest, 1998).

ARLOU Uladzimir (25 August 1953, Polotsk), Belorussian writer. Arlou studied history at the Belorussian State University in Minsk. In 1975–76 he worked as a teacher of history in Novopolotsk and then as a journalist and deputy editor-in-chief of the regional daily Khimik. In 1988 he became an editor in Mastatskaya Literatura Press, and in 1989, deputy chairman of the Belorussian PEN club. He made his debut as a poet in 1973. In the late 1980s he published collections of short stories: Dobry dzyen, maya Shipshina (Good morning, my Shipshina) and Dzyen, kali upala strala (The day the arrow fell). He won wide recognition for his short stories, essays, and historical novels: Poka nye pogasla svyecha (Until the candle dies down; 1990); Milast' knyazya Hyeranima (The Love of Prince Hieronymus; 1993); Tayamnitsy polatskay historyi (Secrets of the history of Polotsk; 1994); and Adkul nash rod (From where our clan comes; 1996). He co-authored Dzyesiats' vyakou belaruskay historyi (Ten centuries of Belorussian history; 1999). In 1998 he published a collection of short stories, Rekvyem dla byzenzapily (Requiem for a motor saw), a psychological portrait of Soviet Belorussian society of the 1970s and 1980s. His works have been translated in many European countries, and he has received many prestigious Belorussian awards. (EM)

Sources: Bielaruskiya pismienniki: Biyabibliografichny slounik, vol. 1 (Minsk, 1992); Bielaruskiya pismienniki 1917–1990: Davyednik (Minsk, 1994); Belarus: Entsyklapedychny davyednik (Minsk, 1995); Kto jest kim w Białorusi (Białystok, 2000).

ARSENNEVA Natalya [also spelled Arsen'neva Natal'lia] (20 September 1903, Baku–25 July 1997, Rochester, N.Y.), Belorussian poet. Arsenneva spent her childhood and youth in Vilnius. In 1921 she graduated from a Belorussian gymnasium in Vilnius, and she completed a course for teachers. Between 1921 and 1922 she studied in the Art Department of Stefan Batory University in Vilnius. In 1922 she married Franciszek Kuszal, a Belorussian activist and an officer in the Polish Army. Until September 1939 she lived in Słonim and in Chełmno. In the autumn of 1939, as a Polish officer's wife, she was arrested, along with her two sons, and she was deported to Kazakhstan. Released from exile thanks to the endeavors of Janka Kupała, she settled in Minsk. During the German occupation she worked in the editorial offices of the Belaruskaya gazeta. Her husband was a commander in an officers' school that was preparing cadres for the Belorussian military formations fighting on the side of Germany. In 1944 she and her family left for Germany, and in 1950, for the United States. She worked in the editorial offices of the émigré newspaper Byelarus, Radio Svaboda, and the Belorussian Institute of Literature and Arts in New York. In 1920 she made her debut with the poem “Nasha Dumka,” published in a Vilnius newspaper. The first collection of her poems, Pod sinim nebam (Beneath the blue sky), appeared in Vilnius in 1927; the second, Siahodnia (Today), in Minsk in 1944. She wrote love poems and lyric poetry inspired by Belorussian nature. The war left a deep mark on her writing. The motives of people who were destroying the world were beyond her comprehension. She wrote patriotic poems for which music was composed. In 1979 an anthology of her émigré writings, Mizh berahami (Between the banks), appeared in the United States. Its recurrent motifs are the idea of freedom and a nostalgia for Belorussia. She also wrote stage works such as Svaty (1955) and librettos for operas by Mykola Kulikovich, Lasnoie Oziero (Forest Lake) and Usiaslau Charadzei. She translated librettos for operas by Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart, Georges Bizet, Johann Strauss, and Pyotr Tchaikovsky into Belorussian. (EM)

Sources: B. Sachanka, S'niatstsa sny ab Bielarusi . . . (Minsk, 1990); Bielaruskiya pis'mienniki 1917–1990: Daviednik (Minsk, 1994); Entsyklapedyia historyi Bielarusi, vol. 1 (Minsk, 1993); Jan Zaprudnik, Historical Dictionary of Belarus (Lanham, Md., 1998).

ARTUKOVIĆ Andrija (29 November 1899, Klobuk, near Ljubuska–16 January 1988, Zagreb), Croatian nationalist activist. Born into a peasant family in Bosnia Herzegovina, Artuković graduated from a French gymnasium in Široki Brijeg (Lištica) and in law from the university in Zagreb in 1924. While a student, he began to associate with Croatian extremist nationalists. After the royal coup of 1929 he joined the Ustaša movement. He took part in an assassination attempt at the gendarmerie post in Brušane in the mountains of Velebit in 1932, and then he fled from Yugoslavia. In Italy he was one of the closest associates of Ante Pavelić in the preparations for the assassination of King Alexander Karadjordjević in Marseilles (1934). The French extradited Artuković to Yugoslavia on condition that he would not be interrogated about all the details of his activities. In April 1935 he was convicted on a trivial offense. Released in 1936, he went to Austria and then to Berlin, where the Ustaša general headquarters was moved in 1937. On 15 April 1941 he returned to Croatia as minister of interior of the Ustaša government. In that capacity he organized concentration camps and the mass killing of Serbs and Jews. At that time he became notorious for issuing a law forbidding “Serbs, Jews, Gypsies, and dogs” to enter public places. From the beginning of October 1942 he was minister of justice and religious affairs, and from April 1943 he again served as minister of interior. When Nikola Mandić became prime minister, Artuković was transferred to the less important post of chancellor of the seal (državni prabilježnik).

After the war Artuković managed to escape from Yugoslavia. For a short time he stayed in France, then in Switzerland and Ireland, and in 1948 he arrived in the United States and settled in Seal Beach, California. In August 1945 a Communist Yugoslav court declared him a war criminal; however, the American authorities considered him a political exile. In 1981 the Yugoslav authorities demanded his extradition as a war criminal. He was arrested but was soon released under pressure from Croatian organizations in the United States. After a long effort, in February 1986 he was finally handed over to Yugoslavia, and after a one-month trial, at which he denied accusations of having taken part in genocide, he was sentenced to death. The execution was postponed due to his ill health. He died in prison. (WR)

Sources: Hrvatski biografski leksikon, vol. 1 (Zagreb, 1983); L. Hory and M. Broszat, Der Kroatische Ustascha-Staat 1941–1945 (Stuttgart, 1964); Ivo Omrčanin, Dramatis personae and finis of the Independent State of Croatia in British and American Documents (Bryn Mawr, 1983); Bogdan Krizman, Ustaše i Treći Reich (Zagreb, 1983), vols. 1–2; Bogdan Krizman, Ante Pavelić i Ustaše (Zagreb, 1983); Djordje Ličina, Dossier Artuković (Zagreb, 1986); Jovo

Popović, Sudenje Andriji Artukovicia i sto nije receno (Zagreb, 1986); New York Times, 19 January 1988.

ASKENAZY Szymon (23 December 1865, Zawichost–22 June 1935, Warsaw), Polish historian, politician, and diplomat. Askenazy came from an intellectual Jewish family. He favored assimilation and was a Polish patriot, advocating the independence of Poland. In about 1888 he became affiliated with Warsaw Freemason circles. He was not a formal member of any lodge but enjoyed the support of several Freemasons. Having graduated in historical studies, in 1902 he became a lecturer and then a professor at the University of Lwów (Lviv). From 1907 he was a member of the Academy of Arts and Sciences. He represented a neo-Romantic trend in Polish historiography, a reaction to the dominant conservative Kraków school. He was particularly interested in the partitions of Poland and with Napoleonic times. He argued with the theory of Polish guilt for the partitions at the end of the eighteenth century, and he glorified Polish armed struggles for independence. He placed the Polish cause in the European context—for instance, in Przymierze polsko-pruskie (The Polish-Prussian Alliance; 1900) and Rosya-Polska (Russia-Poland; 1907). In Książę Józef Poniatowski, 1763–1813 (Prince Józef Poniatowski; 1905) and Łukasiński (2 vols.; 1908) he restored the myth of these heroes of the struggle for freedom, and in Napoleon a Polska (Napoleon and Poland, 3 vols.; 1918–19) he popularized the Napoleonic legend. Among his other works should be mentioned Gdańsk a Polska (Danzig and Poland; 1923) and Rękopisy Napoleona w Polsce 1793–1795 (Napoleon’s manuscripts in Poland, 1793–1795; 1929). Askenazy created his own historical school, and his best-known students were Władysław Konopczyński, Marian Kukiel, Henryk Mościcki, and Adam Próchnik.

During World War I Askenazy went abroad and was allied with the so-called activists, supporting the Central Powers. Despite his support for the pro-Austrian Chief National Committee, he collaborated with representatives of the opposite orientation. Along with Henryk Sienkiewicz, he established in Switzerland the Committee for Aid to War Victims in Poland. After Poland regained independence, he served as the first minister plenipotentiary at the League of Nations (1920–23). He gave up this post as a result of his conflict with Foreign Minister Roman Dmowski. Until the end of his life Askenazy was subjected to attacks from the nationalist right on account of his sympathies for freemasonry and his alleged anti-Polish activities. Owing to the anti-Semitic attitude of a part of the academic community, he did not return to Lwów University, and, despite efforts, he failed to gain a chair at

Warsaw University. In 1928 he received only an honorary professorship at Warsaw University. (MC)

Sources: Wielka Encyklopedia PWN, vol. 2 (Warsaw, 2001); Józef Dutkiewicz, Szymon Askenazy i jego szkoła (Warsaw, 1958); Historycy warszawscy ostatnich dwóch stuleci, eds. Aleksander Gieysztor, Jerzy Maternicki and Henryk Samsonowicz (Warsaw, 1986); Ludwik Hass, "W ujarzmionej stolicy—bez łoży (1831–1905)," www.arsregia.home.pl; "Szymon Askenazy," www.arsregia.home.pl; Słownik biograficzny szachistów polskich, Part 1, www.dig.com.pl/pdf/Szachy.pdf.

ASPĀZIJA [pseudonym of Elza Pliekšāne, née Rozenberga] (16 March 1865, Zaļenieku, Courland–5 November 1943, Riga), Latvian poet and playwright. Aspāzija came from a rich peasant family. In 1884 she graduated from a high school for girls in Riga. In 1879 she wrote her first poem in German, and in 1888 her first drama, Atrabēja (Avengeress). Her works, reflecting social conflicts at the turn of twentieth century, were not welcomed by the conservative element of the Latvian intelligentsia but brought her recognition in modernist and leftist circles. From 1891 she worked as a private teacher, and in 1893–95, in a Latvian theater in Riga. Later she joined the movement for women's rights. After her first marriage ended, she made friends with and in 1897 married the poet Jānis Rainis. From 1897 to 1903 she voluntarily joined him in exile in Russia. She also periodically lived in Riga, where she worked at the daily Dienas Lapa. It was then that she wrote her best-known plays, Zaudētās Tiesības (Lost rights; 1894) and Sidraba Šķidrums (Silver veil; 1905). In 1905 she took part in the revolution, and after its suppression she emigrated with her husband to Switzerland and continued her literary work. In April 1920 via Poland she returned with Rainis to Latvia, where they received an enthusiastic welcome. In 1920–22 she was a deputy to the Latvian Constituent Assembly on behalf of the Social Democratic Party. After her husband's death in 1929 she continued her literary work, becoming a leading figure in Latvian cultural life. She continued to write and publish plays and collections of poems, in which she frequently referred to her memories from childhood, as well as to Latvian history and mythology. She also translated Quo Vadis, by Henryk Sienkiewicz, into Latvian. She survived the fall of independent Latvia and the Soviet occupation and died after the German invasion. She is buried in Riga. (EJ)

Sources: Raiņa un Aspazijas gadagrāmata 1968. gadam (Vesterosa, 1967); Saulcerīte Viese, Aspazija (Riga, 1975); B. Amoliņa, Aspazija—spēks un daiļums, un mūžam nerimstošais gars (Riga, 1990); Raiņa un Aspazijas gadagrāmata (Riga, 1990); Saulcerīte Viese, Gājēji uz Mēnesdārzu (Riga, 1990); M. Butevica, Aspazija (Riga, 1993); Andrejs Plakans, Historical Dictionary of Latvia (Lanham, Md., 1997).

ASTRA Gunārs (22 October 1931, Riga–6 April 1988, Leningrad), Latvian dissident, victim of communism. Astra graduated from a technical high school and then studied Latvian philology. Afterwards he worked as a technician in the VEF factory in Riga. In 1961 he was arrested and sentenced to fifteen years in a labor camp for "anti-Soviet activities" since he had taken pictures of bridges and other facilities recognized by the authorities as secret. He was imprisoned in the Mordovian camps. Released in 1976, he became a blue-collar worker in Riga. In 1983 he was arrested again, this time for possession of the uncensored (illegal) novel Piecas dienas (Five days), which described everyday life in Soviet Latvia; for distributing copies of works by George Orwell and Aleksandr Solzhenitsyn; and for possessing recordings of Western broadcasts. Sentenced to seven years in prison and five years of forced settlement, Astra, in his last words before the court, openly criticized Russification policies and Russian colonization in Latvia. The text of his speech was widely distributed in Latvia and abroad in secret. He was imprisoned in the labor camps of the Perm region. Released on the basis of an amnesty in December 1988, he died in hospital after an operation. (EJ)

Sources: Biographical Dictionary of Dissidents in the Soviet Union, 1956–1978 (The Hague, 1982); Wielka Encyklopedia PWN, vol. 1 (Warsaw, 2001); Māris Ruks, Gunārs Astra (Riga, 1998); Biruta Eglīte, Kas jūs bijāt, Gunār Astra? (Riga, 1998); Policy of Occupation Powers in Latvia, 1939–1991, ed. Elma Pelkhaus (Riga, 1999).

ASTROUSKI Radaslau (6 November 1887, Zapole, near Slutsk–17 October 1976, Benton Harbor, Michigan), Belorussian social activist and politician. Astrouski took part in anti-tsarist demonstrations during the revolution of 1905. Between 1908 and 1913 he studied mathematics at St. Petersburg University. Arrested in 1911 for his activities in the Russian revolutionary movement, he completed his studies at the University of Dorpat (Tartu). In 1914 he taught mathematics at a gymnasium in Częstochowa, and in 1915–17, at the Minsk Teachers' Institute. After the February 1917 revolution he was appointed commissar of Slutsk county and headmaster of a gymnasium in Slutsk. He introduced the use of the Belorussian language in the schools. In June 1917 he joined the Central Committee of the Belorussian Socialist Hromada, the most influential Belorussian party. After the Bolshevik revolution he opposed recognition of the new Russian government and advocated the establishment of Belorussian state authorities. In December 1917 he was a delegate to the All-Belorussian Congress, which passed a resolution to establish national state authorities. He fought in the army of General Anton Denikin against the Bolsheviks, and in November 1920 he took part in the Slutsk uprising. After the war he settled in Wilno (Vilnius), where he was one of the key Belorussian figures, serving as headmaster of a Belorussian gymnasium (1924–36), president of the Belorussian School Society (1924–25), and headmaster of the Belorussian Cooperative Bank (1925–26).

In 1926 Astrouski became deputy president of the Central Committee of the Belorussian Peasants' and Workers' Hromada and a member of the Communist Party of Western Belorussia. Arrested in January 1927, he denied any ties with the Communists. From 1928 he promoted cooperation with the Polish government. In 1930 he co-founded the Central Union of Belorussian Cultural and Economic Organizations (Centrsayuz). Politically and socially ostracized by Vilnius Belorussian organizations, he left for Łódź, where he taught mathematics at a local school. In 1940 he became president of the Belorussian Committee in Łódź, and he established close cooperation with the Germans. Between the fall of 1941 and the fall of 1943, on behalf of the Germans, he served as mayor of Smolensk, Brańsk, and Mahilyow (Mogilev) successively. In December 1943 the Germans promoted him to the post of president of the Belorussian Central Council (BCC). The council aspired to be the Belorussian government in exile. In June 1944 the council, under Astrouski's leadership, convened the Second All-Belorussian Congress in Minsk, which, in agreement with the Germans, proclaimed the creation of the Belorussian state. A few days later the Red Army seized Minsk. Astrouski left for Germany, where on 25 March 1948 he formally reestablished the BCC as an émigré government of Belorussia. However, his opponents in exile claimed that the only legal Belorussian representation was the government of the Belorussian People's Republic, which had existed since 1918. Astrouski continued his political activities in the United States, where he arrived in 1956. He gathered some war émigrés who supported the legality of the BCC as the only representation of the Belorussian nation. (EM)

Sources: Bielaruskaia Sovietskaia Entsiklopediia, vol. 1, 1969; Entsyklapiedyia historyi Bielarusi, vol. 1 (Minsk, 1994); Nicholas P. Vakar, Belorussia: The Making of a Nation (Cambridge, Mass., 1956); V. Kalush, In the Service of the People for a Free Byelorussia: Biographical Notes on Professor Radaslau Ostrowski (London, 1964); Vitaut Kipel and Zora Kipel, eds., Byelorussian Statehood (New York, 1988); Jerzy Turonek, Białoruś pod okupacją niemiecką (Warsaw, 1993); Jan Zaprudnik, Historical Dictionary of Belarus (Lanham, Md., 1998).

ATANASOV Georgi (25 July 1933, Pravoslaven, Plovdiv district), Bulgarian Communist activist. Atanasov graduated in history from Sofia University. In 1956 he joined the Bulgarian Communist Party (BCP). From 1958 he was active in the youth movement, participating in various functions in the Dimitrov Communist Youth League (DCYL) and attaining the post of first secretary of the DCYL Central Committee (1965–68). At the same time, he rose in the party hierarchy. He began as a member of the BCP Town Committee in Sofia. Next, he served as candidate member and then member of the CC of the BCP (1966–90), head of the Department of Science and Education of the CC of the BCP (1968–76), head of the Administrative Department of the CC of the BCP (1976–78), secretary of the CC of the BCP (1977–86), candidate member of the Politburo of the CC of the BCP, head of the Organization Department of the CC of the BCP (1984–86), and member of the Politburo of the CC of the BCP (March 1986–February 1990). He also occupied high posts in the government administration. He was the first deputy of the president of the State Planning Committee (1980–81), president of the State Control Committee and the People's Control Committee, and deputy president of the State Council (1981–84). From 1966 to 1990 he was MP and served (among other capacities) as a member of the committee established in August 1987 to prepare changes in the constitution. Furthermore, he served as a member of the National Council of the Patriotic Front. From 21 March 1986 he was prime minister. Under the pressure of demonstrations, in mid-December 1989 he agreed to roundtable talks with the opposition. On 3 February 1990 he stepped down as a result of criticism at the Extraordinary Fourteenth Congress of the BCP. After the fall of the regime, in April 1992 he was arrested, and on 3 November 1992 the Supreme Court sentenced him to ten years in prison for the embezzlement of 200,000 leva from a fund for orphans. After 333 days in prison he was released owing to ill health. (JJ)

Sources: Koy koy e v Bulgariya (Sofia, 1998); Entsiklopediya Bulgariya (Sofia, 1978); James F. Brown, Bulgaria under Communist Rule (New York, 1970).

ATANASOV Nedyalko [originally Mochurov] (8 July 1881, Slomer, near Turnovo [now Veliko Turnovo]–12 February 1960, Sofia), Bulgarian peasant politician and teacher. Having graduated from a gymnasium in Shumen in 1899, Atanasov worked as a teacher for fourteen years. From 1908 he was a member of the Bulgarian Agrarian National Union (BANU), and from 1911 he was an MP representing this party. He was also an MP in 1914–17, 1919–20, and 1920–23. In the government of Aleksandur Stamboliyski, he served as minister of construction, roads, and spatial management (February–May 1920); minister of trade, industry, and labor (April–May 1920); and minister of post and telegraph (May 1920–June 1921 and March–June 1923). After the military coup of June 1923 he was arrested, tried, and acquitted in April 1924. He emigrated to Yugoslavia, where between 1924 and 1925 he was a member of the foreign representation of the BANU. After a split in the leadership of the peasant movement in exile he joined the leadership of its moderate, centrist wing. Atanasov was also one of the leaders of a group called Tseliski Glas (Voice of the Village) and editor of a newspaper of the same name. From 1935 to 1944 he had an ambivalent attitude toward the tsarist Bulgarian regime, holding a parliamentary seat in 1938–39. After the Communist coup of 9 September 1944 he was one of the leaders of the BANU opposition led by Nikola Petkov (1945–47), and he was an MP on behalf of this party. Because of his opposition activities, in 1949 he was imprisoned in a concentration camp in Belene, where he was a “dean” of the so-called brigade of deputies, which consisted of deputies to the Sixth Grand National Assembly. Released in 1955, Atanasov joined the Fatherland Front. He was the author of the following works: Tsanko Tserkovski: Lichni spomeni (Tsanko Tserkovski: Personal diaries; 1921); Zemedelski besedi (Village talks; 1930); and Po trudnija pyt: BZNS na vlast (On a tough path: The BANU in power; 1931). (JJ)

Sources: Entsiklopediya Bulgariya, vol. 1 (Sofia, 1978); Zygmunt Hemmerling, Ruch ludowy w Polsce, Bulgarii i Czechosłowacji 1893–1930 (Warsaw, 1987); Tasho V. Tashev, Ministrite na Bylgariia 1879–1999 (Sofia, 1999).

AVAKUMOVIĆ Jovan (1 January 1841, Belgrade–11 August 1928, Belgrade), Serbian lawyer and politician. Avakumović graduated in law in Germany and France, and then he practiced as a defense attorney and was active in the Liberal Party. In 1880 he was minister of justice, and from August 1892 to April 1893 he was Serbian prime minister and minister of foreign affairs. From the end of the nineteenth century he, along with other liberals, remained in opposition to King Alexander Obrenović, demanding a universal voting franchise, a territorial self-government, and more independence from Austria-Hungary. After King Alexander was assassinated, on 11 June 1903 Avakumović resumed the position of prime minister until 4 October 1903. A leading expert in penal law, he authored the first Serbian handbook on the subject: Teorija kaznenog prava (Theory of penal law; 1877); he also wrote Sticaj zločina (Circumstances of a crime; 1883) and Pokusaj (Attempt at murder; 1884).

Sources: Biographisches Lexikon, vol. 1; Enciklopedija Jugoslavije, vol. 1 (Zagreb, 1955); Chedomille Mijatovic, A Royal Tragedy (London, 1906); Michael B. Petrovich, A History of Modern Serbia 1804–1918, vol. 2 (New York, 1976); Željko E. Šuster, Historical Dictionary of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Lanham, Md., 1999).

AVERESCU Alexandru (9 March 1859, Ismail, Bessarabia–3 October 1938, Bucharest), Romanian marshal and politician. After finishing high school, between 1878 and 1881 Averescu studied at a military school in Mănăstirea Dealu, and between 1882 and 1886 he attended the Military College in Turin, Italy. In 1894–95 he was a commander of the Military College in Bucharest, and from 1895 to 1898 he served as military attaché in Berlin. In 1907 he became a general, and between March 1907 and March 1909 he was minister of war in the government of Dimitrie Sturdza. In that capacity he commanded military units that suppressed a peasant revolt in Moldavia, Muntenia, and Oltenia. This claimed the lives of over ten thousand peasants.

During the Second Balkan War (1913) Averescu commanded the Romanian Army in Bulgaria. From Romania’s entry into World War I until 1918, he commanded the Second Army and consolidated the defenses in Moldavia. During the heaviest battles, between late 1916 and August 1917, the lines of defense successfully resisted the attacks of the Central Powers. For example, Averescu won a victory over the Germans at Mărăști in July 1917. Between 29 January and 5 March 1918 Averescu served as premier and minister of foreign affairs. He negotiated peace with the Central Powers on behalf of the royal court and the National Liberal Party (NPL). On 7 May 1918 a peace treaty was concluded in Bucharest, but the treaty was humiliating for Romania, which lost much territory, including southern Dobruja and the Carpathian passes. Disagreements about political events led to mutual accusations between Averescu and the royal court; the latter accused him of “republicanism,” while he accused his predecessor, Premier Ion I. C. Brătianu, of implementing a policy that proved disastrous for Romania. In 1918 in Iași Averescu set up his own People’s Party (Partidul Poporului [PP]), in opposition to the ruling NPL. He was head of the PP until his death. In December 1919 he temporarily served as minister of the interior, and between 13 March 1920 and 17 December 1921 he was prime minister and minister of the interior, simultaneously serving as minister of industry and trade from November 1920. During his rule important social and political reforms were introduced—an agrarian reform (1921) and a social security reform (1920–21). The centralization of the government and the unification of the country was also carried out. Romania joined the Little Entente and signed an alliance treaty with Poland on 3 March 1921. In 1920 Averescu gained international recognition for the incorporation of Bessarabia into Romania. Averescu was fascinated with the experiment of Benito Mussolini in Italy.

On 30 March 1926 Averescu again became premier. He strengthened Romania's international position, concluding alliance treaties with France and Italy (1926). However, he was still perceived as a "republican" by the royal court and had bad relations with Ion I.C. Brătianu. Shortly before the death of King Ferdinand, on 7 June 1927, Averescu resigned as premier. In 1930 he was appointed marshal, but the same year he came into conflict with the new king, Charles II. However, in 1938 he became his adviser, supporting a royal dictatorship. In February and March 1938 he served as minister of state in the Government of National Unity of Patriarch Miron Cristea. Averescu authored (among other works) Răspunderile (Responsibility; 1918), Cauza politică (Political issue; 1927), and a book of memoirs, Notițe zilnice de război (Daily notes from the war; 1937). (FA/TD)

Sources: David Mitrany, The Land and the Peasant in Rumania (New Haven, 1930); R.W. Seton-Watson, A History of the Roumanians (Archon Books, 1963); Holger H. Herwig and Neil M. Heyman, Biographical Dictionary of World War I (Westport, Conn., 1982); Juliusz Demel, Historia Rumunii (Wrocław, 1986); Constantin Kirițescu, Istoria războiului pentru întregirea României 1916–1919, 2 vols. (Bucharest, 1989); Andrea Schmidt-Rösler, Rumänien nach dem Ersten Weltkrieg (Frankfurt am Main, 1994); Keith Hitchins, Rumania 1866–1947 (Oxford, 1994); Vasile Alexandrescu, Costică Prodan and Dumitru Preda, În apărarea României Mari: Campania Armatei Române 1918–1919 (Bucharest, 1995).

B

BABIĆ Milan (26 February 1956, Kukor, near Knin—5 March 2006, The Hague), leader of Serb separatists in Croatian Krajina. A dentist by profession, Babić had an office in Knin. Active in the Communist Party, in the late 1980s he became the mayor of Knin. In 1989 he co-founded the Serbian Democratic Party (Srpska Demokratska Stranka [SDP]), which in the first free elections of April–June 1990 won five mandates in the Croatian parliament. From early 1990 Babić strove for Serb autonomy in Croatia, but until the summer of 1990 he was in the shadow of the SDP leader, Jovan Rašković, who was ready to make a compromise with the Zagreb authorities. The radicalization of the Serbs and the creation in June 1990 of a Community of Serb-Administered Areas without consent from Zagreb, strengthened Babić's position. In July 1990 he became chairman of the Serbian National Council (SNC), a quasi-parliament of Serbs from Krajina that in December 1990 proclaimed secession from Croatia (it introduced the Cyrillic script, gave up paying taxes to Zagreb, and armed a local militia). In February 1991 Krajina proclaimed independence from Croatia, confirmed in a referendum among Serbs in the spring of 1991. When in June 1991 Croatia proclaimed independence, Serbs from Krajina, supported by the federal army, took a quarter of Croatian territory by force and proclaimed the Republic of Serbian Krajina, including other areas inhabited by a Serb majority—Slavonia, Baranya, and Srem.

This was a pyrrhic victory for Babić. Striving for the rapid unification of Krajina with the rest of Serb territories within a new Yugoslav federation, or Greater Serbia, he stood in the way of different plans proposed by Slobodan Milošević. In February 1992 Babić was removed from the SNC leadership and replaced by Goran Hadžić, who accepted UN peacekeeping forces in Krajina (the Cyrus Vance Plan). Babić tried to regain power in the presidential elections of December 1993, but he lost to the commander of the Krajina militia, Milan Martić, who was supported by Belgrade. For a few weeks, during the Croatian offensive in the summer of 1995, Babić was prime minister of the Republic of Serbian Krajina, but he failed to prevent the defeat and emigration of most of the Krajina Serbs from Croatia (he too emigrated). In January 2004 the Trial Chamber of the International Tribunal for War Crimes in Former Yugoslavia found him guilty of crimes against humanity during the Serbian offensive of 1991. He was found dead in his prison cell. (AW)

Sources: Robert Stallaerts and Jeannine Laurens, Historical Dictionary of the Republic of Croatia (Metuchen and London, 1995); Karen Dawisha and Bruce Parrot, eds., Politics, Power and the Struggle for Democracy in South-East Europe (Cambridge, 1997); Leszek Podhorodecki, Jugostawia: Dzieje narodów, państw i rozpad federacji (Warsaw, 2000); Eastern Europe and the Commonwealth of Independent States 1992 (London, 1992); Bugajski.

BABITS Mihály (26 November 1883, Szekszárd—4 August 1941, Budapest), Hungarian writer, translator, and historian of literature. Born into a family with roots in the gentry, from his early years Babits was fascinated by ancient cultures and native literature. After graduating from high school in Pécs in 1901, he studied Hungarian and classical philology at the University of Budapest (1901–5). He wrote poems and other short pieces from an early age and published them in literary magazines. His first collections, Levelek Irisz koszorújából (Leaves from the wreath of Iris; 1909) and Herceg, hátha megjön a tél is? (My prince, and if winter comes as well?; 1911), already showed his formal mastery and intellectual depth. Babits considered art a phenomenon free from social implications. After his studies, he started working as a teacher, and he became the editor (from 1939 editor-in-chief) of the biweekly Nyugat, the leading literary magazine of interwar Hungary. He translated a lot from Dante Alighieri, William Shakespeare, Johann Wolfgang Goethe, and Charles Baudelaire. He also wrote novels, such as A gólya kalifa (The stork caliph; 1916), in which he applied the theories of Sigmund Freud; Kártyavár (House of cards; 1923), a satire on contemporary Hungary written from the point of view of a small town; and Halál fia (Convicts; 1927), which was a family saga set against the background of social and cultural change at the turn of the twentieth century.

Babits was involved in the republican revolution of late 1918 and then, as a member of the Directorate of Writers, in the Hungarian Soviet Republic. After its fall he denied any connections with communism but nevertheless was forced to leave the University of Budapest, where he taught contemporary literature. From the late 1920s he was seriously ill with throat cancer. Losing his voice, he continued to write, publishing, among other things, a futurist novel on the coming destruction of humanity, Elza pilóta vagy a tökéletes társadalom (Woman pilot Elza, or the perfect society; 1933), and a two-volume collection of essays, Az európai irodalom történelem (History of European literature; 1934–35). His intellectual poetry and prose, as well as his translations, made him one of the outstanding Hungarian writers of the interwar period. (MS)

Sources: Aurél Kárpáti, B. M. életműve (Budapest, 1941); Babits Emlékkönyv (Budapest, 1941); Paul Igotus, Hungary (London, 1972); Mały słownik pisarzy węgierskich (Warsaw, 1977); Tibor Hajdu, The Hungarian Soviet Republic (Budapest, 1979); Mint különös hírmondó: Tanulmányok és dokumentumok (Budapest, 1983).

BABIUCH Edward (28 December 1927, Grabocin), Polish Communist activist. The son of a miner, Babiuch graduated from the Higher Party School at the Central Committee (CC) of the Polish United Workers' Party (Polska Zjednoczona Partia Robotnicza [PUWP]) and from the Central School of Planning and Statistics in Warsaw. In 1946 he joined the Polish Workers' Party, and in 1948, the PUWP. In 1949–55 he worked in the apparatus of the Polish Youth Union and from 1955 to 1959 in the CC apparatus; in 1959–63 he was secretary of the Warsaw Provincial Committee of the PUWP; from 1963 to 1965 he was deputy head of the CC Organization Department and editor of the party periodical, Życie Partii. Between 1965 and 1970 he was head of the CC Organization Department and from 1964, a member of the PUWP CC. After the fall of Władysław Gomułka, in December 1970 he entered the CC Secretariat and Politburo as one of the closest associates of Edward Gierek, but he preferred to remain in the shadows. From 1969 he was an MP; from 1972, a member of the Council of State; and from 1976 to February 1980 he was deputy chairman of the latter body. After the fall of Piotr Jaroszewicz, on 18 February 1980 Babiuch was made prime minister. He could not prevent the deepening social and economic crisis and the wave of summer strikes. His clumsy response to the Baltic Coast strikes, feeble authority, and badly received speech of mid-August led to his dismissal on 24 August 1980. He also gave up his position in the State Council. In October 1980 he was dismissed from the PUWP CC, and in December 1980 he gave up his parliamentary seat. In a resolution of the Eleventh PUWP Extraordinary Congress in July 1981, Babiuch was deemed in part responsible for the state and party crisis. On the basis of a decision of the Military Council of National Salvation, on 13 December 1981, Babiuch, along with a group of higher officials of the Gierek regime, was interned for propaganda reasons. Released after a few months, he retired from public life. (PK)

Sources: Mołdawa; Słownik polityków polskich XX w. (Poznań, 1998); Michał Czajka and Marcin Kamler, Leksykon historii Polski (Warsaw, 1995).

BACHYNSKYI Lev (14 February 1872, Serafinsti, near Horodenka–4 October 1930, Heilenstadt Grimmenstein, Austria), Ukrainian politician and lawyer. Bachynskyi came from a teacher's family. He graduated from high school in Kolomyia and in law in Tschernowitz (Chernivtsi). In 1897 he was arrested for taking part in an anti-Austrian demonstration. After his release he started practicing law in Stanisławów (Ivano-Frankivsk). As a representative of the Ukrainian Radical Party (URP), from 1907 to 1918 he was a member of the Chamber of Deputies of the Council of State in Vienna, where he represented the Pokutye region of the Hutsul people. Engaged in the struggle of Ukrainian students against the Polish authorities of Lwów (Lviv) University, he advocated Ukrainization of this university. On 16 December 1907, protesting the refusal of the chamber presidium to present a resolution of Ukrainian deputies concerning recent incidents at the university, he threw his reading desk at the speaker but hit and wounded someone else. In 1915–16 he was deputy chairman of the General Ukrainian Council in Vienna, and in 1918–19, deputy chairman of the Council (Rada) of the Western Ukrainian National Republic (WUNR). He prepared two laws passed by this Ukrainian parliament: one concerned the unification of the WUNR with the Kiev Ukrainian National Republic (3 January 1919), and the other concerned land reform. From 1918 until his death he was the leader of the URP (later the Ukrainian Social Radical Party) in Galicia. In 1928–30 he was MP of the Polish parliament. He advocated seeking support for the Ukrainian left in the Second International. (TS)

Sources: Encyclopedia of Ukraine, vol. 1 (Toronto, 1985); Czesław Partacz, Od Badeniego do Potockiego: Stosunki polsko-ukraińskie w Galicji w latach 1888–1908 (Toruń, 1996); Postowie i senatorowie Rzeczypospolitej Polskiej 1919–1939. Słownik biograficzny (Warsaw, 1998).

BACHYNSKYI Yulian (1870, Lviv–1940, USSR), Ukrainian politician and journalist, victim of Stalinist persecution. The son of a Greek Catholic clergyman, at the beginning of the 1890s Bachynskyi joined the Galician Ruthenian-Ukrainian Radical Party, which was formed in 1890. He became involved with the so-called young faction (of Viacheslav Budzynovskyi, Mykola Hankevych, and Volodymyr Okhrymovich), which, unlike the moderates, the so-called old faction (of Ivan Franko and Mikhaïlo Pavlyk), evolved toward Marxism. In 1895 Bachynskyi published his famous book, Ukraina irredenta, in which, for the first time in the modern history of the Ukraine, an independent and unified Ukrainian state was postulated. In 1914 he published Ukrainska emihratsia v Ziedynenykh Derzhavakh Ameryky (Ukrainian emigration in the United States of America), which was the fruit of his stay overseas in 1905–6.

In the fall of 1918 Bachynskyi joined the Ukrainian National Council in Lviv (Lwów), taking part in a proclamation of the Western Ukrainian People's Republic (WUPR) in Eastern Galicia on 9 November 1918. After the unification of both Ukrainian states in January 1919, he headed the Ukrainian mission in Washington. In May 1921 he returned to Europe and became allied with the followers of Yevhen Petrushevych, the former dictator of the WUPR and prime minister of its government-in-exile. In this group he represented pro-Soviet views, favoring the agreement with the Kremlin; therefore in 1933 the Soviet authorities allowed him to come to the USSR. Traveling through Polish territory, he was arrested and held in prison for one year. After his arrival in Kharkiv in the summer of 1934 he worked in the editorial offices of the Ukrainian Soviet Encyclopedia. On 4 November 1934 he was arrested during a wave of persecutions of Ukrainian intellectuals. He was tried, along with Antin Krushelnytsky, and on 28 March 1935 he was sentenced to ten years in prison. He died in a labor camp. His publications include Podil Ukrainy (The division of the Ukraine; 1897) and Bolshevystska revolutsiia i Ukraiintsi (The Bolshevik Revolution and the Ukrainians; 1928). (TS)

Sources: Encyclopedia of Ukraine, vol. 1 (Toronto, 1984); Yaroslav Hrytsak, "Molodi' radykaly v suspilno-politychnomu zhytti Halychyny," Zapysky naukovohto tovarystva im. Shevchenka, vol. 222 (Lviv, 1991); John-Paul Himka, "Young Radicals and Independent Statehood: The Idea of a Ukrainian Nation-State, 1890–1905," Slavic Review, vol. 41 (Summer 1982).

BACILEK Karel (12 October 1896, Chotiansky, near Poděbrady–19 March 1974, Bratislava), Czechoslovak Communist activist. The son of a Slovak bricklayer, in his youth Bacilek worked as a blacksmith and railroader. In 1915–18 he served in the Austrian army and between the end of 1918 and December 1919, in the Czechoslovak army. In 1921 he joined the Communist Party of Czechoslovakia (CPC). He was swiftly promoted, becoming the organizational secretary of the party in Slovakia (1930) and joining the CPC Central Committee (CC) in 1931. Sent to the USSR, he completed studies at a Comintern school in 1935. After the German invasion of March 1939 he left for Moscow. From December 1940 to March 1941 he stayed in Slovakia, organizing the Communist underground. After his return to the USSR he was attacked for his inability to win over Slovak comrades to the Kremlin's policies. He was arrested and sent to a labor camp in the Mordovian ASSR. Released in April 1943, he started working for Soviet intelligence. Dropped beyond the front lines near Warsaw, he managed to get to Slovakia. In August 1944, as secretary of the party, he organized the Slovak national uprising in Banská Bystrica. After the failure of the uprising he commanded a guerrilla unit.

After the Communist coup in February 1948 Bacilek was quickly promoted. In 1949 he joined the Secretariat of the CC of the Communist Party of Slovakia, and in 1950 he became the Slovak prime minister. In September 1951 he was appointed minister of state control. From January 1952 to September 1953 he headed the Ministry of State Security of Czechoslovakia, playing an important role in a purge related to the case of Rudolf Slansky and the Slovak activists led by Gustav Husak. In January 1953 he was appointed deputy prime minister of Czechoslovakia. He was also promoted to general, and in September 1953 he became secretary general of the Communist Party of Slovakia. In this capacity he counteracted attempts at a "thaw." On 4 April 1963 he was ousted from the party executive. This was related to the rehabilitation of the imprisoned Slovak activists. Since it was impossible to uncover all Communist crimes, Bacilek served as a political scapegoat. Even the reasons for his withdrawal were not officially explained. In 1966 he left the CC, and in 1968 he was finally expelled from the party. However, he was never brought before a court for his crimes. His publications include Poučenie z procesu z vedenim protištátneho špionažneho a sprisahaneckého centra na čele s Rudolfom Slánskym (Lessons from the trial of the anti-state, spy, and conspiracy center headed by Rudolf Slansky; 1953) and Leninské učenie: Kompas na naše ceste k socializmu (Lenin's teachings: A compass on our road to socialism; 1954). (WR) Sources: Lazitch; SBS, vol. 1; Edward Taborsky, Communism in Czechoslovakia 1948–1960 (Princeton, 1961); Eugen Loebel, Stalinism in Prague (New York, 1969); Jifí Pelikán, The Czechoslovak Political Trials 1950–1954 (Stanford, 1971).

BAČKIS Audrys (1 February 1937, Kaunas), Archbishop of Vilnius (Wilno). From early childhood Bačkis lived abroad, where his father worked in the diplomatic corps, first in Paris, then in Washington, D.C. He studied theology in St. Sulpice Seminary in Paris in 1954–57, in St. Casimir College in Rome in 1957–61, and in the Pontificia Academia Ecclesiastica in Rome in 1961–64. In March 1961 he was ordained, and in 1964 he received a Ph.D. in canon law at the Lateran University in Rome. In 1964 he also assumed the position of attaché in the papal nuncio's Office in Manila, the Philippines, and in 1965 he was consecrated titular bishop of Meta and appointed secretary of the papal nunciature in San Jose, Costa Rica. From 1968 he held the same office in Ankara, Turkey, and from 1970 in Nigeria. After his return from Africa, from 1973 he worked as auditor of nunciatures at the Secretary of State of the Council for Public Affairs of the Holy See. In 1979 he became under-secretary of state in this council, and in 1988, as archbishop, he assumed the position of papal nuncio in the Netherlands. On 24 December 1991 Pope John Paul II appointed him archbishop of the newly established Vilnius province, and in 1995–96 he presided over the Conference of the Lithuanian Episcopate. He moderated nationalistic tendencies among the clergy and encouraged the Lithuanian Christian Democrats to adopt a more open attitude toward neighboring countries. On 21 February 2001 he was elevated to the rank of cardinal. (WR) Sources: EL, vols. 1 and 6; Algimantas P. Taškūnas, ed., Lithuania in 1991 (Sandy Bay, Tasmania, 1992); Anatol Lieven, The Baltic Revolution (New Haven, 1993); Annuario Pontificio, 2001.

BACZYŃSKI Krzysztof Kamil, pseudonym “Jan Bugaj” (4 August 1921, Warsaw–4 August 1944, Warsaw), Polish poet. Baczyński, whose family was from the intelligentsia, wrote his first poems while at the Stefan Batory Gymnasium in Warsaw, where he passed his final exams in 1939. During the Nazi occupation he was connected with a leftist youth conspiracy. From 1943 he attended secret Polish studies at the university level and joined the Scouting Shock Troops, which were organized into the Home Army battalion Zośka. He graduated from an underground reserve cadet school, Agrykola. He took part in the Warsaw Uprising and was killed in the first days of fighting in Warsaw Theater Square. His wife, Barbara, whom he married in 1942, was killed at the same time elsewhere in Warsaw. Baczyński’s poetic creativity developed fully during the occupation, which became the background of most of his poems, even love lyrics devoted to his wife. He published two collections secretly: Wiersze wybrane (Selected poems; 1942) and Arkusze poetycki (Poetic sheet; 1943). His whole output, five hundred poems and prose pieces, was preserved in manuscript and was published for the first time after the war in 1962 as Utwory zebrane (Collected works; 1962). Full of intense feelings of the moment and of symbolic visions, his poems combine reflections on the fate of the nation and personal responsibility with intimations of terror and threats to the sense of life. During the occupation critics already appreciated his poems. In the course of time he was recognized as the most outstanding poet of the war generation and was compared to Juliusz Słowacki. He even became the object of a cult of the generation coming of age in the 1960s and 1970s. His great talent and his tragic fate prompted one of his first critics, Kazimierz Wyka, to state that it was the fate of the Poles “to shoot at the enemy with diamonds.” (WR) kurz . . . Wspomnienia o Krzysztofie Kamile Baczyńskim (Kraków, 1979); Kazimierz Wyka, Baczyński i Różewicz (Kraków, 1994); Stefan Zabierowski, Krzysztof Kamil Baczyński: Biografia i legenda (Wrocław, 1990).

Sources: Literatura polska: Przewodnik encyklopedyczny, vol. 1 (Warsaw, 1984); Zygmunt Wasilewski, ed., Żołnierz, poeta, czasu

BADZIO Yuriy (24 April 1936, Kopynivka, near Mukachevo), Ukrainian specialist in literary theory and dissident. Badzio came from a large peasant family. In 1958 he graduated in Ukrainian philology at Uzhgorod University, and then he worked as a teacher and school director in the Transcarpathian countryside. Beginning in 1961 he worked at the Institute of Literature of the Academy of Sciences of the Ukrainian SSR in Kiev, and in 1961–64 he participated in the Council of Creative Youth Club, one of the first informal organizations of the generation of the 1960s (shestidesiatniki). In September 1965 he took part in a protest against the arrests of intellectuals. Removed from the Communist Party and fired from his job, he also was not allowed to publish. In 1971 he wrote a letter to the Sixth Congress of the Association of Ukrainian Writers, criticizing the uneven treatment of Ukrainian culture in the Ukrainian SSR. In 1972 he started working on a huge project demystifying Soviet totalitarianism—Pravo zhyty (The right to live). As a result of KGB searches, he twice (in 1977 and 1979) lost big portions of the manuscript. In April 1979 he was arrested, and in December 1979 he was sentenced to seven years in a special severe labor camp and to five years of exile. In March 1980 he was imprisoned in a Mordovian camp, where he protested against the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan and against the holding of the Olympics in Moscow. His wife and son were also subject to repression. From 1986 Badzio lived in exile in the village of Khandyga in Yakutia. He refused to ask for an earlier release. Freed in December 1988, he joined in the creation of an independent Ukraine. In May 1990 he wrote a manifesto for the Democratic Party of Ukraine, and in December 1990 he was elected its leader. Soon he withdrew from political life and returned to research at the Institute of Philosophy in Kiev. In 1996 he published Pravo zhyty, based on the manuscript that he was given back. He authored many works on contemporary Ukrainian politics, including Vlada—opozytsiya—derzhava v Ukraini syohodni (Power—opposition—state in contemporary Ukraine; 1994) and Natsionalna ideya i natsionalne pytannia (The national idea and the national question; 2000). (TS)

Sources: Kharkiv Group for the Defense of Human Rights; Visnyk represiy v Ukraini (New York), 1981, nos. 5 and 8; 1984, nos. 2, 9, and 10; Volodymir Baran, Ukraina pislya Stalina: Naris istoriyi 1953–1985 rr. (Lviv, 1992); Heorhiy Kasyanov, Nezhodni: Ukrainska intelihentsiya w rusi oporu 1960–80 rokiv (Kiev, 1995); Anatoli Rusnachenko, Natsionalno-vyzvolnyi ruh v Ukraini (Kiev, 1998).

BAGIŃSKI Kazimierz (15 March 1890, Warsaw–27 July 1966, Phoenix, Arizona), Polish peasant politician. Having graduated from high school in Warsaw, Bagiński studied at the Polytechnic College in Lwów (Lviv) (1911–14). From 1914 he was active in the Polish Socialist Party (PPS), and he commanded a unit of the Polish Military Organization (Polska Organizacja Wojskowa) in the Lublin region. In 1915 he co-organized the Polish Peasant Party, Liberation (PSL Wyzwolenie), and from February 1919 he was a member of the Executive Board of the party. He served as a volunteer in the Polish-Soviet war. From March 1921 he was secretary of the Executive Board of the PSL Wyzwolenie; from March 1923, its vice president; and from 1925 to 1929, secretary general of the party. In 1919–28 he was an MP, representing the PSL Wyzwolenie. Co-organizer of the center-left opposition (Centrolew), in September 1903 he was arrested and imprisoned in the Brześć fortress. Released on bail, he co-organized a unified peasant movement in the form of the Peasant Party (Stronnictwo Ludowe [SL]), founded in 1931. From March 1931 he was a member of the Chief Council of the party and secretary of its Chief Executive Committee (CEC). On 15 January 1932 he was sentenced in a trial in Brześć to two years' imprisonment. After the validation of the verdict, at the end of September 1933 he left for Czechoslovakia, where he maintained contact with (among others) Wincenty Witos and the Czech Agrarians. Following the partition of Czechoslovakia in March 1939, Bagiński returned to Poland and was imprisoned in Płock. Released on 8 April 1939, in May 1939 he assumed the post of secretary of the CEC of the SL.

After the German invasion of Poland in September 1939 Bagiński went to Volhynia. In mid-1942 he returned to Warsaw and was active in an underground peasant movement called Roch. In 1943 he was editor-in-chief of its newspaper, Wieś. He represented the SL Roch in the Council of National Unity (Rada Jedności Narodowej [RNJ]), and from March 1944 he was director of the Interior Department of the Government Delegation for the Homeland. At that time he used a pseudonym, "Dąbrowski." In September 1944 he became deputy president of the RNJ. During the Warsaw Uprising he was temporarily president of the Central Committee of the Peasant Movement. After the capitulation of the rising, Bagiński left Warsaw with the whole civilian population. Arrested on 28 March 1945 by the NKVD, he was taken to Moscow, and on 21 June 1945 he was sentenced to one year in prison in the Trial of the Sixteen. Released in November 1945, he returned to Poland and became one of the leaders of the Polish Peasant Party (Polskie Stronnictwo Ludowe [PSL]), organized by Stanisław Mikołajczyk. A member of the CEC and of the Chief Council of the PSL, as well as head of the Press and Propaganda Department of the party, on 11 October 1946 Bagiński was arrested and in April 1947 sentenced to eight years by a military court in Warsaw. In July 1947 he was released under an amnesty agreement. Fearing another arrest, in October 1947 he secretly went with Mikołajczyk to the United States, where they initially cooperated, but in 1949 their paths parted. Bagiński stood on the side of the Political Council (Rada Polityczna), and along with Stefan Korboński he set up the PSL National Unity Faction (PSL Odłamek Jedności Narodowej), in which he was active until his death. (WR) Sources: Kunert, vol. 1; Bogdan Czaykowski, Bolesław Sulik, Polacy w Wielkiej Brytanii (Paris, 1961); Wincenty Witos, Moje wspomnienia, vols. 1–3 (Paris, 1964–65); Tygodnik Powszechny, 1966, no. 10; Roczniki Dziejów Ruchu Ludowego, 1966, vol. 8; Stefan Korboński, "Wspomnienie o Kazimierzu Bagińskim," Wiadomości, 1967, no. 19.

BAGRANOV Ivan (27 November 1891, Voden–1 February 1945, Sofia), Bulgarian politician. In 1912 Bagrianov graduated from a military academy in Sofia. In the Balkan Wars and during World War I he served as an officer of artillery. After the war he completed law studies in Sofia and agriculture studies in Leipzig and Vienna. He was a member of the Agrarian Party and was in the close circle of political friends of Tsar Boris III. From 1938 Bagrianov was an MP, and from November 1938 to February 1941, minister of agriculture and of state property. He was considered a supporter of an agreement with Great Britain and resigned in disapproval of Bulgaria's adhesion to the Axis powers. When the regents attempted to unite Bulgaria with the Allies after the tsar's death, Bagrianov became prime minister on 1 June 1944. Tolerated by the Germans, he yielded to their pressure regarding anti-Jewish legislation, but in June 1944 he agreed to the opening of the Soviet consulate in Varna. On 17 August 1944 he announced a break with the "previous policy of chauvinism and war" and proclaimed the neutrality of Bulgaria. As a result of the uncompromising attitude of the USSR, which rejected this declaration, he failed to advance negotiations with the Allies, and on 1 September 1944 he resigned from his post. After the coup of 9 September 1944 he was arrested and, in accord with the directives of the Communist leadership, sentenced to death for "anti-national policies" in a major trial of the leaders of tsarist Bulgaria. He was immediately executed. (WR)

Sources: Entsiklopediya Bulgariya, vol. 1 (Sofia, 1978); Ilcho Dimitrov, "Vnyshnata politika na pravitelstvoto na Ivan Bagrianov, 1 juni–1 septemvri 1944 g.," Godishnik na Sofiiskaia Universitet. Filozofsko-Istoricheski Fakultet, 1967, vol. 61; Marshall Lee Miller, Bulgaria during the Second World War (Stanford, 1975); Jerzy Jackowicz, Partie opozycyjne w Bułgarii 1944–1948 (Warsaw, 1997).

BAHDANKEVICH Stanislau (1 January 1937, Shapovaly, near Valozhyn), Belorussian economist and politician. In 1964 Bahdankevich graduated from the All-Union Financial and Economic Institute in Moscow. From 1956 he worked in the Soviet State Bank in Belorussia, gradually advancing in its management. In 1981 he took a chair in the Belorussian Institute of the National Economy, and in 1991 he became a professor of economics. In 1994 he assumed the position of deputy chairman of the International Eurasian Academy of Sciences. From 1991 to 1995 he was chairman of the National Bank of Belorussia. He was dismissed by President Alyaksandr Lukashenka for his opposition to a plan for the unification of the financial systems of Belorussia and Russia. From 1995 he was deputy to the Supreme Council, which was outlawed by Lukashenka in 1996 but was recognized by European countries as the only legal parliamentary assembly in Belorussia. In 1995–2000 Bahdankevich was chairman of the United Civic Party of Belorussia (Abjadnanaja Hramadzianskaja Partija Bielarusi), which was liberal in character. From 1998 he presided over the Commission for Economic Policy of the opposition National Executive Committee, which served as a shadow cabinet. (EM)

Sources: Bielaruskaia entsyklapiedzia, vol. 11 (Minsk, 1996); Jan Zaprudnik, Historical Dictionary of Belarus (Lanham, Md., 1998); Kto iest kto w Respublike Belarus (Minsk, 1999); David R. Marples, Belarus: A Denationalization of a Nation (Amsterdam, 1999).

BAHDANOVICH Maxim (9 December 1891, Minsk–25 May 1917, Yalta), Belorussian poet, critic, and translator. Bahdanovich's first work, an allegorical parable, Muzika (Music), was published in 1907. In 1908 he fell ill with tuberculosis. At that time he was living in Yaroslavl in Russia; from there he sent his works to the newspaper Nasha niva. Despite his illness, optimistic notes prevailed in his poetry. He completed high school in Yaroslavl, and in the fall of 1916 arrived in Minsk, where he worked as a secretary for a food committee of the guberniya (province). Seriously ill, in February 1917 he went for treatment to the Crimea. He died and was buried there. His collection of poems, Vianok (The garland; 1913), the only work published in his lifetime, has been considered a paradigm of classical poetics in Belorussian. Bahdanovich was a pioneer in writing about the history of Belorussian literature; he was the author of Karotkaia historyia bielaruskai pismiennastsii da XVI staletsia (Short history of Belorussian literature until the sixteenth century) and Novy peryod u historyi bielaruskai litaratury (A new period in the history of Belorussian literature). He was also a translator of poetry, especially Slavic poetry. He also translated the works of Heinrich Heine, Friedrich Schiller, Horace, Paul Verlaine, and poems from various nations of the world. Central in his works were social and national ideals, the concepts of equality and brotherhood among people, and a poetic vision of nature. He also originated Belorussian lyrical love poetry. At the end of the twentieth century many patriotic demonstrations were organized near his monuments. A complete collection of his works was published in 1991–95 under the title Bahdanovich Maksim Adamovich, 1891–1917: Pouny zbor tvorau (Bahdanovich Maksim Adamovich, 1891–1917: A complete collection of works). (AS/SA)

Sources: Belarus: Entsyklapedychny daviednik (Minsk, 1995); Arhiunyya materyialy da zyttsia i tvorchastsi Maksima Bahdanovicha (Minsk, 1996–97); Batskaushchyna: Zbornik histarychnai litaratury (Minsk, 1992); Belarusian Children's Publications (Minsk, 1993–95); A.V. Maldzis, ed., Bielaruskiya pismienniki: Bibliografichny slounik (Minsk, 1993–95); Jan Zaprudnik, Historical Dictionary of Belarus (Lanham, Md., 1998).

BAJCSY-ZSILINSZKY Endre (6 June 1886, Szarvas–24 December 1944, Sopronkőhida), Hungarian politician. Bajcsy-Szilinszky's ancestors were Slovak peasants. In 1904 he graduated from a Calvinist high school in Békéscsaba and in 1908 from law studies at the University of Kolozsvár (Cluj). From 1910 he practiced as a defense attorney. In May 1911, he and his brother sued a Socialist Agrarian politician, András Áchim, for slandering their father. During a fight, Áchim was badly wounded and died. A Budapest court acquitted the Zsilinszky brothers, stating that they had acted in self-defense. During World War I, Bajcsy-Zsilinszky fought as an officer on the Serbian and Russian fronts; in 1916 he was seriously wounded, and in 1917 he returned to the Russian front. From November 1918 he was back in Hungary, supporting the nationalist right and co-founding the Hungarian National Defense Association and the Hungarian Race Research Society. In 1919 he fought against the Hungarian Soviet Republic, and after its fall he cooperated with Gyula Gömbös as editor (1919–22) and later editor-in-chief (1922–26) of an anti-Semitic daily, Szózat. In 1922 he was elected to the parliament on behalf of the government Party of Unity. In view of the growing conflict between Prime Minister István Bethlen and the nationalists, in 1923 Bajcsy-Zsilinszky left the party and co-founded (with Gömbös, among others) the Hungarian National Independence Party (HNIP). In 1925 he received the prestigious title of “hero” (vitéz) and changed his name to Bajcsy-Zsilinszky by adding his mother's maiden name.

After the lost election of 1926, Bajcsy-Zsilinszky parted company with Gömbös, and in the fall of 1927 he left the HNIP. From 1928 to 1932 he edited the periodical Előörs. After the elections of 1929, when, owing to electoral fraud by the authorities Bajcsy-Zsilinszky was defeated, he became increasingly critical of the political system and of the German threat. In 1930 he founded the opposition National Radical Party, and in 1931 he won a mandate on its behalf. After Hitler's takeover in Germany, he warned against the Nazi threat and attacked the Gömbös government for its pro-German policy. He favored a pro-French orientation and recommended reconciliation with Yugoslavia. In 1935 the authorities prevented him from winning a parliamentary seat. In response he gave up the title of "hero," and in 1936 he led his party into the Independent Smallholders' Party (ISP). Elected to the parliament again in 1939, he edited an anti-German weekly, Független Magyarország (1939–41), and the periodical Szabad Szó (1941–44), which condemned laws of 1938, 1939, and 1941 that limited the citizenship rights of Jews.

When in June 1941 Hungary went to war against the USSR and in December 1941 against Great Britain and the United States, Bajcsy-Zsilinszky sharply criticized Prime Minister László Bárdossy. In the parliament and in letters to Regent Miklós Horthy he demanded Hungary's withdrawal from its alliance with Germany. He protested the Hungarian murders of Serbs in Voivodina in January 1942, demanding a severe punishment for those responsible. After the fall of the Mussolini regime in 1943 he, along with ISP leader Zoltán Tildy, sent a memorandum to Prime Minister Miklós Kállay in which they demanded Hungary's withdrawal from the war, a proclamation of neutrality, and the rescinding of anti-Jewish legislation; they encouraged reconciliation with neighbors and called for resistance to the potential German occupation of Hungary. Bajcsy-Zsilinszky was known for his support for Poland. On 19 March 1944, SS soldiers raided his apartment, badly wounded him, and took him prisoner. He tried to commit suicide in prison. In October 1944 he was transferred to the Hungarian authorities, which set him free during an attempt by Regent Horthy to withdraw from the war. When the Arrow Cross Party took over power, Bajcsy-Zsilinszky went into hiding. On 5 November 1944 he became leader of the Hungarian National Insurgent and Liberation Committee, composed of a coalition of opposition parties. Because of a betrayal, on 23 November he was arrested. On 6 December 1944 he was put on trial before military court in Budapest. Because Soviet troops were advancing, he was transferred to Sopronkőhida, sentenced to death by an Arrow Cross court, and executed. (JT)

Sources: Biographisches Lexikon, vol. 1; Magyar Nagylexikon, vol. 3 (Budapest, 1994); Nagy Képes Milleniumi Arcképcsarnok (Budapest, 1999); Új Magyar Életrajzi Lexikon, vol. 1 (Budapest, 2001); Magyarország 1944–1956, CD-ROM (Budapest, 2001); Paul Ignotus, Hungary (London, 1972); Sándor Tidrenczel, Bajcsy-Zsilinszky Endre és politikai pártja (Nyiregyhaza, 1986); Károlyi Vigh, Bajcsy-Zsilinszky Endre, 1886–1944: A küldetéses ember (Budapest, 1992).

BAJRAKTARI Muharrem (1 May 1896, Domaj–21 January 1989, Brussels), Albanian politician. Bajraktari was from Kosovo. He graduated from a high school in Kolesjan, and in 1917–18 he studied in a military academy in Vienna. In March 1920 he was one of the leaders of an anti-Serb uprising in the region of Stiqnit. Back in Albania in 1921, he served as an officer in the military police in Krume. In 1924 he supported Ahmet Zogu, as a result of which he was promoted to the rank of major. He worked in the military court in Shkodër and then as a commander of the military police in the Dibra region in Peshkopi. In December 1926 he led a punitive expedition suppressing rebellion in the region of Dukagjini. Accused of an abuse of power, he was transferred to Tirana. In 1929 he took over command of the military police in the capital, in 1931 he became an aide-de-camp to Zogu, and then he was transferred to control the region of Lumë. Suspected of an anti-government plot, in 1935 he was called to the capital. Fearing for his life, he escaped to Yugoslavia and from there to France, where he joined the National Union (Bashkimi Kombëtar) and remained in opposition to the king. In 1939 he moved to Italy, where he was offered a ministry in the collaboration government or leadership of the Albanian Fascist Militia, but he declined. He returned to Albania and, along with Gani Kryeziu, he led preparations for an anti-Italian uprising in northern Albania organized by British intelligence. The plan was abolished in December 1940.

During the German invasion of Yugoslavia in April 1941, Yugoslav officers wanted to gain Bajraktari's cooperation, but the rapid fall of Yugoslavia put an end to these plans. The region of Lumë remained under the control of Bajraktari's troops until March 1942, when an Italian operation, supported by Catholic Mirdytes, dispersed these troops. In the spring of 1943 major resistance groups negotiated with Bajraktari, who promised support but refused to subordinate his troops to any larger group. He opposed the armed resistance of the Communist guerrillas, which led to an intensification of repression. In 1944 he participated in talks with partisans from the Communist Fifth Brigade of the National Liberation Army, but at the end of 1944 open conflict erupted between them. After the Communist takeover, Bajraktari became affiliated with royalist troops operating between Peshkopi and Kukës, but he acted on his own, controlling the region of Lumë and exercising his own notions of justice. In September 1946 he was forced to flee to Greece with a small group of his followers. In exile he co-initiated the Committee of Free Albania, created in Paris in August 1949, and worked for it until its end in 1953. In 1994 President Sali Berisha posthumously awarded him with the order of Për veprimtari patriotike (For Patriotic Activity). (TC)

Sources: Çejku Lufti, Luma neper sfidat e historisë–gjakfolurit e varrhumburit (7 prill 1939–10 gusht 1988) (Prizren, 1997); Bernd J. Fischer, King Zog and the Struggle for Stability in Albania (New York, 1984); Pallushi Petrit, Muharrem Bajraktari ne vitet 1945–1946 (Tirana, 1998); Sh. Hoxha, Muharrem Bajraktari gjatë pushtimit italian (1939–shtator 1943) (Tirana, 2001).

BAKARIĆ Vladimir (8 March 1912, Velika Gorica, near Zagreb–16 January 1983, Zagreb), Yugoslav Communist activist of Croatian nationality. After graduating from high school and law studies in Zagreb in 1935, in 1937 Bakarić received a Ph.D. In 1933 he joined the then illegal Communist Party of Yugoslavia. From 1936 to 1941 he worked as a defense attorney in Zagreb, contributing to the legal periodicals Izraz and Naše novine. Arrested three times, from 1937 he was head of the Department of Agitation and Propaganda of the Central Committee (CC) of the Communist Party of Croatia (CPC), and from 1940 he was a member of the CPC CC. From the end of 1941 he cooperated with the partisans of Josip Broz Tito, directing their operations in Croatia. He became a member of the Anti-Fascist Council of the National Liberation of Yugoslavia (Antifašističko Vijeće Narodnog Oslobođenja Jugoslavije [AVNOJ]), founded in November 1942. Political commissar of the general staff of the National Liberation Army, from October 1944 he was secretary of the CPC.

In April 1945 Bakarić became prime minister of the Croatian republic, supervising the repression of Ustasha activists and of people accused of collaborating with them. In 1946 he was a member of the Yugoslav delegation to the Paris Peace Conference. In January 1948 he took part in Moscow talks with the Soviet leadership, which did not ease the conflict between Tito and Stalin. After the Information Bureau of the Communist and Workers' Parties condemned Yugoslavia in June 1948, Bakarić gave Tito strong support, and after the dismissal of Andrija Hebrang he took over the leadership of the Croatian party. From 1950 he supported the new economic policy, including decollectivization and a system of self-government in ownership and management in industry. He also helped in the purge of opponents of this policy. He headed the Croatian government until 6 February 1953, and on 18 December 1953 he became speaker of the Croatian parliament. At the Fifth Congress of the Communist Party of Yugoslavia (CPY) in 1948 Bakarić became a member of its CC, and from the Sixth Congress he was a member of the Executive Committee of the Union of Yugoslav Communists. In the 1960s he showed some understanding of Croatian national feelings, but in 1971–72 he supported Tito in his purges of Croatian Communists accused of nationalism and counterrevolution. In 1974 he was the co-author of a new constitution that decentralized power in the Yugoslav federation. After Tito's death he became a member of the collective leadership of Yugoslavia. Bakarić was a theoretician of the Yugoslav model and authored several works in this field, including O poljoprivredi i problemima sela (On agriculture and problems of the countryside; 1960), Socijalistički samoupravni sistem i društvena reprodukcija (The Socialist system of self-management and social reproduction; 1974), and dozens of articles on ideological and constitutional issues. He was a member of the Yugoslav Academy of Arts and Sciences. (WR) Sources: Enciklopedija Jugoslavije, vol. 1 (Zagreb, 1955); Hrvatski biografski leksikon, vol. 1 (Zagreb, 1983); Vladimir Dedijer, The Battle Stalin Lost (New York, 1970); Stephen Clissold, ed., Yugoslavia and the Soviet Union, 1939–1973 (Oxford, 1975); Vladimir Bakarić, 1912–1983 (Zagreb, 1983); Miko Tripalo, Hrvatsko proljeće (Zagreb, 1989); www.rulers.org.

BALABANOV Aleksandur (18 January 1879, Štip–30 November 1955, Sofia), Bulgarian philologist and journalist. The son of a merchant, Balabanov studied classical philology in Leipzig, and then he received a Ph.D. in Erlangen, Germany. He already distinguished himself during his studies, mastering all the major European languages and Latin. In 1904–12 he taught in a high school in Sofia and lectured at Sofia University, where he established the chair of classical philology. In 1908 he became associate professor and in 1917, full professor. He authored a handbook of classical literature (1914) and translated Faust, by Johann Wolfgang Goethe, and a whole series of classical Greek works. Co-founder of the periodicals Hudozhnik and Razvigor, contributor to the daily Vreme, and friend and adviser to Tsar Boris III, Balabanov included the classical work of Bulgarian literature, Zapiski po bulgarskite vystanniya (Notes from Bulgarian uprisings), by Zakhari Stoyanov, in the compulsory school reading list. Balabanov was the author of Lyubov i poeziya (Love and poetry; 1939), the memoirs I az na tozi swiat (I am in this world as well; 1955), and many other works. After the Communist takeover, he was pushed into oblivion and isolated in his attempts to maintain links with European culture. It was with humor that he suffered the fate of a

“bourgeois scholar,” as he was described by the official propaganda. (JW)

Sources: Enciklopediya Bulgariya, vol. 1 (Sofia, 1976); Aleksandur Balabanov i Simeon Radev v spomenite na suvremennitsite si (Sofia, 1986).

BĂLAN Ioan (11 February 1880, Teiuș–4 August 1959, Bucharest), Romanian Greek Catholic bishop. After graduating from the theological seminar in Blaj, Bălan studied theology in Budapest and Vienna. In 1903 he was ordained in Blaj and returned to Vienna to continue studies. In 1906 he received a Ph.D. in theology there. In 1906 he started his ministry in Bucharest. From 1909 to 1920 he was vicar general of Bucharest, and in 1919 he moved to Blaj, where he was appointed metropolitan canon and (in 1921) rector of the Blaj Greek Catholic Theological Academy. In 1927–29, appointed by Pope Pius XI, he was a member of a special commission to elaborate canon law for the eastern churches. In 1936 he was consecrated Bishop of Blaj. After the Communist takeover and the formal liquidation of the Greek Catholic Church, Bălan refused to join the Orthodox Church. Arrested on 28 October 1948 along with five other Romanian Greek Catholic bishops, he was placed in the Dragoslavele Monastery, the summer residence of Romanian Orthodox patriarchs, now converted into a prison. In early 1949 he was moved to the prison in the Căldărușani Monastery, and in 1950 to Sighet Marmăției Prison. He was kept there without trial until 1955, when, on the orders of Gheorghe Gheorghiu-Dej, he was released with two other (still living) bishops, Iuliu Hossu and Alexandru Rusu. He was put under house arrest in the Curtea de Argeș Monastery, which soon became a place of Greek Catholic pilgrimages. Communist Speaker of the Parliament Petru Groza visited the bishops and tried to convince them that their church did not exist in Romania, but in 1956 they sent a memorandum to the government demanding the reconstruction of the Greek Catholic Church. The memorandum was signed by many people, so the authorities separated the bishops to reduce their influence. Bălan was placed in the Ciorogârla Monastery, where he lived in isolation. Seriously ill, in 1959 he was put in a Bucharest hospital, where he soon died. He was buried in the Catholic Bellu Cemetery in Bucharest. His beatification is under way. (LW)

Sources: Józef Darski, Rumunia: Historia, współczesność, konflikty narodowe (Warsaw, 1995); Paul Caravia, Virgiliu Constantinescu, and Flori Stănescu, The Imprisoned Church of Romania, 1944–1989 (Bucharest, 1999); Dennis Deletant, Communist Terror in Romania (New York, 1999); www.bru.ro.

BALANTIĆ France (21 November 1921, Kamnik–24 November 1944, Grahovo), Slovenian poet. After high school Balantić studied linguistics in Ljubljana. In 1941 he was arrested by the Italian occupation authorities. Sent to a concentration camp in Gonars, after his release he joined the anti-Communist Countryside Guard and in 1943, the nationalist Homeland Guard, which cooperated with the Italians. He was killed in a Communist guerrilla attack on Grahovo. Balantić was influenced by the traditions of Slovene Social Catholicism, and he combined formal expressionism with a metaphysical message. He wrote his first collection, Sonetni venec (Wreath of Sonnets), in 1940. V ognju grozy plapolam (I Struggle through the fire of terror) was published after his death in 1944. Despite his great talent, his works were totally ignored in Communist Yugoslavia for political reasons. A major collection of his poems, Izbrano delo (Selected works), was published in Buenos Aires in 1976. In Yugoslavia, a volume of his poems that was ready for print in 1964 could not appear until 1984, when there was a relative easing of censorship. It was only after Slovenia gained independence that Balantić’s poetic mastery was acknowledged. (WR) Sources: Enciklopedija Slovenije, vol. 1 (Ljubljana, 1987); F. Pibernik, “Zgodnj Balantić,” Nova Revija, 1986, no 5; Leopoldina Plut-Pregelj and Carole Rogel, Historical Dictionary of Slovenia (Lanham, Md., 1996).

BALCEROWICZ Leszek (19 January 1947, Lipno), Polish economist and politician. In 1970 Balcerowicz graduated from the Foreign Trade Department of the Central School of Planning and Statistics in Warsaw (CSPS; now the Warsaw School of Economics—Szkola Główna Handlowa [WSE]), and in 1974 he received an MBA from St. John’s University in New York. From 1969 to 1981 he belonged to the Polish United Workers’ Party (PUWP). In 1970–80 he was a researcher at the CSPS Institute of International Economics, and from 1978 to 1980, at the Economic Policy Department of the Institute of Basic Problems of Marxism-Leninism at the PUWP Central Committee. In 1975 he received a Ph.D. at the CSPS. From 1980 he was research secretary at the CSPS Institute of Economic Development, and in 1981 he was an expert at the Sieć (Network) community in Solidarity, elaborating systemic reforms. During the period of martial law he led an independent seminar on economic systems at the CSPS. In 1989–90 he was a member of the Civic Committee of the chairman of Solidarity.

From September 1989 to December 1991 Balcerowicz was deputy prime minister and minister of finance in the government of Tadeusz Mazowiecki and chairman of its Economic Committee. He elaborated and implemented a plan for the rapid stabilization and transformation of the Polish economy, which was in deep structural crisis.

The plan consisted of the removal of all price and wage controls, the introduction of a single rate of exchange for the Polish złoty, an economic opening to the West, and the curbing of high inflation by a special tax on excessive wage increases. During the first three months of 1990 the monthly rate of inflation fell from 76 percent to 6 percent, but the reform deepened the recession, and hidden unemployment surfaced. Balcerowicz's "shock therapy" became a point of reference for all economic reforms in post-Communist countries. Thanks to this policy, Poland was the first post-Communist country to overcome the recession during transition. In 1990 Balcerowicz received a postdoctoral degree and in 1992 he assumed a professorship at the WSE and was a visiting professor to many foreign universities. Among other works, he authored The Soviet Type of Economic System and Innovativeness (1988); Systemy gospodarcze: Elementy analizy porównawczej (Economic systems: Elements of comparative analysis; 1989); 800 dni: Szok kontrolowany (800 Days: A shock under control; 1992); Macropolicies in Transition to a Market Economy: A Three Year Perspective (1995); Socialism, Capitalism, Transformation (1995); Wolność i rozwój: Ekonomia wolnego rynku (Freedom and development: Free market economics; 1995); and Państwo w przebudowie (The state under reconstruction; 1999). He has received many honorary doctorates and other awards.

From 1992 to 2000 Balcerowicz presided over the Board and Research Council of the Center for Social and Economic Research (CASE). From April 1995 to December 2000 he was chairman of the Union of Freedom (Unia Wolności [UF]). In the parliamentary elections of September 1997 he gained the best results in the Silesian region of Katowice. From October 1997 to June 2000 he was deputy prime minister, minister of finance, and head of the Economic Committee of the government of Jerzy Buzek. He resigned in when the UF left the ruling coalition. From December 2000 he was chairman of the National Bank of Poland (Narodowy Bank Polski). His top priority was curbing inflation. (IS WR) Sources: Wielka encyklopedia PWN, vol. 3 (Warsaw, 2001); Kto jest kim w Polsce (Warsaw, 2001); Janusz A. Majcherek, Pierwsza dekada III Rzeczypospolitej (Warsaw, 1999); Antoni Dudek, Pierwsze lata III Rzeczypospolitej 1989–2001 (Kraków, 2002); Wojciech Roszkowski, Historia Polski 1914–2001 (Warsaw, 2002).

BALICKI Zygmunt (30 December 1858, Lublin–12 September 1916, Petrograd), Polish publicist and nationalist politician. Balicki graduated from high school in Lublin. While a student in St. Petersburg, he joined the Commune of Polish Socialists. In 1880 he arrived in Warsaw, but, fearing arrest, he moved to Lwów (Lviv), where along with Bolesław Limanowski he founded a Socialist association called Lud Polski (Polish People). In 1881 the association issued a manifesto with a program of independence—the first such program since the failure of the January uprising of 1863. Balicki was arrested by the Austrian authorities. Facing the threat of extradition to Russia, in 1883 he went to Switzerland. He acquired Swiss citizenship and did his military service there. In 1886 he secretly returned to Warsaw. After talks with the supporters of the national movement, in January 1887 he left for Kraków, where he set up the Union of Polish Youth, popularly called Zet. In January 1888 this organization became subordinated to the Polish League (Liga Polska). Acting with the Polish League, in 1889 Balicki founded the Association of Polish Emigration (Związek Wychodźstwa Polskiego). In 1890 he began a cooperation with Roman Dmowski, as a result of which the National League (Liga Narodowa) was founded in 1893. Although for two years Balicki was formally still a member of the Foreign Union of Polish Socialists, in fact he had already rejected socialism in favor of nationalism. In 1896 in Geneva he earned a doctorate in law. At the National League Congress in Budapest in 1896 he was elected a member of the league's Central Committee. From 1898 he lived in Kraków, founding units of the league in Upper Silesia and in Greater Poland. He was also active in the Society of People's Schools and in the Gymnastic Society Sokół (Falcon). In 1902 he published Egoizm narodowy wobec etyki (National egoism against ethics), in which he justified Polish nationalism and outlined a program of national education. Balicki favored the ethics of the nation to individual ethics and considered the rights of the nation as natural rights.

In 1905, along with Dmowski and Jan Ludwik Popławski, Balicki moved to Warsaw. He backed the pro-Russian shift in Dmowski's orientation; as a result the National League broke off ties with the Union of Polish Youth. Between 1908 and 1914 Balicki edited Przegląd narodowy, explaining the objectives of the anti-German and pro-Russian policy of the league. He was sentenced to one year's imprisonment for the publication of the article "Program Szymona Konarskiego" (The program of Szymon Konarski; 1908). He served his sentence in Włocławek and was released in June 1910. Two years later he published Psychologia społeczna (Social psychology), a work he had begun in prison. His lively attitude and didactic talents won him great popularity and affection among the young. After the outbreak of World War I Balicki became a member of the Polish National Committee (Komitet Narodowy Polski [KNP]) in Warsaw, and in 1915 he moved along with the KNP to Petrograd.

There he became involved in organizing the Polish Legion. It was to fight on the side of the Russian army in counterbalance to the Polish Legions (Legiony Polskie) of Józef Piłsudski, which were fighting on the side of Austria-Hungary. Balicki was buried in St. Catherine's Church. In 1918 the Bolsheviks removed his body and buried it in a common grave. (WR) Sources: PSB, vol. 1; Stanisław Bukowiecki, "Zygmunt Balicki," Kurier Warszawski, 1916, no. 271; Marian Seyda, Polska na przełomie dziejów (Poznań, 1927); Władysław Pobóg-Malinowski, Narodowa Demokracja 1887–1918 (Warsaw, 1933); Roman Wapiński, Narodowa Demokracja 1893–1939 (Wrocław, 1980); Bogumił Grott, Zygmunt Balicki: Ideolog Narodowej Demokracji (Kraków, 1995).

BALITSKY Anton (17 September 1891, Baliche, near Hrodna [Grodno]–31 October 1937?), Belorussian politician. In 1913 Balitsky graduated from a teachers' seminary in Svisloch. For a short time he worked as a teacher. He began to study at the Vitebsk Teachers' Institute but was mobilized into the army. During the February 1917 revolution he was in St. Petersburg, where he joined the Bolsheviks. Until 1919 he fought with the Red Army on the southern front. In November 1919 he became a member of the Bolshevik party. He took part in the formation of the Soviet government in Odessa. In 1921–26 he was deputy commissar and then (1926–29) commissar for education of the Belorussian SSR. His name is associated with the process of the Beloruthenization of education in the Belorussian SSR. In 1929, as the struggle against so-called national democratism intensified, Balitsky was strongly suspected of Belorussian nationalism. In 1930 he was accused of being a member of a conspiratorial (in fact nonexistent) organization called the Belorussian Liberation Union. In March 1931 he was sentenced to ten years in labor camps. As a result of a retrial in 1937 his sentence was changed to death, and he was executed. (EM)

Sources: Ivan S. Lubachko, Belorussia under Soviet Rule, 1917–1957 (Lexington, Kentucky, 1972); Vitaut Kipel and Zora Kipel, eds., Byelorussian Statehood (New York, 1988); Entsyklopedyia historyi Bielarusi, vol. 1 (Minsk, 1993); N. Vasilieuskaia, Abvinavachvaletstva u natsionaldemokratyzmie (Minsk, 1995).

BALLUKU Beqir (14 February 1917, Tirana–1975 Tirana?), Albanian Communist activist. Balluku was born into a poor Muslim family. After graduating from a technical school in Tirana, in 1935–39 he worked in a metal factory in Tirana. He took part in anti-Italian demonstrations in April 1939, and from 1940 to 1942 he served in the army. In the Shkodër garrison he entered into contact with a radical group of youth. Demobilized in 1942, he joined the Communist resistance. He co-initiated the formation of local cells of the Communist Party and assumed the position of political commissar of the Third Brigade of the Enver Hoxha guerrillas. At the end of the war he was political commissar of the First Corps. As a member of a special people's tribunal to try "war criminals and enemies of the people," he was responsible for the prosecution of political opponents. From 1945 he was deputy chairman of the Democratic Front, and in 1947 he became commander of an infantry division with the rank of colonel. In February 1948 he was promoted to general, and until 1953 he was chief of staff of the army. A member of the Central Committee and Politburo of the Albanian Labor Party and MP from 1948, in 1952–53 he studied at the Voroshilov Military Academy in Moscow.

In 1953–74 Balluku was minister of defense and from 1954, also one of the deputy prime ministers, responsible for the control and indoctrination of the populace. In the 1950s he became famous for saying proudly that the Albanian army had in fact become a part of the Soviet army. In accordance with the Hoxha line, in September 1960 he nevertheless sharply criticized Soviet policy at the congress of the North Vietnamese party in Hanoi. In March 1961 in Warsaw he represented Hoxha at the last meeting of the Warsaw Pact in which the Albanian delegation participated. After the breach with the USSR, he became an equally zealous supporter of the Chinese line. In September and October 1968 he gained Mao Zedong's assurance that China would defend Albania in the case of a threat to its sovereignty. In July 1974 Balluku was dismissed under mysterious circumstances. Officially he was accused of neglect in the armed forces and of attempted rebellion. According to one source, he is believed to have opposed Hoxha's idea of defending Albania by means of thousands of bunkers. According to another source, he was to write a report, which Hoxha called the "black thesis," on the disastrous situation in the army. It is also possible that Balluku had simply become too strong a rival of the dictator. At first Balluku was interned at Roskovec, near Fieri, and then he was imprisoned, sentenced to death, and executed. (TC)

Sources: Stavro Skendi, Albania (New York, 1956); William E. Griffith, Albania and the Sino-Soviet Rift (Cambridge, Mass., 1963); Peter R. Prifti, Socialist Albania since 1944: Domestic and Foreign Developments (Cambridge, Mass., 1978); Arshi Pipa, Albanian Stalinism: Ideo-Political Aspects (New York, 1990); Gjergji Titani and Hasani Proleter, Personalitete ushtarake shqiptare në vite 1912–1997, vol. 1 (Tirana, 1997); Bardho Hysen, Beteja dhe duele: Esse dhe kujtime (Athens, 2000).

BALODIS Janis (20 February 1881, Trikatas–8 August 1965, Saulkrasti), Latvian general and politician. In 1898 Balodis joined the Russian army, and in 1902 he graduated from the military academy in Vilnius (Wilno). He was decorated for his service in the Russo-Japanese War (1904–5). Balodis was wounded during World War I in East Prussia and taken captive by the Germans. In November 1918 he returned to Latvia, and he joined the Latvian army in the making as a captain. He was soon promoted, at first to command a battalion, next a brigade, and then a division. After the death of Colonel Oskar Kolpaks, from March to June 1919 Balodis commanded the Latvian army fighting the Bolsheviks, the White Russians, and the Germans in southern Latvia. On 16 October 1919 he was officially appointed commander-in-chief of the Latvian Army. On 30 December 1919 he signed a treaty of military cooperation with Poland in the liberation of Latgalia. The operation began on 3 January 1920 with an attack by the Polish-Latvian group under the command of General Edward Rydz-Śmigły. In January 1920 Balodis was appointed general. In July 1921 he went into the reserves. From 1925 he was an MP associated with the Peasant Union of Kārlis Ulmanis, and from 1931 he served as defense minister. In this role he significantly advanced preparations for the coup d'état of 15–16 May 1934. The army's commander-in-chief, General Martins Penkis, was not informed of the plot, and Balodis neutralized the army. The most significant role in the coup was played by Aizsargs, a paramilitary organization of the Peasant Union. On 16 May, together with Ulmanis, Balodis signed a program manifesto for the new government. In it, they presented evidence that the country was on the verge of ruin as a result of widespread corruption, unstable government, and the imminent threat of civil war because of the activities of the radical right and left wings. From 1936 Balodis served as vice president and defense minister. Although he was ready to accept Ulmanis's dictatorial methods of government and even his cult status as "the leader of the nation," Ulmanis dismissed him on 5 April 1934 because he had demanded that Ulmanis fulfill a promise made in 1934 to convene the parliament and pass a new constitution.

After the Red Army entered Latvia in July 1940, together with a group of independence activists, Balodis attempted to put forward a list of non-Communist candidates in the elections to the National Assembly, but he was prevented from doing so by a special deputy from the Kremlin, Andrei Wyshynsky. Balodis was then arrested by the NKVD, and after many years in prisons and forced labor camps, he returned to Latvia, where he died. He was decorated with many Latvian orders and with the Polish Virtuti Militari Cross. (WR/EJ)

Sources: Arnolds Spekke, History of Latvia (Stockholm, 1951); Adolf Blodnieks, The Undeclared Nation (New York, 1960); Piotr Łossowski, Kraje bałtyckie na drodze od demokracji parlamentarnej do dyktatury (1918–1934) (Wrocław, 1972); Adolfs Šilde, Latvijas Vēsture (Stockholm, 1976); Visvaldis Mangulis, Latvia in the Wars of the 20th Century (Princeton Junction, N.J., 1983).

BALOGH István (30 March 1894, Stájerlak [now in Romania]–21 July 1976, Budapest), Hungarian Catholic priest and political activist. After high school Balogh graduated from a theological seminar in Temesvár (Timișoara) and was ordained in 1918. In 1921–25 he studied philosophy at the universities in Budapest and Szeged, and in 1929 he received a Ph.D. in philosophy. From 1926 to 1946 he was vicar in Szeged. He co-initiated summer festivals in this town, and in 1934 he was elected to the local government on behalf of the government Party of Unity. He founded and edited the Szegedi Katolikus Tudósító (1927–35) and a periodical for country folk, Tanyai Újság (1936–38). In 1930–32 he edited the daily Szegedi Hírlap, and from 1938 to 1944 he was co-owner of a liberal daily, Délmagyarország, and two presses.

In November 1944 Balogh took over the leadership of the Independent Smallholders' Party (ISP) organization in Szeged, although he had not belonged to this party. In December 1944 he took part in the creation of the Hungarian National Independence Front (HNIF), which included the ISP, Communists, Social Democrats, and the National Peasant Party. Until May 1945 he presided over the HNIF cell in Szeged and belonged to the preparatory commission of the Provisional National Assembly. From December 1944 to May 1947 he was secretary of state for political affairs in the government, and until the summer of 1945 he headed the government Press Bureau. He was a signatory to the Hungarian-Soviet armistice of 20 January 1945. In 1945–46 he was a government commissioner of abandoned property. From August 1945 he was a member of the ISP national leadership. After the arrest of Béla Kovács, in February 1947 Balogh was elected secretary general of the party. After the ISP prime minister, Ferenc Nagy, was forced to resign, Balogh also gave up his ministerial position, and in early June 1947 he left the ISP. With Communist support, a month later he founded the Independent Hungarian Democratic Party, which gained 5.2 percent of the vote and eighteen parliamentary seats in the elections of 31 August 1947. From 1947 he was a member of the Hungarian-Soviet Cultural and Educational Society. As a result of his political involvement, in September 1948 Balogh was suspended as a Catholic priest. In February 1949 he led his party into the Communist-controlled Hungarian Independence People's Front and soon was elected to the presidium of its national board. From August 1949 to December 1951 he was a member of the Presidential Council of the Hungarian Republic. In 1950 he co-initiated a “peace movement” of the Catholic clergy, and later he became a member of the National Peace Council and the National Council of the Popular Patriotic Front. In 1951 he moved out of Budapest but returned in 1953. Later, until his death, Balogh was allowed to work in Budapest as a priest and from 1968, as a titular abbot. (JT)

Sources: Magyar Életrajzi Lexikon, vol. 3 (Budapest, 1981); Magyar Nagylexikon, vol. 3 (Budapest, 1994); Magyarország 1944–1956, CD-ROM, 1956-os Intézet (Budapest, 2001); Új Magyar Életrajzi Lexikon, vol. 1 (Budapest, 2001).

BANACH Kazimierz (4 March 1904, Korytkowo, near Opoczno–29 August 1985, Warsaw), Polish political activist. Banach graduated from the Free Polish University (1932). From 1922 he belonged to the Polish Peasant Party Liberation (Polskie Stronnictwo Ludowe Wyzwolenie) and from 1931, to the Peasant Party (Stronnictwo Ludowe [SL]). Active in the peasant youth movement, chairman of the Academic Union of Peasant Youth (1929–30), chairman of the Central Board of the Peasant Youth Association Wici (1931–32), and a member of the presidium of the Slavonic Union of Peasant Youth, in 1935–39 Banach was active in the Wici organization in Volhynia. In March 1940 he co-organized the underground peasant movement SL Roch and was chief of staff of the Supreme Command of the Peasant Battalions (Bataliony Chłopskie); then he edited peasant underground periodicals and served as a delegate of the Polish government in exile in Volhynia. In 1944 he took part in the Warsaw Uprising. In 1945 he joined the Polish Peasant Party (Polskie Stronnictwo Ludowe [PSL]) of Stanisław Mikołajczyk. At first a member of the PSL Chief Executive Committee and Supreme Board, he represented the party in the Communist-controlled Home National Council (Krajowa Rada Narodowa). He advocated a conciliatory attitude toward the Communists. In the parliamentary elections of January 1947 he won a seat, having organized a splinter group called PSL-Left. Excluded from the PSL in April 1947, after the escape of Mikołajczyk in the fall 1947, he took part in the takeover of the party by a pro-Communist faction and its merger with the Communist-controlled Peasant Party into the United Peasant Party (Zjednoczone Stronnictwo Ludowe [ZSL]) in November 1949. In 1950–55 he was marginalized and worked in the cooperative movement. From 1956 he became one of the ZSL leaders. He was a member of the Chief Committee, editor of ZSL periodicals, chairman of the People’s Press Cooperative (1951–71), MP (until 1972), a member of the Council of State (until 1971), deputy chairman of the Communist war veterans’ Union of Fighters for Freedom and Democracy (1956–74), and a long-time member of the Communist-controlled International Federation of Resistance Movements. (AP)

Sources: Mołdawa; Słownik Biograficzny Działaczy Ruchu Ludowego (Warsaw, 1989); Roman Buczek, Stronnictwo Ludowe w latach 1939–1945 (London, 1975); Krystyna Kersten, Narodziny systemu władzy: Polska 1943–1948 (Poznań, 1990); Andrzej Paczkowski, Stanisław Mikołajczyk, czyli kłęska realisty (Warsaw, 1991).

BANACH Stefan (30 March 1892, Kraków–31 August 1945, Lwów [Lviv]), Polish mathematician. In 1910–14 Banach studied at the Lwów Polytechnic, but with the outbreak of World War I he had to break off his studies. In 1919 he, along with Hugo Steinhaus, published his first scholarly work. From 1920 he worked at the Lwów Polytechnic as an assistant professor. In the same year he received a Ph.D.; in 1922 he received a postdoctoral degree, and he became full professor. From 1924 he was a member of the Polish Academy of Arts and Sciences. In the mid-1920s he already had international standing as a mathematician; he co-established the Lwów school of mathematics and was the discoverer of a new branch of mathematics: functional analysis, known at that time as the theory of linear operations. In 1929, along with Steinhaus, he founded the periodical Studia Mathematica, which in a short time won worldwide recognition. In 1932 he published his major work, Théorie des opérations linéaires (Theory of linear operations), which was the first handbook of functional analysis. In it he introduced the concept of the “Banach space.” Along with Alfred Tarski, he also presented the theorem of the paradoxical factoring of a sphere. In 1939 he was elected chairman of the Polish Mathematical Association. The outbreak of World War II found him in Lwów, which was taken by the Red Army. In 1940–41 he was dean of the Soviet-controlled University of Lwów. After the seizure of the city by the Germans, he lost his job and worked as a feeder of lice in an institute producing anti-typhoid vaccine. When the Soviet army returned in the summer of 1944, Banach returned to scholarly work at the university. He intended to move to Kraków, but he died before he could. His main works were published in Oeuvres avec des commentaires (Works with commentary, 2 vols.; 1967–79). (WR)

Sources: Hugo Steinhaus, “Stefan Banach,” Studia Mathematica, 1963, no 1; Polacy w historii i kulturze krajów Europy Zachodniej, ed. Krzysztof Kwaśniewski and Lech Trzeciakowski (Poznań, 1981); Roman Kałuża, Stefan Banach (Warsaw, 1992); S. Wagon, The Banach-Tarski Paradox (Cambridge, 1993); Roman, Kałuża Through a Reporter’s Eye: The Life of Stefan Banach (Boston, 1996); J. Koziół, Banach-geniusz ze Lwowa (Warsaw, 1999).

BAŃCZYK Stanisław (25 October 1903, Lubiszów, near Opoczno–16 April 1988, Washington, D.C.), Polish peasant politician. Bańczyk graduated from a training school in Sieradz. From 1919 he belonged to the Polish Peasant Party Wyzwolenie (Polskie Stronnictwo Ludowe Wyzwolenie), and from 1931 to the Peasant Party (Stronnictwo Ludowe [SL]). He was one of the top leaders of the Peasant Youth Association Wici, and he co-organized the peasant strike of 1937. He favored cooperation with the Polish Socialist Party and supported a united front of the left with the Communists; he was arrested several times. During the German occupation he was a member of the underground SL Roch, and then he co-organized the SL Wola Ludu (Will of the People), on whose behalf he became a member of the Communist-controlled Home National Council (Krajowa Rada Narodowa). In 1945 he was chairman of the Chief Executive Committee of the pro-Communist SL, but he advocated its autonomy and cooperation with the Polish Peasant Party (Polskie Stronnictwo Ludowe [PSL]) of Stanisław Mikołajczyk. In November 1945, with a group of followers, Bańczyk moved to the PSL, where he became deputy chairman of its Chief Executive Committee. He won a parliamentary seat in the fraudulent elections of January 1947. He supported Mikołajczyk's policies, and after Mikołajczyk's escape he resigned and secretly left Poland as well. One of the top PSL leaders in exile, in 1954 Bańczyk opposed Mikołajczyk and, along with Stanisław Wójcik, he took the lead of a separate PSL. Later he resigned from it, since one of his chief aides proved to be an agent of Communist intelligence. In 1964 he joined the Kazimierz Bagiński group, and in 1968–75 he was the head of the PSL in exile, after most splinters groups were again reunited. The party split again in 1975, and Bańczyk ceased to play a significant role in the political life of Polish émigrés. (AP)

Sources: Mołdawa; Słownik Biograficzny Działaczy Ruchu Ludowego (Warsaw, 1989); Roman Buczek, Stronnictwo Ludowe w latach 1939–1945 (London, 1975); Krystyna Kersten, Narodziny systemu władzy: Polska 1943–1948 (Poznań, 1990); Andrzej Paczkowski, Stanisław Mikołajczyk, czyli kłeska realisty (Warsaw, 1991).

BANDERA Stepan (1 January 1909, Uhryniv Staryi, near Kalush–15 October 1959, Munich), Ukrainian nationalist politician. The son of a Greek Catholic priest, Bandera graduated from high school in Stryi. As a student of agronomy at the Lwów (Lviv) Polytechnic, in 1927 he joined the Ukrainian Military Organization (Ukrajinska viiskova orhanizatsiia [UVO]). He also belonged to the Union of Nationalist Ukrainian Youth (Soyuz Ukraiinskoi Natsionalistichnoi Molodi). From 1929 he was a member of the Organization of Ukrainian Nationalists (Orhanizatsiia Ukrainiiskikh Natsionalistiv [OUN]), and from 1931 he was head of the propaganda section of the OUN Executive Department. With the support of the young, radically anti-Polish members at the OUN leadership (provid) meeting in Prague on 6 June 1933, he was appointed the OUN leader (providnyk). On his recommendation the OUN continued terrorist actions against Polish authorities—for example, the assassination of the minister of interior, Bronisław Pieracki. Arrested on 14 June 1934, in January 1936 Bandera was sentenced to death. The sentence was then commuted to life imprisonment. He was held in the Święty Krzyż, Rawicz, Wronki, and Bereza Kartuska prisons.

Released in early September 1939 along with a group of young nationalists, Bandera attempted to resume power in the OUN. In view of the resistance of the followers of Andriy Melnyk, on 10 February 1940 the organization split. Bandera took over the leadership of the revolutionary OUN faction, named the Bandera faction after him (OUN-B); it took over most of the organizational network in the Ukraine and acted mostly against Soviet power. Counting on a German-Soviet war, the OUN-B formed military units cooperating with the German Wehrmacht and special troops aimed at taking over power in the territory taken by the Germans. On 30 June 1941 in German-controlled Lviv, Bandera's followers announced the creation of an independent Ukraine with a government headed by Yaroslav Stetsko. Bandera was probably to become the head of state. The Germans refused to recognize the Stesko government and demanded a withdrawal of the declaration of independence. When the OUN-B refused, its activists were arrested. Bandera was placed in the Sachsenhausen-Zellenbau concentration camp as a special prisoner. He made contact with the commander-in-chief of the Polish Home Army, General Stefan Grot-Rowecki, also kept there, but no details of these contacts are known.

Changes in the German policy toward the Ukraine led to Bandera's release in mid-September 1944. His position toward the Third Reich in the last months of the war is not clear. Probably he gradually distanced himself from the German authorities. After the war he remained in the Western occupation zones of Germany, heading Foreign OUN Groups (Zakordonnyie Chastyny OUN [ZCh OUN]). Differences grew between Bandera and OUN activists connected with the Ukrainian Insurgent Army (Ukrainska Povstanska Armia [UPA]) and its political superstructure, the Ukrainian Supreme Liberation Council. In particular Bandera questioned a resolution of the Third OUN Congress that rejected democratization of the organization. He also refused to recognize the council's leadership in exile.

He supported a continuation of the UPA armed struggle, leaving the choice of methods to its commander-in-chief, Roman Shukhevych. Discrepancies within the ZCh OUN led to a split in the organization in 1948. Activists connected with the council questioned Bandera's power and established the so-called OUN-Z, led by Lev Rebet and Zinovi Matla. Attempts by Shukhevych to ease the tension between the factions failed. Representatives of both factions sent to the Ukraine were caught by the Soviets. Bandera's representative, the head of the ZCh OUN Security Service, Myron Matviyenko, disclosed important secrets of the organization to the Soviets. His arrest, as well as the creation of an OUN network controlled by the Polish Communist security apparatus, further weakened Bandera's position. Nevertheless, as a long-term prisoner, for many Ukrainians he was still a symbol of the national struggle for independence. For this reason the head of the Soviet KGB, Aleksander Shelepin, ordered his assassination. On 15 October 1959 Bandera was murdered by a KGB agent, Bohdan Stashynskiy. Bandera was buried in Munich. In 1978 a collection of his works, Perspektyvy ukraiïnskoy revoliutsii (Prospects of the Ukrainian revolution), appeared in Munich. (GM)

Sources: Encyclopedia of Ukraine, vol. 1 (Toronto, 1984); Petro Mirczuk, Bandera: Symvol revoliutsionnoy bezkompromisovnosti (New York and Toronto, 1961); Murdered by Moscow: Petlura, Konovalets, Bandera: Three Leaders of the Ukrainian Liberation Movement (London, 1962); Karl Anders, Mord auf Befehl- der Fall Staschynskij (Tübingen, 1963); Moskovsky vbitvitsy Bandery pered sudom (Monachium, 1965); Ryszard Torzecki, Polacy i Ukraińcy: Sprawa ukraińska w czasie II wojny światowej na terenie II Rzeczypospolitej (Warsaw, 1993); Ubiistvo Stepana Bandery (Lviv, 1993); Wasyl Kuk, Stepan Bandera 1909–1999 (Ivano-Frankovsk, 1999).

BÁNFFY Dezső (28 October 1843, Koložsvár [Cluj]–24 May 1911, Budapest), Hungarian politician. After graduating from law and administration studies in Cluj, Berlin, and Vienna, Bánffy was governor of Szolnok-Doboka Province (1876–90) and then of Beszterce-Naszód Province (1890–92). He was a conservative of a peremptory nature. Speaker of the parliament on behalf of the Liberal Party (1892–95), from January 1895 to February 1899 he was prime minister at the time of the culmination of the Hungarian nationalist offensive, the so-called struggle for culture. Bánffy's personal engagement and his skillful policies helped his government to force a modernization of the civil law. He also made a number of decisions to consolidate a strong national state. For instance, the celebration of the millennium of Hungarian statehood in 1896 strengthened national consciousness and pride among Hungarians and transformed Budapest into a modern European capital. Bánffy's nationalist policies led to a long-term crisis of the Dual Monarchy. In 1904 he returned to politics, becoming an MP and chairman of the conservative New Party (Új párt), which, however, failed to play a significant role. He was the author of Magyar nemzetiségi politika (Hungarian national policy; 1902) and A horvát kérdéstről (On the Croatian question; 1907), in which he presented an uncompromising attitude toward national minorities (MS)

Sources: Bánffy Dezső nemzetiségi politikája (Budapest, 1899); Lajos Bíró, "Bánffy Dezső," Huszadik Század, 1912, no. 23; Steven Béla Varga, Historical Dictionary of Hungary (Lanham, Md., 1997).

BANGERSKIS Rūdolfs (21 July 1878, Taurupe, Livonia–25 February 1958, Oldenburg, Germany), Latvian general. After high school Bangerskis served in the Russian army from 1895. In 1901 he graduated from the infantry cadet school in Petersburg and served as an officer in the Ninety-Third, Ninety-Sixth, and Thirty-Sixth Regiments. He took part in the Russo-Japanese War of 1904. In 1912–14 he studied in the Academy of the General Staff but broke off his studies at the outbreak of World War I. In December 1916 he was a colonel in the staff of the Fourteenth Corps and later of the Thirty-First Corps; from January 1917 he commanded the Seventeenth Regiment of Siberian Riflemen. Demobilized in March 1918, he went to Yekaterinburg, where he joined the anti-Bolshevik Siberian Army of General Aleksander Kolchak. Chief of staff of a division and later commander of a division, he was promoted to lieutenant-general. From October 1919 he commanded a corps and then a group of armies. In December 1920 he returned to Latvia. From 1924 he was commander of a division of the Latvian Army and headed higher military courses. From December 1924 to December 1925 and from December 1926 to January 1928 he was minister of war. In 1925 he was confirmed as general, and in 1936 he retired. After the Soviet invasion of 1940 he avoided arrest, although he was listed for deportation. During the German occupation, in 1942–43 he worked in the General Juridical Administration of the Latvian government. From April 1943 a general inspector of the Latvian Legion in the rank of Gruppenführer SS, he withdrew with the German army to the west and was elected chairman of the Latvian National Committee in Potsdam in February 1945. From June 1945 he was in a British POW camp. Released in December 1946, he settled in Oldenburg. He wrote a four-volume memoir, Mana mūža atmiņas (Memoirs of my life; 1958–60). He was killed in a car crash. (EJ)

Sources: Es viņu pazīstu (Riga, 1939); Adolfs Blodnieks, The Undefeated Nation (New York, 1960); Ēriks Jēkabsons and U. Neiburgs, “Generālis Rūdolfs Bangerskis,” Vīri, 1995, no. 4; Andrejs Plakans, Historical Dictionary of Latvia (Lanham, Md., 1997); Latvijas armijas augstākie virsnieki: Biogrāfiska vārdnīca (Riga, 1998).

BANUSHI Ireneo Ilia (18 August 1906, Shkodër–25 November 1973, Lushnjë), Albanian Orthodox bishop. In 1925 Banushi graduated from Iliricum, a Franciscan high school in Shkodër and in 1931, from the Orthodox theological seminary in Cetinje. In 1938 he graduated in theological studies in Belgrade. After returning to Albania, he lectured in a theological seminary, and he taught Latin and history in a high school in Tirana. During the Italian occupation he was imprisoned in Shkodër as a “political suspect” and was later interned near Mantua in Italy. Released in June 1940, he returned to Tirana. From October 1941 to January 1942 he again taught in a high school. In January 1942 he was appointed archimandrite of Shen Naum Monastery, and the following month he was consecrated bishop. In June 1942 the Holy Synod reorganized the church administration, taking into consideration territories included in Italian-occupied Albania. Banushi took over the Struga-Prespa diocese. He sympathized with the Communist guerrillas but remained passive.

At the end of World War II Banushi dedicated himself to writing pastoral works. In July 1945 he became ordinary bishop of the Gjirokaster diocese, but he resided in Tirana because the Communists prevented him from coming to Gjirokaster, wishing to place one of their priests there. On 28 October 1946 Banushi was arrested, and in April 1947 he was sentenced to five years for “collaboration with the occupiers.” Released owing to an amnesty on 28 April 1949, he recovered from tuberculosis, which he had acquired in prison. Interned in the Shen Vlashi Monastery in Durrës, he took part in the Third Congress of the Albanian Orthodox Church in February 1950. He was pressed to give up his consecration as bishop. Since he refused, on 22 August 1952 he was arrested again, and on 9 April 1953 he was sentenced to five years in prison. After his release, in 1958 he was interned in the Ardenice Monastery near Lushnjë. In 1967, when all religious practice was prohibited by Albanian law, he was allowed to settle and work as a blue-collar laborer in Lushnjë. He worked in railway construction, as a storekeeper, and as an accountant. He died of tuberculosis. (TC)

Sources: Beduli Dhimiter, Kisha orthodoxe autoqefale e Shqipërisë gjër në vitin 1944 (Tirana, 1992); Beduli Kristofor, Episkop Irine Banushi: Martir i Kishës Orthodoxke Autoqefale te Shqipërisë (Tirana, 2000).

BARADULIN Ryhor (24 February 1935, Verasovka, Vitebsk region), Belorussian poet, critic, and translator.

From 1954 to 1959 Baradulin studied philology at the Belorussian State University in Minsk. Later he worked for the periodicals Sovetskaya Byelorussiya, Byarozka, Belarus, and Polymya. In 1996 he became editor-in-chief of the monthly Mastatskaya literatura. In 1990–99 he was chairman of the Belorussian PEN club, and in 1995–97, a member of the board of the Belorussian Soros Foundation. He made his literary debut in 1953. The major collections of his poems include the following: Meladzik nad stepami (New moon over the steppes; 1959); Adam i Yeva (Adam and Eve; 1968); Vyartannie u pyershy snieħ (Return to the first snow; 1972); Absiah (The range; 1978); Amplituda smielastsi (The amplitude of braveness; 1983); Mauchannie pieruna (The silence of thunder; 1986); and Samota palomnitstva (The solitude of pilgrimage; 1990). His poems have been translated into eleven languages. Baradulin also translated the works by García Lorca, Aleksandr Voznesenskiy, Omar Chajjam, Pablo Neruda, William Shakespeare, George Byron, Adam Mickiewicz, and Władysław Broniewski into Belorussian. It is believed that he authored the anonymous poems Raskaz pra Lysuyu Haru (The tale of Bald Mountain) and Luka Mudishchau, the former being a satire of the Soviet system and the latter of President Alyaksandr Lukashenka. Baradulin won numerous national and international awards. (EM)

Sources: Entsyklopedyia litaratury i mastatstva Belarusi, vol. 1 (Minsk, 1984); Bielaruskiya pismienniki: Biyabibliografichny slounik, vol. 1 (Minsk, 1992); Jan Zaprudnik, Belarus: At a Crossroads in History (Boulder, Colo., 1993); Bielaruskiya pismienniki 1917–1990: Davednik (Minsk, 1994); Jan Zaprudnik, Historical Dictionary of Belarus (Lanham, Md., 1998); Kto iest kto w Respublike Belarus (Minsk, 1999).

BARÁK Rudolf (11 May 1915, Blansko–12 August 1995, Prague), Czech Communist activist. Between 1930 and 1945 Barák was a laborer in his home, Blansko. In 1945 he joined the Communist Party of Czechoslovakia (CPC), and as an obedient executor of orders, he was soon promoted in the party hierarchy. He advanced from membership on a factory committee to the party secretariat in the district of Blansko, and after the coup in February 1948 he became the chair of the Regional National Committee in Blansko. Owing to the support of the equally swiftly promoted Antonín Novotný, in October 1950 Barák was appointed head of the CPC in Brno and in December 1952 deputy member, and soon thereafter member, of the CPC Central Committee. At the beginning of 1953 he was briefly deputy prime minister, and in September 1953 he assumed the post of interior minister. In this role he headed the state terror. Over a hundred Czechoslovak concentration camps fell within his power. From June 1954 he was a member of the Politburo of the CC and chaired a special committee for investigating the political trials of 1948–53; the committee was created after Stalin's death in the first stages of collective leadership in Czechoslovakia. The committee covered up most of the Stalinist crimes, and its report was never made public. However, Barák collected a great deal of evidence incriminating his political rivals. Along with Novotný, he played a major role in holding back de-Stalinization and prevented its spread to Czechoslovakia from neighboring countries. He directed the program Return, in which postwar emigrants were encouraged to return to Czechoslovakia. From 1959 he was deputy prime minister and enjoyed great popularity among the party masses, especially after the amnesty of 9 May 1960, through which many political prisoners were released.

When unrest connected with a bad economic situation and Khrushchev's "second thaw" in the USSR began in 1961, Barák was most frequently mentioned as Novotný's successor. Alarmed by the independence of Barák's policies and by the fact that Barák knew about Novotný's role in the trial of Rudolf Slánský, Novotný counterattacked. In June 1961 Barák was dismissed from the Ministry of Interior and was assigned a marginal post as plenipotentiary for a local administration a month later. On the night of 23–24 January 1962 President Novotný, Prime Minister Viliam Široký, and Minister of Interior Lubomir Štrougal personally arrested Barák under the pretext of his having embezzled $1,000. On Novotný's motion the CC Plenum of 6–7 February 1962 denounced Barák for his activities in the ministry and his "manipulations of state property." On 20 June 1962 he was sentenced to fifteen years of prison. Released and rehabilitated by the Supreme Court during the Prague Spring in May 1968, he did not return to political life. (WR) Sources: ČBS; Who's Who in the Socialist Countries (New York, 1978); William E. Griffith, ed., Communism in Europe, vol. 2 (Cambridge, Mass., 1966); Edward Taborsky, Communism in Czechoslovakia 1948–1960 (Princeton, 1961); Eugen Loebel, Stalinism in Prague (New York, 1969); Jiří Pelikán, The Czechoslovak Political Trials 1950–1954 (Stanford, 1971).

BARANIAK Antoni (1 January 1904, Sebastianów, near Śrem–18 August 1977, Poznań). Polish archbishop. Born into a peasant family, after primary school in Sebastianów Baraniak studied in schools run by the Order of St. Francis Salesius in Oświęcim and Kraków, where he passed his graduation exams and took vows in May 1924. In August 1930 he was ordained. From 1927 to 1933 he studied in Warsaw and at the Gregorian University in Rome, where he received a Ph.D. in canon law. From 1933 he was personal secretary to the Primate of Poland, August Hlond, and later to Primate Stefan Wyszyński. On 26 April 1951 he was appointed auxiliary bishop of the Gniezno bishopric and was consecrated on 8 July 1951. He kept working in the secretariat of the Primate of Poland, acting as bishop in western and northern dioceses, where the Communist authorities had removed the apostolic administrators.

As Baraniak was a close aide to Primate Wyszyński, on 25 September 1953 Communist security officers arrested him in Warsaw. He was tortured physically and mentally in a Warsaw prison. (For instance, he was kept naked in a wet and cold cell.) His forced confessions were to serve as a foundation for the trial of Primate Wyszyński, but he refused to testify against the primate. On 21 December 1955 Baraniak was released and transferred to a Salesian convent in Marszałki, near Ostrzeszów, where he was kept in strict isolation. He was set free in October 1956. Imprisonment had ruined his health. On 30 May 1957 Pope Pius XII appointed him archbishop of Poznań, which was perceived as a sign of solidarity between the Pope and the persecuted bishop. Baraniak took over the Poznań archbishopric on 2 July 1957. He established a number of new parishes and reactivated the collegiate church in Środa; he participated in the Second Vatican Council and in the synods of bishops in 1969 and 1971. In 1968 he also organized a diocesan synod. Thanks to his endeavors, the Papal Theological Department was created in Poznań. Baraniak was known as an outstanding preacher; he frequently spoke in defense of the rights of believers and priests harassed for building churches without special permission from the Communist authorities. (AGr)

Sources: Piotr Nitecki, Biskupi Kościoła w Polsce: Słownik biograficzny (Warsaw, 1992); Leksykon duchowieństwa represjonowanego w PRL w latach 1945–1989, vol. 1 (Warsaw, 2002); Marian Przykucki, "Z kalendarium życia i pracy ks. arcybiskupa Antoniego Baraniaka metropolity poznańskiego," in W służbie Kościoła Poznańskiego (Poznań, 1974); Andrzej Micewski, Kardynał Wyszyński: Prymas i mąż stanu (Paris, 1982); Antoni Dudek, Państwo i Kościół w Polsce w latach 1945–1970 (Kraków, 1995); Jan Żaryn, Stolica Apostolska wobec Polski i Polaków w latach 1944–1958 (Warsaw, 1998).

BARANKOVICS István (13 December 1906, Polgár–13 March 1974, New York), Hungarian Christian Democratic politician. Barankovics was born into a teacher's family. In 1925 he passed his high school final examinations at the Cistercian Gymnasium in Eger, and then he entered the law department of the university in Budapest. He interrupted his studies in order to concentrate on journalism. It was only in 1944 that he obtained his degree in political science. In 1928 he was elected secretary general of the National Union of Hungarian Catholic College Students.

A committed Christian sensitive to social problems, Barankovics found an ally in the person of Count Gyula Dessewffy, the president of the Ferenc Deák Society. In 1937 Dessewffy founded a political periodical, Az Ország útja, and asked Barankovics to join him as co-editor. In 1943 the magazine ceased publication, and Barankovics became editor-in-chief of the nationwide daily Magyar Nemzet. In it, he outlined his political program in the spirit of Christian Democracy. After the German occupation of Hungary (March 1944), Magyar Nemzet was suspended.

When the Arrow Cross Party took over power in October 1944, Barankovics went into the underground and was active as secretary general of the Christian Democratic People's Party of Count József Pálffy. In April 1945 the party officially appeared as the Democratic People's Party (DPP). Barankovics wanted to transform the party into a modern Christian Democratic party with a program based on papal social encyclicals. He recognized the republican state, and in the face of the postwar situation, he considered it necessary to maintain good relations with the USSR. Because of this he came into conflict with Cardinal József Mindszenty and also with Count Pálffy, who enjoyed the support of the cardinal. In the summer of 1945 the party split in two. In the elections of November 1945 Barankovics's wing gained two seats under an electoral agreement with the Smallholders' Party (SP). Despite electoral fraud, in the elections of 1947 Barankovics entered parliament, and the DPP obtained sixty seats, becoming the second largest faction. After the split, the SP became a base for middle-class forces. Although he was ready for compromise, Barankovics could not lead the opposition for long. In his last parliamentary speech in December 1948, he sharply criticized the concentration of power and the government policies of economic planning and collectivization. Under political pressure, on 2 February 1949 Barankovics issued a statement in which he announced the dissolution of the party, and then he fled the country. At first he lived in Austria, where he was head of the office for the affairs of refugees in Salzburg. In 1951 he settled in the United States. In 1954, together with a group of his supporters, he revived the DPP. From 1958 he was a member of the Hungarian Committee and president of the Christian Democratic Union of Eastern Europe in New York. (JT)

Sources: Ferenc Nagy, The Struggle behind the Iron Curtain (New York, 1948); Prominent Hungarians Home and Abroad (Munich, 1966); Imre Kovacs, ed., Facts about Hungary: The Fight for Freedom (New York, 1966); Magyar Nagylexikon, vol. 3 (Budapest, 1994); A magyar forradalom és szabadságharc enciklopédiája, CD-ROM, 1956-os Intézet (Budapest, 1999).

BARCIKOWSKI Kazimierz (22 March 1927, Zglechów, near Mińsk Mazowiecki), Polish Communist activist. Born into a peasant family, Barcikowski was active in the Peasant Youth Association Wici during his studies. In 1950 he graduated from the Central School of Farming in Łódź. In 1953 he joined the Polish United Workers' Party (Polska Zjednoczona Partia Robotnicza [PZPR]). In 1954–56 he was deputy editor-in-chief of the state publishing house Iskry; in 1956 he became secretary of the Supreme Board of the Polish Youth Association, and from 1957 to 1960 he was vice president of the Supreme Board of the Peasant Youth Association (Związek Młodzieży Wiejskiej [PYA]). In 1960–62 he studied at the Higher School of Social Sciences at the PUWP Central Committee (CC), where he received a Ph.D. in 1962. From 1963 to 1965 he presided over the PYA Supreme Board; from 1965 to 1968 he was deputy head of the Organization Department of the PUWP CC and editor-in-chief of the party organ, Życie Partii. From 1964 a deputy member and from 1968 to 1990 a member of the PUWP CC, in 1965–89 he was MP. From 1968 to 1970 he was first secretary of the PUWP Provincial Committee in Poznań, and from December 1970 to February 1974, he was CC secretary for agriculture and contacts with the parliament. From 1971 he was a deputy member of the party Politburo. From February 1974 to December 1977 he was minister of agriculture, and later, until February 1980, he was first secretary of the PUWP Provincial Committee in Kraków. After that he returned to the government, assuming the position of deputy prime minister (February–October 1980). Then, until November 1985, he was PUWP CC secretary again.

During the Baltic coast strikes of August 1980, Barcikowski headed a government commission to negotiate with the Inter-Factory Strike Committee in Szczecin headed by Marian Jurezyk. On 30 August 1980, without full coordination with the party leadership, Barcikowski signed an agreement with the committee. A few days later, after Edward Gierek was toppled, Barcikowski became a member of the Politburo and remained in this position until July 1989. In September 1980 he became a member of the newly founded Joint Commission of the Government and Episcopate. Co-chairman of the commission from 1980 to 1989 and co-author of legislation regulating relations between the state and the church, he was the CC secretary responsible for the control of the church and of satellite parties. He played a significant role in the introduction of martial law, and on 14 December 1981 he joined the so-called directorate, an informal political team to rule Poland. In 1980–85 he was the head of the PUWP parliamentary caucus. From 1980 to 1989 he was a member of the Council of State, and in 1985–89 he was its deputy chairman. From 1989 chairman of the Chief Cooperative Council, Barcikowski published the memoirs Na szczytach władzy (At the top of power; 1998). (PK)

Sources: Mołdawa; Włodzimierz Janowski and Aleksander Kochański, Informator o strukturze i obsadzie personalnej centralnego aparatu PZPR 1948–1990 (Warsaw, 2000); Antoni Czubiński, Dzieje najnowsze Polski 1944–1989 (Poznań, 1992); Andrzej Paczkowski, Droga do “mniejszego zła.” Strategia i taktyka obozu władzy, lipiec 1980–styczeń 1982 (Kraków, 2002).

BÁRDOSSY László (10 December 1890, Szombathely–10 January 1946, Budapest), Hungarian politician. The son of a white-collar worker, in 1912 Bárdossy graduated in law from the University of Budapest. In 1913 he chose an administrative career, taking a job in the Ministry of Religious Denominations and National Education. He was promoted when he moved to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs in 1922. He became deputy head and (in 1927) head of the Press Department of the Foreign Ministry. From 1930 he was a councillor in the embassy in London, and in 1934–41, ambassador in Bucharest. After the sudden death of István Csáky, in February 1941 Bárdossy was appointed minister of foreign affairs, and after Prime Minister Pál Teleki committed suicide, on 3 April 1941 Bárdossy became prime minister, retaining the position of head of diplomacy.

Bárdossy believed in the victory of the Third Reich, and driven by a desire to recover Voivodina for Hungary, he agreed to the movement of German troops through Hungarian territory after Hitler decided to attack Yugoslavia. After the proclamation of “independent” Croatia—in agreement with Regent Miklos Horthy—on 11 April 1941 Bárdossy decided to join in the German attack. As a result, the Hungarian army took Voivodina. After the German invasion of the USSR on 22 June 1941, Bárdossy broke off relations with the Soviet Union. Four days later, he submitted to the government Horthy’s decision to join the war against the USSR, and the next day he announced this decision in the parliament without asking it for consent. Under German and Italian pressure, in the absence of Horthy and without the consent of the cabinet, after the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor, on 11 December 1941 Bárdossy announced that Hungary was also at war with Great Britain and the United States. In domestic policy Bárdossy represented the extreme right. In 1941 the so-called third anti-Jewish law was passed, which prohibited marriages between Jews and gentiles and declared sexual relations between them a race crime. In January 1942 Bárdossy contributed to the creation and shipment of the Second Army, numbering some two hundred thousand soldiers, to the eastern front, and he allowed the recruitment of about twenty thousand Hungarian Germans to the Waffen-SS. In 1943 the Second Army suffered heavy losses on the Don River. One out of four soldiers was killed, and some twenty-eight thousand were taken by the Soviets. Bárdossy’s submission to the Germans eroded his position and that of his government, while pro-Western conservatives demanded his dismissal. His position was additionally weakened by his conflict with Horthy, who wanted to create the position of deputy to the regent and saw his son as a candidate. Bárdossy was opposed, but the regent achieved his goal in February 1942.

On 7 March 1942 Bárdossy was forced to resign, but he remained one of the key leaders of the extreme right. In 1943 he took over the lead of the radical United Christian National League. In 1944 he became MP. After the Arrow Cross took power in October 1944, Bárdossy remained MP. At the end of the war he escaped to Bavaria. Arrested by the Americans, in October 1945 he was handed over to Budapest. A month later, the People’s Court in Budapest sentenced him to death for war crimes, and he was soon executed. (JT)

Sources: Biographisches Lexikon, vol. 1; Magyar Nagylexikon, vol. 3 (Budapest, 1994); Nagy Képes Milleniumi Arcképcsarnok (Budapest, 1999); Új Magyar Életrajzi Lexikon, vol. 1 (Budapest, 2001); Magyarország 1944–1956, CD-ROM (Budapest, 2001); John F. Montgomery, Hungary: The Unwilling Satellite (New York, 1947); Nicholas Horthy, Memoirs (Paris, 1954); Bűnös volt-e Bárdossy László (Budapest, 1996); Steven Béla Várdy, Historical Dictionary of Hungary (Lanham, Md., 1997); Pál Pritz, A Bárdossy-per (N.p., 2001).

BARKAUSKAS Antanas (20 January 1917, Paparchiai), Lithuanian Communist activist. After the Soviet invasion of Lithuania in June 1940 Barkauskas joined the Communist youth organization Komjaunimas and took a job in the Soviet administration in Kaunas. When the Third Reich attacked the USSR, in June 1941 he joined the Red Army and in 1942, the Soviet Communist Party. After the war he resumed his work in the administration of the Lithuanian SSR, supporting Sovietization and Stalinist policies. He graduated from a higher party school in Moscow. From 1950 he was a functionary of the Vilnius committee of the Communist Party of Lithuania (CPL), supporting collectivization and the extermination of the remaining freedom fighters. In 1953–55 he lectured at the Polytechnic Institute in Kaunas, and from 1959 he was head of a department of the CPL Central Committee (CC). From 1961 to 1975 he was a member of the CC Secretariat, and from 1962 to 1966, of the CPL CC Politburo. During the administration of Leonid Brezhnev Barkauskas became one of the leading supporters of the Kremlin policy of Sovietization. In 1982 he published a Soviet version of Lithuanian history, Lithuania: Years and Deeds. From 1975 to 1985 and from 1988 to the beginning of 1990 he was chairman of the Supreme Council of the Lithuanian SSR, ineffectively trying to prevent perestroika and glasnost. (WR) Sources: The International Who's Who 1984/85 (Europa 1985); Romuald J. Misiunas and Rein Taagepera, The Baltic States: Years of Dependence 1940–1990 (Berkeley, 1993).

BĂRLĂDEANU Alexandru (25 January 1911, Comrat, Moldavia–13 October 1997, Bucharest), Romanian Communist activist. In 1936 Bărlădeanu joined the Communist Party of Romania (Partidul Comunist din România [CPR]). In 1937 he graduated in law from the university in Iași. In 1937–40 he was assistant professor and held the chair of political economy at this university, and in 1940 he received a Ph.D. in economics there. From 1940 to 1946 he worked at a research institute in Chișinău, the capital of the Moldavian SSR since 1940, created from the formerly Romanian Bessarabia. In 1946 he moved to Romania, already under Communist control. From 1946 to 1947 he was an economic expert of the Romanian delegation to the Paris Peace Conference. From 1946 to 1951 he held a chair in the Institute of Economics. Appointed professor in 1949, he was deputy minister of the national economy in 1946–48 and minister of foreign trade from 1948 to 1954. In 1955–56 he was deputy chairman and then chairman of the State Planning Commission. He implemented the Stalinist economic concepts of Gheorghe Gheorghiu-Dej—for instance, he supervised the construction of a metallurgical plant in Galați. From 1955 he was a member of the Central Committee (CC) of the Romanian Workers' Party (as of 1965 the Romanian Communist Party [RCP]). In 1955 he became a deputy to the National Assembly; in 1962–65 he was a deputy member and in 1965–68 a member of the RCP CC Politburo. From 1955 to 1965 (with a break in 1956) he was deputy prime minister for economic affairs, and then until 1967, first deputy prime minister. At a Comecon meeting on 15 February 1963 he protested the imposition of Comecon plans on Romania.

After the takeover of power by Nicolae Ceaușescu in 1965, as a close aide of Gheorghiu-Dej, Bărlădeanu was gradually moved to the shadows. In 1968 he was forced to give up all his posts, excluded from the RCP, and placed under house arrest, in which he stayed until the fall of Ceaușescu in December 1989. From the mid-1980s he is believed to have been in touch with other high RCP officials who had been removed by Ceaușescu and who were considering a return to power with Soviet support. On 10 March 1989 the BBC broadcast a letter signed by Bărlădeanu and five other former Gheorghiu-Dej aides protesting the Ceaușescu dictatorship and its economic policies. After the fall of the dictator Bărlădeanu belonged to a close circle of leaders constituting the provisional government of the National Salvation Front (Frontul Sălburi Naționale [NSF]). After the parliamentary elections of May 1990 he was the speaker of the Senate until 1992, and in 1990–91 he co-chaired the National Assembly. In 1992 he was dismissed from the NSF in view of his unreformed Communist views on the economy, and he joined the extreme nationalist Greater Romania Party (Partidul România Mare), attracting many former Communists. From 1955 he was a member of the Romanian Academy of Sciences, and from 1990 to 1994 he was its deputy chairman. (LW)

Sources: Dictionar Enciclopedic, vol. 1 (Bucharest, 1993); Ghita Ionescu, Communism in Romania 1944–1962 (London, 1964); Ion Rațiu, Contemporary Romania (Richmond, 1975); Juliusz Stroynowski, ed., Who's Who in the Socialist Countries of Europe (Munich, London, and Paris, 1989); Józef Darski, Rumunia: Historia, współczesność, konflikty narodowe (Warsaw, 1995); Dorina N. Rusu, Membrii Academiei Române 1866–1999 (Bucharest, 1999); Ion Alexandrescu, Ion Bulei, Ion Mamina, and Iona Scurtu, Enciclopedia de istorie României (Bucharest, 2000).

BARLICKI Norbert, pseudonyms “Grzela,” “Betani,” and others (6 June 1880, Sieciechów, near Kozienice–27 September 1941, Auschwitz), Polish Socialist politician, lawyer, and journalist. Barlicki initially was an adherent of Józef Piłsudski; in 1902–6 he was a member of the Polish Socialist Party (PPS), then the PPS-Left (1906–14), and then the PPS-Revolutionary Faction. Between 1917 and 1918 he was a member of the Central Workers' Committee and the Peasant Union, and in 1919 he returned to the PPS. Between 1919 and 1939 he was a member of the Chief Council of the PPS and in 1920–26, a member of the Central Executive Committee (CEC); between 1926 and 1931 he served as president of the CEC. From November 1918 to January 1919 he was deputy minister of interior in the government of Jędrzej Moraczewski. In 1919–33 he was an MP, and between 1920 and 1926 he served as president of the Union of Polish Socialist Deputies (Związek Polskich Posłów Socjalistycznych). In 1920 he was a member of the State Defense Council. From February to April 1926 he was minister of public works. After the coup of May 1926 he joined the opposition to the sanacja regime. Co-organizer of the center-left opposition (Centrolew), in 1930 Barlicki was arrested and imprisoned in the Brześć fortress. In January 1932 he was sentenced to two and one-half years' imprisonment. After his release in 1933 he became quite radicalized, favoring cooperation between the PPS and the Communist Party of Poland (KPP). From 1936 to 1937 he was editor-in-chief of Dziennik popularny. In his political journalism Barlicki propagated the ideas of a united people's front. In 1937 he was elected mayor of Łódź, but he was not approved by the state authorities. From 1939 to 1940 he co-organized leftist Socialist groups. In 1940 he edited an underground newspaper, Chłop i robotnik. Arrested in 1940 by the Germans, he perished in the Auschwitz concentration camp. He authored Aleksander Dębski: Życie i działalność, 1857–1935 (Aleksander Dębski: Life and activity, 1857–1935; 1937) and Proletariat (1947). (JS)

Sources: Słownik polityków polskich XX wieku (Poznań, 1998); Jan Tomicki, ed., Norbert Barlicki: Wybór przemówień i artykułów z lat 1918–1939 (Warsaw, 1964); Jan Tomicki, Norbert Barlicki, 1880–1941: Działalność polityczna (Warsaw, 1968); Norbert Barlicki, Muszę zamilknąć spory na lewicy: Wybór pism (Warsaw, 1980); Marian Leczyk, ed., Sprawa brzeska (Warsaw, 1987).

BARONS Krišjānis (31 October 1835, Strutele, Courland–8 March 1923, Riga), Latvian folklorist, journalist, and writer; one of the originators of the Latvian national awakening. Barons was the son of a provincial official. In 1855 he graduated from a gymnasium in Mitava (Jeglava), and in 1856–60 he studied mathematics and astronomy at the university in Dorpat (Tartu), where he took part in the social life of Latvian students. In 1856 he published his first story and soon after a geography textbook. In 1862 he moved to Petersburg, where until 1865 he co-edited the magazine Pēterburgas avīzes (from 1862 he was its editor-in-chief). Later, he worked as a translator in the Russian Ministry of Education. He was the author of the first Latvian bibliography. He wrote articles on social and political issues, stories, and poems. From 1867 he worked as a private tutor and later as a German teacher in Moscow. He was affiliated with the Moscow Society of Friends of the Natural Sciences, Anthropology, and Ethnography. In 1893 he returned to Riga and continued working on a compilation and scholarly edition of Latvian folk song texts, a project that began in 1878. He was a precursor of the Latvian science of folklore. Between 1894 and 1915, 217,996 folk songs edited by Barons were published in eight volumes. In independent Latvia Barons enjoyed great respect as one of the main developers of Latvian cultural life. (EJ)

Sources: A. Baumanis, Krišjānis Barons (Riga, 1935); Krišjāņa Barona piemīņai (Riga, 1962); K. Arājs, Krišjānis Barons un latvju dainas (Riga, 1985); Atmiņas: Stāsta K. Barons un laikabiedri (Riga, 1985); R. Pussars, Pie dižozola saknēm (Riga, 1985); S. Viese, Mūža raksts (Riga, 1985); Krišjānis Barons: Bibliogrāfiskais rādītājs (Riga, 1990).

BARTEL Kazimierz (3 March 1882, Lemberg [Lwów, Lviv])–26 July 1941, Lwów), Polish politician and mathematician. The son of a railway worker, Bartel was trained as a metalworker, and in 1901 he graduated from high school in Lwów. From 1902 to 1907 he studied machine construction at the Lwów Polytechnic and until 1909, philosophy and mathematics at Lwów University. Then he continued studies at the university in Munich. After returning home, he started working at the Lwów Polytechnic, where he got a chair in descriptive geometry in 1913. In 1917 he became professor. During World War I he served in the Austrian army, and in November 1918 he organized a Polish railway regiment to fight against the Ukrainians in Lwów. In 1919 he took command of the railway troops, and then he took part in the Polish-Soviet war. In December 1919 he became minister of railways in the government of Leopold Skulski. He continued to serve in this capacity in the subsequent government until December 1920. In 1922 he won a parliamentary seat on behalf of the Polish Peasant Party Liberation (Polskie Stronnictwo Ludowe Wyzwolenie), but in 1925, in protest against its plans to expropriate large estates without compensation to their owners, he withdrew from the party and founded the Club of Labor, supporting Józef Piłsudski.

After the coup of May 1926, Bartel was prime minister five times (15 May–4 June 1926, 8 June–24 September 1926, 27–30 September 1926, 27 June 1928–13 April 1929, and 29 December 1929–29 March 1930) and deputy prime minister once (2 October 1926–27 June 1928). Until January 1927 he was also minister of religious denominations and public education. His major task as head of government after the coup was to stabilize the country and gain social support. The state of emergency was abolished, construction of the port of Gdynia was accelerated, and food prices were regulated. After Ignacy Mościcki was elected president, Bartel created a new cabinet, which prepared an amendment to the constitution strengthening the role of the president, and introduced personnel changes in the state administration. As a result of a parliamentary crisis, in September 1926 his government had to resign, but he was given the task of creating another cabinet. Since its composition was exactly the same as that of the preceding cabinet, relations between the ruling circle and the parliament grew tense. When Piłsudski became prime minister, Bartel was practically the acting head of government and mediated between Piłsudski and the parliament. When the conflict with the parliament became aggravated and Piłsudski resigned, Bartel created another government. Seen as Piłsudski's moderate follower, he also faced strong opposition in the government, where advocates of a hard line criticized him for liberalism and subjection to the parliament. In April he resigned, but he soon became head of government again. During his fifth term he got involved in a sharp conflict with the parliament, which passed a vote of no confidence on several of his ministers. As a result Bartel himself resigned. The Piłsudski tactics of manipulating Bartel were known as “Bartelling,” since despite his formally high position Bartel did not belong to the inner circle of Piłsudski aides.

Leaving the political scene, Bartel gave up his parliamentary mandate and returned to the Lwów Polytechnic. In 1930 he became its rector. As an opponent of confrontation with the opposition, in the Brześć trial he testified as a witness for the defense. In 1937 President Mościcki appointed him senator, but Bartel did not return to politics. In 1926–38 he belonged to the Great National Lodge. After the outbreak of World War II and the entry of the Soviet army, he worked at the Lwów Polytechnic, adopting a submissive attitude toward the Soviets. When the Germans entered the city, on 21 July 1941 he was arrested and soon shot. He was the author of (among other works) Geometria wykreślna (Descriptive geometry; 1919); Perspektywa malarska (Perspectives in painting, 2 vols.; 1928–58); and Mowy parlamentarne (Parliamentary speeches; 1928). (PU)

Sources: Adam Próchnik, Pierwsze piętnastolecie Polski niepodległej (Warsaw, 1983); Władysław T. Kulesza, Koncepcje ideowo-polityczne obozu rządzącego w Polsce w latach 1926–1935 (Wrocław, 1985); Prezydenci i premierzy Drugiej Rzeczypospolitej (Warsaw, 1992); Kto był kim w Drugiej Rzeczypospolitej (Warsaw, 1994); Ludwik Malinowski, Politycy II Rzeczypospolitej, vol. 2 (Toruń, 1995); Encyklopedia historii Drugiej Rzeczypospolitej (Warsaw, 1999).

BARTÓK Béla (25 March 1881, Nagyszentmiklós [Sinicolau Mare]–26 September 1945, New York), Hungarian composer, pianist, and ethnographer. Bartók inherited his musical interest and talent from his mother, the pianist Paula Voit. In 1892–96 he studied with László Erkel in Pozsony (Bratislava), and from 1899 he studied piano at the Musical Academy in Budapest, from which he graduated in 1903 and where he worked from 1907. In 1903 he made his first tour as a pianist (Vienna, Berlin, Pozsony). His first compositions (the symphonic poem Kossuth in 1903 and a suite for orchestra in 1905–7) bear the marks of inspiration from the works of Johannes Brahms and Richard Strauss. Influenced by his friendship with Zoltan Kodály, Bartók was increasingly interested in folklore (not only Hungarian folklore), and he collected it as he traveled through the Carpathian region, the Balkans, and North Africa. Drawing from the motifs, rhythms, and harmonies of folk music, as well as from Kodály's works, Bartók created his own Hungarian style. Initially Hungarian audiences received his works with reserve. As a result he went through a crisis and withdrew from public life for a couple of years.

Despite the crisis Bartók worked uninterruptedly, and he wrote music for three stage works—an opera, A kékszakállú herceg vára (Bluebeard's castle; 1911), and the ballets A fából faragott királyfi (The wooden prince; 1914–16) and A csodálatos mandarin (The miraculous Mandarin; 1919). During the Soviet Hungarian Republic (1919) Bartók joined the Directorate of Musicians, so after the counterrevolution he was not allowed to teach for a year. In 1923 he divorced his wife, Marta Ziegler, and married a student, Ditta Pásztor. In the 1920s he toured Germany, Great Britain, France, the Netherlands, and Italy. In 1928 he went to the United States and the Soviet Union. His growing foreign reputation increased his popularity in Hungary and resulted in a commission in 1923 to compose a suite commemorating the five hundredth anniversary of the establishment of Budapest. Because of Bartók's unwillingness to publicly support Hungarian claims to territories lost as a result of World War I, there was antipathy against him among nationalist circles. Preaching international reconciliation, he composed the Cantata Profana (1930). In 1934 he left the Musical Academy in Budapest to focus on the source materials he had gathered. This resulted in the work Népzeneink és a szomszéd népek népzeneje (Our folk music and our neighbors'; 1934). In 1936 he made his last ethnographic trip, this time to Turkey.

Bartók was at the height of his creativity in 1926–39. His formal discipline and great taste in combining elements of classical music with stylized folk motifs resulted in such works as his first and second piano concertos (1926, 1930–31), the Sonata for Two Pianos and Percussion (1937), and the Second Violin Concerto (1937–38). In reaction to the ban on his music in the Third Reich and Italy and fearing the growing influence of the Fascists in Hungary, in 1940 Bartók emigrated with his family to the United States, where he taught as visiting professor at Columbia University in New York. It was then that he composed the Concerto for Orchestra (1943) and—upon the request of Yehudi Menuhin—the Sonata for Violin (1944). He died of leukemia a few months after World War II. His ashes were brought to Hungary in 1988. After the war, both under communism and later, he was recognized as the most outstanding Hungarian pianist and composer, as well as an untiring seeker of a synthesis in music of East and West. His work as a musical ethnographer, as well as his creative talent, contributed greatly to the survival and popularization of the most typical features and motifs of East and Central European musical cultures. At the same time he was one of the pioneers of modern art of the early twentieth century. (MS)

Sources: János Deményi, Bartók élete és művei (Budapest, 1948); Witold Rudziński, Warsztat kopozytorski Beli Bartoka (Kraków, 1964); Béla Bartók Letters (London, 1971); Tedd Crow, ed., Bartok Studies (Detroit, 1976); Béla Bartók: Mit Selbstzeugnissen und Bilddokumenten (Hamburg, 1977); Malcolm Gillies, Béla Bartók Essays (Lincoln, Neb., 1993); Bartok Remembered (London, 1991); Béla Bartók, 1881–1945 (Paris, 1993); Benjamin Suchoff, ed., Így látták Bartókot (Budapest, 1995); Peter Laki, ed., Bartok and His World (Princeton, 1995); Ernő Lendvai, Bartók és Kodály harmóniavilága (Budapest, 1997).

BARTOSZEWSKI Władysław (19 February 1922, Warsaw), Polish historian, diplomat, and social and political activist. During the Nazi occupation Bartoszewski was imprisoned in the Auschwitz concentration camp (1940–41). From 1941 to 1944 he studied Polish philology at the underground Warsaw University, and he graduated in 1949. He worked for the Front of Polish Renaissance, a secret Catholic organization, and from 1942, in the Office of Information and Propaganda (Biuro Informacji i Propagandy [BIP]) of the High Command of the Home Army (Komenda Główna Armii Krajowej [KG AK]). Engaged in saving the Jews, from 1942 he belonged to the Provisional Committee of Assistance to Jews, Żegota. From 1943 he was deputy head of the Jewish section of the Department of Interior of the Homeland Delegation of the Government-in-Exile. He took part in the Warsaw Uprising of 1944, and in 1945 he was secretary of the BIP KG AK Biuletyn Informacyjny. He belonged to the underground organization Nie and worked in the Homeland Delegation of Armed Forces.

In 1945 Bartoszewski started working in the Chief Commission to Investigate German Crimes in Poland. In 1946–82 he belonged to the Association of Polish Journalists. In 1946 he joined the Polish Peasant Party (Polskie Stronnictwo Ludowe [PSL]) of Stanisław Mikołajczyk and worked in the editorial staff of Gazeta Ludowa. Arrested during the repression of the PSL, he spent 1946–48 and 1949–54 in prison. Rehabilitated in 1955, he worked for the Association of Polish Librarians and from 1957 to 1960, at the weekly Stolica. From 1957 he wrote for the Tygodnik Powszechny, and in 1961–62 he was active in the political discussion group, the Crooked Circle Club. From 1963 he was a secret correspondent for Radio Free Europe (RFE). In 1966 he received the medal of Righteous among Nations. In 1970 he was repressed (his home was searched, he was investigated, and a few years' ban was placed on his publications) for his work for RFE and for opposition activities (for example, the preparation of the "Letter of 34," from intellectuals to the prime minister concerning censorship). From 1972 to 1984 he was secretary general of the Polish PEN club; from 1973 to 1985 he lectured at the Catholic University of Lublin, and in 1974–75 he held a secret seminar in Warsaw on the recent history of Poland. A participant in the Polish Independence Agreement, in 1978 he co-founded the Society of Scientific Courses and lectured there on World War II history and Polish-Jewish relations. He appealed many times to the Communist authorities to respect human rights, arguing, for example, for a pardon for Andrzej and Benedykt Czuma in 1974 and the limitation of censorship in 1978. In the summer of 1980 he supported striking workers.

Bartoszewski was engaged in the creation of the free trade union Solidarity. Interned during the period of martial law from December 1981 to April 1982, he was released under pressure from international public opinion. Active in underground publishing activities, in 1983–90 he also lectured in Germany. In 1986 he received the prestigious Peace Award of German Booksellers. In 1987 he was invited by Lech Wałęsa to participate with a group of intellectuals to sign a declaration of goals for the Polish opposition. President of the International Council of the State Museum in Oświęcim (Auschwitz) from 1990, in 1991 Bartoszewski received honorary citizenship from the State of Israel. In 1995 he received the Order of the White Eagle. In 1990–95 he was ambassador to Austria; from March 1995 to December 1996 and from July 2000 to October 2001 he was minister of foreign affairs. Senator from 1997 to 2001, he played an important role in the improvement of Polish-German and Polish-Jewish relations. In 2003 he criticized German plans to erect a Center of the Expelled (Vetriebene) in Berlin, arguing against a selective interpretation of the fate of war victims. An honorary doctor at several universities, he authored Prawda o von dem Bachu (The truth about von dem Bach; 1962); Ten jest z ojczyzny mojej: Polacy z pomocą Żydom 1939–1945 (Righteous among nations: How Poles helped the Jews, 1939–1945, co-authored with Zofia Lewinówna; 1967); Warszawski pierścień śmierci (Warsaw death ring; 1967), Palmiry (1969); 1859 dni Warszawy (1859 Days of Warsaw; 1974), Polskie państwo podziemne (The Polish underground state; 1979); Die Warschauer Ghetto: Wie es wirklich war (The Warsaw ghetto: How it really was; 1983); the memoirs Warto być przyzwoitym (It is worth being an honest person; 1990); The Convent of Auschwitz (1991); and the collections of speeches and interviews Above Divisions (2001) and Common European Responsibility (2001). (PK)

Sources: Kto jest kim w Polsce: Informator biograficzny (Warsaw, 1984); Opozycja w PRL: Słownik biograficzny 1956–1989 (Warsaw, 2000); Władysław Bartoszewski: Życie i twórczość (Warsaw, 1999); Prawda i Pojednanie. W 80. Rocznice urodzin Władysława Bartoszewskiego (Warsaw, 2002); Roman Kuźniar and Krzysztof Szczepaniak, eds., Polityka zagraniczna RP 1989–2002 (Warsaw, 2002).

BAŠAGIĆ-REDŽEPASIĆ Safetbeg (6 May 1870, Nevesinje, Herzegovina–9 April 1934, Sarajevo), Bosnian poet, historian of literature, and politician. Born into a Muslim family belonging to the Ottoman elite, Bašagić-Redžepasić was the son of a poet writing in Turkish. After moving to Sarajevo, he went to a local high school (1885–95). In 1899 he graduated from Oriental studies at Vienna University. In 1910 he received a Ph.D.; his thesis was, Die Bosniaken und Herzegovcen auf dem Gebiete der islamischen Literature (Bosnians and Herzegovinians in Islamic literature). He taught Arabic in a high school in Sarajevo (1900–1906) and established a number of cultural and social organizations, including Gayret, El-Kame, and a Muslim club (1903–7). Elected to the Bosnian Assembly, after the death of Ali Hodzha bey Firdus in 1910 he became its speaker. He supported both the Habsburgs and broad autonomy for Bosnians in the Austro-Hungarian Empire. He also cooperated with conservative Hungarian politicians. He wrote for such periodicals as Behar and Ogledalo, and he published many works on the history of Bosnia and Herzegovina, as well as on the history of literature. He translated classical Arabic works and published a couple of collections of his own poems. After World War I he withdrew from politics. From 1919 he worked as a custodian in a museum in Sarajevo. He amassed a significant collection of books in the field of Oriental studies. At the end of his life he advocated a rapprochement of Bosnians with Croats, which was reflected in his work Znameniti Hrvati, Bosnjaci i Hercegovci u Turskoj carevini (Outstanding Croats, Bosnians, and Herzegovinians in the Turkish state; 1931). In 1971 his Izabrana djela (Selected works) were published in Sarajevo. (MC)

Sources: Biographisches Lexikon, vol. 1; Ante Čuvalo, Historical Dictionary of Bosnia and Herzegovina (Lanham, Md., 1987); “Safvet Beg Basagic-Redzepasic,” bosna.com/basagic.html; “Safetbeg Basagic-Redzepasic,” uni/koeln.de/phil/fak/soeg/ethnos/inhalte/inhalte2dzaja.htm.

BASANAVIČIUS Jonas (23 November 1851, Ožkabaliai, near Vilkaviškis–16 February 1927, Wilno [Vilnius]), Lithuanian doctor, ethnographer, and politician. The son of a peasant, in 1873 Basanavičius started to study history at the University of Moscow, but after a year he moved to its medical department. He graduated in 1878, and two years later he left for Bulgaria, where he practiced as a doctor and directed a hospital in Lom Polanka. In 1891 he adopted Bulgarian citizenship. In 1892 he assumed the position of director of a hospital ward in Varna, and in 1894 he became the personal physician of Prince Ferdinand. At that time he was a member of the Bulgarian Democratic Party, but he was always interested in his homeland. During his many trips to Germany and Austria he studied source materials concerning Lithuanian history. He also collected folktales and folk songs, which he published in Mitteilungen der Litauischen Literarischen Gessellschaft (1880–85), edited in Tilsit in so-called Lithuania Minor, belonging to Germany. In 1883 he was co-founder of the first periodical in Lithuanian, Aušra. He edited a number of collections of legends, tales, and folk songs, including Ožkabilių dainos (Songs from Ožkabaliai, 2 vols.; 1902); Lietuviškos pasakos (Lithuanian tales, 2 vols.; 1898–1902); Iš gyvenimo lietuviškų vėlių ir velnių (From the life of Lithuanian devil spirits; 1903); and Lietuviškos pasakos ivarios (Various Lithuanian tales, 4 vols.; 1903–5). All together he published about 1,000 stories and 300 folk songs, as well as a description of about 280 plants typical of the Lithuanian flora. Historical works in which he tried to prove a Tracian-Phrygian origin of the Lithuanians were of less importance.

When Basanavičius reached retirement age in January 1905, he asked the Russian Ministry of Interior for consent to return to Lithuania. He could not wait to receive a reply, and in April 1905 he secretly crossed the Russian border and came to Vilnius at a time of growing revolutionary tensions. On 29 October 1905 he appealed in Vilniaus Žinios for the convention of an all-Lithuanian congress in Vilnius. During the Great Assembly in Vilnius (4–5 December 1905) he called for unity among all political groups in the struggle for freedom, demanding an autonomous Lithuania with a parliament in Vilnius and the introduction of Lithuanian in the schools, churches, and offices. A major problem was that Lithuanians were a minority in the Vilnius area. After the suppression of the revolution the Russian authorities eased their policies toward the Lithuanians, so in February 1907 Basanavičius established the Lithuanian Research Society (LRS) in Vilnius and presented it with his own huge collections. He also edited the periodical Lietuvių Tauta. He represented a conciliatory attitude toward Russia and an increasingly confrontational attitude toward the Poles. On his initiative, in 1912 Lithuanian priests sent a letter to the Holy See demanding the elimination of Polish from the church ministry in Lithuania. In 1913, along with Martynas Yčas, he went to the United States, where he collected funds for the construction of LRS headquarters. The outbreak of World War I made such construction impossible, while the donated funds soon lost their value.

Basanavičius spent World War I years in Vilnius. In July 1917 he gained German consent for the organization of a conference of Lithuanian delegates on local self-government. When on 22 September 1917 the Lithuanian Council was created, he, as its senior member, was the first to sign the declaration of Lithuanian independence on 16 February 1918. He stayed in Vilnius during Bolshevik rule at the turn of 1919, as well as after the town was taken over by the Poles, first in April 1919 and then in October 1920. In the Lithuanian elections of June 1920 he ran on the list of the (nationalist) Party of National Progress, but he lost. Until the end of his life he demanded the incorporation of the Vilnius area to Lithuania. He also continued with his ethnographic explorations and journalism. He authored memoirs titled Autobiografija, published in Lietuvių Tauta in 1928. (WR)

Sources: EL, vol. 1; Saulius Sužiedelis, Historical Dictionary of Lithuania (Lanham, Md., 1997); R. Mackevičius, Jonas Basanavičius (Vilnius, 1930); Jerzy Ochmański, Litewski ruch narodowo-kulturalny w XIX wieku (Białystok, 1965); Alfred E. Senn, Jonas Basanavičius: The Patriarch of the Lithuanian National Renaissance (Newtonville, Mass., 1980); Adolfas Nezabitauskas, Jonas Basanavičius (Vilnius, 1990); Henryk Wisner, Litwa: Dzieje państwa i narodu (Warsaw, 1999).

BATA István (5 March 1910, Tura–17 August 1982, Budapest), Hungarian Communist activist. Bata graduated from primary school, and in 1935–38 he worked as a tramway conductor in Budapest. In 1930 he joined the Social Democratic Party. From 1939 he was a member of the leadership of the Trade Union of Tramway Workers. In 1942 he was briefly arrested and later kept under police surveillance. From 1945 he was a member of the leadership of the Trade Union of State Workers and a member of the Hungarian Communist Party (HCP). From 1947 to 1949 he was HCP secretary of the Third Quarter of Budapest. In 1949 he was accepted into the army as a colonel, and then he was sent for training to the Military Academy in Moscow. After his graduation, in 1950 he became commander of the National Air Defense with the rank of general. In October 1950 he was appointed Chief of the General Staff (until August 1953). In 1951–53 he was a deputy member of the Central Committee (CC) of the Hungarian Workers' Party (HWP), and in June 1953 he became a CC member and a deputy member of the HWP Politburo. In July 1953, after the dismissal of Mihály Farkas, he was appointed minister of national defense, and in 1954 he was promoted to the rank of general of the army. In May 1955 he belonged to the Hungarian delegation that signed the Warsaw Pact. At the HWP CC meeting on the night of 23–24 October 1956 he was dismissed from all his posts. Four days later he left for Moscow. On 4 November, the day of the second Soviet invasion, he returned to Hungary, but the Kádár government did not accept his return, and in February 1957 the CC of the new Hungarian Socialist Workers' Party (HSWP) extended the term of his exile. In September 1958 he was allowed to return. Excluded from the HSWP and deprived of his military rank in February 1959, he returned to his early trade. He became director of a tramway depot, and later he worked as head of the Department of Traffic Safety in the Budapest Transportation Company. In 1972 he retired. (JT)

Sources: Magyar Életrajzi Lexikon (1978–1991) (Budapest, 1994); Magyar Nagylexikon, vol. 3 (Budapest, 1994); Magyarország 1944–1956, CD-ROM, 1956-os Intézet (Budapest, 2001); Új Magyar Életrajzi Lexikon, vol. 1 (Budapest, 2001).

BAT'Á Tomáš (3 April 1876, Zlín–12 July 1932, Otrokovice), Czech entrepreneur. Bat'a was apprenticed to his father, a shoemaker. At the age of eighteen, along with his brother Antonín and his sister Anna, he founded his own shoe company, which was bequeathed to Antonín. The firm expanded thanks to its introduction of light and cheap footwear to the market. In 1904 Bat'a began the machine production of shoes, founding the first factory of this kind in Austria-Hungary. To gain experience, he left for the United States, where he got a job with Ford, the first company to introduce assembly-line production methods. In the 1920s, thanks to the introduction of similar innovations in his factories and to a reduction in the cost of raw materials, Bat'a became a monopolist in the domestic market (he controlled 80 percent of the production of footwear), while Czechoslovakia became the world leader in footwear production in 1928. In order to avoid the high duties imposed on the import of his products in other countries, from 1929 to 1931 Bat'a founded branches in Germany, Switzerland, Poland, and India. At the beginning of the 1930s he was the largest entrepreneur in light industry in Czechoslovakia, employing sixteen thousand workers in thirty-two factories. He introduced modern methods of management and organization, as well as an innovative system, called batismus, that motivated workers. In 1931 his industrial plants were transformed into a joint-stock company, and after World War II they were nationalized by the Communist authorities. Bat'a was killed in an air accident. In 1942 his memoirs, How I Began, were published; in 1986 came Úvahy a projevy (Comments and speeches), and in 1992, Knowledge in Action: The Bata System of Management. (PU)

Sources: ČBS; J. T. Pagač, Bat'a a 30 let jeho podnikatelské práce (N.p., 1926); A. Cekota, Bat'a-Myšlenky, činy, život, práce (N.p., 1929); Kto bol kto za I. ČSR (Bratislava, 1993); Politická elita meziválečného Československa 1918–1938: Kdo byl kdo za první republiky (Prague, 1998).

BATTĚK Rudolf (2 November 1924, Bratislava), Czech sociologist and political activist. At the end of World War II Battěk took part in the resistance movement, and in 1952 he graduated from the Higher Political and Social School in Prague. In 1951–61 he worked as an economist in the communal administration; from 1961 to 1965, in the railways; and in 1965–69, in the Sociological Institute of the Czechoslovak Academy of Sciences. During the Prague Spring of 1968 he co-founded the Club of Engaged Non-Party Members (Klub Angažovaných Nestraníků). From July 1968 to November 1969 he was a deputy to the Czech National Council. In the spring and summer of 1969 he opposed the so-called normalization, demanding a debate on the political situation in the council. In September 1969 he was stripped of immunity and arrested, and two months later he was deprived of the parliamentary mandate. In 1969–70 he was in prison, accused of an attempt to overthrow the republic. After his release he worked as a doorkeeper in the State Statistical Office. In 1971 he was arrested again, accused of distributing leaflets before an election, and sentenced to three and a half years in prison. After his release in 1974 he took a job as a turner, and then as a shop window cleaner. In 1977 he signed Charter 77, and in 1978 he co-founded the Committee for the Defense of the Unjustly Prosecuted (Výbor na Obranu Nespravedlivě Stíhaných [VONS]). In 1980 he became the spokesman for Charter 77. Arrested for the third time and falsely accused of assault on a social worker and in 1981 additionally of an “attempt to overthrow the republic,” he was sentenced to five and a half years in prison. He was released in 1985. From 1983 he was an honorary member of the Executive Committee of the Czechoslovak Social Democracy in exile in Zurich.

In 1988 Battěk belonged to the founders of the Movement for Civic Freedom (Hnutí za Občanskou Svobodu), and in November 1989 he took part in the creation of the Civic Forum (Občanské Fórum [OF]). From January 1990 to June 1992 he was a deputy in the House of Commons of the Federal Assembly and from June 1990, its speaker and deputy speaker of the Federal Assembly. In 1989–90 he was deputy chairman of the preparatory committee of the Czechoslovak Social Democratic Party (Československá Sociální Demokracie [ČSSD]), but before the elections of June 1990 he organized the Social Democratic Club within the OF and was excluded from the ČSSD. In 1992 he founded the movement Democrats 92, whose aim was to defend the Czechoslovak state, but in the elections of June 1992 he lost and retired from political life. He devoted himself to journalism. In 1994 he became chairman of the European Movement in the Czech Republic, and in 1996 he lost in the election to the senate, running as an independent candidate. (PU)

Sources: ČBS; Českoslovenští politici: 1918–1991 (Prague, 1991); Kdo byl kdo v našich dějinách ve 20. století, vol. 1 (Prague, 1998); Who's Who in the Socialist Countries of Europe, vol. 1 (Munich, 1989); Kdo je kdo 91/92 Česká Republika: Federální orgány ČSFR, vol. 1 (Prague, 1991).

BAZHAN Mykola (9 October 1904, Kam'yanets Podil'skyy [Kamieniec Podolski]–23 November 1983, Kiev), Ukrainian poet, translator, and Soviet activist. Born into a military family, Bazhan was brought up in Uman. In 1921 he began to study at the Institute of Foreign Affairs in Kiev, but he did not complete his studies. In the 1920s he was involved in cinematography and edited the magazine Kino. In 1925 he made his literary debut with a futurist poem, Aeromarch. He was one of the co-founders of the Free Academy of Proletarian Literature (Vaplite). He also was affiliated with a group called Nova Heneratsiia (New Generation) and with the magazine Literaturnyi iarmarok. Abandoning the futurism and constructivism in the collection 17-i patrol (Seventeenth patrol; 1926), he became a romantic expressionist in his collections Budivli (Buildings; 1929) and Chyslo (Number; 1931). A leading figure in the cultural revival of the Ukraine in the 1920s, Bazhan created his own style, marked by a dynamic imagination; monumentalism; and a richness of language, metaphors, and rhymes. In the collection Rozмова serdets (Conversation of hearts) he criticized the traditions of Russia. The above-mentioned volumes, as well as his subsequent collections, Doroha (Path; 1930), Poezii (Poems; 1930), and Sliptsi (The blind; 1933), served as grounds to accuse him of “detachment from Socialist reality,” abstractionism, idealism, and Ukrainian nationalism.

Bazhan gained official recognition at a time of mounting Stalinist terror. Between 1935 and 1937 he published a trilogy, Bezsmertia (Immortality), dedicated to Sergey Kirov; he also translated from the Georgian the poem Shota Rustavele Vitiaz' v tigrovii shkuri (Knight in tiger's skin; 1937), and he published the collections Bat'ky i syny (Fathers and sons; 1938) and Iamby (Iambs; 1940), which were written in the spirit of Stalinist patriotism. From 1943 to 1948, within the framework of Stalin's policy of winning over the Ukrainians, Bazhan served as deputy president of the USSR Council of Ministers. He was a long-term member of the CC of the Communist Party of the Ukraine (Bolshevik) and of the Supreme Soviets of the Ukrainian SSR and the USSR. In 1941–45 he wrote works on war themes. He received a Stalinist award for the collection Kliatva (Oath; 1941). After the war he published several works of propaganda. After Stalin's death he remained in the public realm: he presided over the Union of Ukrainian Writers (1953–59); from 1951 he was a full member of the USSR Academy of Sciences, and from 1958 he was head of the publishing house Ukrains'ka Radians'ka Entsyklopedia. He wrote a series of verses and poems in which he more extensively drew on the European cultural heritage. These works include the poems Mitskevych v Odesi: 1825 rik (Mickiewicz in Odessa: The year 1825; 1957); Italiis'ky zustrichi (Italian meetings; 1961); Bohy Hretsii (Gods of Greece; 1968); and translations of the poetry of Cyprian Kamil Norwid. Bazhan received the Shevchenko Award for Polit kriz' burii (Flight in the storm), and he based the philosophical volume of lyrical poetry Chotyry opovidannia pro nadiiu (Four stories of hope; 1967) on the motifs in the poetry of Rainer Maria Rilke. The last volumes he wrote also received wide recognition: Umans'ki spohady (Memoirs from Uman; 1970) and Nichni rozдумы staroho maistra (Night reflections of an old master; 1974). (TS)

Sources: Encyclopedia of Ukraine, vol. 1 (Toronto, 1984); Rozstrilane vidrodzhennia, ed. Yurii Lavrinenko (Paris, 1959); Y. Adelgeim, Mikola Bazhan (Moscow, 1970); Y. Surovtsev, Poeziia Mikoly Bazhana: Kriticheskii ocherk (Moscow, 1970); N. Kostenko, Poetyka Mykoly Bazhana 1923–40 rr. (Kiev, 1971); N. Kostenko, Poetyka Mykoly Bazhana 1941–1977 (Kiev, 1978).

BEBLER Aleš (8 June 1907, Idria–12 August 1981, Ljubljana), Slovene Communist activist and diplomat. Bebler studied law in Ljubljana and from 1927 in Paris, where he received a Ph.D. in 1930. In 1927 he joined the Association of Yugoslav Communist Youth (Savez Komunističke Omladine Jugoslavije [SKOJ]), and in 1929, the Communist Party of Yugoslavia. He was also secretary of the International Organization of Assistance to the Revolutionaries, organizing legal and financial aid to political prisoners and striking workers. While in Paris, he edited the newspapers Plamen and Delo. In 1933 he went to Moscow for an annual party training program. He took part in the Spanish Civil War as captain of the Fifteenth International Brigade. He was twice wounded and went to France for treatment. When in 1939 he came to Yugoslavia, he was arrested and sentenced to one year in prison. After his release he became deputy head of the Commission for Agitation and Propaganda of the Central Committee (CC) of the Communist Party of Slovenia (CPS) and was active in the Association of Friends of the USSR.

During World War II Bebler organized Communist guerrillas in Slovenia. In 1942–44 he operated in the Primorski kraj. He was a member of the regional CPS committee and of the regional council of the Slovene Liberation Front (SLF). From June to November 1944 he was a member of the CPS committee in Steiermark. In September 1944 he became a member of the SLF executive committee, and in May 1945, minister of finance of the Slovene republic. In August 1945 he assumed the position of deputy minister of foreign affairs of Yugoslavia. He belonged to the Yugoslav delegation during the first six sessions of the UN General Assembly, and in 1950–51 he was Yugoslav representative to the United Nations. He closely followed the line of Josip Broz Tito. After the Cominform condemned Yugoslavia in June 1948, Bebler implemented Tito's opening to the West. Between 1948 and 1954 he belonged to the CC of the CPS (as of 1952, the Union of Slovene Communists) and to the CC of the CPY (as of 1952, the Union of Yugoslav Communists). In 1955–57 he was ambassador to France, then chairman of the parliamentary foreign affairs commission, and afterwards ambassador to Indonesia. In 1963 he was appointed judge of the Constitutional Tribunal of Yugoslavia. He published (among other works) the following: Za pravedne granice nove Jugoslavije (For just frontiers of the new Yugoslavia; 1949); Potovanje po sončnih deželah (Journeys in sunny lands; 1956); Otroci zemlje in morja (Children of earth and sea; 1966); and Čez drn in strn (Across country; 1981). (AO)

Sources: Enciklopedija Jugoslavije, vol. 1 (Zagreb, 1955); Lazitch; Edvard Kardelj, Reminiscences (London, 1982); Milovan Đilas, Rise and Fall (San Diego, 1985); Enciklopedija Slovenije, vol. 1 (Ljubljana, 1987); Beatrice Heuser, Western "Containment" Policies in the Cold War: The Yugoslav Case, 1948–53 (London, 1989).

BECHYNĚ Rudolf (6 April 1881, Nymburk–1 January 1948, Prague), Czech Social Democratic politician and journalist. Becjumě was a locksmith by profession. From 1905 he worked in the Social Democratic press (Právo lidu and Rovnost), and in 1909 he became the editor-in-chief of Hlas Lidu, which was published in Prostějov. At that time he established contacts with Vlastimil Tusar, who encouraged him to become a parliamentary correspondent from Vienna. From 1911 to 1918 he was an MP representing Social Democracy to the Austrian parliament. In 1915 he was arrested on the charge of treason and was sent to the eastern front with a rank of private. He returned from the front in January 1917, with his health seriously undermined. He resumed his activities in the Social Democratic Party, in which he represented a socially moderate wing. In the fall of 1917 an article of his was published in Právo Lidu. In it, Bechyně insisted that Social Democratic policy should become anti-Habsburg, and he demanded changes in the party executive ranks. When the postulated changes took place in 1918, he found himself in the party executive.

During the formation of the Czechoslovak state in the fall of 1918 Bechyně represented Social Democracy in the National Committee, and then he was an MP in parliament for twenty years (1918–38). Along with Tusar he formed the anti-Communist wing of Social Democracy. After the collapse of the Tusar government and the appointment of the nonparty cabinet of Jan Černý in 1920 Bechyně was a representative of his party in the Five, a non-parliamentary body consisting of the representatives of the five major parties in Czechoslovakia. This body was to ensure the stability of the country. Under the “red and green” government, based on a coalition of the Social Democrats and the Agrarians, Bechyně held many ministerial posts. He was minister of education between 1922 and 1924, minister of railways and deputy prime minister in 1925–26, minister of supplies between 1929 and 1932, and again minister of railways in 1932–38. He never accepted the Pact of Munich. In July 1939 he emigrated to Great Britain via Poland. In Great Britain, between 1940 and 1945 he was a member of the Czechoslovak National Council (Státní rada Československa) in London, and in 1940–41 he was the first president of the council. After the end of the war he returned to Czechoslovakia but not to political life, although he received offers to join the government. He was the author of the essay Pero mi zustalo (I have only my pen left; 1948). His daughter, Jarmila, was a well-known actress. (PU)

Sources: ČBS; Kto bol kto za I. ČSR (Bratislava, 1993); Politická elita meziválečného Československa 1918–1938: Kdo byl kdo za první republiky (Prague, 1998).

BECK Józef (4 October 1894, Warsaw–5 June 1944, Stanesti, Romania), Polish politician and diplomat. Beck came from a family of a labor, cooperative, and self-government activists. He grew up in Galicia and studied at the Polytechnic College in Lwów and the Export Academy in Vienna. He interrupted his education during World War I and was assigned to the artillery of the First Brigade of the Polish Legions. He fought on the Russian front—for example, at Kostiuchnówka, where he became famous for his courage on the battlefield. On behalf of the Polish Military Organization Beck went on a secret mission to the Ukraine. From 1918 he was in the Polish Army and took part in the Polish-Soviet war. Because of Beck’s diplomatic skills, Józef Piłsudski often sent him on secret missions. In 1922–23 Beck was a military attaché in Paris and Brussels. In 1925 he graduated, with the rank of lieutenant colonel of artillery, from the Higher Military School in Warsaw. He was active in the coup of May 1926, being the chief of staff of Piłsudski’s main armed forces. From 1926 to 1930 he was the chief of staff of the minister for military affairs; between the end of August 1930 and December 1930 he was deputy prime minister and minister without portfolio in Piłsudski’s government. From 6 December 1930 he was vice minister, and from 2 November 1932, minister of foreign affairs. From 1935 he was a senator representing Warsaw.

Considered one of Piłsudski’s most trusted confidants, Beck was chosen by Piłsudski to realize his vision of Polish foreign policy. Taking into account that the international balance in Europe was disturbed and that collective security on the continent was undermined, Piłsudski recommended that Beck concentrate on strengthening Polish foreign policy. After Piłsudski’s death in May 1935, Beck tried to continue his policy, which consisted of maintaining an equal distance to both the Soviet Union and Germany. His efforts led to the signing of a non-aggression treaty with the USSR on 25 July 1932 and a non-aggression declaration with the Third Reich on 26 January 1934. On 5 May 1934 he extended the Polish-Soviet non-aggression treaty for ten years. He also sought the greater independence of Poland from France. He opposed Polish participation in collective agreements, fearing the violation of Polish interests by foreign powers. The policy of balancing between France and Germany, as well as between Germany and the USSR; Beck’s decisive attitude toward Lithuania in March 1938; his forcing Czechoslovakia to cede Zaolzie to Poland in October 1938; and lingering (though unjust) imputations of Beck’s having spied during his diplomatic mission in France—all these factors led to Beck’s unpopularity in the European capitals. At first Beck thought that Germany did not pose a great threat to Poland. However, in 1938 and 1939 he rejected German demands from Poland (the incorporation of Gdańsk to the Third Reich, the extraterritorial corridor, and accession to the Anti-Comintern Pact). After the annexation of Czechoslovakia by Germany Beck accepted the security guarantees given to Poland by Great Britain on 31 March 1939, and he signed an alliance with Great Britain based on the treaties of 6 April 1939 and 25 August 1939.

After the renunciation of the Polish-German declaration of non-aggression by Hitler in April, on 5 May 1939 Beck gave a now famous address in the Sejm. In it, he reacted to Hitler’s speech and to his demand for Lebensraum (living space) for the Germans. His words (“In Poland, we do not know the notion of peace at all cost. There is only one thing in the life of people, nations, and states that is invaluable. That thing is honor”) brought him temporary popularity in Poland. During the British-French-Soviet talks in Moscow in the summer of 1939 Beck consequently rejected Moscow’s demands for the right of the Red Army to march into Polish territory as an ally, because he feared that they would never leave Poland. The declaration of war on Germany by Great Britain and France on 3 September 1939 has been considered as Beck’s diplomatic success. Nonetheless, Poland did not receive the help of the two powers. Along with the entire government Beck crossed the border into Romania on the night of 17–18 September 1939. He was interned in Romania. His attempt to escape failed. He spent the rest of his life in exile. After 1939, his policy was the subject of criticism from various sides in Poland and was often presented in an unfavorable light in the Western countries and the USSR, where Polish raison d'état was generally not taken into consideration. The question of whether his policy had any alternative remains open. In exile Beck wrote Ostatni raport (The last report; 1946), in which he explained his policy. (PK)

Sources: Czy wiesz, kto to jest? (Warsaw, 1937); Stanisław Mackiewicz, Polityka Becka (Paris, 1964); Doman Rogoyski, "Pułk. Józef Beck więźniem w Rumunii," Zeszyty Historyczne, 1970, no. 18; P. Starzeński, Trzy lata z Beckiem (London, 1972); Olgierd Terlecki, Pułkownik Beck (Kraków, 1985); Andrzej Albert (Wojciech Roszkowski), Najnowsza historia Polski 1914–1993, vol. 1 (Warsaw, 1995); Słownik polityków polskich XX w. (Poznań, 1998).

BEDNORZ Herbert (22 September 1908, Gliwice–12 April 1989, Katowice), Polish bishop. The son of a metalworker and Polish independence activist, after the division of Upper Silesia in 1922 Bendorz, along with his family, had to move to Katowice, where he graduated from high school. He studied at the Theological Department of the Jagiellonian University and at the Theological Seminary in Kraków. In June 1932 he was ordained and left for Louvain and Paris, where he received a Ph.D. He specialized in Catholic social teachings and canon law. After his return in 1937, he became secretary general of the Catholic Youth Association. During the German occupation he worked in the Brzeziny parish. From March 1946 he headed the ministry department of the Katowice curia. On 24 December he was consecrated auxiliary bishop of the Katowice diocese. On 4 November 1952 he was arrested for preparing an appeal to restore religious instruction in the schools and forced to move out of his diocese. He settled in Poznań, maintaining contacts with priests loyal to the purged bishops. In November 1956 he returned to Katowice, and after the death of Bishop Stanisław Adamski, on 12 November 1967 he became ordinary bishop of the Katowice diocese. Pope John XIII appointed him one of the consultants responsible for preparing the Second Vatican Council. He cooperated with the commission for the laity and mass media. He took part in four sessions of the council and served as the spokesman of the Polish Episcopate. He gave special attention to the ministry of workers and chaired the Commission for Ministry to Workers of the Conference of the Polish Episcopate. He strove to obtain Communist permission to build new churches, especially in new housing areas of big towns. In 1972–75 he organized the first synod of the Katowice diocese attracting the participation of lay believers.

Bednorz was a spokesman for the religious and cultural rights of Silesians. He encouraged pilgrimages of various social groups to Piekary, which shaped the social, religious, and political formation of Upper Silesian workers. For more than a dozen years the main preacher in Piekary was the Kraków cardinal Karol Wojtyła, later Pope John Paul II. Bednorz protested against the four-brigade system of work in Silesian mining, which was introduced in the 1970s and deprived miners of free Sundays. During the summer 1980 strikes, his call for free Sundays became one of the main demands of the striking workers and was agreed to by the authorities in the Jastrzębie agreement. Bednorz supported ministry to the strikers and endeavors to unite Solidarity structures in Upper Silesia and the Dąbrowskie region. During the period of martial law he repeatedly appealed to the authorities to free Solidarity activists. In March 1982 he established the Episcopal Committee of Relief to the Imprisoned and Interned. He also defended the cross, placed in front of the so-called Wujek mine, where riot police shot several miners in December 1981 and which was devastated by the security police. Caring for the formation of clerics, Bednorz, as the only bishop in Poland, sent them to a yearly training session in factories. In June 1983 he welcomed Pope John Paul II at Muchowiec Airfield, near Katowice, in the name of half a million believers. When Bednorz turned seventy-five, he offered his resignation and retired after the appointment of his successor in June 1985. (AGr)

Sources: Słownik Biograficzny Katolickiego Duchowieństwa Śląskiego XIX i XX wieku (Katowice, 1996); Leksykon duchowieństwa represjonowanego w PRL w latach 1945–1989, vol. 1 (Warsaw, 2002); Jerzy Myszor, Historia diecezji katowickiej (Katowice, 1996); Jerzy Myszor, "Życie i działalność ks. biskupa Herberta Bednorza (1908–1989): Szkic biograficzny," Śląskie Studia Historyczno-Teologiczne, 1989, vol. 22; Andrzej Grajewski, Wygnanie, Diecezja katowicka w czasach stalinowskich (Katowice, 2003).

BEGMA Vasył (1 January 1906, Odessa–12 August 1965, Kiev), Soviet Communist activist in the Ukraine. In 1927 Begma joined the Communist Party, and from 1928 he held executive posts in the Komsomol, in trade unions, and in the Communist Party apparatus in the Kherson, Dnepropetrovsk, and Kharkiv regions. In 1938 he became secretary of the regional committee of the Communist Party (Bolshevik) of the Ukraine (CP[B]U) in Kiev. After the Polish Eastern Borderland was incorporated into the USSR, in 1939–41 Begma was first secretary of the regional party committee in Równe, supervising Soviet deportations. From 1940 he was a member of the Central Committee (CC) of the CP(B)U. In 1941–42 he belonged to the War Council of the Twelfth Army. In 1942–44 he was secretary of a secret CP(B)U committee in Równe, head of the regional partisan staff, and commander of a guerrilla detachment that operated against the Germans and against the Polish underground army. As a reward he was promoted to the rank of major general. From 1944 to 1949 he was first secretary of the regional party committee in Równe again, and in 1950–59 he was head of the party committee in Khmelnytskyi. From 1959 he was head of a CP(B)U CC department. He was also a deputy to the Supreme Council of the USSR and the Ukrainian SSR. (GM)

Sources: Ukrainska Radianska Encyklopediya, vol. 1 (Kiev, 1977); Mieczysław Juchniewicz, Polacy w radzieckim ruchu partyzanckim 1941–1945 (Warsaw, 1975).

BELISHOVA Liri (14 October 1926, Belishovë, near Ballsh), Albanian Communist activist. Born into a Muslim white-collar family, Belishova studied in Berat and in a training school for girls in Tirana. Attracted by the aims of Liri Gega, from 1940 she was affiliated with a Communist group in Shkodër. In February 1943 she joined the Communist Party and then became a member of the leadership of a Communist youth organization in Tirana. Suspended from school for taking part in an anti-Italian demonstration in July 1943, in which she lost an eye, in October 1944 she returned to Albania after an operation in a British hospital. She became a member of the secretariat of the Albanian Anti-Fascist Youth and of the Central Committee (CC) of the Communist Party of Albania (CPA), and from 1945 she was a member of the General Council of the Communist-controlled Democratic Front. She was in favor of the CPA's independence from the Yugoslav party and was in opposition to the Koçi Xoxe faction. After the death of her husband, Nako Spiru, who allegedly committed suicide in 1947, Belishova was dismissed from the CC and the Communist youth organization, and she headed a social service department in the government.

At the First CPA Congress in November 1948, when the name of the party was changed to the Albanian Party of Labor and when Xoxe was dismissed, Belishova, at the age of twenty-two, became a member of the Politburo. From 1948 she was a deputy to the Popular Assembly (Kuvendi Popullor) and from 1950, secretary of the parliament presidium. From 1951 to 1954 she studied, along with Ramiz Alia, at the Institute of Marxism-Leninism in Moscow. She was a member of the Albanian delegation to Stalin's funeral in March 1953. Later she dealt with propaganda. She was dismissed from the party leadership in June 1960 in connection with her visit to the (Communist) World Council of Trade Unions, where she openly supported the Soviet standpoint and then reported to the Soviets about Chinese intentions and suspended a publication praising Stalin and criticizing resolutions of the Twentieth Congress of the Soviet party. In September 1960 she became head of a primary school in Tirana and then a teacher in Goranzi, near Gjirokaster. When her second husband was dismissed from a ministerial position, she was deprived of work. In May 1961 she was removed from the party and interned with her family, first in Kuç, near Vlory; then in Progonat; and finally in Cerrik, near Elbasan. Released in May 1991, she first lived in Cerrik, and then she returned to Tirana. She attracted public attention again on 12 June 1991 when, in an interview for Rilindja Demokratike, she accused Enver Hoxha of assassinating Spiru. (TC)

Sources: Raymond Hutchings, Historical Dictionary of Albania (Lanham, Md., 1996); William Griffith, Albania and the Sino-Soviet Rift (Cambridge, 1963); Henry Hamm, Albania: China's Beachhead in Europe (London, 1963); interview with Liri Belishova by Tadeusz Czekalski, 10 February 2002, Tirana.

BELŠEVICA Vizma [originally Elsberga] (30 May 1931, Riga), Latvian poet. Belševica graduated from a trade school (1948), a technical school for cultural workers (1955), and the Maksim Gorky Literary Institute in Moscow (1961). For many years she worked as a journalist for the periodical Pionieris in Riga. She made her literary debut in 1947. From 1958 she was a member of the Association of Latvian Writers. In the poems published in the collections Visu ziemu šogad pavasaris (This year it is spring all through the wintertime; 1955) and Zemes siltums (The warmth of the earth; 1959) she dealt with the relationship between an individual and society, with human dignity, and with the persistence of the national consciousness despite totalitarian pressures. In 1959 she published a poem, Piezīmes uz Livonijas Indriķa hronikas malām (Notes in the margins of the chronicle of Henry of Livonia), in which she alluded to the enslavement of the Latvian nation by the Soviets. Despite her rich vocabulary and style, she often used simple expressions. On the wave of the cultural revival in the early 1960s she published the collections Jūra deg (The sea aflame; 1966) and Gadu gredzeni (Rings of years; 1969), which were seriously attacked by the party leadership. In 1970–74 her works were banned from publication. In 1987 she published Dzeltu laiks (The leaves of time grow yellow). She also authored a novel, Ķikuraga stāsti (Kikuraga tales; 1965), and numerous short stories, collected in Nelāime mājās (Misfortune at home; 1979); she also translated from English and Russian. In 1988–90 she was the head of the Latvian PEN club. Decorated with the Order of the Three Stars of Latvia, she is an honorary member of the Latvian Academy of Sciences. (EJ)

Sources: Latviešu rakstniecība biogrāfijās (Riga, 1992); Who Is Who in Latvia (Riga, 1996); Wielka encyklopedia PWN, vol. 3 (Warsaw, 2001); R. Admiņš, “‘Pārsāpētās dzejaas’ dzimšana un atdzimšana," Karogs, 1981, no. 5; Andrejs Plakans, Historical Dictionary of Latvia (Lanham, Md., 1997).

BENEŠ Edvard (28 May 1884, Kožlany, near Plzeň–3 September 1948, Sezimovo Ústí near Tábor), Czech diplomat and politician. Beneš graduated from a Vinohrady high school in Prague in 1904, and then he studied philology, philosophy, and sociology at the Department of Philosophy of Charles University in Prague. It was there that he met his mentor and future friend, Tomáš Garrigue Masaryk. In 1905 Beneš left for France, where he studied sociology and political science at the Sorbonne and the École Libre des Sciences Politiques, as well as law at the University of Dijon, where he received a Ph.D. in 1908. In 1906 he also studied in London, and in 1907–8, in Berlin. In 1909 he returned to Prague, where he received a Ph.D. in philosophy. From 1909 to 1915 he lectured at a trade school; from 1912 he was associate professor at Prague University and, from 1913, also at the Prague Polytechnic. In 1921 he became professor of sociology at Charles University. Initially he was close to Social Democracy, and while abroad he wrote for its organ, Právo lidu. Later he turned to the Czech Progressive Party (Česká Strana Pokroková) of Masaryk. Before World War I he, like Masaryk, thought the best solution for the Czechs would be to convert the Habsburg monarchy into a federation.

After the outbreak of World War I Beneš co-founded an anti-Habsburg independence movement led by an informal group called Mafia (Maffie). On 3 September 1915 he went to Paris, from where, along with Masaryk and Milan R. Štefánik, he guided Czechoslovak policies in exile. In 1916–18 he was secretary general of the Czechoslovak National Council in Paris, trying to attract Western powers to the idea of an independent Czechoslovak state. He established close contacts with French freemasonry. He was the right-hand man of Masaryk, and during the latter's trip to Russia and the United States from May 1917 to the end of the war Beneš was actually in charge of the movement abroad. In February 1918 he signed an agreement on the creation of a Czechoslovak army in France. On 14 October 1918 he established a provisional government in Paris and took over its foreign and interior ministries. In late October 1918 he took part in the Geneva talks between the foreign and domestic centers of the independence movement on the shape of the future Czechoslovak state.

Thanks to the unlimited trust of President Masaryk, from November 1918 to December 1935 Beneš was foreign minister. His affiliation to freemasonry was also helpful. From 20 September 1921 to 8 October 1922 he was also prime minister. He had an overwhelming influence on the Czechoslovak foreign policy of the 1920s and 1930s. It was based on cooperation with France (a mutual aid treaty of 25 January 1924) and within the Little Entente (Czechoslovakia, Romania, and Yugoslavia). He was co-founder of the League of Nations, in which he held important positions. In 1920 he was its vice-president; in 1923–27 he was a member of its council, and in 1935, president. In 1919–20, along with Prime Minister Karel Kramář, he took part in the Paris Peace Conference and succeeded in achieving most of the Czechoslovak territorial demands. In view of the growing German danger, on 16 May 1935 he signed an alliance with the USSR.

In domestic policy Beneš belonged to the inner circle of Masaryk's Castle group (Hrad), from 1923 to 1933 he was one of the leaders of the Czechoslovak Socialist Nationalist Party, and in 1919–26 and 1929–35 he was MP on its behalf. After President Masaryk resigned in 1935, Beneš was his candidate to succeed him, and, after overcoming resistance from the rightist MPs, on 18 December 1935 he was elected president. He assumed this position in an increasingly aggravated international situation. Initially his priority was a peaceful solution to nationality problems (especially coming to terms with the Sudeten Germans) in the face of growing pressure from the Third Reich. He counted on the cooperation of Western democracies and the USSR. In late 1936 he passed information to the Kremlin on alleged contacts of high Soviet officers with Germany, which indirectly contributed to a bloody purge in the Red Army. His policies failed. Pressed by Great Britain and France, in September 1938 he had to accept the Pact of Munich and cede the Sudetenland to Germany. On 5 October 1938 he resigned and left for London. In February 1939 he went to the United States and lectured at the University of Chicago. In July 1939 he returned to England.

After the outbreak of World War II, Beneš returned to active politics. Despite problems with his earlier resignation, he managed to resume rule as Czechoslovak president-in-exile and to establish a government in exile in London in July 1940. He strove for the restoration of Czechoslovakia's prewar borders and for the resettlement of the German population. He won recognition of his government from Western allies. Realizing the inevitability of postwar Soviet domination in Central Europe and not trusting the Western powers after the Pact of Munich, Beneš wanted to establish good relations with the USSR. This policy resulted in a new Czechoslovak-Soviet alliance, signed on 12 December 1943. Beneš's compliance toward Stalin is sometimes explained by the suspicion, based on quite credible sources, that he might have collaborated with Soviet intelligence.

In April 1945 Beneš appointed the first government of postwar Czechoslovakia, the so-called Košice government, which included Communist ministers. On 16 May 1945 he triumphantly returned to Prague as president of the new state. In June 1945 he passed decrees on the punishment of Hitlerite war criminals and traitors, as well as on the resettlement and expropriation of Sudeten Germans. From 1945 to 1948 he seemed a symbol of continuity of democratic Czechoslovakia, but he failed to oppose Communist strategies of takeover, and during the coup of February 1948, under pressure from Klement Gottwald, he accepted the resignation of democratic ministers; this was a forewarning of full Communist control. In May 1948 he refused to sign a new, Stalinist constitution. On 7 June 1948 he resigned, and soon he died.

Beneš was the author of a number of works in sociology and political science, including the following: Le problème autrichien et la question tchèque (The Austrian problem and the Czech question; 1908); Otázka národnostní (The question of nationality; 1909); Stručný nástin vývoje moderního socialismu (Outline of development of modern socialism, 4 vols.; 1910–11); Stranictví (Party membership; 1912); Democracy Today and Tomorrow (1939); and Úvahy o slovanství (Slav character; 1944). He also published the memoirs Světová válka a naše revoluce (My war memoirs, 1928; 1927–28); Paměti: Od Mnichova k nové válce a novému vítězství (1947; From Munich to New War and New Victory, 1954); and Mnichovské dny (Munich days; 1968). He also published numerous collections of speeches, some of them in English. (PU)

Sources: ČBS; Kdo byl kdo v našich dějinách ve 20. století, vol. 1 (Prague 1998); Politická elita meziválečného Československa 1918–1938. Kdo byl kdo za první republiky (Prague 1998); Kto bol kto za I. ČSR (Bratislava, 1993); Ferdinand Peroutka, Byl Edvard Beneš vinen? (Paris, 1950); R.W. Seton-Watson, A History of the Czechs and Slovaks (Hamden, Conn., 1965); Ludwik Hass, Ambicje, rachuby, rzeczywistość: Wolnomularstwo w Europie Środkowo-Wschodniej 1905–1928 (Warsaw, 1984); František Havlíček, Eduard Beneš—člověk, sociolog, politik (Prague, 1991); Karel Kaplan, Poslední rok presidenta: Edvard Beneš v roce 1948 (Prague, 1993); Eduard Táborický, President Beneš mezi Západem a Východem (Prague, 1993); Josef Hanzal, Edvard Beneš (Prague, 1994); Igor Lukes, Czechoslovakia between Stalin and Hitler: The Diplomacy of Edvard Beneš in the 1930s (Oxford, 1996); Antonín Klimek, Zbyněk Zeman, The Life of Edvard Beneš: Czechoslovakia in Peace and War (Oxford, 1997); Nigel West, Venona: The Greatest Secret of the Cold War (London, 1999); Piotr Majewski, Edvard Beneš i kwestia niemiecka w Czechach (Warsaw, 2001).

BENKE Valéria (26 June 1920, Gyöng), Hungarian Communist activist. The daughter of a watchmaker, after high school Benke started to study pedagogy, but she broke off her studies because of World War II. In 1941 she joined the Social Democratic Party, and in 1944, the Hungarian Communist Party (HCP). From 1943 she worked as a country teacher in southern Hungary. When in March 1944 Hungary was occupied by Germany, she helped to hide worker activists from Szeged. In the spring of 1945 she graduated from an HCP school in Debrecen and became lecturer of the central party school. From the summer of 1946 she worked in the HCP committee in the Tenth Quarter of Budapest and later in the Budapest city party committee. From July 1947 she worked in the HCP Central Committee (CC) Secretariat for Women, from 1948 to the end of 1950 she was secretary of the Budapest committee of the (Communist) Democratic Union of Hungarian Women, and from 1949 to 1971 she was an MP. In 1951–54 she was secretary of the All-National Peace Council. At the same time she was a deputy member, and until October 1956 a member, of the CC of the (Communist) Hungarian Workers' Party. Chairman of Hungarian Radio from 1954, on 23 October 1956 she refused to allow Budapest demonstrators to present their demands on the air. A week later she was dismissed, but on 6 November 1956 the new government of János Kádár appointed her a special radio commissar. In February 1957 she was coopted to the CC of the Hungarian Socialist Workers' Party (HSWP). From January 1957 she was deputy chairman, and from August 1957 chairman, of Hungarian Radio and Television. In 1957 she finally graduated from Budapest University, although her intellectual capabilities were the subject of many jokes. From January 1958 to September 1961 she was minister of culture and education. From 1961 she was editor-in-chief, and from 1966 to 1988 chairman, of the editorial board of the monthly Társadalmi Szemle, a theoretical organ of the Communist Party. In 1967–71 she belonged to the Presidential Council. From 1970 to 1985 a member of the HSWP CC Politburo, in 1970–75 she was responsible for agitation and propaganda. In December 1988 she retired. (JT)

Sources: Magyar Nagylexikon, vol. 3 (Budapest, 1994); A magyar forradalom és szabadságharc enciklopédiája, CD-ROM, 1956-os Intézet (Budapest, 1999); Ki kicsoda 2000 (Budapest, 2001).

BERAN Josef (29 December 1888, Plzeň–17 May 1969, Rome), Czech cardinal, Primate of Bohemia. The son of a teacher, in 1907–11 Beran studied at the Papal University in Rome, where he was ordained in 1911. After returning to Bohemia, he defended a Ph.D. in theology. In 1912–17 he worked in the parish of Chyšín and then in Prague. From 1917 to 1928 he was a teacher and then director of St. Ann Training School for Girls in Prague. From 1929 he lectured in theology in the Prague metropolitan seminary, and in 1932 he became rector of this seminary. He also lectured in pedagogy at the Theological Faculty of Charles University in Prague. During the Nazi occupation he maintained contacts with the Czech resistance. After the assassination of Reich Protector Reinhard Heydrich, in May 1942 Beran was taken hostage by the Gestapo and sent to the Terezin concentration camp in July 1942. In 1943 he was moved to the camp in Dachau, where he met some of the Czech Communist activists.

On 25 May 1945 Beran returned to the Prague seminary. From 1941, when Cardinal Karel Kašpar died, the Prague metropolis had no bishop. Because of Beran's good contacts with the ruling circles and his moral authority, Pope Pius XII appointed him the Prague metropolitan and then the Primate of Bohemia on 4 November 1946. Beran took over the Prague archbishopric a week later, and he started efforts to reconstruct the church organization, increase priestly vocations, and revitalize popular piety. He paid special attention to the all-Czech celebrations of St. Adalbert (Vojtech), which attracted thousands of believers throughout the country. At the same time he protested steps by the authorities to limit religious freedom that threatened the unity of the Catholic Church. As head of the Conference of the Czech Episcopate, he opposed attempts by the state to organize so-called patriotic priests in the Catholic Action. During the Communist coup of February 1948, he issued a pastoral letter, Nemič arcibiskupe! Nesmiš mlčet! (Do not remain silent, Archbishop! You must not remain silent!), in which he condemned the totalitarian actions of the Communist Party of Czechoslovakia. In a series of articles in the daily Lidova demorace he pointed to the democratic mechanisms of interwar Czechoslovakia as a pattern to follow. He agreed to celebrate a solemn service in St. Vitus Cathedral in Prague on the occasion of Klement Gottwald's becoming president, but on 15 June 1948 he issued a letter to believers presenting the authorities with six major demands of religious freedom.

On 19 June 1949 the Communists provoked unrest during the Corpus Christi celebrations in Prague. The militia intervened, beating and arresting many participants, while Beran was interned in the archbishop's palace. Not willing to risk an international scandal, the Communists did not give him a show trial, but they kept him in prison without trial in various places until 1963, when he was released thanks to a temporary "thaw." He was not allowed to return to Prague and was forced to stay in a home for the aged, first in Mukařov and later in Radvanov in southern Bohemia. On 22 February 1965 Pope Paul VI appointed him cardinal. A few days earlier a special Vatican envoy, Archbishop Agostino Casaroli, had met with him and had presented to him the conditions agreed upon with the Communist authorities: Beran was to leave Czechoslovakia, and in exchange the Prague archbishopric would get an apostolic administrator in the person of Bishop František Tomašek. Beran agreed, and on 19 February 1965 he left for Rome. In exile he continued to be involved in the church affairs of Czechoslovakia. He often spoke in defense of religious freedom and visited Czech communities in Western Europe and America. During the Second Vatican Council he delivered a homily on tolerance, O svobode svědomi (On the liberty of conscience), in which, among other things, he appealed for the church rehabilitation of Jan Hus. He welcomed the Prague Spring of 1968 and began preparations to come back to Prague. A serious illness forced him to change these plans, and the Warsaw Pact invasion of August 1968 made them impossible. After the suicide of Jan Palach, he appealed for respect for the sovereignty of the nation and paid homage to Palach. Procedures toward his beatification started in Prague in 1990. Beran was the author of many works in theology and the history of the church, including Blahoslavená Anežka Česká (Blessed Agnes of Bohemia; 1974) and an autobiographical volume, Velká mše (The Great Holy Mass). (AGr)

Sources: ČBS; Josef Tomeš et al., Česky Biografický Slovník XX. Století (Prague, 1999); Maria Teresa Carloni, Il cardinale scomodo: Il Card. Giuseppe Beran, arcivescovo di Praga (Urbano, 1972); Bohdan Cywiński, I was prześladować będą (Lublin and Rome, 1990); Václav Vaško, Neumlčená: Kronika Katolické Cirkve v Československu po druhé světové válce (Prague, 1990); Karel Kaplan, Stát a Cirkve v Československu 1948–1953 (Brno, 1993); Hansjakob Stehle, Eastern Politics of the Vatican 1917–1979 (Athens, Ohio, 1981); Cardinal Agostino Casaroli, Il martirio della pazienza: La Stante Sede e i paesi comunisti 1963–1989 (Turin, 2000).

BERAN Rudolf (28 December 1887, Pracejovice–28 February 1954, Leopoldov), Czech Agrarian politician. Beran came from a family of smallholders. In 1905 he graduated from an agricultural vocational school in Strahonice, and he began his political activities, taking up work in the secretariat of the Czech Agrarian Party (Česká Strana Agrární) in Prague. In 1909 he became secretary of the Union of Agrarian Youth. He became known as one of the main organizers of the Agrarian Party and of the agricultural cooperative movement in south Bohemia. Thanks to his organizational skills, he became an important figure among Agrarians and a close associate of Antonín Švehla. After the formation of Czechoslovakia he held the post of secretary general of the Agrarian Party for fifteen years; as of 1922 the party was known as the Republican Party of Peasants and Smallholders (Republikánská Strana Zemědělského a Maloroľnického Lidu). He took an active role in shaping the local organs of the party; as a result, in the first elections in April 1920, the Agrarians gained forty-two parliamentary seats and nineteen senatorial seats. Throughout the interwar period he sat in the National Assembly and was president of the parliamentary club of the Agrarians.

Beran had strong influence within the party, and after Švehla's withdrawal from political life in 1927, his role became even more important. In 1933 he was incumbent vice-president of the party, and in 1935 he was unanimously elected its president. In his view, he was a representative of the right wing of the Agrarians. He was in favor of strong-handed rule, and in foreign policy he advocated cooperation with Germany. This led to conflict with Edvard Beneš, the main architect of Czechoslovak foreign policy. In 1935 Beran tried to form a bloc in parliament in order to prevent the election of Beneš as president of Czechoslovakia and to push the candidacy of Bohumil Němec. After his attempts failed, Beran began to lean toward cooperation with the Sudeten German Party (Sudetendeutsche Partei [SdP]), with the Slovak People's Party of Reverend Andrij Hlinka, and with the Czech Fascist parties.

After the Munich dictate Beran became president of the Party of National Unity (Strana Národní Jednoty), which was subservient to Germany, and between 1 December 1938 and 15 March 1939 he was simultaneously prime minister of the Second Czechoslovak Republic. At that time he had to deal with many social and economic problems linked to the mass influx of refugees from the territories occupied by the Third Reich and from Slovakia. After the German invasion, as head of the government of the German Protectorate of Bohemia and Moravia (16 March–27 April 1939), he received Hitler and Reich Protector Konstantin von Neurath in Prague. After resigning, Beran maintained contacts with the resistance movement, mainly with the Defense of the Nation (Obrana Národa), a national organization that he supported financially. Arrested by the Gestapo in June 1942, he was sentenced to ten years. Released in 1943, he was held under house arrest until the liberation in 1945. However, he was soon imprisoned again, and in April 1947 he was sentenced to twenty years and his property was confiscated because of his collaboration with the Third Reich. He died in prison. (PU)

Sources: ČBS; Vojtech Masny, The Czechs under Nazi Rule (New York and London, 1971); Kto bol kto za I. ČSR (Bratislava, 1993); Libor Vukoupil, Slovník českých dějin (Brno, 2000); Českoslovenští politici: 1918–1991 (Prague, 1991); Politická elita meziválečného Československa 1918–1938: Kdo byl kdo za první republiky (Prague, 1998); Kdo byl kdo v našich dějinách ve 20. století, vol. 1 (Prague, 1998).

BERDNYK Oleksandr (Oles') (25 November 1927, Vavilovo, near Mikolaiiv), Ukrainian writer and dissident. From 1943 to 1945 Berdnyk fought on the front lines. After high school, in 1949 he graduated in theater studies at the Ivan Franko Memorial Dramatic Theater in Kiev, where he also worked as an actor. In 1950 he was sentenced to ten years in a labor camp for protesting the denunciation and propagandistic treatment of classical literature. He was imprisoned in the northern Russian camps and in Kazakhstan. Released owing to an amnesty in 1955, he returned to Kiev, joined the Association of Ukrainian Writers (AUW), and started writing. He won recognition as an author of science fiction. Among other things, he published two collections of short stories, Poza chasom i prostorom (Beyond time and space; 1957) and Marsiians'ki zaitsi (Hares of Mars; 1962), and the following novels: Liudyna bez sertsia (A man without a heart [with Yuri Bedzyk]; 1958); Shliakhy tytaniv (Paths of titans; 1959); Dity bezmezzhia (Children of infinity; 1964); Khto ty? (Who are you? 1966); Chasha Amrity (Amrita's cup; 1971); and Zoryanyi korsar (Star pirate; 1971).

Berdnyk lived in Mykola Rudenko's house. In April 1972 during a search there the Soviet police confiscated a work by Ivan Dziuba, Internatsionalizm chy rusyfikatsiia? (Internationalism or Russification?), and typewriters. Berdnyk's response, a sixteen-day hunger strike, led to a meeting with the first secretary of the Communist Party of the Ukraine (CPU), Petro Shelest, and to the return of the confiscated items, but Berdnyk's works were subjected to ideological criticism for their futuristic ideas and defense of religion. In May 1973 he was dismissed from the CPU, in 1974 he was denied permission to leave the USSR, and in 1976 his books were removed from libraries. On 9 November 1976 he, along with Rudenko, Oksana Meshko, and Levko Lukyanenko, founded the Ukrainian Helsinki Group (UHG). In 1976 and 1979 Berdnyk signed memoranda to the Soviet authorities and to international public opinion in defense of the persecuted. In November 1977 he authored the Manifesto of the Ukrainian Movement for the Defense of Human Rights, and in May 1978, an open letter to the UN Human Rights Commission. He went on a hunger strike again, demanding the release of Rudenko. Arrested in March 1979, in December 1979 Berdnyk was sentenced to six years of labor camp and three years of exile. He spent 1980–81 in a camp in Kuchino, near Perm. Amnestied in March 1984, he distanced himself from other dissidents. In 1987 he founded the Noospheric Front, whose aim was to defend the values accumulated through centuries of "cosmo-history" against contemporary "pseudocivilization." From December 1989 he presided over an association called the Spiritual Republic of Ukraine and edited the periodicals

Svyata Ukraina and Zhoda. In 1991 he ran for the Ukrainian presidency but lost. Four collections of his uncensored works were published in the West: Zoloti vorota (The golden gate; 1975); Blakymni koval (Blue smith; 1975); Ukraina Sichi Vohnyanoi (Ukraine of the Burning Sich; 1977); and Svyata Ukraina (Holy Ukraine; 1980). These were also published in the Ukraine after 1990. (TS)

Sources: Encyclopedia of Ukraine, vol. 1 (Toronto, 1984); Informatsiini byuleteni Ukrainiskoi hromadskoi hrupy spryannja vykonanniū Helsinkykh ugod (Baltimore and Toronto, 1981); Ukrainska Helsinska Hrupa 1978–1982 (Toronto and Baltimore, 1983); Ludmila Aleksieyeva, Istorija inakomyshja v SSSR (Vilnius and Moscow, 1992); Hrihoriy Kasyanov, Nezhodni: Ukrainiska intelihentsiia w rusi oporu 1960–80 rokiv (Kiev, 1995); Anatoliy Rusnachenko, Natsionalno-vyzvolnyi rukh w Ukraini (Kiev, 1998); Bohdan Nahaylo, The Ukrainian Resurgence (Toronto, 1999).

BERECZ János (18 September 1930, Ibrány), Hungarian Communist activist. Berecz joined the Hungarian Workers' Party (HWP) in 1951. In 1955 he graduated from the Lenin Memorial Institute, and in 1966 from the Academy of Social Sciences of the Central Committee (CC) of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union in Moscow. Gradually advancing in the ranks of the Communist youth organization, in 1966 he became secretary of the Hungarian Socialist Workers' Party (HSWP) committee in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. From 1972 he was deputy head, and from 1974 head, of the Foreign Affairs Department of the HSWP CC. In 1982–85 he was editor-in-chief of the party daily, Népszabadság, and from 1985 to 1989 he was HSWP CC secretary for ideology and propaganda. From 1980 he was member of the CC, and from 1987, of the CC Politburo. From 1985 to 1990 he was MP and head of the parliamentary commission of foreign affairs. In the 1980s he belonged to the top party leadership, and he had substantial influence on cultural policies. He authored many articles and several books, trying to legitimize communism in Hungary. His work Ellenforradalom tollal és fegyverrel 1956 (Counterrevolution by pen and arms, 1956; 1969) was an official version of the history of the 1950s and of the revolution of 1956, and it was read both at home and, thanks to numerous translations, in other Communist countries. Soon after the HSWP was transformed into the Hungarian Socialist Party in 1989, Berecz reestablished an orthodox Communist HSWP and belonged to its top leadership until 1991. Later he gave up politics but always defended communism and HSWP policies. (MS)

Sources: Politikus pályák (Budapest, 1984); Klaus-Detlev Grothusen, ed., Ungarn (Göttingen, 1987); Miklós Molnár, From Béla Kun to János Kádár: Seventy Years of Hungarian Communism (New York, 1990); Ki kicsoda 2002 (Budapest, 2001).

BERISHA Sali Ram (15 October 1944, Tropoje), Albanian politician and doctor. Born into a Muslim peasant family, in 1967 Berisha graduated from the medical school of the university in Tirana. Later he lectured there. At the same time he worked as a cardiologist in a hospital, where he headed the Albanian Labor Party (ALP) cell. In the 1970s he went abroad several times, which was only possible among the ruling elite. He continued specialized studies in cardiology in France on a UNESCO scholarship. He authored several articles in cardiology that were published in European periodicals. In 1986 he was elected a member of the European Commission of Doctors in Copenhagen. In 1988 he received a Ph.D., and in 1989 he became a full professor. Enjoying relative freedom, even during the rule of Enver Hoxha Berisha could read his favorite French authors, Jean-Paul Sartre and Albert Camus, unavailable to most Albanians. For many years he was the personal doctor of Hysni Kapo, but he also treated other members of the leadership, including Hoxha.

In April 1990 Berisha left the ALP, and then he published a number of articles pointing to the necessity of introducing democracy into Albania. These articles were published with the silent consent of the party leadership, which in this way helped him become a political figure. In December 1990 Berisha co-organized student demonstrations and the Democratic Student Movement. On 12 December 1990 he was co-founder of the Party of Youth and Intellectuals, which after a couple of days took the name of the Albanian Democratic Party (Partia Demokratike e Shqipërisë [ADP]) and was the first legal opposition party since World War II. In March 1991 Berisha was elected MP in the National Assembly. In the next parliamentary elections, in March 1992, he gained 98 percent of the vote in the Kavaje district. On 8 April 1992 the National Assembly chose him as president.

Initially Berisha enjoyed Western support, since he was recognized as one of the most credible Balkan politicians and was praised for his support for market reforms. His collaborators from the ADP were of a different opinion, accusing him of autocratic tendencies. He was re-elected president on 3 March 1997, under increasing political crisis and an opposition boycott. Faced with the possible collapse of the state administration, caused, among other things, by the collapse of financial pyramids, Berisha agreed to a coalition government and earlier elections, but he refused to step down. As a result, on 4 June 1997 he barely escaped an attempt on his life in the south of Albania. Under pressure from the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe and after his party lost the election to the post-Communist Albanian Socialist Party, on 23 July 1997 Berisha finally resigned. In January 1998, not willing to accept the results of the election, he demanded the dissolution of the parliament and new elections. After the assassination of Azem Hajdari, in September 1998 the post-Communists accused Berisha of an attempted coup. He was stripped of immunity but not arrested. Despite another election loss and a split in the ADP, in 2001 Berisha was elected its chairman. (TC)

Sources: “Sali Berisha,” Rilindja Demokratike, 15 October 1994; Raymond Hutchings, Historical Dictionary of Albania (Lanham, Md., 1996); Elez Biberaj, Shqipëria ne tranzicion: Rruga e vështrisë drejt Demokracisë (Tirana, 2001); Miranda Vickers and James Pettifor, Albania: From Anarchy to a Balkan Identity (New York, 1997); Bugajski; www.rulers.org.

BERĶIS Krišjānis (26 April 1884, Īslīces, Courland–December 1941, concentration camp near Perm), Latvian general. Berķis came from a peasant family. After completing a municipal school in Bauska, he joined the Russian Army. In 1906 he graduated from the Junker School in Vilnius (Wilno) and served as officer in the second regiment of Finnish riflemen in Helsingfors. During World War I he was commander of a company and then a battalion, and in 1917 he was transferred to the sixth regiment of the Latvian Riflemen. He rose to the rank of lieutenant colonel. Demobilized in December 1917, he stayed in Finland until the spring of 1919, when he returned to Latvia. In March 1919 he joined the Latvian Army. He was commander of a regiment, and from August 1919, of the Latgalian division. In 1925 he was appointed general. Between 1933 and 1934 he worked in the general staff of the army. From April 1934 he was commander of the Livonian division and chief of the Riga garrison. He took part in the coup of Kārlis Ulmanis of 15 May 1934. From November 1934 he was the commander-in-chief of the Latvian Army. On 5 April 1940 he was appointed minister of war. After the seizure of Latvia by the USSR, on 20 June 1940 Berķis was dismissed from his post and transferred to the reserves. Soon after, while attempting to leave for Finland, he was arrested in Tallinn and was deported to Russia, where he died. (EJ)

Sources: A. Berķis, Ģenerālis Krišjānis Berķis (Riga, 1995); Latvijas armijas augstākie virsnieki 1918–1940: Biogrāfiska vārdnīca (Riga, 1998).

BERKLAVS Eduārd (15 June 1914, Kuldīgas, Courland), Latvian Communist activist and dissident. After primary school Berklavs worked as a blue-collar laborer in Kuldīga and (from 1935) in Riga. He belonged to an illegal Communist youth organization, for which he was imprisoned in 1936–39. In 1939–40 he was a leader of the Union of Working Youth of Latvia. After the Soviet invasion of June 1940, he took an active part in the incorporation of Latvia into the USSR. From February 1941 he was second secretary of the Riga regional committee of the Communist Party of Latvia (CPL), and from 1941 to 1944 he served as an officer in the Red Army, advancing to the rank of major. Demobilized in 1946, he worked as first secretary of the Komsomol in Latvia. In 1951 he graduated from the Higher Party School in Moscow, and then he was active as secretary of the Riga party committee. From 1954 to 1956 and from 1958 to 1959 Berklavs was deputy chairman of the Council of Ministers of the Latvian SSR, and in 1957–58, first secretary of the Riga party committee.

Berklavs belonged to the leadership of a “national” wing of the party, which opposed the inflow of Russians into Latvia and strove for wider cultural autonomy in the Latvian SSR. At a meeting of the CPL Central Committee in early July 1959 Berklavs criticized the Russification policies of the Kremlin. Despite gaining some support in the CPL leadership, on 15 July 1959 he was dismissed from his position. Jānis Kalnbērziņš and Vilis Lacis, veterans of Soviet power in Latvia, were also dismissed for their defense of Berklavs, while the new CPL leader, Arvids Pelše, carried out a purge of the supporters of autonomy. Berklavs was soon sent to Vladimir, where he worked in the economic administration. In 1968 he returned to Latvia and worked as a white-collar and then a blue-collar worker in a Riga factory. In 1971 he signed a “Letter of 17 Latvian Communists” in protest against Russian colonization and the cultural Russification of Latvia. The letter was published in the West. Removed from the party, Berklavs was harassed by the KGB. On 18 June 1988 he signed the founding declaration of the Latvian National Independence Movement (Latvijas Nacionālas Neatkarības Kustība [LNIM]) and became one of its leaders. In November 1988 he represented Latvia at the conference of Baltic activists for the withdrawal of the Soviet Army from Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania. In 1988–91 he was a member of the Council of the Latvian Popular Front, and from 1990 he was MP of the Supreme Council of the Latvian SSR. After Latvia regained independence, in 1993–95 Berklavs was MP on behalf of the LNIM. His memoirs, Zināt un neaizmirst (To know and not to forget), were published in 1998. (EJ)

Sources: Romuald J. Misiunas and Rein Taagepera, The Baltic States: Years of Dependence 1940–1990 (Berkeley, 1993); Andrejs Plakans, The Latvians: A Short History (Stanford, 1995); Who Is Who in Latvia 1996: Biographical Dictionary (Riga, 1996); Jurijs Dreifelds, Latvia in Transition (Cambridge, 1996); Andrejs Plakans, Historical Dictionary of Latvia (Lanham, Md., 1997); Policy of Occupation Powers in Latvia, 1939–1991 (Riga, 1999); Bugajski.

BERLING Zygmunt (27 April 1896, Limanowa–11 July 1980, Warsaw), Polish officer, appointed general by Stalin. From 1912 Berling was a member of the Riflemen Society. From 1914 to 1918 he was in the Polish Legions and in the Polish Auxiliary Corps, and from the end of 1918 he served in the Polish Army. Between 1918 and 1919 he took part in the Polish-Ukrainian war and then, as a battalion commander, in the Polish-Soviet war. He was decorated with the Order of Virtuti Militari. In 1925 he graduated from the Military College in Warsaw. From 1925 to 1927 he was chief of staff of the Fifteenth Infantry Division, and in 1930–32 he served as chief of staff of the command of the district of the Fifth Corps in Kraków. From 1935 to 1937 he commanded an infantry regiment of the First Infantry Division of the Legions. After a conflict with General Stefan Dąb-Biernacki Berling was transferred to the command of an infantry regiment of the Second Infantry Division of the Legions. He squandered the property of his wife and then divorced her, leaving her and their children without means of support. Because of that, in July 1939 he was dismissed from service.

During the September campaign of 1939 he was in Wilno (Vilnius). After the Soviet invasion he was interned in the Starobielsk camp. He escaped the fate of the majority of Starobielsk prisoners—that is, transport to Kharkiv and death at the hands of the NKVD—and he was relocated in the Gryazovets camp. There he expressed a wish to cooperate with the USSR authorities without any political conditions. In November 1940 he was transferred to Malakhovka (the “villa of happiness”), where along with a couple of Polish officers he embarked on a project to organize a Polish division. After the signing of the Polish-Soviet treaty of July 1941 he became chief of staff of the Fifth Infantry Division of the Polish Army, commanded by General Władysław Anders, and later commander of the evacuation base in Krasnovodsk. In September 1942, after the evacuation of the army, Berling willingly stayed in the USSR, and until May 1943 he was at the disposal of the Soviet authorities. He was co-founder and activist of the Union of Polish Patriots (Związek Patriotów Polskich). From May 1943 he was an organizer and commander (until November 1943) of the First Tadeusz Kościuszko Infantry Division, which he commanded during the battle at Lenino. In August 1943 he was appointed general by the Kremlin, and he commanded the First Corps of the Polish Military Forces in the USSR. From May to July 1944 he was commander-in-chief and from July to October 1944 deputy commander-in-chief of the Polish Army in the USSR, commanding the First Polish Army both in the battles at Dęblin and Puławy, at Magnuszew bridgehead, and in the fights for Warsaw bridgeheads. Because of his attempt to come to the aid of the insurgents in Warsaw, Berling was dismissed from his position by the Soviet command and transferred to the post of deputy head of the defense department of the Polish Committee of National Liberation (PKWN).

In 1944–47 Berling was MP to the National Home Council (Krajowa Rada Narodowa [KRN]). After a conflict with leaders of the Polish Workers’ Party (PPR) and the PKWN, whom he denounced to the Kremlin as “Trotskyists,” he was permanently dismissed from command of the troops. From January 1945 to February 1947 he studied at the Kliment Voroshilov Academy of the General Staff in Moscow. In 1947–48 he was a co-organizer, and from 1948 to 1953 commander, of the Academy of the General Staff at Rembertów. He retired in 1953. Between 1953 and 1956 he was undersecretary of state in the Ministry of State Farms and then in the Ministry of Agriculture in 1956–57. From 1957 to 1970 he was inspector general of hunting, and from 1963, a member of the Polish United Workers’ Party (Polska Zjednoczona Partia Robotnicza [PUWP]). He was the author of the three-volume Wspomnienia (Memoirs; 1990–91). He was considered a hero by former soldiers of the Polish Army in the USSR while regarded a traitor by other soldiers. (WD)

Sources: Jan Nowak, “Sprawa Generała Berlinga,” Zeszyty Historyczne, 1976, no. 37; A. Topol, Zygmunt Henryk Berling 1896–1980 (Katowice, 1990); Stanisław Jaczyński, Zygmunt Berling (Warsaw, 1993); Daniel Bargielowski, Konterfekt renegata (Warsaw, 1996); Wielka Internetowa Encyklopedia Multimedialna wiem.onet.pl; Stanisław Dronicz, Wojsko i politycy (Warsaw, 2001).

BERMAN Jakub (23 October 1901, Warsaw–10 April 1984, Łomża), Polish Communist activist. Born into a Jewish middle-class family, in 1925 Berman graduated in law from Warsaw University. In 1924 he became a member of the Communist Union of Youth, and in 1928 he joined the Communist Party of Poland (Komunistyczna Partia Polski [KPP]). In 1938 the KPP was dissolved by the Comintern and its leaders in the USSR were killed on the pretext of having succumbed to the influence of Polish intelligence. The same year Berman, on behalf of the Comintern, took part, along with Stanisław Radkiewicz, in the liquidation of KPP units in Poland. In September 1939 Berman headed east. In spring 1941 he edited an organ of the Communist Party in Belorussia, and between November 1941 and May 1943 he ran a Polish course in a Comintern school in Kushnarenkovo, where he educated cadres for the Polish Workers’ Party (PPR). From December 1943 he was secretary of the Home Department of the Union of Polish Patriots (Związek Patriotów Polskich). He co-founded the Central Bureau of Polish Communists in the USSR. As he enjoyed the trust of the Kremlin, Berman became a member of the top leadership of the bureau and was responsible for contact with Communists in occupied Poland, as well as for preparing members of the initiative groups of the PPR that were deployed in occupied Poland.

From August 1944 Berman was formally in the PPR, and from the start he was made a member of the Central Committee (CC) and the Politburo of the party. In the party leadership he represented a strict pro-Moscow “internationalist” wing. From 1944 to 1945 he was deputy head of the foreign department of the Polish Committee of National Liberation (Polski Komitet Wyzwolenia Narodowego [PKWN]) and deputy minister of foreign affairs of the provisional government. From 1945 to 1952 he was undersecretary of state in the Presidium of the Council of Ministers and a member of the Presidium of the Government. He played a key role in government structures, but he was not formally appointed deputy prime minister until 1954. From 1944 to 1946 he was a member of the National Home Council (Krajowa Rada Narodowa [KRN]) and from 1947, an MP. From December 1948 he was a member of the CC of the Polish United Workers’ Party (Polska Zjednoczona Partia Robotnicza [PUWP]) and its Politburo. In 1948–54 he was a member of the CC Secretariat, and between February 1949 and 1954 he was a member of the Public Security Commission of the Politburo.

Along with Bolesław Bierut, Hilary Minc, and Roman Zambrowski, Berman belonged to the top leadership of Stalinist Poland. He was in charge of public security, foreign policy, education, ideology, propaganda, and culture. On behalf of the party he monitored the security apparatus, and because of his position, he was co-responsible for its crimes. In accord with a decision of the Politburo in August 1945 he organized a series of show trials of pro-independence activists. Many of these trials ended in death sentences, as it was alleged, according to Berman’s horrendous testimony, that the Home Army (Armia Krajowa [AK]) had collaborated with the Gestapo during the Nazi occupation. Berman considered propaganda and culture important parts of the arsenal of “class struggle.” For example, in 1947 he held a special conference with intellectuals who were linked to the PPR. At the conference he outlined the propaganda tasks for scholars and artists. He took an active part in the suppression of the Polish Peasant Party (Polskie Stronnictwo Ludowe [PSL]) between 1945 and 1947. At the Sixth Plenum of the CC of the PPR in August and September 1948 he was one of the main architects of the dismissal of Władysław Gomułka from the party leadership. Along with Bierut and Minc, he initiated investigations that were aimed at bringing about the trial of Gomułka. As a result of these activities, the Ministry of Public Security and the Information Service of the Polish Army arrested and tortured hundreds of people, and a dozen or so were sentenced to death.

Berman’s position weakened at the beginning of the 1950s as an anti-Semitic wave began to spread in the USSR. In May 1956 he was forced to resign from the Politburo, and at the Seventh Plenum of the CC of the PUWP in July 1956 he was sharply attacked by (among others) Mieczysław Moczar. Although at the Eighth Plenum of the CC of the PUWP on 21 October 1956 he undertook a self-criticism, he was dismissed from the CC, and in 1957 he was expelled from the PUWP for “lack of alertness.” The Ninth Plenum of the CC of the PUWP issued a resolution on the party responsibility of functionaries of the Ministry of Public Security. In this resolution, Berman was stigmatized, along with Radkiewicz, but the main burden of blame was shifted to lower-level functionaries. Despite the attempts of Public Prosecutor General Andrzej Burda in 1957, the Politburo did not agree to prosecute Berman for his crimes in the Stalinist period. Until 1968 Berman worked in the publishing house Książka i Wiedza, and then he retired. During martial law Berman came back into the public light, and in December 1983 he was decorated with the medal of the KRN. He left memoirs that are kept in the Archive of New Records (Archiwum Akt Nowych) in Warsaw. (PK)

Sources: Mołdawa; Słownik polityków polskich XX w. (Poznań, 1998); Zbigniew Błazyński, Mówi Józef Światło: Za kulisami bezpieki i partii (London, 1985); Marek Łatyński, Nie paść na kolana: Szkice o opozycji lat czterdziestych (Warsaw, 1987); Krystyna Kersten, Narodziny systemu władzy: Polska 1943–1948 (Poznań, 1990); Stanisław Marat and Jacek Snopkiewicz, Ludzie bezpieki (Warsaw, 1990); Teresa Torafska, Oni (Warsaw, 1990); Jerzy Poksiński, “TUN”—Tatar-Utnik-Nowicki: Represje wobec oficerów Wojska Polskiego w latach 1949–1956 (Warsaw, 1992); Andrzej Werblan, Stalinizm w Polsce (Warsaw, 1993).

BERON Petyr (14 March 1940, Sofia), Bulgarian politician. The grandson of one of the nineteenth-century pioneers of the Bulgarian national revival, Beron studied biology at the University of Sofia. After studies in France, he returned to Bulgaria and received a Ph.D. in 1975. Later he worked in the Institute of Biology of the Bulgarian Academy of Sciences and was director of the Museum of Natural Sciences in Sofia. In April 1989 he joined Ekoglasnost, and on behalf of this organization he became secretary of the Union of Democratic Forces (Sayuz na Demokratichnite Sili [UDF]). During round-table talks in 1990 he decided to support the reformation government of Andrey Lukanov as a “lesser evil.” Beron was perceived as a representative of the nationalist faction of the UDF and one of the key persons responsible for rejecting a motion to accept the (Muslim) Movement for Rights and Freedoms of Ahmed Dogan into the UDF. After the parliamentary elections of June 1990, Beron won a seat in the Grand National Assembly, where he headed the UDF club. When Zhelyu Zhelev was elected president in August 1990, Beron became UDF chairman. In this capacity he negotiated with the post-Communist Bulgarian Socialist Party (BSP) on the formation of a coalition cabinet dominated by the UDF, but these talks failed. After Lukanov resigned, Beron was considered a candidate for prime minister, but the BSP objected. At this time it was revealed that Beron had been a collaborator in the Communist Ministry of Interior for twenty-one years. As a result he had to give up his position as UDF chairman and head of its parliamentary club in December 1990. In April 1991, after a split in the UDF owing to a conflict on de-communization and dates for elections, Beron, along with some radical activists, left the UDF and founded a rightist bloc. In 1992 he ran for vice-president. When he lost, he returned to his job in the Museum of Natural Sciences in Sofia. (AG)

Sources: Koy koy e v Bulgariya (Sofia, 1998); Raymond Detrez, Historical Dictionary of Bulgaria (Lanham, Md., 1997); Jerzy Jackowicz, Bulgaria od rządów komunistycznych do demokracji parlamentarnej 1988–1991 (Warsaw, 1999); www.omda.bg/engl/personalia/beron_engl.htm.

BEROV Luben (6 October 1925, Sofia), Bulgarian historian and politician. Berov graduated in economics at the University of Sofia in 1949. From 1950 to 1962 he worked as an assistant professor at the Higher Institute of Economics (HIE) in Sofia. Gradually advancing, he received a Ph.D.; in 1971 he became professor, and in 1976 he was given a postdoctoral degree in economics. He held a chair in economic history and was deputy dean and dean in the HIE and professor in the Institute of Balkan Studies of the Bulgarian Academy of Sciences. In 1990–92 he was adviser to President Zhelyu Zhelev on economic affairs. From 30 December 1992 to 17 October 1994 Berov was prime minister and (until June 1993) minister of foreign affairs. His government, composed of experts, faced great difficulties without a stable parliamentary majority, but it functioned thanks to the support of the (Turkish) Movement for Rights and Freedoms and the post-Communist Bulgarian Socialist Party (BSP). The government was opposed by the Union of Democratic Forces faction of Filip Dimitrov and, at the end, by President Zhelev. The opposition accused the Berov government of hampering institutional reforms and personnel changes. The state administration malfunctioned; there was growing crime, financial pyramids, and a banking crisis. In March 1994 Berov had a heart attack and was hospitalized for a month. When he lost the support of the BSP, on 2 September 1994 his government resigned but continued operation until a new one was formed. In 1995 Berov became chairman of the Agricultural Credit Center and a member of the Presidium of the Open Society Foundation. He authored many works, including the following: Ikonomicheskoto razvitye na Bulgariya prez vekovete (Economic development of Bulgaria through the centuries; 1974); Dvizhenye na tsenite na Balkanite prez XVI–XIX v. (Price changes in the Balkans in the sixteenth to nineteenth centuries; 1976); Razvityeto na industriyata w Bulgariya 1884–1947 g. (Development of industry in Bulgaria, 1884–1947; 1989); Stopanska istorija (Economic history; 1994); and Istoriya na sveta (World history; 1996). (JJ)

Sources: Entsiklopediya Bulgariya, vol. 7 (Sofia, 1996); Raymond Detrez, Historical Dictionary of Bulgaria (Lanham, Md., 1997); Koi koy e v Bulgariya (Sofia, 1998); Tasho Tashev, Ministrte na Bulgariya 1879–1999: Entsiklopedichen spravochnik (Sofia, 1999); Evgeniya Kalinova and Iskra Baeva, Bulgarskite prekhodi 1944–1999 (Sofia, 2000); Angel Tsyrafov, Entsiklopediya. Pravitelstvata na Bulgariya. Khronologiya na politicheskiya zhivot 1879–2001 (Sofia, 2001).

BĒRZIŅŠ Alfreds (21 October 1899, Jeri, Livonia–30 November 1977, New York), Latvian politician. Bērziņš was educated in a city school in Valka. Arrested by the Bolsheviks in 1918, in 1919 he escaped from prison and volunteered for the Latvian Army. In 1919–20 he went through an officer training course in a military academy, and in 1920–21 he served as a lieutenant of infantry. Demobilized, he graduated from an evening high school and studied in the Trade Institute in Riga. He published a lot and was active in youth organizations. From 1926 he was a member of the Agrarian paramilitary organization Aizsargi, and later he was its instructor and head of a department in its headquarters. In 1931 he was elected MP on behalf of the Latvian Agrarian Union (Latviešu Zarnieku Sanienība [LAU]). Along with Kārlis Ulmanis and Janis Balodis, he belonged to a close circle of organizers of the coup of 15 May 1934, after which he became deputy minister of interior and, from April 1937, minister of social affairs. After the Soviet invasion of June 1940 he was the only member of the government who managed to escape through Estonia and Finland to Sweden, while the NKVD deported his whole family. In exile he resumed activities aimed at restoring the independence of Latvia. Arrested by the Gestapo in Berlin in early 1941 while returning to Sweden from Switzerland, where he had conferred with Latvian ambassadors and ministers, he was sent to the Sachsenhausen concentration camp. Released in November 1943, he was forced to stay in Berlin under police surveillance. At the end of the war he was released from a displaced persons camp, and he worked in Latvian émigré organizations and published a lot.

In 1950 Bērziņš he left for the United States. He settled in New York, where he took an active part in émigré organizations. He edited the periodicals Latvijas Brīvībai (1952–60), The Baltic Review (1953–61), La Revue Baltique (1954–61), Zemnieku Vienība (1954–62) and Revista Baltica (1957–67). He published (among other works) Atmiņas par Kārli Ulmani (Memoirs on Kārlis Ulmanis; 1947); I Saw Vishinsky Bolshevizē Latvia (1948); Kārlis Ulmanis (1952); Labie gadi (Good years; 1963); The Unpunished Crime (1963); The Two Faces of Coexistence (1967); Tāls ir ceļš atpakaļ uz mājām (It is a long way back home; 1971); Kārlis Ulmanis: Cilvēks un valstsvīrs (Kārlis Ulmanis: A man and a statesman; 1973); 1939 (1976); and several concise works on independent Latvia and Soviet occupation published in English, French, Spanish, Arabic, and Armenian. (EJ)

Sources: Es viņu pazīstu (Riga, 1939); Kadets, 1939, no. 1; Latvju enciklopēdija, vol. 1; Enciklopēdiskā vārdnīca, vol. 1 (Riga, 1991); Andrejs Plakans, Historical Dictionary of Latvia (Lanham, Md., 1997).

BĒRZIŅŠ Jānis [originally Peteris Kiusis] (13 November 1889, Jaunpils–29 July 1938, Moscow), Latvian Communist activist in the USSR. The son of a landless peasant, Bērziņš studied in a theological seminary, but in 1905 he joined the revolution. For some time he even fought in a detachment of “forest partisans” against the tsarist army. He was caught and sentenced to death in 1907, but owing to his young age the sentence was commuted, and after two years he was released. In 1911 he was arrested again for his revolutionary activities, and he was sent to Siberia. He escaped from exile and returned to Latvia in 1914. In 1915 he was recruited to the Russian Army and took part in the February 1917 revolution. In November 1917, during the Bolshevik coup, he commanded the Kremlin Guard in its attack on the Winter Palace in Petrograd. In 1918 he took the leadership of the People’s Commissariat of Interior of the Bolshevik government of Latvia. After the collapse of the Latvian revolution, he returned to Petrograd and served in the Red Army. In November 1920 he was appointed head of the Cheka special section in the Fifth Army, and in December 1920 he started his career in military intelligence. For his role in the suppression of the Kronstadt Revolt, in April 1921 he was promoted to director of the Third Bureau of the Chief Intelligence Administration (Głównoje Razwiediwatielnoje Uprawlenie [GRU]). In March 1924 he became head of intelligence of the Red Army, with the rank of general. He supervised many intelligence operations against true and alleged enemies of the USSR. Frequently these were liquidation operations. In October 1935 he decided to resign and became deputy commander of the Far East Army. From 1936, as “General Grishin,” he headed a Soviet mission supervising the International Brigades during the Spanish Civil War. In June 1937 he returned to the Soviet Union and resumed the position of head of Red Army intelligence. Accused by his superior, Kliment Voroshilov, of espionage for the Third Reich, he was arrested at the end of 1937, sentenced to death, and executed. (WR)

Sources: MERSH, vol. 4; Latvijas PSR Maza Enciklopēdija, vol. 1 (Riga, 1967); D. J. Dallin, Soviet Espionage (New Haven, 1955); Robert Conquest, The Great Terror (New York, 1968); Boris Levytskyj, The Stalinist Terror in the Thirties (Stanford, 1974); Burnett Bolloten, The Spanish Revolution (Chapel Hill, N.C., 1979); Pierre de Villemarest, GRU: Le plus secret des services soviétiques, 1918–1988 (Paris, 1988).

BETHLEN István (8 October 1874, Gernyeszeg, Transylvania–5 October 1946, Moscow), Hungarian politician. Bethlen graduated in law from Budapest University. From 1901 to 1939, with a short break in 1919–20, he was MP. He represented a traditional conservatism, opposing all kinds of extremism. During World War I he served in the army. Realizing the inevitability of national separatisms in the Kingdom of Hungary, at the end of the war he began to be inclined toward the Oszkár Jászi idea of a federal system based on the equal rights of all the nationalities of the Habsburg monarchy. In the fall of 1918 he sharply criticized the liberal republican government of Mihály Károlyi, mostly for its plans for land reform and for its foreign policy.

After the proclamation of the Hungarian Soviet Republic (HSR), in April 1919 Bethlen was one of the key organizers of the Anti-Bolshevik Committee in Vienna, uniting conservative and Christian National politicians with Admiral Miklós Horthy, Pál Teleki, and Gyula Gömbös. After the collapse of the HSR in August 1919 Bethlen opposed both a military dictatorship and a restoration of Habsburg rule. He saw the best chance for political consolidation in Hungary in a provisional system of a kingdom without a king, with Regent Horthy at the helm. Bethlen won wide support for this idea, including the support of most Hungarian Jews, which was particularly important in view of nationalist accusations that the Jews had supported the HSR. Bethlen was most instrumental in consolidating Hungary after the shock of the revolution and the Treaty of Trianon, to which he was a signatory on 4 June 1920 and by which Hungary lost two-thirds of its prewar territory, while every third Hungarian was left outside the new state. In the elections of January 1920 the Christian National Unity Party (Keresztény Nemzeti Egyesülés Partja [KNEP]), led by Bethlen, won 35 percent of the vote and was runner-up to the Smallholders and Agrarian Laborers' Party (Országos Kisgazda és Földműves Párt [OKFP]), which won 40 percent of the vote.

On 14 April 1921 Bethlen became prime minister. He strove for domestic consolidation and the strengthening of the Christian National government. In October 1921, during a second attempt by Charles IV Habsburg to recover the throne of Hungary, Bethlen fiercely opposed him, and, although he was a royalist, on 6 November 1921 he forced through a law dethroning the Habsburgs. In December 1921 he reached a secret agreement with the Social Democratic leader Károly Peyer that led to the legalization of the Social Democratic Party as an opposition, though loyal, party. On 22 February 1922 Bethlen renewed and extended an agreement between the KNEP and the OKFP that led to their merger into the government Unity Party (Egységes Párt). The agreement included the consent of the conservatives to a land reform and of the populists to limit voting rights. In March 1922 Bethlen changed the electoral law and—with the exception of Budapest and a few large towns—he restored open elections, which helped the government party win a parliamentary majority in subsequent elections. In 1923 he dismissed a group of Gömbös nationalists from the ruling party. In 1926 he promoted the creation of the Upper House, which replaced the House of Lords, abolished in 1918.

In domestic policy Bethlen tried to maintain a balance between the restriction and the neutralization of opposition groups. He made a concession to the extreme right and the populists when he decided to retain the numerus clausus principle in relation to Jewish students (1920–28). In the mid-1920s his government achieved economic stability. In 1924 he managed to obtain a significant loan from the League of Nations. Through a tax increase he managed to balance the budget, and in 1927 he introduced a new currency, the pengő. In foreign policy he strove for the revision of the Treaty of Trianon, the restoration of a modernized but historical Kingdom of Hungary, and a reduction in the German and Soviet danger. In 1927 he weakened the encirclement of Hungary by the Little Entente by means of a treaty of friendship with Italy. He understood that to revise the Treaty of Trianon Hungary would need German support, but he first tried to improve relations with Western powers such as Great Britain. He was temporarily minister of treasury (1921), foreign affairs (1924), agriculture (1924), and justice (1924 and 1929). Ten years of his government strengthened the authoritarian nature of the political system, with elements of democracy, such as a relatively free press and trade unions and with an elected parliament. This system was also against extreme nationalism.

Owing to a political crisis caused by the Great Depression, on 19 August 1931 Bethlen resigned. As one of the most influential aides of Regent Horthy and until 1935 leader of the government party, he still played a key political role. In 1935 he left the Unity Party in protest against the pro-Fascist policy of Prime Minister Gömbös, and until 1945 he was the leader of the so-called defense of the constitution, opposing extremist tendencies. He was also the leader of a pro-British group of Hungarian politicians. In February 1939 he contributed to the resignation of a pro-German prime minister, Béla Imrédy, and supported the foreign policy of the Teleki government. He did not run in the elections of 1939, but in May 1939 Horthy appointed him a member of the Upper House for life.

In April 1941, during the German invasion of Yugoslavia, Bethlen appealed to the government of László Bárdossy to stay out of the conflict. He did not agree to a one-sided pro-German orientation and was against breaking off contacts with the Western powers. He thought it a grave mistake for Hungary to declare war on the USSR, Great Britain, and the United States and tried to convince Horthy to change this line. In 1943–44 he attempted to reconcile with the Anglo-Saxon powers and to conclude a separate peace treaty with them. In order to unite anti-German forces, in 1943 he founded the Hungarian National Circle. He also condemned anti-Jewish legislation. When Germany occupied Hungary on 19 March 1944, he went into hiding in the countryside. Despite Gestapo efforts to arrest him, he maintained contact with Regent Horthy. In June 1944 he appealed to Horthy to appoint a government that could restore Hungary's sovereignty. He urged the establishment of contacts with the USSR and the conclusion of an armistice. In his plans for an armistice and for the creation of a provisional government, Horthy saw a leading role for Bethlen. Nevertheless, when the Arrow Cross took over power in October 1944, Bethlen had to go into hiding again. In early December 1944 he reported to one of the Soviet commanders, counting on an agreement with the Kremlin. He was first kept under house arrest, but when he refused to cooperate with the Communists, in April 1945 he was transferred to Moscow, where he died in the Butyrki Prison hospital. In June 1994 his ashes were returned to Hungary. (JT)

Sources: Biographisches Lexikon, vol. 1; Magyar Nagylexikon, vol. 3 (Budapest, 1994); Nagy Képes Milleniumi Arcképcsarnok (Budapest, 1999); Új Magyar Életrajzi Lexikon, vol. 1 (Budapest, 2001); Magyarország 1944–1956, CD-ROM (Budapest, 2001);

Bethlen István beszédei és írásai, vols. 1–2 (Budapest, 1933); C. A. Macartney, October Fifteenth: A History of Modern Hungary, vols. 1–2 (Edinburgh, 1957–1961); William M. Batkay, Authoritarian Politics in a Transitional State: Istvan Bethlen and the United Party in Hungary, 1919–1926 (Boulder, Colo., 1982); Ignac Romcsics, Bethlen István: Politikai életrajz (Budapest, 1991); Steven Béla Varga, Historical Dictionary of Hungary (Lanham, Md., 1997).

BIADULA Zmitrok [originally Samuil Plaunik] (23 November 1886, Posadets, near Vileika–3 November 1941, Uralsk), Belorussian writer. The son of a Jewish leaseholder (arendar), Biadula was educated at a rabbinical school, and then he worked as a tutor. In 1912 he moved to Wilno (Vilnius), where he established ties with Belorussian activists. He worked in the editorial offices of Nasha Niva, where he published poems, feature articles, and short literary essays. He also contributed to the conservative magazine Byelarus. The first collection of his lyrical miniatures written in prose, Abrazki (Pictures), appeared in 1913 from the St. Petersburg Belorussian publishing house Zahlanie Sontsa i u Nashava Kontsa (The Sun Will Also Shine in Our Window). In this collection, nature and peasants were the main motifs. In his stories he idealized the peasant community, depicting its ethical values, inborn sense of justice, and capacity for deep spirituality. Against this background he presented the picture of a degenerate nobility and middle-class society. In 1915 he went to Minsk, where he participated in the work of the Belorussian Relief Committee for War Victims. In 1917 he took part in all the most significant events that led to the creation of the Belorussian People's Republic. He attended the First All-Belorussian Congress and participated in the work of the Belorussian Military Committee. In 1919 he accepted the idea of Belorussian Soviet statehood. He appealed to Belorussian Jews to join in the work for the economic and political revival of Belorussia. In 1919 he published Zhydy na Bielarusi (Jews in Belorussia). He was one of the most widely read writers in the Belorussian SSR, but he became popular only after his death in the postwar period, when his works were published in large print runs. His most important works include Pad rodnym niebam (Under our native sky; 1922); Deliehatka (Woman delegate; 1928); Salaviei (Nightingale; 1928); Try paltsy (Three fingers; 1930); Yazep Krushynski (1929–1932); Niezvychainyia historyi (Not ordinary stories; 1931); and Na pradoptanykh steszhkakh (On trodden paths; 1940). In 1985 Zbor tvorau u piatsi tamakh (Collected works in five volumes) was published. (EM)

Sources: Bielaruskiya pis'mienniki (1917–1990): Daviednik (Minsk, 1994); I. Navumienka, Zmitrok Biadula (Minsk, 1995); Jan Zaprudnik, Historical Dictionary of Belarus (Lanham, Md., 1998); Wielka Encyklopedia PWN, vol. 2 (Warsaw, 2001).

BIBÓ István (7 August 1911, Budapest–10 May 1979, Budapest), Hungarian politician, lawyer, and political scientist. The son of an ethnologist and director of the University Library in Szeged, Bibó attended the local Piarist gymnasium and from 1929 studied law at the university in Szeged. He established close contacts with Ferenc Erdei, one of the outstanding representatives of peasant writers. In 1933–35 he was on state scholarships in Vienna and Geneva. From November 1938 he worked in the Ministry of Justice. In 1937 he was the co-author of a programmatic declaration of the March Front, which aimed at the development of the Hungarian countryside. In the summer of 1944 he formulated the Peace Proposal (Békeajánlat) between the working class and the middle class. During the German occupation Bibó used his post in the ministry to save many Jews by issuing safe conduct permits for them. Because of this, on 16 October 1944 he was arrested by the Arrow Cross Party. After a few days he was released and went into opposition.

In February 1945, at Erdei's request, Bibó started working in the Ministry of Interior under the Provisional National Government. Between March 1945 and July 1946 he directed the administrative department of the Ministry of Interior and worked on the reform of the county (comitat) system. Between July 1945 and October 1946 he represented the National Peasant Party in the Committee on Legal Reform, where he helped to prepare changes in the electoral law. In October 1945 his article, "A magyar demokrácia válsága" (The crisis of Hungarian democracy), was published, stimulating much debate. The next year his analytical studies were issued—for example, A kelet-európai kisállamok nyomorúsága (The misery of small East European nations; 1946) and Zsidókérdés Magyarországon 1944 után (The Jewish question in Hungary after 1944.). From 1946 to 1950 Bibó was a professor at Szeged University, and from July 1946, a member of the Hungarian Academy of Sciences; between 1946 and 1949 he was professor at the East European Research Institute, and then he became the director of the institute. In 1950 he was removed from all his posts and went to work as a librarian at the University Library in Budapest.

During the revolution of 1956 Bibó took part in the reorganization of the National Peasant Party, which on 3 November appointed him minister without portfolio in the coalition government of Imre Nagy. On 4 November, along with Zoltán Tildy, Bibó conducted talks with the commander of the Soviet units, which had seized the parliament building. After that he formulated a manifesto to the people. On 6 November he published the text, "Tervezet a magyar kérdés megoldására" (The project of a compromise solution to the Hungarian question), and then he left the parliament. On 12 November he was officially dismissed from his post by the head of the Presidential Council, István Dobi. At the beginning of 1957 Bibó wrote a study, Magyarország és a világhelyzet (Hungary and the world situation), which was sent abroad and published in London. In May 1957 he was arrested, and on 2 August 1958 the Supreme Court sentenced him to life imprisonment. Released under an amnesty in 1963, Bibó worked in the library of the Central Statistical Office in Budapest until 1971. During his retirement he edited his works, undertook translations, and published minor works. In 1976 in London, without the assent of the Hungarian authorities, his work Paralysis of International Institutions and the Remedies was published in English. Bibó's funeral became an opportunity for the first open appearance of various currents of the opposition to the János Kádár regime. (JT)

Sources: Magyar Nagylexikon (Budapest, 1994), vol. 3; A magyar forradalom és szabadságharc enciklopédiája, CD-ROM (Budapest, 1999); Nagy Képes Milleniumi Arcképcsarnok (Budapest, 1999).

BIELECKI Jan Krzysztof (3 May 1951, Bydgoszcz), Polish economist and politician. Bielecki graduated from the Higher School of Economics in Sopot in 1973, where he later worked as an assistant professor. From 1975 to 1982 he worked in the Center for Training for Managers of the Ministry of Metallurgy and the Machine-Building Industry in Gdańsk. From 1980 he belonged to Solidarity, and worked in the Social and Professional Center for the Dansk region. From the end of 1981 he was its director. Removed from there in 1982, he ran a handicraft workshop and later was co-owner and driver of a truck. In 1985–89 he was co-founder and worker in a cooperative, Doradca (Adviser), employing several dozen experts deprived of jobs during martial law. From the end of 1981 he was active in the Solidarity underground in Gdańsk; from 1984 he was a liaison of the Gdańsk regional management with the Provisional Coordinating Commission. In 1988 he co-founded the Liberal Congress in Gdańsk. In the elections of June 1989 he won a parliamentary seat, and he joined the Civic Parliamentary Club. From February 1990 he was a member of the Presidium of the Liberal-Democratic Congress (Kongres Liberalno-Demokratyczn [KLD]), and he co-organized the presidential campaign of Lech Wałęsa. After Wałęsa's victory, from 4 January 1990 to 5 December 1991 Bielecki was prime minister. He continued the policies of his predecessor, Tadeusz Mazowiecki, paying special attention to the economic transformation and rapprochement of Poland with the West. In 1991–93 he presided over the KLD Political Council, and from March to September 1992, over the KLD parliamentary club; from November 1993 to April 1994 he was vice-president of the KLD National Board. After the merger of the KLD with the Democratic Union, he was a member of the Union of Freedom (Unia Wolności) until 2001. In the government of Hanna Suchocka he was minister responsible for contacts with the European Economic Community from July 1992 to October 1993. From December 1993 he was Polish representative to the European Bank of Reconstruction and Development, and from 2003, chairman of one of the largest Polish banks, the PeKaO SA. (AF)

Sources: Nasi w Sejmie i Senacie (Warsaw, 1990); Teresa Torańska, My (Warsaw, 1994); Janusz A. Majcherek, Pierwsza dekada III Rzeczypospolitej 1989–1999 (Warsaw, 1999); Antoni Dudek, Pierwsze lata III Rzeczypospolitej 1989–2001 (Kraków, 2002).

BIELECKI Tadeusz (30 January 1901, Słupia, near Kielce–5 February 1982, London), Polish politician and lawyer. Bielecki graduated from the Department of Philosophy of the Jagiellonian University in Kraków and received a Ph.D. there. He subsequently belonged to various organizations of the National Democratic movement. In 1924–27 he belonged to the National League, then to the Camp of Great Poland (Obóz Wielkiej Polski [OWP]) and the National Party (Stronnictwo Narodowe [SN]). For some time he was the personal secretary of Roman Dmowski, and, having gained his trust, after the dissolution of the OWP in 1933 he became head of the SN Department of Organization and one of the leaders of the so-called faction of the young in the party's leadership. From 1928 he was secretary of the headquarters of the secret National Guard and member of the SN informal leaderships, the so-called seven and nine. From 1935 he was vice-president of the SN Supreme Board for organization, and, in view of the ailing health of Dmowski, he gradually took over the party leadership. After Dmowski's death, in June 1939 Bielecki became president of the SN Supreme Board. In 1930–35 he was MP, and in 1938–39, a member of the Warsaw City Council.

After the September 1939 disaster, Bielecki escaped to France and later to Great Britain, where he was active as chairman of the SN Political Committee, chairman of the National Democratic Foreign Committee (1942–45), and (until 1968) chairman of the SN Executive Committee. He belonged to the émigré National Council of the Polish Republic, and he was its vice-president from 1940–41. He remained in opposition to the governments of General Władysław Sikorski and Stanisław Mikołajczyk. He was particularly critical of concessions concerning Poland's eastern frontiers and the provisions of the Yalta Conference on Poland. In 1947 he supported the takeover by President August Zaleski, but afterwards he went into opposition against his rule. He belonged to the founders of the Political Council, an union of parties opposing Zaleski, and he belonged to the council until 1954. An active participant in the talks held by General Kazimierz Sosnkowski on the unification of political émigrés, on 14 March 1954 Bielecki was among the signatories of the Unification Act, which, however, was rejected by the followers of Zaleski. From 1954 to 1971 Bielecki was chairman of the Provisional Council of National Unity and then of the Council of National Unity. From 1979 to 1981 he chaired the Council of the Roman Dmowski Institute in London. In 1984 he published W szkole Dmowskiego: Szkice i wspomnienia (In Roman Dmowski's school: Essays and memoirs; 1968). (PK)

Sources: Roman Wapiński, Narodowa Demokracja 1893–1939 (Wrocław, 1980); Kto był kim w Drugiej Rzeczypospolitej (Warsaw, 1994); Andrzej Albert [Wojciech Roszkowski], Najnowsza historia Polski 1914–1993, vol. 2 (Warsaw, 1995); Andrzej Friszke, Życie polityczne emigracji (Warsaw, 1999); Stanisław Kilian, Mysł społeczno-polityczna Tadeusza Bieleckiego (Kraków, 2000).

BIELINIS Jurgis (16 March 1846, Purviškiai–18 January 1918, Vilnius [Wilno]), Lithuanian independence activist, famous smuggler of books. Born into a peasant family, Bielinis graduated from a German primary school in Riga. From 1873 he took part in secret anti-tsarist activities. When in 1864 Russian authorities banned the publication of Lithuanian in Latin characters, many Lithuanian activists antedated their publications or published them in so-called Little Lithuania in German East Prussia. Then these books and leaflets were smuggled across the Russian border into Lithuania. Bielinis was one of the main organizers of the network of smugglers (knygnešiai, or book carriers), first in cooperation with the Samogetian bishop Motiejus Valančius and then on his own. The center of these operations was in the village of Garšviai in Panevežys county. Bielinis once said that he would not die until “the Muscovites got out of Lithuania.” In fact he died soon after the Germans occupied Lithuania and a month before the Lithuanian declaration of independence. (WR)

Sources: EL, vol. 1; Petras Ruseckas, Knygnešys, vols. 1–2 (Kaunas, 1925–1928); Jerzy Ochmański, Litewski ruch narodowo-kulturalny w XIX wieku (Białystok, 1965).

BIEŃ Adam, pseudonyms “Alfa,” “Witold Bronowski,” and “Walkowicz” (14 December 1899, Ossala, near Połaniec on the Vistula–4 March 1998, Warsaw), Polish politician, lawyer, and journalist. From 1914 to 1917

Bień was a member of secret scouts in Sandomierz. He took part in the liberation of Sandomierz from the Austrians. From 1919 he was a member of the Central Union of Rural Youth (Centralny Związek Młodzieży Wiejskiej [CZMW]). After high school, he fought as a volunteer in the Polish-Soviet war. In 1925 he graduated in law from Warsaw University. Next, he underwent a two-year legal training and worked in the judiciary. In 1925–35 he was president of the Mazovian Association of Folk Theaters and co-author of the book Teatry ludowe w Polsce (Folk theaters in Poland; 1928). He also co-founded the Institute of Folk Theaters. In 1928 he co-organized the Union of Rural Youth of the Republic of Poland, called Wici (Związek Młodzieży Wiejskiej Rzeczypospolitej Polskiej Wici). At first he was vice-president, and in 1929–31, president of its Main Board. He exerted a decisive influence on the elaboration of the ideological principles of Wici. In 1921–31 he was a member of the Polish Peasant Party Liberation (Polskie Stronnictwo Ludowe Wyzwolenie). He began underground activities during World War II in an attack on a train near Staszów that had been organized by partisans from a group called Jędrusie. In the spring of 1940 he joined the underground Peasant Party Roch (SL Roch). From 1941 to 1943 he presided over the Legal Commission of the Central Leadership of the Peasant Movement. From May 1944 he was minister of justice and member of the Home Council of Ministers of the Polish Government in London. He also served as first deputy to Vice-Premier Jan Stanisław Jankowski. Bień belonged to the civil command of the Warsaw Uprising, and after its fall, to an underground military and political organization called Niepodległość (Independence [NIE]). He contributed to underground newspapers of the peasant movement.

On 28 March 1945 Bień was arrested by the NKVD, and in June of that year, following the Trial of the Sixteen in Moscow, he was sentenced to five years. He served most of his sentence in Lubyanka Prison. After his return to Poland in 1949 he was not allowed to work as a judge until 1953; instead he translated Russian literature for the People's Publishing Cooperative. In 1953–73 he worked as defense attorney in Przasnysz. In 1974 he retired and settled in his native Ossala. He was the author of the memoirs Więźniowie Moskwy (Prisoners of Moscow; 1987); Wyprowa moskiewska (Moscow expedition; 1989); Bóg wyżej—dom dalej, 1939–1949 (God higher, home further, 1939–1949; 1991); and Listy z Łubianki (Letters from Lubyanka; 1997), for which he received many awards. He was also involved in political journalism, articles of which appeared in uncensored publications in Poland and abroad. In 1987 he was signatory to the founding document of the Independent Peasant Movement Solidarity (Niezależny Ruch Ludowy Solidarność). In 1990 he was one of the authors of an appeal to the Sejm (National Assembly) of the Republic of Poland for the establishment of the Institute of National Remembrance (Instytut Pamięci Narodowej [IPN]), and for the passing of a law condemning Stalinist crimes in Poland. The appeal was published in Tygodnik Solidarność. In 1994 Bień was decorated with the Order of the White Eagle. In 1995 he questioned the ethical grounds of Aleksander Kwaśniewski's accession to the presidency because Kwaśniewski had made false claims in the presidential campaign that he had a university degree. According to his will, Bień was buried at a village cemetery in Niekrasów. After his death, his memoirs were published: Bóg wysoko—dom daleko: Obrazy przeszłości 1900–1920 (God high, home far away: Pictures of the past 1900–1920; 1999). (JS)

Sources: Waldemar Grabowski, Delegatura Rządu Rzeczypospolitej Polskiej na Kraj (Warsaw, 1995); Proces szesnastu: Dokumenty NKWD (Warsaw, 1995); Hanna and Stanisław Bielscy, eds., Adam Bień, Bóg dał, Bóg wziął: Dokumenty i teksty z lat 1920–1995 (Warsaw, 1997); Jacek Chrobaczyński, Ostatni z szesnastu: Biografia polityczna Adama Bienia, 1899–1998 (Warsaw, 2000).

BIENERT Richard (5 September 1881, Prague–3 February 1949, Prague), Czech politician and police officer. From 1906 Bienert served in the Austrian police in Prague. During World War I he cooperated with the national independence movement, which was rallied around a secret committee formed by a group of famous political activists (e.g., Karel Kramář and Alois Rašín), the so-called Mafia (Maffie). In the interwar period, as the head of the Prague police, he carried out its reorganization so as to adapt it to the new political and legal situation. From 1924 to 1939 he was the vice-head and then the head of the territorial political executive in Bohemia. At the beginning of 1942 he held the portfolio of the interior minister of the Protectorate of Bohemia and Moravia, and from 19 January 1945 to 5 May 1945 he was its last prime minister. At the same time he frequently replaced the ailing president, Emil Hácha. In May 1945 Bienert was arrested and on 31 July 1946 sentenced by the Supreme Court to three years of prison. (PU)

Sources: ČBS; Kdo byl kdo v našich dějinách ve 20. století, vol. 1 (Prague, 1998); Vojtech Masny, The Czechs under Nazi Rule (New York and London, 1971).

BIENIASHEVICH Uladzimir (21 August 1874, Druja–27 January 1938?), Belorussian historian and paleographer. In 1897 Bieniashevich graduated in law from Petersburg University. In 1897–1900 he studied in Berlin and Heidelberg. Until 1905 he worked in West European archives and museums, analyzing Roman and Byzantine manuscripts. In 1909 he became professor at Petersburg University. His two-volume work, Ahliad prats pa slavianaznavstvu (Overview of Slavic studies), was the first bibliography of Belorussian history, ethnography, literature, and language studies in Belorussia. In the 1920s he was director of the manuscript section of the Leningrad Library. In 1929 he was arrested and accused of counterrevolutionary activities. Imprisoned until 1933, when he was released as a result of the intervention of such outstanding scholars as Albert Einstein, in 1937 he was arrested again and soon shot, along with his two sons and his brother. His major works include the following: Opisannie grecheskikh rukopisei monastyria sv. Yekateriny na Sinaie (Description of Greek manuscripts of St. Catherine Monastery in the Sinai, 3 vols.; 1912–1915); Ocherki po istorii Vizantii (Outline of Byzantine history, 4 vols.; 1912–1915); Sinagoga v 50 titulov i drugie iuridicheskie sborniki Joana Skholastika (Synagogue in 50 titles and other collections of law by Joannes Scholasticus; 1914); Sbornik pamiatnikov po istorii tserkovnogo prava, preimushchestvo russkoi tserkvi do epokhi Petra Velikogo (Collection of relics of legal history writing in the Russian Orthodox Church prior to Peter the Great, 2 vols.; 1914–1915). (EM)

Sources: Entsyklapedyia historyi Belarusi, vol. 2 (Minsk, 1994).

BIEŃKOWSKI Władysław (17 March 1906, Łódź–15 April 1991, Warsaw), Polish Communist activist, sociologist, and journalist. The son of a laborer, in 1934 Bieńkowski graduated in philosophy from Warsaw University, and then he worked as a teacher in Lwów (Lviv). During the German occupation he took part in a Communist conspiracy. From 1942 he belonged to the Polish Workers' Party (Polska Partia Robotnicza [PPR]), and he closely cooperated with Władysław Gomułka. In December 1943 he was co-founder of the Home National Council (Krajowa Rada Narodowa). From February 1945 to September 1946 he was deputy minister of education, and then, until February 1947, head of the Department of Propaganda of the PPR Central Committee (CC), playing an important role in shaping education and cultural policies. As the result of a fraudulent election in January 1947 he became MP in the Constituent Assembly on behalf of the PPR. From September 1946 to March 1947 and from January to October 1948 he was secretary of the PWP CC, but with the decline of Gomułka's position, Bieńkowski lost importance as well. In December 1948 he joined the Polish United Workers' Party (Polska Zjednoczona Partia Robotnicza [PUWP]), but he was dropped from the party's CC. At the end of 1948 he was appointed director of the National Library and held this position until November 1956.

Bieńkowski returned to politics in 1956, siding with Gomułka. In Gomułka's name he talked to the imprisoned primate, Cardinal Stefan Wyszyński, about the latter's release. From November 1956 to October 1959 he was minister of education, and in 1957–69 he was an MP again. He took an active part in the proceedings of the political discussion group, the Crooked Circle Club. Dismissed by Gomułka along with a group of party liberals, he gradually shifted toward the opposition. The publication of his works by the émigré Literary Institute in Paris was a political sensation: Motory i hamulce socjalizmu (Stimulators and brakes of socialism; 1969); Drogi wyjścia (Ways out; 1971); and Socjologia klęski. Dramat gomułkowskiego cztertnastolecia (The sociology of defeat: The drama of Gomułka's fourteen years in power; 1971). These works kept within the limits of Marxism, but Bieńkowski advocated increased powers for the parliament, limitations on censorship, and a reduction of the state bureaucracy. In May 1970 he was expelled from the PUWP. In 1976, simultaneously with the "Letter of 101" (men of culture protesting against amendment of the constitution), Bieńkowski sent his own "Open Letter on Polish-Soviet Relations." In 1977, along with Andrzej Kijowski and Stefan Kisielewski, he took part in a citizens' commission auditing the Committee for the Defense of Workers (Komitet Obrony Robotników [KOR]). In a special statement of September 1977 the commission issued a positive opinion on KOR activities. In 1978 Bieńkowski co-founded the independent Society of Scholarly Courses and took an active part in its activity. In 1981 he published Theory and Reality: The Development of the Soviet System, and in 1988 he broke with Marxist ideology in the work Zrozumieć społeczeństwo (To understand the society), published in Paris. (PK)

Sources: Mołdawa; Krystyna Kersten, Narodziny systemu władzy (Warsaw, 1990); Andrzej Friszke, Opozycja polityczna w PRL 1945–1980 (London, 1994); Marek Łatyński, Nie paść na kolana: Szkice o polskiej polityce lat powojennych (Wrocław, 2002); Opozycja w PRL: Słownik biograficzny, vol. 2 (Warsaw, 2002).

BIERUT Bolesław (18 April 1892, Rury Jezuickie, near Lublin–12 March 1956, Moscow), Polish Communist leader. Born into a Catholic peasant family, Bierut completed five grades of primary school. He started working at fourteen, at first in construction and then as a typesetter. In 1910 he met a radical cooperative activist, Jan Hempel. Under his influence, Bierut severed his ties with religion and became close to the revolutionary left. In 1912 he joined the Polish Socialist Party-Left (Polska Partia Socjalistyczna-Lewica). After the outbreak of World War I he went into hiding in Warsaw and Lublin to avoid being drafted by the army and to continue his revolutionary activities. In December 1918 he joined the Communist Workers' Party of Poland (KPRP; as of 1925 the Communist Party of Poland [KPP]). In the fall of 1919 he left the KPRP and, along with Hempel, joined the extremely leftist Union of Workers' Consumer Associations (Związek Robotniczych Stowarzyszeń Spożywczych). In 1921 Bierut returned to the KPRP. From 1923 he was active in the party apparatus in Zagłębie Dabrowskie, in the cooperative movement, and in the Polish Freethinkers' Society. In 1924 he was arrested for his Communist activities. Acquitted and released, he became a full-time party functionary. From May 1925 to May 1926, under the pseudonym "Jan Iwaniuk," Bierut studied at a party school in Moscow, where he underwent training in intelligence and sabotage work and where he met the majority of the KPP leadership. From 1925 to 1927 he was a member of the KPP Central Committee (CC); in 1926–27 he was head of the party's Central Technical Department, and from May 1927 he was a member of its Provisional National Secretariat. Temporarily arrested, in November 1927 Bierut again went to the USSR, where he attended the International Lenin School. Although from 1918 he was married to Janina Górczyńska, with whom he had two children, Bierut entered into a relationship with Małgorzata Fornalska and had a daughter with her.

In the faction struggle within the KPP Bierut supported the anti-Stalinist "majority," so he was "transferred" from the KPP to the All-Union Communist Party (Bolsheviks), and from 1930 he was active as an instructor in the Balkan Secretariat of the Executive Committee of the Comintern. As a Comintern agent and member of the CC of the Bulgarian party, Bierut, under the pseudonym "Mikołaj," often went to Austria, Czechoslovakia, and Bulgaria. In July 1932 he returned to Poland, taking over the secretariat of the KPP committee in Łódź. From 1933 he served as secretary of the CC of the International Organization for Aid to Revolutionaries in Poland. He also started working in the KPP Military Department, which cooperated with Soviet intelligence. On 11 December 1933 he was arrested and sentenced to seven years for his activities against the Polish state. In December 1938 he was released under an amnesty. In 1936 the KPP CC commission for the verification of the party's top members expelled him from the party for "behavior unbecoming of a Communist" during an investigation and trial. However, while Bierut served out his sentence, the Comintern dissolved the KPP, and the majority of its leaders were exterminated in the USSR. After his release Bierut worked in the cooperative movement.

In September 1939 Bierut went to the Polish Eastern Borderlands, which were occupied by the Red Army. From October 1939 he worked in Kowel, and between November 1939 and June 1941, at a construction project conducted by the USSR Commissariat of Transportation. In July 1940 the Control Commission of the Communist International quashed the charges that had been leveled against him by the KPP CC commission. The period between 1939 and 1943 in Bierut's life remains shrouded in mystery. Most probably, having regained the trust of the Kremlin, Bierut must have entered into closer contact with the Soviet intelligence service because after the Germans entered Minsk in June 1941, he assumed the post of deputy head of the economic and supplies department of the city board. At that time he moved in with Anastasia Kolesnikova, who bore him a daughter.

In July 1943 Bierut returned to occupied Poland. He started working in the editorial offices of Trybuna Wolności, an organ of the Polish Workers' Party (Polska Partia Robotnicza [PPR]), and, under the pseudonym "Bolesław Birkowski," he joined the CC of the PPR. He also often used the pseudonym "Tomasz." After the arrest of Fornalska and Paweł FINDER, in December 1943 Bierut became secretary of the CC of the PPR, and at the founding congress of the National Home Council (Krajowa Rada Narodowa [KRN]) on 1 January 1944, he was made its president. Already a conflict between Bierut and Władysław Gomułka, head of the PPR, was emerging. Gomułka wanted to formally broaden the political base of future Communist authority by including, for example, members of the Central People's Committee (Centralny Komitet Ludowy), while Bierut counted mainly on the backing of the Red Army and Soviet services. On 10 June 1944 he sent a letter to Georgi Dimitrov, head of the Comintern, accusing Gomułka of "sectarian" and "opportunist" tendencies and suggesting a change at the head of the party. This clash allowed the Kremlin to even more tightly control the leadership of the PPR.

At the end of July 1944 PPR and KRN leaders, including Bierut, arrived in Lublin, where the Polish Committee of National Liberation (Polski Komitet Wyzwolenia Narodowego [PKWN]) was installed. In addition to Gomułka, Jakub Berman, Hilary Minc, and Aleksander Zawadzki, Bierut became a member of the newly founded Politburo of the party. Along with the last three mentioned above, Bierut represented an extreme pro-Moscow tendency. Information about his membership in the PPR leadership was not announced; he was presented as a nonparty head of the KRN. On 5 August 1944 in the Kremlin Bierut participated in talks with the prime minister of the Polish government-in-exile, Stanisław Mikołajczyk. Bierut pretended then that he did not know anything about the outbreak of the Warsaw Uprising; in this way he wanted to make it more difficult for Mikołajczyk to use the uprising as an argument in support of the Polish cause. In the autumn of 1944 Bierut was instrumental in introducing harsher repressive measures against pro-independence forces in the territory of "Lublin Poland." These measures were employed by USSR intelligence, the NKVD, and the newly forming apparatus of the security department of the PKWN.

The day after the Red Army took the ruins of Warsaw, Bierut arrived in the capital, where on 19 January 1945, on behalf of the KRN, he received a military parade of the units of the new Polish Army. On his return from Yalta, Stalin called Bierut to Moscow and informed him about the decisions made there. Bierut became involved in propagating the Yalta agreements as the basis of the new Poland. On 21 April 1945 he was in Moscow again, where the Polish-Soviet treaty of friendship, mutual assistance and cooperation was signed. From 16 to 21 June he participated in Moscow talks that ended up in the formation of the Provisional Government of National Unity. The announcement of the creation of this government coincided with the announcement of sentences in the trials of the leaders of Underground Poland. Although Mikołajczyk joined the Provisional Government of National Unity and accepted the Yalta agreements, Bierut played a key role in the struggle to crush the Polish Peasant Party (Polskie Stronnictwo Ludowe), which enjoyed the support of the majority of Poles.

After the Communists stole the elections in January, on 5 February 1947 the Constituent Assembly elected Bierut president of Poland. In the summer of 1948 there emerged a sharp conflict in the PPR leadership. While Gomułka opposed the acceleration of collectivization and sanctions against the Yugoslav party, Bierut supported Stalin's line all the way. During his visit to the Kremlin on 15 August 1948 Bierut obtained Stalin's consent for the removal of Gomułka. At the PPR CC plenum, which started on 31 August, Bierut delivered the main speech, attacking Gomułka and bringing about his resignation. Subsequently, Bierut himself became secretary general of the PPR. After the PPR absorbed the already dependent Polish Socialist Party to form the Polish United Workers' Party (Polska Zjednoczona Partia Robotnicza [PUWP]) in December 1948, Bierut assumed the post of first secretary of the CC of the PUWP. He led the purge in the party apparatus and consolidated the party's strictly Stalinist leadership. He increased the number of Soviet advisers in the police and military. From May 1950 to March 1954 he was president of the Secretariat of the Organizational Bureau of the CC and then the first secretary of the CC of the PUWP. From May 1950 he was the actual head of the Presidium of the Council of Ministers, and between November 1952 and March 1954, prime minister. From 1949 until his death Bierut presided over the Public Security Commission of the PUWP CC Politburo. In this role he was directly responsible for the persecution of Polish pro-independence activists. He personally supervised investigations against officers and soldiers of the Home Army and the Polish Army and against some activists of the PPR and the wartime People's Army, including Gomułka. Bierut accepted cruel methods of extorting testimony. He also led the struggle against the Catholic Church, which culminated in the arrest of Primate Stefan Wyszyński in September 1953. Bierut supported the policy of collectivization and accelerated industrialization, which brought about a sharp supply crisis in 1954–56. Between May 1951 and July 1952 Bierut presided over the Constitutional Commission. As head of state, Bierut did not use his right to grant pardons in the cases of hundreds of people unjustly sentenced to death.

Bierut built a personality cult around himself modeled on that of Stalin. After Stalin's death in March 1953 Bierut opposed changes in the government system of Poland. However, under pressure from the Kremlin's "collective leadership" and because of ferment in the PUWP linked to the revelations of Józef Światło (a high-ranking security functionary who had fled to the West), Bierut resigned as prime minister in March 1954. Then, in December of the same year, he agreed that the Ministry of Public Security be replaced with the Public Security Committee. Formally supporting the "thaw," Bierut did all he could to deter the thaw process in Poland. In February 1956 he went to the Twentieth Congress of the CPSU in Moscow. During the debates he developed influenza, and after the congress his health deteriorated further. While Bierut was in Moscow, the PUWP's "active core" (i.e., the most active comrades) held a conference in Warsaw. At the meeting, the party leadership was subjected to much criticism. A few days later Bierut died in a Moscow hospital. (WR)

Sources: Mołdawa; Zbigniew Błażyński, Mówi Józef Światło: Za kulisami bezpieki i partii (London, 1985); Marek Łatyński, Nie paść na kolana: Szkice o opozycji lat czterdziestych (Warsaw, 1987); Jan Nowak, O proces Bolesława Bieruta (Warsaw, 1989); Krystyna Kersten, Narodziny systemu władzy: Polska 1943–1948 (Poznań, 1990); Czesław Kozłowski, Namiestnik Stalina (Warsaw, 1993); Andrzej Werblan, Stalinizm w Polsce (Warsaw, 1993); Andrzej

Garlicki, Bolesław Bierut (Warsaw, 1994); Polska-ZSRR. Struktury podległości. Dokumenty WKP(b), 1944–1948 (Warsaw, 1995); Piotr Lipiński, Bolesław Niejasny (Warsaw, 2001).

BIJEDIĆ Džemal (22 April 1917, Mostar–18 January 1977, Inač kod Kreševa), Bosnian Communist activist. Born into a Muslim family, Bijedić graduated from high school in Mostar and studied law at the University of Belgrade. In 1938 he joined the Union of Yugoslav Communist Youth (UYCY), and in 1939, the Communist Party of Yugoslavia (CPY). In 1940–41 he was secretary of the UYCY committee in Herzegovina. From the end of 1941 he fought with the Communist guerrillas of Josip Broz Tito. He was secretary of local CPY organizations in Mostar, Sarajevo, and Tuzla. From the founding congress of the Communist Party of Bosnia and Herzegovina in 1948 he was a member of its Central Committee. In 1970 he was elected speaker of the federal National Assembly. From 30 June 1971 until his death he was president of the Federal Executive Council (government) of Yugoslavia. In this capacity he advocated rapprochement between Yugoslavia and the Arab countries, which caused tension in the southern republics of the Yugoslav federation. Bijedić was killed in a plane crash. There were unconfirmed rumors that the accident could have been the work of anti-Muslim forces in Bosnia and Herzegovina. (WR) Sources: Enciklopedija Jugoslavije, vol. 1 (Zagreb, 1980); Ante Čuvalo, Historical Dictionary of Croatia (Lanham, Md., 1997).

BIL'AK Vasil (11 August 1917, Krajná Bystrá, near Svidník), Slovak Communist activist of Ukrainian descent. Bil'ak worked as a tailor until 1949. From 1945 he belonged to the Communist Party of Czechoslovakia (CPC), and during the period of accelerated advancement of workers after 1948 he joined the party apparatus and was a Central Committee (CC) member from 1954. In 1955–68 he was secretary and member of the CC Presidium of the Communist Party of Slovakia (CPS), and from January to August 1968 he was first secretary of the CPS CC. From December 1958 to February 1963 he was plenipotentiary for education (the equivalent of minister in the Slovak government). From July 1960 to January 1963 he was also minister of education in the Czechoslovak government. In 1960–63 he was deputy chairman of the Slovak National Council. From 1960 to 1969 he was MP to the National Assembly, and from 1969 to 1989 he was deputy to the House of Commons of the Federal Assembly.

In April 1968 during the "Prague Spring," Bil'ak was elected as a representative of the party hardliners, to the Presidium of the CPC CC. A staunch opponent of democratic change, in August 1968, along with other dogmatists, such as Alois Indra and Antonín Kapek, he signed a letter to the Soviet leadership asking for intervention in the defense of “socialism.” In August 1968 he took part in Moscow talks between Czechoslovak and Soviet leaders, openly supporting the Soviet point of view. In November 1968 he became secretary of the CPC CC responsible for foreign policy and ideology. In the 1970s and 1980s he belonged to the chief engineers of “normalization,” and, among other things, he was responsible for the purges of intellectuals. Trusted by Leonid Brezhnev, he had significant influence in the CPC apparatus and shaped the neo-Stalinist line of the party. After 1985 he was a fierce opponent of perestroika. In December 1989, as one of the most compromised functionaries of the regime, he was deprived of all positions. Removed from the CPC, he retired to Bratislava. From June 1990 there was an investigation into his role in the preparation of the Warsaw Pact invasion of August 1968, but in 2002 he was acquitted of high treason. Despite his protests, in 1991 his unauthorized memoirs, Míl'niky môjho života (Milestones of my life), were published. (PU)

Sources: ČBS; Kdo byl kdo v našich dějinách ve 20. století, vol. 1 (Prague, 1998); Who's Who in the Socialist Countries of Europe, vol. 2 (Munich, London, and Paris, 1989); Českoslovenští politici: 1918–1991 (Prague, 1991); Gordon H. Skilling, Czechoslovakia's Interrupted Revolution (Princeton, 1976); Vladimír V. Kusin, From Dubcek to Charter 77: A Study of “Normalization” in Czechoslovakia 1968–1978 (New York, 1978); Zdeněk Mlynař, Nightfrost in Prague: The End of Humane Socialism (New York, 1980); Alexander Dubcek, Hope Dies Last (New York, 1993).

BILCZEWSKI Józef (26 April 1860, Wilamowice, near Kęty–20 March 1923, Lwów), Roman Catholic archbishop of Lwów. Bilczewski came from a peasant family and was one of nine children. After finishing high school, he worked in Mogiła, near Kraków, and then he went to study archeology and theology in Vienna, Rome, and Paris. Ordained in July 1884, in 1890 he defended a postdoctoral degree thesis in archeology at the Jagiellonian University, where he started working the following year. In 1893 he received the title of professor of archeology. From 1900 he was a member of the Polish Academy of Arts and Sciences (Akademia Umiejętności), and in 1900–1 he was rector of the Jagiellonian University. On 17 December 1900 he was appointed archbishop of Lwów in the Latin rite. He followed the program of social Catholicism in the spirit of the teachings of Pope Leo XIII. For example, he founded many professional, educational, economic, and charity organizations. In 1906 he was one of the co-founders of the Catholic Social Union. He was also a patron of Catholic trade unions in Galicia; these were coming into existence at that time. Bilczewski used his income to found schools, shelters for orphans and poor children, libraries, and reading rooms. He was the author of (among other works) textbooks on archeology and catechism and volumes of Listy pasterskie (Pastoral letters; 1922–24), which were translated into several foreign languages. During World War I he defended its victims regardless of whether they were Poles, Ukrainians, or Jews. In November 1918, along with Andrey Sheptytsky, Bilczewski tried in vain to prevent the outbreak of Polish-Ukrainian fighting, and when the struggle took place (1918–19), he was able to maintain good relations with the Greek Catholic hierarchy. On 26 June 2001 Pope John Paul II beatified Bilczewski during ceremonies in Lviv. (WR)

Sources: Encyklopedia historii Drugiej Rzeczypospolitej (Warsaw, 1999); Osservatore Romano (weekly edition in English), 2001, nos. 25 and 27.

BILIŃSKI Leon (15 June 1846, Zaleszczyki–6 June 1923, Vienna), Polish economist and politician. Biliński graduated in law from the University of Lviv (Lwów). In 1867 he earned a doctorate there, and a year later, a postdoctoral degree. In 1879 he was elected rector of this academy, as a result of which he entered the State Diet in Lviv. In 1883 he was elected to the Austrian Council of State, where he attracted attention with his speeches on taxation and the budget. In 1892 he became the president of the General Management of State Railways, and between 1895 and 1897 he was minister of finance in the government of Kazimierz Badeni. Next he assumed the post of governor of the Austro-Hungarian Bank, in which he served until 1909. From 1909 to 1911 he was again minister of finance of Austria, and from 1912 to 1915, minister of finance of Austria-Hungary. In July 1914 Biliński was one of four ministers who supported a moderation of the demands of an ultimatum presented to Serbia so that its government could accept them. After the end of the war he moved to Warsaw, where from August 1919 he served as minister of finance in the Polish government headed by Ignacy Paderewski. He attempted to balance the budget and to control inflation by floating an internal loan. His criticism of uncoordinated government expenses led to a serious clash between him and Paderewski, and in November 1919 Biliński resigned. In 1920 he returned to Vienna, where he assumed the presidency of the Polish-Austrian Bank. He was also a member of the liquidation committee of the Austro-Hungarian Bank and the author of many scholarly works—for example, Wykłady ekonomii społecznej (Lectures on social economics; 1873–74) and System nauki skarbowej (System of financial science; 1876). He represented theoretical views similar to those of the historic school. He published Wspomnienia i dokumenty (Memoirs and documents, 2 vols.; 1924–25). (WR) Sources: Polacy w historii; Encyklopedia historii Drugiej Rzeczypospolitej (Warsaw, 1999).

BĪLMANIS Alfreds (2 February 1887, Riga–26 July 1948, Rehoboth Beach, Delaware), Latvian diplomat. After graduating from high school in 1905, Bīlmanis studied in the Department of History of Moscow University. He graduated in 1910, and later he received a Ph.D. at the University of Vilnius (Wilno). In 1910–11 he served in the army, and between 1912 and 1914 he worked as a teacher and director of a high school in Yerevan and Volhynia. Mobilized into the army as a reserve officer in July 1917, he served on the staffs of various armies and edited military periodicals. He was moved to the reserves in April 1918 and returned to his job as a teacher and social worker in Równe. After returning to Latvia in 1920, he was secretary and then head of the Press Department of the Foreign Ministry. From June 1932 to October 1935 he was ambassador to the USSR and then to the United States. After Latvia was occupied by the Red Army and incorporated into the USSR, in July 1940 Bīlmanis was dismissed by the new authorities, but he continued his mission as Latvian ambassador to the United States until his death. In this capacity he was deputy to the ambassador to Great Britain, Kārlis Zariņš, whom the last independent Latvian government had appointed an extraordinary minister plenipotentiary to direct diplomatic services and to represent the state in case its legal authorities would not be able to. Bīlmanis authored and edited a number of historical works illustrating the Latvian right to independence, including Latvia in the Making (1928); Latvia in the Present World Crisis (1941); Three Stars between the Anvil and Hammer (1942); Baltic States and the Problem of Freedom of the Baltic Sea (1943); Latvian-Russian Relations (1945); and The Church in Latvia (1945). His History of Latvia was published posthumously in 1951. (EJ)

Sources: Latvijas darbinieku galerija (Riga, 1928); Es viņu pazīstu (Riga, 1939); Latvia in 1939–1942 (Washington, D.C., 1942); J. Feldmans, “Alfreds Bīlmanis,” Tēvzeme, 14 August 1948; A. B., “Dr. A. Bīlmanis un viņa mūža darbs,” Latvija Amerikā, 20 October 1951; A. Dzirkale, “Alfrēda Bīlmaņa piemiņai,” Latvija Amerikā, 2–6 February 1952; P. Prieditis, “Dr. Alfreds Bīlmanis diplomāts un tiesību cīnītājs,” Universitas, 1974, no. 33.

BIRK Aadu (Ado) (14 November 1883, Tarvastu–2 February 1942, Sosva, Sverdlovsk region), Estonian politician and economic activist. Birk studied at the Orthodox theological seminar in Riga and later at the Theological Academy in Petersburg. Afterward he studied law at the universities in Dorpat (Tartu), Petersburg (1908–11), and Leipzig (1911). In 1911 he became head of the Statistical Office in Tallinn, where he was noticed by one of the city’s most prominent lawyers, Jaan Poska, mayor of Tallinn from 1912. In 1912–17 Birk was Poska’s assistant, and he advanced with the increasing influence of his boss. In 1917 he became secretary of the Estonian Provincial Assembly (Eesti Maanõukogu [EPA]). After Estonia was occupied by Germany in 1918, Birk went to Helsinki, where he tried to get local politicians involved in the Estonian cause. After the liberation of Estonia, in 1918–19 he was EPA president and chaired a committee preparing elections to the Estonian Constituent Assembly (Eesti Asutav Kogu). Later he became its deputy speaker. In 1919–20 he was twice minister of foreign affairs. From 28 to 30 July 1920 he was briefly prime minister and then ambassador to Moscow until 1925.

In 1925 Birk was appointed foreign minister again. He tried to avoid frictions with the USSR. When at the end of 1925 the Ministry of Foreign Affairs was taken over by the pro-Polish Ants Piip, Birk was sent as ambassador to Moscow again. The Kremlin tried to win over Estonia through trade contracts, but differences in perceiving the long-term benefits of such cooperation became a source of problems for Birk, who was recalled home in 1926. He refused to return and stayed in the USSR, where he fell victim to a GPU (gosudarstvennoe politicheskoe upravlenie) provocation and was arrested. In 1927 he managed to return to Estonia, where he was arrested on account of spying for the Soviet Union. His case became one of the most publicized political trials in the country, and prominent lawyers were engaged in his defense, including the Social Democratic leader August Rei. The accusation against him was not proved, and in November 1927 Birk was released. The question of whether he was or was not a Soviet agent remains open. Until 1940 he was involved in business and social work, with, among others, the Estonian Rifle Association and the Estonian Apostolic Orthodox Church. After the Soviet invasion, on 14 June 1941 he was arrested and transferred to the Sosva labor camp, where he was sentenced to death. He died a few days before execution. (AG)

Sources: Piotr Łossowski, Stosunki polsko-estońskie 1918–1939 (Gdańsk, 1992); www.president.ee/eng/riigipead/AaduBirk.html; Pekka Erelt, “Eesti Diplomat GPU Võrgus,” Eesti Ekspress, 3 June 1999, www.ekspress.ee/Arhiiv/1999/22/Aosa/Elu.html, www.orthodoxa.org/estonie/histoireaoc/thesegeb.htm.

BIRKAVS Valdis (28 July 1942, Riga), Latvian politician. Birkavs graduated from the Department of Law of the Latvian State University (LSU) in Riga in 1969. In 1968–86 he worked as an expert, head of section, and director of a criminological laboratory, and from 1986 he lectured at the LSU in Riga, where he received a Ph.D. A member of the Communist Party of Latvia, in 1988 he was co-founder and chairman of the Association of Latvian Lawyers. In 1990–93 he was deputy to the Supreme Council of the Latvian SSR, and after restoration of independence, of the Supreme Council of Latvia. He represented the Latvian National Front and was deputy chairman of its parliamentary club. In 1993 he was elected to the parliament (Saeima) on behalf of the Latvian Way (Latvijas Ceļš) as one of its leaders and was chairman from 1997. From 8 July 1993 to 15 September 1994 he was prime minister. He resigned as the result of a split in the ruling coalition of his party and the Latvian Agrarian Union. The collapse of the coalition resulted from different approaches to tariff policies and to the disclosure in the parliament that two members of the cabinet—Foreign Minister Georgs Andrejevs and minister without portfolio Edvins Inkars—had been KGB agents. In 1994–98 Birkavs was minister of foreign affairs; from September 1994 to November 1995 he was deputy prime minister, and from July 1999 to May 2000, minister of justice. He played an important role in Latvia's endeavors to integrate with European and Atlantic security structures. In October 2000 he was reelected to the parliament. (EJ)

Sources: Who Is Who in Latvia 1996: Biographical Dictionary (Riga, 1996); Wielka Encyklopedia PWN, vol. 4 (Warsaw, 2001); Andrejs Plakans, The Latvians: A Short History (Stanford, 1995); Jurijs Dreifelds, Latvia in Transition (Cambridge, 1996); Kas ir kas Latvijā (Riga, 1999); www.rulers.org.

BIRŽIŠKA Mykolas (12 August 1882, Viešniai–24 August 1962, Los Angeles, Ca.), Lithuanian historian of literature and politician. The son of a doctor, in 1907 Biržiška graduated in law from Moscow University and settled in Vilnius (Wilno). In 1910–11 he edited the periodical Visuomenė and took part in the activities of the Lithuanian Research Society and the Social Democratic Party. After Vilnius was occupied by the Germans in 1915, he stayed and worked for the Lithuanian Committee of Aid to War Victims. He also directed the first Lithuanian high school in Vilnius. He wrote several textbooks on the Lithuanian language and the history of literature, and he lectured at the Higher School of Humanities. During a September 1917 conference he joined the Lithuanian Council (Lietuvos Taryba), and on 16 February 1918 he co-signed the declaration of Lithuanian independence. From December 1918 to March 1919 he was minister of education. When Vilnius came under Polish self-government, representing the Polish majority of the city, on 2 January 1919 Biržiška published a protest, and after the city was seized by the Bolsheviks, he was temporarily arrested. When the Polish Army took the city in April 1919, he was elected chairman of the Lithuanian Committee. He took part in talks held with the Poles in Suwałki; these were concluded on 7 October 1920 with an agreement on the separation of Polish and Lithuanian troops, leaving Vilnius on the Lithuanian side. After the violation of this agreement and seizure of the city by the Polish troops under General Lucjan Żeligowski, Biržiška secretly published papers and leaflets criticizing Polish activities. Arrested by the Polish authorities, in February 1922 he was released on the condition that he leave for Lithuania.

Biržiška settled in Kaunas, where he directed a high school and lectured in the history of Lithuanian literature at the newly founded Vytautas Magnus University. In 1925 he published his main work, Mūsų raštų istorija (History of our literature). In 1922–25 he was dean, and in 1926–27 rector, of the Kaunas university. He belonged to the editorial board of the Lithuanian encyclopedia (1932–44), and from 1940 to 1944 he was a member of the Lithuanian Academy of Literature. He was engaged in publicizing true or alleged Polish wrongdoings to the Lithuanians—for instance, in the Union of Liberation of Vilnius (Vilniui Vaduoti Sajunga). He published a chronicle, Vilniaus Golgota (The Golgota of Vilnius; 1930), exaggerating Polish repression. In 1931 he visited the United States, promoting the Lithuanian vision of the historical and contemporary reality of Vilnius. He published Iš mūsų kultūros ir literatūros istorijos (From the history of our culture and literature, 2 vols.; 1931–38). When Lithuania got the Vilnius region from the Soviets, Biržiška became rector of Vilnius University, purged the Polish teachers, and published his version of its history as Senasis Vilniaus Universitetas (The old Vilnius University; 1940). He remained the rector under the German occupation. In April 1943 he chaired a meeting of Lithuanian politicians who supported the creation of Lithuanian troops to fight against the Soviets and published a proclamation on the subject that was censored by the Germans. Biržiška signed the document. Before the return of the Red Army in the summer of 1944, Biržiška left for Germany, where he was professor of the Baltic University in Hamburg and then in Pinneberg until 1949, when he settled in the United States. He also published a collection of documents in Polish, Na posterunku wileńskim (On the Vilnius outpost, 4 vols.; 1920–36). In exile he published Lietuvių tautos kelias (The way of the Lithuanian nation, 2 vols.; 1952–53) and two volumes of memoirs, Dėl mūsų sostinės (For our capital; 1960–62). (WR) Sources: EL, vol. 1; V. Maciunas, "Mykolas Biržiška," Aidai (Brooklyn), 1952, no. 7; Alfred E. Senn, The Emergence of Modern Lithuania (New York, 1959); Piotr Łossowski, Litwa a sprawy polskie 1939–1940 (Warsaw, 1982); Alfonsas Eidintas and Vytautas Žalys, Lithuania in European Politics: The Years of the First Republic, 1918–1940 (New York, 1997).

BISTRAS Leonas (20 October 1890, Liepaja–18 October 1971, Kaunas), Lithuanian politician. In 1911–14 Bistras studied medicine in Geneva and Dorpat (Tartu), as well as philosophy in Fribourg, Switzerland, where he received a Ph.D. in 1921. From 1910 he wrote for a Catholic periodical, Ateitis, and he belonged to the Christian Democratic Party. For some time he was its chairman, and for many years he belonged to its leadership. Three times elected to the parliament, in 1922–23 he was its speaker. From 25 September 1925 to 15 June 1926 he was prime minister and minister of defense. For some time he also directed the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. His government failed to convince the Holy See about its vision for the Lithuanian province, including Vilnius (Wilno). When in April 1926 Pope Pius XI attached the Vilnius metropolis to the Polish church organization, the Lithuanian Christian Democrats suffered a defeat in prestige. Bistras resigned as a result of the May 1926 elections lost by the right. After the Nationalist coup of December 1926, he returned to the government as minister of education and held this office until May 1927, when the Christian Democrats withdrew from the government. During the regime of Antanas Smetona he remained in opposition until March 1939, when the Nationalists attempted to widen the political foundation of their government and offered him the portfolio of education again. He held this office until November 1939. From 1922 to 1940 he lectured in philosophy at Kaunas University. In 1929–36 he was editor-in-chief of the Catholic daily, Rytas, critical of the Nationalist dictatorship to the extent that was allowed by censorship, and from 1936 he contributed to the periodical XX Amžius. He translated the papal encyclicals Rerum navarum, Graves de communi, and Quadragesimo anno into Lithuanian. After Lithuania was occupied by the Red Army, on 11 February 1940 Bistras was arrested and then deported to Siberia. He spent sixteen years in the Gulag and in forced settlement. In 1956 he was allowed to return to Kaunas. (WR)

Sources: EL, vol. 1; Alfonsas Eidintas and Vytautas Žalys, Lithuania in European Politics: The Years of the First Republic, 1918–1940 (New York, 1997).

BISZKU Béla (13 September 1921, Márokpapi), Hungarian Communist activist. Biszku was born into a peasant family that moved to Budapest in 1929. He qualified as a metalworker and started working in a crane and machinery factory in 1937. In 1943 he joined the Metalworkers' Trade Union, and in 1944, the illegal Hungarian Communist Party (HCP). Between 1944 and 1945 he was one of the leaders of armed resistance in the Thirteenth Quarter of Budapest, Angyalföld. After the war he organized the HCP structures there. From 1946 he worked in the Budapest committee of the party, and in June 1949 he became head of its personnel department. In 1951 he was appointed secretary of the Tenth Quarter (Kőbánya) committee of the Hungarian Workers' Party (HWP), and in September 1953 he started studying in the HWP Higher Political School. From the spring of 1955 he was secretary of the Angyalföld HWP committee. In the first days of the 1956 revolution he organized armed groups of party members and workers in order to suppress the insurgency.

After the revolution was suppressed, Biszku became a member of the Central Committee (CC) and Politburo of the new Hungarian Socialist Workers' Party (HSWP). On 8 December 1956 he became first secretary of the Budapest party committee, and in February 1957, minister of interior in the government of János Kádár. Biszku bears the responsibility for the repression against the insurgents of 1956. He played a key role in preparing the trial of Imre Nagy and his aides. In August 1957 in Moscow he discussed the general idea of the trial, the indictment, and possible sentences. In 1958–71 and 1975–85 Biszku was MP, and in September 1961 he was promoted to the post of deputy prime minister. In November 1962, at the eighth party congress, he was elected the CC secretary for administration. At the same time he left his government post. From December 1963 he was the CC secretary for organization, and from 1966, for both administration and organization. He represented the extreme dogmatic wing of the party leadership, in opposition to the economic mechanism launched in 1968, and largely contributed to its failure. In the fall of 1972, enjoying the support of the Kremlin, Biszku tried to force a more conservative line, challenging Kádár. In January 1973 he was appointed head of the Commission for Physical Education and Sports. In 1980 he was dismissed from the Politburo and in 1985 from the HSWP CC. (JT)

Sources: Magyar Nagylexikon, vol. 4 (Budapest, 1995); A magyar forradalom és szabadságharc enciklopédiája, CD-ROM (Budapest, 1999); Ki kicsoda 2000 (Budapest, 2001); Bennet Kovrig, Communism in Hungary from Kun to Kádár (Stanford, 1979); Miklós Molnár, From Béla Kun to János Kádár: Seventy Years of Hungarian Communism (New York, 1990).

BIZAUSKAS Kazimieras (2 February 1893, Pavilosta–26 June 1941, near Minsk), Lithuanian Christian Democratic politician. Bizauskas studied law in Moscow, and after that he worked as a teacher. Elected to the Lithuanian Council (Tarybe) in 1917, he signed the declaration of independence of Lithuania of 16 February 1918. From 1920 he was an MP representing Christian Democracy. He negotiated the Soviet-Lithuanian peace treaty of 12 July 1920. In 1922 he was a Lithuanian representative to the Vatican, and from 1923 he was at missions in the United States, Latvia, Great Britain, and the Netherlands. From 28 March 1939 to 17 April 1940 he was deputy prime minister in the government of Antanas Merkys. In September 1939 he opposed an alliance of Lithuania with Germany against Poland that was proposed by some members of the government. After the fall of Poland he was summoned to Moscow, and on 10 October 1939 he signed a treaty of mutual assistance with the USSR providing the incorporation of the district of Vilnius (Wilno) to Lithuania. In November 1939 he assumed the post of government plenipotentiary in that region. In relations with the local Polish committee he remained moderate, although he opposed the patriotic gestures of the Polish clergy. At the time of the invasion of the Soviet forces, on 15 June 1940, he represented the Lithuanian authorities to the special representative of the USSR, Vladimir Diekanozov. After the “elections” to the new National Assembly he was arrested in November 1940. After the outbreak of the German-Soviet war in June 1941 he was evacuated from prison in a death march and was shot by the NKVD somewhere around Minsk. (WR)

Sources: EL, vol. 1; Piotr Łossowski, Litwa a sprawy polskie 1939–1940 (Warsaw, 1982).

BLACHNICKI Franciszek Karol (24 March 1921, Rybnik–27 February 1987, Carlsberg), Polish Catholic priest and social activist. In 1939 Blachnicki graduated from high school in Tarnowskie Góry. He fought in the Polish-German war of September 1939 and then worked in the underground. Arrested in the spring of 1940 and deported to the concentration camp in Auschwitz (identification number 1201), he was held there until September 1941. In March 1942 he was sentenced to death, but owing to the efforts of his family, his sentence was commuted to ten years’ imprisonment. Released by the American Army in April 1945, Blachnicki returned to Poland and entered the Silesian Theological Seminary in Kraków. Ordained in June 1950, he worked as a curate in the parishes of Upper Silesia (1950–56). In 1957 he founded a sobriety movement called the Temperance Crusade. In August 1960 the Polish Communist authorities liquidated the headquarters of the movement in Katowice. In response, he sent out a number of memorials. Arrested in March 1961 and sentenced to nine months, after his release he pursued further studies and scholarly work at the Catholic University of Lublin. In 1965 he defended his doctoral thesis, and in 1977 he received a postdoctoral degree. He published around one hundred scholarly and popular works. Between 1964 and 1980 he worked for the postconciliar renewal of the liturgy in Poland.

In 1963 Blachnicki began to conduct retreats that evolved into the “oasis” movement. From 1969 this movement was called the Living Church Movement, and from 1976, the Light and Life Movement. His initiative was accepted in hundreds of Polish parishes, becoming the basis for great educational work among the youth, as well as among the elderly, and in 1973 Blachnicki began to create the Home Church Movement for the renewal of family life in Poland. In 1981 in Lublin he established the Independent Christian Social Service, whose aim was to prepare staff for social and political work. On 9 December 1981 he left Poland and went to Rome. He was there when martial law was declared in Poland. He settled in Marianum, a Polish center in Carlsberg in Germany. There he established the International Evangelization Center, Life and Light. In June 1982 Blachnicki founded the Christian Service for the Liberation of Nations, which propagated the ideals of nonviolent resistance in Eastern Europe. He also initiated the establishment of consecrated life communities: a women’s Institute of the Immaculate Mother of the Church and the Community of Priests of Christ the Servant. In February 1994 he was posthumously decorated with the Commander’s Cross of the Order of Polonia Restituta. In November 2001 the diocesan phase of his beatification process was completed. Blachnicki published, for example, Dziesięć kroków ku dojrzałości chrześcijańskiej (Ten steps toward Christian maturity; 1977) and Prawda–Krzyż–Wyzwolenie: Ku polskiej teologii wyzwolenia (Truth–Cross–Liberation: Toward a Polish theology of liberation; 1985). (AGr)

Sources: Słownik biograficzny katolickiego duchowieństwa śląskiego XIX i XX wieku (Katowice, 1996); M. Paluch, Zarys historii Ruchu Światło-Życie (Lublin and Kraków, 1998); J. Mikulski, Polska teologia wyzwolenia: Teologia wyzwolenia człowieka w ujęciu ks. Franciszka Blachnickiego; an extensive bibliography included (Tarnów, 2000).

BLAGA Lucian (5 May 1895, Lancreâu, Transylvania–6 May 1961, Cluj), Romanian diplomat, poet, and philosopher. The son of an Orthodox priest, Blaga initially studied in a theological seminary in Sibiu (Hermannstadt) and then at Vienna University (1916–20), where he received a Ph.D. on the basis of his work Kultur und Erkenntnis (Culture and knowledge). Later he wrote poems and was engaged in journalism. For many years he contributed to a traditionalist periodical, Gladirea (1921–41). He was in large part influenced by Friedrich Nietzsche and Oswald Spengler, and he glorified nature and the national mystique. He used elements of Dionysian expressionism, both in his philosophical works and in his poems and plays. He combined his reflections on the mystical ethos of the Romanian peasantry (“Mioritic space,” from the folk ballad “Miorița”) with the intuitive German philosophy of his time. He also opposed French influence on Romanian culture and advocated replacing it with German influence.

This philosophical stance was instrumental in Blaga’s political activity. From 1926 he worked in diplomacy, advancing from attaché in Warsaw to counselor of the embassy in Switzerland (1928–32) and Vienna (1932–37) and ambassador in Lisbon (1938–39). His diplomatic career came to an end with the development of the royal dictatorship of Charles II. His Germanophilic and mystical philosophy was unacceptable to the regime, since it was too close to the extreme nationalism of the Iron Guard. In 1937 Blaga became a member of the Romanian Academy of Sciences, and in 1939 he was appointed professor of the philosophy of culture at Cluj University (1939–49). After the Communist takeover he was deprived of the right to teach, although he formally remained a “scholarly worker” of the university. He was ostracized, kept under police surveillance, and died in oblivion. In 1966 his memoirs, Hronical și cîntecul vîrstelor (Chronicle and song of life) were published. In the 1980s some aspects of his intellectual output were rehabilitated by the Communist regime, and since its collapse his thought has revived. In 1989 a large collection of his poems was published in the United States as At the Court of Yearning: Poems. In 1990 his autobiographical novel, Luntrea lui Caron (Charon’s boat), was published, in which he presented the tragic fate of the Romanian intelligentsia and nation after World War II. (MC)

Sources: Biographisches Lexikon, vol. 1; Kurt W. Treptow and Marcel Popa, Historical Dictionary of Romania (Lanham, Md., 1996); Dimitrie Vatamaniuc, Lucian Blaga, 1885–1961: Biobibliografie (Bucharest, 1977); I. Opreșan, Lucian Blaga printer contemporani: Dialoguri adnotate (Bucharest, 1987); Corin Braga, Lucian Blaga: Geneza lumilor imaginare (Iași, 1998); Dorli Blaga, Blaga supraviețuit de Securitate (Cluj, 1999); Mircea Muthu, Lucian Blaga: Dimensiuni rasaritene (Pitești, 2000); R. T. Allen, “The English Language Web Site for Lucian Blaga (1895–1961),” <http://homepage.ntlworld.com/rt.allen/blagindex.html>.

BLAGOYEV Dimiter (14 June 1856, Zagorichane, Aegean Macedonia [now in Greece]–7 May 1924, Sofia), Bulgarian theorist of Marxism and revolutionary activist. Blagoyev came from a poor peasant family. From 1870 to 1877 he was educated in Istanbul, Adrianople, Gabrovo, and Stara Zagora, and in 1878 he went for further education to Russia. During his natural science and law studies in Petersburg he became involved in the Russian revolutionary movement. In 1883 he created the first Social Democratic organization in Russia, from where he was expelled in 1885 because of his revolutionary activities. After his return to Bulgaria he propagated Socialist ideas in the Syvremennyi pokazatel newspaper and in Den magazine. On his initiative the Bulgarian Social Democratic Party was created at a congress in Buzludzha in 1891. In his first original Bulgarian work on Marxism, Shto e sotsializym i ima li toi pochva u nas? (What is socialism and does it have roots in our country? 1891), he argued with the proponents of socialism who pursued limited, mainly economic, aims without forming a strong party of the working class. After the unification of the Socialist organizations in 1894 Blagoyev became the leader of the Marxist current within the Bulgarian Workers’ Social Democratic Party (BWSDP). He expressed his views in Novo Vreme magazine, which he edited. There he also published many articles including “Marksizym ili bernstainianstvo?” (Marxism or revisionism? 1901), and “Opportunizym ili sotsializym?” (Opportunism or socialism? 1902). He also published articles in the Leninist Iskra.

In 1903 Blagoyev, along with Gavrilo Georgiev and Georgi Kirkov, caused a split in the BWSDP into “broad” and “narrow” Socialists, and he became the leader of the latter (Tesnyaks). With his direct involvement, the General Workers’ Syndicate Union was created in 1904, the organization that led a wave of strikes in 1906–9. Blagoyev laid the foundations for Marxist philosophical and economic thought in Bulgaria. He was also the author of works on the history of the workers’ movement in Bulgaria, esthetics, and the theory of literature. He wrote (for example) Dialektychen materializym i teoriia na poznanieto (Dialectical materialism and the theory of cognition; 1903–4) and Prinos kym istoriata na sotsializma v Bylgariia (Contribution to the history of socialism in Bulgaria; 1906). During the Balkan Wars (1912–13) and World War I (1914–18) the BWSDP (Tesnyaks) under his leadership struggled against “militarism” and “Greater Bulgarian chauvinism,” putting forward slogans of peace and cooperation among the Balkan nations for the sake of the revolution. Blagoyev attended two Balkan Socialist conferences and the congress of the Second International in Copenhagen (1910) as the chairman of the Tesnyak delegation. In 1902–19 he was elected to the parliament three times, and he presided over the parliamentary group of Tesnyaks; between 1911 and 1915 he was also a councillor in the Sofia commune.

There, especially after 1914, he spoke against granting credits for war purposes. It was with satisfaction that he welcomed the Bolshevik Revolution in Russia. He was a co-organizer of the Communist International. The party he led evolved in 1919 into the Bulgarian Communist Party and passed a programmatic declaration in the Leninist spirit. Blagoyev published (mainly in the Rabotnicheski vestnik newspaper) articles denouncing imperialism and criticizing the views of Karl Kautsky, who spoke against the principle of the dictatorship of the proletariat. In the spring of 1923 Blagoyev withdrew from active political life due to ill health. (JJ)

Sources: Entsiklopediya Bulgariya, vol. 1 (Sofia, 1978); Dimiter Blagoev 1856–1966, eds., Ruben Avramov and Maria Chervendineva (Sofia, 1970); Letopis za zhivota i deynostta na Dimiter Blagoev 1856–1924, vols. 1–2 (Sofia, 1974–1975); Kiryl Vasiliev, Dimiter Blagoev: A Biography (Sofia, 1977); Tadeusz Wasilewski, Historia Bulgarii (Wrocław, 1988).

BLAHO Pavel (25 March 1867, Skalica–29 November 1927, Bratislava), Slovak Agrarian politician and cultural and educational activist. Blaho came from a peasant Catholic family. In 1898 he completed medical studies in Vienna, where he was a leader of the Slovak academic youth, and then he worked as a doctor in Skalica. From 1903 to 1914 and in 1918 he also worked seasonally at the health resort of Luhačovice in Moravia. Along with Vavro Šrobár he founded and edited the magazine Hlas (1898–1904), which provided a platform for young Slovak intellectuals who opposed conservatism, Russophilia, and the policy of passive resistance of the Slovak National Party (Slovenská Národná Strana) leadership. From 1906 to 1918 he was a member of the Hungarian parliament. Along with Milan Hodža he was one of the main proponents of the agricultural cooperative movement. He conducted extensive educational work in the Slovak countryside, established libraries and temperance societies, and organized education for the youth in Czech schools. He advocated cooperation with the Czechs and initiated the so-called Luhačovice conferences (1908–14), at which the representatives of the Slovak and Czech national independence movements met. He organized training trips for Slovak farmers to farms in Bohemia and Moravia. From 1912 to 1913 he traveled throughout the United States, giving lectures that contributed to the political activation of Slovak émigrés.

At the end of 1918 Blaho participated in the organization of the Czechoslovak state administration in Slovakia, and he joined the Slovak Club in the National Assembly in Prague. The assembly was convened under the provisional constitution that was passed by the Czechoslovak National Committee. In 1919 he became president of the National Republican Peasant Party (Národná a Republikánská Strana Rol'nícka), later renamed the Slovak Agrarian Party (Slovenská Národná a Rol'nícka Strana), which in 1922 merged with the Czech Agrarians into a nationwide party, the Republican Party of Farmers and Peasants (Republikánská Strana Zemědělského a Maloroľníckého Lidu). In 1920–27 Blaho was member of the National Assembly and deputy president of the Agrarian parliamentary club. In 1921 he became president of the Agricultural Council in Bratislava. (MG)

Sources: SBS; Reprezentačný–biografický lexikón Slovenska (Martin, 1999); Politická elita meziválečného Československa 1918–1938: Kdo byl Kdo (Prague, 1998); Štefan Janšák, Život Dr. Pavla Blahu, vols. 1–2 (Trnava, 1947); Włodzimierz Winclawski, Lud, naród, socjologia: Studium o genezie socjologii słowackiej (Toruń, 1991).

BLAKYTYNYI Vasyl [originally Ellanskyi], pseudonyms “Markiz Popelastyi,” “Vasyl Ellan,” and others (12 January 1894, Kozeľ, Chernikhiv region—4 December 1925, Kharkiv), Ukrainian writer and Communist activist. Blakytnyi graduated from the Chernikhiv theological seminary, and in 1912–15 he studied in the Trade Institute in Kiev, where he was active in illegal student revolutionary groups. In 1917 he joined the Ukrainian Party of Socialist Revolutionaries (Ukraińska Partiiia Sotsialistiv-Revolutsioneriv), becoming a leader of its leftist wing, which became the Ukrainian Communist Party. The left wing group was the so-called Borotbists, named after their periodical, Borot'ba, meaning Struggle. Blakytnyi was also editor of this periodical and of the research and literary biweekly Zshytky borotby. One of the initiators of the merger of the Borotbists with the Communist Party (Bolsheviks) of Ukraine (Komunistyczna Partia [Bilzowykiw] Ukrajiny [CP(B)U]), from 1920 Blakytnyi was a member of the CP(B)U, and from 1920 to his death, of its Central Committee. In 1920–21 he was director of the Ukrainian State Publishing House, and from 1921 to his death, editor-in-chief of the newspaper Visti VUTsVK. He started his literary career in 1912, but he published his first works in 1918. He was one of the pioneers of Ukrainian Soviet literature, editor of and contributor to many periodicals (such as Shlakhyy mystetstva, Vsesvit, and Chervonyi perets), and co-founder (1923) and leader of Hart, the Association of Proletarian Writers. In 1920 he published a volume of proletarian lyrics, Udary molota i sertsia (Hammer strokes and heartbeats). He also wrote political satire. In 1924 he published Notatky olivtsem (Pencil notes) and Radyanska hirchytisia (Soviet charlock), and in 1925,

Derzhavnyi rozum (State reason). In the 1930s Stalinist authorities found nationalistic elements in his writings, so his works were confiscated, and his statue in Kharkiv was demolished. The most complete edition of his works is Tvory (Works, 2 vols.; 1958). (BB)

Sources: Encyclopedia of Ukraine, vol. 1, (Toronto, 1984); Ukraińska Literaturna Entsyklopediia, vol. 1 (Kiev, 1988); Malyi Slovnyk Istorii Ukraïny (Kiev, 1997); Dovidnyk z Istorii Ukraïny (Kiev, 2001).

BLANDIANA Ana [originally Otilia Coman] (6 February 1942, Timișoara), Romanian poet and dissident. Blandiana's father spent fourteen years in a Communist prison, which strongly influenced her childhood and youth. She made her literary debut in 1959, and in 1967 she graduated in philology from the university in Cluj. In 1968–84 she edited a student periodical, Amfiteatrul, and from 1968 she wrote columns for Contemporanul and România Libera, critical of Stalinist schemes. In her collections of poems and essays, such as A tria taina (Third secret; 1969); Cinzece de poeme (Fifty poems; 1970); Cele patru anotimpurii (Four seasons; 1977); Întîmplări din gredina mea (Events from my garden; 1980); and Stea de pruda (Rapacious star; 1985), she was not only innovative, but also intellectual and sensible. In 1968 she won an award from the Association of Romanian Writers, in 1974 an award from the Romanian Academy, and in 1982 the Herder Award. In view of the repression of the freedom of creativity and the violation of human rights of the Nicolae Ceaușescu regime, Blandiana spoke up against it. In 1984 she wrote Questionarul pentru Ana Blandiana (A questionnaire for Ana Blandiana), in which she protested against artistic conformism. She also wrote a series of poems, Analogica, in which she warned against the demographic policy of the regime, which forbade abortion so as to increase the population but caused such ills as poverty and depersonalization. Publication of this collection was banned and Amfiteatrul was closed down, but her poems circulated in samizdat. In 1988 Blandiana was punished again with the ban on the publication of a collection of verses for children, Întîmplării de pe strada mea (Events in my street), whose hero, a cat by the name of Arpagic, was a parody of the dictator. On 3 March 1989 she wrote an open letter to Ceaușescu protesting censorship and stressing that her poems could have been published in the USSR and East Germany: and not in Romania.

After the revolution of December 1989, Blandiana was included in the Council of the National Salvation Front (Frontului de Salvare Național). Soon, however, she resigned in protest against post-Communist manipulation, which deprived the council of a democratic character. In 1991 she published 100 poeme (100 Poems). She co-organized the Civic Alliance (Alianța Civică [CA]) and joined its leadership. The organization declined to seek power but aimed at a critical analysis of systemic transformation and democratic development. The CA became one of the foundations of the Democratic Convention of Romania (Convenția Democrată Română [RKD]). After the convention took over power in 1997, the CA left it in 1999, criticizing its anti-democratic policies and excessive submission to the post-Communist Democratic Party, its coalition partner. Blandiana was in favor of this secession, expressing her attachment to democracy. In 1990 a collection of her poems was published in London as The Hour of Sand. From 1994 she was director of the Museum of Remembrance of the Victims of Communism. (ASK)

Sources: Andrei Codrescu, The Hole in the Flag (New York, 1991); Daniel N. Nelson, ed., Romania after Tyranny (Boulder, Colo., 1992); Șerban N. Ionescu, Who Was Who in Twentieth Century Romania (Boulder, Colo., 1994); www.memorialsighet.ro.

BLAUMANIS Rūdolfs (1 January 1863, Ērgļi, Livonia–4 September 1908, Takaharju, Finland), Latvian writer and poet. Blaumanis's father worked as a cook at an estate. In 1881 Blaumanis graduated from a German trade school in Riga. He lived in his rural district, and for some time he was a scribe at the estate in Koknese. He published his first novel, written in German, in 1882. In 1887–93 he wrote reviews in a German newspaper in Riga. Later, in Riga and in Ērgļi, he concentrated entirely on writing. Between 1898 and 1903 he contributed to Latvian newspapers in Riga and St. Petersburg, and from 1906 he edited a newspaper, Latvija. He wrote poems, stories, and stage plays. Latvian peasants, estate workers, and fishermen were predominant in his works; they were representatives of the life he knew from experience. He used humor extensively. Among other works, he was the author of Skroderdienas Silmačos (Tailors' days in Silmaci; 1902), the most often produced Latvian stage play, and a comedy, Ugunī (Fires; 1906). He also wrote patriotic poetry about the heroism of Latvian soldiers in the fight against the Teutonic knights in the thirteenth century: Tālavas taurētājs (Trumpeter from Tālava). Blaumanis died of tuberculosis and was buried in Ērgļi. (EJ)

Sources: P. Zālīte, Rūdolfs Blaumanis: Viņa darbi un nozīme literatūrā (Riga, 1923); Antons Birkerts, Rūdolfs Blaumanis dzīvē un darbā (Riga, 1930); Alfons Vilsons, Latviešu literatūras klasiķis Rūdolfs Blaumanis (Riga, 1956); Rūdolfs Blaumanis laika biedru atmiņās (Riga, 1962); Lutsia Volkova, Tapšana (Riga, 1988); Andrejs Plakans, Historical Dictionary of Latvia (Lanham, Md., 1997).

BŁODNIEKS Ādolfs (24 July 1889, Tukums, Courland–21 March 1962, Brooklyn, N.Y.), Latvian politician. Born into a peasant family, Błodnieks was educated in a trade school in Tukums. In 1905 he took part in the revolution and was seriously injured. Later he graduated from a high school oriented toward the natural sciences and mathematics in Kursk, and from 1910 he studied at the Riga Polytechnic Institute. During World War I he volunteered for the Russian Army and served in the air force. In 1917 he was elected a member of the Soviet of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies in Petrograd. Later, however, he was a co-founder of the Latvian Party of National Democrats and was active in the Union for the Defense of the Fatherland and Freedom, an anti-Bolshevik organization under the leadership of Boris Savinkov. In 1919 he returned to Latvia and became head of a department in the Ministry of Finance. He was a member of the Latvian Provisional National Council and then a deputy to the Constituent Assembly and the parliaments (Saeima) of subsequent terms. He was one of the founders of the new Farmers' and Smallholders' Party (Jaunsaimnieku un Sīkgruntnieku Partija), and from 1921 he was editor of the party newspaper, Latvija. From 23 March 1933 to 17 March 1934 he was prime minister. After the occupation of Latvia by the Red Army in 1940 he avoided deportation, and in 1944 he went into exile. In 1960 in New York he published The Undeclared Nation. (EJ)

Sources: Latvijas darbinieku galerija (Riga, 1928); Latvijas vadošie darbinieki (Riga, 1935); Es viņu pazīstu (Riga, 1939); Piotr Łossowski, Kraje bałtyckie od demokracji parlamentarnej do dyktatury (1918–1934) (Wrocław, 1972); Andrejs Plakans, Historical Dictionary of Latvia (Lanham, Md., 1997).

BNIŃSKI Adolf (21 August 1884, Kossowo, near Gostyń–7/8 July 1942, near Poznań), Polish politician and social worker. Bniński graduated from high school in Inowrocław in 1905, and then he studied at the Jagiellonian University in Kraków and later in Munich and Halle in Germany. He was active in laying the foundations of the Polish administration in Greater Poland (Poznania) and Central Poland; he was government commissioner in Łódź (1918–19) and head of the county administration (starosta) in Środa Wielkopolska (1919–20). In 1923–28 he was provincial governor (wojewoda) of Greater Poland. He sympathized with National Democracy, and with its support he ran in the 1926 presidential election, but he lost to Ignacy Mościcki. Apart from his political activities, Bniński ran family estates in Gułtowy and Biskupice in Greater Poland and took part or presided over many social and economic organizations, such as the Greater Polish Agricultural Chamber (1920–22), Catholic Action, and the Supreme Council of Landowners' Organizations (1937). He was also one of the chairmen of the Chief Administration of Popular Reading Rooms. After the May coup of 1926 he approached the ruling group of Józef Piłsudski, and as a result he was appointed senator. In the 1930s he tried to stimulate conservative circles, creating the Conservative Party (Stronnictwo Zachowawcze) in 1938, but to no major avail. After the German invasion of 1939 he joined in underground activities under the pseudonym "Białoń," de facto holding the position of delegate of the government-in-exile for the territories incorporated into Germany from 3 May 1940. Prime Minister General Władysław Sikorski confirmed him formally in this position on 4 December 1940. At the end of July 1941 Bniński was arrested by the Gestapo in Poznań, imprisoned in Fort VII, sentenced to death, and shot (probably with seven aides) in a forest near Poznań. (AG)

Sources: Kto był kim w Drugiej Rzeczypospolitej (Warsaw, 1994); S. Dworacki, ed., Wojewoda Adolf hr. Bniński (1884–1942): Materiały do sesji okolicznościowej w Gułtowach (Poznań, 1997); Andrzej Kwilecki, Ziemiaństwo wielkopolskie (Poznań, 1998); Krzysztof Jasiewicz, Lista strat ziemiaństwa polskiego 1939–1956 (Warsaw, 1995); Waldemar Grabowski, Delegatura Rządu Rzeczypospolitej na Kraj (Warsaw, 1995).

BOBAN Mate (1940, Sović, near Grude–7 July 1997, Mostar), Croatian leader from Bosnia. In 1958 Boban joined the League of Communists of Yugoslavia (LCY). For more than twenty years he was its local functionary. A turning point in his career came in 1990, when he founded the Democratic Union of Herzegovina and soon merged it into the Croatian Democratic Union of Bosnia-Herzegovina (CDUBH). On behalf of this party he won a parliamentary seat. Soon he became the CDUBH deputy chairman and later chairman. He took over from the previous party leader, Stjepan Kljujić, who had lost the support of the Croatian president, Franjo Tuđman. On 3 July 1992 Boban took the lead of Herceg-Bosnia, thought to be a Croatian state within Bosnia-Herzegovina and supported militarily by Croatia. For about a year heavy fighting took place in the Lašvanska Valley between the Croats and Muslims, and about thirty thousand people perished. Boban initially took part in international negotiations and accepted the Cyrus Vance and David Owen Plan of 1992–93. Boban's idea of resettling Bosnian Croats to parts of Bosnia-Herzegovina where they were in the majority, thought to be coordinated with the Roman Catholic Church, in fact led to a conflict between Boban and Archbishop Vinko Puljić. In view of growing international criticism of the Bosnian Croats—it was connected to information about the torture of Muslims in concentration camps—Tuđman called upon Boban to respect international law. Finally, accused of ethnic cleansing, Boban was dismissed as a result of international pressure. (AO)

Sources: Laura Silber and Allan Little, The Death of Yugoslavia (London, 1995); David Owen, Balkan Odyssey (New York, San Diego, and London, 1995); Norman Cigar, Genocide in Bosnia (Texas A&M University Press, 1995); Susan L. Woodward, Balkan Tragedy (Washington, D.C., 1995); Ante Čuvalo, Historical Dictionary of Bosnia and Herzegovina (Lanham, Md., 1997); www.rferl.org; www.bosnet.org.

BOBOSHEVSKI Tsvetko (8 August 1884, Vratsa–21 December 1952, Sofia), Bulgarian politician and lawyer. In 1906 Boboshevski completed law studies in Paris. He returned to Bulgaria and became a lawyer in Vratsa. He joined the National Party, and after it merged with the Progressive Liberal Party, he joined the United National Progressive Party, in which he served as secretary from November 1920. Having joined the oppositional Constitutional Bloc in 1922, he participated in the preparations for the military coup of 9 June 1923, in which he took an active part. After the coup he joined the People's Alliance. In the government of Aleksandur Tsankov he served as minister of trade, industry, and labor (June 1923–November 1924) and as minister of justice (November 1924–January 1926). In the cabinet of Andrei Liapchev he again assumed the position of minister of trade, industry, and labor (January 1926–May 1930). In the 1930s he joined a political group centered around the magazine Mir. He supported the coup of 19 May 1934. In 1934–36 he was president of the Bulgarian Mortgage Bank. During World War II he maintained an anti-Fascist and anti-German stance, but he refused to cooperate with the Communists. He was also against organizing a guerrilla movement. In March 1943 he was involved in a movement to save the Bulgarian Jews. He was a supporter of the pro-English and pro-French lines in foreign policy. However, he joined the Fatherland Front as an independent intellectual. The Communists rewarded him for that, appointing him, along with Venelin Ganev and Todor Pavlov, one of the three regents of Bulgaria. Boboshevski took an ambiguous stance on various issues; sometimes his attitude was even favorable to the opposition. He held the post of regent from 9 September 1944 until 8 September 1946, when Bulgaria was proclaimed a republic. (JJ)

Sources: Entsiklopediya Bulgariya, vol. 1 (Sofia, 1978); Tasho V. Tashev, Ministrite na Bylgariia 1879–1999 (Sofia, 1999).

BOBROWSKI Czesław (17 February 1904, Sarny–17 May 1996, Warsaw), Polish economist and politician. In 1925 Bobrowski graduated from Warsaw University and in 1927, from the Ecole des Sciences Politiques in Paris. In 1925–26 he worked in the Polish General Consulate in Prague; from 1931 to 1932 he was director of a Polish-Soviet trade company, Sovpoltorg, in Moscow; and in 1936–39 he was director of a department in the Ministry of Agriculture and Land Reforms. In 1931 and 1933–36 he edited the biweekly Gospodarka Narodowa. During World War II he lived in the West, where he co-authored the “plan for the first six months” of Polish economic policy after the war. He came back to Poland in August 1945. A deputy to the Communist-controlled Home National Council (1945–47) and to the Constituent Assembly (1947–51), from August 1946 to December 1948 he was a member of the Supreme Board of the Polish Socialist Party (Polska Partia Socjalistyczna [PPS]), and from November 1945 to March 1948 he chaired the Central Planning Office (Centralny Urząd Planowania [CUP]) and was deputy chairman of the Economic Committee of the Council of Ministers. He co-authored the Three-Year Plan for Economic Reconstruction, passed in September 1946 and based on a well-balanced concept of an even rate of growth in all branches of the economy. He distanced himself from the Soviet model of planning and from the “battle for trade” policy of the (Communist) Polish Workers' Party (Polska Partia Robotnicza [PPR]), which meant complete nationalization. At a joint meeting of PPS and PPR leaders on 18–19 February 1948 Hilary Minc (PPR) attacked the CUP for favoring consumption and not production, for deviation from Marxist “science,” and for mixing up planning and forecasting. The resignation of Bobrowski and liquidation of the CUP are thought to be the beginnings of Stalinization in the Polish economy.

In 1948–50 Bobrowski was an ambassador to Sweden, and then he remained abroad. In 1952–56 he worked in the Centre Nationale de la Recherche Scientifique in Paris. On 30 October 1951 he was stripped of his parliamentary mandate. He returned to Poland during the “thaw.” From 1956 he worked at Warsaw University, where in 1959 he became a full professor. In 1957–63 he was deputy chairman of the Economic Council of the government and favored the decentralization of economic management and a more flexible, indicative planning. From 1964 to 1968 he was president of the Main Board of the Popular Knowledge Society. In the 1960s and 1970s he worked for various international organizations. He was UN planning adviser for the governments of Algeria, Ghana, and Syria. He also taught in France and Italy. As dean of the Department of Economics, on 8 March 1968 he intervened with the authorities on behalf of repressed students. After the introduction of martial law in December 1981, he took the position of chairman of the Consultative Economic Council, authenticating party and government policies. From 6 December 1986 to 17 July 1989 he belonged to the Consultative Council for the Chairman of the Council of State, General Wojciech Jaruzelski. Bobrowski authored numerous works, including U źródeł planowania gospodarczego (At the roots of economic planning; 1956), and Wspomnienia ze stulecia (Memoirs of one hundred years; 1983). (PK)

Sources: Mołdawa; Wielka Encyklopedia Powszechna, vol. 4 (Warsaw, 2001); Jan Drewnowski, "Proces Centralnego Urzędu Planowania," Zeszyty Historyczne, 1974, no. 28; Krystyna Kersten, Narodziny systemu władzy (Poznań, 1990).

BOBRZYŃSKI Michał (30 September 1849, Kraków–3 July 1935, Poznań), Polish historian of law and politician. After graduating from St. Ann High School in Kraków, Bobrzyński studied law at the Jagiellonian University in Kraków. In 1872 he received a Ph.D. there. He mainly dealt with the history of Polish and German law. From 1879 he was a full professor at the Kraków university. In 1878 he became a member of the Academy of Arts and Sciences. In the next dozen years he published several works, including Dzieje Polski w zarysie (Outline of Polish history; 1879), revised and reedited many times. He was of the opinion that Old Poland's problems were a result of a weak state authority and not the greed of its neighbors. This view stimulated fierce debates among historians and politicians. One of the founders of the so-called Kraków historical school, in 1885 Bobrzyński was elected to the Galician Land Parliament (Sejm) and to the parliament in Vienna, where he sat until 1908 (with a break in 1900–1903). He was one of the leaders of the Kraków Conservatives, the so-called Stańczyk group, advocating "organic work" and not armed insurrections as the best national policy. He thought Galician Poles should support the Habsburgs in exchange for guarantees of national development. In 1891–1901 Bobrzyński was vice-president of the Land School Council in Lwów (Lviv) and contributed to the extension of the school network and the upgrading of Galician education.

When Governor Andrzej Potocki was assassinated by a Ukrainian in April 1908, Bobrzyński became his successor. In the five years of his term his main goals were the easing of Polish-Ukrainian tensions and a reform of the Galician electoral law. He thought it in the interest of Poland to support Ukrainians against Russia, which he perceived as the main threat to Poland. On both issues he faced strong opposition from the National Democrats, and when both projects failed, he resigned in May 1913. After the outbreak of World War I he tried to push through a plan for the unification of the Russian-controlled former Kingdom of Poland with Austria. In 1916–17 he was Austrian minister for Galicia, focusing his efforts on a draft law separating Galicia and making it easier for its future merger with the rest of Polish territories. After Poland regained independence, Bobrzyński retired from political life. In 1919 he settled on the Poznanian estate of Graby and returned to scholarly work. In 1919 he chaired the Inquiry (Ankieta), a group of experts evaluating various projects of the constitution. In 1922 he co-authored a proposal for the autonomy of Lwów (Lviv), Stanisławów (Ivano-Frankivsk), and Tarnopol (Ternopil) Provinces, and in 1926 he took part in the Commission of Three to prepare a reform of the administration. He was also the author of Wskreszenie państwa polskiego (Revival of the Polish state, 2 vols.; 1920–25) and the memoirs Z moich pamiętników (From my diary, 2 vols.; 1957). (PU)

Sources: PSB, vol. 2; Encyklopedia historii Drugiej Rzeczypospolitej (Warsaw, 1999); Waldemar Łazuga, Michał Bobrzyński: Myśl historyczna a działalność polityczna (Warsaw, 1982); Henryk Wereszycki, Historia polityczna Polski 1864–1918 (Wrocław, 1990); Wojciech Kaute, Synteza dziejów Polski Michała Bobrzyńskiego (Katowice, 1993); Józef Buszko, Polacy w parlamencie wiedeńskim 1848–1918; (Warsaw, 1996); Piotr Majewski, ed., Michał Bobrzyński o potrzebie "silnego rządu" w Polsce (Warsaw, 2001).

BOCHEŃSKI Józef [monastic name Innocenty] (30 August 1902, Cuszów, near Kraków–8 February 1995, Fribourg, Switzerland), Polish logician and philosopher. Born into a landowner's family, in 1920 Bocheński took part in the Polish-Soviet war. Later he studied economics in Poznań (with, among others, with Florian Znaniecki), philosophy in Fribourg, and theology in Rome. At first he considered being an agnostic; in 1926, however, he entered a theological seminary in Rome, and in 1932 he was ordained in the Dominican Order. In 1931 he received a Ph.D. in philosophy, and in 1934, in theology. Afterward he lectured at the Collegium Angelicum in Rome and at the Jagiellonian University in Kraków. He took part in the Polish-German war of 1939, and as chaplain of the Polish Army in the Italian campaign, he was at the Battle of Monte Cassino (May 1944). From 1945 he was a professor at Fribourg University, where he lectured in the history of twentieth-century philosophy. In 1950–51 he was dean of the Philosophical Department and from 1964 to 1966, rector of this university. He also taught at the University of Notre Dame (1955–56), UCLA (1958–59), the University of Kansas (1960), the University of Pittsburgh (1968), and the Canadian University of Alberta in Edmonton (1971). In 1972 he retired but continued intensive scholarly activities.

As a philosopher Bocheński firmly opposed relativism and skepticism. He was of the opinion that the world is a logic structure, recognizable through experience and common sense. In numerous works and public presentations he criticized nationalism, racism, pacifism, feminism, and anarchism as contrary to the rudiments of European culture. He also opposed a liberal interpretation of humanism and democracy and argued that they stemmed from Christianity. His main philosophical interest was in liberty and authority. The most important of his early works include the following: De cognitione existentia Dei (On the recognition of the existence of God; 1936); Elementa Logicae Graecae (Elements of Greek logic; 1937); Europäische Philosophie der Gegenwart (Contemporary European philosophy; 1947); The Ancient Formal Logic (1951); Formale Logik (Formal logic; 1956); and The Logic of Religion (1965). Until 1994 he was president of the World Council of Societies of Logic and Methodology of Science.

Bocheński was a pioneer of Sovietology. He founded the Institute of Eastern Europe in Fribourg and was its first director. He advised the governments of West Germany (the Konrad Adenauer cabinet), the United States, Argentina, and Switzerland. He considered Marxism as a set of false enunciations and stressed the contradictions between communism and the European tradition. He edited Studies in Soviet Thought and the series Sovietica. He authored dozens of books, including Handbuch des Weltkommunismus (Handbook of world communism; 1958); Der sowjetrussische dialektische Materialismus (Diamat) (Soviet dialectics of materialism [Diamat]; 1962), and Sto zabobonów: Krótki filozoficzny słownik zabobonów (One hundred superstitions: A short philosophical dictionary of superstitions; 1987). He held numerous honorary doctorates, from Polish, U.S., Latin American, and African universities. He founded the Polish Catholic Mission in Switzerland and was its first rector. From 1945 to 1989 his works were banned in Poland, but after the fall of communism he was reappeared in the Polish media and publications. (PK)

Sources: International Who's Who 1983/84; Ks. D. Gabler, "Józef Maria Bocheński: Logik, filozof, mędrzec," Tygodnik Powszechny, 25 October 1987; Aleksander Bocheński, Materiały do kroniki rodzinnej Bocheńskich (Fribourg, 1981); Słownik historii doktryn politycznych, vol. 1 (Warsaw, 1997); E. Morscher and O. Neumaier, Joseph Maria Bocheńskis Leben und Werk (Salzburg, 1988); Między Logiką a Wiarą. Z Józefem M. Bocheńskim rozmawia Jan Parys (Warsaw, 1998).

BODNARAŞ Emil (10 February 1904, Kolomyia–24 January 1976, Vienna), Romanian Communist activist. Bodnaraş' father was Ukrainian, and his mother was German. After graduating from high school he studied law at the university in Iaşi. However, he did not complete his studies, and he switched to the Officers' Academy in Timișoara, from which he graduated in 1927. Next, he began his military service, first in Craiova and then in Sadagura, close to the Soviet border. From there, as an agent of Romanian intelligence, he managed to get to the USSR in 1931. Captured, he agreed to switch loyalties; he underwent training in the OGPU (Obedinennoe gosudarstvennoe politicheskoe upravlenie) center in Astrakhan and started working in the foreign intelligence of the NKVD. As an NKVD agent, Bodnaraş, who was fluent in German, went on many spy missions to Poland and the Baltic states. On his way to Bulgaria in 1934 he was recognized at a station in Bucharest, and he was arrested. Condemned to death for desertion and for crimes against the security of Romania, he had his sentence commuted to ten years' imprisonment. He served his sentence in prisons in Doftana, Aiud, Galați (Galatz), Braşov, and Caransebeş, where he met the leadership of the Romanian Communist Party (RCP), became close to Gheorghe Gheorghiu-Dej, and formally entered the RCP.

Released on 7 November 1942, Bodnaraş settled in Brăila, where, under the pseudonym "Engineer Ceauşu," he continued to spy for the USSR despite the fact that he was under police surveillance. The most mysterious period in his life was between 1942 and 1944. In those years he visited Tîrgu-Jiu Prison and met the RCP leaders who were being held there. This must have taken place with the full knowledge of Siguranța, the security police of Marshal Ion Antonescu, who probably hoped that Bodnaraş might become a willing tool in his hands when Romania joined the side of the Allies. However, Bodnaraş was a key figure chosen by the Kremlin not only to direct the Communist takeover, but also to remove unwanted persons from the Communist leadership. As early as April 1944 he dismissed the formal head of the party, Ştefan Foriş. As a result, the leadership of the RCP was assumed by a group that arrived from the USSR and by Gheorghiu-Dej. Bodnaraş represented the RCP in the group of politicians who were preparing Romania's shift to the side of the Allies. In May 1944 he attended a meeting with King Michael at which the overthrow of Antonescu was mentioned for the first time. During the coup in August 1944 Bodnaraş commanded the Patriotic Guard, a unit of which imprisoned Antonescu and then handed him over to the Soviets. The Patriotic Guard was the germ of the Communist political police, to which Bodnaraş recruited not only Soviet agents, but also criminals and members of the Fascist Iron Guard who wanted to avoid responsibility. On 15 January 1945 the prime minister, General Nicolae Rădescu, called for the dissolution of the Patriotic Guard, but Bodnaraş ignored this order.

In February 1945 Bodnaraş was instrumental in overthrowing the government of Rădescu. In the cabinet of Petru Groza, Bodnaraş served as undersecretary of state in the Prime Minister's Office, and in fact he controlled Groza's moves. In April 1945 Groza formally appointed him head of the government political information service. In this capacity, until 1947 Bodnaraş was in charge of the cruel suppression of opposition leaders. In December 1947 he became defense minister and was promoted to general. He monitored the army's behavior toward the Communist-imposed abdication of King Michael, and then he conducted a purge of the army. As a member of the party Politburo, Bodnaraş often acted as a mediator between fractious factions. He was also responsible for brutal persecutions in the Greek Catholic Church, the Roman Catholic Church, and the Orthodox Church, as well as for collectivization, during which many resisting peasants were killed and tens of thousands were sent to forced labor camps—for example, along the Danube-Black Sea Canal.

Bodnaraş supported Gheorghiu-Dej in his efforts to eliminate the group of Ana Pauker, Vasile Luca, and Teohari Georgescu in 1952 and to dismiss and then murder Lucreţiu Pătrăşcanu (1948–54). Bodnaraş gradually removed direct Soviet executors from the security apparatus and from the army and replaced them with similar Romanian elements. During the Hungarian Revolution of 1956, when the leadership was afraid that the unrest might spread to Romania, Bodnaraş became head of the government's special military and police command. This command pressured the Kremlin to launch a military intervention in Budapest. When the Communists arrested Imre Nagy and took him to Bucharest, Bodnaraş also had an opportunity to interrogate him. At the end of November 1956 he arrived in Budapest to help János Kádár rebuild the political police, with the assistance of Hungarian agents from Transylvania.

Bodnaraş supported Gheorghiu-Dej in his struggle against Miron Constantinescu and Iosif Chişinevschi in 1957. From 1956 to 1959 Bodnaraş was formally only a minister of transport, and his position in the party leadership was due to his position in the KGB. From the end of the 1950s he closely cooperated with Gheorghiu-Dej in his efforts to carve out a more independent foreign policy for the RCP. However, the degree of the Kremlin's tolerance for this policy, as well as Bodnaraş's true motives in this matter, are controversial. As early as 1955, Gheorghiu-Dej and Bodnaraş were intending to demand the withdrawal of Soviet troops from Romania, and they achieved this goal in May 1958. In February 1964 Bodnaraş was a member of the Romanian delegation sent to Moscow and Beijing in an attempt to ease the conflict between China and the USSR. He was closely connected with Nicolae Ceauşescu from the time the latter was his subordinate as chief political commissar of the army. After Gheorghiu-Dej's death, in March 1965 Bodnaraş supported Ceauşescu's candidacy as Gheorghiu-Dej's successor. At the Ninth Congress of the RCP in July 1965 Bodnaraş joined the new seven-member Standing Presidium of the CC. He remained a member of this presidium until the end of his life, probably to make credible the RCP's "independent line" toward the Kremlin. Although in 1954 he voted in favor of the execution of Pătrăşcanu, after Pătrăşcanu's rehabilitation in 1968 Bodnaraş published an article mourning the death of a "great personality" and a "good friend." Bodnaraş supported the consolidation of Ceauşescu's power, delivering, for example, the main speech on amendments to the constitution in 1974. (WR) Sources: Michael Shaffir, Romania: Politics, Economics and Society (Boulder, Colo., 1985); Victor Frunză, Istoria stalinismului în România (Bucharest, 1990); Edward Behr, Kiss the Hand You Cannot Bite: The Rise and Fall of the Ceauşescus (New York, 1991); Şerban N. Ionescu, Who Was Who in Twentieth Century Romania (Boulder, Colo., 1994); G. Iavorschi, "Pentru cine a lucrat 'inginerul Ceauşu?'" Magazin Istoric, 1994, no. 9; Dennis Deletant, Communist Terror in Romania: Gheorghiu-Dej and the Police State, 1948–1965 (New York, 1999).

BŐHM Vilmos (6 January 1880, Budapest–28 October 1949, Stockholm), Hungarian politician and trade union activist. A mechanic by trade, Bőhm started his political career in the Hungarian Social Democratic Party (HSDP) with trade union activity. In 1912 he was elected to the HSDP leadership and soon became secretary of the National Union of Iron and Nonferrous Metal Workers. During the republican revolution of late 1918, he was secretary of state in the Ministry of Defense and chairman of the committee for demobilization. From January 1919 he was minister of defense in the government of Dénes Berinkey. After the proclamation of the Hungarian Soviet Republic (HSR) in March 1919 he continued directing this ministry and took over the high command of the Hungarian Red Army fighting in Slovakia. In the spring of 1919 he favored armistice with the Entente and opposed the Soviet-type rule of "the dictatorship of the proletariat." In March and April 1919 he was also people's commissar for nationalization. He was proud that nationalization in Hungary went further than in Soviet Russia.

From July 1919 Bőhm was minister plenipotentiary in Vienna, where he held talks with the representatives of the Entente on the international recognition of the HSR. After the fall of Soviet rule in Hungary he stayed in Vienna, where he worked as a senior salesman in a department store. At the same time he wrote memoirs and articles on the Hungarian revolution, including A Magyar Tanácsköztársaság keletkezése és összeomlása (The rise and fall of the Hungarian Soviet Republic; 1920) and Két forradalom tüzeben (In the flames of two revolutions; 1923). From 1934 he lived in Czechoslovakia and then in Sweden, where he was active in the Hungarian Social Democracy movement abroad. Among other things, during World War II he was a go-between in the talks between the Hungarian government and the anti-German coalition. In 1945 he returned to Hungary, taking the lead of the right wing of the Social Democratic Party, unwilling to merge with the Communists. From 1946 he was ambassador to Sweden. In 1948 he resigned and refused to go back to Hungary. In Communist historiography he is shown as a representative of the conservative, or even treacherous, attitude of the Social Democrats. (MS)

Sources: Magyar Nagylexikon, vol. 3 (Budapest, 1994); Nagy Képes Milleniumi Arcképcsarnok (Budapest, 1999); Új Magyar Életrajzi Lexikon, vol. 1 (Budapest, 2001); Rudolf L. Tókes, Béla Kun: The Man and the Revolutionary (New York, 1966); Éva Szabó, "Adalékok Bóhm Vilmos politikai életrajzához," Történelmi Szemle, 1980, no. 1; László Havanyecz, "Egy elsőgenerációs hazafi," Népszabadság, 1997, no. 107.

BOJKO Jakub (7 July 1857, Gręboszów, near Dąbrowa Tarnowska–7 April 1943, Gręboszów), Polish peasant politician. Bojko did not finish school but was an autodidact. He worked on his family farm and was also a peasant teacher, a communal writer, and an administrative head of the Gręboszów rural district. He published articles in Wieniec and Pszczółka and then in Przyjaciół Ludu and Piast. From the beginning of the 1890s he was active in the peasant movement. He was a co-founder of the Peasant Party (Stronnictwo Ludowe [SL]) and a member of the party's top executive body. He was the SL deputy to the Galician Diet (1895–1914) and to the Austrian Reichsrat (1897–1918). After the split in the SL he joined the Polish Peasant Party Piast (Polskie Stronnictwo Ludowe Piast), and in 1914–18 he was president of the party. In independent Poland Bojko was a member of the Main Board (1918–20) and of the Chief Council (1919–27) of the PSL Piast. On behalf of this party he was elected to the Constituent Assembly and served as deputy speaker. From 1922 to 1927 he was senator and deputy Senate speaker. He backed the coup of May 1926; therefore in 1927 he left the PSL Piast and founded Peasant Unification (Zjednoczenie Ludu), a party that supported the new regime. However, his new party did not gain any significant support among the peasants, so he was reelected to the Assembly in 1928 on behalf of the Nonparty Bloc of Cooperation with the Government (Bezpartyjny Blok Współpracy z Rządem [BBWR]). In 1930 he became a BBWR senator. However, owing to his age and health he was less and less active, and he focused mainly on writing his memoirs. In his village, Bojko was a well-known storyteller, and his articles, stories, and poems were very popular. It was his book Dwie dusze (Two souls; 1904) that brought him the greatest fame. He also authored Ze wspomnień (From the memoirs; 1959). (WR) Sources: Kto był kim w Drugiej Rzeczypospolitej (Warsaw, 1994); Wilhelm Feldman, Stronnictwa i programy polityczne w Galicji 1846–1906 (Kraków, 1907); Zygmunt Lasocki, Polskie Stronnictwo Ludowe w czasie wojny (Kraków, 1935); Andrzej Zakrzewski, Wincenty Witos (Warsaw, 1978).

BOLETINI Isa (15 January 1864, Boletin, near Mitrovica–23 January 1916, Podgorica), Albanian independence activist. Boletini came from a rich family from Kosovo. From 1878 he participated in the League of Prizren, which was instrumental in the Albanian national awakening. He took part in the last battle of the league's supporters with the Turkish troops at Slivove (22 April 1881). After the fall of the league, with his detachment Boletini continued operations in the neighborhood of Sokolica, avoiding Turkish pacification in 1884–85. During the Greek-Turkish war of 1897 he cooperated with the Greeks. As a representative of the Mitrovica region, he took part in the congress of Albanian delegates in Peje (Peć) in 1899. In 1899–1900 he was aligned with Bajram Curri and with the Beselidhja Shqiptare society in Peje. In 1902 he went to Istanbul, trying to organize support for the Albanian cause in Turkey, but he was interned. He returned to political activity in 1908, after the Young Turk revolution. In 1910–12 he was one of the most influential leaders of the anti-Turkish uprising in northern Albania. His troops controlled the area between Mitrovica and Prishtina. During the First Balkan War, in October 1912 he fought against Serbian troops that entered this territory. He took part in the Congress of Vlorë, which proclaimed Albanian independence on 28 November 1912. In 1913, along with Ismail Kemali, Boletini represented Albania at a conference of major European powers in London and tried to counteract a division of the territories inhabited by Albanians. Then he returned to Kosovo, where he organized an anti-Serb uprising. In 1914 his troops supported Prince Wilhelm von Wied against separatists operating in the region of Shijak. Boletini was killed in an ambush organized by a Montenegrin detachment. (TC)

Sources: Fjalori Enciklopedik Shqiptar (Tirana, 1995); Bardhosh Gaçe, Ata që shpallën Pavarësinë Kombëtare (Tirana, 1997).

BONDARCHUK Sergei (29 September 1920, Bilozerka, near Kherson—October 20, 1994, Moscow), Soviet actor and movie director of Ukrainian descent. Before World War II Bondarchuk studied at the Theater School in Rostov. After the German invasion in 1941 he played in various front-line theaters, and in 1945–48 he studied at the All-Union Institute of Cinematography in Moscow. He made his stage debut in 1948 in the play Molodaia Gvardiia (Young Guard), based on a novel by Aleksandr Fadyeev. His movie directing debut was Fate of a Man (1959), based on a story by Mikhail Sholokhov, for which he received the top award at the film festival in Moscow. In it Bondarchuk played the lead role of Andrey Sokolov, a Soviet soldier and prisoner of war who fulfilled his duties to the fatherland but lost out in his private life. The movie was thought to be a metaphor for the Soviet man. Bondarchuk was the first Soviet actor who after the war played in a Western movie—Era notte a Roma (There was a night in Rome; 1960). In 1966–67 Bondarchuk directed the Russian national saga War and Peace, based on the novel by Leo Tolstoy; in it he played Pyotr Bezukhov. He also directed an Italian-Soviet-British production of Waterloo (1970), one of the best battle films in history. He strengthened his international reputation with subsequent movies: Oni srazhalis za rodinu (They fought for the fatherland; 1975); a Yugoslav film, The Peaks of Zelenogore (1976); and Step (Steppe; 1978). Ukrainians—also the Ukrainian émigré community—applauded his leading role in the biographical films Taras Shevchenko (1951) and Ivan Franko (1956). (TS)

Sources: Encyclopedia of Ukraine, vol. 1 (Toronto, 1985); Jurij Chanjutin, Sergei Bondarchuk (Moscow, 1962); Nina Tolczenowa, Mera krasoty: Kino Sergeia Bondarchuka (Moscow, 1974); Vyacheslav Podvig and A. Chernenko, Masterskaia Sergeia Bondarchuka (Moscow, 1985); Yuri Tiurin, Serguëi Bondartchouk (Moscow, 1988).

BOREJSZA Jerzy [originally Benjamin Goldberg] (14 July 1905, Warsaw—15 January 1952, Warsaw), Polish Communist activist. The son of the editor-in-chief of the Jewish newspaper Haint, Borejsza was the half-brother of Józef Róžański. The name Borejsza was a literary pseudonym. Borejsza attended high school in Warsaw, where he was active in a radical youth organization called Hashomer Hatzair. In 1924 he went to Germany. He was expelled from high school for smuggling revolutionary books. Between 1924 and 1925 he studied at the Polytechnic College in Toulouse, and then he moved to Paris, where he worked as a laborer and also studied Romance philology, especially Spanish literature, at the Sorbonne. In 1926 he took part in the preparations for the Catalanian revolt and became editor of the Spanish magazine Acción. At the end of 1927 he returned to Poland. Drafted into the army, Borejsza served in an infantry regiment in Grodno and Sokółka, and then he worked as a printer and proofreader in Warsaw. In 1929 he joined the Communist Party of Poland (Komunistyczna Partia Polski [KPP]). He worked as secretary for agitation and propaganda of the KPP Warsaw committee. Arrested several times for his Communist activities, he was always released after a few months. He was secretary of the Trade Union Central Department (Centralny Wydział Zawodowy) and the KPP CC and its instructor in Upper Silesia, where he edited Tygodnik Robotniczy. From 1936 he wrote for the official newspapers—for example, Lewar, Dziennik Popularny, Sygnaly, Wiadomości Literackie, and Skamander. With the consent of the KPP, Borejsza entered into cooperation with the Czarno na Białem and with Dziennik Poranny, the organ of the Polish Teachers' Union. In 1937 he co-organized a sit-in strike of this newspaper. He gained publicity after a series of articles in defense of the Spanish Republic for the Wiadomości Literackie and a book on the subject, Hiszpania (1873–1936) (Spain, 1873–1936; 1937). After the dissolution of the KPP, in 1938–39 he contributed to Robotnik.

At the end of 1939 Borejsza managed to get to Lwów (Lviv), where he worked as a director of Ossolineum (a museum and archive). From 1940 he belonged to the Soviet Writers' Union. The outbreak of the German-Soviet war in June 1941 found him in Kiev. Next, he went in Moscow and Kuibyshev. Owing to the support of Georgi Dimitrov, Borejsza was admitted to the Red Army as a volunteer, and he fought as a captain on the front. In 1943 he took an active part in organizing the Union of Polish Patriots (Związek Patriotów Polskich [ZPP]) and the First Tadeusz Kościuszko Infantry Division. In 1943–44 he contributed to Nowe Widnokreghi, the organ of the ZPP, and was editor-in-chief of Wolna Polska. He also served as a major in the First Polish Army, publishing a series of battlefront reports.

From 1944 Borejsza was an activist in the Polish Workers' Party (Polska Partia Robotnicza [PPR]). Thanks to his efforts, a part of the Ossolineum collections was brought to Wrocław after the war. In April 1947 he was appointed a deputy member of the CC, and on 1 October 1948, deputy head of the Department of Propaganda, Culture, and Education of the PPR CC. From May 1945 he was a deputy to the National Home Council (Krajowa Rada Narodowa [KRN]). Borejsza was the first editor-in-chief of Rzeczpospolita, the organ of the Polish Committee of National Liberation (Polski Komitet Wyzwolenia Narodowego [PKWN]). He organized and was president of the publishing cooperative Czytelnik (1945–48) and was editor-in-chief of the social and literary magazine Odrodzenie (1948–50). He also initiated the construction of the publishing house Dom Słowa Polskiego. At the Unification Congress of the PPR and the Polish Socialist Party in December 1948 Borejsza was appointed a deputy member of the CC of the Polish United Workers' Party (Polska Zjednoczona Partia Robotnicza [PUWP]) and deputy head of the Department of Culture, Education, and Science of the PUWP CC. Borejsza was a co-organizer and secretary general of the World Congress of Intellectuals for Peace, initiated for Soviet propaganda purposes and held in Wrocław in 1948. In January 1949 a serious car accident drastically reduced his political activity. His books include Rewolucja łagodna (Mild revolution; 1945); Ostrożnie z bombą atomową (Careful with the atomic bomb; 1945); and Na rogatkach kultury polskiej (On the turnpike of Polish culture; 1947). (WD)

Sources: Słownik Pracowników Książki Polskiej; CA KC PZPR, zespół Jerzego Borejszy, 257 BSK PZPR 237/XXIII, personal file no. 15; 10 lat książki "Czytelnika" (Warsaw, 1954); K. Małek, Z Mazur do podziemia (Warsaw, 1970); Zofia Nałkowska, Dzienniki czasu wojny (Warsaw, 1970); Organizacja i działalności bojowe LWP 1943–1945, vol. 4 (Warsaw, 1963); Edmund Osmańczyk, Był rok 1945 (Warsaw, 1970).

BORETSKY Mykola (19 December 1879, Sarny–1936, Leningrad?), Metropolitan bishop of the Ukrainian Orthodox Church, victim of Communist persecution. In 1901 Boretsky graduated from the theological seminary in Kiev. Ordained in 1904, in 1921 he joined the Ukrainian Autocephalous Orthodox Church, established by Archbishop Vasyl Lipkivsky. From 1922 he was bishop of Haysyn. When the Soviet authorities removed Lipkivsky, on 17 October 1927 the Second Ecumenical Council chose Boretsky as the metropolitan bishop and the head of the Ukrainian autocephalia, composed of around three thousand parishes. As a conciliatory hierarch, he was able to organize ecclesiastical conferences and edit Tserkva i Zhyzn magazine for some time. Despite his efforts to maintain correct relations with the authorities, he was ordered in 1930 to liquidate the autocephalia. As a result of his refusal he was arrested by the authorities and sent to a camp in Medvezhegorsk and then to the Solovets Islands, where he is believed to have turned insane as a result of the appalling living conditions. His later life is unknown. According to one version, he died in prison in Leningrad. (WR) Sources: Encyclopedia of Ukraine (Toronto, 1984); Russian Oppression in Ukraine (London, 1962).

BORILĂ Petru (13 February 1905, Silistra–?), Romanian Communist activist. From the early 1920s Borilă was active in Communist youth organizations, and from 1924, in the Communist Party of Romania (CPR). He took part in the Tatar-Bunar uprising in 1924. Serving in the army, he escaped to the USSR and was tried in Romania for desertion. He graduated from the Leninist School of the Comintern and the Mikhail Frunze Memorial Military Academy, and in the late 1930s he fought in the International Brigades in the Spanish Civil War. He commanded a battalion and was wounded. After returning to the USSR, he co-organized and was one of the commanders of the Tudor Vladimirescu Division within the Red Army, to which former Romanian POWs were recruited. In August 1944 he came back to Romania, where he joined the Central Committee of the Communist Party. From April 1947 he was secretary of the party organization in Bucharest. In 1948 he was appointed political commissar of the Romanian Army and advanced to general. From February 1949 to March 1950 he was deputy minister of defense and chief of the Political Directorate of the army. From March 1950 to March 1951 he was minister of construction and then chief of the state control commission. After the purge of Ana Pauker, Vasile Luca, and Teohari Georgescu in 1952, Borilă joined the Politburo of the CC of the Romanian Workers' Party (RWP), and from October 1953 to October 1955 he was deputy prime minister. In April 1954 he extensively and falsely testified against Lucrețiu Pătrășcanu. Closely connected with Gheorghe Gheorgiu-Dej, Borilă was RWP delegate to the Twentieth Congress of the Soviet party in February 1956 and to the Moscow conference of Communist parties in 1960. From March 1961 to March 1965 he was deputy prime minister again. In the course of the elimination of Gheorgiu-Dej's followers by Nicolae Ceaușescu, Borilă was dismissed from the Politburo in December 1968; his daughter, Ioana, was married to Ceaușescu's son, Valentin. (WR)

Sources: Lazitch; Stephen Fischer-Galati, ed., Romania (New York, 1957); Dennis Deletant, Communist Terror in Romania: Gheorghiu-Dej and the Police State, 1948–1965 (New York, 1999); Ion Alexandrescu, Ion Bulei, Ion Mamina, and Ioan Scurtu, Enciclopedia de istorie României (Bucharest, 2000); Thomas Kunze, Nicolae Ceaușescu: O biografie (Bucharest, 2002).

BORIS III Sachsen-Coburg-Gotha (30 January 1894, Sofia–28 August 1943, Sofia), Tsar of Bulgaria. Boris was the son of Ferdinand and Maria-Louisa Bourbon-Parma. After his father's abdication he succeeded him on 3 October 1918. The change in sovereigns was, along with territorial concessions and war reparations, one of the conditions of armistice and later of the peace treaty signed by the victorious coalition with Bulgaria in Neuilly on 27 November 1919. From 1918 to 1923 Boris played a strictly titular role. On Aleksandur Stamboliyski's demand, he dissolved the National Assembly in February 1920, which led to early elections and the assumption of dictatorial power by the Bulgarian Agrarian National Union. However, Boris's importance as an agent uniting the divided political scene grew steadily. He backed Aleksandur Tsankov's rightist coup of 9 June 1923 and resisted a Communist upheaval in September 1923. In April 1925 on two occasions he avoided being killed by the Communists. They organized an unsuccessful attack on him in the Arabakonak Pass, and two days they later blew up the Orthodox church of Holy Sunday in Sofia. One hundred and fifty people were killed then, and five hundred were injured. Along with his government Boris was late for the mass and therefore survived. After the attack, the Communist Party of Bulgaria was delegalized, and its leaders were arrested. The repressive measures alarmed the more moderate political forces, which wanted a return to democracy, so Boris persuaded Tsankov to resign.

Between 1926 and 1934 Boris supported democratic governments, but they were unstable. There was an increase in radical nationalist attitudes, on the one hand, and on the other hand, an increase in the influence of the republican military group Zveno. Boris, in turn, steadily expanded his own political base. The military coup of 19 May 1934, staged by the Zveno officers, threatened not only democracy, but monarchy as well. Prime Minister Kimon Georgiev announced radical reforms and established relations with the USSR. All this induced Boris to reach for a full control of power. With the help of some of the officer corps faithful to him, Boris forced the government of Georgiev to resign, purged the army of the opponents of the monarchy, and, in November 1935, appointed the cabinet of Georgi Kioseivanov, who proved a useful instrument of the tsarist government. The manipulated elections of 1938 gave Boris full control over the parliament. In foreign policy he chose a pro-German course, hoping for the backing of the Third Reich in the precarious surroundings of the Balkan Entente (Yugoslavia, Greece, and Romania) and for support for Bulgarian territorial claims against its neighbors in the future. The increase in trade with Germany temporarily brought prosperity to Bulgaria but subordinated its economy to the Third Reich. However, the support of Germany helped in the signing of an agreement with the Balkan Entente states in which the signatories renounced the use of force and agreed to remove the restrictions on the number of soldiers in the Bulgarian Army.

After the outbreak of the Polish-German war in 1939 Bulgaria proclaimed neutrality. The Molotov-Ribbentrop Pact of August 1939 gave Bulgaria a sense of stability, but in 1940 Boris became involved in the rivalry between Berlin and Moscow for influence in the Balkans. Owing to the support of Berlin, in August 1940 Bulgaria gained southern Dobrudja, which was annexed from Romania. This intensified pressure from the USSR, which sought a treaty of mutual assistance with Bulgaria. This pressure induced Boris to seek further rapprochement with Germany. On 1 March 1941 he decided Bulgaria would join the anti-Comintern Pact. The German Army used the Bulgarian territory for an attack on Yugoslavia and Greece, and in April 1941 the Bulgarian Army occupied Macedonia, which was annexed from Yugoslavia. Despite the deterioration of Bulgarian-Soviet relations after June 1941, Boris opposed the involvement of Bulgaria in the war against the USSR. This was easier especially because Hitler no longer had much to offer Bulgaria. The declaration of war against England and the United States was of a symbolic nature, but it made Bulgaria's situation difficult at the end of the war. Temporarily, Boris's effective tactics won him great popularity. German pressure increased after the defeat at Stalingrad. In March 1943 the government in Sofia disenfranchised and expropriated the Bulgarian Jews, but Boris did not agree to their deportation to the Nazi extermination camps.

Noticing a breakthrough on the Eastern Front, in the summer of 1943 Boris started secret negotiations with England; the agreement aimed at an offensive on the Balkans, and Boris also more and more seriously considered joining the side of the Allies. On 14 August 1943 Boris arrived, at Hitler's invitation, at his headquarters in Rastenburg (Kętrzyn). Hitler demanded that two Bulgarian divisions be put at his disposal, but Boris refused. Soon after his return to the country, during a stay in a mountain health resort, Tsarska Bistritsa, on 23 August Boris suddenly fell ill, and he died after five days. There is a theory that he was poisoned because Hitler was alarmed by his attitude toward the Allies. According to the doctors who examined his heart, the cause of death was an extensive infarction. (WR) Sources: Biographisches Lexikon, vol. 1; Entsiklopediya Bulgariya, vol. 1; Hans-Joachim Hoppe, Bulgarien-Hitlers eigenwilliger Verbündeter (Stuttgart, 1979); Stefane Groueff, Crown of Thorns: The Reign of King Boris III of Bulgaria, 1918-1943 (Lanham, Md., 1987); Marshall Lee Miller, Bulgaria during the Second World War (Stanford, 1975); Duma, 12 November 1991.

BORISEVIČIUS Vincentas (23 November 1887, Bebrinkai, near Vilkaviškis–November 1946, Vilnius), Lithuanian bishop, victim of communism. Born into a peasant family, Borisevičius studied theology and philosophy in the theological seminary in Sejny and at the University of Fribourg, Switzerland. In 1910 he was ordained and started his ministry in the Samogetian parishes. In 1916–17 he was chaplain of the Tenth Russian Army in Minsk. After returning to Lithuania, he worked as a school chaplain in Marijampolė; in 1922–26 he lectured in theology in the Gižai theological seminary, and then he was chancellor of the Telšiai diocese. From 1927 to 1935 he was professor and rector of the Telšiai theological seminary. In 1940 he was consecrated bishop and appointed auxiliary bishop of the Telšiai diocese, and in 1941 he took it over as an ordinary bishop. After the Red Army returned to Lithuania in the summer of 1944, the Soviet authorities demanded that the bishops condemn the anti-Communist guerrillas. Since Borisevičius refused, he was arrested in 1946 and shot in prison. (WR) Sources: EL, vols. 1 and 6; Andrius Baltinis, Vyskupo Vincento Borisevičiaus gyvenimas ir darbai (Rome, 1975); Constantine R. Jurgėla, Lithuania: The Outpost of Freedom (St. Petersburg, Fla., 1976); Irena Mikłaszewicz, Polityka sowiecka wobec Kościoła katolickiego na Litwie 1944–1965 (Warsaw, 2001).

BOROVETS Taras, pseudonym “Bulba” (9 March 1908, Bystrzyce, near Równe–15 May 1981, New York), Ukrainian social and political activist. In the Second Republic of Poland Borovets was the owner of masonry works in Volhynia. He made a plaque for the grave of the mother (and the heart) of Marshal Józef Piłsudski at the Rossa cemetery in Vilnius. For his activities in the Ukrainian nationalist underground he was imprisoned in the Bereza Kartuska camp. In 1940–41, on the recommendation of the president of the Ukrainian National Republic, Andrei Livytsky, Borovets organized an armed underground in Polesie. After the outbreak of the German-Russian war in 1941, he formed the Polesian Sich, which fought against the remnants of the Red Army. When the Germans demanded the disarmament of his troops, he withdrew to the forests near Olevsko. There he formed the first Ukrainian Insurgent Army (Ukrainska Povstanska Armiiia [UPA]), which fought against the Germans and Communists. He disagreed with the unification of his formation with the UPA composed of the Stepan Bandera faction of the Organization of Ukrainian Nationalists (OUN-B). He also did not support the anti-Polish actions carried out by the Bandera movement, which led to mass killings in the Polish population in Volhynia in 1943. In the summer of 1943 the majority of Borovets’s people were incorporated by force into the Bandera faction of the UPA. Borovets changed the name of his divisions to the Ukrainian National Revolutionary Army (UNRA) in order to distinguish them from those of his political rivals. In the autumn of 1943 he entered into negotiations with the Germans. Arrested and sent to the Sachsenhausen concentration camp in November 1943, he was released in 1944. In 1946 he was arrested by the British and charged with the murder of Poles, but he was released. He did not play a major role while in exile in Germany, Canada, and the United States. In West Germany he was involved in various activities, including the organization of the Ukrainian National Guard and the editing of the magazine Mech i Volia (1951–53). He later went to the United States. Borovets authored the memoirs Armia bez derzhavy (An army without a state; 1981). (GM)

Sources: Encyclopedia of Ukraine, vol. 1 (Toronto, 1984); Baley Petro, Fronda Stepana Bandery v OUN 1940 r. (Las Vegas, 1997); Entsyklopediia Ukraïnoznavstva, vol. 1 (Kiev, 1993); Torzecki Ryszard, Polacy i Ukraïńcy: Sprawa ukraińska w czasie II wojny światowej na terenie II Rzeczypospolitej (Warsaw, 1993).

BOROWSKI Tadeusz (12 November 1922, Zhytomyr–3 July 1951, Warsaw), Polish writer. Borowski spent his childhood in the Soviet Ukraine. After coming to Poland, his family settled in Warsaw in 1932, and his father worked as a blue-collar laborer. During the German occupation Borowski graduated from an underground high school and started Polish studies at the underground Warsaw University. He was also active in the cultural life of the leftist youth. In February 1943 he was arrested by the Gestapo and sent to the Auschwitz concentration camp in Oświęcim. From August 1944 he was in the Natzweiler-Dautmergen and Dachau camps. Liberated by the American Army in May 1945, he stayed in a displaced persons’ (DP) camp on the outskirts of Munich. In 1946 he returned to Poland, where he graduated in Polish studies. In 1948 he joined the Polish Workers’ Party (as of December 1948, the Polish United Workers’ Party [Polska Zjednoczona Partia Robotnicza]) and wrote for the Communist press—in, among other publications, the daily Rzeczpospolita and the weekly Nowa Kultura. He made his debut as a poet during the occupation and while in the DP camp, describing the degradation of humanity under totalitarian Nazi rule. In his most popular series of short stories, Pożegnanie z Marią (Farewell to Maria; 1948) and Kamienny świat (World of stone; 1948), he dispassionately elaborated on the mechanism of moral depravation in the system of mass murder. Borowski initially interpreted totalitarianism as the result of social engineering experiments. In his later works he gave over his talent to Communist propaganda and promoted Socialist Realism. He committed suicide. A collection of his short stories was published in New York as This Way for the Gas, Ladies and Gentlemen in 1967. (WR) kamiennego świata (Warsaw, 1978); Joanna Szczęsna, Tadeusz Borowski-poeta (Poznań, 2000).

Sources: Literatura polska XX wieku: Przewodnik encyklopedyczny, vol. 1 (Warsaw, 2000); Czesław Miłosz, Captive Mind (New York, 1953); Tadeusz Drewnowski, Ucieczka z

BORUSEWICZ Bogdan (11 January 1949, Lidzbark Warmiński), Polish social and political activist. In 1968, as a student at an artistic high school in Gdynia, Borusewicz was arrested for producing and distributing leaflets calling for the defense of repressed university students, but he escaped. In 1969 he was sentenced to three years in prison, but he was released after a year and a half. In 1970–75 he studied history at the Catholic University of Lublin. From June 1976 he helped workers persecuted after the Radom riots, and from November 1976 he was a member of the Committee for the Defense of Workers (Komitet Obrony Robotników [KOR]). He also organized self-education activities on the Baltic Coast. In 1978 he was co-founder of the Free Trade Unions of the Baltic Coast. He edited the uncensored trade newspapers Robotnik and Robotnik Wybrzeża. In the 1970s he was arrested many times but usually for short periods of time. In 1979 he co-authored and signed a “Charter of Workers’ Rights,” which was the program of a trade union movement independent of Communist authorities. He also maintained contact with the underground Young Poland Movement (Ruch Młodej Polski). In 1980 he was one of the main leaders of the August strikes on the Baltic Coast, but he did not join the Inter-Factory Strike Committee in Gdańsk. In 1980–93 he was a member of Solidarity, and in 1980–81, a member of its Inter-Factory Founding Committee in Gdańsk. He criticized the style of Lech Wałęsa and cooperated with the leader of the inter-union opposition, Andrzej Gwiazda. After the introduction of martial law in December 1981 Borusewicz went into hiding as a member of the Solidarity Regional Coordinating Commission in Gdańsk. From 1984 he was a member of the national Provisional Coordinating Commission. In January 1986 he was caught by the security service and kept in prison until the amnesty of July 1986.

In 1989 Borusewicz belonged to the opponents of the Round Table Talks. From 1990 he chaired Solidarity’s Gdańsk Region and belonged to the Presidium of the National Commission of Solidarity. From 1991 he was deputy chairman of the union. In the parliamentary elections of October 1991 he won a seat on behalf of Solidarity. He chaired its parliamentary club and the Extraordinary Commission to Investigate the Effects of Martial Law. In the 1993 and 1997 elections he won seats on behalf of the Democratic Union (Unia Demokratyczna; as of April 1994, Unia Wolności [Freedom Union]). From 1993 to 1997 he chaired the parliamentary commission of special services. From 1991 he was deputy chairman, and from 1993 to 1997 chairman, of the Polish-Ukrainian Inter-Parliamentary Group. In 1997–2000 he was deputy minister of interior and administration. From 2000 he was a member of the board and deputy speaker of the Pomeranian Provincial Diet. In 2002 he was reelected to this position. (PK)

Sources: Wielka encyklopedia PWN, vol. 4 (Warsaw, 2001); Jerzy Holzer, Solidarność (Warsaw, 1983); Andrzej Friszke, Opozycja polityczna w PRL 1945–1980 (London, 1994); Opozycja w PRL: Słownik Biograficzny 1956–1989, vol. 2 (Warsaw, 2002); Antoni Dudek, Pierwsze lata III Rzeczypospolitej 1989–2001 (Kraków, 2002).

BORUTA-SPIECHOWICZ Mieczysław (20 February 1894, Rzeszów–13 October 1985, Zakopane), Polish general. Already in high school Boruta-Spiechowicz joined the Rifle Association (Związek Strzelecki). In 1914–18 he fought in the Polish Legions and in the Second Polish Corps in the East and was active in the Polish Military Organization in the Ukraine. At the end of 1918 and 1919 he commanded a sector of the defense of Lwów (Lviv). Next he left for France, where he commanded the regiment of riflemen in the army of General Józef Haller. After his return to Poland, in 1921 he graduated from the School of the General Staff and also completed studies at the university in Antwerp. Then he held various command and staff posts. From 1934 he was the commander of a division, and in 1936 he was appointed brigadier general. In the Polish-German war of 1939 he commanded the Operational Group (OG) Bielsko and then the OG Boruta in the Kraków army. After the end of the military operations, in November 1939 he was arrested by the Soviets. In August 1941 he was released from prison under the Sikorski-Majski agreement, and he commanded the Fifth Infantry Division, which was beginning to form at that time. Next he was in command of Polish troops that were being evacuated from the USSR to Iran. After his arrival in Great Britain, from February 1943 he was the commander of the First Corps in Scotland. In December 1945 he returned to Poland and entered the “people’s” Polish Army, but in mid-1946 he retired and settled in Zakopane. At the end of the 1970s he joined the ranks of the democratic opposition, and in 1977 he was one of the co-founders of the Human and Civil Rights Defense Movement (Ruch Obrony Praw Człowieka i Obywatela). In September 1981 he was an honorary guest of the First Congress of the Independent Self-Governing Trade Union Solidarity. (WR)

Sources: K. Kryśka-Karski and S. Żurkowski, Generałowie Polski Niepodległej (London, 1976); Nowy Dziennik, 1 November 1985; Piotr Stawiecki, Słownik biograficzny generałów Wojska

Polskiego, 1918–1939 (Warsaw, 1994); Andrzej Friszke, Opozycja polityczna w PRL 1945–1980 (London, 1994); Generał Ludwik Mieczysław Boruta-Spiechowicz (Szczecin, 1997).

BOSILKOV Evgeni [originally Vikenti] (16 November 1900, Belene on the Danube–12 November 1952, Sofia), Bulgarian Roman Catholic bishop, martyr for the faith. Born into a peasant family, at eleven Bosilkov entered a lower theological seminary in Oresh; in 1913 he moved to the seminary in Ruse and later to a high school in Kortrijk, Belgium. In 1919 he entered the novitiate of the Passionist Order in Ere, Belgium, adopting the monastic name of Eugene of the Most Holy Heart of Jesus. He completed the theological studies in Ruse, where he was ordained in July 1925. Soon he left for further studies in Rome. In the Papal Institute for Oriental Studies he received a Ph.D. for his thesis on the union of the Bulgarian church with the Roman church in the thirteenth century. After returning to Bulgaria in 1932, he became parish priest of Ruse Cathedral and secretary to the local bishop and then parish priest in Bardarski Geran, where he stayed until 1947. He won great popularity among the faithful owing to his active ministry, organizational activities, and care for the poor.

In 1946 Pope Pius XII appointed Bosilkov apostolic vicar of the Nikopoli diocese, and on 27 October 1947 he was consecrated as bishop of this diocese with the seat in Ruse. In 1948 he managed to go to the Netherlands and to Rome for a short time, where he sought material aid for his faithful. Although his superiors wanted to keep him abroad, he decided to go back to Bulgaria, knowing he was risking repression, especially after the Communist authorities broke off relations with the Holy See in 1949. Repression affected Catholics both of the Eastern rite (for example, the arrest of exarch Kiry Kurtev) and of the Latin rite. On 16 July 1952 Bosilkov was arrested along with twenty-seven priests, monks, lay believers, and a group of Orthodox who had cooperated with them. Communist interrogators tried to make Bosilkov break off relations with Rome and create a Bulgarian national church. When he refused, he was accused of founding a Vatican spy ring. Proofs for this were items collected from an exposition of Bulgarian World War I effects—a few old arms, a typewriter, and a radio. All the convicted were brutally tortured. On 3 October 1952 Bosilkov was sentenced to death. The execution was held secretly at night at the Sofia prison. Three other martyr monks were executed with Bosilkov: Pavel Dzhidzhov, Jozafat Shishkov, and Kamen Vichev. For years the fate of Bosilkov was unknown. It was not until 1975, during an audience with Pope Paul VI, that the head of the Bulgarian Communist Party, Todor Zhivkov, confirmed his death. On 15 March

1998 Pope John Paul II declared Bosilkov blessed. He was the first Bulgarian Roman Catholic to be beatified. In May 2002 John Paul II blessed the three other Bulgarian martyrs as well. (AGr)

Sources: Hansjakob Stehle, Tajna dyplomacja Watykanu: Papiestwo wobec komunizmu (1917–1991) (Warsaw, 1993); Desmond O’Grady, Punkt zwrotny: Chrześcijaństwo przed i po obaleniu Muru Berlińskiego (London, 1997); “Bł. Wincenty Eugeniusz Bosilkow,” L’Osservatore Romano (Polish edition), 1998, nos. 5/6; Fernando Taccone, Evgeni Bosilkov: Bolgarski episkop i muchenik (Ruse, 1998); Todor Gospodinov, Blazheniyat Episkop Evgeni Bosilkov-rozhba na khiliadeletnata istoriya na Belene (Swisztow, 1999).

BOZANIĆ Josip (20 March 1949, Rijeka), Archbishop of Zagreb. Born into a peasant family, after primary school in Vrbnik on the island of Krk, Bozanić graduated from high school in Pazin. Then he studied theology in Rijeka and at the Pontificia Università Gregoriana in Rome. In June 1975 he was ordained. He received his licentiate at the Lateran University in Rome. After returning to Croatia, he worked in the curia of the Krk diocese, where he was vicar general from 1987. On 10 May 1989 he was consecrated. For a couple of months he was auxiliary bishop and then ordinary bishop of the Krk diocese. He took part in the synods of European bishops in 1991 and 1999. From 5 June to 22 November 1996 he was apostolic administrator of the Rijeka-Senje metropolis. On 5 July 1997 he was appointed the successor of Cardinal Franjo Kuharić as Archbishop of Zagreb. From this time he was also chairman of the Conference of Croatian Bishops and co-president of the commission for state-church relations. He was in charge of the preparations for two pilgrimages by Pope John Paul II to Croatia (in 1998 and 2003). On 21 October 2003 Bozanić was included in the College of Cardinals. He often spoke up in defense of the poor, who suffered most from the systemic transformations. He also criticized manifestations of nationalism and intolerance. He developed charity organizations and supported the development of Catholic schools. On his initiative the dialogue with representatives of the Serbian Orthodox Church in Croatia, broken off as a result of the war in the former Yugoslavia, was resumed. (AGr)

Sources: Glas Koncila, 2003, no. 40; Annuario Pontificio, 2003; www.Hrvatska Biskupska Konferencija, www.catholic-hierarchy.org.

BOZHILOV Dobri (13 June 1884, Kotel–1 February 1945, Sofia), Bulgarian financier and politician and high-rank Mason. From 1922 to 1935 Bozhilov was vice-president, and in 1935–38 president, of the National Bank of Bulgaria. In November 1938 he assumed the post of minister of finance in the government of Georgi Kioseivanov, and then held the post in the cabinet of Bogdan Filov until September 1943. After the death of Tsar Boris III, when Filov became one of the regents, on 14 September 1943, Bozhilov assumed the post of head of the government, while retaining the Ministry of Finance. He no longer believed in the victory of Bulgaria's German ally but remained Filov's loyal co-worker. In October he announced a broad amnesty to the opponents of the regime. After the Allied air raids on Sofia in November 1943 the government's popularity declined considerably, and Bozhilov did not manage to resolve the impasse in the country. He failed to move forward the matter of Bulgaria's withdrawal from the war or the matter of an agreement with the Allies, especially an agreement that the Allies abandon their plans to invade the Balkans. On 18 May 1944 he resigned as head of the government. This was to signify a change in Bulgarian policy. After the overthrow of the Regency Council in September 1944 Bozhilov was arrested. Along with about a hundred leading politicians of the regime he was sentenced to death and executed. (WR)

Sources: Entsiklopediya Bulgariya, vol. 1 (Sofia, 1978); Marshall Lee Miller, Bulgaria during the Second World War (Stanford, 1975); Hans-Joachim Hoppe, Bulgarien: Hitlers eigenwilliger Verbündeter (Stuttgart, 1979); Tasho Tashev, Ministrите на България 1897–1999 (Sofia, 1999).

BRĂNCUȘI Constantin (21 February 1876, Peștișani Gorj, near Tîrgu Jiu—16 March 1957, Paris), Romanian sculptor. Brâncuși came from a large family of poor peasants. At the age of eleven he was admitted to the Craiova School of Arts and Crafts. After graduating from this school, he began to study at the Sculpture Department of the Bucharest School of Fine Arts. In 1901, after completing his studies, he set off to continue his education. Having no money, he set out for Paris on foot. He went through Budapest, Vienna, Zurich, and Munich, and after two years he arrived in Paris. In 1904 he settled in Paris for good. He studied at the Ecole des Beaux Arts. He began to exhibit in Paris and was very successful. Impressed with his works, Auguste Rodin invited him to join his atelier, but Brâncuși decided to create independently, breaking away from idealized naturalism and academicism. He made a breakthrough in twentieth-century art, as he carved directly in stone and abandoned a modeling of the initial maquettes. His first sculptures of that period, The Kiss, The Wisdom of the Earth, and The Prayer, were done in 1907, and they bore the features of naturalism. However, in the same year he created the first sculpture in the famous series called Maiastra, and it was a breakthrough in the art of sculpture. In 1913 he began to exhibit in New York, London, Prague, and his own country. In 1920 in Paris, he exhibited Princess X (1916), but the work was denounced as indecent even by the Salon des Indépendants.

Recognition for Brâncuși came in 1922, when statuettes from the Paleolithic era, the most primitive and pure works of art, were found in French caves. These statuettes looked as if they had been made by Brâncuși. At the invitation of the Romanian minister of foreign affairs, Nicolae Titulescu, in 1935 Brâncuși began to create the biggest collection of monumental open-air sculptures in the world in Tîrgu Jiu, not far from his native village. He created the following: a thirty-three-meter-high Endless Column, as well as Gate of Kiss, Table of Silence (also called Table of Dacians), and Alley of Chairs. During his lifetime, Brâncuși won his greatest fame in the United States. It was there that the majority of his most precious sculptures were bought. In all his works, a fascination with the primordial “powers of the universe” and with form can be observed. The subjects of his works stemmed from myths and legends. His artistic output includes over 750 sculptures, which are dedicated to various themes—for example, the origin of the world, love, the myth of dreams and death, and a nostalgia for infinity. On the occasion of the 125th anniversary of his birth, UNESCO declared the year 2001 as the International Year of Constantin Brâncuși. Museums in Philadelphia and New York have the greatest number of his works. (LW)

Sources: Dictionar Enciclopedic, vol. 1 (Bucharest, 1993); The Dictionary of Art, vol. 4 (London, 1996); Carola Giedion-Welcher, Constantin Brâncuși (Neuchâtel, 1959); Petru Comarescu, Mircea Eliade, and Ionel Jianu, Témoignages sur Brâncuși (Paris, 1967); Petru Comarescu, Brâncuși (Bucharest, 1972); Miro de Michelli, Brâncuși (Milan, 1966); Geist Sydney, Brâncuși: The Sculpture and Drawings (New York, 1975).

BRĂȚIANU Constantin I. C. (Dinu) (11 February 1866, Florica—1950, Sighet), Romanian economist, engineer, and politician. Brățianu was the son of the head of the Liberal Party and premier Ion Brățianu (1821–1891) and the brother of Ion I. C. Brățianu and Vintilă Brățianu. He studied at the Ecole des Mines in Paris from 1884 to 1888, specializing in the petroleum industry, railways, and finance. From 1890 to 1930 he directed petroleum companies and railway construction projects, and for over thirty years he administered credit companies that provided services for the rural sector. For over thirteen years he was director of the Letea paper factory. Along with his brother Vintilă he reformed banks he administered: the Banca Muscel, Banca Româneasca, and Creditul Agricol. He aimed at the modernization of agriculture, and he promoted the principles of protectionism. In 1895, as a representative of the National Liberal Party (Partidul Național Liberal [NLP]), he was elected to the parliament. As a government expert, he negotiated trade agreements with other countries in 1896–1907. He was also a budget specialist. During the premierships of both of his brothers (1922–26 and 1927–28) he refused to participate in their cabinets. He opposed the return of Charles II to Romania in 1930. Between 1933 and 1934 he was minister of finance in the governments of the so-called young liberals, Ion Duca and Gheorghe Tătărescu. Later, he was in conflict with Tătărescu. In 1934–47 Brățianu was head of the NLP. From 1934 to 1940, especially at the time of the royal dictatorship (1938–40), he was in opposition to King Charles. In August 1940, along with Iuliu Maniu, he supported the abdication of the king and the transfer of power to General Ion Antonescu. After Romania recovered Bessarabia and northern Bukovina from the USSR in June and July 1941, he turned against Antonescu and his pro-German policy in particular. At that time he came into contact with the representatives of Polish diplomacy in exile, especially within the framework of the Tripod Action (Akcja Trójnóg), prepared in Lisbon by the Polish diplomats in exile and aimed at the withdrawal of Romania, Italy, and Hungary from the Axis.

In June 1944 Brățianu co-founded the National Democratic Front, which included the Socialists, the National Peasant Party, the NLP, and the Communists. He took an active part in the preparation of the coup d'état against Antonescu. After the coup, from August 1944 to October 1944, he was minister of state. He also presided over the Romanian National Bank. In 1944–47 he tried to reorganize the NLP, opposing the Tătărescu faction. From the formation of the Petru Groza government in March 1945, until his arrest, Brățianu, along with Maniu, led the political resistance to the Communist regime. In the elections of November 1946 his party, cooperating with Mainu's National Peasant Party, obtained around 80 percent of the vote, but the election results were falsified. In July 1947 Brățianu was arrested along with other leaders of the opposition. Despite his advanced age, he was sentenced to life imprisonment, and he died in the Sighet prison. He was the author of, among other works, Agricultura în România (Agriculture in Romania; 1919) and La situation économique de la Roumanie. In 1992 his Amintiri, documente, corespondență (Memoirs, documents, correspondence) was published. (FA/TD)

Sources: Biographisches Lexikon, vol. 1; C. I. C. Brățianu and I. G. Duca, Partidul Național Liberal (Bucharest, 1932); Ghita Ionescu, Communism in Rumania 1944–1962 (London and New York, 1964); Mareșal Ion Antonescu, Epistolarul Infernului

(Bucharest, 1993); Józef Darski, Rumunia: Historia, współczesność, konflikty narodowe (N.p., n.d.); J. Kurcysz, Na przedpolu Jałty: Wspomnienia z tajnej służby w dyplomacji (Katowice, 1995); Denis Deletant, Communist Terror in Romania: Gheorghiu-Dej and the Police State, 1948–1965 (New York, 1999).

BRĂȚIANU Gheorghe I. (12 February 1898, Ruginoasa–23, 26, or 27 April 1953, Sighet), Romanian politician. Brățianu was the son of Ion I. C. Brățianu and Princess Maria Moruzi-Cuza. Between 1919 and 1922 he studied at the Sorbonne, at the Ecole Pratique des Hautes Études in Paris, and at the École des Chartes in Paris. In 1923 he earned a Ph.D. in history from the university in Chernivtsi. In 1922 he also completed law studies. From 1923 he was professor of medieval history at the university in Iași, where he worked with Nicolae Iorga. From 1928 he was a member of the Romanian Academy of Sciences. In 1929 he lectured at the Sorbonne. In 1940 he was a professor at the University of Bucharest. From 1941 to 1947 he was director of the N. Iorga Institute of History in Bucharest. In his works, he dealt with the social and economic history of the decline of the Roman Empire and the Middle Ages, paying special attention to the Danube Basin.

Brățianu was politically active from 1926, when he joined the National Liberal Party (Partidul Național Liberal [NLP]). He was an MP in 1927–28, 1931–32, and 1933–37. In June 1930 he brought about a split in the NLP. A group of his adherents, the so-called Georgists, who supported Charles II, the soon-to-be king of Romania, emerged from the NLP. In January 1938 his group returned to the NLP. In January 1941 he refused to accept a ministerial post in the government of General Ion Antonescu. From June to October 1941 he served in the army, fighting against the USSR. He then returned to his scholarly work, and in 1943 he received an honorary doctorate from the University of Bonn. In August 1944 he mediated in talks on setting terms with the Allies. The talks were held between Marshal Antonescu and the leader of the National Peasant Party (NPP), Iuliu Maniu. On 23 August 1944, speaking on behalf of his own party as well as the NPP and the Socialists, Brățianu planned to convince Antonescu about the necessity of concluding an immediate truce. Negotiations on the issue were interrupted by a coup that took place on the afternoon of the same day. In February 1947 Brățianu protested against the Paris Peace Conference decisions on Romania (the loss of northern Bukovina and Bessarabia). In 1947–50 he was under house arrest. In May 1950 he was arrested. He probably committed suicide in the Sighet prison. The place of his burial is unknown.

Brățianu published (among other works) Le problème des frontières russo-roumaines (The question of Russo-Romanian borders; 1922); Problemele politicii noastre de stat (Problems of our state policy; 1937); Acțiunea politică și militară a României în lumina corespondenței diplomatice a lui Ion I. C. Brățianu (Romania's political and military activities in light of the diplomatic correspondence of Ion I. C. Brățianu; 1939–40); Către români: Zece conferințe și prelezezi (To the Romanians: Ten conferences and lectures; 1942); Une énigme et un miracle historique: Le peuple roumain (Enigma and a miracle of history: The Romanian people; 1942); Tradiția istorică despre întemeierea statelor românești (Historical tradition about the creation of the Romanian states; 1945); Formules d'organisation de la paix dans l'histoire universelle (Forms of peace organization in world history; 1945); he also authored the memoirs File rupte din Cartea Războiului (Pages torn from the book of war). (FA/TD)

Sources: Biographisches Lexikon, vol. 1; R.W. Seton-Watson, A History of the Roumanians (Hamden, CT 1963); Andrzej Koryn, Rumunia w polityce wielkich mocarstw 1944–1947 (Wrocław, 1983); Șerban Papacostea, “Gheorghe I. Brățianu: Istoricul și omul politic,” Revista Istorică, 1993, nos. 1–2; M. Brățianu, Gheorghe Brățianu—enigma morții sale (Bucharest, 1997).

BRĂȚIANU Ion I. C. (20 August 1864, Florica—24 September 1927, Bucharest), Romanian liberal politician. Brățianu was the son of Ion Brățianu, called the elder, one of the leaders of the Romanian independence movement. He attended Sfântul-Sava High School in Bucharest, and later he graduated from the École Polytechnique in Paris (1889). He worked on the construction of the bridge over the Danube near Černavoda and then in the construction of the railway line between Bacău and Piatra Neamț. In 1889 he joined the National Liberal Party (NLP). Elected to parliament for the first time in 1895, he was named minister of foreign affairs in 1897. In 1901 he was appointed head of diplomacy in the government of Dimitrie Sturdza. In March 1907 Brățianu joined the next government of Sturdza, becoming minister of interior. In this capacity, he was in charge of the pacification of the peasant uprising in Moldova that claimed eleven thousand lives. From 9 January 1909 and 11 January 1911 he served as prime minister for the first time. The two Balkan Wars enhanced the prestige of the Conservative Party; therefore the NLP, which was led by Brățianu from 1909, could resume power only by promoting a bolder program of social reforms. The program included, for example, the promise of agricultural reform and universal suffrage.

On 17 January 1914 Brățianu was appointed prime minister for the second time. In parliament, he proposed amendments to the constitution toward democratic reforms, which had been promised earlier. In foreign policy he cautiously supported the Entente countries. When the war broke out, he was able to restrain the pro-German sympathies of King Charles I, hoping that if the Central Powers lost the war, Romania would get the territories that were inhabited mostly or partly by Romanians and that belonged to the Habsburg monarchy. However, Brățianu's government did not formally express itself in favor of any side, playing on the needs of both sides. On 2 October 1914 Russia agreed to Romania's conditions, but the successes of Germany and Austria-Hungary on the Eastern Front inhibited Brățianu from bringing Romania into the war on the side of the Entente. It was only the Russian summer offensive of 1916 and the impatience of England and France, as well as their support for the territorial claims of Romania, that prompted the government to declare war against the Central Powers on 27 August 1916. Under Brățianu's influence King Ferdinand also eventually decided to cast his lot with the Allies. Almost immediately the Romanian Army suffered a series of defeats, and Brățianu's government had to withdraw from Bucharest to Iași. The defeat of Russia in 1917 and the Brest-Litovsk Peace Treaty of March 1918 led Romania to the verge of catastrophe. Brățianu again used his diplomatic skills, beginning peace negotiations with the Germans. However, as the German conditions were unacceptable, on 8 February 1918 he resigned from the premiership. He was succeeded by General Alexandru Averescu and then by a pro-German conservative, Alexandru Marghiloman. The decision on the change of government was reached between Brățianu and Marghiloman in the form of a gentlemen's agreement. The impossibility of implementing peace, which was signed with the Central Powers in Bucharest in May 1918, created a situation in which Brățianu could maintain, not very truthfully, that Romania had never renounced the Entente.

On 12 December 1918 Brățianu again became head of the government. He represented Romania at the Paris Peace Conference, demanding that the victorious Entente keep its territorial promise of 1916. His stance would probably have been disregarded had it not been for the fact that the Romanian troops seized Transylvania, Bessarabia, and Bukovina. This convinced Italy at first, and then France, to back the Romanian demands. However, the formation of the Hungarian Soviet Republic, to which Romania was an important barrier, had a decisive impact on the situation. The Romanian troops even entered Budapest. Peace treaties signed with Bulgaria at Neuilly and with Hungary at Trianon granted the Romanians the territories they claimed. On 27 September 1919 Brățianu resigned as prime minister. He was recalled to office on 19 January 1922, becoming head of a government dominated by the liberals. He consolidated social and political reforms introduced by his predecessors. The constitution of 28 March 1923 included a provision that the agrarian reform was a part of the constitution. As a result of his efforts, voting rights were extended under a law of 1926. He also brought about the “act of 4 January 1926,” by which Prince Charles, who had a relationship with his mistress, Magda Lupescu, was formally excluded from the royal succession and the succession went to Prince Michael. On 30 March 1926 Brățianu finally resigned as head of the government because of ill health. In 1927, after the death of King Ferdinand, he appointed a Regency Council. Brățianu was the author of (among other works) România și Peninsula Balcanică (Romania and the Balkan Peninsula; 1913) and Le rayonnement de génie latin (Radiance of the Latin genius; 1919). (FA/AD/WR)

Sources: Biographisches Lexikon, vol. 1; Sabina Cantacuzino, Din viața familiei I. C. Brățianu (Bucharest, 1933); Georghe Brățianu, Acțiunea politică și militară a României în 1919 în lumina corespondenței diplomatice a lui I. I. C. Brățianu (Bucharest, 1939); David Sherman Spector, Rumania at the Paris Peace Conference: A Study of Diplomacy of I. C. Brățianu (New York, 1962); Holger H. Herwig and Neil M. Heyman, Biographical Dictionary of World War I (Westport, Conn., 19820); Vasile Alexandrescu, Romania in World War I (Bucharest, 1985); Mircea Mușat and Ion Ardeleanu, România după Marea Unire, vols. 1–2 (Bucharest, 1986); Glenn Torrey, General Henri Bertholet and Romania, 1916–1919 (Boulder, Colo., 1987); Emile Turdeanu, Modern Romania: The Achievement of National Unity, 1914–1920 (Los Angeles, 1988); Ioan Scurtu, I. I. C. Brățianu: Activitatea politică (Bucharest, 1992).

BRĂȚIANU Vintilă I. C. (28 September 1867, Florica–22 December 1930, Bucharest), Romanian politician and economist. Brățianu was the son of the leader of the Liberal Party and premier, Ion Brățianu (1821–1891) and the brother of Ion I. C. Brățianu. From 1897 he was an active member of the National Liberal Party (NLP). He studied at the École Polytechnique in Paris from 1885 to 1889. In 1895 he became a member of the construction management of the railway bridge over the Danube between Černavoda and Fetești. Later, he held many administrative and government positions. For example, he was president of the State Monopoly (1899–1901) and secretary general in the Ministry of Finance (1901–4). In 1903 he was elected to the parliament for the first time, and in 1907 he took up the post of mayor of Bucharest. From 1910 he headed the Romanian National Bank. During World War I he served as war minister (August 1916–August 1917). After the end of the war he was finance minister (January 1922–March 1926), and after his brother’s death he simultaneously served as prime minister and minister of finance (24 November 1927–16 November 1928). From 16 November 1927 until his death he was head of the NLP.

An expert in the field of public finance, he contributed to the stabilization of the Romanian leu after World War I. He also initiated the policy of Romania’s economic self-sufficiency (Prin Noi Însine [By Ourselves]). In November 1928 he helped Iuliu Maniu, head of the National Peasant Party, to assume the post of prime minister. He was the author of (among other works) Interesele României în actualul război (Romania’s interests in the present war; 1914); Petrolul și politica de stat (Petroleum and state policy; 1919); Consolidarea finanțelor României (Financial stabilization of Romania; 1922); and Politica financiară (Financial policy; 1927). (FA/TD)

Sources: Biographisches Lexikon, vol. 1; R.W. Seton-Watson, A History of the Roumanians (Hamden, CT, 1963); Șerban N. Ionescu, Who Was Who in Twentieth Century Romania (Boulder, Colo., 1994); Keith Hitchins, Rumania 1866–1947 (Oxford, 1994).

BRATKOWSKI Stefan (22 November 1934, Wrocław), Polish journalist. Bratkowski graduated in law from the Jagiellonian University in Kraków in 1955 and worked there as an assistant professor for a year. In 1949–56 he belonged to the Polish Youth Union, and in 1956 he joined the student movement demanding de-Stalinization. Then he worked as a journalist for the weekly Po prostu. In 1956–57 he was a member of the Central Committee of the Socialist Youth Union. From 1954 to 1981 he belonged to the Polish United Workers’ Party (PUWP). From 1971 to 1974 he edited a weekly supplement to the daily Życia Warszawy entitled Życie i Nowoczesność, which promoted innovations and reforms in the command economy. In 1978 he co-initiated the Discussion Forum Experience and Future (Konwersatorium Doświadczenie i Przyszłość [DiP]) and co-authored a “Report on the State of the Republic and the Means to Improve It,” including an analysis of the crisis and suggested reforms within the ideological framework of the Communist system. He continued these analyses in subsequent reports of the Discussion Forum. In 1980–81 he was editor of Życie i Nowoczesność again, and on 30 October 1980 he was elected president of the Association of Polish Journalists (Stowarzyszenie Dziennikarzy Polskich [SDP]). He belonged to the reform movement in the Communist Party aiming at cooperation with Solidarity. In October 1981 he was removed from the PUWP. During martial law, after the suspension and then the dissolution of the SDP, he wrote for the underground press. From 1983 to 1988 he authored twenty issues of Gazeta Dźwiękowa, recorded on tape. From December 1988 he was a member of the Civic Committee of the Chairman of Solidarity, and from February to April 1989 he took part in the Round Table Talks. In 1989–90 he was president of the restored SDP and then its honorary president. In 1991–92 he chaired the publishing cooperative Czytelnik. He wrote for Gazeta Bankowa, Gazeta Wyborcza, Rzeczpospolita, and other dailies and periodicals. He authored many popular books in economics, social affairs, and history, such as Księga wróżb prawdziwych (A book of true prophecies; 1969); Skąd przychodzimy? (Where do we come from? 1975); Z czym do nieśmiertelności (on Tadeusz Kościuszko) (With what to immortality? 1977); Wiosna Europy: Mnisi, królowie, wizjonerzy (The spring of Europe: Monks, kings, visionaries; 1997); Pan Nowogród Wielki (Mister Novgorod the Great; 1999); and Podróż do nowej przyszłości (A trip to a new future; 2000). (AF)

Sources: Wielka encyklopedia PWN, vol. 4 (Warsaw, 2001); Jerzy Holzer, Solidarność (Warsaw, 1983); Dariusz Fikus, Foksal '81 (Poznań, 1989).

BRAUN Jerzy (1 September 1901, Dąbrowa Tarnowska–17 October 1975, Rome), Polish writer, philosopher, and politician. The son of a notary, already as a student in high school Braun became involved in scouting. In 1919 he became a scoutmaster in Tarnów, where he edited the Scout monthly Czuwaj. In November 1918 he wrote the text and music to a popular scout song, Płonie ognisko i szumią knieje (The glowing campfire). In 1919 entered the Jagiellonian University, but he interrupted his studies in 1920 to take part in the Polish-Soviet war, for which he was decorated with the Cross of Valor. He graduated in Polish philology at the Jagiellonian University in 1923, and then he developed literary activities. He published poetry volumes (including collections of scout songs) and wrote novels, stage plays (e.g., Europa, staged in Warsaw's Atheneum Theater by Stefan Jaracz), and film scripts. From 1926 to 1928 he edited the Gazeta Literacka, which he founded in Kraków. After moving to Warsaw in 1929, Braun came into contact with the Messianism of Józef Maria Hoene-Wroński and with the Messianic Institute. Soon he became an expert in this philosophy, as well as its popularizer. In 1932 he began to publish the biweekly Zet, where he propagated the ideas of Hoene-Wroński. However, he attributed a world-saving mission not to Poland but to Christianity and to a revived church. Among other works he wrote Zagadka dziejowa Polski (The Polish historic puzzle; 1938).

In September 1939 Braun fought in the defense of Warsaw. Wanted by the Gestapo, he left for Krosno, where he joined the then-forming underground organization called Nowa Polska and became its leader. He returned to Warsaw in the spring 1940 to preside over a Catholic underground organization called Unia, and he was the author of its ideological declaration. After the incorporation of Unia into the Labor Party (Stronictwo Pracy [SP]) in March 1942, Braun became a member of the party's Main Board and vice-president of its Program Council. He was also active in the Chief Commission of the Directorate of Civil Resistance. In 1943, under the pseudonym "Inżynier Z.," he published Marxizm, kapitalizm, a gospodarka dynamiczna (Marxism, capitalism, and a dynamic economy). From 1944 to 1945 he represented the SP in the Council of National Unity (Rada Jedności Narodu [RJN]). He fought in the Warsaw Uprising. From March to July 1945, under the pseudonym "Rogowski," he was president of the RJN and signed its last manifesto on 1 July 1945.

After the RJN as well as the Delegation of the Polish Government-in-Exile were dissolved, Braun cooperated with the group of Karol Popiel in the SP. In November 1945 he was arrested along with his wife on the charge of illegally attempting to cross the border in Cieszyn. Released in March 1946, both returned to Warsaw, where between February 1947 and September 1948 Braun co-edited the Tygodnik Warszawski. In January 1948 he graduated in philosophy at the Catholic University of Lublin. On 3 September 1948 he was arrested along with his wife for his wartime underground activities. On 19 April 1951 he was sentenced to life imprisonment. He served his sentence in Warsaw and Wronki. Under an amnesty, in April 1956 his sentence was commuted to twelve years, and then it was suspended due to his ill health. In May 1958 he was rehabilitated. He returned to his literary, journalistic, and social work. Active in the Club of Catholic Intellectuals in Warsaw, he served as vice-president of the Warsaw branch of the Polish Writers' Union. He was also involved in the preconciliar work of the Polish laity and ecumenical movement, cooperating with Primate Stefan Wyszyński. From 1966 he lived in Rome. He attended the fourth session of the Second Vatican Council and worked with Radio Vatican and Osservatore Romano. He is buried at the Powązki Cemetery in Warsaw. He left his memoirs, Czasy i ludzie (Times and people), and co-authored memoirs about Jan Hoppe, Człowiek ze spiżu (Man of bronze; 1981). (JS)

Sources: Kunert, vol. 1; Encyklopedia katolicka, vol. 2 (Lublin, 1976); Jacek Bartyzel, "Jerzy Braun: Człowiek i dzieło," Tygodnik Powszechny, 1985, no. 42; Maria Żychowska, Jerzy Braun, 1901–1975: Harcerz, poeta, filozof, publicysta, mąż stanu (Tarnów, 1986); Muza poezji w celi Jerzego Brauna (Kraków, 1997); Janusz Zabłocki, Chrześcijańska Demokracja w kraju i na emigracji 1947–1970 (Lublin, 1999); www.biblioteka.tarman.pl/patroni/braun2.html.

BRAZAUSKAS Algirdas Mykolas (22 September 1932, Rokiškis), Lithuanian Communist activist and post-Communist politician, president of Lithuania. After graduating from high school in 1951, Brazauskas completed engineering studies at the Kaunas Polytechnic in 1956.

During studies he belonged to the Komsomol, and in 1959 he joined the Communist Party of the Soviet Union. In 1958 he became chief engineer of Energostroy, which constructed the Kaunas Hydropower Plant, and then, until 1962, he directed a power engineering company. In 1962–65 he was head of the department of building materials in the Economic Council of the Lithuanian SSR, and from 1965 he was minister of the building materials industry. In 1966 he became a deputy member of the Central Committee (CC) of the Communist Party of Lithuania (CPL) and deputy chairman of the State Planning Commission of the government of the Lithuanian SRR. From 1967 he was a deputy to the republican Supreme Council. In 1974 he received a Ph.D. in economics, and in 1977 he became secretary for economic affairs and a member of the CPL CC Politburo. Although he began his career during the reign of Leonid Brezhnev and was a loyal executor of Soviet policies, he became known for his administrative skills and openness to perestroika.

When the Lithuanian Movement for Perestroika (Lietuvos Persitvarkymo Sąjūdis) was created in June 1988, Brazauskas realized that the Communist Party would no longer be able to suppress Lithuanian aspirations for freedom and that he should join the movement. The first member of the top Communist leadership to take part in the mass gatherings of the movement, he won wide support and sympathy in the society. His viewpoint prevailed in the CPL CC, which, after a brutal police crackdown on a commemoration of the anniversary of the Molotov-Ribbentrop Pact on 23 August 1988, decided to dismiss the previous first secretary, Ringaudas Songaila, and entrusted Brazauskas with this position. Brazauskas' first decision, which gained him even more sympathy, was to give back Vilnius Cathedral to the Roman Catholic Church. As head of the CPL, he was in favor of the political and economic autonomy of Lithuania but was more cautious than the Estonian leadership. In October 1988 in the Supreme Council Brazauskas blocked a declaration of Lithuanian independence similar to the Estonian declaration. The council adopted the declaration on 18 May 1989, when the downfall of the Soviet Union seemed closer. Following Brazauskas, most of the Lithuanian Communists left the Soviet party in December 1989, founding an independent CPL. From January to March 1990 Brazauskas was chairman of the Supreme Council. Despite the victory of the Lithuanian Movement for Perestroika in the elections to the Supreme Council in February and March 1990 and Brazauskas's departure from the chairmanship of the council, which had declared the full independence of Lithuania, Brazauskas became deputy prime minister in the government of Kazimiera Prunskiene. He held this position from April 1990 to early January 1991. In December 1990 he became chairman of the Lithuanian Democratic Labor Party (Lietuvos Demokratinė Darbo Partija [LDPP]), created by former CPL activists.

During the crisis that followed the declaration of Lithuanian independence, Brazauskas was increasingly criticized for his cautious policies and his Communist past, but he managed to maintain a good reputation in the society. After the elections of October 1992 he became the speaker of the parliament, and, after withdrawing from the LDPP, on 14 February 1993 he won the presidential election. He effectively continued the pro-independence and pro-democracy line of Lithuanian politics. At the end of August 1993 the last Soviet troops left Lithuania, and at the beginning of September 1993 Brazauskas welcomed Pope John Paul II. This was the first papal pilgrimage to any former Soviet republic. As the first president of any post-Soviet country, on 4 January 1994 Brazauskas officially stated that membership in NATO was a strategic goal for Lithuania. During his term as president, he signed a border agreement with Russia and a breakthrough treaty of friendly relations and neighborly cooperation with Poland (26 April 1994). In June 1995 Lithuania signed an association treaty with the European Union, and in December 1995 it officially submitted its candidature for union membership. Despite his continued popularity, Brazauskas did not run for reelection in December 1998. He organized the Social Democratic Coalition including the LDPP, the Lithuanian Social Democratic Party, the New Democracy, and the Union of Russians in Lithuania; it won the parliamentary elections of October 2000. In January 2001 both leftist parties merged into the Social Democratic Party of Lithuania. On 3 July 2001 Brazauskas assumed the post of prime minister and played an important role in the accession of Lithuania into the European Union, decided by national referendum in the spring of 2003. (MK)

Sources: Saulius Suziedelis, Historical Dictionary of Lithuania (Lanham, Md., 1997); Kas yra kas Lietuvoje 95/96; Alexander Rahr, ed., A Biographical Directory of 100 Leading Soviet Officials (Boulder, Colo., 1990); Alfred E. Senn, Lithuania Awakening (Berkeley, 1990); Anatol Lieven, The Baltic Revolution (New Haven, 1993); Romuald J. Misiunas and Rein Taagepera, The Baltic States: Years of Dependence, 1940–1990 (Berkeley, 1993); V. Stanley Vardys and Judith B. Sedaitis, Lithuania: The Rebel Nation (Boulder, Colo., 1997); Piotr Łossowski, Litwa (Warsaw, 2001).

BŘEZINA Otokar [originally Václav Jebavý] (13 September 1868, Počátky, near Pelhřimov–25 March 1929, Jaroměřice nad Rokytną, near Třebíč), Czech writer. After graduating from high school in 1887, Březina started working as a teacher and led a solitary life. He read a lot and wrote many letters, acquiring a vast literary and philosophical knowledge. In 1913 he became a corresponding member, and in 1923 a full member, of the Czech Academy of Science and Art. In 1919 he received an honorary doctorate from Charles University in Prague, and in 1923 he rejected an offer to assume a chair of philosophy at Brno University. He was twice a candidate for the Nobel Prize in literature (1921 and 1928). He made his literary debut in the spirit of positivism in 1886, but from 1892 he was closer to symbolism and soon became one of the major exponents of Czech modernism. His first volume, Tajemné dálky (Secret distances; 1895), was mostly pessimistic and elegiac. In two subsequent volumes—Svítání na západě (Dawn in the West; 1896) and Větry od pólů (Winds from the poles; 1897)—he presented hymns that showed the human experience as a means to better recognize the Absolute. In his next collections—Stavitelé chrámu (Builders of the temple; 1899) and Ruce (Hands; 1901)—he argued that love was the major uniting force and the ultimate goal of life. After the latter collection, in which people appeared as brothers and sisters working together to improve the world, he found that he had no more to say and ended his poetic career. He started writing essays. In the volume Hudba pramenů (Music of the roots; 1903) he considered the mysteries of art, beauty, and world order. In 1908 he gave up active literary work, apart from essays that he never completed and that were published in 1970 as Skryté dějiny (Hidden histories), in which the incomplete works were reconstructed by Otakar Fiala. (PU)

Sources: ČBS; Slovník českých filozofů (Brno, 1998); Miloš Marten, Otokar Březina (Prague, 1903); Miloš Dvořák, Tradice díla Otokara Březiny (Prague, 1928); Antonín Veselý, Otokar Březina: Osobnost a dílo (Brno, 1928); Emanuel Chalupný, Dopisy a výroky Otokara Březiny (Prague, 1931); Jakub Deml, Mé svědectví o Otokaru Březinovi (Prague, 1931); Oldřich Králík, Otokar Březina (Prague, 1948); Józef Zarek, Esejstyka Otokara Březiny: W kręgu dylematów symbolisty (Wrocław, 1979).

BRIEDIS Fridrihs (24 June 1888, county of Polotsk–28 August 1918, Moscow), Latvian officer in the Russian Army. Born into a peasant family, Briedis attended school in Dvinsk (Daugavpils, Dünaburg). In 1906 he entered the Junker school in St. Petersburg, from which he graduated in 1909. Next, he served as an officer in the Ninety-ninth Infantry Regiment in Dvinsk. From 1914 he took part in the fighting in Prussia and in Poland. In 1915 he was transferred, at his own request, to the units of Latvian Riflemen on the Riga front. He was one of the more outstanding combat officers and was wounded many times. In 1917 he was promoted to colonel and was appointed commanding officer of the First Regiment of Latvian Riflemen. Arrested by the Bolsheviks in October 1917, he managed to escape. He went to Vitebsk and then to Petrograd and Moscow. In January 1918, along with other Latvian officers, he joined the Union for the Defense of the Fatherland and Freedom, an anti-Bolshevik organization led by Boris Savinkov. Under Briedis's pressure, the leadership of the union planned to demand autonomy for Latvia, within the framework of democratic Russia. In July 1918 Briedis was one of the leaders of the anti-Bolshevik uprising in Rybinsk and Yaroslavl. On 7 August 1918 he was arrested in Moscow, and then he was executed by a firing squad in Lubyanka Prison. (EJ)

Sources: Pulkvedis F. Briedis (Riga, 1921); Edvins Mednis, Pulkvedis Briedis (Riga, 1934); P. Dardzāns, "Pulkvedis F. Briedis cīņās un dzīvē," Latviešu Strēlnieki, 1938, no. 25; M. Akmenājs, Briedis (Stockholm, 1963); V. Stinkulis, Pulkvedis Fridrihs Briedis (Riga, 1992); Andrejs Plakans, Historical Dictionary of Latvia (Lanham, Md., 1997).

BRONIEWSKI Stanisław, pseudonym "Orsza" (29 December 1915, Warsaw–30 December 2000, Warsaw), Polish scouting activist. From 1928 Broniewski was a member of the Polish Scouting Association (Związek Harcerstwa Polskiego [ZHP]). He graduated from the Law and Economics Department of Poznań University. In September 1939 he co-organized the Scouting Emergency Organization (Pogotowie Harcerzy) in Warsaw. During the German occupation he commanded the Warsaw troop of the Gray Ranks (Szare Szeregi; the underground ZHP), and then its Shock Troops. In March 1943 he commanded the famous Warsaw Arsenal operation in which several Pawiak prisoners, including Jan "Rudy" Bytnar, were rescued from German hands. From May 1943 he was head of the Gray Ranks. He fought in the Warsaw Uprising, and after its failure he was imprisoned in the POW camp in Bergen-Belsen. In 1945 he took over the command of Polish scouting in Germany. In 1946 he decided to return to Poland. From 1946 to 1948 he worked in the Central Planning Office, and in 1948–53, in the Union of Consumer Cooperatives Społem. Contrary to Communist endeavors to take over total control of Polish scouting, Broniewski embodied the tradition of the Gray Ranks and set a pattern for three generations of Polish scouts. After October 1956 he initiated an organizational committee aiming at the renewal of Polish scouting after Stalinism. He joined the ZHP Central Headquarters, but he was purged from it by the Communists in 1958. From 1957 to 1963 he worked in the Economic Council of the Council of Ministers and then in the Institute of Environmental Protection. After receiving a Ph.D. and a postdoctoral degree, he also lectured at the University of Łódź. In 1989 he presided over the National Committee for ZHP Renewal. He authored numerous works on town planning and economics; memoirs, Całym życiem: Szare Szeregi w relacji naczelnika (With all my life: The Gray Ranks story told by its head; 1983); and a biography, Florian Marciniak: Naczelnik Szarych Szeregów (Florian Marciniak: Head of the Gray Ranks; 1988). (WR)

Sources: Kunert, vols. 1–3; Wielka Encyklopedia Powszechna, vol. 4 (Warsaw, 2001); Jerzy Jabrzemski, ed., Szare Szeregi: Harcerze 1939–1945, vols. 1–3 (Warsaw, 1988); Więź, 2001, no. 3.

BRONIEWSKI Władysław (17 December 1897, Płock–10 February 1962, Warsaw), Polish poet. In 1915–17 Broniewski served in the Polish Legions on the side of the Austro-Hungarian Army. After refusing to swear an oath of loyalty to the Central Powers, he was interned in the Szczypiorno camp. In 1919–21 he served in the Polish Army; he took part in the Polish-Soviet war and was decorated with the Order of Virtuti Militari for bravery on the battlefield. From 1921 to 1924 he studied philosophy at Warsaw University, but he did not graduate. At this time he drew closer to the extreme left and worked with periodicals inspired by the Communist Party of Poland. Temporarily arrested, after release he was secretary of the editorial board of Wiadomości Literackie. In 1939 he was in Lwów (Lviv), where, after the Soviet invasion, he was arrested and deported to the Gulag. As a result of the Polish-Soviet agreement of July 1941, he was released. He joined the Polish Army in the USSR and was evacuated with it to Iran and the Middle East in 1942. In 1945 he returned to Poland. In his poetry he combined patriotic emotions and revolutionary pathos and agitation with lyrical exaltation. He alluded to Polish Romantic poetry but also to contemporary poetics, using a simple or even colloquial language. In the volumes Wiatraki (Windmills; 1925) and Dymy nad miastem (Smoke over the city; 1929) and in the poem Komuna Paryska (The Paris Commune; 1929) he expressed the revolutionary mood, and in the collection Krzyk ostateczny (Ultimate shout; 1938), a pre-sentiment of the coming disaster of war. In April 1939 he wrote his most popular poem, Bagnet na broń (Bayonets ready!), in which he called people to arms in defense of Polish independence. After World War II he became a leading poet of the Communist regime, creating political and propaganda works, such as the poem Słowo o Stalinie (A word on Stalin; 1949), but also personal and landscape lyrics (WR)

Sources: Literatura polska XX wieku: Przewodnik encyklopedyczny, vol. 1 (Warsaw, 2000); Wielka encyklopedia PWN, vol. 4 (Warsaw, 2001); Jan Zygmunt Jakubowski, Władysław Broniewski (Warsaw, 1975); Feliksa Lichodziejewska, Broniewski bez cenzury 1939–1945 (Warsaw, 1992).

BRUCAN Silviu (18 January 1916, Bucharest), Romanian Communist and post-Communist activist. Before World War II Brucan graduated in political science and worked as a journalist. During the war he was active in the Communist underground but hiding because of his Jewish descent. After the coup of August 1944, he became one of the leaders of the Romanian Communist Party (Partidul Comunist Român [RCP]). Until 1956 he was editor-in-chief of the main party daily, Scântea, helping to carry into effect numerous Stalinist propaganda campaigns. In 1944–56 he was in Moscow many times. From 1956 to 1963 he was ambassador to the United States and to the United Nations and was engaged in acquiring American high technologies. After his return, in 1963 he became head of state television. Soon after the takeover of power by Nicolae Ceaușescu in 1965, as a member of the Gheorghe Gheorghiu-Dej group, Brucan was dismissed from this position. He worked at Bucharest University and was deputy director of the Association of International Studies.

In the 1980s Brucan was a member of a group of Communist functionaries supported by the Kremlin and ready to take over power in case the Soviet leadership determined that Ceaușescu was no longer acceptable. The political police, Securitate, knew of his affiliation but did nothing. In 1987, after the army bloodily suppressed a workers' rebellion in Brașov, Brucan gave interviews to Western journalists criticizing the use of force. In 1988 he was allowed to go to the United States, where he met the head of the East European desk of the State Department. He also visited London, Vienna, and Moscow, where he met Mikhail Gorbachev, who probably promised his support for an alternative Romanian government. After Brucan returned to Romania, on 10 March 1989 the BBC broadcast the "Letter of Six," written by former high Communist functionaries protesting the violation of human rights and the economic policy of the Ceaușescu regime. Brucan was briefly arrested. After the fall of Ceaușescu on 22 December 1989, Brucan became one of the leaders of the National Salvation Front (Frontul Sălbări Naționale), which took over power. Brucan was against the withdrawal of Romania from the Warsaw Pact, political pluralism, and appropriation of the peasants. When Ion Iliescu was elected president in May 1990, Brucan became one of his closest advisers. Nevertheless, at the end of 1990 he was marginalized by Iliescu, as he was thought to be too conservative a Communist. Brucan authored (among other works) the following: Originele politicii americane (The roots of American policy; 1968); Dialectic of World Politics (1978); Post-Brezhnev Era: An Insider's View (1983); Stâlpii noii puteri în România (Foundations of new power in Romania; 1996); Social Change in Russia and Eastern Europe: From Party Hacks to Nouveaux Riches (1998); and the memoirs Generația irosita: Memorii (Wasted generation; 1993). (LW)

Sources: Ion Rațiu, Contemporary Romania (Richmond, 1975); Józef Darski, Rumunia: Historia, współczesność, konflikty narodowe (Warsaw, 1995); Ion Alexandrescu, Ion Bulei, Ion Mamina, and Ioan Scurtu, Enciclopedia de istorie României (Bucharest, 2000); www.wyborcza.pl; www.abcnet.com.pl; www.diploweb.com; www.loc.gov.

BRUSZNYAI Árpád (27 June 1924, Derekegyháza–9 January 1958, Budapest), one of the leaders of the Hungarian Revolution of 1956. In 1949 Brusznay graduated cum laude in classical philology and history, and in 1950 he received a Ph.D. It was predicted that he would have a brilliant scholarly career. In 1949–50 he worked in the Institute of Classical Philology of Budapest University. In 1951 his father was imprisoned for political reasons; his brother, a Roman Catholic priest, was interned in Kistarcsa; and Brusznay himself was fired from work. First he worked as an organ player in the Vác basilica, where he also taught Old Greek, Latin, and music in the local theological seminary. In 1952 he got a teaching job at László Lovassy High School in Veszprém. After the outbreak of the revolution, on 26 October 1956 he was elected to the Revolutionary Council of Veszprém County; on 31 October he became its deputy chairman, and on 1 November, chairman. The council urged the government of Imre Nagy to start negotiations on the withdrawal of Soviet troops from Hungary, to announce free parliamentary elections, and to “build socialism” with respect to the national tradition. Enjoying substantial authority, Brusznay vetoed lynchings and prevented bloodshed. He issued a decree on the partial dissolution of collective farms and on the takeover of Communist Party property by the council. He made sure that all the Communist security functionaries gave up their arms and handed them over to the council members. On 2 November he agreed in Budapest that the military commander of Veszprém should transfer arms to the newly formed detachments of the Revolutionary National Guard, and he helped to organize its units with respect to discipline and order. A day after the second Soviet intervention, on 5 November 1956 he was arrested and transferred to the USSR. Six weeks later he returned to Hungary, but on 25 April 1957 he was arrested again by the Hungarian authorities, and on 19 October 1957 he was sentenced by a military court in Győr to life imprisonment for “leading a plot against the power of the people.” On 7 January 1958 the Supreme Military Court changed this verdict to a death sentence, and two days later he was executed. (JT)

Sources: Attila Szokolczay, Az 1956-os forradalom és szabadságharc (Budapest, 2001); Új Magyar Életrajzi Lexikon, vol. 1 (Budapest, 2001); György Litván, ed., Revolucja węgierska 1956 roku (Warsaw, 1996).

BRYJA Wincenty (16 June 1897, Morawczyn, near Nowy Targ–27 January 1973, Morawczyn), Polish Peasant Party politician. Bryja completed secondary school in Nowy Targ. From 1917 he served in the Austrian Army, and from 1918 to 1921, in the Polish Army. In 1925 he graduated in law from the Jagiellonian University. A member of the Polish Peasant Party Piast (Polskie Stronnictwo Ludowe Piast) from 1924, he worked in a bank. Between 1935 and 1938 Bryja was head of the Union of Peasant Intelligentsia and edited its periodical, Zagon. During the Nazi occupation he revived the organization in the underground under the code name “Orka,” in close union with the secret Peasant Party. From October 1942 he was head of the Department of Finance of the Delegation of the Polish Government-in-Exile for the Homeland (Delegatura Rządu na Kraj) in Warsaw. Seriously wounded during the Warsaw Uprising, Bryja was forced out of the city along with the civilian population of the capital. He later worked as a treasurer of the peasant movement called Roch and managed the finances of the Delegation. From July 1945 he co-organized the structures of the Polish Peasant Party (Polskie Stronnictwo Ludowe [PSL]) in the capacity of (for example) treasurer of its Chief Executive Committee and member of its Supreme Council. In December 1945 Bryja was coopted to the National Home Council (Krajowa Rada Narodowa) as a PSL representative. In fake elections in January 1947 he gained a seat in the Constituent Assembly. Fearing arrest, he attempted to cross the border but was caught by the Czechoslovak police and delivered to the Communist authorities in Poland. After his arrest, on 15 November 1947, the Constituent Assembly canceled his parliamentary immunity. He was kept in prison for four years without a trial, and on 8 October 1951 he was sentenced to ten years. Released in 1954, until his death he worked on his own farm. (WR)

Sources: Kunert, vol. 2; Stanisław Łach, Polskie Stronnictwo Ludowe w latach 1945–1947 (Gdańsk, 1995).

BRYSTYGIEROWA Julia, pseudonym “Luna,” (25 November 1902, Stryj–9 October 1975, Warsaw), Polish Communist activist. The daughter of a Jewish druggist, Brystygierowa attended high school in Lwów (Lviv) and then studied history at Jan Kazimierz University in Lwów. After receiving a Ph.D. from this university in 1926, she studied in Paris and Lwów. She earned her living giving private classes and also worked as a teacher in Vilnius but was dismissed for her participation in a strike. Linked with the Communist movement from 1927, in 1931 she began to edit Przegląd Współczesny in Lwów, for which she was arrested. In 1931 she joined the Communist Party of Western Ukraine (Komunistyczna Partia Zachodniej Ukrainy [KPZU]), where she was involved in agitation and propaganda. Imprisoned between 1932 and 1933 after a conflict with party authorities, in 1936 Brystygierowa again joined the leadership of the KPZU and was a secretary of the CC of the International Organization for Aid to Revolutionaries of Western Ukraine. As a representative of the KPZU CC, she took part in negotiations on the establishment of a people's front. She wrote for the press and acted in legal pro-Communist organizations. In May 1936 she co-organized the Congress of Culture Workers in Lwów. Arrested and convicted in April 1937, she was released in April 1939. From the fall of 1939 she lived in Lwów and worked as a secretary in the District Committee of the International Organization for Aid to Revolutionaries. She also had contacts with Nowe Widnokregi and probably with the NKVD. After the outbreak of the German-Soviet war in June 1941 she went to Kharkiv and then to Samarkand. At the First Congress of the Union of Polish Patriots (Związek Patriotów Polskich [ZPP]) in Moscow (9–10 June 1943), she joined the Main Board of the ZPP. Later, she served as secretary of the Presidium of the Main Board of the ZPP and as head of its personnel and organizational department.

In September 1944 Brystygierowa arrived in Lublin and took up a seat in the National Home Council (Krajowa Rada Narodowa [KRN]). She was a member of the Polish Workers' Party (Polska Partia Robotnicza [PPR]) from October 1944. She took part in the First and the Second Congresses of the PPR and in the Unification Congress of the Polish United Workers' Party (Polska Zjednoczona Partia Robotnicza [PUWP]). Until 1954 she was a member of the Central Commission of Party Control. On 20 December 1944 she became head of a section in the Investigation Bureau of the Public Security Department of the Polish Committee of National Liberation (Polski Komitet Wyzwolenia Narodowego [PKWN]), and then she quickly rose in the Communist hierarchy. From January 1945 she was head of the Third Department ("for the struggle against political banditry") of the Ministry for Public Security. In October 1945 she became acting director of the Fifth (Political) Department, and between January 1950 and July 1954 she served as director of this department. In this capacity she controlled political parties, cultural institutions, and religious organizations. She contributed significantly to the establishment of the group centered around Dziś i jutro, the weekly of Bolesław Piasecki.

Her role in the government structures was greater than her official position would suggest, because she attended the plenums of the PUWP CC and prepared many key decisions of the party leadership. She supervised electoral fraud during the referendum of June 1946 and the parliamentary elections of January 1947. She also played a key role in the struggle against the Catholic Church. In 1949 she co-organized the Committee of Priests in the Association of Fighters for Freedom and Democracy as an opposition group to church authorities. Her efforts, which won her the nickname of "bloody Luna," led to many arrests, including those of around nine hundred priests, several bishops, and Primate Stefan Cardinal Wyszyński. After the escape of Józef Światło to the West, in August 1954 she became head of the Third Department (for the struggle against the underground) of the Ministry of Public Security. In December 1954 the Third Department was transferred to the Committee for Public Security. During the thaw Brystygierowa supported the pro-liberal course of the Puławska group, and she began to criticize abuses committed by the security apparatus. In March 1955 she inspired the creation of the Club of the Crooked Circle in Warsaw, but she simultaneously continued the firm policy of struggle against the church. After the liquidation of the Committee for Public Security, in November 1956 she left the security services. In May 1958 she retired and devoted herself to literary work, publishing (for example), under her maiden name, Julia Prajs, the novel Krzywe litery (Crooked letters; 1960). At the end of her life Brystygierowa, who was losing her sight, found care at the Laski Institute for the Blind, run by nuns, where she converted to Catholicism. (PK)

Sources: Trybuna Ludu, 13 October 1975; Andrzej Micewski, Współrzędzić czy nie kłamać: PAX i Znak w Polsce 1945–1976 (Paris, 1978); Słownik biograficzny działaczy polskiego ruchu robotniczego, vol. 2 (Warsaw, 1987); Antoni Dudek and Grzegorz Pytel, Bolesław Piasecki: Próba biografii politycznej (London, 1990); Michał Czajka and Marcin Kamler, Leksykon Historii Polski (Warsaw, 1995); Leszek Żebrowski, "Brystygierowa Julia," Encyklopedia "białych plam," vol. 3 (Radom, 2000).

BRZEZINSKI Zbigniew (28 March 1928, Warsaw), American political scientist and politician of Polish descent. The son of a Polish diplomat, from 1938 Brzezinski lived with his parents in Canada. After World War II they remained abroad. After graduating from Columbia University, in 1953 he received a Ph.D. at Harvard University. He specialized in international relations and in the Communist system in particular. In 1956, along with Carl Friedrich, he published a classic work, Totalitarian Dictatorship and Autocracy, which included a typology of nondemocratic systems. His subsequent works—The Soviet Bloc: Unity and Conflict (1960) and Ideology and Power in Soviet Politics (1962)—strengthened his position among American experts on totalitarianism and Soviet policy. In 1966–68 he was a member of the Council of Policy Planning of the U.S. State Department, and from 1973 to 1977, director of the Tripartite Commission for American-European-Japanese Cooperation. An adviser to Jimmy Carter during his presidential campaign in 1976, from January 1977 Brzezinski was head of the National Security Council. Under his influence, the Carter administration followed events in Poland very closely, particularly in the context of human rights and the developing democratic opposition. At the end of December 1977, along with Carter, Brzezinski visited Poland, meeting, among others, Primate Stefan Wyszyński. In December 1980 he warned the Kremlin that a planned invasion aimed at the suppression of the Solidarity movement could bring fatal consequences for international relations. He also maintained a close contact on this matter with Pope John Paul II.

After leaving the administration, Brzezinski returned to scholarly work at Columbia University and as an adviser to the Center for International Studies at Georgetown University in Washington, D.C. In 1988 he joined an interparty group of advisers on international security. As an expert in this field, he supported a hard line toward the Soviet Union. His support for systemic transformation in Poland and other East Central European countries was always taken into consideration. He advocated an American mission as a superpower to stabilize international relations, and he supported the extension of NATO into Poland and other well-prepared East Central European countries. He frequently visited Poland. In The Grand Failure (1989; Polish edition: Wielkie bankructwo; 1990) he analyzed the historic importance of the fall of Soviet communism, and in The Grand Chessboard (1997; Polish edition: Wielka szachownica; 1997) he presented his vision of the post-Communist world order. Among other works, he also published memoirs: Power and Principle (1985; Polish edition: Cztery lata w Białym Domu; 1990). In 1981 he was awarded the Presidential Medal of Freedom, and in 1995, the Polish Order of the White Eagle. From 1991 he was a member of the Polish Academy of Arts and Sciences. (WR) Sources: The International Who's Who (1991); Wielka encyklopedia PWN, vol. 4 (Warsaw, 2001); Christine E. Thompson, The Works of Zbigniew Kazimierz Brzezinski (Monticello, Ill., 1985); Gerry Argyris Andrianopoulos, Kissinger and Brzezinski: The NSC Struggle for Control of US National Security Policy (New York, 1991); Józef Frankiewicz, Zbigniew Brzeziński i jego związki z Przemyślem (Przemyśl, 1999).

BRZozowski Stanisław, pseudonym “Adam Czepiel” (28 June 1878, Maziarnia, near Chełm—30 April 1911, Florence, Italy), Polish writer and philosopher. Brzozowski started studies in natural science at Warsaw University, but in 1897 he was dismissed from the university for having organized an anti-Russian demonstration. In September 1898 he was arrested and imprisoned in the Warsaw Citadel, where he gave extensive testimony. In prison he fell ill with tuberculosis, which overshadowed the rest of his life. He made his literary debut in 1900 in Przegląd Filozoficzny, and then he contributed to Przegląd Społeczny, Krytyka, and Głos. His novels, Pod ciężarem Boga (Under the burden of God; 1901) and Wiry (Whirls; 1904–5), were written in the spirit of modernism. His biting journalism started two important debates of the early twentieth century, and they were frequently referred to later. In an extensive article published in Głos in 1903 Brzozowski attacked Henryk Sienkiewicz for supporting the myth of a noble conservatism and for promoting a vision of Polish history so that Poles would not lose heart. In 1904 he criticized Zenon Przesmycki “Miriam” for launching the motto “art for art’s sake.” At this time Brzozowski favored a “philosophy of the deed,” based on his interpretation of Friedrich Nietzsche, and in his critiques he stressed the moral and social aspects of a literary work. For him the ultimate measure of an idea was the “quality and quantity of deeds born of it.” Thence his critical attitude toward the Polish insurgent tradition and his apotheosis of labor. He was not uncritical of scientism, positivism, or Marxism, though, and he rejected social determinism.

In 1905 Brzozowski drew closer to Socialist ideology but never joined the Polish Socialist Party. He gathered his essays on the main intellectual trends of his time in Kultura i życie (Culture and life; 1907). He condemned the decadence of contemporary elites—for instance, in Legenda Młodej Polski (The legend of Young Poland; 1909). As a great polemicist, he exerted significant influence on students; thus in order to compromise him the followers of National Democracy published a booklet with his testimonies of 1898. For health reasons Brzozowski settled in Zakopane, and in 1907 he moved to Florence. In 1908 he was accused of collaborating with the Russian political police, Okhrana. He vigorously denied the charges and demanded an independent civil investigation, but in 1910 nothing was proved. Increasingly isolated and bitter, under the influence of the writings of John H. Newman, he turned to religion and died a Roman Catholic. His works had an enormous influence on Polish social and artistic thought in the twentieth century. His Dzieła (Works) were published in four volumes in 1973–90. (WR) Sources: PSB, vol. 3; Literatura polska XX wieku: Przewodnik encyklopedyczny, vol. 1 (Warsaw, 2000); Marian Zdziechowski, Gloryfikacja pracy: Myśli z pism i o pismach Stanisława Brzozowskiego (Petrograd, 1916); Bohdan Suchodolski, Stanisław Brzozowski: Rozwój ideologii (Warsaw, 1933); Andrzej Stawar, O Brzozowskim (Warsaw, 1961); Czesław Miłosz, Człowiek wśród skorpionów: Studium o Stanisławie Brzozowskim (Paris, 1962); Andrzej Walicki, Stanisław Brzozowski: Drogi myśli (Warsaw, 1977).

BUČAR France (2 February 1923, Bohinjska Bistrica), Slovene lawyer and politician. At the end of 1941 Bučar joined the anti-Italian guerrillas. Caught in 1942, he spent almost two years in the camps of Gonars and Novara. After the capitulation of Italy, he was transported to a camp in Germany, but he escaped on the way and returned to Slovenia to resume guerrilla activities. In 1944 he joined the Communist Party. After the war, he graduated in law from the University of Ljubljana, and in 1956 he received a Ph.D. in law there. In 1963 he became secretary of the Republican Chamber of the Assembly of the Slovene republic and began lecturing at the Department of Public Administration of the University of Ljubljana. In view of his criticism of Yugoslav politics, expressed in his book Podjete in družba (Entrepreneurship and society; 1972), and for his activity in the radical Marxist group Praxis, in 1976 he was banned from lecturing and forced into early retirement. He still wrote in the spirit of the revision of communism. In 1986 he published Resničnost in utvara (Reality and myth), and in 1988, Usodne odločitve (Fateful decisions), becoming one of the key opponents of the system in the 1980s. He was one of the leaders of the opposition coalition DEMOS, and as a result of the first free elections of April 1990 he won a parliamentary seat and was elected speaker of the National Assembly. It was during his term that Slovenia declared independence on 25 June 1991. In December 1992 he was elected MP again, but in 1994 he lost in the elections for the mayor of Ljubljana. (WR) Sources: Enciklopedija Slovenije, vol. 1 (Ljubljana, 1987); Leopoldina Plut-Pregelj and Carole Rogel, Historical Dictionary of Slovenia (Lanham, Md., 1996).

BUCHKO Ivan (1 October 1891, Hermaniv, near Lviv [Lwów]–21 September 1974, Rome), Ukrainian Greek Catholic bishop and social activist. Buchko graduated from the Academic High School in Lviv, and in 1911–15 he studied theology in Rome. In 1915 he was ordained, and in 1922 he received a Ph.D. in theology. In the 1920s he was rector of the Minor Seminary and professor at the Greek Catholic Theological Seminary in Lviv. From 1929, as auxiliary bishop of the Lviv archbishopric, in cooperation with Metropolitan Andriy Sheptytskyi, he helped to develop various institutions to stimulate Ukrainian religious life, such as the Ukrainian Youth for Christ (Ukrajnińska Mołod' Chrystowi) and Catholic Action (Katołyčka Akcija). He also began defending Ukrainian social initiatives before the Polish authorities. In 1939 he visited Ukrainian communities in South America, and from 1940 he was bishop of the Philadelphia exarchate and Greek Catholic minister of New York. From 1942 until his death he resided in the St. Josaphat College in Rome, a Basilian seminary training Greek Catholic priests. In 1946 he became apostolic visitor of Ukrainians in Western Europe. He maintained contacts with the underground Greek Catholic Church in the Soviet Ukraine. In 1953 he became titular archbishop of Leucadia, and in 1958 he became a consultant of the Congregation of Eastern Churches, a member of the Vatican Commission of Eastern Churches of the Second Vatican Council, and vice-president of the Conference of the Ukrainian Episcopate. He was active in the social, scholarly, and religious life of the Ukrainian diaspora, an honorary member of the Taras Shevchenko Scientific Society, and an honorary doctor of the Free Ukrainian University and the Ukrainian Technical and Economic Institute in Munich, Germany. (TS)

Sources: Encyclopedia of Ukraine, vol. 1 (Toronto, 1985); Annuario Pontificio, 1974.

BUDAJ Ján (10 February 1952, Bratislava), Slovak politician. Budaj started studies in mathematics and physics but did not complete them. In the 1970s and 1980s he was repressed for opposition activities, and from 1976 to 1989 he worked as a stoker. He cooperated with the Czech Charter 77 and Polish Solidarity, among other things as editor and author of political and cultural periodicals published without censorship. In November 1989 he was active in Bratislava protests, moderated meetings of the Velvet Revolution, and co-organized the Public against Violence movement (Verejnost proti násiliu [VPN]) in Slovakia. He was the first VPN chairman, and during the reconstruction of the parliament in 1990 he was coopted to the Slovak National Council. He became its speaker and largely contributed to the victory of the opposition in the first free elections in Czechoslovakia in June 1990. After the split of the VPN, in the spring of 1991 he withdrew from politics and turned to journalism. After the creation of independent Slovakia, in 1993, along with Milan Kňažko, Budaj founded a liberal-democratic party, the Alliance of Democrats (Aliancia Demokratov). When the group of Jozef Moravčík left the Vladimir Mečiar movement and founded the Democratic Union of Slovakia

(Demokratická Únia Slovenska [DUS]), the Alliance of Democrats joined it. In March 1997 Budaj was elected the DUS deputy chairman. Before the elections of 1998, along with other DUS candidates, he joined the Slovak Democratic Coalition (Slovenská Demokratická Koalicie [SDK]), co-authoring its program and winning a parliamentary seat on its behalf. He opposed the transformation of the coalition into one party, as well as unification of the DUS with the Slovak Democratic and Christian Union (Slovenská Demokratická Kresťanská Únie [SDKÚ]), founded by Mikulaš Dzurinda in 2000. When Budaj lost the struggle for party leadership and when the DUS joined the SDKÚ, in November 2000 he founded the Liberal Democratic Union, which returned to the name DUS in 2002. (PU)

Sources: Kto je kto na Slovensku 1991 (Bratislava, 1991); Slovensko 1996: Súhrnná správa o stave spoločnosti (Bratislava, 1997); Slovensko 1997: Súhrnná správa o stave spoločnosti (Bratislava, 1998); Slovensko 1998–1999: Súhrnná správa o stave spoločnosti (Bratislava, 1999); Slovensko 2000: Súhrnná správa o stave spoločnosti (Bratislava, 2000); <http://www.du.sk>.

BUDAK Mile (30 August 1889, Gračac, Bosnia–7 June 1945, Zagreb), Croatian journalist, poet, and nationalist politician. From 1907 Budak contributed to Bosnian Croat magazines. He obtained a Ph.D. in law from the university in Zagreb (1920). In the 1920s and 1930s he was active in the Croat nationalist opposition to the dictatorship of King Alexander Karadjordjević, and he belonged to the Croatian Party of Rights (Hrvatska Stranka Prava). He also published many stories and novels—for example, Pod gorom (Under the mountain; 1930) and Ognjište (A hearth; 1938). He was a proponent of the theory that the Croats were not Slavs but the descendants of Goths; therefore they were a Germanic people. In his books he glorified violence and ethnic hatred. In 1932 he was seriously injured as a result of a Serb police action. After his recovery he went to Italy and then to Germany, where he became one of the closest associates of Ante Pavelić. He returned to Yugoslavia in 1939 and took part in a bomb attack on the Yugoslav authorities. He was taken into custody, and at the same time his wife committed suicide.

After the creation of the Independent Croatian State in April 1941 Budak became its education minister. In this role, he actively supported the mass killing of Serbs and Jews. At the same time he attracted the cooperation of Bosnian Muslims; as a result Džafer bey Kulenović was appointed as the Ustaša deputy prime minister. In October 1941 Budak became ambassador of Croatia to Berlin. In April 1943 he assumed the portfolio of foreign affairs, but he resigned soon after the creation of the government of Nikola Mandić in October 1943. During the war he published books in which he presented extremely nationalist views—for example, Ratno roblje (Prisoners of war; 1941); Na vulkanima (On the volcano; 1941); and Kresojića soj (The Kresojić clan; 1944). As was discovered later, his wife had cooperated with Communist intelligence. On 6 May 1945 he fled from Zagreb but was captured by the British and handed over to the Communists on 18 May. He was sentenced to death and executed by a firing squad. In the independent Croatia of Franjo Tuđman the legacy of Budak became the subject of sharp political disputes when streets began to be named after him and when some of his works were being revived, such as Ognjište and Ratno roblje. (WR)

Sources: Enciklopedija Jugoslavija, vol. 2 (Zagreb, 1982); Ivo Omrčanin, Dramatis personae and finis of the Independent State of Croatia in British and American Documents (Bryn Mawr, Pa. 1983); Bogdan Krizman, Ustaše i Treći Reich (Zagreb, 1983), vols. 1–2; Bogdan Krizman, Ante Pavelić i Ustaše (Zagreb, 1983); Ivan Gabelica and Ivan Pandžić, eds., Nad Velebitom sviče: Zbornik o Mili Budaku (Zagreb, 1995); Marcus Tanner, Croatia: A Nation Forged in War (New Haven, 1997).

BUDIŠA Dražen (27 July 1948, Drniš), Croatian politician. The son of a white-collar worker, in 1967 Budiša started philosophical and sociological studies at the University of Zagreb. During the Croatian Spring of 1971 he took part in the independent student movement, for which he was arrested and sentenced to four years of hard labor. After his release in 1975, he continued his studies and graduated in 1976. In 1977 he started working in the National Library and then in the library of the University of Zagreb. After some time he became the head of its special collection. He also published. In the 1980s he was active in the anti-Communist opposition, and in 1990 he was co-founder of the first opposition party—the Croatian Social Liberal Party (Hrvatska Socijalno Liberalna Stranka [HSLS]). In 1996–97 he was chairman of the HSLS Supreme Board, and then he became the HSLS president. On its behalf he was elected to the parliament in 1992, and from July 1991 to April 1992 he was minister without portfolio in the government of Franjo Gregurija.

In the presidential elections of August 1992 Budiša came in second (22 percent of the vote), and as a result of simultaneous parliamentary elections, the HSLS became the strongest faction opposing the ruling Croatian Democratic Union of President Franjo Tuđman. After the elections of October 1995 Budiša became deputy speaker of the House of Representatives. In 1995 the opposition won the local elections in Zagreb, and Budiša was elected mayor of the capital, but Tuđman refused to accept this result and finally nominated a government commissioner to rule the city. In 1998 the HSLs entered into a coalition with the post-Communists of Ivica Račan. Together they won forty-seven seats in the parliament in the elections of January 2000. According to an agreement, Račan became prime minister of a wide center-left coalition, and Budiša its candidate for president. Nevertheless, in February 2000 he unexpectedly lost to Stipe Mesić, coming in second (27 percent of the vote in the first round and 44 percent in the second round). As a result, he resigned as the HSLs president, but in 2002 he was reelected to this position. After the government crisis of March 2002 he became deputy prime minister in the reconstructed government of Račan, but in July 2002 his party left the coalition and Budiša resigned. Budiša authored more than forty books and articles on the history of Croatian literature and culture, including Počeci tiskarstva u evropskih naroda (Beginnings of printing in European countries; 1984); Hrvatske knjige tiskane u Mlečima od XV. do XVIII stoljeca (Croatian books printed in Venice from the fifteenth to the eighteenth centuries; 1990); and Razgovori o hrvatskoj državi (Debates on Croatian statehood; 2001). (AW)

Sources: Tko je tko u Hrvatskoj (Zagreb, 1993); Vít Hloušek, "Stranický systém Chorvatska: Nedokončená transformace," in M. Strimiska, ed., Postkomunistické stranické systavy a politická pluralita (Brno, 1999); Alex J. Bellamy, "Croatia after Tudjman: The 2000 Parliamentary and Presidential Elections," Problems of Post-Communism, 2001, no. 5; Karen Dawisha and Bruce Parrot, eds., Politics, Power and the Struggle for Democracy in South-East Europe (Cambridge, 1997); Zoran Kusovac, "The Prospects for Change in Post-Tudjman Croatia," East European Constitutional Review, 2000, no. 2; Europa Środkowo-Wschodnia 1991–1998 (Warsaw, 1992–2000); www.hsls.hr/cv.htm.

BUDKA Mykyta (7 September 1877, Dobromirka, near Zbaraž [Zbarazh]–1 October 1949, Karaganda), bishop of the Greek Catholic Church, martyr for the faith. After theological studies at a Jesuit university in Innsbruck, in October 1905 Budka was ordained a priest, and then he continued his studies in Vienna, earning a Ph.D. in 1909. Later, he worked at a theological seminary in Lwów (Lviv) and performed pastoral duties for the Ukrainian émigrés. He also edited the magazine Emigrant. On 15 July 1912 he was consecrated bishop. Next, the Pope appointed him apostolic exarch in Canada. He remained in Canada until 1927. In 1928, after a short stay in Rome, he was appointed vicar general of the Lwów chapter and auxiliary bishop of Lwów. As the Soviet authorities were withdrawing from Lwów in June 1941, the NKVD was threatening him with execution. On 11 April 1945 he was arrested, along with Archbishop Yosyf Slipyi, and taken to a prison in Kiev. He was accused of treason, and on 3 June 1946 the military court sentenced him to five years in a labor camp. He died there. On 27 June 2001 Pope John Paul II beatified him at a solemn Holy Mass in Lviv. (WR)

Sources: Encyclopedia of Ukraine, vol. 1 (Toronto 1984); Martirologia ukrain's'kikh tserkov u chetyriokh tomakh, vol. 2 (Toronto, 1985); Bohdan R. Botsiurkiv, The Ukrainian Greek-Catholic Church and the Soviet State (1939–1950) (Edmonton, 1996); Osservatore Romano (weekly edition in English), 2001, nos. 25 and 27.

BUGAJ Ryszard (22 February 1944, Gawłowo, near Skierniewice), Polish economist and politician. As a student at the Department of Economics of Warsaw University Bugaj took part in the student protests of March 1968. Dismissed from the university, he worked as a blue-collar laborer. After graduating from the Central School of Planning and Statistics in 1970, he worked in the Institute of Building and in the Planning Commission of the Council of Ministers, and from 1982, in the Institute of Economics of the Polish Academy of Sciences. In 1976–80 he was affiliated with the Committee for the Defense of Workers (Komitet Obrony Robotników [KOR]) and published in the uncensored press. In 1980–81 he was a member of the board of the Mazowsze region of Solidarity and one of the chief economic advisers in the National Coordination Commission of Solidarity. He represented the union in the Commission for Economic Reform. In 1981 he became deputy head of the Center for Social and Professional Studies of the Solidarity National Commission, and he co-authored the union's economic program. After the introduction of martial law in December 1981, he was interned. After his release in 1982, he cooperated with the underground leadership of Solidarity. He published in uncensored periodicals and in Tygodnik Powszechny. In 1987 he initiated the Society for Reform and Democracy, in which proposals for state reform were discussed. From 1988 he was a member of the Civic Committee of the Chairman of Solidarity. He took part in the Round Table Talks (February–April 1989).

With the elections of June 1989 Bugaj was an MP on behalf of the Civic Parliamentary Club (Obywatelski Klub Parlamentarny [OKP]), and he chaired the parliamentary commission on economic policy, the budget, and finance. Critical of the reforms of Deputy Prime Minister Leszek Balcerowicz, as early as November 1989 Bugaj co-founded the Group for the Defense of Labor within the OKP. In 1990–92 he chaired the Solidarity of Labor and its parliamentary club; then he co-founded, and from January 1993 he chaired, the National Council of the Union of Labor (Unia Pracy [UP]) and its parliamentary club. He advocated market reforms with strong social shields and a strict control of privatization. He opposed grassroots privatization and favored government intervention to prevent an excessive stratification of income. An advocate of the separation of church and state, Bugaj opposed cooperation with the post-Communists. After the electoral defeat of the UP in September 1997 and the party's evolution toward cooperation with the post-Communists, he left the UP in 1998. (AF)

Sources: Nasi w Sejmie i Senacie (Warsaw, 1990); Jan Skórzyński, Ugoda i rewolucja: Władza i opozycja 1985–1989 (Warsaw, 1995); Janusz A. Majcherek, Pierwsza dekada III Rzeczypospolitej 1989–1999 (Warsaw, 1999); Opozycja w PRL: Słownik biograficzny 1956–89, vol. 1 (Warsaw, 2000); Antoni Dudek, Pierwsze lata III Rzeczypospolitej 1989–2001 (Kraków, 2002).

BUGÁR Béla (7 July 1958, Bratislava), Hungarian politician in Slovakia. Bugár graduated in mechanics from the Bratislava Polytechnic in 1982, and later he worked as an engineer in a heavy mechanical equipment factory in Bratislava. After the Velvet Revolution of 1989 he was one of the founders of the Hungarian Christian Democratic Movement (HCDM), registered in March 1990. In the first free elections, in June 1990, Bugár was elected to the Federal Assembly of Czechoslovakia, and in 1991 he took the lead of the HCDM. In the elections of June 1992 he won a seat in the Slovak National Council, which after the split of Czechoslovakia in January 1993 was renamed the National Council of the Slovak Republic. Bugár sat in the Slovak parliament after the elections of 1994, 1998, and 2002. He played a significant role in the unification of all Hungarian parties into the Party of the Hungarian Coalition (Magyar Koalíció Pártja, Strana Maďarskej Koalicie [PHC]) before the parliamentary elections of September 1998. At the PHC founding congress on 21 June 1998 he was elected its chairman and maintained this position at subsequent PHC congresses in 1999 and 2001. Under his leadership in 1998 the PHC won about 9 percent of the vote and entered the government coalition. This led to an improvement in the relationship between the Hungarian minority and the Slovak government, while Hungarians gained some influence on government decisions. As a result of this electoral success, Bugár assumed the position of deputy speaker of the parliament, while the PHC won three portfolios in the government of Mikulaš Dzurinda. In the subsequent election, in September 2002, the PHC further improved its standing, gaining more than 11 percent of the vote, entering into the same coalition, and maintaining three portfolios in the second Dzurinda cabinet. (PU) správa o stave spoločnosti (Bratislava, 1999); Slovensko 2000: Súhrnná správa o stave spoločnosti (Bratislava, 2000); mesto.sk/samorin/?ID=1335; www.nevyberjusmev.sk/lidri-smk-bugar.php.

Sources: Slovensko 1996: Súhrnná správa o stave spoločnosti (Bratislava, 1997); Slovensko 1997: Súhrnná správa o stave spoločnosti (Bratislava, 1998); Slovensko 1998–1999: Súhrnná

BUJAK Zbigniew (29 November 1954, Łopuszno), Polish trade union activist and politician. From 1974 Bujak worked in Ursus, a mechanical equipment factory; in 1974–76 he served in the Sixth Pomeranian Airborne Division, and in 1977 he graduated from an evening electrical-technical school. From 1978 he was engaged in distributing materials from the uncensored press. In July 1980 he co-organized a strike in Ursus, and in August 1980 he co-founded the Workers' Committee in Solidarity with the Striking Baltic Coast Workers. From September 1980 he presided over the Mazowsze region of Solidarity, and from February 1981 he belonged to the Presidium of the National Coordinating Commission of Solidarity and took part in a number of negotiations with the authorities. On the night martial law was introduced, 13 December 1981, Bujak avoided arrest and went into hiding, organizing underground structures of Solidarity. In 1982–86 he was chairman of the Regional Executive Committee of Solidarity and a member of the All-Polish Provisional Coordination Commission of the union. Arrested on 31 May 1986, he was amnestied in September 1986. He joined the Solidarity Provisional Council and, in 1987, the National Executive Commission of the union. From December 1988 he belonged to the Civic Committee of the Chairman of Solidarity, and from February to April 1989 he took part in the Round Table Talks.

In 1990, during a growing conflict with Lech Wałęsa on the role of the Civic Committee, Bujak supported Tadeusz Mazowiecki. He left Solidarity in June 1990, joining the Civic Movement-Democratic Action (Ruch Obywatelski-Akcja Demokratyczna [ROAD]). One of its plenipotentiaries until January 1991, he opposed unification of the ROAD with other groups supporting Mazowiecki and wanted to transform it into a Social Democratic party. After these groups merged into the Democratic Union, on 20 April 1991 Bujak co-founded the Democratic Social Movement, on whose behalf he was elected to the Assembly in the fall of 1991. In June 1992, the movement merged with the Solidarity of Labor group into the Union of Labor (Unia Pracy [UP]). From January 1993 he was its deputy chairman. He actively supported the freedom of abortion, and in 1992 he presided over a committee demanding a referendum on this matter. From September 1993 he was MP on behalf of the UP. After the electoral defeat of the UP in September 1997 and after it evolved toward cooperation with the post-Communists, in February 1998 Bujak left it, joined the Union of Freedom, and became a member of its leadership. In 1998 he graduated from the Department of Journalism and Political Science of Warsaw University. From May 1999 to the beginning of 2002 he was chairman of the Chief Office of Tariffs. He authored an interview considered controversial by most Solidarity members: Przepraszam za "Solidarność" (I am sorry for Solidarity; 1991). (AF)

Sources: Wielka encyklopedia PWN, vol. 5 (Warsaw, 2001); Opozycja w PRL: Słownik biograficzny 1956–89, vol. 1 (Warsaw, 2000); Jan Skórzyński, Uгода i rewolucja: Władza i opozycja 1985–1989 (Warsaw, 1995); Antoni Dudek, Pierwsze lata III Rzeczypospolitej 1989–2001 (Kraków, 2002).

BULAK-BALAKHOVICH Stanisław (10 February 1883, Meyszty, near Braślów [Braslaw]–10 May 1940, Warsaw), Belorussian general and politician of Polish descent. Bulak-Balakhovich stemmed from a landowner's family and was brought up in the Polish tradition, but because of his Populist convictions, he drew closer to the Belorussians. He graduated from an agricultural school, and in 1905 he took part in the organization of peasant riots in the Braślów region. It was then that he was nicknamed "Bats'ka." In August 1914 he volunteered for the Russian Army and fought on the southwestern front. Promoted to the rank of colonel, he commanded troops thrown behind the front line to disorganize the subsidiaries of the German army. In 1917 he commanded a cavalry division near Riga. In the spring of 1918 he joined the Red Army, but in November 1918 he attached his regiment to the White Guard Voluntary Corps operating in the Pskov area. After the seizure of Pskov he was promoted to major general. In August 1919 General Nikolai Yudenich appointed him commander of the Northwestern Army Corps. Since Bulak-Balakhovich was a Socialist revolutionary, he soon left the White Russian Army.

In early 1920 Bulak-Balakhovich entered into contact with the military mission of the Belorussian National Republic (BNR) and subordinated his 1,200-man detachment to the BNR authorities. Belorussians accounted for 75 percent of the soldiers. As a result of an agreement of the Belorussian military envoy to Riga and Tallinn, Kanstantsin Yezavitau, with Józef Piłsudski, in June 1920 the Bulak-Balakhovich detachment was transferred to Polesie. Developed into a corps of a few thousand men called the Belorussian National Army, it disrupted the Bolsheviks heading for the Vistula River. After Poland signed an armistice with the Bolsheviks, in October 1920 Bulak-Balakhovich made an agreement with the Belorussian Political Committee in Warsaw, headed by Pavel Aleksyuk. On the committee's behalf Bulak-Balakhovich continued operations against the Bolsheviks, and he captured Pinsk and Mozyr. In Mozyr he announced that the BNR had authority over the liberated areas and presented himself as the head of state. His offensive of November 1920 was stopped before he could seize Minsk. A part of his troops stayed in Soviet Belorussia and fought as guerrillas until 1922, while others, including Bulak-Balakhovich, withdrew to Poland and were interned. In September 1921, the Belorussian Socialists who met in Prague accused him of the usurpation of power and war atrocities.

In Poland Bulak-Balakhovich became a brigadier general and was active in the pro-government Federation of Polish Associations of Homeland Defenders. In 1929 he co-initiated the Central Committee of the Collection of Funds for Combating Espionage. He wrote strongly anti-German articles. In 1937–39 he was a member of the Polish military mission sent to General Francisco Franco, but he remained without a formal assignment to the army. In September 1939 he commanded a group of volunteers in the defense of Warsaw. At the beginning of the German occupation he organized a secret National Volunteer Army, also called the Military Confederation. He was killed in unclear circumstances during an attempted arrest by the Gestapo in the Warsaw quarter of Saska Kępa. Bulak-Balakhovich authored a few volumes of poetry and two books: Wojna będzie czy nie będzie? (Will there be war or not? 1931) and Precz z Hitlerem czy niech żyje Hitler (Down with Hitler or long live Hitler; 1933). (EM)

Sources: Marek Cabanowski, Zapomniany bohater: Generał Stanisław Bułak-Bałachowicz (Warsaw, 1993); Oleg Łatyszczek, Białoruskie formacje wojskowe 1917–1923 (Białystok, 1995); Andrzej Nowak, Polska i trzy Rosje: Studium polityki wschodniej Józefa Piłsudskiego (do kwietnia 1920 roku) (Kraków, 2001).

BULATOVIĆ Momir (21 September 1956, Belgrade), Communist and post-Communist activist, president of Montenegro. Bulatović graduated in economics and worked as an assistant professor at the Department of Economics at the university in the Montenegrin capital of Titograd (now Podgorica). In 1974 he joined the League of Communists of Montenegro (LCM). In January 1989 he headed a demonstration that led to a change in the Montenegrin republican authorities. As a result he assumed the position of chairman of the LCM Central Committee. In 1988–90 he favored maintaining the Yugoslav federation even by force. It was his position (among other things) that made the Slovene, Croatian, and Bosnian delegations leave the Fourteenth Extraordinary Congress of the League of Communists of Yugoslavia in the spring of 1990. As a result the party split. From December 1990 Bulatović was chairman of the Presidium of the Montenegrin republic, and in January 1993 he was elected its president. After the LCM was renamed the Democratic Party of Socialists (Demokratska Partija Socijalista) he was its head until July 1997, when it split. In October 1997 presidential elections were held that would determine whether Montenegro would continue its pro-Serb policy and remain in the Yugoslav Federation or would choose more autonomy. As an advocate of the former option, Bulatović lost, and in January 1998 Milo Đukanović assumed the post of president. Owing to the support of Slobodan Milošević, in May 1998 Bulatović became prime minister of the federal Yugoslav government. He served in this capacity until November 2000. From March 1998 to January 2001 he also headed the Socialist People's Party (Socijalistička Narodna Partija [SNP]). The end of his political career was connected with the fall of the Milošević regime. (AO)

Sources: Noty biograficzne, Polish Press Agency, June 2001; Laura Silber and Allan Little, The Death of Yugoslavia (London, 1995); Bugajski; www.rferl.org/newsline.

BULIĆ Frane (4 October 1846, Vranjic, near Split–29 July 1934, Zagreb), Croatian Catholic priest, archaeologist, and historian. Born into a peasant family, Bulić graduated from high school in Split and from a theological seminary in Zadar (1869). Later he studied philosophy and archaeology at the University of Vienna (1869–78). He also specialized in the history of the Dalmatian Catholic Church. He worked as a teacher, schoolmaster, and superintendent of the Split region (1873–96); director of the Archaeological Museum in Split (1883–1923); and conservator of Dalmatian monuments. He described his explorations mostly in the periodical Vjesnik za arheologiju i historiju dalmatinsku, which he co-founded and headed for forty years (1888–1928). He also published in Austrian, Vatican, and Serbian scholarly periodicals. Among other things, he published Hrvatski spomenici u kninskoj okolini (Croatian monuments from the Knin region; 1885) and Car Dioklecijan (Caesar Diocletian; 1916). He combined the work of a Dalmatian regionalist with the promotion of Croatian culture. In 1923 he published Stopama hrvatskih narodnih vladara (Following the footsteps of Croatian rulers). He was engaged in founding Croatian schools in Dalmatia; he struggled to make Croatian the official language, and he tried to unite Dalmatia (under Austrian jurisdiction) with most of the old Kingdom of Croatia (within the Kingdom of Hungary). He was elected to the local diet in Split and then twice to the parliament in Vienna (1887 and 1907). He was a member of the Serbian Academy of Sciences and then of the Yugoslav Academy of Science and Arts (from 1922). He endowed his property to the students of archaeology and art history. (MC)

Sources: Biographisches Lexikon, vol. 1; Enciklopedija Jugoslavije, vol. 2 (Zagreb, 1956); Hrvatski biografski leksikon, vol. 2 (Zagreb, 1989); Stjepan Antoljak, Hrvatska historiografija do 1918, vols. 1–2 (Zagreb, 1992); Nenad Cambi, “Predgovor: Frane Bulić život i djelo,” in Frane Bulić, Izabrani spisi (Split, 1984); Darko Zubrinic, “History of Croatian Science,” www.hr/darko/etf/et22.html#buli.

BUMBAROV Boris (29 March 1906, Izvor, near Radomir–28 June 1959, Virshets), Bulgarian leftist politician. After graduating from high school in Kiustendil (1914), Bumbarov worked as a teacher in the village of Kosharite (1915–16) and then as a telegraph worker at the Sofia Central Telegraph Station (1916–19). In 1920 he joined the Bulgarian Agrarian National Union (BANU). During the rule of Aleksandur Stamboliyski he served successively as personal secretary to the president of the National Assembly; secretary in the Ministry of Railways, Post, and Telegraphs; and administrative director of the Pernik mine. After the military coup of June 1923 he was arrested and detained for several months in Sofia. After his release he emigrated to the Kingdom of Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes, from where he controlled the trafficking channel Sofia-Istanbul and maintained contacts with the illegal leadership of the BANU and of the Bulgarian Communist Party. In 1926 the Sofia Regional Court sentenced him to death in absentia for his activities in exile, which aimed at the creation of a united front of the left. Additionally, he was convicted to fifteen years for illegally crossing the border and for weapons smuggling. After an amnesty he decided to return to Bulgaria in February 1933 but was arrested at the border, and then he spent several months in prison in Sofia. Released in July 1933, he returned to political life in the BANU faction called Pladne.

During World War II, as a dangerous enemy of the system, Bumbarov was removed first to Ardino (1939) and then to a concentration camp in Gonda Voda (1941–42). After his release he was under close police surveillance in Krumovgrad (1942). In 1943–44 he was again in prison. After release, he participated in the creation of the illegal Fatherland Front. After the coup of 9 September 1944 he was elected a member of the BANU Chief Committee and was appointed minister of public works, roads, and spatial planning in the government of Kimon Georgiev. As he did not accept the totalitarian methods of government, in July 1945 along with several other ministers (e.g., Grigor Cheshmedzhiev, Petko Stainov, Asen Pavlov, and Nikola Petkov) Bumbarov left the cabinet subordinated to the Communists. He became one of the leaders of the opposition BANU that was created by Petkov and a member of the editorial board of the party's press organ, Narodno zemedelsko zname. As a representative of the BANU led by Petkov, from 1946 to 1947 Bumbarov was a deputy to the Sixth Grand National Assembly (Constituent Assembly), where he sharply criticized the policy of the Communist government. In 1949 he was arrested and sentenced to twenty years' imprisonment. Released under an amnesty in 1956, he died three years later. In 1990 he was posthumously rehabilitated. (JJ)

Sources: J. F. Brown, Bulgaria under Communist Rule (New York, 1970); John D. Bell, Peasants in Power: Alexander Stamboliski and the Bulgarian Agrarian National Union, 1899–1923 (Princeton, 1977); Tasho V. Tashev, Ministrite na Bylgariia 1879–1999 (Sofia, 1999).

BUMÇI Luigji (7 November 1872, Shkodër–1 March 1945, Lezhë), Albanian Roman Catholic bishop and diplomat. The son of a merchant, Bumçi studied in Shkodër and then in Italy. He was ordained and then in 1912 he was consecrated ordinary bishop of the Lezhë diocese. In July 1911, on behalf of the metropolitan of Shkodër, he tried to mobilize Albanians of the Cetinje region against plans to divide territories inhabited by Albanians. In July 1919 he intervened with Pope Benedict XV against the Italian-Greek agreement sanctioning the division of these territories. He headed the Albanian delegation to the Paris Peace Conference and took part in the talks held in Belgium and Great Britain aimed at improving the image of Albania in Europe. In December 1919 he went to Rome, where he asked the Pope for support for the Albanian argument in the conflict with Greece over the Korçë and Gjirokastrë area. He represented Roman Catholics in the Supreme Council, which held the regency of Albania. He held the position in the Supreme Council until December 1921. He also gathered representatives of the four major religions of Albania to an All-Albanian Congress in January 1921. He favored a wider engagement of the Catholic Church in the formation of a democratic society, including a promotion of the parliamentary system among the faithful. In 1921 he also mediated during the rebellion of the Catholic Mirdyete tribe against the central power. As a result of his conflict with the papal nuncio, in 1922 he was forced to go to Fiume (Rijeka), where he worked for two years. Owing to the appeals of his faithful, he was allowed to return to Albania. Because of the political tension preceding the revolution of 1924, he was temporarily deprived of the freedom to move around but was later allowed to function normally. When at the end of 1944 the Lezhë diocese was brought under Communist control, he was put in house arrest, where he died. (TC)

Sources: Vllamasi Sejfi, Ballafaqime politike ne Shqiperi (1897–1942) (Tirana, 1995); Tadeusz Czekalski, Zarys dziejów chrześcijaństwa albańskiego w latach 1912–1993 (Kraków, 1996); Gurakuqi Romeo, “Aspekte të qëndrimit të klerit katolik Shqiptar,” in Krishtërimi ndër shqiptarë: Simpozium Ndërkombëtar (Shkodër, 2000).

BUROV Atanas (30 January 1875, Gorna Oriakhovitsa–15 May 1954, Pazardzhik), Bulgarian politician and banker. Burov's father was a tradesman, a banker, and on several occasions a deputy to the parliament. Expelled from high school in Gabrovo for organizing a student strike, Burov completed law and economic studies in Paris. After his return to Bulgaria he directed the construction of the Sofia-Kiustendil railway line. He also began his political activity in the National Party. From 1911 to 1913 he was vice-president of Fifteenth National Assembly. This post did not pose an obstacle for him to take part as an officer in the Balkan Wars (1912–13). He was minister of trade in the cabinet of Stoian Danev (June–July 1913) and in the coalition government of Aleksandur Stamboliyski (October 1919–March 1920). After the military coup of 9 June 1923 he was one of the founders of Democratic Concord. Between 1926 and 1931 Burov held the portfolio of foreign minister in the cabinet of Andrei Lapchev, implementing a policy of rapprochement with France. After the fall of the Democratic Concord government he was active in the opposition against successive governments whose policy was rapprochement with Nazi Germany. In March 1941 he decisively opposed Bulgaria's adherence to the Tripartite Pact and the subordination of the country to Germany. For a short time he served as minister without portfolio in the government of Konstantin Muraviev (2–8 September 1944), which broke off the alliance with Germany.

After the assumption of power by the Communists, Burov was subjected to repressive measures. From 10 September 1944 he was under house arrest and was later put in prison in one cell with Dimitër Gichev, Nikola Mushanov, Konstantin Muraviev, and Vergil Dimov. On 1 February 1945 the “people's court” sentenced him to one year of prison and two years of deprivation of public rights. At the beginning of September 1945 he was released on a pardon. On 14 May 1948 Burov, along with his wife, was removed to Drianovo, where he had to report to the police station twice a day. In 1950 he spent a month in a forced labor camp, Dulovo, in Dobrudja, and then he returned to Drianovo owing to the intervention of Todor Pavlov. On 21 April 1951 he was arrested and on 13 November 1952 sentenced in a fake trial to twenty years of prison for “activities against the people.” At first he served the sentence in Shumen and then in Pazardzhik, where he died. (JJ)

Sources: Kratka bulgarska entsiklopediya, vol. 1 (Sofia, 1964); Marshall Lee Miller, Bulgaria during the Second World War (Stanford, 1975); Zh. Tsvetkov, Atanas Burov: Zhivot za Bulgaria (Sofia, 1992).

BURSCHE Juliusz (19 September 1862, Kalisz–20 February 1942, Sachsenhausen-Oranienburg), Polish pastor, victim of Nazism. Bursche graduated from high school in Warsaw and from the Department of Evangelical Theology at the university in Dorpat (Tartu). In 1884 he started working as a curate in Warsaw, where in December 1904 he was appointed superintendent of the Evangelical Church of the Augsburg Confession in the Polish lands annexed by Russia. Removed by the Russian authorities to Orenburg in 1915, after the February 1917 revolution Bursche left for Stockholm, from where he returned to the Congress Kingdom of Poland, which was occupied by the Germans. In 1918 he became a member of the Provisional Council of State, and he was also appointed head of the Calvinist Church in Cieszyn Silesia. In 1919 he was an expert of the Polish government in the treaty commission at the Paris Peace Conference. Next, he directed a plebiscite action in Mazuria. In March 1920 he became superintendent of the Evangelical Church of the Augsburg Confession in Poland. In 1928 he assumed the post of president of the Council of Evangelical Churches in Poland, and on 3 July 1937 he was appointed bishop. Soon after the outbreak of World War II he went to Lublin, where he was arrested by the Gestapo and transported to a prison in Berlin. Since he refused to collaborate, he was sent to the camp in Sachsenhausen-Oranienburg, where he died a martyr's death. According to another version, he perished in Berlin's Moabit Prison. Bursche was a doctor of theology and the author of many dissertations on the history of the Reformed churches. He was also the founder and editor of the periodicals Zwiastun Ewangeliczny (1898–1914) and Gazeta Mazurska (1922–39). (WR) Sources: Wielka encyklopedia PWN, vol. 5 (Warsaw, 2001); Kto był kim w Drugiej Rzeczypospolitej (Warsaw, 1994); D. Staemmler, Der Protestantismus in Polen (Posen, 1925); Waldemar Gastpary, Biskup Bursche i sprawa polska (Warsaw, 1972); Krzysztof Krasowski, Związki wyznaniowe w II Rzeczypospolitej (Warsaw, 1988).

BUZALKA Michal (18 September 1885, Svätý Anton–7 December 1961, Tábor), Slovak Roman Catholic bishop. Buzalka graduated in theological studies in Vienna and was ordained there in 1908. Later he worked as a teacher of religion in a high school in Banská Štiavnica and chaplain in St. Stephan Hospital in Budapest. In 1912 he received a Ph.D. in theology in Vienna. In the first years of independent Czechoslovakia Buzalka took part in the formation of the autonomous Slovak movement. In 1922–23 he edited the daily of the Slovak People's Party (Slovenská Ľudová Strana [SL'S]), Slovák, but he did not join the party. From 1922 to 1924 he was lecturer and from 1931 rector of the theological seminary in Trnava, and from 1936, rector of the Bratislava seminary. In 1938 he was consecrated and appointed auxiliary bishop of Trnava. From 1939 he directed Catholic Action and the Association of Catholic Youth. In 1940–45 he edited the daily Katolícke noviny. From 1941 he was field vicar of the Slovak Army. During the war he was not engaged in politics but rather opposed the participation of priests in the power structures of the Slovak state. He helped the repressed Jews, and through the papal nuncio he informed the Vatican about German war crimes on the eastern front. In 1945 he was imprisoned by the new Czechoslovak authorities for a few months. In 1950, along with two other bishops—Jan Vojtaššák and Pavel Gojdič—he was arrested by the Communist secret police. Tortured during interrogation, in January 1951 he was sentenced in a show trial to life imprisonment for “high treason” and “espionage for the Vatican.” Released conditionally for health reasons in 1956, he was forbidden to return to Slovakia. Forced to settle in a home for the aged in Děčín and in Tábor, he died of a heart attack. In 2002 his beatification process was started. (MG)

Sources: Augustín Matovčík et al., Reprezentačný biografický lexikón Slovenska (Martin, 1999); Jozef A. Mikuš, The Three Slovak Bishops: Their Struggle for God and Slovakia until Their Condemnation by the Communists in 1951 (n.p. 1951); Róbert Letz, “Boží sluha Michal Buzalka, pomocný biskup trnavskej apoštolskej administratúry,” in Boli solou a svetlom (Trnava, 2001); Boli traja (Bratislava, 2001).

BUZEK Jerzy (3 July 1940, Śmiłowice, Teschen Silesia), Polish politician. Buzek graduated in power engineering from the Silesian Polytechnic in 1963 and then worked in the Institute of Chemical Engineering of the Polish Academy of Sciences in Gliwice. In 1969 he received a Ph.D. and in 1979 a postdoctoral degree. From 1997 he was a professor of technical sciences and the author of several dozen works on mathematical modeling and chemical processes. From 1980 he belonged to Solidarity and its regional and national authorities. One of the key organizers of Solidarity in Upper Silesia and the Dąbrowskie Industrial Region, in September 1981 Buzek presided over the proceedings of the First Congress of Solidarity in Gdańsk. After the introduction of martial law, in 1981–89 he was active in the underground structures of Solidarity (for example, in the Silesian Regional Executive Commission), working with Marian Krzaklewski. In 1996 he was an expert in Solidarity's Electoral Action (Akcja Wyborcza Solidarność [AWS]) and co-author of its economic program. After the electoral victory of the AWS in September, on 31 October 1997 Buzek became prime minister of a coalition government based on the AWS and the Freedom Union (Unia Wolności [UW]), and he held this position until 4 October 2001. After the UW withdrew from the coalition in June 2000, Buzek's was a minority government. It prepared and implemented reforms of the administration, social security, education, and health service. Some of these reforms created confusion, which, given the aggressive rhetoric of the post-Communist opposition, led to a serious decline of approval ratings for the cabinet and for Buzek himself. Buzek succeeded in finalizing talks concerning Poland's entry into NATO; these ended with a ceremonial delivery of ratification acts for new members on 12 March 1999. As a new NATO member, Poland supported the NATO air raids on Yugoslavia. Buzek played an indirect role in gaining a positive solution for Poland on some questions during the Nice summit of the European Union in December 2000. From January 1999 he presided over the AWS Social Movement, which aimed at becoming a political party, and he was the AWS leader from October 2001. After the election of September 2001 was lost, Buzek resigned from these positions. From 2002 he was chairman of the Pro Publico Bono Civic Society Institute and professor and deputy rector of the Polonia Academy in Czestochowa. (IS)

Sources: Kto jest kim w Polsce (Warsaw, 2001); Wielka Encyklopedia PWN, vol. 5 (Warsaw, 2001); Antoni Dudek, Pierwsze lata III Rzeczypospolitej 1989–2001 (Kraków, 2002); Wojciech Roszkowski, Historia Polski 1914–2001 (Warsaw, 2002).

BYKAU Vasil (19 May 1924, Bychki, Vitebsk region–22 June 2003, Minsk), Belorussian writer. In 1939–40 Bykau studied sculpture at the Vitebsk School of Fine Arts. In 1942 he was recruited to the Red Army and graduated from an officer training school in Saratov; from 1943 he fought on the front in the Ukraine, Romania, Bulgaria, Yugoslavia, Hungary, and Austria. Demobilized in 1947, he worked in artistic workshops in Hrodna (Grodno) and on the editorial staff of the local daily. In 1949–55 he served in the army again. Moved to the reserves, he returned to journalism. In 1978 he moved to Minsk. In 1978–80 he was a deputy to the Supreme Council of the Belorussian

SSR, and in 1989–91, to the Supreme Council of the USSR. From 1989 he was connected with the opposition Belorussian National Front. In 1990–93 he presided over Homeland, the World Belorussian Union. In 1998 he emigrated to Finland. He later lived in Germany. In 2000 he returned to Belorussia and lived there under very difficult conditions. Later he moved to the Czech Republic but returned to Belorussia before his death.

Most of Bykau's novels and short stories allude to the fate of the Red Army soldiers during World War II. Because he presented wartime events in a realistic way, based on his own experience, he was frequently accused of slandering the Soviet state and its army. He became famous for the novels Žurauliny kryk (Crane's cry; 1960); Zdrada (Betrayal; 1961); Tretsyaya rakyeta (1962; Third Flare, 1963); Pastka (Trap; 1964); and particularly Myortvym nie balits (The dead do not hurt; 1965). These books were usually published after long and stormy debates of Soviet writers with the Communist ideologists. Bykau's subsequent novels—Kruhlyanski most (Kruhlany Bridge; 1969); Sotnikov (1970); Abyelisk (Obelisk; 1971); Dazhyts da svitannya (1974; Alpine Ballad: Hold Out Till Dawn, 1989); and Yaho batalyon (1975; His Battallion, 1981)—were published for broad circulation and in Russian. Twelve of his novels and short stories were filmed, including Ascension. In the last years of his life Bykau increasingly dealt with the Soviet past, but under the regime of Alyaksandr Lukashenka his stories and novels could be published only in literary periodicals. His collection of stories, Stsyana (Wall), was published in Minsk in 1997 in a print run of 750 copies thanks to reader subscriptions. The work included a shocking image of the history of Soviet Belorussia. (EM)

Sources: V. Buran, Vasil Bykau: Narys tvorchastsi (Minsk, 1976); I. Dyedkov, Vasil Bykov: Ocherk tvorchestva (Moscow, 1980); Entsyklapiedyia litaratury i mastatstva Belarusi, vol. 1 (Minsk, 1984); Belaruskiya pismenniki: Biyabibliahrafichny slounik, vol. 1 (Minsk, 1992); Belaruskiya pismienniki 1917–1990: Davednik (Minsk, 1994); Jan Zaprudnik, Belarus: At a Crossroads in History (Boulder, Colo., 1993); Jan Zaprudnik, Historical Dictionary of Belarus (Lanham, Md., 1998); David R. Marples, Belarus: A Denationalization of a Nation (Amsterdam, 1999).

C

ČAKSTE Jānis (14 September 1859, Lielsesavas, Courland–14 March 1927, Riga), Latvian lawyer and politician. Born into a peasant family, Čakste graduated from a German gymnasium in Jelgava (Mitava). Next, he studied law at Moscow University, and he was in charge of the Society of Latvian Students in Moscow. His early views were influenced to a great extent by Krišjānis Valdemārs, the revival movement activist who worked in Moscow. After graduating from university in 1886, Čakste worked as a lawyer in Jelgava. He was also one of the leaders of the Latvian social movement there. From 1888 he published and edited the newspaper Tēvija, which he used to fight against the influences of the German landed gentry. During the revolution of 1905 he was one of the authors of a proposal for autonomy for Latvia within the framework of Russia. In 1906 he was elected deputy to the Duma, where he actively participated in the discussions on land ownership. After the First Duma was suspended in 1908, he signed the so-called Viborg Protest, and consequently he was held in prison for three months.

From 1915 Čakste was in charge of Latvian organizations that provided relief for war refugees in Jelgava and then in Dorpat (Tartu). In 1916 in Stockholm he published Die Letten und ihr Lettland (The Letts and their Latvia). Elected commissar (governor) of Courland in April 1917, he held his office in Dorpat and from October 1917, in Kazan and St. Petersburg. He took part in the work of the Latvian Provisional National Council, defending the idea of full independence for Latvia. Soon he returned to Latvia, and on 17 November 1918 he was elected president of the Latvian Provisional National Council in Riga. In January 1919, as a plenipotentiary of the council abroad, he arrived in London, and from March 1919 he was involved in the work of the Latvian delegation to the Paris Peace Conference. In July 1919 he returned to Latvia. From April 1920 he served as president of the Constituent Assembly, and he simultaneously lectured as professor at the University in Riga. He was connected with the Democratic Center Party. In November 1922 the Saeima (Parliament) elected him president of the Republic of Latvia. In this role, he strove to tighten Latvia's contacts with other Baltic states; for example, he made visits to Estonia (February 1925) and Finland (May 1926). He was buried in Riga. (EJ)

Sources: Emile Doumergue, La Lettonie et la Baltique (Paris, 1919); Jānis Čakste: Ilustrēts piemiņas rakstu krājums (Riga, 1928); R. Legzdīņš, Pirmais latvijas Valsts prezidents Jānis Čakst (Riga, 1978); Andrejs Plakans, Historical Dictionary of Latvia (Lanham, Md., 1997); Čakste J. taisnība vienmēr uzvarēs: Atziņas, runas, dokumenti, raksti, vēstules (Riga, 1999).

ČALFA Marián (7 May 1946, Trebišov), Czechoslovak lawyer and politician. In 1964 Čalfa joined the Communist Party of Czechoslovakia (CPC), and in 1970 he graduated in law from Charles University in Prague. Later he worked as a lawyer in the Czechoslovak Press Agency. In 1972–87 he worked in and later presided over the legislative committee of the Office of the Czechoslovak Prime Minister. From 1987 to 1988 he was deputy director of this office. From April 1988 to December 1989 he was minister without portfolio in the governments of Lubomir Štrougal and Ladislav Adamec. At the same time he presided over the government Legislative Council. In 1989 he supervised the preparation of a new constitution for Czechoslovakia and the Czech and Slovak Republics. During the Velvet Revolution he took part in the negotiations with the opposition and contributed greatly to the agreement that was reached. For one week Čalfa was first deputy prime minister, and from 9 December 1989, prime minister of the “government of national reconciliation.” He remained prime minister after the first free elections of June 1990. In January 1990 he left the CPC and joined the movement Public against Violence (Verejnost’ proti Nasiliu). After this movement split, in 1991 he became vice-president of a liberal party, Civic Democratic Union–Public against Violence (Občianská Demokratická Únia–Verejnost’ proti Nasiliu). From June 1990 to June 1992 he was a deputy to the Chamber of Nations of the Federal Assembly.

Čalfa headed the government in the first stages of systemic transformation. His cabinet led Czechoslovakia from communism to democracy and began the creation of a market economy based on privatization. He tried to resolve the question of Czechoslovak relations in the light of state law and took part in all rounds of negotiations, firmly defending the federation. Despite his Communist past, he quickly turned into a liberal democrat and aligned himself with the ideas of President Václav Havel. He became a close aide to Havel, supporting his candidacy for president from his first days in power as prime minister. After the electoral defeat of his party, on 26 June 1992 Čalfa resigned, remaining an unofficial adviser to Havel. After the split of Czech-Slovakia he adopted Czech citizenship. From 1993 to 1995 he was editor-in-chief of the monthly Právní rádce. He is co-owner of the consulting firm CTL Consulting and a legal adviser of Chemapol. From 1997 he has been chairman of the board of the IC Bank, in which he has shares. (PU)

Sources: ČBS; Českoslovenští politici: 1918–1991 (Prague, 1991); Kdo byl kdo v našich dějinách ve 20. století, vol. 1 (Prague, 1998); Timothy Garton Ash, We the People (Cambridge, 1990); Eric Stein, Czecho/Slovakia: Ethnic Conflict, Constitutional Fissure, Negotiated Breakup (Ann Arbor, 1997); Jan Rychlík, Rozpad Československa: Česko-slovenské vztahy 1989–1992 (Bratislava, 2002); <http://wtd.vlada.cz/scripts>.

CĂLINESCU Armand (4 June 1893, Pitești–21 September 1939, Bucharest), Romanian politician. Călinescu studied law and philosophy at the university in Bucharest and received a Ph.D. in economics in Paris (1919). He began his political career by joining the Peasant Party of Ion Mihalache. He served as president of this party in Argeș County. In 1926 Mihalache's party merged with the National Party of Transylvania to form the National Peasant Party (Partidul Național Țărănesc [NPP]), led by Iuliu Maniu. From 1926 Călinescu was an MP. Between 1928 and 1930 he served as deputy minister of agriculture, and at the beginning of 1930 he assumed the post of deputy minister of interior. After the accession to the throne of Charles II in June 1930, two factions formed within the NPP, one against Charles (including Maniu, Mihalache, and Alexandru Vaida-Voievod) and the other supporting him (including Grigore Gafencu and Nicolae Titulescu). Călinescu supported the latter group. He remained in the NPP until 1937.

Between December 1937 and February 1938 Călinescu was the minister of interior in the government of Octavian Goga. After the royal coup d'état of 10 February 1938, Călinescu remained in his post in the government of "national unity," which was headed by Patriarch Miron Cristea. After Cristea's death, Călinescu took over the responsibilities of prime minister on 7 March 1939. In foreign policy he represented an anti-German line. Following the orders of King Charles II, he brought about the suppression of the Iron Guard (fourteen leaders of the Iron Guard, including Corneliu Zelea-Codreanu, were liquidated on 29 November 1938). In September 1939 Călinescu implemented a policy of formal neutrality toward the Polish-German war, although he actually favored Poland. Călinescu was assassinated by a fighting squad of the Iron Guard on 21 September 1939 in Bucharest. This assassination was considered to be retaliation for his involvement in the suppression of the Iron Guard. In his memoirs René de Weck, the Swiss minister to Romania, presented a version of Călinescu's plans that had heretofore not been known; according to Weck, Călinescu had tried to persuade King Charles II to declare war on the USSR and on Germany. Călinescu was the author of Discursuri parlamentare 1926–1933 (Parliamentary speeches 1926–33; 1938) and other works. In 1990 his Insemnări politice 1926–1939 (Political notes) were published in Bucharest. (FA/TD)

Sources: Biographisches Lexikon, vol. 1; T. Dubicki and K. Dach, Żelazny Legion Michala Archaniola (Warsaw, 1996); A. Hillgruber, Hitler, Koenig Carol und Marschall Antonescu: Die Deutsch-Rumaenischen Beziehungen 1938–1944 (Wiesbaden, 1954); Al. Gh. Savu, Dictatura regala 1938–1940 (Bucharest, 1970); René de Weck, Jurnalul unu diplomat elvetian in România 1939–1945 (Bucharest, 2000).

CÂMPEANU Radu (28 February 1922, Bucharest), Romanian politician. In 1947 Câmpeanu graduated from the Department of Economics and Law of the University of Bucharest. During his studies, in 1944–47, he was president of the youth organization of the National Liberal Party (Partidul Național Liberal [NLP]). After the Communist takeover, he was imprisoned for this activity in 1947–56. Afterward he was kept under house arrest in Bărăgan. He worked as a blue-collar laborer, technician, and head of construction work. In 1973 Communist authorities allowed him to leave for France, where he received political asylum. In 1977 in Paris he founded the Association of Former Romanian Political Prisoners (Asociația Foștilor Deținuți Politici din România). In 1979 he co-founded the Committee of the Union of Organizations of Refugees from the East (Comitetul de Legătură a Organizațiilor de Refugiați din Est) and became its deputy chairman. From 1983 to 1990 he was director of the daily Bire for Romanian émigrés. In 1985 he founded the Club of Liberal Thought.

On 5 January 1990, two weeks after the fall of Nicolae Ceaușescu, Câmpeanu returned to Romania and took the lead of the reborn NLP. From February to May 1990 he was vice-president of the Provisional Council of National Unity (Conciliul Provizoriu Uniunii Naționale), including representatives of the post-Communists and from democratic parties. In the presidential elections of May 1990 he came in second (after Ion Iliescu), gaining 10.6 percent of the vote. In 1990–92 he was senator and then deputy speaker of the Senate on behalf of the NLP, which was the third largest parliamentary faction. In 1991 his party joined the Democratic Convention of Romania (Convenția Democrată Română [DCR]), which included parties opposing the anti-democratic rule of the post-Communist National Salvation Front (Frontul Sălburi Naționale) and of President Iliescu. Despite the convention's stance, without the knowledge of his partners from the DCR, Câmpeanu negotiated with the post-Communists, and in 1991 the NLP entered the ruling coalition. Before the parliamentary elections of September 1992 the NLP broke off with the DCR and failed to get into the parliament. In 1993 Câmpeanu was dismissed from the NLP leadership, but he remained its vice-president. Aiming at overthrowing the new party leader, Mircea Ionescu-Quintus, in 1994

Câmpeanu convened an alternative NLP congress, which deemed the new authorities illegal. Since the Ionescu-Quintus leadership was acknowledged by a court verdict, in 1995 Câmpeanu founded a new liberal party, which failed altogether in the elections of November 1996. In the presidential elections Câmpeanu gained 0.35 percent of the vote and disappeared from the political scene. (LW)

Sources: Dictionar Enciclopedic, vol. 1 (Bucharest, 1993); Personalități politice, publice (Bucharest, 1994); Józef Darski, Rumunia: Historia, współczesność, konflikty narodowe (Warsaw, 1995); Europa Środkowo-Wschodnia 1994–1995 (Warsaw, 1997); Ion Alexandrescu, Ion Bulei, Ion Mamina, and Ioan Scurtu, Enciclopedia de istorie României (Bucharest, 2000); Bugajski; www.nordest.ro.

CANKAR Ivan (10 May 1876, Vrhnika–11 December 1918, Ljubljana), Slovene writer, poet, and playwright. The eighth child of a tailor and a peasant woman, Cankar spent his childhood in poverty. His love for his mother was reflected in his writing. He attended high school in Ljubljana, and it was there that his talent was discovered by a teacher of Slovene. After graduating from high school in 1896, Cankar took up studies at the polytechnic in Vienna, where he got to know working-class life. He did not complete his studies because he devoted himself to literary work. In 1907 he returned from Vienna to Slovenia. He made his literary debut as a poet, but he later dedicated himself to prose and drama; he was one of the leading representatives of the Slovene modernists. His only volume of poetry, Erotika (Erotica; 1899), was denounced in Catholic circles as immoral, and the first edition was almost entirely bought up and burned by the bishop of Ljubljana. In 1897 Cankar debuted as a playwright with Romantične duše (Romantic souls). His next play, Jakob Ruda (1900), showed obvious influences of Henrik Ibsen. Cankar's views came close to those of the Socialists, which he explained in his sketch Kako sem postal socialist (How I became a Socialist; 1913). In 1907 he ran unsuccessfully in parliamentary elections. In 1913 in his lecture Slovenci in Jugoslovani (Slovenes in Yugoslavia) he formulated a program of unification of the Slovenes, Croats, and Serbs within a federal state while the national, cultural, and linguistic identity of the three nations was maintained.

After the outbreak of World War I Cankar was interned in Ljubljana, and then he was inducted into the army. Released owing to illness, he published short stories in which he depicted the war suffering of individuals and of the nation. In 1917 he published his works under the title Podobe iz sanj (Pictures from dreams). He exerted a great influence on the development of the Slovene national culture and social thought. A masterful prose stylist, Cankar is best known for his short stories and novels. His major works include the following: Na klanču (On the slope; 1902); Hiša Marije Pomočnice (The ward of Our Lady of Mercy; 1904); Martin Kačur (1906); Za križem (Following the cross; 1909); Moje življenje (My life; 1913); and Grešnik Lenart (Sinner Lenart; 1921). Cankar won international fame with Hlapec Jernej in njegova pravica (The bailiff Jernej and his rights; 1930; or Jernej's justice; 1926), the story of a man who sought justice in vain. The most complete collection of his works can be found in Zbrano delo (Collected works, 30 vols.; 1967–1976). English publications of his works include My Life and Other Sketches (1978). (AO)

Sources: Enciklopedija Jugoslavije, vol. 2 (Zagreb, 1966); Enciklopedija Slovenije, vol. 1 (Ljubljana, 1987); Spominu Ivana Cankara 1876–1918 (Ljubljana, 1919); Cankarjev zbornik (Ljubljana, 1921); J. Matl, "Ivan Cankar und die heutige slowenische Lyrik," Jahrbücher für Kultur und Geschichte der Slaven (Breslau, 1932); Janko Lavrin, The Conscience of a Small Nation: On Ivan Cankar (London, 1935); B. Vodusek, Ivan Cankar (Ljubljana, 1937); 100 Sto let Ivana Cankarja (Ljubljana, 1976).

CANTACUZINO Gheorghe Grigore (16 September 1837, Bucharest–24 March 1913, Bucharest), Romanian politician. Cantacuzino came from a family of Moldavian hospodars (political rulers from a few families) of Greek origin. A lawyer and a conservative politician, owing to his wealth he was called "Nabob." Between 1855 and 1859 he studied in Paris, where in 1861 he earned a Ph.D. in law. He was a political opponent of Alexandru Ion Cuza, Prince of Romania. In 1866 Cantacuzino was a member of the Constituent Assembly and of the commission on the passage of a new constitution for the Principality of Romania. He began his political activity in 1867, joining the Conservative Party (CP). On behalf of the party in 1869 he was elected an MP, and in 1869–70 he simultaneously served as mayor of Bucharest. Moreover, in the conservative governments he held the posts of minister of justice (January–February 1870), minister of public works (April–December 1870 and December 1873–January 1875), and minister of finance (January 1875–January 1876). In 1889–91 and 1900–1901 he presided over the Chamber of Deputies. Between 1892 and 1895 and in 1913 he served as president of the Senate. In 1899–1913 he was the leader of the CP. From April 1899 to July 1900 he was prime minister. In 1905 he issued Programul Partidului Conservator (The program of the Conservative Party). On 4 January 1905 he again assumed the premiership, but on 25 March 1907 he resigned as a result of a great peasant revolt in Moldova for which his government was totally unprepared. (FA/TD)

Sources: Chronological History of Romania (Bucharest, 1972); Ion Bulei, Sistemul politic al: României moderne. Partidul Conservator (Bucharest, 1987); Ion Bulei, Atunci cândveacul se naște (Bucharest, 1990); Keith Hitchins, Rumania 1866–1947 (Oxford, 1994).

ČAPEK Karel (9 January 1890, Malé Svatoňovice, near Trutnov–25 December 1938, Prague), Czech writer. After graduating from high school in 1909 Čapek studied philosophy at Charles University in Prague, then in Berlin and Paris (1910–11), and he graduated in Prague. In 1915 he received a Ph.D. in philosophy. He joined the followers of modern art and philosophy, becoming a member of the Group of Visual Artists. In 1917–21 he edited the periodical Národní listy, but he left it because of its political line, contrary to that of Tomáš Garrigue Masaryk, with whom Čapek had made friends. Until his death he wrote for Lidové noviny. He also contributed to other periodicals, such as Umělecký měsíčník, Přítomnost, Nebojsa, and Volně směry. In 1921–23 he wrote plays for the Prague Theater on Vinohrady. With his brother, Josef, he organized meetings of the Prague intellectual elite with politicians from Masaryk's circle, known as the Caste (Hrad). Čapek seriously contributed to the creation of the Masaryk legend, both through his journalism and through his three-volume Hovory s T. G. Masarykem (1928–35; English selections: President Masaryk Tells His Story, 1935; Masaryk on Thought and Life, 1971; Talks with Tomáš G. Masaryk, 1995) and Mlčení s T. G. Masarykem (Silence with T. G. Masaryk; 1935). One of the key spokesman of Czechoslovak democracy, Čapek was on friendly terms with several outstanding European writers, such as George Bernard Shaw, H. G. Wells, G. K. Chesterton, and Thomas Mann. In the 1930s he engaged in the struggle against Nazism. The disaster of the Pact of Munich (September 1938) was a serious blow for him as it represented the destruction of values in which he had believed. His death from pneumonia symbolically coincided with the end of the Czechoslovak democratic republic.

Čapek made his literary debut with two volumes of short stories, Zářivé hlubiny a jiné prózy (Shining depths and other stories; 1916) and Krakonošova zahrada (The Garden of Karkonoš; 1918), written with his brother Josef and dominated by the issues that would be crucial in his future works: the question of understanding the world and the catastrophic prospects of civilization. In his own volumes of prose, Boží muka (God's suffering; 1917) and Trapné povídky (Embarrassing tales; 1921), he contemplated the complexity of human nature and the contradictions between objective and subjective truth. Čapek raised similar issues in plays, both in those written with his brother, such as Ze života hmyzu (From the life of insects; 1921), and in those he wrote alone, such as Loupežník (Brigand; 1920) and R.U.R. (RUR: Rossum's Universal Robots; 1921), in which he moved the Prague legend of Golem into the present. With the latter play he became famous for inventing the term "robot," adopted later into many languages. In the novel Krakatit (1924; An atomic phantasy, 1931) he showed the tragic effects of the development of a technical civilization.

Čapek's literary interests changed with the development of fascism in Europe. He gave up his relativist ideas of truth and began to defend democracy and humanism. It was then that he wrote three novels thought to be crucial in his output: Hordubal (1933), Povětroň (1934; Meteor, 1934), and Obyčejný život (1934; Ordinary Life, 1936); they advocated equality and the brotherhood of men. Čapek was increasingly anxious about the growing wave of fascism and expressed his fears in a grotesque novel, Válka s mloky (1936; War with the Newts, 1937), in which, with a variety of styles and measures of expression, he envisioned a world dominated by totalitarianism. With the approaching danger of war he even gave up his pacifism. In a scene in his play Matka (1938; Mother, 1939), the heroine hands a gun to her youngest son and sends him off to fight. Čapek has also left a rich journalistic output. In his columns he discussed various topics connected with the theater, journeys, literature, politics, journalism, and the delights of home. He also wrote a popular book for children, Dášeňka čili Život štěněte (1932; I Had a Dog and a Cat, 1940). He received frequent awards and was very popular abroad. His works were translated into many languages, and his plays were performed all over Europe, the United States, and Japan. Many of his works were filmed. In 1938 a group of French writers nominated him for the Nobel Prize in Literature, but to no avail. (PU)

Sources: ČBS; Kdo byl kdo v našich dějinách ve 20. století, vol. 2 (Prague, 1998); Politická elita meziválečného Československa 1918–1938: Kdo byl kdo za první republiky (Prague, 1998); Halina Janaszek-Ivančíková, Karel Čapek czyli poszukiwanie prawdy (Warsaw, 1985); Václav Černý, Karel Čapek (Prague, 1936); Ivan Klíma, Karel Čapek (Prague, 1962); Miroslav Halík, Karel Čapek Život a dílo v datech (Prague, 1984); František Buriánek, Karel Čapek (Prague, 1988); László Dobossy, Karel Čapek (Budapest, 1961); William E. Harkins, Karel Čapek (New York, 1962); Sergey Nikolsky, Karel Čapek (Moscow, 1952); Bohuslava R. Bradbrook, Karel Čapek: In Pursuit of Truth, Tolerance, and Trust (Sussex, 1998).

CAR Stanisław (26 April 1882, Warsaw–18 June 1938, Warsaw), Polish lawyer and politician. After high school Car started law studies at Warsaw University but because of his participation in the student strike of 1905, he had to leave Warsaw and graduated in Odessa in 1907. For three years he did his apprenticeship, and in 1911 he opened his own law office. In June 1914 he was a delegate to the congress of Polish lawyers in Lwów (Lviv), and from 1915 he was a judge in Warsaw. From December 1918 to December 1922 he was director of the Civil Chancellery of the head of state, Józef Piłsudski, becoming the latter's trusted aide. Later he was director of the Civil Chancellery of Presidents Gabriel Narutowicz and Stanisław Wojciechowski. He resigned in 1923 and practiced for two years. In 1924–26 he was editor-in-chief of the monthly Palestra, and in May 1925 he became prosecutor of the Supreme Court. He returned to politics after the coup of May 1926, assuming the position of director of the Civil Chancellery of President Ignacy Mościcki. In November 1926 he became deputy minister of justice, and in 1927–28 he was general electoral commissioner. From December 1928 to December 1929 and from March to December 1930 he was minister of justice, drawing close to the sanacja group of “colonels,” hardliners among the followers of Piłsudski. Car favored the strengthening of presidential power. After the elections of November 1930 he became MP on behalf of the Nonparty Bloc of Cooperation with the Government (Bezpartyjny Blok Współpracy z Rządem [BBWR]) and deputy speaker of the Lower House (Sejm). From August 1931 he was deputy chairman of the BBWR parliamentary club, and after the elections of 1935 he became speaker of the Sejm. Chairman and general reporter of the parliamentary constitutional commission, he contributed greatly to the passing of the new authoritarian constitution of April 1935. He was the author of Z zagadnień konstytucyjnych Polski: Istota i zakres władzy Prezydenta Rzeczypospolitej Polski (The constitutional questions of Poland: The essence and range of presidential power; 1924), Zarys historii adwokatury w Polsce (Outline history of the Polish bar; 1925), and other works. (PU)

Sources: Posłowie i senatorowie Rzeczypospolitej Polski 1919–1939: Słownik biograficzny, vol. 1 (Warsaw, 1998); Encyklopedia historii Drugiej Rzeczypospolitej (Warsaw, 1999); Andrzej Ajnenkiel, Historia sejmu polskiego, vol. 2, part 2 (Warsaw, 1989); Słownik biograficzny adwokatów polskich, vol. 2 (Warsaw, 1988); Jacek Majchrowski, ed., Stanisław Car: Polska koncepcja autorytaryzmu (Warsaw, 1996); Krzysztof Pol, Poczet prawników polskich (Warsaw, 2000).

ÇARÇANI Adil (5 May 1922, Fushë Bardhë, near Gjirokaster–12 October 1997, Tirana), Albanian Communist activist. Born into a Muslim family, in 1942 Çarçani joined the Communist Party of Albania. In 1943 he assumed the position of political commissar of a battalion, and in 1944, of the Seventh Brigade of the National Liberation Army. After a reorganization of the guerrilla units he was transferred to the Fourth Division. After the war he was party secretary in Durrës and then in Shkodër (1946). From 1948 he worked in the Ministry of Trade. In 1950 he was elected MP from Gjirokaster. From July 1954 he was minister of industry; from April 1952 he was a deputy member, and from June 1956 to June 1991 a member, of the Politburo of the Central Committee of the Albanian Party of Labor (APL). From June 1958 he was minister of industry and mining. Deputy prime minister from 28 December 1965 to 15 January 1982, after the death of Mehmet Shehu, Çarçani became prime minister. Always loyal to the party line, he endorsed the proclamation of Albania as the first fully atheist state (1967), a break with China, and the succession of Ramiz Alia as head of the APL after the death of Enver Hoxha (1985). In 1966–1971 Çarçani was chairman of the Commission for Complete Electrification. In 1967 he was elected a member of the Supreme Council of the Democratic Front, and in 1990–91 he was its chairman. He headed the Albanian delegations signing credit agreements with China in 1968 and 1975. In 1975 he was a member of the commission preparing changes in the constitution. In the early 1990s he was ranked among the party conservatives. His departure from the post of prime minister on 22 February 1991 and the succession of Fatos Nano were aimed at showing Communist moderation but did not prevent the collapse of the Communist regime. In 1991 Çarçani was elected to the parliament on behalf of the post-Communist Albanian Socialist Party and made an inaugural speech there, but on 3 December 1991 he was deprived of immunity, tried, and in 1994 sentenced to five years for the abuse of power and fraud. The sentence was changed to house arrest. (TC)

Sources: Fjalori Enciklopedik Shqiptar (Tirana, 1985); Klaus-Detlev Grothusen, ed., Albanien (Göttingen, 1993); Elez Biberaj, Shqipëria në tranzicion: Rruga e veshtrise drejt Demokracisë (Tirana, 2001); www.rulers.org.

ČARNOGURSKÝ Ján (1 January 1944, Bratislava), Slovak lawyer and politician. The son of Pavol Čarnogurský, in 1969 Čarnogurský graduated in law from Komenský University in Bratislava, and in 1971 he received a Ph.D. From 1970 he worked as a lawyer. He was counsel for the defense in many trials of political dissidents, for which he was removed from the bar in 1981. He worked as a driver and briefly as a lawyer, but in 1987–89 he was unemployed. From 1988 he edited an uncensored periodical, Bratislavské listy. He was active in the democratic opposition, representing Christian Democratic ideas. In August 1989 he was arrested and accused of “an attempt to overthrow the republic.” He was released as a result of an amnesty on 25 November 1989.

During the Velvet Revolution Čarnogurský took an active part in the negotiations between the opposition and the Communist authorities. In the government of Marian Čalfa he became first deputy prime minister (10 December 1989–27 April 1990). Until the end of 1989 he was co-responsible for the Ministry of Interior and then for the legislation that introduced the democratic rule of law in Czechoslovakia. He initiated the creation of the Christian Democratic Movement (Kresťansko-Demokratické Hnutie [KDH]), in Slovakia and from its founding congress in February 1990 he was its chairman. In the first free elections in June 1990 he gained a seat in the Chamber of the People of the Federal Assembly, and he became the first deputy prime minister in the Slovak government of Vladimír Mečiar. He held this position until the the Mečiar government fell as a result of the conflict in the association Public against Violence (Verejnost' proti Nasiliu [VPN]). On 23 April 1991 Čarnogurský became prime minister of the Slovak Republic and held this position until 24 June 1992, when he resigned as a result of the election. He greatly influenced the Czecho-Slovak talks on the shape of the future state, which he wanted to maintain as a union but on the condition of wide autonomy for Slovakia. At that time he planned a division of Czechoslovakia only after its entry into the European Union.

From June 1992 to September 1998 Čarnogurský was an MP of the Slovak National Council (renamed the National Council after the separation of the sovereign Slovak Republic in January 1993). From 1993 to 1994 he was vice-president of the Parliamentary Assembly of the Conference of Security and Cooperation in Europe (CSCE), and from 1994 to 1998 he was a member of the Slovak delegation to the CSCE and the Organization for European Security and Cooperation. One of the key opponents of the Mečiar regime, in order to remove him from power, in 1997 Čarnogurský introduced the KDH into the Slovak Democratic Coalition (Slovenská Demokratická Koalícia [SDK]), led by Mikulaš Dzurinda. After the SDK electoral victory in September 1998, Čarnogurský became minister of justice, but he soon entered into conflict with Dzurinda, who planned to transform the SDK into one party. Čarnogurský remained minister of justice until the elections of September 2002. Meanwhile the KDH split on account of a conflict between the so-called conservatives who, like Čarnogurský, wanted to retain it, and reformers who wanted to join the Slovak Christian Democratic Union (Slovenská Demokratická Kresťanská Únie [SDKÚ]) of Dzurinda. In 2000 Čarnogurský gave up the KDH leadership. His articles and speeches of the 1980s and early 1990s were published as Videné od Dunaja (As seen from the Danube; 1997). (PU)

Sources: ČBS; Kdo byl kdo v našich dějinách ve 20. století, vol. 1 (Prague, 1998); Českoslovenští politici: 1918–1991 (Prague, 1991); Jan Rychlík, Rozpad Československa: Česko-slovenské vz- tahy 1989–1992 (Bratislava, 2002); Eric Stein, Czecho/Slovakia: Ethnic Conflict, Constitutional Fissure, Negotiated Breakup (Ann Arbor, 1997); Slovensko 1996: Súhrnná správa o stave spoločnosti (Bratislava, 1997); Slovensko 1997: Súhrnná správa o stave spoločnosti (Bratislava, 1998); Slovensko 1998–1999: Súhrnná správa o stave spoločnosti (Bratislava, 1999); Slovensko 2000: Súhrnná správa o stave spoločnosti (Bratislava, 2000); www.kdh.sk/tvare/zivot_carnogursky.htm#.

ČARNOGURSKÝ Pavol (21 January 1908, Malá Franková, Spiš–27 December 1992, Bratislava), Slovak politician and journalist, father of Jan Čarnogurský. Čarnogurský graduated from the training school in Spišská Kapitula. He started law studies in Prague, but in 1930 he had to break them off for political reasons, and he finally graduated in Bratislava. From the late 1920s he was active in the Slovak People's Party of Reverend Andrej Hlinka (Hlinkova Slovenská Ľudová strana [HSL'S]). He worked as a teacher in Vajnory and wrote for the daily Slovák; from 1935 he was secretary general of the Association of Catholic Youth. He belonged to the Polonophile wing of the HSL'S, headed by his close aide, Karol Sidor. In 1938–44 he was deputy to the Slovak parliament in Bratislava; in 1939–40 he organized Slovak radio and the Slovak press agency. He opposed the pro-German policy of the Slovak government and cooperated with the domestic resistance, helping persecuted Jews and intervening in the defense of imprisoned politicians, including, among others, Gustav Husák and Ján Ursíny. Along with other Slovak diplomats in Budapest, he supported activists of the Camp of Fighting Poland. After Germany occupied Hungary in March 1944, he helped in the evacuation of Polish freedom fighters into Slovakia and contributed to the establishment in Bratislava of a transfer center of the Polish government-in-exile.

In June 1944 Čarnogurský was deprived of his parliamentary seat. Along with General Augustín Malár, he was preparing two Slovak divisions to pass over to the side of the Red Army, and after the outbreak of the Slovak National Uprising in August 1944 he cooperated with the insurgents. Then he returned to his home village, where he helped the guerrillas and gave shelter to Jews who were in hiding and to the former Polish minister of labor, General Stefan Hubicki. From February to May 1945 he was an officer of the Czechoslovak army in Košice; after the war he edited the daily Katolícke noviny. He took part in the negotiations between former HSL'S activists with the Democratic Party and in failed attempts to create a Christian Republican Party. He was imprisoned in 1945, 1947–48, 1951–52, and 1976. The Communist secret service confiscated his extensive archives. Until 1977 he worked as a blue-collar laborer and was active in anti-

Communist activities and in the underground structures of the Roman Catholic Church. He maintained contacts with Slovak émigré communities. He authored memoirs that are an important source for the recent history of Slovakia. (MG)

Sources: ČBS; Jozef Jablonický, Z ilegality do povstania: Kapitoly z občianskeho odboja (Bratislava, 1969); Ján Korček, Slovenská republika 1943–1945 (Bratislava, 1999); J. Berghauzen, “Ze wspomnień o stosunkach polsko-słowackich,” Dzieje Najnowsze, 1977, no. 4; “Z memoárových statí Pal’a Čarnogurského,” Slovanský přehled, 1968, no. 6.

CARP Petre (29 June 1837, Iași–18 August 1918, Bucharest), Romanian politician and writer. Carp graduated from high school in Berlin and completed his law studies in Bonn (1860). He represented a strong pro-German attitude, but that did not mean he was uncritical of the policy pursued by King Charles I. Carp’s saying, “It’s impossible, Your Majesty!,” became proverbial in Romania. He was also active in the field of culture; along with Titu Maiorescu, Ioan Negruzzi, Vasile Pogor, and Theodor Rosetti, he was co-founder of the literary circle Junimea (Youth). From 1867 this group edited the literary review Convorbiri Literare. Carp was a long-term activist of the Conservative Party (Partidul Conservator) and its president between 1907 and 1914. His political views were close to those of Maiorescu and Alexandru Marghiloman, who promoted social elitism and opposed democracy as a system unsuited to Romanian conditions. Carp held numerous posts; for example, he was head of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs (1870), and then, with the rank of minister, he was on diplomatic missions to Vienna, Berlin, St. Petersburg (1871–75), and again Vienna (1880–85). In Vienna he brought about a meeting between Premier Ioan C. Brătianu and Chancellor Otto von Bismarck. He also significantly contributed to reaching a secret alliance between Romania and the Central Powers (1883). In 1876 he was minister of education, and in 1888–89, again minister of foreign affairs. Between 1891 and 1895, as minister of public property, Carp prepared the mining and forest law. Moreover, as a result of his efforts, the National Bank of Romania issued bonds payable in gold.

While serving as premier between 19 July 1900 and 26 February 1901, Carp introduced taxes on alcohol and tobacco. He resumed the premiership on 11 January 1910, but this time he again made unpopular economic decisions—for example, nationalizing tramway enterprises. He resigned on 10 April 1912, the day before the outbreak of the Balkan War. He opposed a Crown Council decision of 3 August 1914 that declared the neutrality of Romania, and he advocated that a secret alliance with Germany be enforced. After Romania entered the war on the side of the Allies in August 1916, he maintained that for Romania even a military defeat would be better than a victory by Russia and its allies. He remained in German-occupied Bucharest, where he died. He published (among other works) Era nouă (New era; 1888); Discursuri (Speeches; 1907); România și războiul european (Romania and the European war; 1915); Politica externă a României (Foreign policy of Romania; 1915); and Auswaertige Politik und Agrarreform (Foreign policy and land reform; 1917). (FA/TD)

Sources: Biographisches Lexikon, vol. 1; Radu Budișteanu, Petre P. Carp (Bucharest, 1933); Constantine Gane, P. P. Carp și locul său în istoria politică a țării, vols. I–II (Bucharest, 1936); George Tașcă, Politica economico-socială a lui P. P. Carp (Bucharest, 1938); Titu Maiorescu, Inseminări zilnice (Bucharest, 1939–1940); R. W. Seton-Watson, A History of the Roumanians (Hamden, CT, 1963); Zigu Ornea, Junimea și junimismul (Bucharest, 1978); Ion Bulei, Sistemul politic al României moderne: Partidul Conservator (Bucharest, 1987); Ion Bulei, Atunci când veacul se năștea . . . (Bucharest, 1990); Dumitru Vitcu, Diplomats of the Union (Bucharest, 1989).

ČATLOŠ Ferdinand (7 October 1895, Liptovský Hrádok, near Liptovský Mikuláš–16 October 1972, Martin), Slovak general. Čatloš graduated from a high trade school. In September 1915, as a cadet of the Austro-Hungarian army, he was taken prisoner of war by the Russians. In 1917 he joined the Czechoslovak Legion in Russia, in which he commanded a battalion. After returning to Czechoslovakia, in 1925–26 he worked in the Ministry of National Defense in Prague, and then he was deputy military attaché in Budapest for one year. In the late 1920s he studied at the Higher Military School in Paris. After returning home, he was chief of staff of a division in Hranice in Moravia (1935–38) and commander of the military chancellery of the Slovak autonomous government (1938–39). Promoted to the rank of general in 1939, he became minister of national defense of the Slovak Republic, whose government facilitated the German invasion of Poland and then declared war on Poland. At first he supported the radical faction of Vojtech Tuka; later, however, he took a more moderate attitude and sided with President Jozef Tiso. In view of the approaching German defeat, he tried to establish contact with the Slovak resistance, and in the summer of 1944 he elaborated a plan called the “Čatloš Memorandum,” in which he offered the Soviet command the cooperation of Slovak troops in opening the way to the west. The regular Slovak Army was to overthrow the pro-German government and establish a military dictatorship. The Kremlin did not even respond to this offer. After the outbreak of the Slovak National Uprising Čatloš at first opposed it, but on 2 September 1944 he broke through to the territory conquered by the insurgents, where he was interned and temporarily deported to the USSR. In 1947 he was tried in Czechoslovakia and sentenced to five years in prison but released after one year. From 1948 he was a white-collar worker in Martin. (PU)

Sources: ČBS; SBS, vol. 1; Kdo byl kdo v našich dějinach ve 20. století, vol. 1 (Prague, 1998); Reprezentatívny biografický lexikón Slovenska (Martin, 1999); Valerián Bystrický and Štefan Fano, eds., Slovensko na konci druhej svetovej vojny (Bratislava, 1994); Václav Štefánský, Generál Ferdinand Čatloš (Bratislava, 1998).

CEAUȘESCU Elena [née Petrescu] (7 January 1919, Petrești–25 December 1989, Tîrgoviște), wife of Nicolae Ceaușescu. Born into a peasant family, Ceaușescu completed a few grades of primary school. From 1937 she belonged to the Communist Party of Romania. At the beginning of World War II she worked in a textile factory in Bucharest. From 1944 she was a member of the Central Committee (CC) of the Union of Communist Youth, and from 1965, a member of the CC of the Romanian Workers' Party. In 1973 she became a member of the Political Executive Committee of the CC of the Romanian Communist Party (RCP, renamed so in 1965); in 1974 she became a member of the Standing Political Bureau of the Executive Committee of the RCP CC, and from 1975 she was a deputy to the Grand National Assembly. She had an extensive and destructive influence on Romanian politics. She even usurped titles and degrees in chemistry. From 1964 to 1975 she was director of the Institute of Chemistry, and from 1965 to 1989, general director of the Central Chemical Research Institute. In 1979–89 she presided over the National Council of Science and Technology. From 1980 she was first deputy prime minister. In 1981 she became chairperson of the National Committee of People of Science and Peace. From 1984 to 1989 she presided over the central Council of Classification, Standardization, and Quality, and in 1985 she became a member of the Romanian Academy of Sciences. She was a member of many scholarly societies and received many national and foreign awards, both in Western democracies and in Third World countries. In 1970 she became an honorary member of the International Association of Industrial Chemistry in France; in 1973, a member of the New York Academy of Sciences; in 1974, an honorary doctor of the University of Buenos Aires in Argentina; and in 1975, an honorary doctor of universities in Manila and Tehran. She published a few works in chemistry, probably not her own. Her formal position in science was one of the worst scandals in this field. Because of her appetite for luxury, her haughtiness, and her malicious nature, she was hated by even her closest aides. As a result of the coup in December 1989, she was arrested along with her husband, hastily tried, sentenced to death, and shot in the Tîrgoviște military barracks. (LW)

Sources: Persolanități românești ale științelor naturii și tehnicii (Bucharest, 1982); Dictionar Enciclopedic (Bucharest, 1993); Ion Rațiu, Contemporary Romania (Richmond, 1975); Vlad Georgescu, Istoria Românilor de la origini pînă în zilele noastre (Oakland, 1984); Juliusz Stroynowski, ed., Who's Who in the Socialist Countries of Europe (Munich, London, and Paris, 1989); Edward Behr, Kiss the Hand You Cannot Bite (New York, 1991); Ion Alexandrescu, Ion Bulei, Ion Mamina, and Ioan Scurtu, Enciclopedia de istorie României (Bucharest, 2000).

CEAUȘESCU Nicolae (26 January 1918, Scornicești–25 December 1989, Tîrgoviște), Romanian Communist leader. Born into a large peasant family from Oltenia, Ceaușescu completed four grades of primary school. From 1932 he worked as a tailor's apprentice. In 1933 he joined the illegal Union of Communist Youth (UCY) and the Communist Party of Romania (Partidul Comunist din România [CPR]). In 1936 he became secretary of the regional CPR committee in Prahova. According to the instructions of the Comintern, the CPR, which included mostly non-Romanians, advocated the secession of post-World War I Romanian acquisitions in Bessarabia, Bukovina, Transylvania, and Dobruđa. In 1936 Ceaușescu was arrested for anti-state activities and sentenced to two and a half years, which he spent in the Brașov and Doftana prisons. In 1939 he was imprisoned again and sentenced to three years with suspended execution, but since he continued his activities, in 1940 he was put in jail. He was imprisoned in the Jilava and Caransebeș prisons, and in 1943 he was moved to the Tîrgu Jiu camp, where he met the leadership of the Communist Party of Romania and became a protégé of Gheorghe Gheorghiu-Dej.

Released after the coup of 23 August 1944, Ceaușescu became the head of the UCY and was promoted to the rank of colonel, although he had no formal military education. It was then that he married Elena Petrescu, who remained with him until death. In November 1946 he became regional RCP secretary in Oltenia and was responsible for rigging the parliamentary elections. During the pre-election campaign he became famous for brutality. At least one of his murders was documented. In 1945–48 he was a member of the RCP Central Committee (CC), and from February 1948, a member of the CC of the newly established Romanian Workers' Party (Partidul Muncitoresc Român [RWP]). In 1946 he became a deputy to the Grand National Assembly. From 1948 to 1950 he was deputy minister of agriculture, brutally forcing peasants into kolkhozes. From 1950 to 1954 he was head of the Political Administration of the army and deputy minister of national defense. After the party purge of 1952, directed against the followers of Ana Pauker and Vasile Luca, Ceaușescu advanced to the position of the head of the RWP CC Organization Bureau and CC secretary, and in 1955 he became a member of the CC Politburo, responsible for personnel policy. In November 1956 he monitored the influence of the Hungarian Revolution on the Hungarian minority in Romania. For some time Imre Nagy was held in Romania. Along with Emil Bodnaraș, Ceaușescu sent specially trained security officers of Hungarian nationality from Transylvania to Hungary to help János Kádár reconstruct the political police in Hungary.

On 22 March 1965, three days after the death of Gheorghiu-Dej, thanks to the support of the nationalist faction in the RWP leadership and to his own influence in the army and in the party apparatus, Ceaușescu was appointed first secretary of the RWP CC. In July 1965 he changed the name of the party to the Romanian Communist Party (RCP), and in August 1965 he introduced a new constitution and changed the name of the country to the Socialist Republic of Romania. He also changed his title to secretary general of the RCP CC. In 1967–74 he was also chairman of the State Council. In 1974 he introduced the title of president and assumed this position for life. By 1969 he had consolidated his position by gathering all the reins of power into his hands. Skillfully fanning rivalries among the highest officials of the system, he got rid of his major rival, Minister of Interior Alexandru Draghici. He also fired most of the so-called old Communists and rehabilitated those murdered on the orders of Gheorghiu-Dej, including Lucrețiu Pătrășcanu and Ștefan Foriș, as well as some of the political prisoners of the years 1951–58. Promoting his protégés, in 1969 he expanded the CC and secured total control over the party.

Ceaușescu continued the foreign policy of his predecessor, based on nationalism and hidden anti-Russian emotions. In some respects he distanced himself even further from Moscow. In 1965 he opposed the subordination of Romania to the economic plans of the Comecon. He initially slowed down the pace of industrialization, and in 1968 he refused to send Romanian troops to Czechoslovakia. Romania was the only Warsaw Pact country that did not condemn American air raids on Vietnam and that maintained diplomatic relations with Israel after the Six-Day War in 1967. These policies gained Ceaușescu some trust in the West and at home. Democratic countries extended Romania credit, counting on a widening gap between Bucharest and Moscow, and they closed their eyes to the totalitarian rule, terror, and violation of human rights by the Ceaușescu regime. Credit and technologies from the West were nevertheless transferred through Romania to the USSR, as Ceaușescu did not move far from the Soviet bloc. In 1971 he accelerated the pace of industrialization again. Investment funds came from huge concessions from the society and from West German and Israeli payments for Romania's consent to allow Romanian Germans and Jews to emigrate. Actual Romanian-Soviet relations were much closer than the officially declared sovereignty of Romania, especially in the field of intelligence and in economic and military contacts. Nonetheless, Ceaușescu was accepted and honored as a politician almost independent of the Kremlin. For instance, in 1975 he received members of the British nobility. He made numerous foreign trips, achieving significant personal gains. He mediated between the USSR and Israel, but he also maintained close relations with Palestinian terrorists. In 1977 he contributed to the establishment of contact between Egypt and Israel and to the visit of the president of Egypt, Anwar Sadat, to Jerusalem.

At the same time Ceaușescu extended neo-Stalinist policies and strengthened his own personality cult. He also introduced a "dynastic socialism," since he filled the top positions in the state and party apparatus with members of his own family. In 1972 he promoted his wife to the Politburo of the RCP CC. One of his brothers, Nicolae Andruța, was a Securitate general and deputy minister of interior; another, Ilie, was deputy minister of national defense; a third, Ioan, was deputy chairman of the State Planning Commission; a fourth, Florea, was editor of the party daily, Scinteia; a fifth, Marin, was head of an economic agency in Vienna that arranged family business; his sister Maria was deputy chairman of the Red Cross; another sister, Elena, was married to Vasile Barbulescu, the CC secretary for agriculture; his son Nicu was provincial party secretary in Sibiu; and his brother-in-law, Gheorghe Petrescu, was deputy head of the trade unions. The spouses of some of these relatives also held high positions. In 1971 Ceaușescu initiated a mini-cultural revolution that led to a total subordination of the whole society to the party and security apparatus and ultimately to Ceaușescu himself.

With the help of the political police, Securitate, which applied the harshest methods of terror, blackmail, treacherous killings, and forced placements in psychiatric wards, Ceaușescu forced the absolute obedience of the society. Workers' protests were bloodily suppressed in the Jiu region in 1977, in Motru in 1981, and in Brașov in 1987. At the same time the Ceaușescu clan surrounded itself with ostentation, building palaces at a time when most of the population was suffering from growing shortages. The cult of Ceaușescu and his wife took grotesque forms. He was called the "Father of the Romanians" and the "Carpathian Genius,” while she was celebrated as a scholar despite her incomplete primary education. The low cultural level of the Ceaușescu clan went hand in hand with displays of its power. The first breach in the monolith of Ceaușescu power was achieved by Ion Pacepa, deputy head of intelligence, who escaped to the West at the end of 1978 and shook the credibility of the Ceaușescu system. Pacepa’s revelations made it clear that the Ceaușescu dictatorship was primitive and ruthless, with Securitate agents not hesitating to murder Romanian émigré activists.

The intensive industrialization of the 1980s, as well as Ceaușescu’s ambition to discharge foreign debts (Ceaușescu had noted the fall of the Polish regime of Edward Gierek because of its foreign debts), dramatically worsened the economic situation in Romania. Nonetheless, the regime continued its bombastic projects, such as the construction of a Palace of the Republic at the cost of the demolition of old buildings in downtown Bucharest and the plan of “systemization,” aiming at the elimination of traditional village communities. Another serious challenge to the regime came with the Soviet perestroika. In view of the reforms advocated by Mikhail Gorbachev, the ideological orthodoxy of Ceaușescu began to be a burden for both the Soviets and the West. The new Soviet policy raised the hopes of the functionaries who had been fired by Ceaușescu and who were now ready to return at his expense. Some of them must have had contacts with the Soviet KGB. In March 1989 six of these functionaries sent a letter to Ceaușescu criticizing his thoughtless economic and social policies and the atmosphere of terror that he had created.

As late as November 1989, Ceaușescu managed to orchestrate the Sixteenth RCP Congress in the spirit of his apotheosis. After the riots in Timișoara, where the militia tried to evict Pastor László Tőkés but where the local community stood up in his defense, Ceaușescu ordered the use of guns to suppress demonstrations. On 20 December the protests took on massive proportions. The next day a meeting in Bucharest, organized in order to support the leader and at which Ceaușescu spoke, changed into an anti-government demonstration. In view of the immediate danger Ceaușescu fled by helicopter. On the night of 21–22 December a part of the army crossed over to the side of the demonstrators. New Communist leaders emerged in control of some units. Ceaușescu was arrested while escaping from the capital. He was brought, along with his wife, to the military barracks in Tîrgoviște, where they were hastily “tried,” sentenced to death, and executed, most probably on 25 December 1989. (LW)

Sources: Dictionar Enciclopedic, vol. 1 (Bucharest, 1993); Ion Rațiu, Contemporary Romania (Richmond, 1975); Vlad Georgescu, Istoria Românilor de la origini pînă în zilele noastre (Oakland, 1984); Juliusz Stroynowski, ed., Who’s Who in the Socialist Countries of Europe (Munich, London, and Paris, 1989); Mark Almond, The Rise and Fall of Nicolae and Elena Ceaușescu (London, 1992); Silviu Brucan, The Wasted Generation (Boulder, Colo., 1993); Józef Darski, Rumunia: Historia, współczesność, konflikty narodowe (Warsaw, 1995); Denis Deletant, Ceaușescu and the Securitate: Coercion and Dissent in Romania, 1965–1989 (New York, 1995); Costin Scorpan, Istoria României: Enciclopedie (Bucharest, 1997); Ion Alexandrescu, Ion Bulei, Ion Mamina, and Ioan Scurtu, Enciclopedia de istorie României (Bucharest, 2000).

CELMIŅŠ Gustavs Adolfs (1 April 1899, Riga–10 April 1968 San Antonio, Texas), Latvian politician. In 1917 Celmiņš graduated from a trade school in Moscow and started studies at the Riga Polytechnic Institute, which had been relocated outside the city. In the spring of 1918 he returned to Riga, and in December 1918 he joined the Latvian Army. For bravery in Courland he was awarded the Order of Lāčplēsis, and in July 1919 he was promoted to the rank of lieutenant. From January 1920 he was deputy military attaché in Poland. During the Battle of Warsaw (August 1920) he stayed at his outpost, reporting to the Latvian government. In 1924 he retired. From 1925 to 1927 he was a white-collar worker, but he was dismissed for his rightist ideas. From 1927 he belonged to the Latvian National Union (Latviešu Nacionālā Apvienība) and directed its academic section. In 1929 he graduated in philology and philosophy from the University of Latvia in Riga. In 1930–32 he worked in the Ministry of Finance and was dismissed for political reasons again. From 1932 he presided over the Union of the Latvian Nation, Ugunskrusts (Fire Cross), and after its outlawing in 1933 he was the head of a Fascist organization, the Cross of Perkun (Pērkonkrusts). Dressed in gray shirts and black berets, members of the organization propagated extreme nationalism, anti-Communism, and anti-Semitism. Arrested after the Kārlis Ulmanis coup in 1934, in August 1935 Celmiņš was sentenced to three years in prison. After his release in 1937, he was banned from Latvian territory, and he lived in Italy, Poland, Hungary, Romania, Yugoslavia, Turkey, and Germany. From December 1939 to March 1940 he was aide-de-camp of the commander of the “Sisu” Legion fighting against the USSR in Finland.

After the Finnish-Soviet war, Celmiņš lived in the Third Reich, and in 1941 he returned to Latvia, which was occupied by the German Army. He strove to form a Latvian division in exchange for a German declaration of the restoration of Latvian statehood. He directed the Committee of Latvian Volunteer Organizations. In view of the failure of his plans, in 1943–44 he secretly edited the periodical Brīvā Latvija, in which he advocated the reconstruction of the Latvian state against the will of the German authorities. Arrested by the Germans in March 1944, he was sent to the Flossenburg camp and then to Dachau. In 1945, along with other prisoners, he was moved to Italy, where he was liberated by the American Army. In 1945–49 he lived in Italy and from 1949 in the United States. In 1950–52 he was a military instructor at the University of Syracuse, and then he was active as an industrialist in Mexico. In 1956 he became librarian at Trinity College in San Antonio, Texas, and from 1959 he lectured in Sovietology at St. Mary University there. He authored, among other things, the memoirs Eiropa krustcelēs (Europe at the crossroads; 1947) and Sauli Latvijai: Latvijas atbrīvošanas ierindas spēku organizācijas mērķi, uzdevumi un darbības veidi jautājumos un atbildēs (Goals, tasks, and measures of Latvian liberation organizations in questions and answers; 1948). (EJ)

Sources: Philip Rees, Biographical Dictionary of the Extreme Right since 1890 (New York, 1990); Lāčplēša Kara ordeņa kavalieri: Biogrāfiska vārdnīca (Riga, 1995); Piotr Łossowski, Kraje bałtyckie na drodze od demokracji parlamentarnej do dyktatury 1918–1934 (Wrocław, 1974); H. Biezais, “Gustava Celmiņa Pērkoņkrusts dokumentu gaismā,” Latvijas Zinātņu Akadēmijas Vēstis, 1992, nos. 1–4; Latvijas Valsts vēstures arhīvs (State Historical Archives of Latvia).

CELMIŅŠ Hugo (30 July 1877, Lubanas–30 July 1941, Moscow), Latvian Peasant party politician. Celmiņš graduated in agronomy at the Riga Polytechnic in 1903. He later also studied in Bern. In 1907–13 he was editor of the Baltijas Lauksaimnieks magazine in Riga. Between 1904 and 1905 and then from 1914 he served as an officer in the Russian Army, and in 1915 he was taken prisoner by the Germans. At the end of 1918 he returned to Latvia and fought for its independence, attaining the rank of captain. From 1919 he was in the National Council and from 1920 a deputy to the Constituent Assembly, where he represented the Peasant Union of Kārlis Ulmanis. Between 1920 and 1921 he was minister of agriculture and from 1923–24, minister of education. He served as prime minister from 19 December 1924 to 23 December 1925 and then from 1 December 1928 to 26 March 1931. In 1925 he was also minister for foreign affairs. From 1931 he was mayor of Riga. After the coup d'état staged by Ulmanis in 1934, he continued to work at his post to 1935, and between 1935 and 1938 he was ambassador to Germany, Austria, and the Netherlands. After the invasion of Latvia by the Red Army in July 1940 he attempted to run for the People's Assembly, but the list was rendered null. He was arrested by the NKVD in October 1940, sentenced to death, and executed in the Lubyanka Prison in Moscow. (WR, EJ) dija (Stockholm, 1950–51); Piotr Łossowski, Kraje bałtyckie na drodze od demokracji parlamentarnej do dyktatury (1918–1934) (Wrocław, 1972).

Sources: Alfreds Bilmanis, Latvia as an Independent State (Washington, D.C., 1947); Arnolds Svabe, ed., Latviju enciklope-

ČEPIČKA Alexej (18 August 1910, Kroměříž–30 September 1990, Dobříš), Czechoslovak Communist activist. The son of a postman, Čepička graduated in law from Charles University in Prague, and in 1935 he earned a Ph.D. there. Member of a Communist youth organization between 1932 and 1935, in 1938 he joined the Communist Party of Czechoslovakia (CPC). From 1939 to 1942 he was active in the Communist underground in the Protectorate of Bohemia and Moravia. In 1942 he was arrested by the Gestapo and put in the Buchenwald camp. After his release in May 1945 he returned to his work in the apparatus of the CPC. Elected an MP on behalf of the party in 1946, in 1947 he became minister of domestic trade, and after the Communist coup in February 1948, minister of justice. His marriage to the daughter of Klement Gottwald in July 1948 rapidly enhanced his position in the party leadership. In May 1949 he joined the Central Committee (CC), and in October 1949 he became head of the State Council for Church Affairs. He supervised, for example, the suppression of the Catholic Church. He actually dictated many verdicts in the political trials of opposition leaders, the clergy, and high-ranking army officers.

In April 1950 Čepička was appointed minister of national defense and was promoted to general. In September 1951 he also joined the Secretariat and the Presidium of the CPC CC. Sent to the Kremlin by Gottwald in July 1951, he attended the meeting of the CPSU CC Politburo. At this meeting, it was affirmed that charges against Rudolf Slanský had not been sufficiently proven; nevertheless, it was determined that Slanský had made too many mistakes in personnel policy to remain secretary general of the party. In the fall of 1952 Čepička took part in the party committee that prepared the indictment against Slanský. He was also responsible for many other political cases in the 1950s. In 1953 he became deputy prime minister, and in April 1954, a member of the CPC CC Politburo. After Gottwald's death and especially after the Twentieth Congress of the CPSU in the spring of 1956, his influence began to decline. The leadership of the party, and particularly the first secretary of the CPC CC, Antonín Novotný, decided to make him a scapegoat for Stalinism in Czechoslovakia. Čepička's resignation was to show that the “errors and distortions” had been overcome. On 26 April 1956 he was dismissed from all posts. He assumed a minor position as director of the Bureau for Invention and Standardization, and in 1959 he retired. In April 1963 he was expelled from the party for his role in staging the political trials. However, he was never brought to justice for his judicial crimes. (WR)

Sources: ČBS; Who's Who in the Socialist Countries of Europe (Munich, London, and Paris, 1989); Edward Taborsky, Communism in Czechoslovakia, 1948–1960 (Princeton, 1961); William E. Griffith, ed., Communism in Europe, vol. 2 (Cambridge, Mass., 1966); Jiří Pelikán, The Czechoslovak Political Trials, 1950–1954 (Stanford, 1971).

ČERNÍK Oldřich (27 October 1921, Ostrava–19 October 1994, Prague), Czech Communist activist. A metalworker by trade, Černík joined the Communist Party of Czechoslovakia (CPC) in 1945. In 1964 he graduated from the Higher School of Mining and Metallurgy in Ostrava as an extramural student. He belonged to one of the action committees (akční výbor), carrying out political purges after the February 1948 Communist coup. In 1949–52 he was a worker and secretary of the provincial CPC committee in Ostrava, then secretary general of the provincial CPC committee in Opava, and from 1954 to 1956 he was chairman of the Provincial National Council in Ostrava. In 1956–60 he was secretary of the CPC Central Committee (CC) and then until 1963 minister of fuels and power, deputy prime minister of Czechoslovakia, and head of the State Planning Commission. A member of the CPC CC from 1958 and of its Presidium from 1966, in 1960–69 he was a deputy to the National Assembly, and in 1969–70, to the Chamber of the People of the Federal Assembly.

In the second half of the 1960s Černík was one of the key party reformers. He was a pragmatist, and he was concerned mostly with the economy. During the Prague Spring, on 8 April 1968 he became prime minister of the Czechoslovak government. After the invasion of the Warsaw Pact troops in August 1968, along with other Czechoslovak leaders, he was sent to Moscow for talks with the Kremlin leadership. After three days of negotiations he signed the so-called Moscow Protocol, endorsing the invasion and obliging the CPC to “normalize” the situation. Černík wanted to keep his party and government position at all costs, so he supported the “normalization” line. In August 1969 he ordered the termination of a demonstration on the first anniversary of the invasion, and at a CC meeting in September he revoked his support for the 1968 reforms. Despite all this, his power gradually declined, and on 28 January 1970 he was dismissed from the position of prime minister. For some time he was minister-head of the Federal Committee for Technical and Investment Development. In June 1970 he was deprived of all posts and in 1971 expelled from the CPC. He was one of the directors of a standardization institute in Prague. After the fall of the Communist system, in 1990–91 he chaired the Council of the Union of Towns and Communes. (PU)

Sources: ČBS; Českoslovenští politici: 1918–1991 (Prague, 1991); Kdo byl kdo v našich dějinách ve 20. století, vol. 1 (Prague, 1998); Vladimír V. Kusin, The Intellectual Origins of the Prague Spring: The Development of Reformist Ideas in Czechoslovakia 1958–1967 (Cambridge, 1971); Gordon H. Skilling, Czechoslovakia's Interrupted Revolution (Princeton, 1976); Zaciskanie petli: Tajne dokumenty dotyczące Czechosłowacji 1968 r. (Warsaw, 1995).

ČERNIUS Jonas (6 January 1898, Kupiškis, near Panevėžys–3 July 1977, Claremont, California), Lithuanian general and politician. At the end of World War I Černius joined the Lithuanian army-in-the-making. In July 1919 he was one of the first graduates of the War Academy in Kaunas. He also took part in operations on the front. He supplemented his engineering and military education in Brussels (1929) and Paris (1932). After returning to Lithuania, he was promoted to lieutenant colonel and became head of the technical section of the General Staff. In 1934 he was promoted to colonel and made head of the operations section of the General Staff. He also commanded the War Academy. In 1935–39 he was chief of the General Staff, and afterwards he was promoted to general. From 30 March to 22 November 1939 he was prime minister of the government that took a neutral attitude toward the German invasion of Poland in September 1939, but in October 1939 he accepted a Soviet ultimatum: he agreed to allow Soviet troops into Lithuania in exchange for the incorporation of the Wilno (Vilnius) area into Lithuania. After the Soviet occupation of Lithuania in June 1940 he avoided deportation, and during the German occupation (1941–44) he remained passive. Before the return of the Red Army in the summer of 1944 he left for Germany and later to Great Britain. In 1948 he settled in the United States. (WR)

Sources: EL, vol. 1; Saulius Sužiedelis, Historical Dictionary of Lithuania (Lanham, Md., 1997).

ČERNÝ Jan (4 March 1874, Uherský Ostroh, near Uherské Hradiště–10 April 1959, Uherský Ostroh), Czech politician. Černý graduated in law from the Czech university in Prague in 1898, and in 1899–1908 he worked for the district authorities in Hodonín. From 1908 to 1910 he worked in the Ministry of Social Affairs in Vienna, and then for two years he was head of the Prostějov district. From 1912 to 1918 he was head of the Moravian province in Brno, and from 1920 to 1928, chairman of the land political authority of Moravia. After the administrative reforms and until World War II he was president of the Moravian-Silesian Land. From 15 September 1920 to 26 September 1921 and from 18 March to 12 October 1926

he was prime minister of a clerical government, created in view of problems with the formation of a ruling coalition. Four times—in 1920–22, 1926–29, 1932–34, and in late 1938—he was minister of interior. As prime minister he tried to increase the efficacy of the police and military. His was to become an “iron rod” government, aiming at strengthening the foundations of democracy. With the formation of his first cabinet, representatives of the five strongest parties created a group of “Five” (Pětka), designed to be a body that would formally mediate between the government and the parliament, but it was one that actually made the key decisions. As minister of interior, Černý largely contributed to easing the social tensions and preventing social radicalism in the first years of independent Czechoslovakia and to the introduction of the administrative reform of 1928. In 1939 he retired. (PU)

Sources: ČBS; Českoslovenští politici: 1918–1991 (Prague, 1991); Politická elita meziválečného Československa 1918–1938: Kdo byl kdo za první republiky (Prague, 1998); Kdo byl kdo v našich dějinách ve 20. století, vol. 1 (Prague, 1998).

ČERNÝ Václav (26 March 1905, Jizbice, near Náchod–2 July 1987, Prague), Czech historian and theoretician of literature. After graduating from high school in Nachod and the Carnot Lycée in Dijon, France, in 1928 Černý graduated in Romance and Czech studies in the Philosophy Department of Charles University in Prague. In 1929–30 he taught in a high school in Brno, and then for four years he was secretary of the Institute of Slavic Studies in Geneva. It was there that he received his postdoctoral degree in 1931. From 1934 he lectured at the University of Geneva. After returning home, he taught in a high school in Prague, and until 1939 he was associate professor of Romance literature at Charles University. In 1938–39 he was also professor at Masaryk University in Brno. After all the universities were closed down by the German occupation authorities, from 1939 to 1944 Černý taught in a Prague high school, and (with a break in 1942–45) he edited the monthly Kritický měsíčník. During the Nazi occupation he took part in the domestic resistance, and in 1941–42 he belonged to the National Revolutionary Intelligentsia Committee (Národně Revoluční Výbor Inteligence). From January to May 1945 he was imprisoned by the Germans. From 8 to 11 May 1945 he belonged to the Czech National Council (Česka Národní Rada). From 1945 he was professor of the history of literature at Charles University.

After World War II Černý was active in cultural organizations. He criticized Marxist dogmatism and the abuses of Communist rule, preaching democracy and human rights. After the Communist coup of February 1948 he suffered from various forms of repression. In 1951 he was forced to leave the university, and from September 1952 to April 1953 he was imprisoned without trial. After his release until 1961, he worked in the Institute of Contemporary Philology of the Czechoslovak Academy of Sciences and then until 1968 in its manuscript section. During the Prague Spring he returned to public life, resuming his lectures and advocating reforms and democratization. During the “normalization” he was fired from the university and brutally attacked by propaganda. He cooperated with dissident organizations, and he wrote in samizdat publications and abroad. On 1 January 1977 he was one of the first 242 signatories of Charter 77.

Černý dealt with Czech and European literature. Among other things, he discovered manuscripts of two plays by Luís Calderón in the library of the Mlada Vožica castle. He did research on existentialism and the influence of Henri Bergson’s philosophy on contemporary literature. He authored the following monographs: Ideové kořeny současného umění: Bergson a ideologie současného romantismu (Intellectual roots of contemporary art: Bergson and the ideology of contemporary Romanticism; 1927); První sešit o existencialismu (First notebook on existentialism; 1948); and Druhý sešit o existencialismu (Second notebook on existentialism; 1992); he also wrote Co je kritika, co není a k čemu je na světě (What criticism is, what it is not, and what it is for in this world; 1968). He translated French writers (including Bergson), Spanish writers (Miguel de Cervantes, José Ortega y Gasset), and Italian writers. He published three volumes of important memoirs, Paměti (Toronto, 1977–83; Brno, 1992–94). (PU)

Sources: ČBS; Kdo byl kdo v našich dějinách ve 20. století, vol. 1 (Prague, 1998); Slovník českých filozofů (Brno, 1998); Julius Vanovič, Osobnost Václava Černého: Personalistický portrét (Bratislava, 1999).

CHACIŇSKI Józef (13 March 1889, Warsaw–6 May 1954, Góra Kalwaria), Polish Christian Democratic politician. While in a trade school, Chaciński joined the National Youth Organization (Organizacja Młodzieży Narodowej) and a self-education group rallied around the Catholic magazine Prąd. Arrested in 1909 at a secret youth congress, he spent four months in the Warsaw citadel. Released, he began to study in Switzerland but had to interrupt his studies owing to a lack of funds. From 1912 he worked for the editorial office of Prąd and was active in the Christian Workers’ Association (Stowarzyszenie Robotników Chrześcijańskich [SRCh]). In the same year he graduated from high school in Libawa (Liepaja), and then until 1918 he studied law in Kiev. After his return to Poland he worked in the State Property Board, and in 1920

he served in the Polish Army as a volunteer. A secretary general of the SRCh from 1919, between 1920 and 1922 he co-organized the Christian National Labor Party, which as of 1925 was called the Polish Christian Democratic Party (Polskie Stronnictwo Chrześcijańskiej Demokracji). Between 1927 and 1928 Chaciński was leader of this party. In 1922–30 he was an MP and president of the Christian Democratic parliamentary club. At the beginning of May 1926 he was a candidate for the office of prime minister, but he failed to come to an agreement with President Stanisław Wojciechowski on the appointment of the minister of interior. After the coup of May 1926 he was in opposition, and in 1930 he co-organized the Centrolew opposition bloc. In the 1930s he was mainly involved in running a law firm.

During the Nazi occupation Chaciński was arrested (July 1940) and deported to the concentration camp in Auschwitz. Released at the beginning of 1942, he returned to Warsaw, where, as president of the program commission, he was active in the underground Labor Party (Stronnictwo Pracy [SP]). From the spring of 1943 he was a member of the Program Council of the Christian Democratic Unia. From the beginning of August 1944 he served as president of the SP Executive Committee. He firmly opposed the outbreak of the Warsaw Uprising. After its defeat he left the capital along with the civilian population. Arrested by the NKVD on 28 March 1945 in Pruszków, he was taken to the Lubyanka Prison in Moscow and was sentenced in the Trial of the Sixteen to four months. After returning to Poland, he continued his activities in the SP, but after the party was taken over by pro-Communist splinter groups, he abandoned political activity and worked as a legal adviser in the Governing Board of the City of Warsaw. (WR) Sources: Kunert, vol. 1; Stanisław Łoza, Parlament Rzeczypospolitej Polskiej 1919–1927 (Warsaw, 1928); Karol Popiel, Na mogiłach przyjaciół (London, 1966); Encyklopedia Katolicka, vol. 3 (Lublin, 1979); Jacek Majchrowski, “Stronnictwo Pracy: Działalność polityczna i koncepcje programowe 1937–1945,” Zeszyty Naukowe UJ, 1979, no. 88; Proces szesnastu: Dokumenty NKWD (Warsaw, 1995).

CHAJECKI Bronisław, pseudonym “Boryna” (15 December 1902, Warsaw–5 or 20 December 1953, Warsaw), Polish officer and politician, victim of communism. The son of a railwayman, in 1920, while in high school, Chajęcki fought as a volunteer in the Polish-Soviet war. After graduating from high school in Warsaw and from the Reserve Officers’ School in Ostrów Mazowiecka in 1927, he worked as a teacher. He was also active in scouting and became a scoutmaster. During the defense of Warsaw in September 1939 he was deputy to the civil commissioner, Stefan Starzyński, and he was in charge of the municipal administration in the Warsaw suburb of Praga. Next, he began conspiratorial activities. On behalf of the Christian Democratic organization called Unia, he joined the State Security Corps (Państwowy Korpus Bezpieczeństwa [PKB])—that is, the underground military police—and from August 1942 he was its commander for Warsaw. Taken captive at the end of the uprising, he managed to escape during transport, and he joined the Home Army Kampinos group. In March 1945 he joined the “people’s” Polish Army, and in September 1946 he was demobilized in the rank of captain. He worked in administration and taught in a vocational school in Pruszków. On 11 November 1948 he was arrested by the State Security Office (Urząd Bezpieczeństwa [UB]). After a long and brutal investigation he was sentenced to death on trumped-up charges of cooperation with the Germans. On 20 October 1952 the Supreme Court affirmed the judgment. President Bolesław Bierut did not exercise his right to grant a pardon; therefore Chajęcki was executed. The sentence was quashed in 1958, and Chajęcki was posthumously rehabilitated. (WR)

Sources: Kunert, vol. 1; Centralne Archiwum KC PZPR, 202/II/33, k. 40; Cywilna obrona Warszawy we wrześniu 1939 r. (Warsaw, 1965); Jan Hoppe, “Fragmenty wspomnień,” Więź 1969, no. 4.

CHAJN Leon (3 March 1910, Warsaw–1 March 1983, Warsaw), Polish Communist activist. Chajn was born into a white-collar family. In 1931 he graduated from the Higher School of Journalism, and in 1933, from the Law Department of Warsaw University. Then he worked as a lawyer. From 1932 he belonged to the Communist Party of Poland, and in the late 1930s also to the so-called democratic clubs connected with the extreme left. During World War II he lived in the USSR. In 1941–42 he served in the Red Army, and from 1943 he was active in the (Communist) Union of Polish Patriots (Związek Patriotów Polskich). In the summer of 1944 he was briefly a political officer in the First Polish Army in the USSR. In August 1944 he became deputy head of the Department of Justice of the Polish Committee of National Liberation and then deputy minister of justice of the Communist-controlled Provisional Government (January–June 1945), the Provisional Government of National Unity (June 1945–February 1947), and later in the government of Józef Cyrankiewicz. He was one of the chief organizers of the Stalinist judiciary in Poland. Delegated to the Democratic Party (Stronnictwo Demokratyczne), from March 1945 to July 1961 he was secretary general of its Central Committee, supervising its cooperation with the (Communist) Polish Workers’ Party and from 1948 with the Polish United Workers' Party. In 1944–69 he was a deputy to the Home National Council and to the parliament (Sejm). From March 1949 to November 1952 he was deputy chairman of the Supreme Chamber of Control and later deputy minister of labor and social welfare. From February 1957 to June 1965 he was a member of the Council of State and then, until retirement in March 1976, director of the Supreme Directorate of State Archives. In 1964 he published his memoirs, Kiedy Lublin był Warszawą (When Lublin was the capital), and in 1975, a history of Polish freemasonry, Polskie wolnomularstwo 1920–1938 (Polish freemasonry, 1920–1938). (WR)

Sources: Mołdawa; Marek Łatyński, Nie paść na kolana: Szkice o opozycji lat czterdziestych (Warsaw, 1987); Wacław Barcikowski, W kręgu prawa i polityki (Warsaw, 1988); Krystyna Kersten, Narodziny systemu władzy: Polska 1943–1948 (Poznań, 1990); Andrzej Rzepliński, Sądownictwo w PRL (London, 1990).

CHARLES I Hohenzollern-Sigmaringen (20 April 1839, Sigmaringen–27 September 1914, Sinaia), Prince (10 May 1866–10 May 1881) and King (10 May 1881–27 September 1914) of Romania. Charles was the second son of Prince Karl Anton of the cadet branch of the Hohenzollern-Sigmaringen family and of Josephine Beauharnais of Baden. He received a thorough education at home. In 1857 he began his military career, rising to the rank of lieutenant in the Prussian Royal Guard in 1863. Subsequently, he began historical studies at the university in Bonn, and in his free time he traveled throughout France, Spain, and Africa. He fought in the war against Denmark in 1864, rising to the rank of captain. In 1866 he accepted the offer of the Romanian throne. In a referendum held in April 1866 in Romania 685,000 voters were in favor of his candidacy as prince while 224,000 voted against him. Opting for a foreign ruler, Romania's political elites wanted to avoid domestic conflicts; consolidate the position of the state, which was in the process of liberating itself from Turkish supremacy; and gain full independence. The prestige and support of the royal families to whom the future sovereign was related were also important factors.

Charles fulfilled the requirements. On 30 June 1866 he swore an oath to uphold the new constitution, one of the most liberal in Europe at that time. According to the principle of the three-way division of power, adopted to balance the possible dominance of one institution, the prince shared legislative power with the parliament and executive power with the government. A curial electoral law with property qualifications for members of parliament was introduced. This constitution lasted unchanged for over half a century. In 1869 Charles married Princess Elizabeth of Wied, and, together with his wife, he joined the Orthodox faith. The only child from this marriage, a daughter, Maria, born in 1870, died at the age of four. A dynastic-family agreement signed in 1881 designated Ferdinand, a nephew of Charles, as his successor. As a new figure among the Romanian political elite, Charles was guided by a feeling of duty toward Romania. His rule brought political stability, economic development, and independence to the country. He had good relations with the Romanian political elite, although some politicians accused him of dictatorial leanings. It was only in 1870, during the Franco-Prussian War, that the radical wing of the Liberal Party mobilized the pro-French Romanian public opinion against the prince, who was emotionally linked to Prussia. Under such pressure, he was going to abdicate, but the conservative government did not let this happen. Charles broadened Romania's contacts with other countries. He opened diplomatic missions in Vienna, Berlin, St. Petersburg, and Rome. He brought about a postal convention between Romania and its neighboring countries, and in 1875 his efforts led to the conclusion of a commercial convention with Austria-Hungary. In order to entirely free itself from subordination to Turkey, in 1877, during the Russo-Turkish war, Romania took the side of Russia, turning this war into a struggle for its own independence. After the recognition of Romanian independence by the Berlin Congress in 1878, Charles was crowned king on 10 May 1881.

With Europe about to split into two opposing camps, Charles signed a treaty of alliance with Austria-Hungary, thus placing Romania in the camp of the Central Powers. On the same day, 18 October 1883, this treaty was also signed by Germany. Because this alliance blocked the reincorporation of Transylvania from Hungary, Charles managed to keep it secret, and only a small group of people knew about it. With the outbreak of World War I, unlike most members of the Royal Council, who opted for neutrality, Charles advocated Romanian support for the Central Powers. He encouraged the representatives of the Romanian ethnic minority in Transylvania to remain faithful to Austria-Hungary during the war and to join the Austro-Hungarian Army. Charles died at the beginning of World War I. Soon after his death the leaders of the National Liberal Party called for an alliance with the Entente. (ASK)

Sources: Biographisches Lexikon, vol. 2; Dimitrie A. Sturdza, Charles I, roi de Roumanie: Chroniques, actes, documents, vols. 1–2 (Bucharest, 1899–1904); Paul Lindenberg, König Karl von Rumänien, vols. 1–2 (Berlin, 1923); Marie, Queen of Romania, The Story of My Life (New York, 1934); Joseph Roucek, Contemporary Romania and Her Problems (Stanford, 1932); Michel Sturdza, The Suicide of Europe (Belmont, Mass., 1968); Titu Maiorescu, România regilor, vol. 1 (Bucharest, 1996); Ion Bulei, Scurta istorie a Românilor (Bucharest, 1996).

CHARLES II Hohenzollern-Sigmaringen (15 October 1893, Sinaia–3 April 1953, Lisbon), King of Romania. Charles's father, King Ferdinand, was of German origin, and his mother, Marie, was English. After completing a military high school in Iași, Charles studied history at the university in Bucharest. In the military, he rose to commander of a mountain rifle unit and became the general inspector of the Romanian Navy and Air Force (1920). Intelligent but hot-headed, he was often a victim of his impetuosity and ran into problems in public life. In August 1918 he escaped from the front in Moldavia to Odessa and renounced his rights to the throne to marry Valentina (Zizi) Lambrino, the daughter of a Romanian general. As a successor to the throne, he did not have the right to marry a Romanian. Thus, the marriage to Zizi was a morganatic one, and the son born of this union, Paul, did not have a right to the throne. Under pressure from his parents, Charles agreed to the annulment of his marriage, which was declared null and void by the Supreme Court of Appeals on 8 January 1919. However, in August 1919 he again stated that he was Zizi's husband and the father of her son, and he renounced the throne. In order to break up this marriage, Charles's family sent him to the front at Tisza to fight against the Hungarian Soviet Republic, and later he was sent on a long journey across Europe and then on to Egypt, India, and Japan. Upon his return, he agreed to divorce Zizi, and on 23 March 1921 he married Helen, daughter of King Constantine and Queen Sophie of Greece. From this union his second son, Michael, the future king of Romania, was born (7 November 1921).

However, serious disagreements soon erupted between Charles and his wife, as well as between Charles and his father. Charles wanted to have a greater part in governing the country, and, against his father's will, he tried to remove Ion I. C. Brătianu, who was the head of the National Liberal Party (Partidul Național Liberal [NLP]), from any influence on the institution of the monarchy. Then Charles began to publicly flaunt his relationship with Magda Elene Lupescu, a divorcee whom he had met in 1924. Because of strong anti-Jewish attitudes in the country, the Jewish origins of his mistress turned the relationship into a public scandal. On 28 December 1925 Charles sent yet another declaration in which he renounced his rights to the throne, and this time it was accepted by King Ferdinand and the parliament. Charles was excluded from the royal family, and, under the name Carol Caraiman, he settled with Lupescu in Paris. In 1928 he obtained a divorce from Queen Helen. After the death of Ferdinand in 1927, a regency led by Patriarch Miron Cristea was established since Michael was under age.

Taking advantage of the weak authority of the regency, as well as the conflict between the major Romanian political parties, the National Peasant Party (Partidul Național Țărănesc [NPP]) and the NLP, Charles succeeded in his efforts to gain the throne. In June 1930 he unexpectedly arrived in Romania. He was supported by many prominent politicians, including General Alexandru Avarescu, Constantin Argetoianu, Gheorghe Brătianu, and Nicolae Iorga. He was also supported by some members of the Peasant Party and their leader, Ion Mihalache, and even by the Iron Guard. Charles brought about the resignation of the regency and he got the support of most political circles, which allowed him to become king as Charles II, on condition that he abide by the constitutional system and that he break up with Lupescu. He did not keep any of these promises. He began to establish a dictatorial regime and surrounded himself with the court camarilla, which consisted of favored entrepreneurs and society people. Acting behind the scenes, this group became a new power center. Members of this group had to be accepted by Lupescu. Because of this, Charles alienated members of the NPP and a great part of public opinion. Charles used the tactics of dividing and breaking up political parties and choosing factions and activists, such as Armand Călinescu and Alexandru Vaida-Voievod from the NPP, Ion Duca from the NLP, and the so-called young liberals with their leader, Gheorghe Tătărescu. Initially, Charles favored the Iron Guard because he wanted to discredit the democratic government. However, when it became clear that the Iron Guard was going to implement its totalitarian program, which was in competition with the king's, Charles began to suppress this organization. At the end of 1933 the Iron Guard was outlawed. After the retaliatory assassination of the interior minister and Premier Duca by the Guardists on 29 December 1933, Charles ordered the arrest of many members of the Iron Guard.

On 10 February 1938 Charles staged a coup d'état and introduced an authoritarian regime. He declared a state of emergency and appointed a new cabinet, called the government of national unity, which was led by Patriarch Cristea and which consisted of politicians faithful to Charles. On 10 March 1938 the parliament passed a new constitution, which proclaimed Charles the head of state. The king was to exercise legislative power through the National Representation and executive power through the government. The government was to be appointed by the king and was to report to him. The new constitution sanctioned broad prerogatives of the sovereign in foreign policy, in which Charles had taken a leading role as early as 1936, following the dismissal of Nicolae Titulescu, the minister for foreign affairs. Charles established the Royal Council, which served as an advisory organ and consisted of politicians who supported him. All political parties and trade unions were disbanded, and civil liberties were greatly restricted. Boys aged 7–18 and girls aged 7–21 had to be members of the Homeland Guard, a youth organization established under the command of the king as early as 1934. To secure a social and political base for his regime, Charles established the Front of National Rebirth (FNR), the sole political party, with himself as head.

In foreign policy Charles favored France and Great Britain, recognizing them as guarantors of the Versailles order that had brought Romania great territorial gains. In 1934, he signed the Balkan Entente with Yugoslavia, Greece, and Turkey, a pact added to the anti-Hungarian alliance of the Little Entente. The Balkan Entente was directed against Bulgarian revisionism. Charles based the security of Romania on treaties, since he had no funds with which to strengthen the army. The change of power structures in Europe in the second half of the 1930s forced Charles to improve relations with Germany through the economic treaties of 1936 and 1938 and particularly through the treaty of March 1939, which subordinated the Romanian economy to the Third Reich. Germany insisted that the Fascist Iron Guard join the government, but Charles disposed of his rivals by ordering the liquidation of Iron Guard leaders. Three hundred Guardists, including their leader, Corneliu Zelea-Codreanu, were killed in November and December 1938.

To counter the growing threat to Romania from the USSR and Germany and also from Hungarian and Bulgarian revisionism, Charles decided to reconcile with the political parties and he proposed to include the representatives of the opposition groups into the FNR and the government. However, the NPP and the NLP rejected that proposal. Only the Iron Guard accepted it. Charles ordered a mass release of Guardists from prisons and internment camps. The Guardists signed declarations of loyalty to the royal regime. The FNR was transformed into a uniform Party of the Nation, and all public functionaries, trade union leaders, and company directors were obliged to join it. On 22 June 1940 a decree was issued that provided severe penalties for propaganda and conspiratorial activities aimed at changing the political organization of the state. On 4 July 1940 Charles appointed Ion Gigurtu, a Germanophile, as premier, and he brought Horia Sima, the new leader of the Iron Guard, into the cabinet. On 8 August 1940 anti-Jewish legislation was introduced.

Any attempts at gaining Germany as an ally were shattered by the Molotov-Ribbentrop Pact of 23 August 1939, which isolated Romania in the international arena. The partition of Romania was a consequence of this pact. This partition began with the annexation of Bessarabia and northern Bukovina by the USSR in June 1940, followed by the incorporation of northern Transylvania by Hungary in August and the incorporation of southern Dobruja by Bulgaria in September of that year. This meant bankruptcy and a discredit of Charles' policy, and it gave rise to unrest. The Iron Guard attempted a military coup d'état. Germany insisted on Charles's resignation. In those circumstances, on 6 September 1940, Charles abdicated in favor of his son Michael. However, it was General Ion Antonescu who took power. Soon afterward, along with Lupescu, Charles left Romania. He went to Spain, then on to Cuba in 1941. In 1942 he moved to Mexico. In 1943 he settled in Lisbon, where he died. (ASK)

Sources: Dictionar Enciclopedic, vol. 1 (Bucharest, 1999); The Times, 6 April 1953; Marie, Queen of Romania, The Story of My Life (New York, 1934); Alexander L. Easterman, King Carol, Hitler, and Lupescu (London, 1942); Arthur Gould Lee, Helen, Queen Mother of Romania (London, 1956); Andreas Hillgruber, Hitler, König Carol und Marschall Antonescu (Wiesbaden, 1965); Ghislain de Diesbach, La princesse Bibesco (Paris, 1986); Carol al. II-lea regele României: Însemnări zilnice, vol. 1 (Bucharest, 1995); Ion Bulei, Scurtă istorie a Românilor (Bucharest, 1996).

CHARNETSKYI Mykola (14 December 1884, Semakivci, near Stanisławów [Ivano-Frankovsk]–2 April 1959, Lviv), Greek Catholic bishop. Charnetskyi studied theology in Stanisławów and then in Rome, where in 1909 he earned a Ph.D. He was ordained in October 1909, and in 1919 he joined the religious order of Redemptorists in Zboiska. He lectured at a Stanisławów seminary, and in 1926–31 he worked in various parishes of Volhynia. He also founded a monastery in Kostopol. In 1931 he was appointed apostolic visitor to Catholics of the Byzantine rite in Poland. On 2 February 1931 he was ordained bishop. On 9 October 1939 Archbishop Andrii Sheptytsky appointed him exarch of Volhynia, Podlasie, and Polesie. Until September 1940 he also served as exarch of Belorussia. During the Soviet occupation (1939–41) and the German occupation (after 1941) he was not allowed to go to Belorussia; therefore he served in Lviv. He lectured in philosophy, psychology, and moral theology at a local seminary. On 11 April 1945 he was arrested by the NKVD and was accused of collaboration with the Germans. During the liquidation of the Greek Catholic Church by the authorities of the USSR, on 3 June 1946 the military court sentenced Charnetskyi to five years of labor camp and three years of exile for “the betrayal of the homeland.” He was held in (among other places) Kemerovo, Dubrovlag in the Mordovian ASSR, and Inta. Shortly before the end of his sentence in 1950 he was sentenced to a further ten years of labor camp. In 1956 he was allowed to return to Lviv, where he soon died. On 27 June 2001 Pope John Paul II beatified him at a solemn Holy Mass in Lviv. (WR) Sources: Encyclopedia of Ukraine, vol. 1 (Toronto, 1984); Martirologia ukrainskikh cerkov u chetyriokh tomakh, vol. 2 (Toronto, 1985); Bohdan R. Bociurkiv, The Ukrainian Greek-Catholic Church and the Soviet State (1939–1950) (Edmonton, 1996); Osservatore Romano (weekly edition in English), 2001, nos. 25 and 27.

CHEKHIVSKY Volodymir (19 July 1876, Horokhuvatka, near Kiev—after 1936, USSR), Ukrainian politician and religious activist. Chekhivsky graduated from the Kiev Orthodox Theological Academy, and in 1901–5 he was an inspector of a theological seminary in Kam'yanets Podilsky. In 1906 he was elected to the first State Duma in St. Petersburg. Before World War I he was arrested and spent one year in exile in Vologda. Next, he settled in Odessa and was active in the Ukrainian Hromada and in the Prosvita Society. From 1917 he was editor of Ukrainsko Slovo. He was a member of the Central Committee of the Ukrainian Social Democratic Workers' Party. In 1918 he became president of the Ukrainian Military Revolutionary Committee, which planned to overthrow the regime of Hetman Pavlo Skoropadsky. After the capture of Kiev by the troops created by the supporters of the former Ukrainian Central Rada of the Directorate and after Skoropadsky's flight, between 26 December 1918 and 11 February 1919 Chekhivsky headed the Directorate. He also served as prime minister of the government of the Directorate and as minister of foreign affairs. Under his leadership, on 1 January 1919 the government of the Ukrainian National Republic passed the autocephalia of the Ukrainian Orthodox Church. On 8 January 1919 the nationalization of land was also ordered; however, it was forbidden to divide the land into plots without permission of the authorities. In the face of a very difficult situation on the front, a compromise was sought with the command of the French landing troops, and the Socialist cabinet of Chekhivsky was replaced with a more moderate government. From 1921 he was a member of the Council of the All-Ukrainian Orthodox Church. After the Bolsheviks took power in central Ukraine, he withdrew from political life. On 29 July 1929 he was arrested by the OGPU in connection with the show trial of the Union for the Liberation of Ukraine. On 19 April 1930 he was given a death sentence, which was later commuted to ten years of prison. He served his sentence in Kharkiv and Yaroslavl. In 1933 he was deported to the Solovets Islands, where in 1936 his sentence was prolonged by an additional twenty years of labor camp. He was then transported to camps in the Far East, where he perished. He was the author of theological articles published in the magazine Tserkva i zhyttia, and of the pamphlet Za Tserkvu, Khrystovu hromadu, proty tsarstvu t'my (For the Church, Christ's community, and against the kingdom of darkness). (WR)

Sources: Encyclopedia of Ukraine, vol. 1 (Toronto, 1984); Orest Subtelny, Ukraine: A History (Toronto, 2000); Jan Jacek Bruski, Petlurowcy: Centrum państwowe Ukraińskiej Republiki Ludowej na wychodźstwie 1919–1924 (Kraków, 2000).

CHERVENKOV Vulko (6 September 1900, Zlatitsa–21 October 1980, Sofia), Bulgarian Communist leader. Chervenkov was the son of a noncommissioned officer in the Bulgarian Army. After graduating from a gymnasium in Sofia in 1919, he joined the Communist Party. From 1921 to 1923 he edited the magazine Mladezh. He took part in an unsuccessful Communist uprising in 1923. In 1924–25 he was a member of the Central Committee (CC) of the League of Communist Youth of Bulgaria and was its representative in the military structure of the Bulgarian Communist Party (BCP). After the delegalization of the party in connection with an attempt on the life of Tsar Boris III in 1925, Chervenkov escaped from the country, where he was sentenced in absentia to death. In Moscow he studied at the International Leninist School, from which he graduated in 1928. Between 1928 and 1937 he lectured at the Communist University for National Minorities from the West, and between 1937 and 1938 he was the director of the school. From 1934 to 1935 he worked in the Balkan Secretariat of the Comintern. In 1938–41 he was director of the schools for foreigners of the Comintern's Executive Committee. During World War II he edited the "Khristo Botev" broadcasts of Radio Moscow in the Bulgarian language. In 1937, thanks to his marriage to the sister of Georgi Dimitrov, he joined the inner circle of the Bulgarian Communists in the USSR, and between 1941 and 1944 he belonged to the Foreign Office of the CC of the BCP.

Chervenkov returned to Bulgaria in September 1944 as a member of the Politburo and the secretary of the CC, also becoming minister of culture and science in the government already dominated by the Communists. Between December 1947 and August 1948 he was president of the Committee for Science, Culture, and Art. In 1948 he became secretary general of the Fatherland Front, and on 20 July 1949, deputy prime minister. In this capacity he played a key role in the overthrow and execution of Traicho Kostov. Although he was little known in Bulgaria, Chervenkov enjoyed the strong support of Stalin; therefore after the death of Dimitrov in July 1949 and the death of Vasyl Kolarov in January 1950, he subsequently assumed the highest posts, becoming prime minister on 3 February 1950, president of the Fatherland Front on 3 March, and secretary general of the party on 11 November 1950. He became famous for his swift seizure of power in the Stalinist style and for his brutal methods of government. He dismissed nationalist activists, surrounded himself with newcomers from Moscow, and promoted the younger generation. He supervised the state terror against opponents of the regime and purges in the government apparatus. He was also responsible for the terror accompanying the beginning of the collectivization of Bulgarian agriculture. In a short time he created the cult of his own personality.

After Stalin's death in 1953 Chervenkov announced changes in agricultural policy, though he never carried out his promises. This failure was connected with mounting tension in the countryside, as well as with the fact that Bulgaria had modeled its domestic policies on those of the Soviet Union. At the Sixth Congress of the party in March 1954 the "nationals" gained the majority in the CC, and Chervenkov was induced by the Kremlin to share power according to the principle of "collective leadership." He yielded his post as party leader to Todor Zhivkov, retaining the post of prime minister. However, Zhivkov, his former protégé, quickly built his own political base. The personality cult of Chervenkov was soon abandoned, and in the summer of 1955, when he became ill, rumors of his resignation began to spread. The Twentieth Congress of the CPSU heralded the end of his rule. In the spring of 1956 his opponents in the party executive received the strong support of Nikita Khrushchev; therefore on 17 April 1956 he lost his post as prime minister in favor of Anton Yugov. He resigned in an atmosphere of criticism of the "personality cult." However, he remained in the government as deputy prime minister and minister of education. He also retained his membership in the Politburo of the CC. In the fall of 1958 he headed a Bulgarian delegation to China. While some activists joined in the idea of a Great Leap Forward, in January 1959 Chervenkov criticized the ideological pretensions of the Chinese.

Despite everything Chervenkov remained an orthodox Stalinist. At the Twenty-second Congress of the CPSU he opposed Khrushchev's new "thaw." Khrushchev's personal dislike of Chervenkov brought about his final downfall. In November 1962, at the Plenum of the CC, he was removed from the Politburo and from the CC, and soon also from the party, for his "errors" and for "putting himself above the party." He was especially sharply attacked by Zhivkov. For some time he lived in complete isolation, but in 1969 his party membership was reinstated. However, he did not hold any executive posts. (WR) Sources: Entsiklopediya Bulgariya, vol. 7; Annual Obituary (New Haven, CT, 1980); Vylko Chervenkov (Sofia, 1950); J. F. Brown, Bulgaria under Communist Rule (New York, 1970); L. A. D. Dellin, Bulgaria (New York, 1957); Tasho Tashev, Ministrite na Bylgariia 1897–1999 (Sofia, 1999).

CHERVIKOU Alyaksandr (8 March 1892, Dukarka, near Minsk–16 June 1937, Minsk), Belorussian Communist activist. In 1915 Cherviakov graduated from the Teachers' Training Institute in Wilno (Vilnius). Recruited into the Russian Army in 1916, in 1917 he was one of the organizers of the Belorussian Social Democratic Party. In December 1917 he took part in the First All-Belorussian Congress in Minsk. From 1918 he sided with the Bolsheviks and assumed the position of a political commissar on the southern front. He was commissar for education in the first government of the Lithuanian-Belorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, which emerged in January 1919. In 1920 he presided over the Military-Revolutionary Committee in Minsk and was responsible for the Bolshevik terror in the Minsk region. In 1920–24 he was chairman of the Belorussian Council of People's Commissars (government) and Central Executive Committee, as well as a member of the Central Committee of the Communist Party (Bolsheviks) of Belorussia. He negotiated the peace treaty with Poland in Riga. From 1922 to 1937 he was a member of the Central Executive Council of the USSR. He was engaged in the Beloruthenization of public life in the Belorussian SSR. Belorussian became the only official language in the state and party administration, schools, and cultural and research institutions. During the Great Purge in 1937 he was accused of anti-Soviet and counterrevolutionary activities, and he committed suicide. (EM)

Sources: MERSH, vol. 7; Belarus: Entsiklopedychny davednik (Minsk, 1995); Ivan S. Lubachko, Belorussia under Soviet Rule, 1917–1957 (Lexington, KY, 1972); Vitaut Kipel and Zora Kipel, eds., Byelorussian Statehood (New York, 1988); H. Głogowska, Białorus 1914–1929: Kultura pod presją polityki (Białystok, 1996); Jan Zaprudnik, Historical Dictionary of Belarus (Lanham, Md., 1998).

CHESHMEDZHIEV Grigor (4 March 1879, Peshtera–16 September 1945, Sofia), Bulgarian Socialist activist, advocate, and writer. In 1903 Cheshmedzhiev graduated in law from the Sofia Higher Institute (now Sofia University). He co-founded a Socialist organization in Peshtera in 1899. After the split in the Bulgarian Social Democratic Workers' Party (BSDWP) in 1903, he joined the faction of "broad Socialists." In 1907–8 he was a member of the Executive Committee of the Bulgarian Teachers' Union, and then he worked as a defense attorney in Sofia. As a reserve officer, he took part in the Balkan Wars and in World War I. After the war, he was a member of the top leadership of the BSDWP (united), and until 1934 he belonged to its Central Committee. He represented the right wing of the party, opposing communism and the government of Aleksandur Stamboliyski (1920–23). He supported the coup of June 1923. He was a deputy to the National Assembly from 1919 to 1934. After the coup of May 1934 he backed the policy of the Bulgarian Communist Party, which aimed at creating a united front of the left. He edited the newspaper Tribuna, which promoted this idea, and he insisted on amnesty for political prisoners. He was a member of the leadership of the Civic Committee for the Defense of Political Prisoners and Amnesty (1936–37) and remained in close touch with some Communist leaders.

After the outbreak of World War II Cheshmedzhiev supported the idea of concluding a pact of friendship between Bulgaria and the USSR, and he campaigned in defense of Bulgaria's neutrality. He opposed Bulgaria's accession to the Tripartite Pact. He condemned the passage of the anti-democratic Law for the Protection of the Nation by the National Assembly, and he campaigned in defense of Jews in Bulgaria. In 1940 he initiated an appeal to Prime Minister Bogdan Filov, protesting the sanctions against Bulgarian Jews that were being prepared by the government. The appeal was signed by twenty-one Bulgarian writers. He pleaded the cases of Communists and other people accused under the Law for the Protection of the Nation—for example, in the trial of the “parachutists” (Bulgarian Communists dropped onto Bulgarian territory by USSR planes in 1942). From September 1943 he represented the BSDWP in the illegal National Committee of the Fatherland Front.

After the coup of 9 September 1944 Cheshmedzhiev became minister of social policy in the government of Kimon Georgiev. From November 1944 he was a member of the BSDWP CC. After crypto-Communists took over the leadership of the party in May 1945, he became head of the party that was independent from them—the BSDWP (united). In July 1945 he asked the leader of the British Socialists and Prime Minister Clement Atlee to support the postponement of elections, and he also insisted that the elections be held under international control. In protest against the policies of the government of the Fatherland Front, which was dominated by Communists, on 17 August 1945 Cheshmedzhiev resigned. He began to edit the newspaper Svoboden narod. A month later he died. He authored novels, dramas, and short stories, among them the following: Sinovete na Balkana (The sons of the Balkans; 1926); Moisei: Drama (1939); Politicheski spomeni (Political memoirs; 1988); and Izbrani sychineniia (Selected works, 7 vols.; 1938–41); he also edited many newspapers and magazines. He was also one of the founders of the Union of Bulgarian Writers and was a member of its leadership until his death. (JJ)

Sources: Entsiklopediya Bulgariya, vol. 7 (Sofia, 1996); J. F. Brown, Bulgaria under Communist Rule (New York, 1970); Marshall Lee Miller, Bulgaria during the Second World War (Stanford, 1975); Rechnik na bylgarskata literatura, vol. 3 (Sofia, 1982); Tasho V. Tashev, Ministrite na Bylgariia 1879–1999 (Sofia, 1999).

CHINEZU Tit Liviu (22 November 1904, Huduc [now Maiorești]–15 January 1955, Sighet Marmăției), Romanian Greek Catholic bishop, martyr for the faith. Chinezu studied in Reghin, and he graduated from high school in Blaj. In 1925 he went to study at St. Athanasius College in Rome, where most Romanian Greek Catholic bishops studied. In 1930 he received a Ph.D. in theology and philosophy, and he was ordained. In 1931 he returned to Blaj, where he taught at a high school for boys. In 1937–46 he lectured at the Blaj Theological Academy. In 1947 he was sent to Bucharest, where he became a parish priest. On 28 October 1947, along with most of the Romanian Greek Catholic clergy, he was arrested by the Communist authorities. He was placed in the Neamț Monastery along with twenty-five priests. In 1949 he was moved to the Căldărușani Monastery, converted into a prison, where all the Romanian bishops were held. On 3 December 1949 Bishop Valeriu Traian Frențiu secretly consecrated him there as the bishop of Bucharest. The Communist security service found out about it, and he was falsely accused of collaborating with the anti-Communist guerrillas operating in the Transylvanian mountains. On 24 May 1950, along with other bishops, he was transferred to Sighet Prison in Marmureș. He was held there in extremely harsh conditions. In January 1955 he fell ill. Put in an unheated cell without windowpanes, in two days he died. He was buried secretly at night in an unmarked grave in Săracilor Cemetery. He was never formally tried or sentenced. His beatification case is under way. (LW)

Sources: Józef Darski, Rumunia: Historia, współczesność, konflikty narodowe (Warsaw, 1995); Paul Caravia, Virgiliu Constantinescu, and Flori Stănescu, The Imprisoned Church of Romania, 1944–1989 (Bucharest, 1999); Dennis Deletant, Communist Terror in Romania (New York, 1999); www.bru.ro.

CHIȘINEVSCHI Iosif [originally Ion Roitman] (1905, Bălți–23 September 1964, Bucharest), Romanian Communist activist. Born into a Jewish family from Bessarabia, Chișinevschi graduated from primary school. In 1928 he joined the Communist Party of Romania (CPR), which advocated the secession of Bessarabia from Romania. Imprisoned in Doftana in 1928–30, after his release he went to the USSR, where in 1931, thanks to the support of Béla Kun and Dmytro Manuilskyi, he became a member of the CPR Central Committee (CC). From 1931 he also worked for the NKVD and was considered one of the highest-ranking Soviet Romanian agents. In 1931–33 he studied in the Leninist School in Moscow, also improving his knowledge of the Romanian language. Transferred to Romania in 1933, he reorganized the CPR Propaganda Bureau. From 1933 to 1936 he was imprisoned in Doftana again. Between 1936 and 1940 he was a member of the CPR CC Secretariat and head of the Bucharest committee of the party. In 1941–44 he was imprisoned in Caransebeș and in the Țirgu Jiu camp, with, among others, Gheorghe Gheorghiu-Dej and Teohari Georgescu. In this way he became a member of the new “prison” leadership of the CPR. Released after the coup of 23 August 1944, from September 1944 he was also a member of the CPR CC Politburo.

As head of the Communist propaganda apparatus, in 1944–57 Chișinevschi directed the Stalinization of Romanian culture and supervised the mass media. From 1952 he was also head of the Department of Foreign Relations of the CC of the Romanian Workers’ Party. He took part in the founding conference of the Information Bureau of Communist and Workers’ Parties (Cominform) in Szklarska Poręba in September 1947. He was so trusted by the Soviets that he took part in the meetings of the Soviet delegation. He co-organized the propaganda campaign against Josip Broz Tito and supervised the operations of the political police, Securitate. In May 1951, along with Gheorghiu-Dej and Miron Constantinescu, he discussed the elimination of the group of Ana Pauker, Vasile Luca, and Georgescu in Moscow, and then he implemented this purge along with Soviet advisers in 1952. He also had a key part in the staging of the trial of Lucrețiu Patrașcanu in 1954. After the Twentieth Congress of the Soviet party in February 1956, in which he participated as a member of the Romanian delegation, Chișinevschi tried to make use of the new trend. At a Politburo meeting in early April 1956 he, along with Constantinescu, attacked Gheorghiu-Dej for resisting de-Stalinization. Gheorghiu-Dej’s counterattack resulted in the purge of both from the party leadership on 3 July 1957. By 1961 Chișinevschi had lost all his party positions. From 1962 he worked as director of the Scântea Press. After Nicolae Ceaușescu took over power in 1965, Chișinevschi was posthumously rehabilitated. (FA/TD/WR)

Sources: Ghita Ionescu, Communism in Rumania 1944–1962 (Oxford, 1964); Vladimir Tismăneanu, Arheologia terorii (Bucharest, 1992); Lavinia Betea, Maurer și lumea de ieri: Mărturie despre stalinizarea României (Arad, 1995); Stelian Tănase, Elite și societate în timpul lui Gheorghiu Dej (Bucharest, 1999); Denis Deletant, Communist Terror in Romania: Gheorghiu-Dej and the Police State, 1948–1965 (New York, 1999); Robert Levy, Ana Pauker: The Rise and Fall of a Jewish Communist (Berkeley, 2000).

CHMIELOWSKI Albert [original name Adam] (20 August 1846, Igołomia, near Kraków–25 December 1916, Kraków), Polish painter and monk, saint of the Roman Catholic Church. After graduating from high school, Chmielowski started studies at the Agricultural Institute in Puławy, from where he joined the anti-Russian January Uprising of 1863. He fought in the Stanisław Frankowski unit, was wounded, and lost a leg. In 1865–66 he studied drawing at the Wojciech Gerson School in Warsaw and then painting in Paris and Munich (1869–74). He made friends with the painter Maksymilian Gierymski, Henryk Sienkiewicz, and the actress Helena Modrzejewska (Modjeska). He painted poetic, religious, and symbolic compositions, as well as portraits. His pictures Death of a Suicide, A Dream, and Ecce Homo in particular won him wide recognition. Giving up a promising artistic career, in September 1880 Chmielowski entered the novitiate of the Jesuit Order in Stara Wieś. Because of disease and a mental crisis, in April 1881 he gave up the idea of entering the order. After he recovered, in 1884 he came to Kraków, where he continued painting and cared for homeless beggars. After long hesitation, in 1888 he took vows and the monastic name of Albert. He established a tertiary congregation of Albertine brothers and in 1890 of Albertine sisters. For the next twenty-eight years he worked in the congregation in Galicia, personally involved in nursing the sick and poor in (among other places) a “nestling home” (przysłisko) in the Kraków quarter of Kazimierz, where he died. He was particularly remembered in the Kraków church. He became the hero of a drama by Bishop Karol Wojtyła (later Pope John Paul II), Brat naszego Boga (Brother of our God). He was canonized by John Paul II in 1989. (WR) Sources: PSB, vol. 3; Czesław Lewandowski, C.M., Brat Albert (Kraków, 1927); Ks. Andrzej Szeptycki, Ze wspomnień o bracie Albercie (Kraków, 1934); Maria Morstin-Górska, “Adam Chmielowski, brat Albert: Szkic zyciorysu,” Verbum, 1936; Konstanty Michalski, Brat Albert: Życie i dzieło (Warsaw, 1978); Alicja Okońska, Adam Chmielowski: Brat Albert (Warsaw, 1999).

CHŃOUPEK Bohuslav (10 August 1925, Bratislava-Petržalka–28 May 2004, Prague), Slovak journalist and Communist politician. Chňoupek graduated in economics in Bratislava in 1950, and then he worked as a Communist Party journalist, first on the daily Smena and from 1958 on the Bratislava daily Pravda, whose Moscow correspondent he was from 1960 to 1965. In 1965–67 he was editor-in-chief of the periodical Predvoj, and in 1967–68 he was deputy minister of culture and information. He published collections of his reporting, written in the spirit of Socialist realism. He made his literary debut in 1957 with Dunaj sa končí pri Izmaile (The Danube ends at Izmil). Then he published Komunismus sa začína už dnes (Communism begins today; 1962); Generál s levom (General with a lion; 1974); and Mil’niky (Milestones; 1975). In late 1968 he began to advance rapidly in the party and state structures, in part as a result of his full support for the Warsaw Pact intervention in Czechoslovakia. In 1969 he became a member of the Central Committee (CC) of the Communist Party of Czechoslovakia (CPC), and he was head of central radio broadcasting for a year. In 1970–71 he was ambassador to the USSR, and after his return he was made minister of foreign affairs. He was one of the leaders of the CPC “normalization” policy. In the late 1980s, however, he became an adherent of the Soviet perestroika and its application in Czechoslovakia. Because of his too open support for perestroika, he was dismissed in October 1988. After the Velvet Revolution he retired from political life, and in March 1990 he was excluded from the CPC. Later he published a monograph on Andy Warhol (Andy; 1993) and memoirs, Memoáre in claris (Memoirs Claris; 1998). (PU)

Sources: ČBS; Českoslovenští politici: 1918–1991 (Prague, 1991); Who's Who in the Socialist Countries of Europe, vol. 1 (Munich, London, and Paris, 1989).

CHOJECKI Mirosław (1 September 1949, Warsaw), Polish dissident and editor. Born into a family with a patriotic tradition—his mother was a Home Army soldier—from 1967 Chojecki studied at the Warsaw Polytechnic and in 1968–73, at Warsaw University. In 1974–76 and 1980–81 he worked at the Institute of Nuclear Research in Warsaw. Engaged in opposition activities, in 1968 he took an active part in the student strike at the Warsaw Polytechnic, and in 1975 he gathered signatures for a petition against the amendment of the constitution that stipulated the “leading role” of the Communist Party and the “alliance” with the USSR. After the June 1976 riots he was involved in organizing help for the repressed workers of Ursus and Radom, and then he became a founding member of the Committee for the Defense of Workers (Komitet Obrony Robotników [KOR]). Several times beaten by the police, Chojecki took an active part in the development of underground publishing, mimeographing several publications, including Komunikat and Biuletyn Informacyjny KOR. In 1977, after the demonstrations connected with the murder of Stanisław Pyjas, a student cooperating with the KOR, Chojecki was imprisoned for a few months. In 1977–80 he was head of the independent printing house NOWa, the largest secret press in Poland and in the Soviet bloc. Kept under police surveillance and arrested dozens of times for forty-eight hours, in June 1980 he was falsely accused and sentenced to a year and a half with suspended execution. During the summer 1980 strike in the Gdańsk shipyard Chojecki co-organized independent printing. He became an adviser to Solidarity’s Mazowsze region, where he dealt with publications. In 1981–90 he was abroad, as of 1982 in Paris, where he published the monthly Kontakt and directed a film-making company, Video-Kontakt. From 1991 he was head and owner of the film-making group Kontakt. His attempts to establish Independent Polish Television (Niezależna Telewizja Polska) and New Warsaw Television (Nowa Telewizja Warszawa) were in vain. In 1999–2000 Chojecki was adviser to the minister of culture and national heritage. (PK)

Sources: Andrzej Friszke, Opozycja polityczna w PRL 1945–1980 (London, 1994); Opozycja w PRL: Słownik Biograficzny 1956–1989, vol. 1 (Warsaw, 2000).

CHORNOVIL Viacheslav (1 January 1938, district of Kiev–26 March 1999, Kiev), Ukrainian dissident and politician. Chornovil belonged to the so-called shestidesiatniki, the main group in which ideas of opposition to communism originated between 1960 and 1990 in the Ukraine. A member of the Komsomol, he worked at many Komsomol construction sites. After graduating from the university in Kiev, he started working in Kiev radio and television. He was sent to a trial of cultural activists that was held in 1966 in Lviv, and he began to protest the sentences that were pronounced. On 22 May 1966 he wrote a protest letter to the Central Committee of the Communist Party of the USSR. He refused to testify as a witness at a secret trial of opposition activists. After he lost his job as a journalist, he started working in the Lviv branch of the League for the Preservation of Nature. On 3 August 1967 he was arrested for the preparation and publication of Lykho z rozumu (Woe to the clever), a documentary on the persecutions in the Ukraine, and on 15 November he was sentenced to three years of prison. After his release he did not stop his opposition activities, co-editing Ukrains'kyi Visnyk. After the arrest of Nina Strokata-Karavanska he joined a civic committee for her defense. He was arrested again in 1972 and was sentenced to six years of labor camp and three years of exile. In the labor camp he initiated a struggle for the introduction of the status of political prisoner. In 1979, while in exile, he acceded to the Ukrainian Helsinki Group (UHG), which was demanding a respect for human rights in the USSR.

On the wave of glasnost in the summer of 1987 Chornovil again began to publish Ukrains'kyi Visnyk. He was also active in the reactivated UHG, which was soon transformed into the Ukrainian Helsinki Union. In November 1987 he wrote an open letter to Mikhail Gorbachev in which, appealing to “Leninist principles,” he called for a verification of the national policy that was implemented in the USSR. He was active in the Ukrainian Popular Movement (Rukh). At the Rukh congress in 1989 he was one of the first to speak in support of independence and sovereignty for the Ukraine. In 1990 he became president of the Lviv City Council. Thanks to him, agrarian reform and freedom of speech were introduced. In March 1990 he became a deputy to the Supreme Council of the USSR. In 1991 he spoke in support of the independence of the Ukraine. He ran in the first presidential elections in the Ukraine (1 December 1991), winning 7.4 million votes (23.3 percent) and was runner-up to Leonid Kravchuk. After the elections he advocated that Rukh remain in opposition to President Kravchuk. In December 1992 he became the president of Rukh and led it to transform into a political party. He was elected deputy to the Ukrainian parliament in the elections of 1994 and 1998. Under his leadership Rukh became the most powerful party of the opposition, but its political influence gradually declined. At the turn of 1998/99 a conflict broke out between Chornovil and a group of Rukh activists under the leadership of Yuri Kostenko. The conflict was about tactics for the presidential election in 1999. The party split into two branches: Chornovil's faction and Kostenko's faction. Chornovil was killed in a car crash in the suburbs of Kiev, and the circumstances of the accident are the subject of much speculation. (GM)

Sources: Volodymyr Baran, Ukraina 1950–1960-kh rr: Evolutsiia totalitarnoi systemy (Lviv, 1996); Jaroslaw Hrycak, Historia Ukrainy 1772–1999 (Lublin, 2000); Gorgii Kasianov, Nezhodni: Ukrain's'ka intelihentsiia v rusi oporu 1960–1980-kh rokov (Kiev, 1995); Istoriia Ukrainy (Lviv, 1998).

CHRUŚCIEL Antoni, pseudonym “Monter” (16 June 1895, Gniewczyna Łańcucka, near Przeworsk–30 November 1960, Washington, D.C.), Polish general. From 1909 Chruściel was active in scouting, and after graduating from high school, in September 1914 he was recruited into the Austro-Hungarian Army. He graduated from a noncommissioned officers' school and, in 1915, from a school for reserve officers. From December 1918 he served in the Polish Army. He took part in the fighting on the Polish-Ukrainian front and during the Polish-Soviet war. Afterward he studied law at the University of Lwów (Lviv). In 1929–31 he studied at the Higher Academy of War, and then he was a lecturer there. In April 1932 he became head of the military training course at the Center of Infantry Training in Rembertów, and in 1934–36 he headed a course in the Higher Academy of War. In January 1937 he was appointed deputy commander of an infantry regiment in Lwów, and from March 1938 he commanded a rifle regiment in Brześć (Brest). During the Polish-German campaign of September 1939 he fought in the Piotrków Operation Group within the “Łódź” Army.

After the capitulation of the Modlin fortress he was taken prisoner of war.

At the end of October 1939 Chruściel escaped from a POW camp in Działdowo and returned to Warsaw, where from March 1940 he participated in the clandestine activities of the Union for Armed Struggle (as of 1942, the Home Army—Armia Krajowa [AK]); he was head of its Third Department of Tactics and Training. In October 1940 he became chief of staff and deputy commander and in May 1941 commander of the Warsaw city district. In 1942 he was promoted to the rank of colonel. On the orders of General Stefan Rowecki, the AK commander-in-chief, at the end of 1942 Chruściel made contact with Jewish fighters in the Warsaw Ghetto. He was co-responsible for the decision to start the Warsaw Uprising on 1 August 1944. During the fighting, on 14 September, he was appointed brigadier general and on 20 September, commander of the Warsaw AK corps. In view of the illness of General Tadeusz Komorowski, he was the de facto commander of the uprising. After its fall he was taken prisoner of war and deported to Germany. After the liberation by the American troops, in 1945 Chruściel went to London, where from July to September 1945 he was second deputy chief of staff of the Polish Armed Forces (Polskie Siły Zbrojne [PSZ]) in the West; then until November 1947 he was deputy chief of staff and chief of the Main PSZ Liquidation Commission. After demobilization Chruściel was active in war veteran organizations. In 1955–56 he planned to return to Poland, but he could not, since the Communist authorities had deprived him of Polish citizenship in 1946. He settled in Washington, D.C., where he died. He was buried in the Polish cemetery in Doylestown, Pennsylvania. He authored Powstanie Warszawskie (The Warsaw Uprising; 1948). (JS)

Sources: Kunert, vol. 1; Zbigniew Mierzwiński, Generałowie II Rzeczypospolitej (Warsaw, 1990); Tadeusz Kryśka-Karski and Stanisław Żurkowski, Generałowie Polski Niepodległej (London, 1976); Henryk Piotr Kosk, Generalicja polska: Popularny słownik biograficzny, vol. 1 (Pruszków, 1998); Koniec polskiego państwa podziemnego (Łódź, 1987); Marek Łatyński, Nie paść na kolana: Szkice o opozycji lat czterdziestych (London, 1985); Marek Ney-Krwawicz, Komendanci Armii Krajowej (Warsaw, 1992).

CHRZANOWSKI Wiesław (20 December 1923, Warsaw), Polish lawyer and politician. During the German occupation, from 1940 Chrzanowski was active in the Youth of Great Poland and from 1942, in the National Party (Stronnictwo Narodowe). He was a soldier of the National Military Organization and of the Home Army (Armia Krajowa), and he fought in the Warsaw Uprising of 1944. He studied at the secret School of Law of Warsaw University and graduated from the Jagiellonian University in Kraków in 1945. In 1945–46 he belonged to the (Christian Democratic) Labor Party (Stronictwo Pracy), and from 1945 he worked as an assistant professor at Warsaw University and at the Warsaw School of Economics (Szkola Główna Handlowa). In 1946 he became chairman of the Odnova (Revival) Christian Youth Union. In 1947–48 he edited the weekly Tygodnik Warszawski. Arrested by the Communist authorities in 1948, he was sentenced to eight years in prison. Released in 1954, in 1956 he was rehabilitated. In 1957 he co-founded Start, the Young Intelligentsia Club, which was not registered by the authorities. From 1957 to 1960 he completed the requisites to become a lawyer but was denied bar registration. From 1960 he was a legal adviser to the Warsaw consumer cooperative Mokotów, and from 1972 he worked in the Cooperative Research Institute. After receiving his postdoctoral degree, from 1980 to 1988 he was associate professor and from 1988 full professor. From 1982 he lectured at the Catholic University of Lublin, where he also held the chair of civil law, and in 1987–90 he was deputy dean of the Department of Canon and Lay Law.

In 1965–81 Chrzanowski belonged to an informal group of advisers to the Primate of Poland, and in the second half of the 1970s he was active in the democratic opposition, mostly with the Young Poland Movement (Ruch Młodej Polski). A member of Solidarity from 1980 and the union's plenipotentiary in the registration procedures before the Provincial and Supreme Courts, he was adviser to the National Commission of Solidarity. In 1981 he became deputy chairman of the Program Board of the Center for Social and Professional Work of the Solidarity National Commission. From 1981 to 1984 he was a member of the Social Board of the Primate of Poland and his representative in the negotiations with the authorities on the establishment of the Church Agricultural Foundation. In 1982 he co-authored Tezy Prymasowskiej Rady Społecznej w sprawie ugody społecznej (Theses of the Social Board of the Primate of Poland on the social agreement). He cooperated with the Catholic press. In December 1988 he refused to join the Civic Committee of the chairman of Solidarity, Lech Wałęsa. He joined it in 1990, after its leadership changed, and in October 1990 he became its treasurer and member of the Presidium. In October 1989 he was co-founder and became chairman of the Main Board of the Christian National Union (Zjednoczenie Chrześcijańsko-Narodowe [ZChN]). From January to November 1991 Chrzanowski was minister of justice and prosecutor general in the government of Jan Krzysztof Bielecki. In 1991–93 he was MP and speaker of the Lower House (Sejm). From 1994 he was chairman of the ZChN Supreme Council. He authored many books and articles, mostly abroad and in the uncensored press, such as Rzecz o obronie czynnej (On active defense; 1977) and Więźniowie polityczni w Polsce w latach 1945–56 (Political prisoners in Poland, 1945–56; 1983), as well as several works in law. In 1997 he published an extensive interview book Pół wieku polityki, czyli rzecz o obronie czynnej (Half a century of politics, or on active defense). (AF)

Sources: Kto jest kim w Polsce (Warsaw, 2001); Opozycja w PRL: Słownik biograficzny 1956–89, vol. 1 (Warsaw, 2000); Antoni Dudek, Pierwsze lata III Rzeczypospolitej 1989–2001 (Kraków, 2002).

CHUBAR Vlas (22 February 1891, Fedorivka, Yekaterinoslav district–26 February 1939, Kiev?), Ukrainian Communist activist. In 1911 Chubar graduated from a technical high school. He took part in the 1905 revolution, and in 1907 he joined the Russian Social Democratic Workers' Party. He worked in factories in Kramatorsk, Maryupol, Kharkiv, Petrograd, and Moscow. During the Bolshevik Revolution in 1917 he was commissar of the revolutionary committee (revkom) of the Chief Command of Artillery in Petrograd. In 1918–19 he chaired the management of engineering factories and was a member of the Supreme Council of the National Economy. From December 1919 he was active in the Ukraine, organizing reconstruction of local industry. At the end of 1920 he became chairman of the Ukrainian Supreme Council of the National Economy (Wyshcha Rada Narodonoho Hospodarstva), and from December 1921 he presided over the Chief Administration of the Coal Industry of the Donbas Region. After the dismissal of Khristyan Rakovski in July 1923, Chubar became chairman of the Council of People's Commissars of the Ukrainian SSR. He proclaimed himself to be against spokesmen of Ukrainian "national communism," such as Oleksandr Shumskiy, Mykola Khvylovyi, and Mykola Skrypnyk. Chubar introduced the Stalinist line of accelerated industrialization, but he resisted an accelerated collectivization of agriculture and the imposition of overly high grain quotas on the Ukrainian republic. As a result, in 1934 he was dismissed and appointed deputy chairman of the Council of People's Commissars of the Soviet Union. He was the first Ukrainian included in the Politburo of the Central Committee of the All-Russian Communist Party (Bolsheviks). In 1937 he became minister of finance but later in the same year was arrested, and two years later he was shot without a trial. (BB)

Sources: Encyclopedia of Ukraine, vol. 1 (Toronto, 1984); Dovidnyk z Istoriyi Ukraïny (Kiev, 2001); Malyi Slovnyk Istoriyi Ukraïny (Kiev, 1997); Hryhory Kostyuk, Stalinist Rule in the Ukraine (New York, 1960); Trokhim M. Kolyak, Vlas Yakovlevich Chubar: Zhizn i dyeyatelnost (Kiev, 1981).

CHVALKOVSKÝ František (30 July 1885, Jílové, near Prague–25 February 1945, Berlin), Czech politician and diplomat. Chvalkovský studied law at the Czech university in Prague (1903–8) and then in Berlin and London. In 1911–13 he was director of the legal department at the Kraków branch of the Živnostenska Banka. He later worked as a lawyer. From 1918 to 1920 he was personal secretary to the interior minister, Antonín Švehla, and until 1921 he served as head of the political department in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. He took part in the peace negotiations with the Hungarians in Trianon. In 1921 he became ambassador to Japan and later to the United States. Between 1925 and 1927 he was the Agrarian Party deputy to the National Assembly. He resigned his seat after he was appointed ambassador to Germany. He stayed at the diplomatic mission in Germany for five years, and then he served as ambassador to Italy until 1938.

In post-Munich Czecho-Slovakia, Chvalkovský assumed the post of minister of foreign affairs and was an advocate of cooperation with Germany and Italy. He participated in the so-called Vienna Award of 2 November 1938, by which the foreign ministers of Germany and Italy granted a part of the Slovak lands and a part of Subcarpathian Ruthenia to Hungary. He hoped for a compromise with Germany. He considered the reports that warned about Hitler's plans against Czechoslovakia, supplied by František Moravec, the head of special services, as "figments of the imagination." His hopes of maintaining good relations with Germany fell apart when, on 21 January 1939, during his talks with Ribbentrop and Hitler, he heard a series of accusations against Czechoslovakia and demands placed on it. However, in an attempt to maintain the existence of his country, on 22 February 1939 he sent a letter asking for a guarantee that the borders of post-Munich Czecho-Slovakia would remain. This guarantee would be an implementation of the Munich agreement. However, as a result of Hitler's objections, Chvalkovský's attempts were in vain. On the night of 14–15 March 1939, along with President Emil Hácha, Chvalkovský participated in the negotiations with Hitler and Ribbentrop in Berlin, where, under brutal pressure, both he and Hácha signed the act that "put the fate of the Czech nation and the Czech people into the hands of the Führer of the German Reich." Chvalkovský informed Prime Minister Rudolf Beran by phone about the German plans to march into the territory of the republic, insisting that the Czecho-Slovak troops offer no resistance. During World War II Chvalkovský represented the Protectorate of Bohemia and Moravia in Berlin. He was killed during the American air raid of Berlin. (PU)

Sources: ČBS; The International Who's Who (London, 1935); Vojtech Masny, The Czechs under Nazi Rule (New York and London, 1971); Českoslovenští politici: 1918–1991 (Prague, 1991); Politická elita meziválečného Československa 1918–1938: Kdo byl kdo za první republiky (Prague, 1998); Kdo byl kdo v našich dějinách ve 20. století, vol. 1 (Prague, 1998).

CHYHIR Mikhail (24 May 1948, Usovo, near Kopylsk), Belorussian politician. In 1970 Chyhir graduated from the Belorussian State Institute of National Economy and in 1982 from the Moscow Financial Institute. In 1982–86 he was director of the Minsk branch of the National Bank of the USSR, and between 1988 and 1994 he held various managerial positions in Belorussian republican banks. For instance, he was chairman of Belagroprombank. On 21 July 1994 he was asked by the newly elected president, Alyaksandr Lukashenka, to become prime minister. At the end of 1994 Chyhir was accused by MP Sergey Antonchik of corruption, but he continued as head of government until 18 November 1996, when he resigned in protest against a referendum that was aimed at strengthening the position of President Lukashenka. In 1998–99 Chyhir was managing director of the European CEA concern in Moscow. He ran as a candidate for president in the May 1999 elections announced by the Supreme Council, which was no longer recognized by Lukashenka. During the campaign, at the end of March 1999, he was arrested and accused of embezzlement during his term as prime minister, and on 19 May 2002 he was sentenced to three years in prison. In 2001 he tried to run for president, but he lacked the one hundred thousand signatures required by electoral law. (EM)

Sources: Jan Zaprudnik, Historical Dictionary of Belarus (Lanham, Md., 1998); Siergiej Owsianik and Jelena Striełkova, Władza i społeczeństwo: Białoruś 1991–1998 (Warsaw, 1998).

CHYKALENKO Yevhen (9 December 1861, Pereshory, Kherson Province–20 June 1929, Prague), Ukrainian social worker and politician. Born into a rich landowner's family, during his studies in natural science at Kharkiv University Chykalenko belonged to the radical followers of Mykhailo Drahomanov. In 1884 he was arrested and spent the next five years under police surveillance on the family estate in Pereshory. Management of the estate gave him broad agricultural experience. It was then that he wrote a five-volume handbook in agronomy, Rozmowy pro selske khozyaystvo (Discourse on agrarian economy; 1897). From 1900 he lived in Kiev, where he financially supported Ukrainian cultural initiatives. He was probably the richest Ukrainophile in the Russian Ukraine before World War I. He sponsored the publication of a Russian-Ukrainian dictionary (1893–98) and an award for the best history of Ukraine, and he offered pay to writers publishing in the periodical Kiyevskaya starina. He also supported the aid fund for writers of the Taras Shevchenko Scholarly Society and a dormitory for Ukrainian students studying in Lemberg (Lviv, Lwów). Although he was not a man of the left, he also helped the radical Lviv periodical Selnany. He took part in various Ukrainian political initiatives—for instance, the so-called Old Hromada (from 1900) and the Ukrainian Democratic Radical Party (from 1905). He was de facto president of the Association of Ukrainian Progressives (Tovarystvo Ukraiinskykh Postupovtsiv). He was the first publisher of Ukrainian dailies in the Russian part of the Ukraine—Hromadskiy Holos (1906) and Rada (1906–14). For fear of arrest, during World War I he stayed in Finland, Petrograd, and Moscow, far from the front lines. When he came to East Galicia in January 1919, he was interned by the Polish authorities. From 1920 he lived in Rabenstein, Austria. He belonged to the founders and lecturers of the Ukrainian Economic Academy in Podiebrady, Czechoslovakia. He published his memoirs, Spohady (Memoirs, 3 vols.; 1925–26), and Szczodennyk 1907–1917 (Diary 1907–1917; 1931). His daughter, Hanna Chykalenko-Keller, and son, Levko Chykalenko, were active participants in the Ukrainian revolution in 1917–20 and then organizers of the Ukrainian émigré community in Germany. (TS)

Sources: Encyclopedia of Ukraine, vol. 1 (Toronto, 1985); Dmytro Doroshenko, Yevhen Chykalenko: Yoho zhyttia i hromadska diyalnist (Prague, 1934).

CHYTILOVÁ Věra (2 February 1929, Ostrava), Czech film director. In the late 1940s Chytilová studied architecture for two years, and then she worked as a draftsman and laboratory assistant in, among other places, the Barrandov film studios. In 1962 she graduated from the Film and TV Department of the Academy of Musical Arts in Prague. During her studies she had already attracted attention with her medium-feature films Zelená ulice (Green Street; 1960) and Strop (Ceiling; 1961). In the 1960s she was one of the main representatives of the Czechoslovak “new wave” of filmmakers who rejected Socialist realism and sought new means of expression. She made her feature film debut with O něčem jiném (On something else; 1963), a semi-documentary on two entirely different contemporary women; in it she introduced a feminine perception of the world into Czechoslovak filmmaking. In her movie Sedmikrásky (Daisies; 1966), which brought her international renown, she showed, in a grotesque way, two girl heroines living empty and artificial lives. In the 1970s and 1980s she made satirical films presenting society and politics in the period of “normalization.” As an artist of the “new wave” she faced serious problems in realizing these projects. Her best movies of this period include the following: Ovoce stromů rajských jím (Fruit of paradise; 1970); Panelstory (1979); Kalamita (Calamity; 1981); Faunovo velmi pozdní odpoledne (Very late afternoon of a faun; 1983); and Kopytem sem, kopytem tam (With a hoof here, with a hoof there; 1988). After the fall of communism Chytilová directed Dědictví aneb Kurvahošigutntag (The inheritance or fuckoffguysgoodbye; 1992) and Pasti, pasti, pastičky (Traps, traps, little traps; 1998). She also made outstanding documentaries, such as Praha, neklidné srdce Evropy (Prague, the anxious heart of Europe; 1984) and TGM, Osvoboditel (Tomaš Garrigue Masaryk, the Liberator; 1990). In 1994–98 she was a member of the Prague City Council. (PU)

Sources: ČBS; Kdo byl kdo v našich dějinách ve 20. století, vol. 1 (Prague, 1998); Šárka Bartošková and Luboš Bartošek, Filmové profily (Prague, 1986); Jerzy Płażewski, Historia filmu 1895–2000 (Warsaw, 2001); International Dictionary of Films and Filmmakers, vol. 2 (Chicago and London, 1991); Geoffrey Nowell-Smith, The Oxford History of World Cinema (Oxford, 1996); Jean Loup Passek, ed., Dictionnaire du cinéma (Paris, 1991); www.hollywood.com/celebs/bio/celeb/1677987.

CHYZHEVSKYI Dmytro (4 April 1894, Oleksandria, near Kherson–18 April 1977, Heidelberg), Ukrainian philosopher and theorist of literature. Born into a poor family of landowners of Cossack descent, in 1911 Chyzhevskiy enrolled at St. Petersburg University, intending to complete mathematical and astronomical studies. Having attended the lectures of the outstanding Russian philosophers Alexandr Vvedensky and Nikolai Lossky, he changed course, and from 1913 to 1919 he continued philosophical and philological studies in Kiev. At that time he was already an avowed Marxist. In 1916 he was arrested for his affiliation with the Social Democratic faction of the Mensheviks, but thanks to the February 1917 revolution, he regained his freedom. In 1917 he was elected to the Ukrainian Central Council (Rada, UCR). On 22 January 1918, at the forum of the UCR, he voted against the independence of the Ukrainian People’s Republic. After the failure of the Kiev campaign in 1920 Chyzhevskiy stayed for a short time in Poland. At the beginning of 1921 he became assistant professor in the Philosophy Department at Kiev University. However, in the summer of the same year he left the Ukraine to continue his studies in Germany.

During the next few years Chyzhevskiy attended the lectures of (among others) Karl Jaspers, Martin Heidegger, Edmund Husserl, and Heinrich Rickert.

From 1924 he was a lecturer and then a professor at the Ukrainian Higher Pedagogical Institute; from 1929 he also worked at the Ukrainian Free University in Prague, and from 1930, at the Ukrainian Scientific Institute in Berlin. From 1932 he lectured on literature and Slavonic languages at the university in Halle, and from 1935 he also gave lectures at the university in Jena. He maintained intensive contacts with Russian émigré intellectuals. He opposed the Nazi government. He spent the war in Halle, not allowed to leave the town. In 1945 he started to teach courses in Slavic philosophy in Marburg. However, in 1949 he went to the United States at the invitation of Harvard University. Disappointed with the possibilities for further scholarly development overseas, he returned to Germany in 1956 and became chair of Slavic studies at the University of Heidelberg. There he directed the Slavic Institute, one of the major centers for Slavic studies research in Western Europe. He continued his work in the institutions of the Ukrainian diaspora: the Ukrainian Free University in Munich (1945–49, 1956–63) and the Orthodox pedagogical academy (1945–49). He also organized a Ukrainian free academy of sciences in Augsburg. He was a full member of the Heidelberg Academy of Sciences and the Croatian Academy of Sciences in Zagreb, and he belonged to the Hegelian society and the Kantian society.

Chyzhevskiy's publications include over nine hundred items in the history of literature, literary criticism, philology, philosophy, and esthetics. His particular research interests were Ukrainian philosophy and literature (especially of the Middle Ages and the Baroque), literature, and the comparative intellectual history of the Slavs. He derived the specificity of Ukrainian philosophy from Ukrainian emotionality, sentimentality, and lyricism; a tendency toward spiritual solitude; harmony between the external and internal worlds; a desire for order and peace; and tolerance in the sphere of ethics. Chyzhevskiy was discoverer of many of the manuscripts of Jan Ámos Komenský. He left the following works (among others): Logika (Logic; 1924); Filosofia na Ukraïni (Philosophy in the Ukraine; 1926); Narysy z istorii filosofii na Ukraïni (An outline of the history of Ukrainian philosophy; 1931); Ukraïns'kyi literaturnyi barok (The Baroque in Ukrainian literature, 3 vols.; 1941–44); Istoria ukraïns'koi literatury: Vid pochatkov do doby realizmu (History of Ukrainian literature: From the beginning to the end of realism; 1956); History of Russian Literature from the Eleventh Century to the End of the Baroque (1960); Comparative History of Slavic Literatures (1971); Skowroda: Dichter, Denker, Mystiker (Skorowoda: Poet, thinker, and mystic; 1974); and A History of Ukrainian Literature (1975). (TS)

Sources: Encyclopedia of Ukraine, vol. 1 (Toronto, 1984); I. V. Ohorodnyk and V. V. Ohorodnyk, Istoriia filosofskoi dumky v Ukraïni (Kiev, 1999).

ČIČ Milan (2 January 1932, Zákamenné, Dolný Kubín district), Slovak post-Communist lawyer and politician. In 1961 Čič graduated in law from the university in Bratislava, and then he worked there as assistant professor in 1961–64 and 1967–72, as associate professor in 1972–79, and later as full professor. From 1977 to 1987 he was chair of criminal law. From 1987 he was a member of the Slovak Academy of Sciences and director of its Institute of State and Law. In 1989–92 he worked in the Czechoslovak Academy of Sciences, dealing with criminal law and criminology. He published, among other things, Československé trestné právo ako súčasť trestnej politiky (Czechoslovak criminal law as a part of penal policy; 1976); Teoretické otázky československého trestného práva (Theoretical problems of Czechoslovak criminal law; 1982); and academic textbooks. In 1961–90 he belonged to the Communist Party of Czechoslovakia. From 1964 he worked in the Slovak Secretariat of Justice, and after the federalization and formation of the Slovak government, he was deputy minister of justice (1969–70) and minister of justice (1988–89) of the Slovak Socialist Republic.

After the Velvet Revolution, in December 1989 Čič became prime minister of the Slovak government and deputy prime minister of the Czechoslovak government. He held these positions until the first free parliamentary elections of June 1990, in which he ran on behalf of the movement Public against Violence (Verejnost' proti Nasiliu [VPN]) and won a seat in the Chamber of the People of the Federal Assembly. After the VPN split in the spring of 1991, he joined the (Populist) Movement for a Democratic Slovakia (Hnutie za demokratické Slovensko [HZDS]) of Vladimir Mečiar. With the elections of 1992 Čič was a deputy in the Chamber of Nations, deputy prime minister, and minister-chairman of the Federal Office for Competition in the government that was to dissolve the Czechoslovak federation. After the formation of sovereign Slovakia in January 1993, he formally left the HZDS, and in March 1993 he became chairman of the Slovak Constitutional Tribunal. From 2000 he was deputy chairman of the small Party of the Democratic Center (Strana Demokratického Středu). In December 2001 he ran for head of Bratislava Province in the first Slovak local elections, but he lost. (PU)

Sources: ČBS; Kdo byl kdo v našich dějinách ve 20. století, vol. 1 (Prague, 1998); Jan Rychlík, Rozpad Československa: Česko-slovenské vztahy 1989–1992 (Bratislava, 2002); Eric Stein, Czecho/Slovakia: Ethnic Conflict, Constitutional Fissure, Negotiated Breakup (Ann Arbor, 1997); wtd.vlada.cz/scripts/detail.php?id=588.

CIEPLAK Jan (17 August 1857, Dąbrowa Górnicza–17 February 1926, Passaic), Polish Catholic archbishop. The son of a miner, Cieplak attended high school and seminary in Kielce, and then he studied at the Theological Seminary in St. Petersburg (1878–82). Ordained in July 1881, he began to work at this academy, lecturing in biblical archaeology, liturgy, and moral theology. In 1901 he earned a Ph.D. in theology. He contributed to the Encyklopedia Kościelna (Church encyclopedia). In 1900 he was appointed honorary canon and then regular canon of the chapter in Kielce. In June 1908 he was consecrated auxiliary bishop of the Mahilyow (Mogilev) diocese, the largest in the world, comprising the majority of Russia's territory. Substituting for Metropolitan Apolinary Wnurowski, who was ill, between April and September 1909 Cieplak made a great visitation to Siberia. He got as far as Sakhalin, baptizing and confirming thousands of people from Catholics communities. In June 1910, on the orders of the new metropolitan, Archbishop Wincenty Kluczyński, Cieplak visited the diocese of Minsk, and in September 1911, that of central Russia. His homilies aroused Catholic spirit and patriotism among Poles. Therefore, as a result of denunciations accusing Cieplak of acting against the Orthodox Church, the Russian government dismissed him from all government-related posts and deprived him of a government-funded salary. The authorities also opposed the appointment of Cieplak to the post of rector of the Theological Academy in St. Petersburg. After the resignation of Archbishop Kluczyński, on 6 August 1914 Cieplak was made apostolic administrator of the Mahilyow archdiocese. When in December 1917 the Pope appointed Edward Ropp as archbishop, Cieplak delegated his powers to Ropp.

Under the religious freedom that followed the February 1917 revolution, Cieplak not only provided pastoral and charity services to the faithful, but he also worked for the Liquidation Commission (Komisja Likwidacyjna) for the Congress Kingdom of Poland (Królestwo Polskie), and he published a lot. When the Bolshevik authorities arrested Archbishop Ropp and then forced him to leave for Poland, Cieplak resumed the post of apostolic administrator of the Mahilyow diocese. In April 1919, in recognition of his merits, the Holy See granted him the title of titular archbishop of Achrida. Cieplak was harassed by the Bolsheviks and not allowed to pursue his pastoral duties. He was arrested on Good Thursday 1920 but was soon released. In view of Soviets decrees ordering the nationalization of churches and the confiscation of valuables, as well as cult objects, and forbidding the teaching of religion to children and youth, Cieplak delegated Prelate Konstanty Budkiewicz to Moscow to conduct talks with the authorities. In June 1922 both were arrested, and along with a dozen or so other priests they were tried in an ill-famed Moscow trial on 21–25 March 1923. Cieplak and Budkiewicz were sentenced to death. Owing to the publicity the case received all over the world, Cieplak's sentence was commuted to ten years. However, Cieplak was not informed about it; instead he was taken to Lubyanka, where he expected execution. Budkiewicz was executed by firing squad. Without being informed about anything, Cieplak was transported to the Latvian border and was left there. In April 1924 he left Riga and arrived in Warsaw. Then he went to Rome, where he informed Pope Pius XI about the situation of the church in Russia. In October 1925 Cieplak visited Polish parishes in the United States. In December of that year he learned about his appointment to the post of metropolitan of Vilnius. However, he did not live to assume the post because he died of pneumonia in the United States. (WR)

Sources: PSB, vol. 4; Francis McCullagh, Bolshevik Persecution of Christianity (London, 1924); Franciszek ks. Rutkowski, Arceybiskup Jan Cieplak (Warsaw, 1934).

CIMOSZEWICZ Włodzimierz (13 September 1950, Warsaw), Polish post-Communist politician. The son of a Communist intelligence officer, in 1972 Cimoszewicz graduated in law from Warsaw University, where he also received a Ph.D. in international law in 1977 and later worked as assistant professor. During his studies he was active in the Union of Socialist Youth, and in 1973 he became head of the Warsaw University organization of the Association of Polish Students. From 1971 to 1990 he belonged to the Polish United Workers' Party (Polska Zjednoczona Partia Robotnicza [PZPR]). In 1980–81 he worked as a Fulbright scholar in the United States. In view of his independent views, in 1985 he entered into conflict with the authorities of the PZPR Warsaw Provincial Committee and moved to Kalinówka Kościelna, near Białystok, where he ran a farm.

In June 1989 Cimoszewicz was elected to the Lower House (Sejm) on behalf of the PZPR. After its dissolution in January 1990, he presided over the post-Communist Parliamentary Club of the Democratic Left, although he formally stayed out of the Social Democracy of the Polish Republic (Sojaldemokracja Rzeczypospolitej Polskiej [SdRP]). It was only in 1999 that he joined the Democratic Left Alliance (Sojusz Lewicy Demokratycznej [SLD]). In the presidential elections of 1990 he ran as a candidate of the post-Communist camp but gained only 9.2 percent of the vote. After the parliamentary elections of October 1991 he refused to preside over the SLD club in protest against the presence of Leszek Miller, who was accused of illegal operations connected with the so-called Moscow loan for the SdRP. In 1992 Cimoszewicz was included in the so-called Antoni Macierewicz list as an agent of Communist military intelligence, but he was cleared by the Lustration Court in 2001. As an MP, he accused the Roman Catholic Church of attempts to clericalize Polish politics. He also criticized limitations on the right to abortion. Having gained wide popularity in post-Communist circles, after the elections of September 1993 Cimoszewicz became deputy prime minister and minister of justice. In this capacity he issued a list of politicians who had violated anti-corruption legislation, including some post-Communists. From February 1995 to February 1996 he was deputy speaker of the Sejm. Before the presidential elections of November 1995 he discouraged Aleksander Kwaśniewski from running, but in the end he supported Kwaśniewski as head of his electoral staff. After Kwaśniewski won, Cimoszewicz took over the presidency of the constitutional commission of the parliament.

On 7 February 1996 Cimoszewicz became prime minister of the government, based on a coalition of the SLD and the Polish Peasant Party. During his term the coalition suffered from serious tensions. In view of a conflict over agricultural policy, in August 1996 the Peasant Party suggested recalling Cimoszewicz as head of government, but later it withdrew the motion. The Cimoszewicz government introduced a reform of the administration and, as a result of the May 1997 referendum, a new constitution. Cimoszewicz's accusation of neglect, aimed at peasants who had failed to insure their farms, destroyed by a huge flood, was widely publicized and became one of the reasons for the relative failure of the ruling post-Communists in the elections of September 1997 and the resignation of his cabinet in October 1997. Until 2001 Cimoszewicz was an MP on behalf of the SLD, and after the victorious elections of September 2001 he became minister of foreign affairs in the Miller government. Cimoszewicz played an important role in the negotiations on the Polish entry into the European Union and in the elaboration of a strongly pro-American stance after the terrorist attacks of 11 September 2001 and the participation of Polish troops in the war in Iraq in 2003. (AG)

Sources: Wielka encyklopedia PWN, vol. 6 (Warsaw, 2002); Janusz A. Majcherek, Pierwsza dekada III Rzeczypospolitej 1989–1999 (Warsaw, 1999); Antoni Dudek, Pierwsze lata III Rzeczypospolitej 1989–2001 (Kraków, 2002); Wojciech Roszkowski, Historia Polski 1914–2001 (Warsaw, 2002); Bugajski; www.msz.gov.pl/, info.onet.pl/1064428,artykul.html, euro.pap.com.pl/cgi-bin/ludzie.pl?ID=154.

CINCAR-MARKOVIĆ Aleksandar (1889, Belgrade–1952), Serbian diplomat. The son of a general and Serbian prime minister, Cincar-Marković graduated from high school in Belgrade, and in 1911 he graduated in law in Freiburg and Berlin. Later he received a Ph.D. in France. From 1918 he worked as a secretary in the Foreign Ministry. As personal secretary to Nikola Pašić, he took part in the Paris Peace Conference in 1919. He was also secretary general of the delegation to the Rapallo conference, where the Kingdom of Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes (SHS) signed the peace treaty with Italy in 1920. From June 1921 he was the SHS consul in Zadar (then Italian), and from July 1921, in Trieste. He was the first secretary and then councillor of the legation to Albania (July 1923–May 1925); he headed the Balkan section of the Foreign Ministry (1925–26); then he was chargé d'affaires in Budapest (from June 1926), councillor of the legation in Paris (until the fall of 1926), in Sofia (from May 1927), in Vienna (from August 1928), and again in Paris (from 1930). In 1934–35 he was the SHS legate to Bulgaria and then to Germany (1935–39).

In February 1939 Cincar-Marković became minister of foreign affairs in the government of Dragiša Cvetković. On 5 September 1939 Yugoslavia declared neutrality, but Cincar-Marković did not hide his sympathy for Poland and France. Until February 1941 the Cvetković government was reluctant to join the Tripartite Pact, but in view of growing German pressure, it succumbed. Cincar-Marković held talks on this matter. He obtained positive German answers to the questions of whether Yugoslav territorial integrity would be respected, whether Yugoslavia would be free from pressure to allow German or Italian troops to enter it, and whether Yugoslavia could count on support for its claims to the port of Salonika. Despite street demonstrations under the slogan “Better death than the pact,” on 25 March 1941 in Vienna Cvetković and Cincar-Marković, in Hitler's presence, signed the Tripartite Pact. The Yugoslav government thought it had saved the country from war, but on the night of 26–27 March it was toppled by a bloodless coup led by Dušan Simović. On 6 April Germany attacked Yugoslavia. On 17 April, Cincar-Marković, as a representative of the Yugoslav General Staff, signed an armistice, meaning capitulation. During the war and under Communist rule he remained in Yugoslavia but played no role. (AO)

Sources: Jacob B. Hoptner, Yugoslavia in Crisis, 1934–1941 (New York, 1962); Dragiša N. Ristić, Yugoslavia's Revolution of 1941 (Stanford, 1966); Johann Wuescht, Jugoslawien und das Dritte Reich (Stuttgart, 1969); Michał J. Zacharias, Jugosławia w polityce Wielkiej Brytanii 1940–1945 (Wrocław, 1987); www.mfa.gov.yu/history/Ministri/ACincarmarkovic_s.html.

CIOŁKOSZ Adam (5 January 1901, Kraków–1 October 1978, London), Polish Socialist politician, journalist, and historian. From 1911 Ciołkosz was a scout activist; between 1918 and 1920 he was a soldier in the Polish Army, and in 1921 he took part in the Third Silesian Uprising. He graduated in law from the Jagiellonian University and completed the School of Political Sciences in Kraków (1923). In 1921–24 he was an initiator and theoretician of the leftist Free Scouts. From 1921 he belonged to the Polish Socialist Party (Polska Partia Socjalistyczna [PPS]), and in 1928 he was elected to the parliament. In 1930 he was one of the activists of the center-left opposition (Centrolew) who were imprisoned in the fortress of Brześć. In 1933 he was sentenced to three years in prison, of which he served one year. From 1931 he was a member of the Chief Council of the PSP; in 1931–33 and from 1937 he was a member of its Central Executive Committee. From 1936 Ciołkosz was also head of the PPS unit in Lesser Poland (Małopolska). An opponent of collaboration with the Communists, he advocated cooperation with the Socialist parties of the national minorities, especially with the Bund.

After the September defeat of 1939 Ciołkosz fled from occupied Poland to France. He joined the Foreign Committee of the PPS, and until 1945 he belonged to the National Council of the Polish Government-in-Exile. In 1941–42 he was a member of the Committee of Ministers for Home Affairs and maintained radio communication with the leadership of the underground Polish Socialist Party—Freedom, Equality, Independence at home. He cooperated with the leadership of the Labor Party, published on Polish issues in the party's periodicals, and belonged to the committee preparing reconstruction of the Socialist International. Ciołkosz criticized the governments of General Władysław Sikorski and Stanisław Mikołajczyk for insufficiently clear programs for social change after the war and for too compliant a policy toward the USSR. He was active in publicizing information about Nazi crimes in Poland to the Anglo-Saxon world, including information about the extermination of Jews.

In 1945 Ciołkosz condemned the Yalta decisions and remained in Great Britain. He was one of the main leaders of the PPS in exile and of the Polish émigré community. In 1946–57 he was president of the PPS in Great Britain; from 1946 to 1959 he was editor-in-chief of the monthly Robotnik Polski, and in 1957–59 he was president of the Central Council of the PPS. From 1949 he took part in the works of the Socialist International and was a member of the committee preparing its Frankfurt program in 1951. From 1949 he was in the Political Council, one of the three main centers of Polish emigration, and he directed its Department of Foreign Affairs. After the unification action of Polish political émigrés in 1954, at the beginning of 1956 Ciołkosz became the head of the Executive of National Unity (ENU), which served as the government-in-exile. In that capacity he conducted talks in the U.S. Department of State in 1956 and set forth a program for the neutralization of Central Europe. He backed projects of extensive economic assistance for Poland. He firmly defended the inviolability of the border along the Oder and Neisse Rivers. Skeptical toward the prospects of thaw in the Polish People's Republic, he fell into conflict with the majority of the PPS in exile and was removed from the party in 1960. He reconstructed an alternative organization of the PPS, was its head until 1977, and represented it in inter-party bodies of the Polish émigré community. In 1963–66 he was again the president of the ENU.

Ciołkosz was the author of several books, a dozen or so brochures, hundreds of articles, and radio programs broadcast on Radio Free Europe. His work Zarys dziejów socjalizmu polskiego (An outline of the history of Polish socialism, 3 vols.), which he wrote with his wife Lidia, has been one of the most important achievements of emigration historiography. His publications were characterized by his attachment to the principles of socialism, in opposition to communism; the recognition of democracy as a condition for Socialist transformation; an emphasis on the traditions of the PPS; opposition to conciliatory tendencies toward the Communist authorities in Poland, as well as toward Soviet imperialism; distrust of the German; and a struggle against nationalism. Ciołkosz was involved in attempts at Polish-Jewish dialogue and cooperated with magazines published by the Bund. He frequently referred to his extensive historical knowledge. (AF)

Sources: Słownik biograficzny działaczy polskiego ruchu robotniczego, vol. 1 (Warsaw, 1978); Posłowie i senatorowie, vol. 1; D. Urzyńska, Polski ruch socjalistyczny na obczyźnie w latach 1939–1945 (Poznań, 2000); Andrzej Friszke, Paweł Machcewicz, and Rafał Habielski, Druga wielka emigracja 1945–1990, vol. 3 (Warsaw, 1999).

CIORAN Emil (8 April 1911, Rășinari, Transylvania–20 June 1995, Paris), French writer and philosopher of Romanian descent. Cioran was of the opinion that it was best for an intellectual to have no national affiliation. In 1921 he went to high school in Sibiu, and in 1928–32 he studied at the Department of Philosophy and Literature of the University of Bucharest. In 1933 he made his literary debut with Pe culmile disperării (On the heights of despair; 1992), which earned him an award for young writers from the Royal Academy in 1934. In the 1930s he sympathized with the (Fascist) Legion of the Archangel Michael, which later became the Iron Guard. In 1933–35 he worked as a Humboldt Fellow at the University of Berlin. After returning to Romania, in 1936–37 he taught philosophy at a high school in Braşov. In 1937 he was sent by the French Institute in Bucharest to France to continue his doctoral studies. He enrolled in the Sorbonne in Paris, but for the next ten years he traveled throughout France without a clear purpose. In 1940 he was a cultural attaché at the Romanian Embassy in Paris. After World War II and the Communist takeover in Romania, he decided to stay in France for good.

In 1949 Cioran published his first work in French, Précis de décomposition (Short history of decay; 1975). As a result, he was proclaimed one of the leading prose writers and thinkers in France. Later he published fifteen books in French in various styles—usually collections of essays, short texts, and aphorisms. His most important works include the following: Syllogisme de l'amertume (Syllogism of bitterness; 1952); La Tentation d'exister (1956; Temptation to Exist, 1968); Historie et Utopie (1960; History and Utopia, 1987); La Chute dans le temps (1964; Fall into Time, 1970); Le Mauvais Demiurg (The evil demiurge; 1969); and L'inconvénient d'être né (1973; Trouble with Being, 1976). His “philosophy of despair” resulted from his dissent with Christianity. In masterful style he combined existentialism with atheism. From this point of view he analyzed the problem of evil, human nature, and the lack of sense in history. Many times he refused to accept awards. At the end of his life he ceased to write, arguing that he had always thought creativity a kind of therapy that liberated one from anxiety and emotions. After the fall of the Nicolae Ceauşescu regime in Romania (December 1989) Cioran was elected (along with Eugene Ionesco) honorary member of the Association of Romanian Writers. His books began to appear in Romania in the 1990s, but he never returned there. (LW)

Sources: Dictionar Enciclopedic (Bucharest, 1993); Wielka encyklopedia PWN, vol. 6 (Warsaw, 2002); Georgescu Vlad, Istoria Românilor de la origini pînă în zilele noastre (Oakland, 1984); Sylvie Jaudeau, Cioran ou le dernier homme (Paris, 1990); The Temptations of Emile Cioran (New York, 1997); Patrice Bollon, Cioran, l'hérétique (Paris, 1997); Simion Ghinea, Mircea Eliade si Emil Cioran în tinerete (Bucharest, 1998); Aleksandra Gurzinska, ed., Essays on E. M. Cioran (Costa Mesa, Ca., 1999).

CIORBEA Victor (26 October 1954, Ponor), Romanian politician and trade union activist. Ciorbea graduated in law from Cluj University in 1979. In 1979–84 he worked as a judge in Bucharest, specializing in civil cases. From 1981 to 1989 he belonged to the Romanian Communist Party but held no positions in it. In 1984–88 he was civil prosecutor in the General Prosecutor's Office. From 1984 to 1990 he was assistant professor and then lecturer at the School of Law of the University of Bucharest, and he received a Ph.D. in civil and commercial law. After the fall of the Nicolae Ceauşescu regime in December 1989 Ciorbea engaged in trade union activities. From 1990 to 1996 he was chairman of the Federation of Free Trade Unions of Teachers, and in 1990–96, chairman of the National Confederation of Free Trade Unions of Romania (Confederația Națională Sindicatlor Libere din România [CNSLR]), in opposition to the ruling post-Communists. In 1992 he studied management at Case Western Reserve University in Cleveland, Ohio. From 1993 to 1996 he was a member of the Executive Committee of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions, and in 1990–96 he represented Romanian trade unions in the International Labour Organization.

In 1996 Ciorbea ran for mayor of Bucharest on behalf of the Christian Democratic National Peasant Party (Partidul Național Țărănesc-Creștin Democrat [CDNPP]), a part of the Democratic Convention of Romania (Convenția Democratică din România [DCR]), and he won. Also in 1996 he joined the CDNPP, and after the DCR won the parliamentary elections, on 12 December 1996 Ciorbea became prime minister of a government based on a coalition of the DCR, the Social Democrats, and the Hungarian minority. In 1997 he was elected deputy chairman of the CDNPP. Thanks to a high level of social confidence, he could start economic reforms, but after a year he lost the support of the Social Democrats. As a result of a conflict within the CDNPP, Ciorbea left it, lost the support of the DCR, and had to resign on 30 March 1998. At the same time he gave up the position of mayor of Bucharest. In 1999–2000 he headed the small National Christian Democratic Alliance (Alianța Națională Creștin Democrată [NCDA]). In 2000 his party joined the restored Democratic Convention of Romania 2000, including the center and right-wing parties, but the coalition failed to reach the required threshold to get into the parliament. In 2001 the NCDA joined the CDNPP, and Ciorbea was elected its chairman. (LW)

Sources: Józef Darski, Rumunia: Historia, współczesność, konflikty narodowe (Warsaw, 1995); Ion Alexandrescu, Ion Bulei, Ion Mamina, and Ioan Scurtu, Enciclopedia de istorie României (Bucharest, 2000); Duncan Light and David Phinnemore, Post-Communist Romania (New York, 2001), Bugajski; www.rulers.org; www.ijs.si.

CIOSEK Stanisław (2 May 1939, Pawłowice, near Radom), Polish Communist and post-Communist activist. Born into a white-collar family, in 1959 Ciosek joined the Polish United Workers' Party (Polska Zjednoczona Partia Robotnicza [PZPR]), and in 1961 he graduated from the Higher Economic School in Sopot. From 1960 he was active in the Association of Polish Students (Zrzeszenie Studentów Polskich [ZSP]). In 1963–66 he was secretary of the Executive Committee; from 1966 to 1969 he was vice-president, and in 1969–73, president of the ZSP Main Board. At the same time he advanced in the party apparatus. From 1971 he was a deputy member of the PZPR Central Committee (CC), and in 1972–85 he was an MP. From 1973 to 1975 he was president of the Main Board of the Federation of Socialist Unions of Polish Youth. In 1975–80 he was first secretary of the provincial PZPR committee in Jelenia Góra, and in February 1980 he became a member of the PZPR CC. At the Ninth Extraordinary PZPR Congress in July 1981 he was dropped from the CC. From November 1980 to November 1985 he was minister for contacts with trade unions, and he took part in several negotiations with the leaders of Solidarity (1980–81). From March 1983 to May 1984 he was minister of labor, wages, and social affairs; in 1985–86 he was head of the Social and Legal Department of the PZPR CC, and from 1986 to 1989 he was head of the Commission for Law, Order, and Moral Health of the PZPR CC. A close aide of General Wojciech Jaruzelski, on the latter's request in 1987–88 Ciosek, along with Jerzy Urban and General Władysław Pożoga from the Ministry of Interior, prepared special confidential assessments of the political situation and stressed the necessity of far-reaching systemic reforms. In 1988 Ciosek belonged to the key PZPR negotiators with the Catholic Church and the opposition. He took part in confidential talks in Magdalenka, near Warsaw, which led to the roundtable agreements. From 1986 Ciosek was again a member of the PZPR CC, and in 1986–89 (with a short break in 1988) he was secretary of the PZPR CC. In 1988 he was a deputy member and then a member of the PZPR CC Politburo until January 1990, when the party was dissolved. In 1989–90 he headed the Commission of Law and Order and the Commission of Information Policy of the PZPR CC. From 1990 to 1995 he was ambassador to the USSR (from 1991 to Russia). From 1997 he was foreign policy adviser to President Aleksander Kwaśniewski. (PK)

Sources: Mołdawa; Andrzej Paczkowski, "Nastroje przed bitwą," Zeszyty Historyczne, 1992, no. 100; Jan Skórzyński, Uгода i rewolucja: Władza i opozycja 1985–1989 (Warsaw, 1995); Polska 1986–1989: Koniec systemu, vols. 1–3 (Warsaw, 2002).

ČIURLIONIS Mikolajus Konstantinas (22 September 1875, Varėna–10 April 1911, Pustelnik, near Warsaw), Lithuanian composer and painter. The son of an organist from Druskininkai, Čiurlionis learned to play many instruments in his childhood, showing great talent. From 1882 to 1893 he attended the school of Prince Michał Ogiński in Plungė, and then he left for Warsaw, where he studied at the conservatory under the direction of (among others) Adolf Sygietyński and Zygmunt Noskowski. He was also interested in nature, in the history of literature, and in art. During his studies he composed the cantata De Profundis, two sonatas, and short pieces for the piano. After graduating from the conservatory, he decided to earn a living by giving private lessons and to continue his creative endeavors. In 1901 his symphonic poem In the Forest won a prize in a competition organized by the Zamoyski family. Thanks to the financial support of Prince Ogiński, Čiurlionis studied at the Leipzig Conservatory (1901–2) and also at the Academy of Fine Arts in Warsaw (1904–6). After the Russian revolution of 1905 he returned to Lithuania and devoted himself to his creative work. From 1906 to 1907 an exhibition of his works was held in Vilnius, where he was a member of the Lithuanian Art Society and a conductor of the Rūta Choir. This exhibition made a great impression. Transformed folk motifs were the substance of his second exhibition in Vilnius (Wilno) in March 1908. In the fall of 1908 Čiurlionis left for St. Petersburg, where he joined a circle of artists known as Mir Isskustva (World of Art). He enjoyed the recognition of critics but lived in poverty, and as a result of overwork he developed a mental illness. He was treated in a sanatorium near Warsaw, where he died. He was buried at Rossa Cemetery in Vilnius.

Despite his short life, Čiurlionis left a vast legacy, considered neo-Romantic. Many of his 250 compositions are assessed today as pioneering contributions to Lithuanian symphonic music. His most famous works include a string quartet (1902); a symphonic poem and piano series under the same title, The Sea (1907 and 1908); and numerous collections of songs and miniatures based on folk motifs. He also left around three hundred paintings from the series The Creation of the World, The Deluge, Silence, Music of the Forest, The Funeral, and several others. His works also include engravings, sketches, and book covers. His paintings, deeply rooted in his experience of his native landscape, were characterized by a transition from realistic symbolism to mystical symbolism. In independent Lithuania, between 1924 and 1925 a special gallery was built in Kaunas, where his works were exhibited. Later, his works were moved to Vytautas the Great Museum of Culture, which became the State Museum of Arts during the Soviet period. In 1913 Georgy I. Sedov, a polar explorer, named the mountains on the coast of Franz Joseph Land after Čiurlionis. (WR)

Sources: EL, vol. 1; The Dictionary of Art, J. Turner ed., vol. 7 (London, 1996); P. Galaunė, ed., M. K. Čiurlionis (Kaunas, 1938); N. Vorobiev, M. K. Čiurlionis: Der litauische Maler und Musiker (Kaunas, 1938); A. Rannit, "M. K. Čiurlionis: The First Abstract Painter of Modern Times,” Lituanus, 1957, no. 3; Alfred E. Senn, Mikolajus Konstantinas Čiurlionis: Music of the Spheres (Newtonville, Mass., 1986); Vytautas Landsbergis, Zodžio kūryba: Mikalojus Konstantinas Čiurlionis (Vilnius, 1997).

CLEMENTIS Vladimir (20 September 1902, Tisovec, Slovakia–3 December 1952, Prague), Czechoslovak Communist activist. After completing a gymnasium in Skalica, Clementis studied in Germany and France; then he graduated from Charles University in Prague, where he obtained a Ph.D. in law. In 1925 he joined the Communist Party of Czechoslovakia (CPC). In 1927 he became head of a society that sought rapprochement with the USSR. In the 1930s he ran a law practice in Bratislava and organized Communist cells in Slovakia. In 1935–38 he was an MP representing the CPC in the parliament. In May 1939 he went via Poland to Paris. In the fall of 1939 he criticized the Molotov-Ribbentrop Pact, so he was expelled from the party for his “incomprehension of the situation” in Europe. In the summer of 1940 he left for London, where after 1941 he wrote pro-Soviet articles under the pseudonym of “Peter Hron.”

At the beginning of 1945 Clementis returned to Czechoslovakia, was again admitted to the party, and soon became a member of its Central Committee. In April 1945 he assumed the post of deputy prime minister in the Košice government, and after the Communist coup in February 1948 he became minister for foreign affairs. On 29 June 1945 in Moscow he signed a treaty under which Subcarpathian Ruthenia was ceded to the USSR. After the elections of May 1946, when the Communists strengthened their position in the coalition government of Klement Gottwald, Clementis supported the Kremlin’s standpoint regarding the rejection of the Marshall Plan by Czechoslovakia in July 1947. He also opted for the incorporation of the area west of the Olza River (Zaolzie) and the Kłodzko Valley into Czechoslovakia, and this led to a conflict with Poland. On the wave of anti-Titoist and anti-Semitic purges, in March 1950 Clementis was deprived of his post, and in January 1951 he was arrested. Tortured during investigations, in November 1951 he was sentenced to death in the trial of Rudolf Slansky and comrades and was executed. In 1963 he was rehabilitated, and his membership in the party was restored to him posthumously. His publications include Usmerňované Slovensko (Slovakia on the right track; 1942); Medzi nami a Mad’arami (The Czechoslovak-Hungarian relationship; 1943); Odkazy z Londyna (The legacy of London; 1947); Naše zahraniční politika (Our foreign policy; 1947); and letters from prison published in Daleko od Teba (Far away from you; 1964). (WR)

Sources: SBS, vol. 1; Artur London, The Confession (New York, 1970); Artur London, On Trial (London, 1970); Zdenka Halotfková and Viliam Plevza, Vladimir Clementis (Bratislava, 1968); Jiří Pelikán, The Czechoslovak Political Trials, 1950–1954 (Stanford, 1971); Stefan Drug, Vladimir Clementis: Život a dielo v dokumentoch (Martin, 1993).

COANDĂ Constantin (5 March 1857, Craiova–4 April 1932, Bucharest), Romanian general and politician. After graduating from high school, Coandă studied at the Paris Polytechnic. He graduated from it in 1877 and from the Saint-Cyr Military Academy in Fontainebleau in 1891. He fought in both Balkan Wars (1912–13). In 1913–16 he was chief inspector of the Romanian Army and then briefly its commander-in-chief. Later he was a representative of the Romanian Army to the Russian high command. In May 1918 he was a member of the delegation for talks on a separate peace treaty with the Central Powers in Bucharest. On 6 November 1918 he became prime minister at a turning point when, because of the decay of the Habsburg monarchy and the weakening of Germany, the government of Alexandru Marghiloman, supported by the Central Powers, resigned. The Coandă cabinet declared war on Austria-Hungary and Germany, so German troops started withdrawing from Romania. On 28 November Romanians from Bukovina resolved to join the Old Kingdom and were followed by the Romanians gathering in Transylvania on 1 December. After the return of King Ferdinand I and his court from Iași to Bucharest, on 14 December 1918 Coandă resigned. In 1919 he joined the People’s Party (Partidul Poporului) of General Alexandru Avarescu. In 1919–20 he a member of the Romanian delegation to the Paris Peace Conference and to the negotiations that led to the signing of the peace treaty with Hungary in Trianon. On 9 November 1919 in Paris he signed the minority treaty of the League of Nations, which allowed for the Entente’s final acceptance of Romanian territorial acquisitions. From March to July 1926 he was minister of industry, and from August 1926 to June 1927, minister without portfolio in the Averescu government. In 1920–21 and 1926–27 he was speaker of the Senate. His son, Henri Coandă, designed the Concorde aircraft in France. (FA/WR)

Sources: R. W. Seton-Watson, A History of the Roumanians (Hamden, CT, 1963); Șerban N. Ionescu, Who Was Who in Twentieth Century Romania (Boulder, Colo., 1994); Keith Hitchins, Romania 1866–1947 (Oxford, 1994).

ÇOBA Ernesto M. (16 February 1913, Shkodër–8 January 1980, Tirana), Albanian Catholic archbishop, Jesuit, victim of communism. Çoba studied at the theological seminary in Shkodër, and then he studied theology in Tirana and Rome. In February 1936 he was ordained, and then he taught religion in the seminary and in Catholic schools in Shkodër. After the arrest of Reverend Mikel Koliqi, Çoba was the local parish priest. Consecrated on 20 April 1952 as a bishop and the apostolic administrator of the Shkodër diocese, after the death of Bishop Bernardin Shllaku in 1956, Çoba became ordinary archbishop of Shkodër. In 1951, as secretary of the episcopate, he negotiated a new legal status of the Catholic Church in Albania with the Communist authorities. As the new archbishop of Shkodër, he became, according to tradition, the head of the Albanian church. Contrary to Communist policy, he maintained contacts with the Holy See through the Italian legation in Tirana. His term in office coincided with the harshest period of the “cultural revolution” of the 1960s. In view of an intensifying anti-religious campaign, Çoba could not protect church property from nationalization. In 1965 he was summoned by the local structures of the Democratic Front several times and learned about the takeover of other churches, which were then turned into youth clubs. He was also informed about a ban against the use of bells during religious celebrations and about a limitation on baptisms to be performed only in the area of archbishops residence. When in 1967 all religious institutions were finally outlawed, Çoba tried to intervene with the local authorities and with the Office of the Council of Ministers, but in vain. When all churches in Shkodër were closed down, he celebrated the Holy Mass in private homes. During one of these celebrations he was seriously beaten by the political police. Arrested on 3 April 1976, he was sentenced to twenty-five years in prison for maintaining contacts with a foreign country (the Vatican), and he died in the prison hospital. Before 1990 it was thought that he had been killed in Ballsh Prison after celebrating the Holy Mass. (TC)

Sources: State Archives in Tirana, Durrës Archdiocese Collection; Brian Curdy and Lulash Dajçi, “Bishop Ernest Coba, Father of the Poor: The 10th Anniversary of Martyrdom,” Albanian Catholic Bulletin, 1989; Nogaj Ndoc Dom, Kisha Katolike Shqiptare 1944 mentor 1990: Humbje dhe fitore (Shkodër, 1999); Simoni Zef, “Përsekutimi i kishës katolike në Shqipëri nga 1944–1990,” in Krishtërimi ndër shqiptarë: Simpozium Ndërkombëtar (Shkodër, 2000).

CODREANU-ZELEA Corneliu (13 September 1899, Iași–30 November 1938, Bucharest), leader of the Romanian Fascists. Codreanu-Zelea’s mother was of German origin and his father of Polish origin. He was brought up and educated in Iași, a town with a Jewish majority and where anti-Semitic attitudes were strong. From his youth he remained under the influence of the nationalistic theories of Alexandru Cuza. Codreanu-Zelea studied law at the university in Iași and then in France and Germany. He began his political career at the University of Iași, gaining popularity with his radical anti-Bolshevik and anti-Semitic slogans in 1919. He declared absolute loyalty toward the Orthodox Church, condemned the corruption of the administration, and expressed a dislike of capitalism and a mystical faith in the peasantry. In 1924 he shot the prefect of Iași, who had tried to suppress the activities of nationalistic fighting squads. Released after a short imprisonment, he became convinced that “the atrocities of the Jewish-Bolshevik revolution” should be answered by similar methods—that is, the use of terror. He maintained that in prison he had had a vision: the Archangel Michael had instructed him to revive the Romanian nation. Therefore in 1927 he organized the Legion of the Archangel Michael, which became the Iron Guard in 1930.

The Guardists, who planned to gain absolute power, used nationalistic, anti-Semitic, and mystical-religious slogans. They conducted pogroms in Cluj, Oradea, Hunedoara, and other towns. Liberal and peasant governments unsuccessfully attempted to prevent the development of the movement, which, especially during the Great Depression, became very influential. At the beginning of December 1933 the authorities outlawed the activities of the Iron Guard, and on 29 December the Guardists murdered Premier Ion Duca. King Charles II used the Iron Guard as an instrument in his fight for full power, although he did not trust it. In 1934 Codreanu-Zelea introduced the slogan “All for the fatherland.” His fighting squads, wearing green shirts and carrying small bags of Romanian soil, began to terrorize the streets. On 20 March 1935 Codreanu-Zelea officially registered a new party, called All for the Fatherland, and made General Gheorge (Zizi) its leader. Under that new name the Iron Guard continued its activities even after it had been declared illegal. The All for the Fatherland Party was successful in the elections of December 1937, gaining over 15 percent of the vote. In 1938 Codreanu-Zelea stated, “Let us destroy the Jews before they are able to destroy us.” Charles II felt threatened by the Iron Guard, and on 15 April 1938 he imprisoned its leaders, including Codreanu-Zelea, who was sentenced to ten years in prison. On the night of 29–30 November Codreanu-Zelea, along with twelve other prisoners, was murdered; according to the official explanation, “they were shot while trying to escape.” That incident worsened relations between Romania and the Third Reich, which supported the Iron Guard. Codreanu-Zelea was the author of Die Eiserne Garde (The Iron Guard; 1939) and other works. (WR)

Sources: Biographisches Lexikon, vol. 1; Eugen Weber, “The Men of Archangel,” Contemporary History, 1966, no. 1; Nicholas M. Nagy-Talavera, The Green Shirts and the Others: A History of Fascism in Hungary and Romania (Stanford, 1970); Alexander E. Ronnett, Romanian Nationalism: The Legionary Movement (Chicago, 1974); Tadeusz Dubicki and Krzysztof Dach, Żelazny Legion

Michala Archaniola (Warsaw, 1996); Zigu Ornea, The Romanian Extreme Right (Boulder, Colo., 1999).

ČOLAKOVIĆ Radoljub (7 June 1900, Bijeljina–1983?), Yugoslav Communist activist from Bosnia. Čolaković graduated from high school in Sarajevo. During trade studies in Zagreb, he joined the Communist Party of Yugoslavia (CPY). In 1921 he was sentenced to twelve years in prison for taking part in the assassination of the minister of interior, Milorad Drašković. While in prison, he translated Capital by Karl Marx. Released in 1932, he left for the USSR, where in 1933–35 he studied at the Lenin School of the Comintern. Sent to Vienna, he worked there in the CPY émigré headquarters under the pseudonym “Rudi.” In April 1936 he became a member of the CPY Politburo under the pseudonym “P. Vuković” and was active in Paris and Prague, where the CPY headquarter was moved. During a purge within the CPY, in 1937 Čolaković was dismissed from the Politburo, and his book, ABC Leninizma (The ABCs of Leninism), was condemned by the Comintern. Sent to Spain, in 1936–39 he fought in the International Brigades under the pseudonym “Ivan Pavlović.” In 1939 he returned to Yugoslavia, where he spent half a year in prison. When in June 1941 the CPY took an anti-German attitude, he joined the Communist guerrillas in Serbia and then in Bosnia. In November 1943 he became a member and secretary of the Anti-Fascist Council of National Liberation of Yugoslavia (Antifašističko Vijeće Narodnog Oslobođenja Jugoslavije). After the war, between April 1945 and September 1949 Čolaković was head of the republican government of Bosnia and Herzegovina and then federal minister and member of the Central Committee of the League of Yugoslav Communists (LYC). In 1945–48 he was also chairman of the Yugoslav Association for Cultural Cooperation with the USSR, and, after the Soviet-Yugoslav split in 1948, he was chairman of the Council of Culture and Science. After the constitutional reform of 1953, he joined the Union Executive Council (government), and then he became its deputy chairman. In 1955 he was responsible for the reform of education. At the Ninth LYC Congress in 1969 he made the inaugural speech but was dropped from the party leadership. In 1977 he published Zapisi iz oslobodilakog rata (Records from the war of liberation), and in 1978, Govori, članci, polemika (Speeches, articles, polemics). (WR) Sources: Lazitch; Enciklopedija Jugoslavije, vol. 2 (Zagreb, 1966); Denison Rusinow, The Yugoslav Experiment, 1948–1974 (Berkeley, 1974); Kritičari o djelu Radoljuba Čolakovića (Sarajevo, 1983).

COLOTKA Peter (10 January 1925, Sedliacka Dubová, Dolný Kubín district), Slovak Communist activist and lawyer. In 1947 Colotka joined the Communist Party of Czechoslovakia (CPC). In 1950 he graduated in law from Comenius University in Bratislava, and he worked there as associate professor from 1956 and as professor from 1964. In 1956–57 he was deputy dean, in 1957–58 dean of the School of Law, and in 1958–61 deputy rector of this university. A member of the International Tribunal in the Hague from 1962 to 1970, in 1963–68 he was a member of the Slovak National Council and its secretary of justice. In 1966–89 he was a member of the Central Committee (CC) of the Communist Party of Slovakia (CPS) and of the CPC, and from 1968 to 1988 (with a break from January to September 1969) he was deputy prime minister of Czechoslovakia. At the same time he was head of the government of the Slovak Socialist Republic from May 1969 to October 1988. From December 1968 to February 1989 he was an MP to the Federal Assembly, and from January to April 1969 he was its speaker. In April 1969 he became a member of the CPC CC Presidium, and in May 1969, a member of the CPS CC Presidium. He sat in these bodies until October 1988. At the end of his career as a colorless party apparatchik of “normalization,” from January 1989 to January 1990 he was ambassador to France. For his activities in the 1970s and 1980s Colotka was ousted from the party in February 1990, and in June 1990 he was accused of embezzlement. In 1994 he was cleared of these accusations. (PU)

Sources: ČBS; Českoslovenští politici: 1918–1991 (Prague, 1991); Who's Who in the Socialist Countries of Europe, vol. 1 (Munich, London, and Paris, 1989).

CONSTANTINESCU Alexandru (9 March 1873–1949, Bucharest?), Romanian Communist activist. An upholsterer by trade, Constantinescu was one of the pioneers of the Socialist movement in Romania, representing its left wing. He first became known in 1907, making radical speeches to Bucharest workers in which he supported the peasant rebellion in Moldavia, which was soon bloodily suppressed by the army. In 1907 he was a Romanian representative to the Congress of the Second International in Stuttgart. During World War I he remained in Bucharest, where, after Romania acceded to the Entente in 1916, he established the Committee for the Struggle against War. In 1917 he organized the first Communist underground cells, active in the German-occupied part of Romania. Many members of these groups were sent to Russia after the war. In 1921 Constantinescu played an important role in the creation of the Socialist-Communist Party, which took the name of the Communist Party of Romania (Partidul Comunist din România) in 1922. In 1919–23 he published in the periodical Lupta de clasă, supporting Communist tendencies in the Second International and later the Third International (Comintern). In 1923, probably in connection with the growing repression against the Communist Party, he moved to France and then to the USSR, where he was active in the Bolshevik party. In 1937 he secretly moved to Romania, where he was soon removed from the party owing to the Stalinist purge. He died in oblivion after World War II. (LW)

Sources: Ion Rațiu, Contemporary Romania (Richmond, 1975); Grothusen Klaus-Detlev, Südosteuropa-Handbuch: Rumänien (Göttingen, 1977); Vlad Georgescu, Istoria Românilor de la origini până în zilele noastre (Oakland, 1984); Ghiță Ionescu, Comunismul în România (Bucharest, 1994); Ion Alexandrescu, Ion Bulei, Ion Mamina, and Ioan Scurtu, Enciclopedia de istorie României (Bucharest, 2000).

CONSTANTINESCU Emil (19 November 1939, Tighina), Romanian politician, lawyer, geologist, and president of Romania. In 1960 Constantinescu graduated in law from the University of Bucharest. In 1960–61 he worked as a judge in Pitești, but then he undertook geological studies at the same university and graduated in 1966. He stayed at the university, where he received a Ph.D. in geology in 1979 and became professor in 1990. From 1990 to 1992 he was deputy rector of the University of Bucharest. In 1991–92 he lectured at Duke University in Durham, N.C. In 1990 he co-founded University Solidarity (Solidarități Universitare) and became its head. The organization attracted university teachers, scholars, and students striving to democratize Romania. In 1990 he also co-founded the Civic Alliance (Alianța Civică), an anti-Communist party aiming at the development of a civil society. In 1991 he became its deputy chairman and head of the Anti-Totalitarian Forum (Forumului Antitotalitar) and Civic Academy (Academia Civice), opposing the post-Communist rule of Ion Iliescu. In 1992, thanks to the support of Corneliu Coposu, Constantinescu became chairman of the Democratic Convention of Romania (Convenția Democratică din România [DCR]), a coalition of democratic and anti-Communist groups, and its candidate for president. In the elections of October 1992 he was runner-up to Iliescu, with 38.6 percent of the vote. From 1992 to 1996 Constantinescu was rector of the University of Bucharest and chairman of the National Council of Romanian Rectors. Between 1994 and 1998 he was a member of the International Union of Rectors. In 1995 he was reelected chairman of the DCR.

In October 1996 the DCR won the parliamentary elections, and on 17 November 1996 Constantinescu won the presidential election. During his term, which lasted until December 2000, he supported steps toward the accession of Romania into the European Union and NATO. He gave his backing to the NATO intervention in Kosovo. He tried to introduce structural reforms leading to the strengthening of the market economy and the civil society. Nevertheless, he failed to lead the country out of economic recession. In the presidential elections of 2000 he backed Prime Minister Mugur Isărescu, who nevertheless lost. In 2001 Constantinescu returned to the University of Bucharest. He continued lecturing as a visiting professor of mineralogy and crystallography in many countries and received honorary doctorates from universities in Ankara, Athens, Paris, Beijing, and Montreal. He published twelve scholarly books and several dozen articles in geology. (LW)

Sources: Józef Darski, Rumunia: Historia, współczesność, konflikty narodowe (Warsaw, 1993); Personalități politice, publice (Bucharest, 1994); Tom Gallagher, Romania after Ceausescu (Edinburgh, 1995); Costin Scorpan, Istoria României: Enciclopedie (Bucharest, 1997); Ion Alexandrescu, Ion Bulei, Ion Mamina, and Ioan Scurtu, Enciclopedia de istorie României (Bucharest, 2000); Bugajski.

CONSTANTINESCU Miron (13 December 1917, Chișinău [Kishinev]–18 July 1974, Bucharest), Romanian Communist activist. Constantinescu graduated from high school in Arad in Transylvania and studied philosophy at the University of Bucharest in 1935–39. In 1935 he joined a Communist youth organization. During his studies he contributed to the leftist periodicals Cadran, Cuvântul liber, and Era nouă. In 1939 he became secretary general of the Communist youth organization. Arrested for Communist activities, until the coup of August 1944 he was detained in the Galați, Caransebeș, and Lugoj prisons with a group of activists who, under the leadership of Gheorghe Gheorghiu-Dej, soon took over control of the Communist Party. After his release Constantinescu was editor-in-chief of the central party daily Scânteia. In 1946 he became a member of the Central Committee (CC) of the Romanian Communist Party (Partidul Comunist Român), and from 1948 he was a member of the CC Politburo of the Romanian Workers' Party (RWP). In 1947–48 he was deputy minister of national education; in 1948–49, minister of mining and oil industry; and from 1948, a lecturer at the University of Bucharest. In the late 1940s he supported Ana Pauker in her endeavors to make the RWP a mass party, even by including repentant members of the (Fascist) Iron Guard. In 1949–55 Constantinescu was head of the State Planning Commission and from August 1954 to July 1957, deputy prime minister. He supported Gheorghiu-Dej in his struggle against the Ana Pauker-Vasile Luca- Teohari Georgescu faction, consulting on this matter in Moscow in September 1951. In January 1954 he also consulted with the Kremlin regarding the death sentence in the trial of Lucrețiu Patrașcanu.

After Stalin's death in March 1953, Constantinescu oriented himself toward the Kremlin reformers of Georgy Malenkov and then toward Nikita Khrushchev. Constantinescu was a member of the Romanian delegation at the Twentieth Congress of the Soviet party, but contrary to Gheorghiu-Dej, he chose de-Stalinization. This led to his dismissal from top party and government positions in 1957. In 1957–58 he was director of the Institute of Economic Research, and in 1959–65 he directed a department in the Nicolae Iorga Institute of History. After Nicolae Ceaușescu took over power, Constantinescu returned to politics. From August 1969 to February 1970 he was minister of education, and in November 1972 he became deputy chairman of the Council of State. He also presided over the Economic Council, and from March 1974, shortly before his death, over the National Assembly. In 1974 he also became a member of the Romanian Academy of Sciences. He published a number of books presenting the Communist vision of history, sociology, and economics. (LW)

Sources: Dictionar Enciclopedic, vol. 1 (Bucharest, 1993); Ion Rațiu, Contemporary Romania (Richmond, 1975); Klaus-Detlev Grothusen, ed., Rumänien (Göttingen, 1977); Ghiță Ionescu, Comunismul în România (Bucharest, 1994); Kurt W. Treptow and Marcel Popa, Historical Dictionary of Romania (Lanham, Md., 1996); Dorina N. Rusu, Membrii Academiei Române 1866–1999 (Bucharest, 1999); Dennis Deletant, Communist Terror in Romania: Gheorghiu-Dej and the Police State, 1948–1965 (New York, 1999); Ion Alexandrescu, Ion Bulei, Ion Mamina, and Ioan Scurtu, Enciclopedia de istorie României (Bucharest, 2000).

COPOSU Corneliu (16 September 1916, Bobota–9 November 1995, Bucharest), Romanian lawyer, journalist, and politician. From 1933 to 1937 Coposu studied law at the university in Cluj. He published in the press organs of the National Peasant Party (NPP) that were issued in Cluj: România Nouă and Patria (1935–40). During the Hungarian occupation of Transylvania (30 August 1940–25 October 1944), Coposu remained in Bucharest, where he wrote for the magazine Ardealul and also edited broadcasts on Romanian radio. From 1936 to 1946 he was the political secretary of Iuliu Maniu, and he took part in the organization of a coup on 23 August 1944. In 1943–44 he maintained close contacts with leaders of other parties and also with the Romanian Ministry of Foreign Affairs. He participated in the talks between Romania and the Allies that were held in Cairo. After the war he played a major role in the NPP, holding (among other positions) the post of deputy secretary general. On 14 July 1947 he was arrested and then sentenced in a rigged trial to life imprisonment for “sabotage” and “anti-state activities.”

Until 1964 Coposu was a political prisoner and spent seven years in complete isolation. Later he attempted to reorganize his party, both at home and among emigrants in Western Europe and the United States. In 1987 he introduced the illegal NPP into the European Union and affiliated it with the Christian Democrats. Soon after the overthrow of the regime of Nicolae Ceaușescu (22 December 1989) the Christian and Democratic National Peasants' Party was created, and Coposu became its leader. Between 1992 and 1995 he was president of the opposition Democratic Convention, which was formed together with (among others) the National Liberal Party and the Romanian Social Democratic Party. In 1992–95 Coposu served as senator. As an influential Romanian politician, he proposed Emil Constantinescu for the post of president of Romania. Being a monarchist, Coposu opted for the return of King Michael I and suggested calling a referendum on that issue. An avowed opponent of Russia, he initiated détente with the Hungarians. In October 1995 he was decorated with the French Legion of Honor. He was the author of several works, including Ungaria ne cere pământul (The Hungarians claim our land; 1940); Țara Sălajului (The land of Sălajului; 1944); Armistițiul din 1944 și implicațiile lui (The armistice of 1944 and its implications; 1988); and Retrospective asupra istorici contemporane (A look at contemporary historians; 1990). (FA/TD)

Sources: V. C. Arachelian, Corneliu Coposu: Dialoguri (Bucharest, 1992); Corneliu Coposu în fața istoriei (Bucharest, 1996); Józef Darski, Rumunia: Historia, współczesność, konflikty narodowe (N.p., n.d.); R. Wyborski and Tadeusz Dubicki, “Rumunia przed i po listopadzie 1996,” in M. Wilk, ed., Nowa Europa 1989–2000: Fakty i prognozy (Łódź, 1998).

CORNEA Doina (30 May 1929, Brașov), Romanian dissident. In 1952 Cornea graduated in French studies from Babeș-Bolyai University in Cluj-Napoca. From 1952 to 1958 she taught at a high school in Zalău, and from 1959 she held the chair of French Language and Literature at the Cluj-Napoca university. In 1980 in the uncensored press she published her first book, Încercarea labirintului (Attempt at a labyrinth), and four translated texts. In 1983 she was fired from the university. In 1982 her daughter smuggled her first open letter against the Nicolae Ceaușescu regime to France: Scrisoare către cei care n-au încetat să gândească (Letters by those still remembered) was presented on Radio Free Europe. From 1982 to 1989 Cornea published thirty-one literary texts and political protests in France. In 1983 her activities became the subject of investigation; she was repeatedly interrogated and beaten. In the late 1980s she continued her activities together with her son, Leontin Iuhas. After the workers' riots in Braşov in November 1987 Cornea distributed manifestos of solidarity with the workers. Arrested again, along with her son, she was kept in prison until 21 December 1989, when she took part in a street demonstration demanding the resignation of Ceauşescu and the establishment of a democratic government.

On 22 December 1989, soon after the overthrow of the Ceauşescu dictatorship by a group of Communist activists, Cornea, without her knowledge, was included in the Supreme Council of the National Salvation Front (Frontul Sălvari Naţionale [NSF]), which took over power. At the very end of 1989 she was among the fifty intellectuals who established the Group for Social Dialogue (Grupul pentru Dialog Social). In January 1990 she left the NSF because its program was to reform the system and not abolish it and because of how the Front's leaders treated her. Later in 1990 Cornea was co-founder of the Anti-Totalitarian Forum, which failed to unite the anti-Communist opposition, and then she co-founded the Civic Alliance (Alianţa Civica), which strove to develop civil society. After 1989 she published more than one hundred articles in defense of human rights and democracy in Romania. In 1991 she was one of the co-founders of the Democratic Convention of Romania (Convenţia Democratică din România [DCR]), a coalition of anti-Communist and democratic parties and groups, but she abstained from direct participation in DCR activities. She authored many books, including Liberté? (Freedom? 1990); Scrisori deschise şi alte texte (1991; Open letters and other texts; 1991); and Faţa nevăzută a lucrurilor (The invisible side of things; 1999). In 2000 she was honored with the French Legion of Honor and the Romanian Order of the Star with the Great Cross. (LW)

Sources: Dictionar Enciclopedic, vol. 1 (Bucharest, 1993); Dar-ski Józef, Rumunia: Historia, współczesność, konflikty narodowe (Warsaw, 1995); Scorpan Costin, Istoria Romaniei: Enciclopedie (Bucharest, 1997); Ion Alexandrescu, Ion Bulei, Ion Mamina, and Ioan Scurtu, Enciclopedia de istorie României (Bucharest, 2000); Who's Who in Romania 2002 (Bucharest, 2002); www.aliantacivica.ro.

ČOSIĆ Dobrica (29 December 1921, Velika Drenova), Serbian writer and Communist activist. Born into a peasant family, Čosić was expelled from high school for his activity in the Union of Communist Youth. He joined the Communist Party of Yugoslavia. During World War II he was a political commissar of a guerrilla battalion. After the war, he graduated from the Higher Party School. In 1951 he published his first novel, Daleko je sunce (The sun is far away), and in 1954, Koreni (Roots), for which he received the highest Yugoslav literary critics' award. In 1961 he met Josip Broz Tito, he gained his trust, and accompanied him on his many foreign trips. In 1965–68 Čosić was a member of the Central Committee of the League of Serbian Communists and a deputy to the Federal Assembly. He demanded a revision of the nationality policy (mostly in Kosovo), so in 1968 he was expelled from the party on account of trying to fuel Serbian nationalism. In subsequent years he was active in the opposition and wrote books. He is thought to have been the initiator of a 1986 memorandum, signed by sixteen members of the Serbian Academy of Sciences and Arts, that referred to Serbian nationalism. Čosić has been called the “spiritual father” of Slobodan Milošević and even “father of the Serbian nation.” An advocate for an “ethnically pure” Great Serbia, Čosić favored the unification of all Serbs in one country. In June 1992 Čosić became the first president of the new Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, founded in April 1992. At this time he distanced himself from Milošević, and in the presidential campaign in Serbia in December 1992 he supported his rival, the moderate Milan Panić. In June 1993 the parliament dismissed Čosić from the presidency. His major works include the following: Deobe (Divisions; 1961); Vreme smrti (Time of Death; 1972–75); and a trilogy on a Communist revolting against Stalinism, Vreme zla (Time of Evil), comprised of the novels Gresnjik (Sinner; 1985), Otpadnik (Renegade; 1986), and Viernik (Believer; 1991). (AO)

Sources: Enciklopedija Jugoslavije, vol. 2 (Zagreb, 1956); Sabrina P. Ramet, Nationalism and Federalism in Yugoslavia, 1962–1991 (Bloomington, 1992); Nebojša Popov, Serbski dramati: Od faszystowskiego populizmu do Miloševića (Łódź, 1994); Laura Silber and Allan Little, The Death of Yugoslavia (London, 1995); David Owen, Balkan Odyssey (New York, 1995); John Lampe, Yugoslavia as History (Cambridge, 1996); Bugajski.

COSTINESCU Emil (12 March 1844, Iaşi–6 July 1921, Bucharest), Romanian economist, financier, and politician. In 1862 Costinescu completed his studies in Iaşi. He belonged to the Liberal Party since its creation in 1875, and then he was a member of its successor, the National Liberal Party (NLP). At the end of the nineteenth century he was one of the leading Romanian financiers. A co-founder of the National Bank of Romania in 1880, he was later president of one of the largest Romanian banks. He edited the magazine Românul. When Ion I. C. Brătianu became head of the NLP, he on many occasions appointed Costinescu as minister of finance. Costinescu was in charge of the finance ministry in 1902–4, 1907–10, and 1914–16. Additionally, between 1916 and 1917 he served as minister without portfolio. At the end of World War I, as a financial expert, Costinescu became a member of the Romanian delegation to the Paris Peace Conference. His works include Le tarif des douanes (Customs tariffs; 1904) and Incurajea industriei naționale (Stimulating the national economy; 1912). (FA)

Sources: Ion Gheorghe Duca, Memorii, vols. 2–3 (Bucharest, 1992).

CRISTEA Miron [original name Ilie] (18 July 1868, Toplicza [now Toplița, Transylvania]–6 March 1939, Cannes), patriarch of the Romanian Orthodox Church, premier of Romania. The son of a Transylvanian peasant, Cristea attended a German gymnasium in Bistritz (Bistrița) and a Romanian gymnasium in Năsăud, where he was president of a society called Virtus Romana Rediviva. He was educated at the Theological Institute in Hermannstadt (Sibiu, 1887–90), and he graduated in philosophy and philology from Budapest University in 1894. He earned a Ph.D. on the basis of his dissertation about Mihaiu Eminescu; it was written in Hungarian. From 1901 Cristea belonged to the Romanian Cultural Union in Transylvania (RCUT). After graduation he decided to pursue an ecclesiastic career. From 1895 he was secretary of the consistory in Sibiu. In June 1902 he took on the name Miron and entered the monastery in Hodos-Bodrog. In 1905 he became director of the RCUT. On 21 November 1909 the consistory elected him bishop of Caransebeș. He took holy orders in May 1910 in Sibiu.

Cristea played an important role in organizing the National Assembly in Alba Iulia, the historic capital of Transylvania. On 1 December 1918 the assembly passed a resolution on unification with the Old Kingdom. Cristea served as a member of the presidium of this assembly, and he was a member of the delegation of Transylvanian Romanians who submitted the Act of Unification to King Ferdinand. On 31 December 1919 an overwhelming majority elected Cristea archbishop of Bucharest and metropolitan of the principality of Walachia. From 1920 to 1925 he also served as “the first metropolitan” of Romania, contributing to the unification of the Romanian Orthodox Church in Transylvania, the Old Kingdom, and Bessarabia. When on 12 February 1925 the Romanian parliament changed the metropolis of Bucharest into a patriarchate, Cristea became the patriarch of Romania. He enjoyed great respect; therefore between July 1927 and June 1930 he was a member of the Regency Council, created after the election of Prince Michael, who was under age, as king. However, Cristea recognized the return of Michael’s father, Charles II, to the throne, and on 10 February 1938, after

Charles had introduced a royal dictatorship, Cristea took over the premiership of the new government. He remained in office until his death. He approved of the execution of the Iron Guard leaders, including Corneliu Zelea-Codreanu, the Guard’s founder, in November 1938. Cristea died suddenly while on a journey to France. He was the author of (among other works) România și Vatican (Romania and the Vatican; 1921); Adevăruri istorice asupra întegirii neamului (Historical truth about national integration; 1929); and Inseminaryii de faimă: Jurnal (Notes of Fame: Diary; 1997). (FA/TD)

Sources: Biographisches Lexikon, vol. 1; Ion Rusu Abredeanu, Patriarhul României Dr. Miron Cristea (Bucharest, 1929); Prințul Nicolae al României: In umbra coroanei României (Iași, 1991); Regele Carol al. II-lea al. României, Inseminaryi zilnice, vols. 1–2 (Bucharest, 1995); Armand Calinescu, Inseminaryi politice (Bucharest, 1990).

CRISTESCU Eugen (3 April 1895, Grozavești–12 June 1950, Vacarești), Romanian politician. The oldest of ten children of a teacher, after graduating from a theological seminary, Cristescu started law studies in Iași but discontinued them because of the outbreak of World War I. He took part in the fall campaign of 1916. He graduated in 1920, and in 1926 he received a Ph.D. in law. From 1920 he worked in the central police headquarters. In 1927 he became its deputy director, and in 1929, director. He represented Romania in the International Police Commission in the Hague. He co-initiated and was the first head of the police trade union. An opponent of political extremism, be it Communist or Fascist, Cristescu elaborated a report on the revolutionary Communist movement in Romania in 1918–26 and on its connections with the Communist International; he handed the report to the U.S. legation in Bucharest. He created a special section to survey and combat Communist activities. He prevented riots planned by the Iron Guard in 1933, for which the Guard issued him a death sentence. In 1934 he resigned, but he maintained a high rank in the Ministry of Interior. In 1937 he was appointed its delegate to a special requisition commission, subordinated to the General Staff, where he met the top military, including General Ion Antonescu.

After Antonescu took power, on 15 November 1940 Cristescu was appointed head of the Special Information Service (Serviciu Special de Informații [SSI]), which played a key role in preventing the Iron Guard coup against Antonescu. Cristescu reorganized the SSI, making it an efficient tool of dictatorial power. He personally had no Fascist inclinations, but he cooperated with the German Abwehr and Gestapo, trying to maintain some independence for the Romanian service. The SSI both did surveillance on and protected democratic politicians from the Germans and mediated in the contacts between Iuliu Maniu and Antonescu. At the same time Cristescu initiated the creation of ghettos and internment camps, taking part in decisions on the political arrest and expulsion of foreigners. At the end of 1942, on orders from Antonescu, Cristescu entered into contact with U.S. intelligence, sending his brother on a mission to Turkey. He intercepted the British mission parachuted into Romania in December 1943 and controlled talks held by Maniu and Barbu Știrbei with the Allied command in Cairo about the conditions of armistice. He informed Antonescu on the preparations for a coup by King Michael, in cooperation with the Communists, but the dictator did not believe him. During the coup of 23 August 1944 Cristescu went into hiding, but on 24 September he was arrested by the Communists. Taken by the Soviet mission on 14 October, he was transported to Moscow, detained in Lubyanka Prison, and interrogated for sixteen months. As a result he agreed to cooperate with the Soviet services. In April 1946 he returned to Bucharest, where he was sued, along with other key figures of the Antonescu regime, for “national treason and disaster.” Sentenced to death, he was pardoned by King Michael on the motion of the Communist minister of justice, Lucrețiu Patrașcanu. His sentence was changed to hard labor for life. He was imprisoned in the Dumbraveni, Aiud, and Vacarești prisons. From November 1949 to April 1950 he underwent a new investigation by the political police, Securitate, and he died in prison. (ASK)

Sources: Haralamb Zinca, Spion. Prin. Arhiwele secrete (Bucharest, 1993); Larry L. Watts, Romanian Cassandra: Ion Antonescu and the Struggle for Reform, 1916–1941 (Boulder, Colo., 1993); Cristian Troncota, Eugen Cristescu asul serviciilor secrete romanesti: Memorii, marturi, documente 1916–1944 (Bucharest, 1994).

CRISTESCU Gheorghe (19 May 1882, Copaciu–23 July 1973, Iași), Romanian Communist activist. Cristescu was a quilt maker; thence his party pseudonym, “Plăpamarul.” He belonged to the revolutionary wing of the Romanian Social Democratic Party, which decided to affiliate itself with the Communist International. On 8 May 1921 Cristescu was co-founder of the Romanian Socialist Communist Party in Bucharest. The founding congress of the Communist Party of Romania (Partidul Comunist din România [CPR]) met in Ploiești in October 1922, and Cristescu was elected secretary general. The Comintern insisted that the CPR support the dismemberment of Romania, with Bessarabia and Northern Bukovina ceded to the Soviet Ukraine and Transylvania and Dobruđa recognized as separate states. This line was supported by non-Romanians in the party, but it was hard for the Romanians to accept. Against this background, in 1923 the party was divided by a conflict in which Cristescu represented the Romanian point of view. During a visit by Cristescu to Moscow in September 1923, the CPR delegation was forced to accept the Comintern standpoint, and Cristescu was dismissed from the leadership at the Third CPR Congress in Vienna in August 1924. In the 1920s he was still a party member, for which he spent several years in prison. Disillusioned with communism, in 1928 he joined the United Socialist Party (Partidul Socialist Unitar), and in 1938 he withdrew from politics altogether. When the Communists took power in Romania after World War II, Cristescu was arrested in 1948 and imprisoned for “rightist deviation.” Among other places, he worked in a labor camp, Capul Midia, at the construction of the Danube-Black Sea Canal. He was released in 1968. (WR) Sources: Lazitch; Șerban N. Ionescu, Who Was Who in Twentieth Century Romania (Boulder, Colo., 1994); Dennis Deletant, Communist Terror in Romania: Gheorghiu-Dej and the Police State, 1948–1965 (New York, 1999).

CRNJANSKI Miloš (26 October 1893, Csongrád, Hungary–30 November 1977, Belgrade), Serbian poet and writer. After studying the history of art in Rijeka, Vienna, and Paris, Crnjanski graduated in philosophy from the University of Belgrade. Later he worked as a high school teacher and journalist. He made his literary debut in 1908. During World War I he fought on the Galician front. In 1921 he was co-founder of a literary group, Alpha. In 1928–29 and 1935–41 he worked as a cultural attaché in Berlin, Rome, and Lisbon, and in 1941–65 he lived in London. His first works, included in the collection of poems Lirika Itake (Lyrics from Ithaca; 1919) and the prose work Priče o muškom (Tales of a boy; 1920), as well as the novel Dnevnik o Černojeviću (Notes of Černojević; 1921), reflected his perception of the crisis of civilization and being lost amid the absurd. He proclaimed the unity of the real and created reality. He was influenced by expressionism, often using free versification. In a two-volume novel, Seoba (1929; Migrations, 1994) and Druga knjiga seoba (The second book of migrations; 1962), he combined images from Serbian history with his poetic vision of human fate, full of suffering and a lack of fulfillment. He also authored the dramas Maska (Mask; 1919), Konak (Staying overnight; 1965), and Tesla (Hoe; 1966); a longer poem, Lament nad Beogradom (Lament over Belgrade; 1962); the novel Roman o Londonu (The London story; 1971); memoirs and essays collected in Ljubav u Toskani (Love in Tuscany; 1930), Knjiga o Nemačkoj (The book of Germany; 1931), and Kod Hiperborejaca (The Hyperborean wheel; 1966); a diary, Embahade (1983); and a monograph, Mikelandjelo (Michelangelo; 1982). In 1983 his Izbrana dela Miloša Crnjanskog (Collected works of Miloš Crnjanski) were published in twenty-six volumes. (WR) Sources: Wielka encyklopedia PWN, vol. 6 (Warsaw, 2002); Petar Džadžić, Prostori sreće u delu Miloša Crnjanskog (Belgrade, 1976); Milos Crnjavski and Modern Serbian Literature (Nottingham, England, 1988); ed. David Norris, N. Petrovoić, Lirika Milosa Crnjanskog (Belgrade, 1994).

CRVENKOVSKI Branko (12 October 1962, Sarajevo), Macedonian politician. The son of a Yugoslav military officer, Crvenkovski graduated from the School of Mechanical Engineering, Computer Science, and Automation in Skopje in 1988. Upon graduation, he worked in Semos-Skopje as a chief of department before entering politics. A former Communist, he became an MP in 1990, the same year that he became a member of the presidency of the Social Democratic League of Macedonia (Socijaldemokratski Sojuz na Makedinija [SSM]). He became its president in 1991. Crvenkovski served as president of the Commission for Foreign Political Affairs and Relations and was elected prime minister on 17 August 1992, heading a four-party coalition that included ministers from two Albanian parties. A cornerstone of this government's platform was the creation of inter-ethnic harmony. Between 1992 and 1995, Crvenkovski guided Macedonia through two harmful Greek economic boycotts. During this same period, most countries recognized the sovereignty of the nascent Macedonian state (if not its name—it was the Former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia). Crvenkovski's government was responsible for initiating the 1993 privatization program, an ineffective but long-heralded attempt to bring greater economic stability. Crvenkovski remained in power into 1994, when he received a second mandate to become prime minister. He formed another coalition government that included representatives of Albanian parties. During this administration, he made an effort to reach out to the opposition in order to maintain political stability. With his popularity plummeting in response to deteriorating economic conditions, Crvenkovski reorganized the government in 1996. The Social Democratic Union of Macedonia was upended in the 1998 fall elections by the Internal Macedonian Revolutionary Organization–Democratic Party for Macedonian National Unity. After stepping down on 30 November 1998, Crvenkovski moved into the opposition and remained the head of the SSM. In the elections of September 2002 the majority of seats was won by a coalition, Alliance for Macedonia (Makedonija so Razum), in which Crvenkovski's Social Democrats played a leading role. On 7 October 2002 he became prime minister again. After the death of President Boris Trajkovski, on 28 April 2004 Crvenkovski was elected Macedonia's president. (DP)

Sources: Duncan Perry, "Republic of Macedonia: On the Road to Stability or Destruction?" Transition, 25 August 1995; Duncan Perry, "Destiny on Hold: Macedonia and the Dangers of Ethnic Discord," Current History, March 1998; Valentina Georgieva and Sasha Konechni, Historical Dictionary of the Republic of Macedonia (Lanham, Md., 1998); Bugajski; RFE/RL Newswire; OMRI Daily Reports; www.rulers.org.

CSÁKY Pál (21 March 1956, Šahy, Levice district), Hungarian politician in Slovakia. After graduating from high school in 1975 Csáky studied at the Higher Chemical Technological School in Pardubice, where he graduated as a chemical engineer in 1980. For ten years he worked as a technologist in the Levitex Levice Company. After the Czechoslovak Velvet Revolution, in March 1990 he was co-founder of the Hungarian Christian Democratic Movement (HCDM), and he won a parliamentary seat in the Slovak National Council in the first free elections in June 1990. Later he was elected to the Slovak parliament in 1992 and 1994. From 1992 to 1998 he was HCDM deputy chairman, exerting a strong influence on the unification of all Hungarian parties into the Party of the Hungarian Coalition (Magyar Koalíció Pártja; Strana Maďarskej Koalicie [PHC]). At the PHC's founding congress, on 21 June 1998 Csáky was elected its deputy chairman. In the parliamentary elections of September 1998 the PHC won more than 9 percent of the vote and entered the ruling coalition, which was to lead Slovakia out of isolation and stagnation after the regime of Vladimír Mečiar. In the Mikulaš Dzurinda government, sworn in on 30 October 1998, Csáky became deputy prime minister for human rights and minorities. Thanks to the PHC's entry into the ruling coalition, relations between the Slovak government and the Hungarian minority improved a great deal. In the elections of September 2002 the PHC won more than 11 percent of the vote, staying in the government, and Csáky remained deputy prime minister. (PU)

Sources: Slovensko 1996: Súhrnná správa o stave spoločnosti (Bratislava, 1997); Slovensko 1997: Súhrnná správa o stave spoločnosti (Bratislava, 1998); Slovensko 1998–1999: Súhrnná správa o stave spoločnosti (Bratislava, 1999); www.vlada.gov.sk/csaky/podpredseda_pal_csaky.html; www.nevyberajusmev.sk/lidri-smk-csaky.php.

CSERNOCH János (18 June 1852, Szokolca [Skalica, now in Slovakia]–25 July 1927, Esztergom), cardinal, Primate of Hungary. Born into a poor Slovak peasant family, Csernoch maintained his peasant accent all his life.

After theological studies in Pazmaneumin in Vienna, in November 1874 he was ordained. He continued his studies at the Augustineum in Vienna, where he received a Ph.D. in theology in 1876. From 1877 he worked as a chaplain in Budapest; from 1879, as a lecturer in theology in the Esztergom seminary; and from 1882, as secretary to the Primate of Hungary and papal chamberlain. In 1888 he was appointed canon, and in 1893, vicar of the Esztergom basilica, the main headquarters of the Catholic Church in Hungary. From 1896 Csernoch was diocese censor and from 1898, archdeacon of Nógrád; in 1901–10 he was MP on behalf of the Popular Catholic Party, which supported the agreement with Austria of 1867 but opposed the separation of church and state. One of the restorers of political Catholicism, Csernoch played an important role in the organization of the Christian Social movement, including both Catholics and Protestants. He published a lot in Magyar Korona and Religio.

In 1905 Csernoch was appointed archdeacon of the Esztergom basilica, and on 16 February 1908, bishop of Csanád. He was consecrated on 10 May 1908. On 20 April 1911 he became archbishop of Kalocsa, and on 13 December 1912, archbishop of Esztergom and prince primate of Hungary. On 25 May 1914 he was elevated to the rank of cardinal and proved to be the last Hungarian primate to crown the king of Hungary (Charles IV Habsburg in 1916). A close friend of Prime Minister István Tisza, after the outbreak of World War I Csernoch supported the war tactics of his government, but from 1916 his stance evolved toward pacifism. In the fall of 1918, in the name of the episcopate, he supported the republican government of sovereign Hungary headed by Mihály Károlyi. During the Hungarian Soviet Republic he remained passive. Afterwards, as a moderate legitimist, he tried to mediate between Charles IV and Regent Miklós Horthy. After some time he found that the return of the Habsburgs would be impossible, and he supported the policy of consolidation of Prime Minister István Bethlen. In 1908–18 he was a member of the House of Lords, and from 1927, a member of the Upper House of the Hungarian parliament. From 1915 he was a member of the Hungarian Academy of Sciences. (JT)

Sources: Magyar Életrajzi Lexikon, vol. 1 (Budapest, 1967); Magyar Nagylexikon, vol. 6 (Budapest, 1998); Új Magyar Életrajzi Lexikon, vol. 1 (Budapest, 2001); Nicholas Horthy, Memoirs (Paris, 1954); Ferenc Reisner, Csernoch János, hercegprímás és a katolikus egyház szerepe IV. Károly monarchiamegmentési kísérleteiben (Budapest, 1991).

CSOÓRI Sándor (3 February 1930, Zámoly), Hungarian writer. Csoóri graduated from the Calvinist high school in Pápa (1950) and studied Russian language and literature at the University of Budapest in 1951–52. In contrast to other writers of his generation, he made his literary debut in 1953 with a poem free of Socialist realism. His first volume, Felröppen a madár (A bird flying up; 1954), written under Romantic and symbolist influences, became a harbinger of the “thaw.” In 1953–54 he edited the literary biweekly Irodalmi Újság and in 1955–56, a poetic column in the literary monthly Új Hang. He fully supported the revolution of 1956. After its suppression, he had no steady job for years but remained true to his poetic vocation. He also wrote press reports and prose dealing with social problems. His breakthrough volume was Második születésem (My second birth; 1967). Since its publication he has been considered one of Hungary’s leading contemporary poets. Subsequent volumes—Szép versek (Beautiful poems; 1970) and Párbeszéd a sötétben (Dialogue in the dark; 1973)—established his position as a master of simple versification but visionary poetry, full of national symbols and existential motifs.

From 1968 Csoóri has worked with the Hungarian film studio Mafilm, writing screenplays for historical and documentary movies, mostly directed by Sándor Sára and Ferenc Kósa—for example, Tízezer nap (Ten thousand days; 1967); Földobott kő (A stone going up; 1989); Ítélet (Sentence; 1970); 80 huszár (80 Hussars; 1978); and Pergőtűz (Spitfire; 1982). From the late 1970s he returned to poetry and published several new volumes, such as A tizedek este (Tenth evening; 1980) and A világ emlékművei (Monuments of the world; 1989). Full of elegiac symbolism but clearly alluding to the Communist reality, these poems made Csoóri one of the informal leaders of the nation. He also published a number of collections of essays, such as Nomád napló (Nomadic diary; 1978) and Készülődés a számadásra (Getting ready to settle accounts; 1987). As a person of unquestionable authority, in 1988 Csoóri became editor-in-chief of the first official non-Communist periodical, Hitel. In 1989 he became co-founder and member of the first non-Communist political party, the Hungarian Democratic Forum (Magyar Demokrata Fórum). From 1991 he was chairman and then honorary chairman of the World Association of Hungarians. He strongly influenced the literary and political life of Hungary at the end of the twentieth century. Many of his works celebrated Hungarian aspirations for freedom, becoming literary expressions of the views and feelings of a society enslaved by communism. In his opposition to the internationalist, urban intelligentsia, Csoóri aligned himself with the tradition of populist writers. (MS)

Sources: Mały słownik pisarzy węgierskich (Warsaw, 1977); Ferenc Kiss, Csoóri Sándor (Budapest, 1990); Steven Béla Várdy, Historical Dictionary of Hungary (Lanham, Md., 1997); A lélek senki földjén: Csoóri Sándor köszöntése (Budapest, 1992); Géza Vasy, A nemzet rebellise (Budapest, 2000).

CSURKA István (27 March 1934, Budapest), Hungarian writer and politician. The son of a writer, in 1957 Csurka graduated from the Higher School of Theater and Film Arts. His first volume of short stories was published in 1956. During the 1956 revolution he was elected head of the National Guard at his school, and in March 1957 he was arrested for half a year. During interrogations he promised to cooperate with the security service, but in fact he failed to report. After his release he lived from author's fees. He authored more than twenty dramas. With irony and a grotesque style he described the decline of moral values in the society. In the 1980s Csurka was one of the leaders of the emerging populist and nationalist opposition, which had roots in the tradition of the 1930s. He considered the countryside the "true root" of the nation, rather than the liberal and urban (mostly Budapest) intelligentsia. In 1985 he co-organized the only meeting of the entire Hungarian opposition, at which he criticized the inertia of the Hungarians after the suppressed 1956 revolution ("a nation of waiters" was his term), and he argued that without a reconstruction of the moral health, the nation faced disaster. In his opinion, it was only the consciousness of national goals and values, as well as entrepreneurship in a "truly Hungarian" sense, that could prevent this disaster.

In September 1987 Csurka co-founded the Hungarian Democratic Forum (Magyar Demokrata Forum [HDF]), the first official opposition party. Elected to its National Presidium (1988–93), in 1991–92 he was its deputy chairman. From 1990 he was MP on behalf of the HDF, the largest parliamentary faction. In August 1992 he stated that there had been no real systemic change in Hungary, that there was only an agreement of elites, and that key political figures—including President Árpád Göncz—were only figureheads implementing the orders of Israel and the United States. He also sharply criticized Prime Minister József Antall, head of the HDF. Csurka announced a radical program of the Hungarian right and created the Movement of the Hungarian Way (Magyar Út Mozgalom). In 1993 he was excluded from the HDF. On the basis of his movement and of the weekly Magyar Fórum, whose editor-in-chief he was from 1989, in 1993 he founded the Hungarian Justice and Life Party (Magyar Igazság és Élet Pártja [HJLP]), an extreme rightist and anti-Semitic group demanding, among other things, a return to the so-called historical Greater Hungary, meaning a revision of the Treaty of Trianon of 1920. In the elections of 1998 the HJLP won 5.5 percent of the vote and fourteen mandates. In the elections of 2002 it won 4.3 percent of the vote and stayed out of the parliament. Csurka authored several dramas, including Ki lesz a bálánya (Who builds now; 1970); Házmestersirato (Bitter sorrows in the watchman lodge; 1978); and Eredeti helyszín (On Location; 1979), as well as novels. (JT)

Sources: Magyar Nagylexikon, vol. 6 (Budapest, 1998); A magyar forradalom és szabadságharc enciklopédiája, CD-ROM (Budapest, 1999); Steven Béla Varga, Historical Dictionary of Hungary (Lanham, Md., 1997); Mały słownik pisarzy węgierskich (Warsaw, 1977); Bugajski.

CUNESCU Sergiu (16 March 1923, Bucharest), Romanian politician. From the late 1930s Cunescu belonged to the Social Democratic Party of Romania (Partidul Social-Democrat din România [SDPR]). Soon after World War II he graduated from the Polytechnic Institute in Bucharest. After the split in the SDPR in 1946 he joined the Independent Social Democratic Party (Partidul Social-Democrat Independent [ISDP]), which included opponents of cooperation with the Communists. After the ISDP was outlawed in 1948 and its leaders were arrested, Cunescu abandoned political activity. He worked as a teacher in the Polytechnic Institute and as a machine engineer. Two days after the Nicolae Ceaușescu regime was toppled, on 24 December 1989 Cunescu joined a group that re-activated the ISDP as the Romanian Social Democratic Party (Partidul Social-Democrat Român [RSDP]). In early 1990 Cunescu became one of its leaders, and in 1991, its formal chairman. For a short time, the RSDP was a part of the National Salvation Front, but in January it left the front along with other historical parties because it was controlled by the post-Communists. In 1990–2000 Cunescu was an MP on behalf of the RSDP. In late 1990 the party joined other anti-Communist groups in the National Convention for the Establishment of Democracy, and in 1991, the Democratic Convention of Romania (Convenția Democrată Română [DCR]). In view of his party's weak position in the DCR, in 1995 Cunescu led the RSDP out of the convention and into a coalition with the Social Democratic Union (Uniunea Social Democrat [SDU]), strongly influenced by the post-Communists. In the parliamentary elections of November 1996 the coalition won 13 percent of the vote and entered the ruling coalition with the DCR. In 1999 Cunescu broke off the coalition with the SDU and resigned from chairing his party, but he stayed its honorary chairman. Before the November 2000 elections the RSDP entered into a coalition with the post-Communist Party of Social Democracy in Romania (Partidul Democrației Sociale din România), and with the end of the parliamentary term in 2000, Cunesco withdrew from political life. (LW)

Sources: Ion Alexandrescu, Ion Bulei, Ion Mamina, and Ioan Scurtu, Enciclopedia de istorie României (Bucharest, 2000); Józef Darski, Rumunia: Historia, współczesność, konflikty narodowe (Warsaw, 1995); romania-on-line.net; www.cdep.ro.

CURRI Bajram bej (1862, Gjakovë–29 March 1925, Gryka e Matines), Albanian independence activist. Curri started his public career as one of the organizers of the Albanian League in Peje (Peč) in 1899. In 1908 he joined a political club, Bashkimi (Union), in Skopje, and in 1912 he was one of the commanders of the anti-Turkish uprising in Kosovo. When in 1913 the Conference of Ambassadors excluded Kosovo from the area that was allocated to Albania, Curri's units took up arms against the Serbian Army. Counting on a political solution to the Kosovo problem, in 1918 Curri joined the Committee for the Defense of Kosovo, which delegated him to the Paris Peace Conference. In January 1920 he became minister without portfolio in the government of Suleyman Pasha Delvina and a member of the Senate. He was no diplomat, though, so he returned to the battlefield to fight for the region of Vlorë against the Italians. Authorized by the minister of war to suppress the rebellion of the followers of Esad Pasha Toptani, he gathered a few hundred soldiers and cleared the north of Albania, and then he controlled the borderland with the Kingdom of Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes (SHS).

The abandonment of the Kosovo question by the Albanian government made Curri start anti-government activities. After taking part in the negotiations that were aimed at the formation of a new cabinet in 1921, he began to actively support the Hasan Prishtina rebellion. The reason he gave was the lack of adequate representation for the Albanian north in the parliament. In February 1922 his units numbered about two thousand men. He was able to maintain his bases thanks to a decision by the Conference of Ambassadors at the turn of 1923 on the creation of a neutral zone along the frontier between Albania and the SHS. In early 1923 the Albanian Ministry of Interior attempted to get rid of his bases in cooperation with the SHS Army, but in vain. Opponents of the minister, Ahmed Zogu, sought Curri's support for a coup. The question of "Kosovo separatists" led to a deterioration of relations between Albania and the SHS in the spring of 1924. During the 1924 revolution it was Curri who gave the signal to attack the troops of the government of Shefqet bey Vërlaci, and the Curri units were the backbone of the troops supporting Fan Noli. From June to December 1924 Curri was minister of war in the government of Noli.

After the defeat of the Noli revolution, Curri was one of its few leaders who stayed in Albania, becoming a target of the Zogu gendarmerie. Along with a group of his closest aides he went to the region of Krasniqë. In 1925 he was encircled by the gendarmerie near Theth. According to various sources, Curri was either killed or committed suicide in Dragobi Cave. A town in northeastern Albania bears his name. (TC)

Sources: Biographisches Lexikon, vol. 1; Stefanaq Pollo and Arben Puto, The History of Albania from Its Origins to the Present Day (London, 1981); Bajram Curri (trajtësa e dokumente) (Tirana, 1982); Drini Skendër, Bajram Curri (Tirana, 1984); Sejfi Vllamasi, Ballafaqime politike në Shqipëri (1897–1942) (Tirana, 1995); Raymond Hitchings, Historical Dictionary of Albania (Lanham, Md., 1996); Neol Malcolm, Kosovo: A Short History (New York, 1998).

CUVAJ Slavko (26 February 1851, Bjelovar–31 January 1931, Vienna), conservative Croatian politician. As an official and later chief of the Osijek and Požega district (1885–1905) and Lika district (1905–6), Cuvaj represented loyalism to the Hungarian authorities. During the rule of Pavao Rauch, the governor (ban) of Croatia (1908–10), Cuvaj was mayor of Zagreb. As a result of the elections to the parliament (Sabor) in Zagreb in 1911, he lost to the Croatian-Serbian Coalition, which was increasingly critical of the dictatorial rule of the Austro-Hungarian bans. Despite this, on 20 January 1912 Cuvaj assumed the position of the ban of Croatia. He believed the conflict could be resolved by the use of force. On 27 January he dissolved the Sabor. As a result of mass student demonstrations and a school strike, the Austro-Hungarian authorities called a state of emergency, and Cuvaj was appointed a special commissioner. In June and October 1912 he twice avoided attempts on his life organized by the terrorists connected with Young Bosnia (Mlada Bosna). Hated by the Croats, in late 1912 Cuvaj was granted a leave of absence, and in the fall of 1913 he formally resigned. His rule only aggravated the ethnic tensions among the Habsburg Slavs. Awarded the title of baron by the Habsburgs, Cuvaj later lived in Austria. (WR)

Sources: Enciklopedija Jugoslavije, vol. 2 (Zagreb, 1956); Hrvatski bografski leksikon, vol. 2 (Zagreb, 1989); R. W. Seton-Watson and the Yugoslavs: Correspondence, vol. 1, 1906–1918; vol. 2, 1918–1941 (London and Zagreb, 1976); Nicholas J. Miller, Between Nation and State: Serbian Politics in Croatia before the First World War (Pittsburgh, 1997).

CUZA Aleksandru C. (8 November 1857, Iași–4 November 1947, Sibiu), Romanian politician and ideologist. Cuza studied in Dresden and Brussels. Initially connected with the Socialist movement, in 1883 he co-edited the influential émigré periodical Dacia, in which nationalist and Socialist viewpoints were mixed. He also published in the Socialist periodical Contemporanul and in the literary magazines Convorbiri Literare, Unirea, and Neamul Romanesc. In 1899 he was given a prestigious award by the Romanian Academy, and he became a member. From 1901 he worked as a professor at the University of Iași. It was then that he began to promote integral nationalism, based on the French model of Charles Maurras and the theories of Herbert Spencer. Cuza proclaimed himself in favor of authoritarian power and the domination of the Romanian majority defined by ethnic and religious categories. In his opinion “race and blood” were also key factors in art. His ideology was also strongly anti-Semitic, as he thought that Jews were not only alien, but also harmful to Romania.

In 1909 Cuza co-organized, with (among others) Nicolae Iorga, the National Democratic Party. In 1918 he created the National Christian Union, which became the League of National Christian Defense in March 1923. The league cooperated with another radical nationalist, Corneliu Zelea-Codreanu. On behalf of the league Cuza was elected to the parliament in 1926. Although both Cuza and Codreanu agreed on the necessity of the close cooperation of Romania with Fascist Italy and Nazi Germany, their ways parted mostly because Cuza resisted the totalitarian mobilization of the society suggested by Codreanu. In 1935 Cuza created the Popular National Bloc. Although he won a parliamentary seat again in 1936, he played no significant role, as he was neutralized by the royal dictatorship of King Charles II. In June 1938 his party merged with the Popular Party of General Alexandru Avarescu into the National Christian Popular Party, but it gained little support. Disappointed by politics, Cuza retired, remaining a symbol and intellectual inspiration for the new generation of radical Romanian nationalists. The circumstances of his death are not clear. Cuza authored (among other works) Generația de la 1848 și era nouă (The 1848 generation and the new era; 1889) and Naționalitatea în artă (Nationality in art; 1910). (MC)

Sources: Biographisches Lexikon, vol. 1; Pamfil Seicaru, Unjunimist antisemit A. C. Cuza (Madrid, 1956); Nicholas Nagy-Talavera, The Green Shirts and Others (Stanford, 1970); Radu Ioanid, The Sword of the Archangel (Boulder, Colo., 1990); Leon Volovici, Nationalist Ideology and Antisemitism: The Case of Romanian Intellectuals in the 1930s (Oxford, 1991); Randolph L. Braham, The Destruction of Romanian and Ukrainian Jews during the Antonescu Era (Boulder, Colo., 1997); motic.wiesenthal.com/text/x05/x0567.html.

CVETKOVIĆ Dragiša (15 January 1893, Niš–18 February 1969, Paris), Yugoslav politician. Cvetković studied law in Subotica. A member of the Serbian Radical Party, he began his political activity in the 1920s as a local government activist in Niš. Elected to the parliament (Skupstina) in 1927, he became minister of religious affairs a year later. After the royal coup d'état of 6 January 1929 and the assumption of dictatorial power by King Alexander Karajordjević, Cvetković joined the United Opposition a group of politicians of various parties that were in opposition to the monarch. After the king was assassinated in 1934, Cvetković linked up with the rightist Yugoslav Radical Union of Milan Stojadinović. As a result, in 1935 he was reelected to the Skupstina and joined the new government as minister of health and social policy. In the face of mounting political crisis, caused by ethnic conflicts and resistance to the authoritarian and pro-Fascist government of Stojadinović—this resistance was manifested in the elections of December 1938—Cvetković entered into an agreement with the regent, Prince Paul Karadjordjević, and Anton Korošec, leader of the Slovenes, and he contributed to the fall of the government on 3 February 1939. A quick political about-face and the trust of the real ruler (Prince Paul) of Yugoslavia helped Cvetković win the post of prime minister, which he assumed on 5 February 1939.

Cvetković's government attempted to abandon authoritarianism. In domestic policy, his most important step was an agreement (sporazum) signed with the Peasant Democratic Coalition of Vladko Maček on 26 August 1939, by which the existence of the Croatian nation was de facto recognized, Zagreb was formally granted broad autonomy (the so-called Croatian Banovina), and Maček joined the government as deputy prime minister. The agreement, which was to open the way to equal rights for Croats in Yugoslavia, turned out to be a tactical “cease-fire” between the two nations, and actually many provisions of this agreement were not enforced. In foreign policy, Cvetković tried to loosen ties with Germany, and, by declaring strict neutrality (also in the war that began with the German aggression against Poland), he sought rapprochement with Great Britain and France. However, relations with the Allies did not progress beyond the stage of contacts of the general staffs of both countries, nor beyond the stage of talks on the possible involvement of Yugoslavia in the war on the side of the Western countries. The Cvetković government was under strong pressure from Germany. This could be observed in a politically motivated increase in trade and the inflow of German capital; in the granting of preferences to the German minority; and in the adoption of anti-Jewish legislation. As the allies of the Third Reich surrounded Yugoslavia, Italy made territorial claims to Dalmatia, and actions were taken by Croatian separatists, Cvetković decided to officially declare strict neutrality in the ongoing war but also to accede to the Tripartite Pact. By signing the pact on 25 March 1941, the Axis states agreed to respect Yugoslav claims to Greek Salonika, and they exempted the Yugoslavs from the military provisions of the pact. However, these terms were not publicly announced.

The signing of the Tripartite Pact, to which Cvetković agreed reluctantly and after long pressure from Germany (Hitler had even threatened Yugoslavia with war), caused serious protests in Yugoslavia and created a breeding ground for a coup, which was staged two days later by a group of officers led by General Dušan Simović, who removed Prince Paul and Cvetković from power. As a result of the coup, at the beginning of April 1941 Yugoslavia was invaded and broken up by the Axis powers and neighboring countries. Cvetković remained in occupied Yugoslavia until 1943, and then he went into exile. In 1951–57 he published ten volumes of Dokumenti o Jugoslaviji (Documents about Yugoslavia). (AG)

Sources: Biographisches Lexikon, vol. 1; Enciklopedija Jugoslavije, vol. 2 (Zagreb, 1956); Jacob B. Hoptner, Yugoslavia in Crisis, 1934–1941 (New York, 1962); Ljubo Boban, Sporazum Cvetković-Maček (Belgrade, 1965); Dragiša N. Ristić, Yugoslavia's Revolution of 1941 (Stanford, 1966); Johann Wuescht, Jugoslawien und das Dritte Reich (Stuttgart, 1969); Waclaw Felczak and Tadeusz Wasilewski, Historia Jugostawii (Wrocław, 1985); Michał J. Zacharias, Jugostawia w polityce Wielkiej Brytanii 1940–1945 (Wrocław, 1987).

CVIJIĆ Džuro (25 October 1896, Zagreb–1937, USSR), Croatian Communist activist. The son of an accountant, Cvijić became active in the revolutionary movement in his youth. In 1912 he was sentenced to three years' imprisonment for his involvement in the preparation of the assassination of Slavko Cuvaj, the ban of Croatia. Released in 1914, he worked as a journalist. From 1917 to 1918 he served in the Austro-Hungarian Army, and after demobilization he was active in the Croatian Socialist Party and in the trade unions. At the founding congress of the Communist Party of Yugoslavia (CPY) in 1919 he became a member of its Central Committee and was head of the Croatian section. After the delegalization of the party in 1921 he went to Vienna, where he got in touch with the Comintern. Using the pseudonyms "Krešić" and "Kirsch," Cvijić traveled between Vienna and Zagreb, and he secretly edited the party's newspaper, Borba. In June 1923, as "Vladetić," he attended the Third Plenum of the Comintern's Executive Committee. When in April 1925 the Comintern dismissed the leadership of the CPY, he was appointed interim secretary of the party. In 1926 he opened the Third Congress of the party in Vienna, and in April 1928, after the ouster of Sima Marković, he became secretary general of the CPY. However, in October of that year, as a result of factious strife, the Comintern removed Cvijić as well. After his return to Zagreb he was arrested, and he spent two and a half years in prison. In 1932 he went to Vienna, where he edited the newspaper The Balkan Federation, and he worked for TASS, the Soviet news agency. In 1933 he spoke at the Reichstag fire trial, which was simultaneously held in London and Dresden and was organized by the Comintern. At the trial, Cvijić defended the Communist cause. In 1934 he was summoned to the USSR, where he worked at the Institute of Agriculture in Moscow. During the Great Purge in 1937 he was arrested and then executed. (WR)

Sources: Lazitch; Enciklopedija Jugoslavije, vol. 2 (Zagreb, 1966); Enciklopedija Leksigrafskog Zavoda, vol. 1 (Zagreb, 1966).

CYRANKIEWICZ Józef (23 April 1911, Tarnów–20 January 1989, Warsaw), Polish Socialist and Communist politician. Born into a white-collar family, Cyrankiewicz studied law at the Jagiellonian University in Kraków but did not graduate. From 1931 he belonged to the Polish Socialist Party (Polska Partia Socjalistyczna [PPS]), and from 1935 he was head of the PPS organization in Kraków. During World War II he was active in the underground PPS Freedom-Equality-Independence (Wolność, Równość, Niepodległość [PPS-WRN]) and in the inter-party political committee in Kraków. He was PPS-WRN candidate for deputy homeland delegate of the government-in-exile. In April 1941 he was arrested by the Nazis, detained in Montelupi Prison in Kraków, and then sent to concentration camps in Auschwitz and Mauthausen, where he co-organized clandestine structures. After his release, in the spring of 1945 Cyrankiewicz joined the leadership of the PPS, now under Communist control. He became a member of the PPS Supreme Board, and from July 1945 to December 1948 he was secretary general of its Central Executive Committee. Broken by the concentration camp experience and by the fatal evolution of the Polish cause at the end of World War II, he was among those Polish Socialists who chose close cooperation with the (Communist) Polish Workers' Party (Polska Partia Robotnicza [PPR]). From 1945 he supported crypto-Communists in the PPS leadership. In November 1946 he became minister without portfolio in the government of Edward Osóbka-Morawski.

After the elections to the Constituent Assembly (Sejm), tampered with by the Communists, on 5 February 1947 Cyrankiewicz became prime minister of the government dominated by the PPR. His candidature was approved in Moscow, and he followed the Moscow line—for instance, he gave up Polish participation in the Marshall Plan in July 1947. Many times he attacked Socialist leaders, such as Zygmunt Żuławski, who defended the integrity of the PPS. In 1948 Cyrankiewicz strove to merge the party with the PPR. During the “unification” congress in December 1948, he was elected to the Central Committee (CC) of the Polish United Workers’ Party (Polska Zjednoczona Partia Robotnicza [PUWP]). He also became a member of the PUWP CC Secretariat and Organization Bureau, and from March 1954 he was a member of the PUWP CC Politburo. From 1952 to 1955 he presided over the Main Board of the Society of Polish-Soviet Friendship, and from 1952 to 1956 he was a member of the Presidium of the All-Polish Committee of the National Front.

After the new constitution was passed in July 1952 and the head of the PUWP, Bolesław Bierut, took over the position of prime minister on 21 November 1952, Cyrankiewicz remained deputy prime minister, but as a result of the redistribution of power within the “collective leadership” promoted by the Kremlin after Stalin’s death, on 18 March 1954 he resumed the position of prime minister. He was active in anti-church actions, both in the early 1950s and in the 1960s, particularly during the celebration of the Millennium of Christianity in Poland in 1966. In June 1956 he sharply attacked workers demonstrating in Poznań, threatening them with “chopping off hands.” Apart from this, Cyrankiewicz was thought a cynical pragmatist and was not engaged in the struggle between the Puławska and Natolin factions. After October 1956 he closely cooperated with Władysław Gomułka. In March 1968 he sharply attacked demonstrating students. Replying to the parliamentary interpellation of Znak, a Catholic club, on this matter, on 10 April 1968 he made a long and demagogical speech supporting the official line.

In December 1970 Cyrankiewicz participated in a top emergency party task force to deal with the crisis connected with the protests of workers on the Baltic Coast. As prime minister, he accepted the decision made by the party leader, Gomułka, to shoot at the workers, and he implemented the decision through the police and military apparatus. Thus he was co-responsible for the massacre on the Baltic Coast. As a result of the dismissal of Gomułka’s ruling group, on 23 December 1970 Cyrankiewicz gave up the position of prime minister, but he was “kicked up” to the position of chairman of the Council of State. He held this position until 27 March 1972. In 1949–72 he was also chairman of the Supreme Council of the Union of Fighters for Freedom and Democracy, a Communist war veterans’ organization. In 1972 he was dropped from the list of candidates to the Sejm, and in December 1975, from the PUWP CC. From March 1973 to April 1986 he remained head of the All-Polish Peace Committee, and until July 1983 he was a member of the Presidium of the All-Polish Committee of the National Unity Front; the position really had a symbolic meaning: subsequent ruling groups were in fact recognizing his contribution to the introduction and strengthening of the Communist system in Poland. (PK)

Sources: Mołdawa; Eleonora and Bogusław Syzdkowie, Nim będzie zapomniany (Warsaw, 1986); Krystyna Kersten, Narodziny systemu władzy (Poznań, 1990); Paweł Machcewicz, Polski rok 1956 (Warsaw, 1993); Andrzej Albert [Wojciech Roszkowski], Najnowsza historia Polski 1914–1993, vol. 2 (Warsaw, 1995); Słownik Polityków Polskich XX w. (Poznań, 1998); Jerzy Eisler, Grudzień 1970 (Warsaw, 2000); Dariusz Stola, Kampania antysyjonistyczna w Polsce 1967–1968 (Warsaw, 2000).

CYWIŃSKI Bohdan (19 July 1939, Milanówek, near Warsaw), Polish historian and social activist. After attending Tadeusz Reytan High School in Warsaw, in 1961 Cywiński graduated in Polish studies from Warsaw University and in philosophy from the Catholic University of Lublin (Katolicki Uniwersytet Lubelski [KUL]). From 1960 he was active in the Catholic Intelligentsia Club in Warsaw. In 1962–65 he worked in the National Library; from 1966 he worked at the Catholic monthly, Znak, and in 1973–77 he was its editor-in-chief. He lectured at the Academy of Catholic Theology in Warsaw, at the KUL, and at the Pauline Higher Theological Seminar in Kraków. In 1971 he published Rodowody niepokornych (Genealogy of the unvanquished), which greatly stimulated and consolidated the Catholic and lay opposition to the Communist regime. Cywiński analyzed the formation of the Polish intelligentsia at the turn of the twentieth century, showing that Polish Catholicism included strong social, and even progressive, undercurrents, while lay Socialists were the leading patriotic force. Remembering the values of the “unvanquished” Polish Catholics, Socialists, and liberals was an important incentive for the Poles disappointed or frustrated by communism in the 1970s.

In 1976 Cywiński took part in protests against amendments to the Communist constitution that would include articles on the “leading role” of the Communist Party and the “alliance” with the USSR. In 1977 he co-organized a hunger strike in defense of imprisoned workers and members of the Committee for the Defense of Workers. In 1977–80 he belonged to the organizers of the Society of Scholarly Courses and lectured at the “Flying University,” which, despite assaults by Communist gangs, broke the state monopoly on education. He was arrested several times, and his apartment was frequently searched. In 1979 he protested before the chairman of the Council of State against the persecution of the free trade unions. In August 1980 he joined the Commission of Experts of the Inter-Factory Strike Committee in the Gdańsk shipyard, and in the spring of 1981 he became deputy editor-in-chief of the Solidarity weekly Tygodnik Solidarność. After the introduction of martial law Cywiński lived in Switzerland. He lectured in Geneva and Fribourg, and he edited the periodical Widnokrąg. After his return to Poland in 1991 he strove to unite the transformation efforts of the East Central European countries. In 1992–94 he lectured in Belorussia and Ukraine, and in 1995–98, at the University of Vilnius (Wilno). In 1995 he received a postdoctoral degree from the KUL. From 1999 he was a professor of contemporary history at the Warsaw Academy of Catholic Theology (now the Cardinal Stefan Wyszyński University). He also authored a collection of essays, Zatruta humanistyka (Contaminated humanities; 1979); Potęga jest i basta (It is mighty, period; 1981); and a history of Communist oppression of Catholic churches in East Central Europe, Ogniem próbowane (Ordeal by fire, 2 vols.; 1982–90) (AG)

Sources: Wielka encyklopedia PWN, vol. 6 (Warsaw, 2002); Andrzej Friszke, Opozycja polityczna w PRL 1945–1980 (London, 1994); wiem.onet.pl/wiem/00e4bd.html; www.uksw.edu.pl/wydzialy/wnhis/politol/struktura/biogramy/bohdan_cywinski.html.

CZAPIK Gyula [originally Géza Czékus] (3 December 1887, Szeged–25 April 1956, Budapest), Hungarian bishop. Born into a printer's family, after high school Czapik entered the theological seminary in Temesvár (Timișoara), and then he studied at the Pazmaneum in Vienna. Ordained in 1910, in 1911 he received a Ph.D. in theology at the Augustineum in Vienna. Later he worked as a tutor for the children of Regent Miklós Horthy, as a parish priest, and as a lecturer in the theological seminary in Szeged. From 1913 he was a professor of theology at the Higher Theological Academy in Temesvár. In 1918 he was appointed diocese prosecutor, and in 1919, deputy director of the theological seminary. When the Romanian troops entered Temesvár in 1919, he moved to Budapest. From 1922 he was papal chamberlain, from 1929 canon, from 1935 prelate, and from 1938 apostolic protonotary. In 1913–14 he edited the monthly Havi Közlöny; in 1917–18, Temesvári Neuer Post; and in 1920–39, Egyházi Lapok, Magyar Kultúra, and Utunk. In 1929 he founded, and from 1950 he directed, the Korda Press, which played an important role in Catholic publishing. He authored and translated a number of books and theological articles.

In July 1939 Czapik was appointed bishop of Veszprém. As a result he became a member of the Upper House. From May 1943 he was archbishop of Eger. Trying to adapt the Catholic Church to the new political circumstances, he played an important role in the preparation and signing of a compromise agreement with the Communist state in 1950. He took note of the dissolution of religious orders but tried his best to help the ousted monks and nuns. After the arrest of Archbishop József Grósz in May 1951, he became president of the Hungarian Episcopate. Two months later, the entire Hungarian hierarchy still at large, except for one auxiliary bishop, swore an oath of loyalty to the new constitution. Czapik tried to save what remained of church activity, but the price was his acceptance of Stalinist lawlessness and his participation in the international peace movement. For instance, in 1955 he spoke at a meeting of the World Council of Peace in Helsinki. He also endorsed the peace movement of Catholic priests, thus serving the interests of Communist propaganda. From 1954 until his death he was a member of the All-National Council of Peace and of the Presidium of the National Council of the Patriotic People's Front. (JT)

Sources: Magyar Életrajzi Lexikon, vol. 1 (Budapest, 1967); Magyar Nagylexikon, vol. 6 (Budapest, 1998); Magyarország 1944–1956, CD-ROM, 1956-os Intézet (Budapest, 2001); Új Magyar Életrajzi Lexikon, vol. 1 (Budapest, 2001).

CZAPIŃSKI Kazimierz (18 November 1882, Minsk–July 1941 Oświęcim [Auschwitz]), Polish Socialist politician. From 1900 to 1910 Czapiński was a member of the Russian Social Democratic Workers' Party and of the Social Democracy of the Kingdom of Poland and Lithuania. He studied law at the University of St. Petersburg but was expelled for agitating among workers. Repeatedly arrested, he remained under police surveillance, was later deported, and lived in forced exile. In 1904 in Geneva he met Vladimir Lenin. In 1907 Czapiński arrived in Kraków, where in 1909 he resumed legal studies at the Jagiellonian University. Expelled in 1911 for organizing student demonstrations, he lectured at people's universities. He also conducted lectures in philosophy and literature at the Kraków College of Academic Lectures. Although he moved away from the extreme revolutionary left, in 1914 he participated in causes supporting Lenin's release from jail. In 1910–19 Czapiński was a member of the Polish Social Democratic Party. From 1919 he belonged to the Polish Socialist Party (Polska Partia Socjalistyczna [PPS]). From 1920 to 1939 he was a member of the Chief Council of the PPS, and in 1921–39, of its Central Executive Committee. From 1919 to 1935 he was an MP and secretary of the Union of Polish Socialist Deputies. In February 1921 he was a delegate of the PPS to the founding congress of the Working Union of Socialist Parties (also known as the Vienna Union) in Vienna. He opposed the conclusion of the concordat and insisted on the separation of church and state. He advocated that schools and education be secular.

Czapiński was against the cooperation of the PPS with the Communists.

A devoted educator, in 1923 Czapiński co-founded the Workers' University Society. From 1924 to 1934 he was vice-president of this society, and in 1934–39 he was president of its Main Board. In 1937 he co-founded the Warsaw Democratic Club. He was involved in journalism and commented on international issues. From 1907 to 1914 he co-edited the periodical Przedświt. In 1914–19 he was editor of the magazine Naprzód. For many years he contributed to the newspaper Robotnik, and in 1935–39 he was its deputy editor-in-chief. On the eve of World War II Czapiński advocated the cooperation of Poland with the USSR and with the Little Entente. Arrested by the Germans in September 1940 and imprisoned in Pawiak Prison, on 6 February 1941 he was sent to the concentration camp in Auschwitz, where he died. He authored many works, including the following: Bankructwo bolszewizmu (Bankruptcy of Bolshevism; 1921); Czy socjaliści mogą walczyć razem z komunistami? Kwestia międzynarodówki i "jednego frontu" proletariatu (Can Socialists fight together with Communists? The question of the international and of the "united front" of the proletariat; 1922); Czarna ofensywa: Drogi i cele wojującego klerykalizmu (The black offensive: Ways and aims of militant clericalism; 1922); Socjalizm czy komunizm? (Socialism or communism? 1924); Państwo a Kościół: Konkordat Polski z Rzymem (The state and the Church: The Concordat between Poland and Rome; 1925); Faszyzm współczesny (Contemporary fascism; 1932); Świat na wulkanie: Krótki zarys sytuacji międzynarodowej (The world on the volcano: A short outline of the international situation; 1938). (JS)

Sources: Słownik Biograficzny Działaczy Polskiego Ruchu Robotniczego, vol. 1 (Warsaw, 1978); Encyklopedia Historii Drugiej Rzeczypospolitej (Warsaw, 1999); Michał Czajka, Marcin Kamler, and Witold Sienkiewicz, Leksykon Historii Polski (Warsaw, 1995); Jerzy Holzer, Polska Partia Socjalistyczna w latach 1917–1919 (Warsaw, 1962); Jan Tomicki, Norbert Barlicki, 1880–1941: Działalność polityczna (Warsaw, 1968); Aleksandra Tymieniecka, Polityka Polskiej Partii Socjalistycznej w latach 1924–1928 (Warsaw, 1969).

CZAPSKI Józef (3 April 1896, Prague–12 January 1993, Maisons-Lafitte, near Paris), Polish painter and art critic. Born into an aristocratic family from the Minsk area, in 1916 Czapski graduated from a high school in Petersburg and started law studies there. In 1917 he served in the Krechowce Uhlan Regiment. In October 1918 he entered the School of Fine Arts in Warsaw, Poland. At the turn of 1919 he went to Petrograd with a mission to find Polish officers captured by the Bolsheviks. In 1920 he took part in the Polish-Soviet war, and he was awarded the Order of Virtuti Militari. In 1924 he graduated from the Academy of Fine Arts in Kraków and became a co-founder of the artistic Paris Committee. Then Czapski left for France, where he studied at the Académie Ranson in Paris, met the leading French artists of that time, and organized many exhibitions. In 1931 he returned to Poland and published in the weekly Wiadomości Literackie, painted in the Colorist style, and exhibited in Poland and abroad. During the September 1939 campaign he fought as an officer. Captured by the Red Army, he was imprisoned in the Starobelsk, Pavlishchev Bor, and Gryazovets camps. After the signing of the Polish-Soviet agreement of July 1941, he was released, and on the orders of General Władysław Anders he searched for Polish officers who had been imprisoned in the Soviet camps of Kozelsk, Starobelsk, and Ostashkov but had disappeared. Since the Soviet authorities could not explain what had happened to them, his mission failed. It was later disclosed that these officers had met a tragic fate, murdered by the NKVD on the orders of the Soviet Politburo in March and April 1940. Evacuated with the army of General Anders via Iran and Iraq, Czapski got to Palestine, and then, along with the Polish Second Corps, he took part in the Italian campaign. After the war he settled in France, where he co-founded and (along with his sister Maria) edited the monthly Kultura in Paris. Continuing to adhere to Colorism and presenting simple themes (mostly landscapes and still lifes), Czapski painted a lot and took part in many exhibitions, mostly in France, Italy, Great Britain, Canada, and the United States. He published important memoirs of his experience in the USSR, Wspomnienia starobielskie (Starobelsk memoirs; 1944), and Na niehumannej ziemi (1949; Inhuman Land, 1951), as well as collections of essays: Oko (The eye; 1960); Tumult i widma (Turmoil and specters; 1981); Czytając (Reading; 1990); and Dzienniki (Diaries; 1986). (WR) Sources: Wielka encyklopedia PWN, vol. 6 (Warsaw, 2002); Murielle Werner-Gagnebin, Czapski: La main et l'espace (Lausanne, 1974); Joanna Pollakówna, Czapski (Warsaw, 1994); Wojciech Karpiński, Portret Czapskiego (Wrocław, 1996); Jan Zieliński, Józef Czapski: Krótki przewodnik po długim życiu (Warsaw, 1997).

CZERNIAKÓW Adam (30 November 1880, Warsaw–23 July 1942, Warsaw), Jewish social activist in Poland. Born into a family with assimilation tendencies, in 1908 Czerniaków graduated in chemistry from the Warsaw Polytechnic and in 1912 in industrial engineering in Dresden. He also studied at the Higher Trade School in Warsaw. Then he worked as a teacher. In 1909 he was briefly arrested by the Russian authorities for his part in the Polish independence conspiracy. In 1919–21 he was head of a section in the Ministry of Public Works; from 1927 to 1934 he was a member of the Warsaw City Council; and in 1931 he was appointed senator on behalf of the ruling Nonparty Bloc of Cooperation with the Government. He failed to take the oath, so he never took a senator's seat. He was active in education and published in Izraelita, Nasze Życie, and Handwerker Tsaytung. In 1938 he joined the commissionaire board of the Jewish Commune, imposed by the Polish authorities after the 1938 strikes; it antagonized both the Jewish left and the extreme right against him.

After the German invasion and in view of the departure of the Jewish Commune leaders, on 23 September 1939 Czerniaków was appointed by the president of Warsaw, Stefan Starzyński, as chairman of the Jewish Council (Judenrat). In this role he was recognized by the Nazi authorities. He turned down an offer to leave Poland. His activities aroused extreme feelings among the survivors of the Warsaw Ghetto. Czerniaków was perceived as someone who was assimilated in the Polish society and lacked a political background in the Jewish community, so his position was shaky. His main target was to secure the survival of the Jewish community, assuming a short duration of the war. He tried to make the Warsaw Ghetto institutions function, paid a lot of attention to maintaining Jewish education, and organized charity work—for instance, giving out food to the starving and homeless.

Czerniaków's activity had a price. Becoming a "transmission belt" for German decisions, he was hated by much of the Warsaw Ghetto community. With his consent the Jewish Council employed opportunists and careerists, including Gestapo agents. Some of his decisions were perceived as particularly traumatic. Quotas of slave workers supplied by the Warsaw Ghetto added to his troubles. He was also accused of inefficient intervention with the German authorities and of avoiding contacts with underground organizations. On the other hand, while the civic authorities of the German General Gouvernement tolerated him, the Nazi security apparatus treated him as a dangerous enemy. Unlike some other leaders of ghettos in the Polish territories, Czerniaków never tried to reap personal benefits from his activities, and when the Germans did not approve of the steps he had taken, he was seriously beaten several times. Until the end he was attached to the idea of Polish statehood, and despite German threats, he kept a portrait of Józef Piłsudski in his office. In July 1942 the German authorities demanded his cooperation in organizing deportations from the ghetto. Realizing that this most likely meant death for the deportees, Czerniaków chose to commit suicide. (AG)

Sources: Encyclopedia of the Holocaust, vol. 1 (New York, 1990); Roman Zimand, W nocy od 12 do 5 rano nie spałem (Paris, 1979); Adama Czerniakowa dziennik getta warszawskiego 6 IX

1939–23 VII 1942 (Warsaw, 1983); The Warsaw Diary of Adam Czerniakow: Prelude to Doom (Chicago, 1999); Jerzy Tomaszewski and Andrzej Żbikowski, eds., Żydzi w Polsce: Leksykon (Warsaw, 2001).

CZERNIN Ottokar, Count (Graf) von und zu Chudenitz (26 September 1872, Dimokur [now Dymokury]—4 April 1932, Vienna), head of Austro-Hungarian diplomacy. Czernin came from a family of the old Czech aristocracy that was loyal to the Habsburgs. After graduating from the German university in Prague, he entered the diplomatic service and was assigned to Paris and later to The Hague. His career was temporarily interrupted by a lung disease. From 1903 he sat in parliament, and from 1912, also in the Czech senate, where he was the backbone of conservatism and monarchism. He strongly opposed the introduction of universal suffrage. He considered the aristocracy as the pillar of the throne and of the empire. He was closely connected with Charles, the heir to the throne, and with Archduke Francis Ferdinand, thanks to whom he returned to the diplomatic service, this time as minister to Romania (1913–16). On 22 December 1916 Charles, as the new emperor, appointed him foreign minister for Austria-Hungary. Initially, Czernin yielded to the persuasion of the German ally and recognized the necessity of an unlimited sea war, with the use of (among other things) submarines. However, seeing the weakness of Austria-Hungary, he tried to induce Charles and the German command to sign a peace with the Entente, even at the price of Germany's returning Alsace and Lorraine to France. Czernin was hoping for territorial gains from Russia—for example, from Polish lands. He also planned to draw Serbia and Romania into a Danube federation in which Austria-Hungary would play a key role. In April 1917 he warned that if a peace was not concluded, the empire might not survive the following winter. His signing, on behalf of Austria-Hungary, of peace treaties with the Ukraine (9 February 1918), Bolshevik Russia (3 March 1918), and Romania (14 April 1918) was the culmination of his career. The terms of these treaties were advantageous to Austria-Hungary. On 16 April 1918 Czernin resigned, paying the political price for secret attempts by Charles and Sixtus of Bourbon-Parma, Charles's brother-in-law, to negotiate a separate peace with France. The disclosure of the secret correspondence by Georges Clemenceau, who aimed at the unconditional defeat of the Central Powers, discredited Czernin in the eyes of the Germans.

After the defeat of Austria-Hungary, Czernin settled in the imperial estates in Salzkammergut, Austria. He attempted to maintain his estates in Bohemia, but when they were lost as a result of Czechoslovak agrarian reforms, he settled permanently in Austria. Between 1920 and 1923 he served as a deputy of the Civic Labor Party (Bürgerliche Arbeitspartei) in the Austrian parliament, and then he went into political retirement. He was the author of several books, including Österreichs Wahlrecht und Parlament (Austrian electoral law and the parliament; 1905); Politische Betrachtungen (Political studies; 1908); and Im Weltkriege (In the world war; 1919). (WR) Sources: Biographisches Lexikon, vol. 1; Neue Deutsche Biographie, vol. Brajtjanu (New York, 1956); Holger H. Herwig and Neil M. Heyman, Biographical Dictionary of World War I (Westport, Conn., 1982); Ladislau Singer, Ottokar Graf Czernin (Graz, 1965); Robert A. Kann, Die Sixtusaffäre und die geheime Friedensverhandlungen Österreich-Ungarns im Ersten Weltkrieg (Vienna, 1966); Ingeborg Meckling, Die Aussenpolitik des Grafen Czernin (Munich, 1969); August Demblin, Minister gegen Kaiser (Vienna, 1997).

CZESZEJKO-SOCHACKI Jerzy (29 November 1892, Nieżyn, near Chernihov—4 September 1933, Moscow), Polish Socialist and Communist activist. Born into a white-collar family, after high school in Dzvinisk (Dyneburg, Daugavpils), from 1911 Czeszejko-Sochacki studied at the School of Law at Petersburg University, but he failed to graduate. He worked as a teacher in Wilno (Vilnius), Warsaw, and Syennitsa, near Minsk. In 1915 he joined the Polish Socialist Party (Polska Partia Socjalistyczna [PPS]), and in 1917, the Lithuanian Social Democratic Party. He worked on the editorial boards of Przegląd Wileński and Jedność Robotnicza. From 1919 he was secretary general and member of the Supreme Board and Central Executive Committee of the PPS. He was particularly concerned with education and belonged to the Main Board of the Union of Workers' Cooperatives. He represented a pro-Communist line in the party. In 1921 he was arrested and imprisoned for a few months in Warsaw. Suspended as a PPS member, he left the party, and in December 1921, with a group of followers, he joined the Communist Workers' Party of Poland (as of 1925 the Communist Party of Poland, Komunistyczna Partia Polski [KPP]). In 1921–25 he was a member of the illegal Communist Party Central Committee (CC), and in 1922 he was a co-founder and leader of the legal Union of Urban and Rural Proletariat. In 1925 he took part in the International Conference of Communists in Brussels.

In 1926–28 Czeszejko-Sochacki was an MP, filling the gap after another Communist deputy, Stanisław Łańcucki, had given up his mandate. He was also secretary of the Communist parliamentary club. In 1928 he was one of the key organizers of the electoral bloc Workers' and Peasants' Unity and was elected to the parliament from Będzin. In 1928 he escaped from Poland and was deprived of the mandate. He joined the CC of the Communist Party of Western Ukraine. From 1929 he was a member of the KPP CC; from 1930 he was its representative in the Executive Committee of the Communist International (Comintern) in Moscow, where he lived under the pseudonym "Jerzy Bratkowski." From 1931 a deputy member of the Presidium and Political Secretariat of the Comintern, in 1932 Czeszejko-Sochacki was dismissed from the KPP leadership because of his alleged role as a PPS provocateur. On 15 August 1933 he was arrested by the Soviet political police. He committed suicide. He was posthumously excluded from the KPP, but rehabilitated in 1956. (PK)

Sources: Parlament Rzeczypospolitej Polskiej 1919–1927 (Warsaw, 1928); Posłowie i senatorowie Rzeczypospolitej Polskiej 1919–1939: Słownik biograficzny (Warsaw, 1998); Jerzy Holzer, Polska Partia Socjalistyczna w latach 1917–1919 (Warsaw, 1962).

CZINEGE Lajos (26 March 1924, Karcag—10 May 1998, Leányfalu), Hungarian Communist activist. Czinege's father was a farm worker and then a postman. After primary school Czinege trained to become a blacksmith. In the fall of 1944 he joined the Metalworkers' Trade Union and in early 1945, the Hungarian Communist Party (HCP). As a well-known athlete, he became secretary of a local branch of the Hungarian Democratic Youth Union, controlled by the Communists. In 1946 he volunteered for the army, and in 1947 he was appointed HCP secretary in Karcag and sent to a two-month party school in Budapest. In 1948–51 he headed a section in the Hungarian Workers' Party (HWP) committee in Szolnok County and then in the Ministry of National Defense, where, without professional qualifications, he served as inspector in the Political Department and deputy commander of artillery for political affairs. At this time he graduated from the Military Political Academy. In 1954 he was made deputy head of the Administration Department of the HWP Central Committee (CC), and in 1955 he became its head.

At the beginning of the revolution, on 23 October 1956 Czinege became a member of the CC Military Commission and took part in the elaboration of a plan for a military crackdown on demonstrators. After the second Soviet intervention of 4 November 1956, he was appointed head of the Administration Department of the CC of the Hungarian Socialist Workers' Party (HSWP), and the next day he was put in charge of the special forces of the Ministry of Defense and Ministry of Interior. From January 1957 he organized the Workers' Guard. In 1957–60 he was first secretary of the HSWP Provincial Committee in Szolnok County. From 1958 to 1967 he was an MP, and from 1959 to 1988, a member of the HSWP CC. From May 1960 to December 1984 he was minister of national defense. In 1961 he also became head of the National Defense Commission of the party CC. In 1960 he was promoted to general of a division, in 1962 to general of arms, and in 1979 to general of the army. He supervised the participation of the Hungarian Army in the Warsaw Pact intervention in Czechoslovakia in August 1968. In 1961–70 he was a deputy member of the party Politburo; it was a rather low rank, considering that other ministers of defense of the Warsaw Pact countries were usually full Politburo members. From December 1984 to June 1987 Czinege was deputy prime minister, and then he retired. In November 1989, when various embezzlement scandals were revealed in the army, he gave up his military rank. (JT)

Sources: Magyar Nagylexikon, vol. 6 (Budapest, 1998); A magyar forradalom és szabadságharc enciklopédiája, CD-ROM (Budapest, 1999); Új Magyar Életrajzi Lexikon, vol. 1 (Budapest, 2001); Bennet Kovrig, Communism in Hungary from Kun to Kádár (Stanford, 1979); Klaus-Detlev Grothusen, ed., Ungarn (Göttingen, 1987); Miklós Molnár, From Béla Kun to János Kádár: Seventy Years of Hungarian Communism (New York, 1990).

CZUMA Andrzej (17 December 1938, Lublin), Polish activist of the democratic opposition. Born into an intelligentsia family of patriotic traditions, in 1963 Czuma graduated in law and administration from Warsaw University. At the same time he studied history at the Catholic University of Lublin. He worked as a legal adviser in the Ministry of Transportation and in the District Administration of the Polish State Railways in Warsaw. In 1965 he co-founded a pioneer secret opposition organization, Ruch (Movement). In June 1970 he was arrested for preparations to set fire to the Lenin Museum in Poronin. He refused to testify, although he was threatened with a death sentence. In the Ruch trial in October 1971 he received the longest sentence: seven years in prison. Released owing to an amnesty in September 1974, he favored the continuation of the secret activities. In March 1977 he co-founded the secret Independence Stream, and he also co-organized an open Movement for the Defense of Human and Civil Rights (Ruch Obrony Praw Człowieka i Obywatela [ROPCiO]). He co-edited the ROPCiO periodical, Opinia. In October he took part in a hunger strike at Holy Cross Church in Warsaw in protest against the arrest of the Czechoslovak organizers of Charter 77. He was arrested several dozen times, but owing to the détente policies of the Edward Gierek regime, for short periods only. In March 1981 he became an adviser to the Inter-Factory Founding Committee of Solidarity in Katowice. He also edited the daily Wiadomości Katowickie of the Solidarity Regional Board in Silesia. In mid-1981 Czuma tried to organize the Movement for Independence (Ruch Niepodległościowy) as a political party, but he failed. Interned after the introduction of martial law in December 1981, he was released in December 1982, and he cooperated with the underground Solidarity structures. In 1985 he left for the United States, where he became co-owner of a radio station in Chicago and (in 1988) owner of an information radio program, the Czuma Radio Show. (WR)

Sources: Opozycja w PRL: Słownik biograficzny 1956–89 (Warsaw, 2000); Wielka encyklopedia PWN, vol. 6 (Warsaw, 2002).

D

DĄBAL Tomasz (29 December 1890, Sobów, near Tarnobrzeg–21 August 1937, Moscow), Polish Communist and Peasant Party activist. From 1909 to 1911 Dąbal studied law in Vienna and medicine in Kraków. From 1909 he was active in the Polish Peasant Party in Galicia, and in 1913 he joined the Polish Peasant Party–Piast. During World War I he served in the Austro-Hungarian Army and in the Polish Legions. In November 1918, he attempted to instigate a peasant revolution, and with a priest, Eugeniusz Okoń, he founded the Tarnobrzeg Republic. As a gifted speaker Dąbal became an MP of the Polish Peasant Party-Left in the elections of 1919. However, he soon left the party, became involved with the Communists, and joined the Communist Polish Workers' Party. In 1920 he was the only MP to support the Soviets in the Polish Sejm. In July 1921 Dąbal, along with Stanisław Łańcucki, founded the parliamentary club of the Communists. In November 1921 he was deprived of his immunity and arrested for anti-state agitation. Sentenced to six years in July 1922, in 1923 he was exchanged for Polish prisoners in the USSR, and he left for Russia. He worked in the Executive Committee of the Third International as a secretary for agriculture, and in October 1923 he became vice-president of the Peasant International (Krestintern). After Stalin's victory over his rivals in the Bolshevik party, Dąbal went to Minsk, where he started his academic career in the Belorussian Academy of Sciences. In 1932 he was appointed its vice-president. In 1932–37 he was also a member of the Central Committee of the Belorussian Communist Party (Bolshevik). During the purge of Polish Communists in the USSR in December 1936, Dąbal was arrested, sentenced to death on 31 July 1937, and executed. His wife spent eight years in prisons and forced labor camps, one of his two sons died of hunger in an orphanage, and the other survived and returned to Poland with his mother in 1957. Dąbal's publications include Powstanie krakowskie (The Kraków uprising; 1926); Polacy Związku Radzieckiego (The Poles in the Soviet Union; 1926); and Zametki o krestianskom dvizhenii v Ievrope (Notes on the peasant movement in Europe; 1927). (WR)

Sources: Postowie . . ., vol. 1; J. D. Jackson, Comintern and Peasant in East Europe, 1919–1930 (New York, 1966); Henryk Cimek, Tomasz Dąbal 1890–1937 (Rzeszów, 1993).

DABČEVIĆ-KUČAR Savka (6 December 1923, Korčula), Croatian Communist activist and economist. Dabčević-Kučar came from a family with a rich civic tradition going back to the Habsburg monarchy. During World War II she took part in an anti-German conspiracy. After the war she studied economics at the universities in Leningrad and Zagreb, where she received a Ph.D. In 1951–71 she worked at the Department of Economics of Zagreb University, gradually advancing to professor. Connected very early on with the Communist movement, from 1961 to 1966 she was a deputy to the republican parliament and a member of the Yugoslav delegation to the UN General Assembly. In 1967–68 she headed the Croatian republican government, and in 1969 she became chairman of the Central Committee of the League of Communists of Croatia. She supported the movement for the wider autonomy of the Croatian republic within the Yugoslav federation, called the Croatian Spring. After Josip Broz Tito condemned “Croatian nationalism” at a meeting of the Presidium of the League of Yugoslav Communists in Karadjordjevo in December 1971, Dabčević-Kučar was dismissed from all her party and state positions, as well as from the university. A far-reaching purge in the Croatian party followed.

Dabčević-Kučar returned to public life in the spring of 1990, when in the first free elections she ran on behalf of the Coalition of National Understanding, which included the Social Democrats, liberals, and Greens. The coalition won 9.4 percent of the vote and 3.8 percent of the mandates. In the fall of 1990, the leaders of the Croatian Spring founded the Croatian National Party (Hrvatska Narodna Stranka [HNS]). Dabčević-Kučar became the chairperson of the party, whose name alluded to the first modern Croatian party, established in the nineteenth century. The HNS was meant as a nationalist alternative to the ruling Croatian Democratic Union and a leftist alternative to the post-Communists, but it failed. In the elections of 1992 it gained 6.6 percent of the vote, and in the presidential election Dabčević-Kučar won 6.0 percent of the vote. The HNS entered various center-right coalitions, which helped it to survive in the parliament. After the elections of 1995 a coalition of five parties, including the HNS, won 20 mandates, and Dabčević-Kučar resigned from the HNS leadership. She authored, among other works, the following: Politička ekonomija (Political economy; 1954); John Maynard Keynes: Teoretičar državnog kapitalizma (John Maynard Keynes: Theoretician of state capitalism; 1957); Osnovne zakonitosti u proizvodnji, razmjeni, raspodjeli i potrošnji u socijalizmu (Basic rules of production, exchange, distribution, and consumption under socialism; 1960); SKH u političkoj akciji (The League of Communists of Croatia in political action; 1971); and '71: Hrvatski snovi i stvarnost ('71: Croatian dreams and reality; 1997). (AW)

Sources: Tko je tko u Hrvatskoj (Zagreb, 1993); Robert Stallaerts and Jeannine Laurens, Historical Dictionary of the Republic of Croatia (London, 1995); Klaus-Detlev Grothausen, ed., Südosteuropa Handbuch, Band I–Jugoslavien (Göttingen, 1975); Ante Čuvalo, The Croatian National Movement, 1966–1972 (Boulder, Colo., 1990); Karen Dawisha and Bruce Parrot, eds., Politics, Power and the Struggle for Democracy in South-East Europe (Cambridge, 1997).

DĄBROWSKA Maria (6 October 1889, Russów, near Kalisz–19 May 1965, Warsaw), Polish writer, translator, and social activist. Dąbrowska came from an impoverished noble family. From 1901 to 1906 she studied at girls' boarding schools in Kalisz and Warsaw. She studied the natural sciences at the University of Lausanne and at the Université Libre in Brussels, where she obtained the degree of Candidate of Natural Sciences in 1912. She simultaneously studied social science and philosophy and worked for the Joachim Lelewel Polish Association, a patriotic organization in exile. She also maintained contacts with Polish workers employed in Belgian mines. In 1910 she started writing for Zaranie, Spółem, Gazeta Kaliska, Przedświt, and Gazeta Robotnicza. In 1911 she married Marian Dąbrowski, a Socialist activist. She made her literary debut in 1913. Between 1913 and 1914 she was in London on a scholarship funded by the Society of Supporters of the Cooperative Movement (Towarzystwo Kooperatystów); she herself was involved in the cooperative movement. In July 1914 she returned to Poland. She lived in Piotrków and Lublin and from 1917 in Warsaw, where she aligned herself with the independence movement. She also was affiliated with a radical faction of the peasant movement and co-edited the magazines Chłopska Sprawa and Polska Ludowa and the youth magazine W słońcu.

From 1918 to 1924 Dąbrowska worked for the government as head of a department in the Ministry of Agriculture and State Property and in the Ministry of Agrarian Reforms, where she was in charge of the library and the press and editorial department. From 1924 she dedicated herself only to writing. She was involved politically in 1926, taking part in protest actions organized by the League for the Defense of Human and Citizen Rights. From 1926 she was in a relationship with Stanisław Stempowski, a Freemason and liberal journalist. From 1930 she was a member of the Polish PEN club. In 1935 she refused to accept the Golden Laurel Award from the Polish Academy of Literature because she considered the academy too closely linked with the sanacja government. From 1936 she worked for the Central Cooperative Union (Centralny Związek Spółdzielczy). From 1938 she belonged to the board of the Warsaw branch of the Polish Writers' Trade Union.

After September 1939, along with Stempowski, Dąbrowska lived in the Eastern Borderland occupied by the USSR. She lived in Łuck and Lwów (Lviv), and in 1941 she returned to Warsaw. She was active in the underground cultural movement. During the Warsaw Uprising she was in Warsaw, and after the end of the fighting she left the capital. From 1947 to 1962 she was vice-president of the Main Board of the Polish PEN club. In 1948 she joined the Organizational Committee of the World Congress of Intellectuals for Peace in Wrocław. She took part in the work of the Polish Writers' Union, and from 1956 she was a member of the board of the union. In 1955 she received a First Degree State Award for her literary work. In 1956 she was a member of the Polish delegation to the International Congress of PEN Clubs in London. In 1957 she was awarded an honorary doctorate from Warsaw University. In 1964 she was one of the signatories of the "Letter of 34," which was seen as the first protest since October 1956 of writers and scholars against Communist cultural policies.

Dąbrowska's writing evolved from positivism to modernist realism. Her most important works include the stories Ludzie stamtąd (Folks from over yonder; 1926) and Marcin Kozera: Opowiadania (Marcin Kozera: Stories; 1927); the monumental novel that was an apotheosis of her work, Noce i dni (Nights and days; 1932–37); a collection of war stories, Gwiazda zaranna (The morning star; 1955); a second monumental novel, Przygody człowieka myślącego (Adventures of a thinker; 1970); and the dramas Geniusz sierocy (Genius of an orphan; 1939) and Stanisław i Bogumił (1945–46). She also authored numerous essays and translations, as well as works on the cooperative movement and on economics—for example, Życie i dzieło Edwarda Abramowskiego (The life and work of Edward Abramowski; 1925) and Ręce w uścisku: Rzecz o spółdzielczości (Hands in a shake: On the cooperative movement; 1938). Throughout her life Dąbrowska wrote her Dzienniki (Diaries). The first five-volume edition of the diaries, abridged by censorship, appeared in 1988, and in 1998–99 it was supplemented by another three volumes. (PK)

Sources: Andrzej Kijowski, Maria Dąbrowska (Warsaw, 1964); Ewa Korzeniewska, Maria Dąbrowska: Poradnik bibliograficzny (Warsaw, 1969); Ewa Korzeniewska, Maria Dąbrowska: Kronika życia (Warsaw, 1971); Współcześni polscy pisarze i badacze literatury: Słownik bibliograficzny, vol.2 (Warsaw, 1994); Grażyna Borkowska, Maria Dąbrowska i Stanisław Stempowski (Kraków, 1999); Literatura polska XX wieku: Przewodnik encyklopedyczny (Warsaw, 2000).

DĄBROWSKI Bronisław (2 November 1917, Grodziec, near Konin–25 December 1997, Warsaw), archbishop, secretary of the Polish Episcopate. Dąbrowski came from an artisan family. His father perished in the Polish-Soviet war. In 1935 Dąbrowski entered the Orionist Order of the Roman Catholic Church. At first he studied in the order's seminary in Zduńska Wola and then in Rome. After the German invasion of Poland in 1939, he returned to Poland, where he continued his studies and worked in the Orionist Order in Warsaw. He also studied at the clandestine Pedagogical Department of Warsaw University. He graduated in 1943, and then he managed an Orionist dormitory for boys in Warsaw. He survived the Warsaw Uprising; after its failure he was placed in an internment camp in Bitenheim, near Dachau, Germany. Upon his return to Poland, in June 1945 Dąbrowski was ordained. He worked among youngsters in Warsaw, and in 1948 he started working at the Secretariat of the Polish Episcopate, where he was entrusted with the Department of Orders of the Secretariat of the Primate of Poland. He held this post until 1992. It was thanks to his endeavors (among those of others) that despite threats and repression under Stalinism, religious orders in Poland were not liquidated and stayed united with the diocese hierarchy. Dąbrowski was later a member of the Vatican Congregation for Institutes of Consecrated Life and Societies of Apostolic Life, as well as chairman of the Commission for Religious Orders of the Polish Episcopate. On 16 November 1961 Pope John XXIII nominated him auxiliary bishop of Warsaw. On 25 March 1962 he was consecrated by Primate Stefan Wyszyński.

In 1969–92 Dąbrowski was secretary of the Polish Episcopate, working closely with Primate Wyszyński and Primate Józef Glemp. On 8 June 1982 Pope John Paul II elevated him to archbishop. Dąbrowski was a member of the Joint Commission of the Polish Government and Episcopate. He took part in all the major talks of the Polish bishops with the Communist authorities. In 1972 he played an important role in the negotiations of the Polish Communist government with Pope Paul VI on the creation of new church structures in the new Polish territories in the north and west. From 1979 he co-organized five pilgrimages of Pope John Paul II to Poland. In talks with the Communist authorities he was also an advocate of all-national and social questions. In February 1981 in Bielsko-Biała he took part in talks that led to the termination of a long strike in the Beskidy region and to the resolution of a sharp conflict between the Communist authorities and Solidarity. During the period of martial law he demanded the release of all political prisoners. On behalf of the Episcopate he took part in the negotiations that brought about a political breakthrough and led to the Round Table Talks and the June 1989 elections, won by the opposition. A record of his meetings with the Polish Communist authorities was published as Rozmowy z władzami PRL: Arcybiskup

Dąbrowski w służbie Kościoła i narodu (Negotiations with the authorities of Communist Poland: Archbishop Dąbrowski in the service of the Church and the nation; 1995). In 1990 the Catholic University of Lublin granted him an honorary doctorate, and in 1993 President Lech Wałęsa awarded him the Commander's Cross with Star of the Polonia Restituta Order. (AGr)

Sources: Peter Raina, Rozmowy z władzami PRL: Arcybiskup Dąbrowski w służbie Kościoła i narodu, vols. 1–2 (Warsaw, 1995); Peter Raina, Kościół w PRL: Kościół katolicki a państwo w świetle dokumentów 1945–1989, vols. 1–3 (Poznań, 1994–95); Pelplin 1996; Biuletyn Prasowy Katolickiej Agencji Informacyjnej, 30 December 1997; Peter Raina, Arcybiskup Dąbrowski—rozmowy watykańskie (Warsaw, 2001); Henryk Łechtkański, “Abp Bronisław Dąbrowski,” Gazeta Wyborcza, 24–26 December 2002.

DĄBSKI Jan (10 April 1880, Kukizów, near Lwów [Lviv]–5 June 1931, Warsaw), Polish Peasant Party politician. The son of a peasant, after graduating from a high school in Lwów in 1900, Dąbski studied law for a year, and then he graduated in chemistry from the University of Lwów (1906). During his studies he was active in the Society of Popular Schools and served in the Austrian Army. In 1905 he joined the Polish Peasant Party (Polskie Stronnictwo Ludowe [PSL]), and in 1906 he was elected to its Supreme Council. After he brought about a split in the party in 1908, he founded the Independent Peasant Party. From 1911 he was active in the Polish Riflemen Teams, and in 1912–13 he belonged to the Provisional Commission of Confederated Independence Parties (Tymczasowa Komisja Skonfederowanych Stronnictw Niepodległościowych). In 1914 Dąbski joined the PSL Piast. He was a member of the pro-Austrian Supreme National Committee. He served in the Polish Legions. In 1917–18 he was active in the Popular Union (Zjednoczenie Ludowe), and then, in 1918, he attracted a part of its membership to the PSL Piast. He was deputy chairman of its Main Board, and from 1920, also of its Supreme Council.

In January 1919 Dąbski was elected to the Constituent Assembly on behalf of the PSL Piast, and from March 1920 to October 1921 he was deputy minister of foreign affairs. He headed the Polish delegation to the peace talks with Soviet Russia, and on 18 March 1921 he signed the Polish-Soviet Peace Treaty of Riga. From mid-May to mid-June 1921 he directed the Foreign Ministry. He opposed the formation of a center-right government (the so-called Chjeno-Piast government of Wincenty Witos), and in 1923 he left the PSL to establish the PSL-Peasant Unity, which, along with the PSL-Liberation faction, joined the Union of Polish Peasant Parties. In 1923–25 Dąbski was its deputy chairman. Elected to the parliament in 1922, 1928, and 1930, he played an important role in the elaboration of the land reform of 1925. In 1926 he was co-founder of the Peasant Party (Stronnictwo Chłopskie), then he became a member of its Main Board, and in 1929–30 he was chairman of its Chief Executive Committee. At first he supported the May coup d'état of 1926, but in 1927 he joined the opposition. From 1928 the deputy speaker of the Lower House, in 1929 Dąbski co-organized the Centrolew, a coalition of center and leftist parties against the ruling sanacja. After the unification of the peasant movement in 1931, he was active in the Peasant Party (Stronnictwo Ludowe). He was the first chairman of the Union of Polish Journalists, chairman of the Union of Legionnaires, and a member of the Executive Department of the International Union of Radical Parties in Paris. He took part in the proceedings of the Green International of Peasants. He published in many newspapers, including Kurier Lwowski (1919–23 editor-in-chief), Przyjaciel Ludu, Gazeta Ludowa (1908–13 and 1915–26 editor-in-chief), Gazeta Chłopska, and Polityka. He also authored the following books: Walka o Sejm Ludowy (Struggle for a popular parliament; 1919); Pokój ryski: Wspomnienia, pPertraktacje, tajne układy z Joffem, listy (Peace Treaty of Riga: Negotiations, secret agreements with Joffe, letters; 1931); and Wojna i ludzie: Wspomnienia z lat 1914–1915 (War and people: Memoirs of 1914–1915; 1969). (JS)

Sources: PSB, vol. 5; Posłowie i senatorowie Rzeczypospolitej Polskiej, 1919–1939: Słownik biograficzny, vol. 1 (Warsaw, 1998); Słownik biograficzny działaczy ruchu ludowego (Warsaw, 1989); Kto był kim w Drugiej Rzeczypospolitej, vol. 1 (Warsaw, 1994); Przywódca ruchu ludowego: Szkice biograficzne (Warsaw, 1968); Stanisław Giza, Jan Dąbski: Całe życie dla ludu (Warsaw, 1979); Bernard Singer, Od Witosa do Stawka (Warsaw, 1990).

DALBOR Edmund (30 October 1869, Ostrów Wielkopolski–13 February 1926, Poznań), cardinal, Primate of Poland. Dalbor graduated from high school in Ostrów, and then he studied theology in Münster; in 1892–94 he studied canon law at the Gregorianum in Rome, where he received a Ph.D. Ordained on 26 February 1893, in 1894–99 he worked in the Poznań curia, and then he taught canon law in the theological seminary in Gniezno. In 1901 he became canon metropolitan in Poznań and in 1909 vicar general; on 30 June 1915 he was appointed archbishop of Poznań and Gniezno. He assumed the office under complicated circumstances, when the German Army was occupying the former (Russian) Kingdom of Poland and taking control of most of the Polish territory. The German authorities hoped for a friendly attitude on the part of the Poles, but the ingress of Dalbor in September 1915 and his first announcements were not to their liking. On the other hand, Dalbor's grateful letter to Emperor William II on the occasion of the Act of 5 November 1916 was unwelcome among the Poles. Dalbor organized charity and ministry for the Polish prisoners of war and refugees, and in 1918 he protested to the German authorities against the assaults of German soldiers and functionaries on churches. In December 1918 he became a member of the Provincial Parliament in Poznań and allowed the Polish clergy to take part in the Greater Polish Uprising and in plebiscite propaganda in Upper Silesia, Ermland, and Mazuria. At the end of 1918 he organized the first conference of Polish bishops; it passed a resolution in which they appealed to the clergy and believers to unite for the reinstatement of Polish statehood. Soon Dalbor established the Primate's Chancellery in Warsaw, which later turned into the Office of the Polish Episcopate. As a metropolitan of the oldest Polish archdiocese, Dalbor actually became the primate of united Poland. On 18 December 1919 he was appointed cardinal. In July 1920 he co-authored a letter of the Polish Episcopate appealing for a defense of the nation against the Bolshevik invasion. He organized ministry for the Poles living in France and Germany. He strove to regulate the legal status of the Catholic Church in Poland, and his efforts were noticeable in the March 1921 constitution and in the concordat of 10 February 1925. From 1922 his health was poor, and he was less and less active. (WR)

Sources: PSB, vol. 4; Encyklopedia katolicka, vol. 3 (Lublin, 1979); Ks. Józef Glemp, "Ksiądz prymas kardynał Edmund Dalbor," Prawo kanoniczne 1974, nos. 3–4; Feliks Lenort, ed., Na stolicy prymasowskiej w Gnieźnie i Poznaniu (Poznań, 1982).

DAMIANOV Georgi (23 September 1892, Lopushna, near Montana–27 November 1958, Sofia), Bulgarian Communist activist. In 1911 Damianov graduated from high school in Vratsa, and he became a village teacher. From 1912 he belonged to the faction of "close Socialists" (Tesnyaki) of the Bulgarian Social Democratic Party cooperating with the Russian Bolsheviks. After graduating from a school for reserve officers in 1915, he took part in World War I operations, conducting antiwar agitation. From 1919 he was a member of the Vratsa district committee of the Bulgarian Communist Part (BCP). One of the leaders of the September 1923 uprising in the Vratsa region, after its failure he escaped to the Kingdom of Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes. In Bulgarian he was sentenced to death in absentia. In exile he cooperated with the BCP Foreign Committee. At the end of 1925 he left for the USSR. After graduating from the Frunze Military Academy in 1929, he served as an officer of the Red Army, and then he taught tactics and chemistry in this academy (1932–34). On the orders of Georgi Dimitrov, in 1934 Damianov was sent to work in the Personnel Department of the Communist International (Comintern). In 1935 he became a member of the BCP Central Committee (CC). He illegally returned to Bulgaria, where he was a member of a three-man commission to “free” the party of “sectarian elements.” In February 1936, when the BCP CC adopted the tactics of the Popular Front, Damianov became a member of the CC Politburo. In 1937 he left for the USSR again, where he was a member of the BCP Foreign Committee and head of the Personnel Department of the Comintern. He was a political inspector of the International Brigades during the Spanish Civil War, and he adopted Soviet citizenship.

During World War II Damianov served in the Red Army, preparing Communist cadres to take over power in Bulgaria. In October 1944 he returned to Bulgaria to direct the Military Department of the Communist Party. At the Eighth Plenum of CC in 1945 he returned to its Politburo and in 1946 joined its Secretariat. In 1945 he became a major general and in 1947 a lieutenant general. From November 1946 to May 1950 he was minister of defense (until December 1947, the title was minister of war) in the governments of Georgi Dimitrov, Vasyl Kolarov, and Vulko Chervenkov. In this capacity he was responsible for a bloody purge in the army. His strong position in the power structure was due to his long-term and wide contacts in the Soviet General Staff. From 1945 until his death he was an MP to the National Assembly, and from 1950 until his death he was chairman of the parliamentary Presidium. (JJ)

Sources: Lazitch; Entsiklopediya Bulgariya, vol. 2 (Sofia, 1981); J. F. Brown, Bulgaria under Communist Rule (New York, 1970); Tosho Tashev, Ministrite na Bulgariya 1879–1999: Entsiklopedichen Spravochnik (Sofia, 1999); Evgenia Kalinova and Iskra Baeva, Bulgarskite prekhodi 1944–1999 (Sofia, 2000); Angel Tsurakov, Entsiklopediya: Pravitelstvata na Bulgariya: Khronologiya na politicheskiya zhivot 1879–2001 (Sofia, 2001).

DANEV Stoyan (7 February 1858, Shumen–29 July 1949, Sofia), Bulgarian politician and scholar. As a high school student in Shumen, in 1876 Danev joined a revolutionary circle and had to leave the country. In 1878 he graduated from high school in Prague, and then he studied law in Zurich and Heidelberg, where he received a Ph.D. in 1881. Later he also studied law and political science in London and at the Sorbonne. From 1884 he had a law practice in Sofia and lectured at Sofia University (1894–98). He also published in the periodicals Sredets, Svetlina, and Bulgariya. At first he was connected with the Liberal Party, and from 1889 he headed the Progressive Liberal Party. He was a radical Russophile and called for the territorial expansion of Bulgaria. He strove for the annexation of Turkish Macedonia together with Serbia. He thought the best solution for the Balkans would be a Bulgarian-Serbian federation at the expense of the Ottoman Empire.

From March 1901 to January 1902 Danev was minister of foreign and religious affairs in the government of Petko Karavelov, and from 4 January 1902 to 19 May 1903 he was prime minister. He closely cooperated with Russian diplomacy and gained its support in economic negotiations in Paris, but he failed to solve the Macedonian question. Acting under pressure from the great powers, he entered into a conflict with the Internal Macedonian Revolutionary Organization and dissolved its structures in 1903. Russian pressure made him appoint a Serbian metropolitan alongside the Bulgarian metropolitan, which led to the fall of his cabinet. In 1911 he was elected speaker of the Great National Assembly. During the Balkan Wars he was foreign minister again, and from 14 June to 17 July 1913, prime minister. He took part in the negotiations that followed the First Balkan War in 1912. He did not support the policy of Tsar Ferdinand, which led to the outbreak of the Second Balkan War. Danev disagreed with a sudden Bulgarian attack on Greece and Serbia in order to recover Macedonia. He was right, since the Bulgarian offensive was stopped, Greece and Serbia were supported by Romania and Turkey, and Bulgaria was defeated. As a result he resigned.

For several years Danev stayed in the opposition. He returned to the University of Sofia, where he became professor of law (1916–34). In 1931 he published Ocherk na diplomaticheskata istoriya na balkanskita dyrzhavi (Outline of diplomatic history of the Balkan states). An opponent of Bulgaria’s entry into World War I, he was minister of finance in the governments of Todor Todorov and Aleksandur Stamboliyski (1919–20). Later he joined the United National Progressive Party within the Constitutional Bloc. After the Stamboliyski regime was toppled in June 1923, Danev was elected to the parliament and advocated rapprochement with the Kingdom of Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes; with Czechoslovakia; and, despite his anti-Communist attitude, with Soviet Russia. He published memoirs and contributions to the diplomatic history of the Balkan Wars. After retirement he was active in the Bulgarian Red Cross. In 1992 his Memoari (Memoirs) were published. (MC) klopedichen spravocnik (Sofia; 1999); www.minfin.government.bg/en/index.html.

Sources: Biographisches Lexikon, vol. 1; Entsiklopediya Bulgariya, vol. 2 (Sofia, 1981); Stephen Constant, Foxy Ferdinand, 1861–1948, Tsar of Bulgaria (London, 1979); Richard J. Crompton, Bulgaria 1878–1983: A History (Boulder, Colo., 1983); Richard C. Hall, Bulgaria’s Road to the First World War (Boulder, Colo., 1996); Tasho Tashev, Ministrite na Bulgariya 1879–1999: Entsi-

DANI Riza (1884, Shkodër–October 1949?), Albanian politician. Born into a Muslim family, Dani studied in a madrassa, and then he graduated from higher studies in Istanbul. In 1908–11 he was active in patriotic clubs, affiliated with the outstanding artists and cultural activists Gjergji Fishta and Luigji Gurakuqi. During World War I he was active in the National Faction (Krahu Kombëtar) in Shkodër, which he left in 1919, becoming its active adversary. In 1924 he was elected to the parliament. During the 1924 revolution he supported Fan Noli and directed the Durrës prefecture. After the failure of the revolution he emigrated and was sentenced to death in absentia. He lived in Italy, Austria, and Yugoslavia. He returned to Albania in 1939, and he worked as a merchant in Shkodër. In 1945 he was elected chairman of the National Council in Shkodër, and then he became an MP. In view of the lack of a political alternative to the Communists, Dani became the leader of the parliamentary opposition. During the election of the parliamentary Presidium he opposed the submission of candidates by the Communists only and suggested other candidates. He also opposed a resolution suggested by Koçi Xoxe and Sejfulla Malëshova that was aimed at making it impossible for the parliament to criticize the government. Along with three other deputies, on 23 December 1946 Dani was deprived of immunity and soon arrested. His followers, called the “group of deputies” were accused by the Communists of founding an independent political party and of plotting in connection with the “Postryba movement” (anti-Communist riots in Postryba on 9 September 1946). Dani was tried in a show trial, and on 31 December 1947 he was sentenced to death. The exact date of the execution is not known. (TC)

Sources: Bashkimi, 25 November 1945; Demir Dyrmishi, “Krijimi i organizatës opozitare nacionaldemokratike dhe veprimtaria e saj ne asamblene kushtetuese (1944–mars 1946),” Studime Historike, 1995; Pjeter Pepa, Dosja e diktatures (Tirana, 1995); Sejfi Vllamasi, Ballafaqime politike ne Shqipëri (1897–1942) (Tirana, 1995).

DANKERS Oskars (26 March 1883, Lielaucis, Courland–11 April 1965, Grand Rapids, Michigan), Latvian general. Dankers graduated from high school in Jelgava. From 1902 he served in the Russian Army; in 1906 he graduated from a military school in Wilno (Vilnius), and then he served as an officer in the Sveaborg fortress. During World War I he commanded a company and a battalion. In early 1916 he was advanced to lieutenant-colonel, and he was wounded several times. In June 1916 he was taken prisoner of war by the Austrians. After his release in December 1918, he served as an officer in the German expeditionary corps of General Rüdiger von der Goltz in Finland. After returning to Latvia, in May 1919 he joined the Latvian Army. He was commander of a regiment, and from August 1919, head of the military district of Lejaskurzeme (Lower Courland), in command of the struggle against the German and White Russian army of Pavel Bermond-Avalov near Liepāja. In December 1919 he was promoted to the rank of colonel and appointed commander of the Semigalian Division. From 1920 this division was stationed in Daugavpils (Dyneburg, Dünaburg). In 1925 Dankers was appointed general, and in 1933, commander of the Courland Division. In January 1940 he retired. After the Soviet invasion of Latvia, on 19 June 1940 he managed to escape to Germany. He returned to Latvia after the establishment of the German occupation. In 1941–45 he was director general for the interior (actually head) of the Latvian self-government. Before the second Soviet invasion, in mid-1944 he left for Germany again. In 1945–46 he was interned by the Western allies in Germany and then released. In 1957 he left for the United States, where he lived until his death. He was the author of Lai vēsture spriež tiesu (Let history pass a verdict; 1965) and of the memoirs No atmiņu pūra (From the corners of memory; 1973). (EJ)

Sources: I. Dankere, Maz tu man solīji (N.p., 1982); H. Biezais, Latvija kāškrusta varā: Sveši kungi—pašu ļaudis (N.p., 1992); Andrejs Plakans, Historical Dictionary of Latvia (Lanham, Md., 1997).

DARÁNYI Kálmán (22 March 1886, Budapest–1 November 1939, Budapest), Hungarian politician. After graduating in law from the University of Budapest in 1909, Darányi worked in the state administration. In 1910–17 he was secretary of Fogaras County and then governor of Zólyom, Győr-Komárom, and Moson Counties. From 1927 he was an MP. In 1928–35 he was secretary of state in the Office of the Prime Minister, and in April 1935 he became minister of agriculture in the government of Gyula Gömbös. Due to the illness of the prime minister, from early May 1936 Darányi was actually in charge of the government until 10 October 1936, when he formally became prime minister. He continued efforts toward rapprochement with the Third Reich and Italy, but at the same time he wanted to maintain good relations with France and Great Britain. At home he was rather inefficient in his attempts to contain the influence of the (Fascist) Arrow Cross Party. He intensified police and administrative measures against its leaders and tried to ease social tensions (e.g., by introducing a minimum wage and a forty-eight-hour work week), but such measures did not prevent the popularity of the extreme right. Darányi also strove to strengthen executive power at the expense of the legislature. His government made the parliament pass a plan of intense armament (the so-called Győr Program of 1938), as well as the first so-called anti-Jewish law of 1938, limiting the chances of people of Jewish descent from working as free professional and white-collar employees. In reaction to his attempt at a more pro-German policy, caused by the incorporation of Austria by the Third Reich, on 14 May 1938 Darányi was dismissed by Regent Miklós Horthy. At the end of 1938 Darányi was elected speaker of the parliament, but he soon died. (MS)

Sources: 20. századi magyar történelem 1900–1994 (Budapest, 1997); Magyar életrajzi lexikon, CD-ROM 2000; C. A. Macartney, October Fifteenth: A History of Modern Hungary, vols. 1–2 (Edinburgh, 1957–1961); Paul Ignotus, Hungary (London, 1972); Steven Béla Varga, Historical Dictionary of Hungary (Lanham, Md., 1997).

DARVAS József [originally Dumitras] (10 February 1912, Orosháza–3 December 1973, Budapest), Hungarian Communist activist and writer. Born into a poor peasant family and orphaned early by the death of his father in World War I, after attending a training school, Darvas could not find a job, so he left for Budapest, where he was both a blue- and white-collar worker. In 1932 he joined the illegal Communist Party; in 1933 he was arrested and put on police surveillance for five years. He published poems and short stories in leftist periodicals. From 1936 to 1937 he worked as an editor of a Communist periodical, Gondalat. He also collaborated with the left wing of the Populist writers and with their periodicals, Szabad Szó and Kis Újság. He authored several historical and sociological novels on the so-called class struggle in the countryside. His sociographic image of his home village, A legnagyobb magyar falu (The largest village in Hungary; 1937), won him wide popularity. During World War II he was active in the leftist antiwar movement and wrote a lot. After the war he was formally a member of the National Peasant Party, but actually he collaborated with the Communists. In 1945–73 he was an MP. From 1945 to 1947 he edited the leftist daily Szabad Szó, and then he was minister of building (1947–50), education (1950–53), and culture (1953–56). During the “thaw” after Stalin’s death and during the 1956 revolution he sided with the party conservatives, unwilling to reform the totalitarian system. From 1957 he was director of the Hunnia Filmstúdió. He authored several screenplays, novels, and dramas presenting the collectivization of agriculture and the 1956 revolution from the Communist perspective. These works included Hajnali tűz (Fire at dawn; 1961) and Részeg eső (Drunken rain; 1963). In 1951–53 and 1959–73 he presided over the Association of Hungarian Writers, and from 1960 he was also vice-president of a façade group, the Patriotic People’s Front. A member of the Presidential Council from 1972, at the end of his life Darvas began to distance himself from communism, returning to the ideology of the Populist writers, stressing folk and national values. (MS)

Sources: Gábor Garai, “Emlékezés Darvas Józsefre,” Élet és Irodalom, 1977, no. 8; Szilveszter Ördög, “Darvas és az örökösök,” Napjaink, 1977, no. 4; Zoltán Biró, Vállalások és kételyek (Budapest, 1987); Klaus-Detlev Grothusen, ed., Ungarn (Göttingen, 1987); Új magyar irodalmi lexikon (Budapest, 1994); Steven Béla Varga, Historical Dictionary of Hungary (Lanham, Md., 1997).

DASKALOV Rayko (8 December 1886, Byala Cherkva–26 August 1923, Prague), Bulgarian politician. Born into a peasant family, after attending a trade high school in Svishtov, Daskalov studied finance at the University of Berlin (1903–8). From his youth he was connected with the Agrarians and was a neighbor and close aide to Tsanko Tserkovski, a co-founder of the Bulgarian Agrarian National Union (Bulgarski Zemedelski Naroden Soyuz [BANU]). From 1914 he published in the BANU periodical Zemedelsko zname. He opposed Bulgaria’s entry into World War I. Along with other leftist politicians, including Aleksandur Stamboliyski, he was involved in the “Declosier Affair,” in which the French politician Declosier tried to prevent a German-Bulgarian alliance. As a result, Daskalov was arrested and was kept in prison until the defeat of Bulgaria. Released on 25 September 1918, in the town of Radomir, along with Stamboliyski, he proclaimed the Bulgarian Republic, and he became the commander-in-chief of its revolutionary armed forces. They were defeated on 29–30 September near the village of Vladaya (near Sofia) by Bulgarian royalists allied with Macedonian and German troops. Daskalov took shelter among the Entente units, where he stayed until the royal amnesty of December 1918.

Daskalov soon returned to politics. In 1919–23 he was an MP to the National Assembly. In the government of Stamboliyski he was minister of agriculture and state property; minister of trade, industry and labor; minister of foreign affairs; minister of health; and minister of finance. In December 1922 he survived an attempt on his life by members of the Internal Macedonian Revolutionary Organization. In May 1923 he became an envoy to Czechoslovakia. He entered into contact with the Communist International in Moscow and tried to establish military cooperation between the BANU and the Bulgarian Communist Party. Despite this, during the coup of June 1923 the Communists stayed neutral, and they soon attempted to seize power themselves, but in vain. Daskalov remained in Prague, where he was shot by a Macedonian terrorist. In 1986 his two-volume Izbrani proizvedeniya (Selected works) were published. (MC)

Sources: Biographisches Lexikon, vol. 1; John D. Bell, Peasants in Power: Alexander Stamboliski and the Bulgarian Agrarian National Union, 1899–1923 (Princeton, 1978); Paun Genov, Rayko Daskalov: Istoria na edni kratyk, no s buri izpylenen zhivot (Sofia, 1978); Dimityr Tishev, Rayko Daskalov: Zhizen put i obshtestvena deynost (Sofia, 1988); Dobrin Michev, Dimityr Tishev, and Bonka Chavdarova, eds., Dr. Rayko Daskalov: Politicheska i dyrzhavna deynost (Sofia, 1988).

DASZYŃSKI Ignacy (26 October 1866, Zbarazh [now Zbarazh, Ukraine]–31 October 1936, Bystra, near Cieszyn), Polish Socialist politician. The son of a clerk, Daszyński was orphaned at the age of nine and brought up in poverty. While in high school in Stanisławów, he came in contact with a Socialist youth circle. Expelled from school for a patriotic speech in 1883, he did odd jobs and studied on his own. In 1887 in Kraków he passed his high school final examinations (matura) extramurally and took up studies in philosophy at the Jagiellonian University. He was working as a tutor near Łomża during his holidays in 1889, when he was arrested by the Russian police, who mistook him for his brother Feliks, at that time already a well-known Socialist activist. After a six-month investigation Daszyński was expelled to Galicia. This experience strengthened his radical anti-tsarist views. After his brother's death, he intended to go to America, but after a short stay in Switzerland he returned to Galicia. In 1890 in Lwów (Lviv) he organized the Workers' Party. When the Polish Social Democratic Party of Galicia and Silesia (Polska Partia Socjal-Demokratyczna Galicji i Śląska [PPSD]) was created in 1892, Daszyński joined it. He represented the party at the rallies of the Austrian Social Democrats and at the congresses of the Socialist International. He organized demonstrations, made speeches, and wrote articles and brochures. From 1893 he was editor-in-chief of the PPSD newspaper, Naprzód. In March 1897 he was elected by an overwhelming majority of the Kraków constituency to the Austrian Reichsrat (parliament) and was a member until 1918, winning fame as an orator. He also cooperated with the Socialists from the Russian partition of Poland—for example, with Józef Piłsudski. During the 1905 revolution the PPSD lent its firm support to the Polish Socialists who fought against tsarism. Nevertheless, Daszyński published an "Open Letter to the Central Workers' Committee of the Polish Socialist Party (CKR PPS)," in which he criticized the PPSD for too close contacts with Russian revolutionaries and for the excessive use of strikes for political purposes. When the PPS split in November 1906 Daszyński supported the moderate PPS-Revolutionary Faction against the radical PPS-Left.

From 1912 to 1914 Daszyński was one of the leaders of the Galician Provisional Commission of Confederated Independence Parties (Tymczasowa Komisja Skonfederowanych Stronnictw Niepodległościowych). After the outbreak of World War I, in August 1914 he took part in the cadre company of Piłsudski, who appointed him war commissar of the county of Miechów. The action was aimed at inciting an anti-Russian uprising there, but it failed. Daszyński co-founded the Supreme National Committee (Naczelny Komitet Narodowy), and he supported the struggle against Russia alongside Austria-Hungary. Initially, he proposed the transformation of Galicia into a separate part of the Habsburg monarchy, equal in rights with Austria and Hungary (the "trialist" concept). At the end of the war he adopted a definitely pro-independence stance. In January 1918 he spoke in the Reichsrat, demanding the convocation of the Polish Sejm and insisting on the participation of Polish delegates from all three sections of partitioned Poland in the Brest-Litovsk peace negotiations. He also urged the conclusion of a peace treaty with Russia and the creation of a unified Polish state.

During the disarmament of the Austro-Hungarian Army in Galicia, on 28 October 1918 Daszyński became vice-president of the Polish Liquidation Commission (Polska Komisja Likwidacyjna [PKL]) in Kraków. On 7 November 1918 he became head of the Provisional People's Government of the Republic of Poland in Lublin. He promoted a program of radical social reforms, including land reform and the nationalization of some branches of industry. When on 10 November Piłsudski returned from Magdeburg Prison to Warsaw, Daszyński agreed to hand over power to the central Socialist-People's government of Jędrzej Moraczewski, and this was done on 17 November. Elected an MP on behalf of the PPSD in January 1919, Daszyński contributed to the swift unification of the PPSD with the Socialist parties from other parts of partitioned Poland into a united Polish Socialist Party (Polska Partia Socjalistyczna [PPS]) in April 1919. From July 1920 to January 1921 he served as deputy prime minister of the coalition government of Wincenty Witos. At that time he very vigorously promoted the Polish cause among Western Socialists, showing discrepancies between Bolshevism and Democratic Socialism. In 1921–28 he was president of the Chief Council of the PPS, and between 1922 and 1923, also president of the PPS Central Executive Committee. He represented the moderate wing of the party, and he often criticized Bolshevik policies in Russia. Elected to the Sejm on behalf of the PPS in 1922, he served as deputy speaker of the parliament from 1922 to 1927. After president Gabriel Narutowicz was murdered in December 1922, Daszyński firmly opposed leftist plans of a coup d'état. From 1923 he was a long-standing president of the Workers' University Society.

In May 1926 Daszyński supported the coup d'état staged by Piłsudski, trying to prevent a split among the Socialists. After the elections of 1928 he became speaker of the Sejm, and he temporarily resigned his party positions. He opposed the abuse of power by the sanacja regime. However, in the face of the looming economic crisis and of the danger of conflicts between the sanacja regime and the opposition, on 24 June 1929 he suggested to Piłsudski that a coalition be formed between the PPS, the Nonparty Bloc of Cooperation with the Government (BBWR), and the Polish Peasant Party–Liberation (Polskie Stronnictwo Ludowe–Wyzwolenie). After Piłsudski rejected this suggestion, relations between Daszyński and Piłsudski definitely deteriorated, and Daszyński began to sharply criticize the ruling group. In October 1929 he refused to open the Sejm session in the presence of armed officers in the parliamentary hall. In 1930, as the Sejm speaker in office, he sent a solidarity telegram to the congress of the center-left opposition (Centrolew), held in Kraków. In 1930 he again won a parliamentary seat, and after the elections he protested the abuse of power by the sanacja regime. In 1931 he was reelected president of the Chief Council of the PPS. However, owing to deteriorating health, he gradually retired from public life, and in 1934 he resigned his post. Daszyński's works include O formach rządu (About forms of government; 1902); Wielki człowiek w Polsce (Great man in Poland; 1925); Sejm, rząd, król, dyktator (The Sejm, the government, the king, the dictator; 1926); and the two-volume Pamiętniki (Diaries; 1926). (WR)

Sources: PSB, vol. 4; Encyklopedia historii Drugiej Rzeczypospolitej (Warsaw, 1999); Adam Próchnik, Ignacy Daszyński: Życie, praca, walka (Warsaw, 1946); Jerzy Holzer, Polska Partia Socjalistyczna w latach 1917–1919 (Warsaw, 1962); Aleksandra Tymieniecka, Polityka Polskiej Partii Socjalistycznej w latach 1924–1928 (Warsaw, 1969); Andrzej Ajnenkiel, Od rządów ludowych do przewrotu majowego (Warsaw, 1978); Stanisław Grau and Ignacy Wilczek [Jerzy Holzer], "Ignacy Daszyński," PPN, 1980, no. 42; Adam Próchnik, Pierwsze piętnastolecie Polski niepodległej (Warsaw, 1983); Jan Tomicki, Polska Partia Socjalistyczna 1892–1948 (Warsaw, 1983); Walentyna Najdus, Ignacy Daszyński 1866–1936 (Warsaw, 1988).

DAVID Josef (Józsa) (17 February 1884, Kylešovice, Opava—21 April 1968, Prague), Czech journalist and politician. Before World War I David worked as a journalist and social activist in Silesia. In 1903 in Opava he founded his first Socialist-Nationalist organization. From 1905 to 1907 he wrote for Pokrok, a magazine of Socialist-

Nationalist orientation that came out in Brno. Next, David founded and edited the periodical Stráž českého severu in the town of Most. He was in favor of universal suffrage and of the creation of a second Czech university in Brno. After the outbreak of World War I David fought on the eastern front, but in 1915 he was taken captive by the Russians. After the February 1917 revolution he co-organized the Czechoslovak Legion in Russia and was a representative of the Czechoslovak National Council in Russia. In December 1917 he also started working at Československý deník, the press organ of the legion. In December 1918 he was sent with a military delegation to Czechoslovakia, and in June 1919 he returned to Siberia with the mission of the Czechoslovak government. In May 1920 he finally returned to Czechoslovakia. From 1921 to 1939 David served as executive secretary of the Czechoslovak Legionnaire Community and as deputy to the National Assembly on behalf of the Socialist-Nationalist Party. In parliament, he was mainly involved with military and defense affairs, and from 1929 he was president of the parliamentary commission for defense. He was a member of the left wing of the party. From the beginning of the 1920s he urged the recognition of Soviet Russia.

In September 1938 David advocated the rejection of the Pact of Munich. At the beginning of the German occupation he tried to form a resistance movement. In October 1939 he went via Slovakia and Hungary to Belgrade, where he was active as a representative of the Czechoslovak resistance movement. His main task was to organize secret transport for Czechoslovak citizens to the West. He left Yugoslavia soon before the German invasion in April 1941. After the German attack against the USSR, he advocated cooperation among Slavs against the German threat. From the end of 1941 he was in London, where he became a member of the Czechoslovak National Council (Státní Rada Československá) and president of the Union of Czechoslovak Legionnaires (Svaz Československých Legionářů) in England. In March 1945 David participated in Moscow talks on the program and composition of a National Front government. Between 1945 and 1948 he was a member of the leadership of the Socialist-Nationalist Party, an MP, and president of the Legionnaire Community. Between April and October 1945 he served as deputy prime minister. Then he was president of the Provisional National Assembly, and from June 1946, president of the Constitutional National Assembly. He was passive during the coup of February 1948. After the elections of May 1948 David left political life entirely. (PU)

Sources: ČBS; Josef Korbel, The Communist Subversion of Czechoslovakia, 1948–1960 (Princeton, 1959); Karel Kaplan, The Short March: The Communist Takeover in Czechoslovakia, 1945–

1948 (London, 1981); Kdo byl kdo v našich dějinách ve 20. století, vol. 1 (Prague, 1998); Biografický slovník Slezska a Severní Moravy, vol. 6 (Ostrava, 1996); Českoslovenští politici: 1918–1991 (Prague, 1991); Politická elita meziválečného Československa 1918–1938: Kdo byl kdo za první republiky (Prague, 1998).

DAVIDOVIĆ Ljubomir (24 December 1863 Vlaška, Serbia–19 February 1940, Belgrade), Serb politician; prime minister of the Kingdom of Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes (SHS). Davidović was one of the co-founders of the National Radical Party. In 1912 he was elected president of the party. In 1914–18 he served as minister of education. From 1919 until his death he was the leader of the newly created Serbian Democratic Party. From 16 August 1919 to 19 February 1920 he was prime minister of the government created by a democratic-Socialist coalition. The normalization of the domestic situation in the country, which had been severely affected by war, was among the priorities of this cabinet. Davidović's government brought about the introduction of an eight-hour workday and the legalization of the social and trade organizations of workers, but it failed to bring down inflation. On 28 July 1924, after the fall of the cabinet of Nikola Pašić, Davidović again became the head of the government. He dismissed the charges against Stjepan Radić, the leader of the Croatian Peasant Party, thus allowing Radić to return to the SHS. Davidović resigned on 6 November 1924. The new elections in 1927 consolidated the Serbian nationalist parties. The Serbian Democratic Party split, and Davidović's faction went into the opposition. Under the dictatorship of King Alexander, Davidović opposed the nationalist policy of the government. In October 1937 Davidović, on behalf of his party, signed a settlement with the Croatian Peasant Party, and this paved the way to a broader Serbian-Croatian agreement of August 1939. (AO)

Sources: Biographisches Lexikon, vol. 1; Radoje Knažević, Ljubomir Davidović 1863–1940 (Belgrade, 1940); Waclaw Felczak and Tadeusz Wasilewski, Historia Jugosławii (Wrocław, 1985); Mark Biondich, Stjepan Radić, the Croat Peasant Party, and the Politics of Mass Mobilization, 1904–1928 (Toronto, 2000).

DELČEV Georgi Nikolov (Goce) (23 January 1872, Kukuš [now Kilkis, Greece]–4 May 1903, Banitsa), Macedonian revolutionary. After graduating from high school in Sofia in 1891, Delchev studied at the Sofia Military Academy, from which he was ousted in 1894 for Socialist activities. He worked as a teacher in Štip, where he met Dame Gruev and entered the leadership of the Internal Macedonian Revolutionary Organization (Vnatrešna Makedonska Revolucionerna Organizacija). He organized its cells, aiming at the liberation of Macedonia and the Adrianople region from the Turks. In 1896 he co-authored the program of the Secret Macedonian-Adrianople Revolutionary Organization (Tajna Makedonsko-Odrinska Revolucionerna Organizacija [SMARO]), which started military operations in 1899. In 1902 he revised the SMARO program, trying to attract all the ethnic groups living in the Adrianople area by emphasizing the quest for the region's autonomy. In his absence, in January 1903 the SMARO leaders made the decision to start an anti-Turkish uprising. Although Delchev thought it premature, he joined in the preparations. During a march of his cheta (unit) he was killed in a Turkish attack. (WR) Sources: Entsiklopediya Bulgariya, vol. 2 (Sofia, 1981); Hristo Andonov-Poljanski, Goce Delcev: His Life and Times (Skopje, 1973); Marcie MacDermott, Freedom or Death: The Life of Goce Delcev (London, 1978); Duncan M. Perry, The Politics of Terror: The Macedonian Liberation Movements, 1893–1903 (Durham, N.C., 1988); Raymond Detrez, Historical Dictionary of Bulgaria (Lanham, Md., 1997).

DELVINA Suleyman Pasha (1884, Delvinë–1 August 1932, Vlorë), Albanian politician and diplomat. Born into an aristocratic family, Delvina graduated from Zosimea High School in Janina and in law in Istanbul. Then he worked as a teacher in an Istanbul high school. In 1901 he returned to his hometown, Delvinë. In 1905 he went back to Istanbul. He taught in Galatasaray High School, and then he worked as a ministerial official of a lower rank. He joined in the activities of the Albanian national club Bashkimi (Unity) in Istanbul. In July 1911 he organized a student demonstration, demanding the right to use the Albanian alphabet in Turkey. In April 1919 the Albanian diaspora in Turkey delegated him to the Paris Peace Conference. As a result of the Congress of Lushnjë of 21 January 1920, in March 1920 Delvina was appointed the first prime minister of an independent Albanian government. Among other things, he concluded a treaty with Italy, which gave up its claims to a protectorate over Albania. Since Delvina proclaimed his desire to realize the “will of the people,” he got into trouble with the conservatives and had to resign on 14 November 1920. In the subsequent government of Ilias bey Vrioni, until October 1921 he was minister of interior. In 1924 he won a parliamentary seat from Vlorë. During the revolution he supported Fan Noli, heading his ministry of foreign affairs from June to December 1924. Delvina was attributed with the idea of establishing diplomatic relations with the Soviet Union. After the failure of the revolution he went into exile. He was active in the leftist National Revolutionary Committee (Komiteti Nacional Revolucionar [KONARE]). Seriously ill, he took advantage of an amnesty to return to Albania. Since he was banned from living in Tirana, he settled in Vlorë, where he soon died. (TC)

Sources: Stefanaq Pollo and Arben Puto, The History of Albania from Its Origins to the Present Day (London, 1981); Tre luftëtarë të çështjes kombëtare (Tirana, 1983); F. Vejzi, Qeveria e Kongresit të Lushnjës dhe veprimtaria e saj. (1918–1920) (Tirana, 1987); Arben Puto, Demokracia e rrethuar: Qeveria e Fan Nolit në marredheniet e jashtme qershor–dhjetor 1924 (Tirana, 1990); Tadeusz Czekalski, Albania 1920–1924: Aparat państwowy i jego funkcjonowanie (Katowice, 1998).

DEMÉNY Pál (29 August 1901, Budapest–14 January 1991, Budapest), Hungarian Communist activist. Demény was born into a middle-class family. In 1918 he passed high school examinations and became a founding member of the so-called independent group of young workers. In February 1919 he joined the Hungarian Communist Party (HCP). During the Hungarian Soviet Republic (HSR) Demény was the leader of young workers in Budapest's Seventh District. He also joined the Hungarian Red Army, where he served as an artilleryman. In August 1919, after the fall of the HSR, he organized the Communist Union of Young Workers. He also edited two illegal newspapers of the organization: Értesítő and Örökforradalom. Arrested in the fall of 1919, Demény was released after two months. In December of that year he started working in the Richter Chemical Plants. Between 1920 and 1921 he was an extramural student of chemistry at the Technische Hochschule in Vienna, but in August 1921 he was re-arrested for his revolutionary activities in Hungary. Demény rejected the chance to emigrate, which was part of the Soviet-Hungarian agreement on the exchange of POWs, and he spent 1921–24 in prison.

After his release, Demény and his supporters began to abandon the Comintern line. In 1925 Demény joined the Hungarian Social Democratic Party (HSDP) but was expelled for his revolutionary views. Later, he organized various workers' anti-alcohol, tourist, and sports associations. He was also busy with writing and publishing books. In 1938 he was tried for distributing anti-war leaflets. Sentenced to a two-year imprisonment, Demény served his sentence in Szeged, where he met Mátyás Rákosi. In November 1940 he was released. During the war, members of the movement (a circle of social democrats) rallied around Demény helped to hide people and to obtain false documents for them. Between September and December 1944 his faction was active under the name of the Communist Party of Hungary (the previous party, under the same name, had been dissolved by János Kádár in 1943). In November 1944 Demény came to an agreement with the Communists, represented by László Rajk and Gábor Péter, on the unification of two national groups. At that time, Demény was recognized as a member of the Central Committee (CC). On 13 February 1945, the day when the siege of Budapest ended, Demény was arrested by Péter, who by then was head of interior security services. In July 1946 the People's Court in Budapest accused Demény of "activities against the people" and sentenced him to four and a half years of forced labor. In 1950 he was interned in Kistarcsa, where in 1953 he was sentenced to a further ten years.

Demény was released on 13 October 1956. At the beginning of 1957 the Supreme Court quashed his last sentence, but Demény was not finally vindicated until 1989. After 1956 he worked in the National Bureau of Translators, and in 1967 he retired. He then began to work on his memoirs. In the autumn of 1989 he joined the Hungarian Socialist Party (HSP), which was founded in the place of the Hungarian Socialist Workers' Party (HSWP). In the first free parliamentary elections in 1990 Demény was elected to parliament from the national list of the HSP. His memoirs, titled A párt foglya voltam (I was a prisoner of the party), appeared in 1988. (JT)

Sources: Magyar Nagylexikon, vol. 6 (Budapest 1998); A magyar forradalom és szabadságharc enciklopédiája (Budapest, 1999).

DÉRÉR Ivan (2 March 1884, Malacky–10 March 1973, Prague), Slovak lawyer and politician. Dérér graduated in law from the university in Budapest, where in 1907 he obtained a Ph.D., and then he worked as a barrister. In his youth he aligned himself with groups linked to the magazine Hlas. In 1918 he was a co-author of the declaration of Turčiansky Sv. Martin. In 1920 he was elected to parliament in Prague from the Social Democratic list of candidates from Slovakia. He was an advocate of a close union of the Czechs and the Slovaks. From 1921 to 1922 he served as minister for unification and worked on the harmonization of law for the former Austrian and Hungarian lands of the Czechoslovak republic. In 1926 he was the author of the law on minorities, called the "Jex Dérér." From February 1934 to the end of 1938 he was the minister of justice, and from 1933 he also served as vice-president of the Social Democratic Party. He represented the party at the Socialist International congresses. After the partition of Czechoslovakia in March 1939 Dérér did not support the Slovak state, which was created with the assistance of the Third Reich. He was active in the Social Democratic conspiracy in Prague, and in 1944–45 he was held prisoner in a Nazi camp in Terezín.

After the war Dérér criticized the takeover of the party by crypto-Communists, with Zdeněk Fierlinger at the head, and at the congress of the Social Democrats in Brno in 1947 he openly came out against Fierlinger. In 1946 he became president of the Supreme Court, trying to maintain the principles of law and order that were being undermined by the Communists. For example, he criticized the wavering attitude of President Edvard Beneš, who did not consult him about the death sentence of Reverend Jozef Tiso. Dérér was against this sentence. After the coup of February 1948 Dérér resigned from his post. In 1950 he was arrested without reason and sentenced to three and a half years of prison. After his release he did not hold any posts. Rehabilitated during the Prague Spring in 1968, he returned for a short time to the political scene and even received the Order of the Republic. During the “normalization” he was again placed in the shadows. He wrote (among other works) the following: Ustava o organizace Československe Republiky (The act on the organization of the Czechoslovak Republic; 1922); Slovensko v prevrate i po ňom (Slovakia during the coup and after; 1924); Katechizmus pozemkove reformy (Catechism of the agrarian reform; 1925); Prečo sme proti autonomii? (Why are we against autonomy? 1934); Česi a Slovacy ve střednej Evrope (The Czechs and the Slovaks in Central Europe; 1938); The Unity of Czechs and Slovaks (1938); and “Anti-Fierlinger” (1952–61; manuscript). (WR)

Sources: East Central Europe, 1985, vol. 12, part 1; SBS, vol. 1; B. Koloušek, Dr Ivan Dérér a národné školstvo na Slovensku (Bratislava, 1935).

DERTLIEV Petyr (7 April 1916, ?–5 November 2000, Sofia), Bulgarian doctor and Social Democratic politician. Dertliev was born into a teacher’s family. Before the war he was active in the Socialist Youth Union, for which he was imprisoned. Between November 1936 and March 1937 he was in the USSR. During World War II he opposed the pro-German policy of subsequent Bulgarian governments. After the seizure of power by the Communists he spoke against totalitarianism, defending Social Democratic ideas. From 1945 he was secretary of a youth organization of the unified Bulgarian Social Democratic Workers’ Party. Because of his activities he was placed in the Rositsa concentration camp in May 1946. He was released as a candidate for the parliament five days before the elections to the Grand National Assembly of 27 October 1946. In parliament, he was a member of the health commission, and he also spoke in defense of democratic freedoms. On 1 July 1948 he was arrested, and in mid-November, after a rigged trial, he was sentenced to ten years of prison. He served the sentence in several labor camps and penal institutes. In 1957 he was released.

After the overthrow of the totalitarian government Dertliev became president of the Bulgarian Social Democratic Party (BSDP), which was reactivated on 26 November 1989, and director of the newspaper Svoboden narod, which came out as of January 1990. He was one of the founders of the Union of Democratic Forces (UDF). At the end of July 1990 he was a candidate for president, but because of the opposition of the Bulgarian Socialist Party deputies, he withdrew his candidacy. At that time the UDF elected Zhelju Zhelev president. In 1990–91 Dertliev was a deputy to the Seventh Constituent Assembly; from January 1991 he was co-president, and from May 1991 president, of the UDF parliamentary group. He took an active role in the preparation of the constitution of 12 July 1991, which he signed in opposition to the boycott against it by thirty-nine deputies of the UDF right. Since his party, the BSDP, failed to enter parliament in the subsequent elections of 1991, 1994, and 1995, the Dertliev’s role diminished. He published two volumes of memoirs, Den prvii, den posleden (Day first, day last; 1996) and Po zharavata (On Tenterhooks; 1998), depicting his life and political activity, as well as his experience in the labor camps and prisons. (JJ)

Sources: Jerzy Jackowicz, Bułgaria od rządów komunistycznych do demokracji parlamentarnej 1988–1991 (Warsaw, 1992); Petyr Dertliev, Dosieto na dr Petyr Dertliev: Spomeni, dokumenti (Sofia, 1994); Raymond Detrez, Historical Dictionary of Bulgaria (Lanham, Md., 1997).

DÉRY Tibor (18 October 1894, Budapest–18 August 1977, Budapest), Hungarian writer. Born into a rich family of Jewish descent, in his youth Déry suffered from bone tuberculosis, underwent several operations, and spent years in bed. After graduating from a trade high school, he worked in the timber processing factories of his mother’s family, first in Galócás, Transylvania, and then in Budapest. He made his literary debut with the novel Lia (1917), rich in erotic scenes, for which he was sued for offending public morality. In 1917–19 he published several poems and short stories in the leading literary periodical, Nyugat. In 1919 he joined the Hungarian Communist Party, and during the Hungarian Soviet Republic (HSR) he became a member of the Writers’ Directorate. At this time he lost his father, who committed suicide in reaction to the nationalization of his estate.

After the fall of the HSR in August 1919, Déry left Hungary, publishing surrealist and expressionist poems in the émigré press. In 1926 he returned to Hungary, but he kept traveling and living abroad from time to time, mostly in Western Europe and Scandinavia. His best works of this time include novels and short stories: A két nővér (Two sisters; 1921); A két hangú kiáltás (A shout in two parts; 1922); Ébredjetek fel! (Awake! 1929); Az éneklő szikla (A singing rock; 1930); Országuton (On the road; 1932); he also wrote novels on the German workers’ movement that were published after World War II: Szemtől szembe (Eye to eye; 1945) and A befejezetlen mondat (Unfinished sentence; 1947). The latter, about a rich burgher who broke off ties with his family and became a Communist, was based on his own experience. In 1934 Déry took part in the Schutzbund uprising in Vienna as a collaborator of the Rote Hilfe, and then he left for Spain for a year. In 1938 he translated Retour de l'URSS, by André Gide, for which he was arrested for two months, and he was banned from publishing. He spent the World War II years in Hungary and made his living by translating. During the German occupation he went into hiding.

After the Communist takeover, Déry returned to public life, holding high positions in the Association of Hungarian Writers and editing the monthly Csillag, which mostly published translations from Russian. Déry was one of the most often published writers of that time, and his plays—such as Tükör (Mirror; 1947), Itthon (Home; 1948), and A tanúk (Witnesses; 1948)—were always playing in the National Theater. This changed after Déry published the novel Felelet (Reply; 1950), announced as the first “truly Socialist realist” work. The extensive novel, dealing with the history of the interwar Hungarian workers’ movement, was not well received by the authorities. Two years later, the second volume of the novel was given an even worse treatment, and Déry got into trouble for refusing a self-criticism. He was marginalized, but soon he joined the supporters of the “thaw.” His collection of short stories A ló meg az öregasszony (The horse and the old woman; 1955) and his novella Niki were indirect criticisms of postwar Hungarian reality. In the summer of 1956 Déry was excluded from the Communist Party, and in 1957 he was sentenced to nine years in prison for expressing his negative attitude to the government of János Kádár. In prison he wrote one of his best novels, A. úr X-ben (Mr. A. G. in X; 1964), a political fiction of a future totalitarian system in which anarchy is law and any useful activity is outlawed. In a novel that he wrote after leaving prison in 1960—A kiközösítő (Throwing anathemas; 1966)—Déry also alluded to the dangers of the Communist social order. In 1969 he published his memoirs, Ítélet nincs (Lack of verdict), and two years later, the novel Képzelt riport egy amerikai pop-fesztiválról (Imaginative coverage of an American pop festival), later adapted as a theater play, in which the Woodstock festival was a pretext for reflections on modern civilization. Later works by Déry were full of irony and skepticism. Even during his lifetime he was considered one of the leading Hungarian writers of the twentieth century. (MS)

Sources: József Révai, Kulturális forradalmunk kérdései (Budapest, 1952); Tibor Déry: Eingeleitet von Georg Lukacs und Tamas Ungvari (Hamburg, 1969); Mario Szenessy, Tibor Déry (Stuttgart, 1970); Tamás Ungvári, Déry Tibor alkotásai és vallomásai tükrében (Budapest, 1973); Béla Pomogáts, Déry Tibor (Budapest, 1974); William Shawcross, Crime and Compromise: Janos Kadar and the Politics of Hungary since Revolution (New York, 1974); Mały słownik pisarzy węgierskich (Warsaw, 1977); “D.T. úr X-ben.” Tanulmányok és dokumentumok Déryről (Budapest, 1995).

DEVA Xhafer (21 February 1904, Mitrovica–25 May 1978, Palo Alto, California), Albanian politician and economist. Deva studied in Salonika and then at Robert College in Istanbul. Later he worked in banks in Egypt and Britain. In 1941 he became the head of administration in Kosovo Mitrovica under German occupation. He was active in the (pro-Western) National Front (Balli Kombëtar), and on 16 September 1943 he co-founded the Second Prizren League, which coordinated Albanian political and cultural organizations and strove for the unification of Albanian territories, including those under Bulgarian occupation. Deva conceived the tactical idea of creating Albanian volunteer brigades armed by the Germans but thought to be the nucleus of a future Albanian army. In late 1944 he left for Vienna and from there for Syria, becoming one of the leaders of the Albanian diaspora, directing the Prizren League in exile, and advocating the formation of a Great Albania. After the death of Midhat Frashëri, Deva was forced by King Zog to be the political leader of all the Albanian diaspora. He took part in the military training of Albanian refugees and later parachuted into Albania during the “Valuable” operation (1951). Disappointed by the operation’s failure, he moved to Rome, where he worked with the Polish Office of Aid to Emigrants, raising funds for Albanians escaping to the West. In 1956, along with his family, he left for the United States, where he lectured at Stanford University until 1971. He initiated the move of the Prizren League headquarters to New York. At a conference in Madrid in 1972, King Leka I described Deva as head of a “united front against the Albanian Communists,” but despite the support of Leka, Deva failed to unite all the quarreling factions of the Albanian diaspora. (TC)

Sources: William Bland and Ian Price, A Tangled Web: A History of Anglo-American Relations with Albania (1912–1955) (London, 1986); Bernd Fischer, Albania at War, 1939–1945 (London, 1999); Xhafer Deva: Jeta dhe veprimtaria (New York, n.d.).

DIENSTBIER Jiří (20 April 1937, Kladno), Czech journalist, politician, and diplomat. In 1960 Dienstbier graduated in journalism from Charles University in Prague. In 1958–69 he worked in the foreign language section of Czechoslovak Radio; in 1964–67 he was a correspondent in the Far East, and in 1968–69, in the United States. From 1958 he belonged to the Communist Party of Czechoslovakia (CPC). In 1968 he was one of most active advocates of democratization, and after the Warsaw Pact invasion in August 1968 he co-edited the anti-occupation broadcasts of Czechoslovak Radio. In 1970 he was expelled from the CPC, fired from work, and subjected to a complete ban of publication. He worked as a blue-collar laborer. In the 1970s and 1980s he belonged to the leaders of the democratic opposition. In 1977 he was one of the first signatories of Charter 77, and in 1979 and 1985, its spokesman. In 1978 he co-founded the Committee for the Defense of the Unjustly Prosecuted (Výbor na Obranu Nespravedlivě Stíhaných) and contributed to many uncensored periodicals. In 1979–82 he was imprisoned for “an attempt to overthrow the republic.” In 1988–89 he took part in a number of opposition activities and was a member of the editorial board of the uncensored periodical Lidové noviny.

During the Velvet Revolution, in November 1989 Dienstbier co-founded the Civic Forum (Občanské Fórum [OF]) and was briefly its spokesman. In the first government that included non-Communists, headed by Marián Čalfa, Dienstbier was minister of foreign affairs from December 1989 and deputy prime minister from 9 April 1990. He resumed the same position after the first free elections of June 1990. He was the architect and realizer of the new Czechoslovak foreign policy. Under the new geopolitical circumstances he aimed to change it into a pro-Western direction. He also supported Central European cooperation. From June 1990 he was an MP to the Chamber of the People of the Federal Assembly, initially on behalf of the OF and after its split, on behalf of the Civic Movement (Občanské Hnutí [OH]), which he chaired. As a result of the electoral defeat of his party, which failed to get into the parliament, on 26 June Dienstbier resigned from his government posts. In 1991–93 he chaired the OH and cooperated with other liberal parties of limited influence. In 1993–95 he presided over the Free Democrats (Svobodní Demokraté), and in 1995–96 he co-presided over the Free Democrats-Liberal National Socialist Party (Svobodní Demokraté-Liberální Strana Národně Sociální). In the parliamentary elections of June 1996 his party lost, and when in the fall of 1996 Dienstbier lost the election to the Senate, he gave up party leadership. In 1997 he toured U.S. universities, giving a number of lectures, and in 1998 he became a special UN reporter on the violation of human rights in the former Yugoslavia. He was also a Czech ambassador for special missions.

Apart from his work in journalism, Dienstbier authored a book on the military coup in Indonesia in September 1965, Noc nastala ve tři ráno (The night came at 3 a.m.; 1967); essays on the new political order in Europe, Snění o Evropě (Dreams of Europe; uncensored edition, 1986; official version, 1990); and a couple of plays published in samizdat in the 1980s. Along with Karel Lánský, he published a book on Czechoslovak Radio during the Soviet occupation, Rozhlas proti tankům (Radio against tanks; uncensored edition, 1986; official version, 1990). (PU)

Sources: ČBS; Českoslovenští politici: 1918–1991 (Prague, 1991); Kdo byl kdo v našich dějinách ve 20. století, vol. 1 (Prague, 1998); Kdo je kdo v České Republice na přelomu 20. století (Prague, 1998); www.dienstbier.cz.

DIMITRIEV Radko (24 September 1859, Gradets–18 October 1918, Pyatigorsk), Bulgarian and Russian general. A soldier from his youth, Dimitriev was initially connected with the Bulgarian anti-Turkish conspiracy, and then he fought against the Turks in the Russian Army (1877–78). He graduated from a cadet school in Sofia, and later he studied at the Nicholas Academy of the General Staff in Petersburg. He distinguished himself in the Battle of Slivitsa against the Serbs (1885). After the victorious termination of this campaign, the Bulgarian prince, Alexander, abandoned the country's pro-Russian orientation. A Russophile and Panslavist, Dimitriev entered into a conflict with the ruler. He plotted against Alexander, and he took part in a failed attempt on his life in August 1886. As a result he had to emigrate to Romania, where he tried to organize a mutiny of Bulgarian officers in 1887. Then he served in the Russian Army in the Caucasus. After Bulgarian-Russian relations were stabilized, Dimitriev returned to Bulgaria and joined the Bulgarian Army in 1898. Thanks to Russian backing, in 1903 he became chief of the general staff. Under his command the Bulgarian Army proved victorious over Turkey in the First Balkan War (1912–13). He failed to repeat this success in the Second Balkan War, when the Bulgarian offensive was resisted by Serbia, Greece, and Romania. After this defeat Dimitriev opposed the pro-German line of Tsar Ferdinand and became Bulgarian envoy to Russia. When World War I broke out, he returned to the Russian Army. He commanded the Third Army at Przemysl and during the Carpathian offensive of 1914–15. Forced to retreat, he managed to prevent panic. When Bulgaria entered the war on the side of the Central Powers, he was deprived of the command of the Third Army. The February 1917 revolution saw him as commander of the Eleventh Army in the Baltic area. As a result of a compromise with the Council of Soldiers' Deputies, Dimitriev managed to maintain discipline, and his units continued the struggle against Germany. Arrested by the Bolsheviks in Pyatigorsk, he was soon executed. (MC)

Sources: Biographisches Lexikon, vol. 1; Svetlozar Nedev, Komandvaneto na bulgarskata voyska prez voynite za natsionalno obedinenie, 1885, 1912, 1913, 1915, 1918 (Sofia, 1993); Kristofor

Chesapchev, Sluzhba na Bulgariia w chuzhbina: Voennodiplomatičeski spomeni, 1899–1914 g. (Sofia, 1993); Richard C. Hall, Bulgaria's Road to the First World War (Boulder, Colo., 1996); Richard C. Hall, The Balkan Wars, 1912–1913: Prelude to the First World War (London and New York, 2000); "Enemy Portrait: General Radko Ruskov Dmitriev," www.geocities.com/veldes11boroevic.html.

DIMITRIJE Pavlović (15 October 1846, Požarevac–6 April 1930, Belgrade), patriarch of Serbia. In 1868 Dimitrije graduated from a seminary in Belgrade, and then he worked as a teacher. In 1870 he took holy orders and then studied at the Philology Department of the Higher School in Belgrade. After graduation he worked as a teacher at a theological seminary in Belgrade. Soon he entered the monastery, retaining his baptismal name. When King Milan Obrenović ousted Metropolitan Mihailo and appointed Mihailo's successor, Teodosije Mraović, in October 1884 Dimitrije was nominated bishop of Niš. After the abdication of King Milan, Mihailo returned as metropolitan and dismissed bishops appointed by Mraović. Dimitrije left for Paris, where he took up Slavic studies at the Sorbonne (1890–92), and then studied agriculture at the university in Montpellier. After his return to Serbia in 1894 he was sent to Athos, where he managed to ease the conflict between monks of Serbian and Bulgarian origin in the Serbian Hilandar Monastery. Owing to his scholarly works, as well as to the experience he had gained abroad, his role again grew in importance, both on the political and on the church scene. In 1895 he was elected to the State Council, and after the death of Metropolitan Mihailo in 1898, the new metropolitan, Inokentije, put Dimitrije in charge of the Šabac diocese. Dimitrije held the post until 19 August 1905, when he was elected metropolitan of Belgrade and of all of Serbia.

Following the annexation of Bosnia and Herzegovina by Austria-Hungary in 1908, Dimitrije began an energetic diplomatic campaign, sending information about the situation of the Serbian people to all Orthodox monasteries and to Russian authorities. After the end of the Balkan Wars, in 1913 he managed to extend the authority of the Serbian Orthodox Church to dioceses that until then had been under the jurisdiction of ecumenical patriarchs. After Serbia's defeat in World War I, along with the government, Dimitrije went to Corfu via Albania. Thanks to contacts that he established at that time with Anglican theologians, young Serbian priests were given a chance to study in England. After the end of World War I this group of priests played an important role in the life of the Serbian Orthodox Church. Having returned to the Kingdom of Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes in 1920, Dimitrije undertook effective actions aiming at the unification of all Serbian Orthodox churches. On 12 November 1920 he was elected patriarch of the United Serbian Orthodox Church. He remained in office until his death, contributing to the establishment of an excellent Theological Department in Belgrade and a professional journal, Bogoslovije. He also helped create the Theological Department in Zagreb. (AG)

Sources: Biographisches Lexikon, vol. 1; Djoko Slijepčević, Istorija srpske pravoslavne crkve, vol. 2 (Munich, 1966).

DIMITRIJEVIĆ Dragutin (byname Apis) (17 August 1876, Belgrade–26 June 1917, Salonika), chief of Serbian intelligence, leader of a terrorist secret society known as the Black Hand. The son of a craftsman, Dimitrijević completed a gymnasium in Niš and Belgrade and then graduated from the Belgrade Military Academy. He was one of the leaders of a plot to overthrow the autocratic rule of Alexander Obrenović. The first attempt to kill King Alexander and his wife failed in 1901. Dimitrijević was involved in the second attempt, which was successfully carried out on 28–29 May 1903. He was wounded during the shooting. After the accession to the throne of Peter I Karadjordjević, Dimitrijević continued his career in the army. In 1910–14 he was a lecturer in tactics at the Belgrade Military Academy, and from 1910 to 1912 he also held the post of chief of staff of a cavalry brigade in Belgrade. His posts allowed him to exert great influence on his students, as well as on members of the officer corps. In May 1911 he was one of the founders, and soon became the leader, of a secret nationalist society called Ujedinjenje ili Smrt (Union or Death), known as Cerna Ruka (Black Hand). The members of this society were active in the territories that they recognized as Serb, and they sought to create a Greater Serbia. Acting as a conspiracy and using brutal methods to punish disloyalty, the society organized attempts on Austro-Hungarian officials. Its sign, the imprint of a black hand, aroused fear and increased the nationalistic mood in Serbia. As early as 1911 Dimitrijević planned the assassination of Emperor Francis Joseph but was unsuccessful. In 1913 he became the chief of Serbian military intelligence.

Dimitrijević's responsibility for the attempt on the life of Archduke Francis Ferdinand in Sarajevo (28 July 1914) has not been quite explained, although the assassin, Gavrilo Princip, belonged to the Black Hand. After Serbia's defeat and the evacuation of the government from Belgrade, Dimitrijević rose to the rank of colonel in 1916. The Black Hand became so influential in the army and in the administration that Regent Alexander Karadjordjević, along with Prime Minister Nikola Pašić, decided to liquidate it. In October 1916 Dimitrijević lost his post of chief of the intelligence department and was assigned to the army staff on the Salonika front. On 28 December 1916 he was arrested and brought to trial under trumped-up charges of high treason and attempts on the life of the heir to the throne. After the so-called Salonika Trial he was sentenced to death on 5 June 1917, and despite the protests of Serbia's allies, Russia and Great Britain, he was executed. In 1953 he was rehabilitated by the courts of Communist Yugoslavia. (AO)

Sources: Biographisches Lexikon, vol. 1; M. Boghitchevitch, Le process de Salonique, juin 1917 (Paris, 1927); M. Boghitchevitch, Le colonel Dragoutine Dimitrievitch Apis (Paris, 1928); Borivoje Nešković, Istina o Solunskom procesu (Belgrade, 1953); Vladimir Dedijer, The Road to Sarajevo (New York, 1966); Spy-Counterspy: An Encyclopedia of Espionage (New York, 1982).

DIMITROV Filip (31 March 1955, Sofia), Bulgarian lawyer and politician. Dimitrov graduated from a high school in which English was the language of instruction and from the Law Department of the University of Sofia (1977). Until 1989 he worked as a barrister. After Todor Zhivkov was removed from power in November 1989, Dimitrov took part in the creation of democratic structures. He initiated the Independent Bar Association and was co-founder of the Bulgarian Green Party. From 6 July 1990 he was deputy chairman, and from December 1990 to December 1991 chairman, of the National Coordination Board of the Union of Democratic Forces (Sayuz na Demokratichnite Sili [SDS]). He also established a monarchist society demanding the return of the king but to no avail. From January to March 1990 he participated in the Round Table Talks on behalf of the SDS, and from May 1991 he presided over the SDS central electoral committee. In the elections of October 1991 he won a parliamentary seat. When it proved possible to create a government majority of the SDS and the (Turkish) Movement for Rights and Freedoms (MRF), on 8 December 1991 Dimitrov became prime minister of this government. He tried to implement economic reforms, but their first social effects undermined his position. He faced growing social discontent, connected with deteriorating living conditions and with the reaction of the Turks to discrimination in their access to privatized state farms. He also faced internal tensions within the SDS on account of the attitude toward the Orthodox Church, the restoration of the monarchy, the pace of reforms, and President Zhelyu Zhelev. When the MRF supported a vote of non-confidence, on 28 October 1992 Dimitrov had to resign as prime minister. After his resignation his position within the SDS weakened. In November 1992 he demanded UN intervention in the former Yugoslavia. After 1997 he was Bulgarian envoy to the United Nations. An amateur of psychoanalysis, a polyglot, and a writer, he authored Ibo živjacha, Gospodî (Since they lived, My Lord; 1991) and Istinskata istorija za ricarite na kryglata masa (True knights of the Round Table; 1992). (JJ)

Sources: Koy koy e v Bulgariya (Sofia, 1998); Europa Środkowo-Wschodnia 1991–1992 (Warsaw, 1992–94); Raymond Detrez, Historical Dictionary of Bulgaria (Lanham, Md., 1997); Bugajski.

DIMITROV Georgi “Gemeto” (15 April 1903, Eni Chyftlik, near Odrinsko—29 November 1972, Washington, D.C.), Bulgarian Peasant Party politician. Dimitrov was born into a peasant family. After high school he completed medical studies in Zagreb, where he earned a Ph.D. in 1929. From 1922 he was a member of the Bulgarian Agrarian National Union (Bylgarski Narodny Zemedelski Sojuz), and he practiced as a doctor in Dovientsa and Sofia. He was temporarily arrested during the coup in 1923 and after an attempt on the life of Tsar Boris III in 1925. However, he had nothing to do with the attempt. In 1928 Dimitrov became secretary of the party youth unit and founded the Agrarian Union of Academic Youth. In the 1930s he was at the head of the leftist faction of Agrarians, which was linked with the magazine Pladne. In 1931 he was elected MP. Although he criticized the Stalinist regime in the USSR, Dimitrov defended the Communists attacked in parliament and financially supported the mother of Georgi Dimitrov. After the royal coup of 1934 he criticized the autocratic government of the tsar and his policy of rapprochement with the Axis states. Because of this he was temporarily arrested in 1935.

After Bulgaria's accession to the anti-Comintern Pact Dimitrov was threatened with imprisonment. Therefore in February 1941 he secretly left for England, where he founded the Bulgarian National Committee, which favored the Allies. Later, he lived in the Middle East. When the Pladne faction joined an agreement with the Communists within the framework of the Fatherland Front in the country, after the coup of 9 September 1944 Dimitrov returned to Bulgaria, becoming the head of the Agrarians and of the non-Communist part of the ruling coalition. At first, the Communists considered appointing him prime minister, but after realizing that he was extremely popular and uncompromising in the defense of democracy, they decided to get rid of him. When he rejected a diplomatic post in England, the Communists attempted to remove him from the leadership of the party. The Agrarians rallied around him, so the Communists and their protector, the commander of the Soviet troops in Bulgaria, General Sergei Biryuzov, restricted his freedom of movement. On 21 January 1945 the police did not allow him to speak at a rally in Pleven and imposed house arrest on him. Despite his ill health, Dimitrov fearlessly stood up to the Communists, so they arrested him in April. After his release, which was conditioned on his resignation as head of the party, he remained the target of a mounting campaign of threats and blackmail. Fearing another arrest Dimitrov, who was suffering from pneumonia, took refuge in the American Embassy in May, and on 5 September 1945 an American military plane took him out of Bulgaria.

Dimitrov established contacts with other Bulgarian emigrant politicians who represented democratic views, and in June 1947 he established the National Bulgarian Committee in Washington. In the following years he was one of the leading activists of the Assembly of Captive European Nations (ACEN). In 1943 Dimitrov wrote Bylgarskata tragedia (Bulgarian tragedy); in 1952 he published his memoirs of Nikola Petkov (Nicola Petkov: In Memoriam); and in 1957 he published an analysis of the Hungarian uprising, Inferences from the Hungarian Revolution. In 1993 his Spomeni (Memoirs) were published in Sofia. (WR) Sources: Entsiklopediya Bulgariya, vol. 2; Charles A. Moser, Dimitrov of Bulgaria: A Political Biography of Dr. Georgi M. Dimitrov (Ottawa, 1979); Dr. Georgi M. Dimitrov, Lebenslauf und politische Tätigkeit: 15 April 1903–29 November 1972 (Munich, 1982); Jerzy Jackowicz, Partie opozycyjne w Bułgarii 1944–1948 (Warsaw, 1997).

DIMITROV Georgi [originally Mikhailov] (18 June 1882, Kovachevtsi, near Radomir–2 July 1949, Moscow), Bulgarian Communist leader. The son of a laborer, Dimitrov left school at twelve and started working in a printing house. In 1900 he joined a trade union organization, and in 1902 he entered the Bulgarian Social Democratic Workers' Party. After the split in the leadership of the party, he backed its Bolshevik wing, the Tesnyaki, and in 1909 he became a member of the Central Committee (CC) of this faction. The same year he was elected secretary of a federation of revolutionary trade unions. In 1913 he was elected to parliament. He was arrested for anti-war and anti-state agitation in 1918 but was soon released in the face of Bulgaria's defeat in the war. After the Bulgarian Communist Party (BCP) was formed in April 1919, Dimitrov became a member of its CC. Arrested by the Romanian police on his way to Russia to the Second Congress of the Comintern in 1920, he arrived in Moscow in 1921. It was then that he met Lenin. At the founding congress of the Communist international trade union organization (Profintern), Dimitrov was a delegate representing Bulgaria and the Balkans. After returning to Bulgaria, he took part in the preparation of a Communist uprising in September 1923, and after its failure he fled to the USSR. The Bulgarian court sentenced him to death in absentia.

During his stay in the USSR Dimitrov quickly rose in the hierarchy of the Communist International (Comintern). He headed the Balkan Communist Federation. At that time he opted for a federation of Balkan states in which ethnic tensions could be avoided. For example, he saw Macedonia, a bone of contention between the Serbs and the Bulgarians, as an autonomous part of such a federation. In 1924 he attended the Fifth Congress of the Comintern. During Stalin's struggle against Leon Trotsky he supported the former; consequently he was promoted to the Executive Committee (EC) of the International. At the EC Plenum in 1926 Dimitrov was elected a deputy member of the Secretariat of the Comintern. Assigned to the secret apparatus of the International in 1929, he settled in Berlin, where, as "Doctor Hediger," he headed the West European Bureau of the Comintern. Arrested by the Nazi authorities on 9 March 1933, he was groundlessly accused of setting fire to the Reichstag. At the trial in Leipzig (September–December 1933) he delivered several famous speeches against Nazism, and as a result he became a hero among leftists and liberal internationalists. In February 1934 Dimitrov returned to the USSR and obtained Soviet citizenship. In 1937 he was elected to the USSR Supreme Soviet. At the Seventh Congress of the Comintern in 1935 he read the main report, which supported an offensive against fascism in Europe and pointed to the tasks of the Comintern. He was then elected a member of the Presidium of the Executive Committee and secretary general of the Communist International.

In this role, Dimitrov directed the creation of "uniform people's fronts" in France and Spain. He oversaw Stalinist purges in various Communist Parties that were sections of the Comintern—for example, in the Latvian, Hungarian, Polish, Romanian, and Yugoslav parties. These purges claimed the lives of thousands of people. In September 1939 he published an article in the Komunisticheski Internatsional. In it, he interpreted the war in Europe as a result of the aggression of Anglo-French imperialism against the "forces of peace and socialism"—that is, the USSR and Nazi Germany. Under his leadership, from 1939 to 1941 the Communist parties followed a pro-German or neutral policy, which changed radically in June 1941, after the invasion of the USSR by the Third Reich. In May 1943 Dimitrov signed an act that formally dissolved the Comintern, but actually the entire Comintern apparatus under his leadership went over to a special department of the CC of the All-Union Communist Party (Bolsheviks). The aim of this operation was to give the appearance of greater independence for Communist parties from the Kremlin; however, it actually increased their subordination to the leadership of the Soviet party. In 1942 Dimitrov coformed the Bulgarian Fatherland Front, and then he was the architect of the Communist takeover in Bulgaria.

After the coup of 9 September 1944 Dimitrov remotely directed the Sovietization of Bulgaria; for example, in January 1945 he ordered death sentences against a few dozen representatives of the Bulgarian political elite. In September 1945 he returned to Sofia, assuming the post of secretary general of the Bulgarian Communist Party, and from November 1946 he simultaneously served as prime minister. He represented Bulgaria at a conference in Paris where the “sovereignty” of the new Bulgaria was recognized. This conference also led to the signing of a peace treaty between the Allies and Bulgaria in February 1947. Dimitrov was in charge of the bloody suppression of his political opponents as well as of his one-time allies from the Fatherland Front; for example, in 1947 he was responsible for the sentencing and then for the execution of Nikola Petkov. Dimitrov was one of the founders of the Information Bureau of the Communist and Workers’ Parties (Cominform), which was created during a conference in Szklarska Poręba in September 1947. At that time, he planned to create a federation of Communist Balkan countries—Albania, Bulgaria, and Yugoslavia. However, since this project was ahead of Stalin’s plans, in January 1948 in Moscow Dimitrov was officially subjected to criticism. In February 1948 in Moscow he signed a treaty of friendship between Bulgaria and the USSR. At the Fifth Congress of the BCP in December 1948 he was reelected secretary general. He was also in charge of the first stage of the collectivization of agriculture. Seriously ill, in 1949 Dimitrov went for treatment to the USSR, where he soon died at a sanatorium near Moscow. It was suspected that he was killed because of his influence in the Communist movement and because of his plans for a Balkan federation.

In 1981–89 fifteen volumes of Dimitrov’s writings, Sychinenia (Works), were published in Bulgaria. They repeatedly appeared in various languages, but the period between 1939 and 1941, when the USSR and the Comintern were cooperating with the Third Reich, was carefully avoided in those publications. After Dimitrov’s death his body was embalmed, in the same way as was done with Lenin’s body, and it was placed in a specially built mausoleum in the center of Sofia. On 18 July 1990 the body was cremated and buried at the Orlandovtsi Cemetery in Sofia, and the mausoleum was demolished. (WR)

Sources: Entsiklopediya Bulgariya, vol. 1 (Sofia, 1981); Lazitch; Communist International: 7th Congress, Moscow, 1935, Resolutions; including also the closing speech of Georgi Dimitroff (New York, 1935); Joseph Rothschild, The Communist Party of Bulgaria: Origins and Development, 1883–1936 (New York, 1959); Kamen

Kalchev and Georgi Dimitrov, Kratkyk biograficheski ocherk (Plovdiv, 1971); Nisan Oren, Bulgarian Communism: The Road to Power, 1933–1944 (New York, 1971); Devetdeset godini ot rozhdeniето na Georgi Dimitrov (Sofia, 1972); Georgi Dimitrov, And Yet It Moves: Concluding Speech before the Leipzig Trial (Sofia, 1978); Dimitroff contra Göring (Berlin, 1981); John D. Bell, The Bulgarian Communist Party from Blagoev to Zhivkov (Stanford, 1986).

DIMITROVA Blaga (2 January 1922, Byala Slatyna—4 May 2003, Sofia), Bulgarian writer and dissident. Dimitrova spent her childhood in Velyko Tyrnovo. In 1945 she graduated in Slavic studies from the University of Sofia, and then she continued studies at the Gorki Institute in Moscow and in Leningrad, where she received a Ph.D. After her studies she edited periodicals for children and youngsters and popular scientific publications. Her knowledge of several Slavic languages, as well as of Swedish, German, and Vietnamese, made her a leading translator. For instance, she translated Pan Tadeusz, by Adam Mickiewicz, and several classical ancient poets. She also wrote poems herself. After the Socialist realist period, in 1956 Dimitrova changed her style, frequently experimenting in poetry. She published her first volume, Lirika (Lyrics), in 1959. For a long time she combined her “disobedient” literature with political engagement. In 1966–72 she lived in Vietnam and was active in trying to draw the war to a close. She also took part in Communist peace congresses in Berlin in 1969 and in Moscow in 1971. But her “deviations” from the official literary line were already clear from the mid-1960s—for instance, in the collection Pytuvanye kym sebe si (1965; Journey to Oneself, 1969), the novel Otklonyenye (Detour; 1967), and the volume of poems Lavinata (Avalanche; 1971). This is why from the early 1970s Dimitrova faced increasing problems with publishing her works. She was strongly criticized for a biography (written together with her husband, Yordan Vasilyev) of Elisaveta Bagriana. Its third volume was banned from publication. In 1981 the censors banned her novel Liceto (Face), and finally most of her works were banned.

Dimitrova belonged to those Bulgarian intellectuals who from the mid-1980s began to demand systemic reforms. She bravely defended the forcibly Bulgarized Turks, writing a short story about them, Ime (Name; 1985). In 1988 she joined the Club for the Support of Glasnost and Perestroika, founded at Sofia University and headed by Zhelyu Zhelev. During a congress of the Association of Bulgarian Writers in 1989 she sharply criticized her colleagues’ silence in the face of the drastic abuses of human rights by the Todor Zhivkov regime. Her engagement in political opposition added to her popularity, which resulted in her assuming the position of vice-president alongside Zhelev in January 1992. On 30 June 1993 she resigned, arguing that she had had no influence on state affairs. Her decision was connected with her links to the right wing of the Union of Democratic Forces, which Zhelev criticized. Later Dimitrova presided over the Raina Kabaivanska Memorial Foundation, supporting talented children. She wrote for Liberation and other Western papers and was among the leading and most influential Bulgarian intellectuals. In 1993 she published a volume of poetic philosophical essays, Uraniya (Urania). Many of her poems were translated into English—for instance, in the collections Because the Sea Is Black (1989), Last Rock Eagle (1992), Forbidden Sea (2000), and Scars (2002). (AG)

Sources: Syvremienna Bulgarska Entsiklopediya, vol. 2 (Sofia, 1994); Heike Rader, Auf Umwegen zu sich selbsts (Marburg, 1997); www.centrenationaldulivre.fr/actualites/biographies-bulgares.htm; Jerzy Jackowicz, Bułgaria od rządów komunistycznych do demokracji parlamentarnej 1988–1991 (Warsaw, 1999); Raymond Detrez, Historical Dictionary of Bulgaria (Lanham, Md., 1997).

DINESCU Mircea (11 October 1950, Slobozia), Romanian poet and dissident. Born into a laborer's family, in 1969 Dinescu graduated from high school in Slobozia. In the early 1970s he moved to Bucharest, where he made his literary debut in the periodical Lucafărul, and in 1971 he published his first volume, Invocația nimănu (Calling nobody), for which he received an award of the Association of Romanian Writers (ARW). At first his works were marked by a sense of the tragic nature of the world. With time Dinescu evolved toward contesting reality and then toward sarcasm. He considered the world as alien to human spirituality. In 1976 he published Proprietarul de poduri (Owner of bridges), for which he was again awarded by the ARW. In 1979–84 he studied journalism at the Stefan Gheorghiu Party Academy. He gradually evolved toward a critical assessment of the Communist reality of Romania. He expressed his objections most clearly in the volume Moartea citește ziarul (Death reading a newspaper), which was banned by the censors from publication in 1988 but was printed in Amsterdam in 1989. In 1976–82 Dinescu edited the periodical Lucafărul, and in 1982–89, the periodical România literară. In 1981 he was awarded by the ARW for the third time. In the second half of the 1980s he was increasingly open in criticizing the Communist system and gained the reputation of a dissident. In 1989 he was fired from România literară and placed under house arrest; he then gave an interview to the French daily Liberation. Released on 22 December 1989, a few hours after the coup that toppled the Nicolae Ceaușescu regime, Dinescu was brought to the central TV headquarters in Bucharest, where, along with other dissidents and coup leaders, he announced the end of the dictatorship. They founded the National Salvation Front (Frontul Sălburi Naționale [NSF]), which took over power. On the next day Dinescu and several other dissidents joined the NSF National Council, making it credible to the society. Soon, however, he left the NSF, and in 1991 he established the weekly Academia Cațavencu and became chairman of the ARW. In 2000 he ceased to publish his weekly and started another periodical, Plai cu boi. He also became a member of the National Council for the Study of Archives of the Former Security Police. (LW)

Sources: Józef Darski, Rumunia: Historia, współczesność, konflikty narodowe (Warsaw, 1995); Dictionar Enciclopedic, vol. 2 (Bucharest, 1996); romania-on-line.net/whoswho/DinescuMircea.htm.

DINNYÉS Lajos (16 April 1901, Alsódabas–14 May 1961, Budapest), Hungarian Peasant Party politician. Born into a landowner's family, Dinnyés was educated at a Calvinist gymnasium in Budapest, and then he graduated from the Agricultural Academy in Keszthely. From 1930 he ran a hundred-hectare farm. He began his political activities in rightist youth organizations. A member of the Independent Smallholders' Party (ISP) from 1930 and MP between 1931 and 1939, in 1934 he was elected a member of the local government commission of Pest County. In the press as well as in parliament, Dinnyés expressed definitely anti-German and anti-Arrow Cross Party views. He did not vote in favor of the anti-Jewish laws of 1938–39. During World War II he served in the army.

After the Germans entered Hungary in March 1944, Dinnyés went into hiding and was in the resistance movement. When the Soviet troops entered the country, he became involved in political life as a member of the National Committee in Alsódabas. From April 1945 until the end of his life, Dinnyés sat in parliament. In August 1945 he joined the National Executive Committee of the ISP and was president of the organization in Pest County. Between September 1946 and September 1947 and then from April 1948 he was again a member of the top party leadership. He had good personal relations with many leading Communist activists, including Mihály Farkas. Between March and September 1947 Dinnyés served as minister of national defense. On 31 May 1947, on the motion of the Hungarian Communist Party (HCP), Dinnyés agreed to assume the post of prime minister, replacing Ferenc Nagy, who, while on leave in Switzerland, was forced to resign. Dinnyés cooperated with the Communists, who aimed at the total takeover of power. He also carried out the nationalization of schools, big banks, and plants that employed more than one hundred people. On 10 December 1948, after Finance Minister István Nyárády escaped abroad, Dinnyés resigned. From December 1948 he was president of the United Research Institute of Agriculture; from 1952, head of the National Agricultural Library and head of the Documentation Center; from 1954, a member of the National Council of the Patriotic People's Front (PPF); and from 1960, a member of the Presidium of the National Council of the PPF. In October 1956 Dinnyés was a member of the Provisional National Council of the Fifth Budapest district. After the failure of the revolution he joined the victorious camp of János Kádár. After the elections of 1958 Dinnyés served as vice-president of the parliament. (JT)

Sources: Ferenc Nagy, The Struggle behind the Iron Curtain (New York, 1948); Imre Kovacs, ed., Facts about Hungary: The Fight for Freedom (New York, 1966); Magyar Nagylexikon, vol. 6 (Budapest, 1998); A magyar forradalom és szabadságharc enciklopédiája (Budapest, 1999).

DIONISIUS [originally Konstantin Valedinsky] (4 May 1876, Murom–15 March 1961, Warsaw), Orthodox Metropolitan of Warsaw and of all of Poland. The son of a clergyman, in his youth Dionisius was involved in missionary work in Siberia. In 1900 he graduated from the Kazan Theological Seminary, and from 1902 he was in charge of the Chełm (Kholm) Theological Seminary. In 1911 he became chaplain of the Russian legation in Rome, and in 1913 he was consecrated bishop and head of the Krzemieniec diocese in Volhynia. After the fall of tsarism, he supported the Ukrainian government of Pavlo Skoropadsky. In 1921 the Polish authorities recognized him as an ally in their efforts to gain autocephaly for the Orthodox Church in Poland. In the face of the resistance of some Russian bishops who recognized the supremacy of the Moscow Patriarchate, in February 1923 the Polish authorities supported the selection of Dionisius as head of the Warsaw diocese and his elevation to metropolitan. Between 1923 and 1924, under government pressure, Dionisius unsuccessfully sought the consent of Patriarch Tikhon of Moscow for the creation of an autocephalous church in Poland. Patriarch Tikhon would not agree to more than its autonomy. Finally, autocephaly was established in an uncanonical way. As a result of the efforts of the Polish authorities, on 13 November 1924 the patriarch of Constantinople confirmed the autocephaly of the Polish Orthodox Church. Dionisius accepted it because it also strengthened the position of the Church in relation to the Polish state.

Despite the breakup with Moscow, by continuing his moderate approach and patient diplomacy, Dionisius managed to prevent a split in the Polish Orthodox Church, and he succeeded in gaining the acceptance of its new status by Orthodox metropolitans from other countries. In November 1938, in agreement with state authorities, Dionisius managed to normalize the internal legal status of the Polish Orthodox Church. He defended the status of the Russian language. Nevertheless, under pressure he allowed, to a limited extent, the native languages of the faithful—that is, Ukrainian, Belorussian, and Polish—to be used for religious services, sermons, and publications. However, he did not agree to demands for the nationalization of the Orthodox Church in Volhynia. When these demands were supported by Polish authorities, promoting the development of the Ukrainian movement in Volhynia, in 1933 Dionisius resigned as head of the diocese of Krzemieniec. He was also in conflict with the authorities in 1938–39, when they started a Polonization of the Orthodox faithful in the regions of Lublin and Chełm and in the western part of Volhynia.

After the fall of Poland in 1939, Dionisius was temporarily placed under house arrest. German authorities brought about a compromise between Dionisius and Ukrainian activists. From September 1940 until the end of the occupation Dionisius served as metropolitan only in German-occupied Poland, and the two other (Ukrainian) bishops, with the consent of the Germans, were given a free hand in the Ukrainization program. Dionisius was also a “protector” of the Ukrainian Autocephalous Orthodox Church, which functioned in the territory of the Ukraine. In January 1945 the Orthodox episcopate of German-occupied Poland was evacuated to Austria. Dionisius was the only hierarch who decided to return to the territories ruled by the Communists. In June 1945 he again assumed charge of the Orthodox Church in Poland. The authorities did not accept his explanations about the occupation period and insisted on his resignation. He was not recognized as head of the autocephalous church by the Moscow Patriarchate; he held out until February 1948. Excommunicated by the Moscow Patriarchate and kept under house arrest in Sosnowiec, Dionisius declared loyalty to the state. He was supported only by the Constantinople Patriarchate and by the Polish government-in-exile. At the end of his life he was allowed to return to Warsaw, where he died in extreme poverty. (TS)

Sources: Encyclopedia of Ukraine, vol. 5 (Toronto, 1993); Mirosława Papierzyńska-Turek, Państwo wobec prawosławia 1918–1939 (Warsaw, 1989), K. Urban, Kościół prawosławny w Polsce 1945–1970 (rys historyczny) (Kraków, 1996).

DIZDAREVIĆ Raif (9 December 1926, Fojnica, Bosnia and Herzegovina), Bosnian politician. From 1943 Dizdarević took part in the Communist guerrilla movement of Josip Broz Tito. In March 1944 he joined the Communist Federation of Yugoslav Youth, and in March 1945, the Communist Party of Yugoslavia. He worked in the security service (1945–51), then in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs (1951–74), and on various diplomatic missions: as secretary and chargé d'affaires in Bulgaria (1951–54), first secretary in the Soviet Union and Mongolia (1956–59), and consul in Czechoslovakia (1963–67). He also held other posts, such as secretary of the Presidium of the Confederation of Yugoslav Trade Unions (1967–72), chairman of the Confederation of Trade Unions of Bosnia and Herzegovina (1974–78), and adviser to the federal secretary (minister) of foreign affairs (1972–74). From 1974 Dizdarević was a member of the Presidium of the Central Committee of the League of Communists of Bosnia and Herzegovina, and from 1978 to 1983 he was a member of the Presidium of the Socialist Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina. He was an MP to the Federal Assembly and its speaker in 1982–83. From May 1984 to the end of 1987 he was federal secretary of foreign affairs. From 15 May 1984 to 15 May 1988 he was a member of the Presidium of the Socialist Federative Republic of Yugoslavia, and then, until 15 May 1989, he was its chairman. Then he retired. During the war in the former Yugoslavia Dizdarević lived in his home village of Fojnica. (AO)

Sources: Juliusz Stroynowski, ed., Who's Who in the Socialist Countries of Europe (Munich, London, and Paris, 1989); www.mfa.gov.yu/history/ministri/RDizdarevic_e.html.

DJAKOVIĆ Djuro (30 November 1886, Brodski Varoš, Bosnia–25 April 1929, Sveti Duh, Slovenia), Croatian Communist activist from Bosnia. As a teenager Djaković worked as a metalworker's apprentice. After joining a trade union organization, he started his political career in the Social Democratic Party of Bosnia and Herzegovina in 1909. During World War I he was sentenced by the Austrian authorities to hard labor. In late 1918 he returned to his home region, and in April 1919 he took part in a meeting at which the Socialist Workers' Party of Yugoslavia was founded. At its subsequent congress in June 1920 the party was dominated by followers of Bolshevism, including Djaković, who was elected to its Central Committee (CC), and the party's name was changed to the Communist Party of Yugoslavia (CPY). In 1920 Djaković won a parliamentary seat, and in June and July 1921 he was the CPY delegate to the Third Congress of the Communist International (Comintern) in Moscow. After returning home, he was temporarily put under house arrest. When the party was outlawed, he took part in its congress in Vienna in July 1922 and was again elected to the CC. Officially he was a trade union activist, and in 1926 he became the leader of the Croatian Metalworkers'

Trade Union. In 1927 he left for the USSR, where under the pseudonym "Georg Friedman" he studied at the Lenin School of the Comintern. In August 1928, as "Bosnić," he took part in the Sixth Congress of the Comintern and became a deputy member of its Executive Committee. In October 1928, at the Fourth CPY Congress, he was elected CC secretary. While crossing the border, Djaković was shot by the police. Recognized as a martyr of the Communist movement, he was included in the hall of fame of postwar Communist Yugoslavia. (WR) Sources: Lazitch; Enciklopedija Jugoslavije, vol. 3 (Zagreb, 1958); Djuro Djaković: Život i djelo (Slovenski Brod, 1984).

DJILAS Milovan (12 June 1911, Podbišće, Montenegro–20 June 1995, Belgrade), Yugoslav Communist activist, politician, and writer. Djilas was born into a Montenegrin peasant family, the fourth of nine children. His father took part in both Balkan Wars (1912–13) and in World War I and was police commander in Kolašin from 1918. Djilas went to high school in Kolašin and Beran. In 1929–33 he studied literature at the University of Belgrade. Already then he was a keen Communist. The Bolshevik victory in Russia made him consider the possibility that a similar revolution was possible in Yugoslavia. During his studies, which he did not complete, he became a radical student leader, engaged in a struggle against the royal dictatorship of King Alexander I. He was first arrested in March 1932 for taking part in an anti-government demonstration. In April 1933 he was detained again and tortured, and he spent three years in the Sremska Mitrovica prison. It was there that he met influential Communist leaders, such as Moša Pijade and Aleksander Ranković, and he joined the zealous followers of Stalinism. After his release in 1936 he recruited volunteers for the Spanish Civil War. As Josip Broz Tito needed Djilas at home, he did not agree to his departure for Spain. In 1938 Djilas became a member of the Central Committee (CC) of the Communist Party of Yugoslavia (CPY), and in 1939 he joined its Politburo. During World War II he belonged to the top organizers of the Communist guerrilla movement. He commanded guerrilla troops in Montenegro and Bosnia, and he edited the party papers Borba and Nova Jugoslavija. During the war his father, two brothers, and one sister were killed by the Nazis or the Chetniks.

After the war Djilas became one of the top leaders of Communist Yugoslavia. In 1945 he was minister for Montenegro, and in 1946 he assumed the post of minister without portfolio. In 1944 he headed a mission to Moscow and met Stalin for the first time. In 1945 he belonged to a Yugoslav delegation, headed by Tito, negotiating conditions for a Yugoslav-Soviet treaty of mutual aid. In 1948 he went to Moscow for the third time to coordinate the policies of the Yugoslav and Soviet governments toward Albania. Discrepancies between the two governments were growing, and, under Soviet pressure, in June 1948 the Information Bureau of Communist and Workers' Parties (Cominform) condemned Tito's leadership of Yugoslavia. Along with Edvard Kardelj and Boris Kidrić, Djilas was considered an architect of the so-called self-government model of Yugoslav communism, which aimed at a limitation of the role of the central authorities in the economy. In January 1953 Djilas became one of the country's vice-presidents, and in December 1953 he also assumed the position of speaker of the Federal People's Assembly.

In 1953–54 Djilas published a series of articles in the daily Borba and the weekly Nova Misao in which he criticized the Communist monopoly of power. He suggested a democratic reconstruction of the system through the introduction of political pluralism. At the Third Extraordinary Plenum of the CC of the League of Communists of Yugoslavia (LCY), on 17 January 1954 he was removed from all positions. In March 1954 he gave up his party membership. When in 1955 Nikita Khrushchev came to Belgrade on a visit that was intended to repair Yugoslav-Soviet relations, Djilas was arrested for "spreading hostile propaganda" in an interview he gave to the New York Times, and he was sentenced to a year and a half in prison with suspended execution. When in the fall of 1956 Soviet troops bloodily suppressed the Hungarian Revolution, which jeopardized Yugoslav-Soviet relations, in December 1956 Djilas was detained again in the Sremska Mitrovica prison in connection with his article "The Storm over Eastern Europe," published in The New Leader in the United States, in which he supported the Hungarian uprising. He was sentenced to three years of hard labor.

An additional four years of prison were added to Djilas' sentence after he published The New Class (1957), smuggled from prison to the West. The book shook intellectual opinion in the West and brought him world fame. In the book he argued that the Communist revolution, started for the sake of a classless society, had resulted in the stabilization of a new ruling class that enjoyed a monopolistic access to power and special privileges. He also argued that under communism a political career was ideal for those who want to live a parasitic life at the expense of others. He considered "Socialist property" a disguise that hid the real ownership of the new class. He was particularly critical of the USSR. For instance, he called the collectivization of agriculture a "horrendous and devastating war, bearing symptoms of madness." He argued that Soviet troops had imposed communism in Poland, Czechoslovakia, and Hungary. He found that in practice in the Soviet bloc "all that was left of the Marxist dialectics and materialism was formalism and dogmatism, serving cementing power, justifying tyranny, and violating human conscience."

Djilas was released in 1961, but returned to prison in 1962 after he published his Conversations with Stalin in the West; in it he called Stalin one of the worst criminals in history. Sentenced to nine years in prison, he was released after four years. All together he spent nine years in the same Sremska Mitrovica prison in which he had spent three years before the war. The 1968 Warsaw Pact intervention in Czechoslovakia had a strong impact on Yugoslav-Soviet relations. While in 1956 Tito had reacted very angrily to Djilas's criticism of the Soviets, in 1968 Tito used the same criticism to warn international opinion against the possibility of Soviet intervention in the Balkans. Djilas was even allowed to tour Western Europe and the United States. Until his death he lived in isolation in Belgrade. He was banned from political activity, but he could write and publish his works abroad, although not at home. The domestic ban on his publications was not lifted until 1988. In May 1989 the Yugoslav authorities officially rehabilitated him. With surprise and horror he watched the war in a decaying Yugoslavia in the 1990s. He put the blame for it on the nationalism of Slobodan Milošević, who, in his opinion, was using it as a means to stay in power. (AO)

Sources: Milovan Djilas, Land without Justice (New York, 1958); Milovan Djilas, Memoir of a Revolutionary (New York, 1973); Milovan Djilas, Wartime (New York, 1977); Milovan Djilas, Rise and Fall (San Diego, 1985); Milovan Djilas, Tito: The Story from Inside (New York, 1980), Stephen Clissold, Djilas: The Progress of a Revolutionary (Hounslow, Middlesex, 1983); Dennis Reinhartz, Milovan Djilas: A Revolutionary as a Writer (New York, 1981).

DJINDJIĆ Zoran (1 August 1952, Bosanski Šamac–12 March 2003, Belgrade), Serbian politician. The son of a Yugoslav general, Djindjić spent his childhood in several garrison towns. In 1970–74 he studied philosophy at the University of Belgrade and was active in the independent student movement. Arrested and sentenced to one year in prison but released after the intervention of the German chancellor, Willy Brandt, he started doctoral studies in Konstanz, Germany. In 1979 he defended a Ph.D. thesis written with Jürgen Habermas. Upon returning to Yugoslavia, Djindjić worked in the Institute of Philosophy and Social Theory, lectured in philosophy at the university in Novi Sad, and edited the periodical of the Serbian Philosophical Society, Teorija. In 1989 he was co-founder of the opposition Democratic Party (Demokratska Stranka [DS]); in 1990 he became head of its Supreme Board and in 1994 its chairman. Elected to the Serbian parliament in 1990, he was head of the DS faction until the elections of 1993, when he was elected to the Upper House of the federal parliament of the new Yugoslavia. In 1996 he co-organized and became one of the leaders of the opposition coalition Together (Zajedno), which included the Serbian Renewal Movement (Srpski Pokret Obnove) of Vuk Drašković and the Democratic Party of Serbia (Srpska Demokratska Stranka) of Vojislav Koštunica. Djindjić was the coalition's candidate for mayor of Belgrade in November 1996. The election was announced invalid in several dozen towns where opposition candidates won (including Belgrade), which resulted in eighty-eight days of mass anti-government demonstrations coordinated by Djindjić (among others). Under such pressure and after the intervention of the European Union, President Slobodan Milošević recognized the election results, and in February 1997 Djindjić became the first non-Communist mayor of Belgrade since World War II. In the summer of 1997 the coalition split, and Djindjić was recalled from office.

In 1998 Djindjić co-organized a liberal opposition coalition, the Alliance for Change, and in 2000 he became its coordinator. The alliance and the DS were in firm opposition to Milošević, accusing him of responsibility for the NATO air raids on Yugoslavia in 1999, and they maintained good relations with NATO diplomats. The government media accused Djindjić of treason, so he left for Montenegro. After the termination of the NATO air raids, he led the Alliance for Change into the Democratic Opposition of Serbia (Demokratska Opozicija Srbije [DOS]), a broad coalition against the Milošević government. Djindjić directed the campaign before the elections of December 2000. After the DOS won, he was elected prime minister of Serbia. He played an important role in internal reforms and in rapprochement with the West. During 2002 the DOS split, but its components supported his government, which entered into conflict with President Koštunica, who was more moderate in dealing with the post-Communists. Among other works, Djindjić published Subjektivnost i nasilje (Subjectivity and violence; 1984); Jesen dijalektike (The autumn of dialectics; 1986); Jugoslavija kao nedovršena država (Yugoslavia as an unfinished state; 1987); and Srbija ni na istoku ni na zapadu (Serbia—Neither East nor West; 1996). Djindjić was assassinated by the mafia structures in an incident that shook Yugoslavia. (AW) Sources: Leonard Cohen, Broken Bonds: The Disintegration of Yugoslavia (Boulder, Colo., 1993); Susan L. Woodward, The Balkan Tragedy: Chaos and Dissolution after the Cold War (Washington, D.C., 1995); Christopher Bennett, Yugoslavia's Bloody Collapse: Causes, Course and Consequences (London, 1995); Karen Dawisha and Bruce Parrot, eds., Politics, Power and the Struggle for Democracy in South-East Europe (Cambridge, 1997); www.serbia.sr.gov.yu.

DJUKANOVIĆ Milo (15 February 1962, Nikšić), Montenegrin Communist and post-Communist activist. Djukanović graduated in economics from the University of Titograd (now Podgorica) in 1986. From 1979 he belonged to the League of Communists of Yugoslavia (LCY), and in 1986–89 he was a member of its Central Committee. He was active in transforming the Montenegrin section of the party into the Democratic Party of Socialists (Demokratska Partija Socijalista [DPS]), which won the first democratic elections in 1990 and has ruled Montenegro ever since. In January 1991 Djukanović was elected prime minister of the Montenegrin republic as a close aide of the DPS leader and president of the republic, Momir Bulatović. At the turn of 1997 Djukanović he entered into conflict with Bulatović because of the latter's support for the Serbian post-Communists of Slobodan Milošević, particularly in the context of Milošević's attempt to invalidate local elections won by the opposition.

Djukanović gained the support of a firm majority in the DPS, and in October 1997 he defeated Bulatović in the presidential elections. He took office in January 1998. His main goals were to change the Yugoslav federation into a confederation and to achieve rapprochement with the West, irrespective of the Serbian standpoint on these matters. In May 1998 the DPS, running in the coalition For a Better Life, defeated the Socialist People's Party of Bulatović and won an absolute majority in the Montenegrin parliament. During the Kosovo conflict and the NATO air raids on Yugoslavia in 1999, Djukanović distanced himself from Milošević, trying to follow an independent foreign and economic policy. He introduced the German mark as the sole currency, and he accelerated privatization. He also maintained good relations with the Serbian opposition. At the same time he tolerated the growth of a local oligarchy and its links with the local and Italian mafia. In 2000, when Milošević changed the Yugoslav constitution without regard to Montenegrin opinion, Djukanović started preparations to declare Montenegrin independence, and he gained support for his policies. The coalition Victory for Montenegro under his leadership defeated the pro-Serbian bloc of Bulatović, Together for Yugoslavia, in the parliamentary elections of April 2001, winning 47 percent of the mandates. In the elections of October 2002 the coalition For a European Montenegro won 52 percent of the mandates. After his term as president was over in November 2002, Djukanović became prime minister of the republic in January 2003. His program for a Yugoslav confederation was finally implemented when the name of the country was changed to Serbia and Montenegro in February 2003. (AW) Sources: Europa Środkowo-Wschodnia, 1991–1998 (Warsaw, 1992–2000); Stojan Cerovic, “Divorce by Mutual Consent,” East European Constitutional Review, 2002, nos. 1–2; Gregory O. Hall, “The Politics of Autocracy: Serbia under Slobodan Milosevic,” East European Quarterly, 1999, no. 2; www.cpa.org.yu/news/elections/republic_mtn_president.htm; www.dps.cg.yu; www.izbori.org.yu/e-dps.html.

DJURANOVIĆ Veselin (17 May 1925, Martinići, near Danilovgrad, Montenegro–30 August 1997), Communist activist from Montenegro, Yugoslav head of state. During World War II Djuranović belonged to the Union of Communist Youth of Yugoslavia and fought in the guerrilla movement of Josip Broz Tito. From April to August 1943 he was imprisoned in an Italian concentration camp near Podgorica. From 1944 he belonged to the Communist Party of Yugoslavia and then to the League of Communists of Yugoslavia (LCY). After the war he advanced in the party structures, and he was active in the Communist youth organization. In 1953–58 he headed Radio Titograd and was editor-in-chief of the periodical Pobjeda. From 1958 to 1962 he headed the ideological commission of the LCY Central Committee (CC). In 1963–66 he was chairman (prime minister) of the Executive Council (government) of the Socialist Republic of Montenegro; from 1966 to 1968 he was secretary of the Executive Committee of the CC of the League of Communists of Montenegro (LCM), and from 1968 to 1977 he was its first secretary. He also belonged to the Presidium of the Montenegrin republic and was its president from May 1982 to May 1983. He was a long-term member of the LCY CC and belonged to its Presidium (March 1969–May 1974). In 1974 and 1984 he was elected to the Presidium of the LCY CC. After the sudden death of Džemal Bijedić, on 15 March 1977 Djuranović assumed the position of chairman of the Federal Executive Council (government) of Yugoslavia, and he held it until 16 May 1982. In May 1984 he became a member of the Presidium (collective head of state) of Yugoslavia, and from May 1984 to May 1985 he was its rotating chairman. (AO)

Sources: Who's Who in the Socialist Countries of Europe (Munich, London, and Paris, 1989); Slobodan Stanković, The End of the Tito Era: Yugoslavia's Dilemmas (Stanford, 1981).

DLOUHÝ Vladimír (31 July 1953, Prague), Czech economist and politician. In 1977 Dlouhý graduated from the Higher Economic School in Prague, and then he became a lecturer there. In 1984–89 he worked as a researcher at the Forecasting Institute of the Czechoslovak Academy of Sciences, working on mathematic and econometric models and studying the command economy and economic growth. In 1989 he was briefly deputy director of this institute. From 1974 he belonged to the Communist Party of Czechoslovakia (CPC), which he left in December 1989. From December 1989 to June 1990 he was deputy prime minister in the government of Marian Čalfa and chairman of the State Planning Commission. Later he temporarily directed the ministries of metallurgy, engineering, power and fuel, and agriculture, and after their liquidation he was minister of the national economy from July 1990 to June 1992. From December 1989 until its dissolution in June 1991 he was the Czechoslovak representative in the Comecon. From June 1990 to June 1992 he was an MP to the Chamber of the People of the Federal Assembly, at first on behalf of the Civic Forum (Občanské Fórum [OF]) and, after its split, on behalf of the Civic Democratic Alliance (Občanská Demokratická Aliance [ODA]). From 1990 he was one of the ODA leaders, and in 1992 and 1993–97 he was its deputy chairman. After the elections of June 1992, when the dissolution of Czechoslovakia became inevitable, Dlouhý assumed the post of minister of trade and industry in the government of the Czech Republic. He was one of the most popular Czech politicians of that time, and he had a significant impact on economic transformation and on privatization in particular. Because of accumulating economic problems, Dlouhý lost in the rankings and had to resign in May 1977. Soon he also gave up his parliamentary mandate but won it again in June 1996. From September 1997 he was an adviser and member of the board of the Prague branch of the ABB concern. In November 1997 he resigned from his position in the ODA, and in February 1998 he left the party. (PU)

Sources: ČBS; Českoslovenští politici: 1918–1991 (Prague, 1991); Kdo byl kdo v našich dějinách ve 20. století, vol. 1 (Prague, 1998).

DŁUGOSZOWSKI-WIENIAWA Bolesław (22 July 1881, Maksymówka, Dolina County [now in the Ukraine]–28 June 1942, New York), Polish general, doctor by profession. In 1906 Długoszowski-Wieniawa graduated in medicine from the University of Lwów (Lviv), and in 1909 he graduated from the Academy of Fine Arts in Paris. In 1910 he joined the Rifle Association. An officer in the First Brigade of the Polish Legions from 1914 to 1917, he served there in the cavalry unit led by Stanisław Belina-Prażmowski (later this unit became the First Uhlan Regiment). He took part in all the battles of this brigade in the Pripet Marshes (Polesie). From September 1915 to October 1916 Długoszowski-Wieniawa was an aide-de-camp of Józef Piłsudski. He was immensely devoted to Piłsudski, on behalf of whom he carried out many secret missions. In 1917 in Warsaw he completed a training course for adjutants and staff officers. During the so-called oath crisis (i.e., when Piłsudski's units refused to swear allegiance to the Germans and Austrians) in July 1917, Długoszowski-Wieniawa sided with Piłsudski. He was arrested, demoted to private, and sent to Kraków. After his escape from hospital, where he feigned illness, he joined the Polish Military Organization (Polska Organizacja Wojskowa [POW]). Working as a doctor in Nowy Sącz, he became a member of the High Command of the POW. In March 1918 he went on behalf of the POW to the Ukraine, from where he was to go to France, where, on the orders of Edward Rydz-Śmigły, the commander-in-chief of the POW, he was to monitor the activities of General Józef Haller. However, in June 1918 he was arrested by the Bolsheviks. After his release from prison, Długoszowski-Wieniawa unsuccessfully tried to get to France via Finland.

In November 1918 Długoszowski-Wieniawa returned to Warsaw and joined the then forming Polish Army (Wojsko Polskie). From 1918 to 1921 he served as an aide-de-camp to Commander-in-Chief Piłsudski. During the Kiev expedition in 1920 he was chief of staff of the First Cavalry Division. From 1920 he was a member of the National Grand Lodge, Łukasiński. In November 1921 he became a military attaché in Bucharest, and in 1922, a liaison officer of the General Staff of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. Between August 1923 and August 1924 he was in the reserves. In 1924 he was promoted to colonel. From October 1925, as head of the Army Inspectorate in Warsaw, Długoszowski-Wieniawa took part in the preparations for the May coup d'état. After the coup, from 1926 to 1928 he was in command of a cavalry regiment in Warsaw. In March 1929 he became acting commander of the Warsaw garrison; in October 1930, commander of the First Cavalry Brigade; and between January 1932 and April 1938, commander of the Second Cavalry Division. In 1932 he was promoted to brigadier general, and in 1938 he rose to the rank of major general.

In 1938 Długoszowski-Wieniawa was appointed Polish ambassador to Italy. On 21 September 1939 President Ignacy Mościcki designated him as his successor. However, owing to the objections of France, he did not assume the post. As the Polish ambassador to Rome, he greatly contributed to the neutral attitude of the Fascist authorities toward Polish refugees who, via Italy, made their way to the Polish Army in France. In 1940, after Italy entered the war against France, Długoszowski-Wieniawa left for New York. In 1942 General Władysław Sikorski appointed him ambassador to Cuba. Długoszowski-Wieniawa committed suicide. He was decorated with (among other things) the Order of Virtuti Militari. He was a very interesting figure, not only as a military man and politician, but also as a poet and a satirist from the circle of Wiadomości Literackie and Skamander. He was a music lover, hero of many anecdotes, and a popular frequenter of Warsaw cafés. His ashes were brought to Kraków and buried in the quarters of the Polish Legions at Rakowice Cemetery. (JS)

Sources: Piotr Stawecki, Słownik biograficzny generałów Wojska Polskiego, 1918–1939 (Warsaw, 1994); Słownik polityków polskich XX wieku (Poznań, 1998); Jacek M. Majchrowski, Ulubieniec Cezara–Bolesław Wieniawa Długoszowski: Zarys biografii (Wrocław, 1990); Marian Romeyko, Wspomnienia o Wieniawie i o rzymskich czasach (Warsaw, 1990); Mariusz Urbanek, Wieniawa—szwoleżer na pegazie (Wrocław, 1991); Witold Dworzyński, Wieniawa: Poeta—żołnierz—dyplomata (Warsaw, 1993); Jacek M. Majchrowski, Pierwszy ułan Drugiej Rzeczypospolitej (Warsaw, 1993); Tadeusz Wittlin, Szabla i koń (London, 1996).

DMOWSKI Roman, pen name “Kazimierz Wybranowski” (9 August 1864, Kamionek, near Warsaw—2 January 1939, Drozdów, near Łomża), Polish politician and ideologist of Polish nationalism. Dmowski was born into an impoverished family with roots in the gentry, but his father was a blue-collar laborer. Dmowski graduated from the Third High School in Warsaw, and in 1886 he started studies in the Department of Physics and Mathematics of Warsaw University. In 1891 he received a candidate's degree, the equivalent of a doctorate. From 1887 he belonged to the Polish Youth Union—Zet, organized in Warsaw by Zygmunt Balicki. Dmowski brought about the removal of Socialist students from the union. In 1890 he effectively opposed an anti-tsarist demonstration prepared jointly by Polish and Russian students. From 1889 he belonged to the Polish League (Liga Polska), and on 3 May 1891 he organized a demonstration in Warsaw to commemorate the centenary of the 3 May Constitution. In 1891 he went to Paris, where he met leaders of the Polish League in exile. Arrested upon his return in August 1892, Dmowski was put in the Warsaw Citadel Prison and released in early 1893. In April 1893 he was instrumental in the dissolution of the Polish League and in the creation of the National League (Liga Narodowa). He became head of its Central Committee.

Dmowski published his first articles in Głos in 1890. He also authored the National League program, Nasz patriotyzm (Our patriotism), in which he outlined the foundations of Polish nationalism. Banned from Russian Poland by the tsarist authorities in 1893, Dmowski settled in Mita (Jelgava) in Latvia, and in 1895 he left for Lemberg (Lwów, Lviv), where he started publishing Przegląd Wszechpolski. Subsequent versions of the program of the National Democratic Party, which he co-authored, were published there. In 1902 he published Myśli nowoczesnego Polaka (Thoughts of a modern Pole), the basic work of contemporary Polish nationalism, in which he explained the premises of Polish nationalism. Dmowski traveled extensively in Great Britain, France, and Brazil. In March 1904 he went across the United States and Canada to Japan. He was not only fascinated by the Japanese society, but also managed to discourage the Japanese from supporting the anti-Russian revolutionary activities in Russian Poland that were advocated by Józef Piłsudski, whom he by chance met in Tokyo.

In March 1905 Dmowski returned to Warsaw. When the Russian authorities introduced martial law in the former Kingdom of Poland in November 1905, he went to Petersburg and talked to the Russian prime minister, Sergei Witte, encouraging him to cede power in the Kingdom of Poland to the Poles in order to calm the revolutionary atmosphere. During the 1905–6 revolution Dmowski advocated autonomy for the kingdom. He organized squads to resist the Fighting Organization of the Polish Socialist Party. Elected to the Second State Duma in February 1907, he became head of the Polish Club. In the Duma he opposed land reform projects. Despite anti-Polish steps by the Pyotr Stolypin government, Dmowski thought that Poland could regain independence only by allying itself with Russia against Germany. In 1908 he explained his views on the European situation after the annexation of Bosnia and Herzegovina by Austria-Hungary in his work Niemcy, Rosja i kwestia polska (Germany, Russia, and the Polish question). He opposed an armed struggle, considered Russia less dangerous to the Poles, and advocated unification of all Polish territories under Russian protection. In July 1908 he took part in the Neo-Slavic Congress in Prague, where he voted for a resolution on the reconciliation and equality of all Slavonic nations. His strategy became the cause of several splits in the National League. The groups Rzeczpospolita, Frona, Secesja, and Zet left the league. Members of the league's Central Committee, including Dmowski, gave up their mandates. At the same time Dmowski opposed a school strike as harmful to Polish-Russian relations. In 1912 he lost an election to the Russian Duma in Warsaw and put the blame for it on the Jewish community. In consequence the league organized a boycott of Jewish shops.

After the outbreak of World War I, Dmowski went to Petersburg and in 1915 to Great Britain. He also traveled to France and Switzerland, lobbying for the recognition of Polish independence by the Entente and by Russia. Until the fall of the tsar he was ineffective, but in August 1917 he managed to co-found the National Committee of Poland (Komitet Narodowy Polski [KNP]) in Paris and became its chairman. In February 1918 he submitted to the French government a map of Polish territorial postulates and was active in the creation of the Polish Army in France under the command of General Józef Haller. Dmowski favored the fragmentation of Austria-Hungary as a region of potential German expansion. In the late summer and fall of 1918 he went to the United States again, where he met President Woodrow Wilson (on 8 October he tried to persuade Wilson to accept Lithuanian autonomy within Poland); with the Jewish community (he rejected a suggestion to accept Jewish representatives into the KNP); and with Polish Americans. He returned to Paris on 19 November 1918, when the Socialist government of Jędrzej Moraczewski was already installed by Piłsudski in Warsaw. Although Dmowski recognized Piłsudski as provisional head of state, he opposed recognition of the Moraczewski cabinet. After the takeover by the Ignacy Paderewski government in January 1919, Dmowski became Polish delegate to the Paris Peace Conference. On 29 January 1919 he made a five-hour speech on the future borders of Poland. Despite the negative impression he made by his anti-Semitism, Dmowski was instrumental in the Entente's understanding of the Polish point of view at the conference.

From 1919 Dmowski was an MP to the Constituent Assembly (Sejm). After signing the Treaty of Versailles of 28 June 1919 and the Treaty of Saint-Germain of 10 September 1919, he returned to Warsaw. He was a fierce critic of the eastern policy of Piłsudski, and he opposed the Polish-Ukrainian offensive of April 1920, but he agreed to sit on the Council of State Defense. He also opposed the federalist program of Piłsudski and favored a unitary character for the Polish state and the assimilation of Slavonic minorities. From 1923 he was less and less active and spent much time in his Chłudów estate, avoiding official positions. He was briefly foreign minister in the government of Wincenty Witos (28 October–15 December 1923). He criticized the excessive powers of the Polish parliament (sejmokracja) and was increasingly inspired by Italian fascism. He opposed the May 1926 coup of Piłsudski. In response he founded the Camp of Great Poland (Obóz Wielkiej Polski [OWP]) and became its leader. The organization's structure was similar to that of the Italian Fascist Party, and its program was aimed at the formation of younger generations of Polish nationalists. Current policy was entrusted to the Popular National Union (Związek Ludowo-Narodowy [ZLN]). At this time Dmowski authored Polityka polska i odbudowanie państwa (Polish politics and the reconstruction of statehood; 1925); Zagadnienie rządu (The question of government; 1927); and Kościół, naród i państwo (The church, nation, and state; 1927). In these works he abandoned the program of nationalism in favor of a Catholic state in a Polish nation. In March 1928 he established the National Party (Stronnictwo Narodowe [SN]), but his success lay rather in the expanding OWP Youth Council, which became the strongest political opposition force in the early 1930s. In March 1933 the sanacja government outlawed the OWP, which stimulated its members to join the official SN Youth Section, as well as to create the separate National Radical Camp (Obóz Narodowo-Radykalny [ONR]). In the early 1930s Dmowski published Świat powojenny i Polska (The postwar world and Poland; 1931) and Przewrót (Upheaval; 1934). He also published, under his pen name, novels in which he blamed Polish problems on the activities of Freemasons and Jews. Because of ailing health, Dmowski was less and less active in the late 1930s. A year before his death he returned to the Catholic Church. (PK)

Sources: PSB, vol. 5; Słownik Polityków Polskich XX w. (Poznań, 1998); Władysław Pobóg-Malinowski, Narodowa Demokracja 1887–1918 (Warsaw, 1933); Marian Kiniorski, Z czterdziestu pięciu lat wspomnień o Romanie Dmowskim (Warsaw, 1939); Roman Dmowski (Poznań, 1939); Andrzej Micewski, Roman Dmowski (Warsaw, 1971); Roman Wapiński, Roman Dmowski (Lublin, 1988); Krzysztof Kawalec, Roman Dmowski (Warsaw, 1999).

DOBI István (31 December 1898, Szőny–24 November 1968, Budapest), Hungarian politician. Dobi came from a poor peasant family. He completed a six-grade primary school and a higher peasant school in 1949. He fought in World War I. In 1919 he served in the Hungarian Red Army and was taken captive by the Romanians at Szolnok. After his return home he again worked as an agrarian laborer. At the beginning of the 1920s Dobi joined the National Association of Agrarian Workers and the Social Democratic Party of Hungary. In 1930 he became president of the party in Szőny, but in 1936 he switched to the Independent Smallholders' Party (ISP). With the support of the party, Dobi was given a post in the Chamber of Agriculture in Kisalföld. He became the organizational secretary of the party and joined its national presidium. From 1937 he was the president of the ISP department for agrarian workers' affairs. Elected the national secretary of the Peasant Association in 1941, between 1943 and 1947 Dobi was president of the Section of Agrarian Workers and executive president of the ISP. After the seizure of the country by the Germans he joined the Hungarian Front.

In June 1945, in his absence, Dobi was elected to the Provisional National Assembly. From 20 August 1945 he was the vice-president of the ISP, a member of the Politburo and of the national executive committee of the party, and a member of the parliament from 4 November 1945. On 15 November 1945 he became minister without portfolio in the government of Zoltán Tildy. From February 1946 to November 1946 he was minister of agriculture, and from November the same year, minister without portfolio. He was again minister of agriculture in the government of Ferenc Nagy. A member of the committee investigating trumped-up Communist charges against MPs of his party, in May 1947 Dobi was elected president of the increasingly divided ISP. He also headed the Hungarian Peasant Association and was the editor-in-chief of its organ, Kis Újság. Dobi collaborated with the Communist Party in all his activities. Between 10 December 1948 and 14 August 1952 he was prime minister; in 1949–60, vice-president of the Patriotic People's Front; from 1951, president of the Council of Collective Farms; and in 1952–67, president of the Presidential Council.

During the 1956 revolution Dobi did not leave the parliament building. He appointed and swore in the government of Imre Nagy. After 4 November 1956 Dobi alone exercised and performed the functions of the Presidential Council. On 7 November 1956 he unlawfully dissolved the Nagy government and appointed members of the Hungarian "Revolutionary Peasant-Worker Government" of János Kádár. In 1959 Dobi formally joined the Hungarian Socialist Workers' Party and was soon elected a member of its Central Committee. In 1961 he was awarded the Lenin Peace Prize, and in 1967, when he was retiring, he was given the title of Hero of Socialist Labor. In 1968 he was appointed president of the National Cooperative Council. In 1962 his memoirs, Vallomás és történelem (Confessions and history), were published. (JT)

Sources: Bennet Kovrig, Communism in Hungary from Kun to Kádár (Stanford, 1979); Miklós Molnár, From Béla Kun to János Kádár: Seventy Years of Hungarian Communism (New York, 1990); Magyar Nagylexikon, vol. 6 (Budapest, 1998); A magyar forradalom és szabadságharc enciklopédiája, CD-ROM (Budapest, 1999).

DOBOSZYŃSKI Adam (11 January 1904, Kraków–29 August 1949, Warsaw), Polish nationalist politician. In 1920 Doboszyński fought in the Polish-Soviet war as a volunteer. After the end of the war he graduated from high school and took up studies at the Gdańsk Polytechnic College, from which he graduated in 1925. In the 1920s he was active in the National Popular Union (Związek Ludowo-Narodowy [ZLN]), and in 1934–40, in the National Party (Stronnictwo Narodowe [SN]) as a member of its radical and anti-Semitic wing of the "young." From 1931 to 1933 he belonged to the Camp of Great Poland (Obóz Wielkiej Polski [OWP]). In his book Gospodarka narodowa (National economy; 1936), he presented a plan for a corporatist system for Poland designed after the model of Italian fascism. On 23 June 1936, along with around a hundred of his supporters, Doboszyński made a “march on Myślenice.” He decided to publicly flog the local mayor (starosta), who persistently persecuted the group National Democracy (Narodowa Demokracja, or Endecja [ND]); however, he could not get to him. After Doboszyński and his supporters entered the town, the local police station was disarmed, and the Jewish shops were robbed. In November 1938 he was arrested and sentenced to three and a half years in prison. Released ahead of time, in February 1939 he became a member of the Chief Committee of the SN. He fought in the September campaign of 1939 and was taken POW by the Germans but escaped and managed to get to France, where he fought in the Polish Army (May–June 1940). After the collapse of France, having avoided internment, Doboszyński left for Britain, where he was a critic of the conciliatory policy toward the USSR followed by General Władysław Sikorski. In December 1946 he secretly returned to Poland to conduct conspiratorial activities in nationalist groups. Arrested in 1947, he was sentenced to death in July 1949. Despite being severely tortured during investigation, he did not admit to collaboration with the Germans, of which he was falsely accused. Nevertheless, he was executed. In 1989 he was rehabilitated. (WR) Sources: Słownik polityków polskich XX wieku (Poznań, 1998); Proces Adama Doboszyńskiego (Warsaw, 1949); Roman Wapiński, Narodowa Demokracja 1893–1939 (Wrocław, 1980); Szymon Rudnicki, Obóz Narodowo-Radykalny: Geneza i działalność (Warsaw, 1985); B. Nitschke, Adam Doboszyński: Publicysta i polityk (Kraków, 1993).

DOBRACZYŃSKI Jan (20 April 1910, Warsaw–5 March 1994, Warsaw), Polish writer and political activist. Born into a clerk’s family, Dobraczyński graduated in economics from the Warsaw College of Commerce (Wyższa Szkoła Handlowa) and in law from Warsaw University. He made his literary debut in the Catholic press in 1933 and then published articles in Prostu z Mostu. During the Nazi occupation he wrote for the underground press—for example, for the monthly Sprawy Narodu. A member of the National Military Organization (Narodowa Organizacja Wojskowa) and of the Home Army (Armia Krajowa), he fought in the Warsaw Uprising, and then he spent the rest of the war in a POW camp in Germany. After his return to Poland, Dobraczyński joined the Dziś i Jutro group of Bolesław Piasecki, and then he became active in the PAX Association. In 1946 he published a novel, W rozwalonym domu (In the demolished house), about the fate of the Warsaw Uprising generation. From May 1952 to November 1956 he was deputy to the Assembly of the Polish People’s Republic. In March 1953, after Tygodnik Powszechny was closed down, he took over the editorship of the weekly, subordinating himself to the Stalinist authorities. From June 1971 to July 1983 he belonged to the Presidium of the All-Polish Committee of the National Unity Front (Front Jedności Narodu). He actively supported the introduction of martial law in Poland. From September 1982 he was in charge of the establishment of the facade organization Patriotic Movement for National Revival (Patriotyczny Ruch Odrodzenia Narodowego [PRON]); from December of that year he served as president of the Provisional National Council of the PRON; and between May 1983 and November 1989 he was president of the PRON National Council. In October 1988 he was appointed retired general. Issues of war and occupation, literary visions of biblical events, and the history of Christianity and Poland dominated his literary output. Dobraczyński won special recognition for his work Listy Nikodema (Letters of Nicodemus; 1958), as well as for his novels and collections of sketches. He also published his memoirs, Gra w wybijanego (Game of elimination; 1962), and Tylko w jednym życiu (In one life only; 1972). (WR)

Sources: Literatura polska: Przewodnik encyklopedyczny, vol. 1 (Warsaw, 1984); Moldawa; Słownik polityków polskich XX wieku (Poznań, 1998); Andrzej Micewski, Współrzędzić czy nie kłamać (Paris, 1978); Antoni Dudek and Grzegorz Pytel, Bolesław Piasecki (London, 1990).

DOBROGEANU-GHEREA Alexandru (30 November 1879, Iași–4 December 1937, Moscow), Romanian Communist activist. Dobrogeanu-Gherea was the eldest son of Constantin Dobrogeanu-Gherea, a veteran Romanian Social Democrat. In 1910 he became active in the Socialist group in Ploiești. He completed philosophical and engineering studies in Germany. In 1919 he was elected to the parliament on behalf of the Romanian Social Democratic Party. Later, he went to Moscow, where he established contacts with the Communist International. This confirmed his critical attitude toward the moderate wing of Social Democracy, which he attacked for abandoning revolutionary ideals. He pinned special hopes on the revolution in Germany. Therefore he allied himself with the “maximalist” wing of the Social Democrats, and at the founding congress of the Socialist Communist Party of Romania in May 1921 he became a member of the top leadership of the party. He was temporarily arrested by the Romanian authorities but was released in June 1922. In September 1923 he again went to Moscow. There he allied himself with the faction of Leon Trotsky; he was criticized for that at the Third Congress of the Communist Party of Romania (CPR) in Vienna in September 1924. In Romania he was sentenced in absentia to ten years’ imprisonment in the spring of 1925. Although in 1926 he spoke at the Plenum of the Executive Committee of the Comintern, in June 1928 he was allowed to attend the Sixth Congress of the CPR in only a consultative capacity. At the end of 1928 Dobrogeanu-Gherea returned to Romania and was arrested there. However, as a result of workers' protests he was released. At the beginning of 1932 he finally went to the USSR and worked there in the International Organization for Aid to Revolutionaries. Arrested along with a group of other Romanian Communists in 1937, he was murdered in Lubyanka Prison. (WR) Sources: Ghita Ionescu, Communism in Romania, 1944–1962 (Oxford, 1964); Lazitch; Marius Mircu, Dosar Ana Pauker (Bucharest, 1991); Șerban N. Ionescu, Who Was Who in Twentieth Century Romania (Boulder, Colo., 1994); Dennis Deletant, Communist Terror in Romania: Gheorghiu-Dej and the Police State, 1948–1965 (New York, 1999).

DOBROGEANU-GHEREA Constantin [originally Mihai Solomon Katz] (21 May 1855, Slovianka, Kharkiv region–7 May 1920, Bucharest), Romanian literary critic and Socialist theoretician of Jewish descent. In 1872 Dobrogeanu-Gherea graduated from high school in Yekaterinoslav (Dnepropetrovsk), and then he studied natural sciences at Kharkiv University, where he joined the Narodnik organization. In 1875 he escaped from the Russian police to Iași, Romania. After a year he moved to Bucharest, where he became a co-founder of the first Romanian Socialist circles, maintaining contacts with Russian political émigrés in Western Europe. He worked as a blue-collar laborer and artisan and married the translator of Anton Chekhov into Romanian, Sofia Gherea. During the Romanian war of independence (1877–78) Dobrogeanu-Gherea was captured by the Russian police and imprisoned in the Petropavlovsk fortress and then in Mezen on the White Sea. He managed to escape, and via Norway, England, France, and Austria he returned to Bucharest in 1879. He edited the first Romanian Socialist dailies, Besarabia and Înainte (1879), and the monthly România viitoare (1880). In 1881 he was co-founder of the periodical Contemporanul, edited by a Socialist circle in Iași. In this periodical he argued with the then popular catchphrase, “art for art’s sake,” and claimed that artists had a social role to play. In 1882 he settled in Ploiești, where he ran a restaurant so that he would be able to sponsor Socialist organizations. In 1883 he started writing political columns under the pen names “Caius Grachus,” “Spartacus,” and “I. Vasiliu.”

In April 1893 Dobrogeanu-Gherea co-founded the Social Democratic Workers’ Party of Romania (Partidul Social Democrat al Muncitorilor din România), and he represented it at the congresses of the Second International in 1893 and 1912. He published several books on socialism in which he initially advocated Russian Narodnik ideas, such as Karl Marx și economiștii noștri (Karl Marx and our economists; 1884); Ce vor socialiștii români (What do Romanian Socialists want; 1886); and Neoioabăgia. Studiu economico-social al problemelor noastre agrare (New serfdom. A study of the economic and social problems of our agriculture; 1910). He thought advanced industrialization in Romania was impossible and advocated the development of agriculture and an improvement in the peasant standard of living—for example, by the takeover of large estates by the state and cheap land leases for peasants. At the end of his life Dobrogeanu-Gherea abandoned radical revolutionary ideas and criticized the Bolshevik revolution in Russia in 1917, parting ways with his son, Alexandru Dobrogeanu-Gherea. He was also involved in literary criticism. In 1893–94 he published the periodical Literatura și știința and contributed to many other periodicals. He also published several books, such as Studii critice (Critical studies, 3 vols.; 1889–97); Asupra criticeii (On criticism; 1890); Arta pentru artă și arta cu tendinți (Art for art’s sake and purposeful art; 1894); and biographies of artists such as Mihai Eminescu. (LW)

Sources: Biographisches Lexikon, vol. 1; Dictionar Enciclopedic, vol. 2 (Bucharest, 1996); Damian Hurezeanu, Constantin Dobrogeanu-Gherea (Bucharest, 1974); Șerban N. Ionescu, Who Was Who in Twentieth Century Romania (Boulder, Colo., 1994); Keith Hitchins, Rumania 1866–1947 (Oxford, 1994); Dorina N. Rusu, Membrii Academiei Române 1866–1999 (Bucharest, 1999); Ion Alexandrescu, Ion Bulei, Ion Mamina, and Ioan Scurtu, Enciclopedia de istorie României (Bucharest, 2000).

DOBROVSKÝ Luboš (3 February 1932, Kolín), Czech journalist and politician. After high school Dobrovský worked as a teacher. In 1960 he graduated in Czech and Russian studies from the Department of Philosophy of Charles University in Prague. From 1959 to 1968 he was editor and commentator for the foreign policy section of Czechoslovak Radio, and in 1967–68 he was its Moscow correspondent. He was also involved in literary criticism and translations from Russian and Polish. In 1969 he worked at the periodical Listy, and in 1969–70, at Plamene. During the Prague Spring he was engaged in the democratization movement, and in 1968–69 he argued against the Soviet occupation. He was fired; in 1970 his publications were banned; and all through the period of “normalization” he worked as a store-keeper, window cleaner, and stoker. He translated a lot and edited the uncensored periodical Kritický sborník; in 1988–89 he worked with the uncensored Lidové noviny. In 1977 Dobrovský was one of the founding signatories of Charter 77, and after the Velvet Revolution of 1989 he was briefly a spokesman for the Civic Forum (Občanské Fórum [OF]). From January to June 1990 he was spokesman for the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, and from June to October 1990, deputy minister of foreign affairs. From October 1990 to June 1992 he was the minister of defense of Czechoslovakia. After a split in the OF in the spring of 1991 Dobrovský became a member of the Civic Movement (Občanské Hnutí). After he lost in the 1992 elections, until 1996 he was head of the chancellery of President Václav Havel; from 1996 to 2000 he was ambassador to Russia and then again an adviser to Havel. (PU)

Sources: ČBS; Českoslovenští politici: 1918–1991 (Prague, 1991).

DOBRZAŃSKI Henryk, pseudonym “Hubal” (22 June 1897, Jasło–30 April 1940, Anielin, Kielce region), Polish officer, legend of the anti-German guerrilla movement. Born into a landowner’s family, in 1914 Dobrzański graduated from a high school in Kraków. From 1912 he served in the Riflemen Teams, a Polish paramilitary organization in Galicia. During World War I he served in the ulhans (cavalry) of the Polish Legions and took part in several battles against the Russian Army. He was awarded the Virtuti Militari Order, as well as the Cross of the Brave four times. In 1918–39 Dobrzański was a cavalry officer and achieved the rank of major. Among the best Polish equestrians, he received many awards in international competition. During the German invasion, from 10 September 1939 he was deputy commander of the 110th Reserve Ulhan Regiment, reconstructed in Wołkowysk (Vaukavysk). A week after his appointment his regiment broke through to the Augustów Forest in fighting against the Red Army and Communist diversion bands. After the dissolution of his detachment, Dobrzański took command of the remaining volunteers and led them on to Warsaw and then to the St. Cross Mountains in the Kielce region. Meanwhile, the group swelled to three hundred men (infantry and cavalry) and became a guerrilla unit called the Fighting Kielce Region. In December 1939 Dobrzański subordinated it to the commander of the Service of Polish Victory, General Michał Tokarzewski-Karaszewicz. After two battles against the Germans, on 1 April 1940 the unit was dispersed, and Dobrzański was killed in a subsequent battle. He was posthumously awarded the wartime Virtuti Militari Order. In revenge for Dobrzański’s operations the Germans burned down several villages in which he had been stationed and murdered their male population. According to popular belief, Dobrzański was the first Polish guerrilla commander of World War II, but actually the first such group was organized in the Pszczyna Forest on 6 September 1939. (TSt)

Sources: Wielka encyklopedia PWN, vol. 7 (Warsaw, 2002); Marek Szymański, Oddział majora “Hubala” (Warsaw, 1977); Tomasz Strzembosz, Saga o “Łupaszce,” podpułkownika Jerzym Dąmbrowskim (1889–1941) (Warsaw, 1996).

DOGAN Ahmed (29 March 1954, Pchelarovo, Dobrich region), Bulgarian politician and philosopher of Turkish descent. In 1981 Dogan graduated in philosophy from the University of Sofia, and then he received a Ph.D. in philosophy at the Bulgarian Academy of Sciences. In 1985 he joined protests against the so-called renaissance operation, consisting in the forced Communist assimilation of Bulgarians of Turkish descent—for instance, by the imposition of Bulgarian names. In 1986 Dogan was arrested and sentenced to ten years for founding an “anti-state” organization. He was detained in a Sofia prison. He was released thanks to an amnesty in November 1989, and on 4 January 1990 he founded the legal Movement for Rights and Freedoms (Dvizheniye za Prava i Svobody [MRF]), which was the continuation of a similar organization that had acted without formal authorization since 1985. From January 1990 he was chairman of the MRF Central Council and of its Central Executive Bureau. He was also editor-in-chief of its press organ, Prava i Svobody. In 1990–91 Dogan was an MP to the Great National Assembly and head of the MRF parliamentary faction. In May 1991 he left the assembly, protesting the draft constitution designed by the post-Communists. From the elections of October 1991 he sat in subsequent parliaments. In October 1992 he and the MRF parliamentary club contributed to the fall of the Filip Dimitrov government, expressing a vote of no-confidence because of the unfavorable effects of state farmland redistribution for the Bulgarian Turks. Dogan’s support for the government of Luben Berov, which emerged afterwards as the result of a post-Communist faction, and accusations directed against Dogan for cooperation with the former Communist security police weakened his position and the MRF ratings. In the elections of April 1997 the MRF ran in a coalition called the Alliance for National Salvation, along with monarchists and the Bulgarian Agrarian National Union–Nikola Petkov; in the elections of June 2001 it ran with other ethnic minority parties and with the liberals, each time winning about 7.5 percent of the vote. (JJ)

Sources: Europa Środkowo-Wschodnia 1991–1992 (Warsaw, 1992–94); Raymond Detrez, Historical Dictionary of Bulgaria (Lanham, Md., 1997); Koy koy e v Bulgariya (Sofia, 1998); Bugajski.

DOLANSKÝ Jaromír (25 February 1895, Prague–16 July 1973, Prague), Czech Communist activist. In 1921 Dolanský graduated in law from Charles University in Prague. In 1922 he joined the Communist Party of Czechoslovakia (CPC), and in 1924–28 he was editor-in-chief of the periodical Komunistická revue. In 1928–29 he was CPC regional secretary in Brno, and from 1929 he belonged to the CPC Central Committee. From 1930 to 1935 he was a leading activist of the Red Trade Unions, and in 1935 he became an MP and secretary of the Communist parliamentary club. When at the beginning of 1939 the CPC went underground, Dolanský, along with Antonín Zapotocký, was in the illegal leadership of the party. He was arrested while trying to cross the Polish border in April 1939 and sent to the Sachsenhausen concentration camp, where he stayed until the end of the war. From 1945 to 1968 he belonged to the Presidium of the CPC Central Committee, and from 1945 to 1969 he was an MP. From July 1946 to April 1949 he was minister of finance and later minister-chairman of the State Planning Office. From December 1951 to September 1963 he was deputy prime minister. He belonged to a relatively moderate wing of the Stalinist leadership and mainly dealt with the economy. At the end of the 1950s Dolanský was the author of a plan to reform the inefficient economic system. With the fall of Antonín Novotný, Dolanský disappeared from political life. (PU)

Sources: ČBS; Kdo byl kdo v našich dějinách ve 20. století, vol. 1 (Prague, 1998); Edward Taborsky, Communism in Czechoslovakia 1948–1960 (Princeton, 1961).

DOMOKOS Géza (18 May 1928, Braşov), Hungarian politician, writer, and journalist from Transylvania. In 1948 Domokos started studies at the Maksim Gorki Institute in Bucharest, and in 1949–54 he studied at the Institute of World Literature in Moscow. Later he worked as a journalist. In 1957–61 he worked for the daily Ifumunkas, and in 1969–90 he was director of the Kriterion Press, which published books in the languages of national minorities. Domokos started his political career in the Office of the Central Committee of the Working Youth Union, whose member he was from 1956 to 1965. In 1965 he joined the Romanian Communist Party (RCP). From 1969 to November 1984 he was a deputy member of the RCP CC; from 1972 he was secretary of the Association of Romanian Writers; in 1971–78 he was a member of the National Council of Radio and Television; and from 1971 he belonged to the Council of the Working People of Hungarian Nationality. On 22 December 1989 he was invited, as a representative of the Hungarian minority, along with Reverend Lászlo Tökés, to join the National Salvation Front, and soon he entered its government. On

25 December Domokos was among the founders of the Democratic Alliance of Hungarians in Romania (DAHR), and he became its provisional chairman. During the First DAHR Congress in April 1990 it was decided that a united Hungarian organization would represent this minority on the Romanian political scene. Domokos was a rival for leadership with the poet and dissident Géza Szöcs. Ultimately Domokos won, and Szöcs became general secretary of the organization. In 1991 it had more than five hundred thousand members. Domokos represented a moderate line, arguing that a more radical program would antagonize even the liberal elements of Romanian public opinion against the Hungarians. Nevertheless, in response to the nationalist slogans of Romanian extremists, in October 1992 in Cluj (Kolozsvár) the DAHR adopted a declaration stating that Hungarians were a nation “co-constituting” the Romanian state and not a national minority; this led to even sharper Romanian reactions. During the Third DAHR Congress in January 1993, Domokos and Szöcs were dismissed, and the organization took a more conciliatory line, especially toward democratic Romanian parties. (PC)

Sources: Dictionar Enciclopedic, vol. 2 (Bucharest, 1996); Who's Who in the Socialist Countries of Europe (Munich, London, and Paris, 1989); Bugajski.

DONÁTH Ferenc (5 September 1913, Jászárokszállás–15 July 1986, Budapest), Hungarian Communist activist. Donáth's father was a barrister. From 1930 Donáth studied at the Department of Law at Péter Pázmány University in Budapest. In 1932 he joined an illegal Communist youth organization, and in 1934 he was admitted to the Hungarian Communist Party (HCP). In 1937 he co-organized the leftist March Front and established contacts with the Foreign Committee of the HCP. In 1939 he took part in a meeting in Makó where the decision was made to create the National Peasant Party. In the spring of 1940 Donáth was arrested. After his release in the fall of 1940, he was sent to the labor service, from which he was exempted in the spring of 1942 because he was suffering from lung hemorrhages. Donáth played a major role in the reorganization of the illegal HCP, carried out at the beginning of the 1940s, and he joined the leadership of the party. From February 1945 he worked in a committee preparing an agrarian reform under Imre Nagy, and then he supervised the implementation of the reform. From 1945 to 1948 he was political secretary of state in the Ministry of Agriculture. From June 1948 he was head of the Secretariat of the CC of the Hungarian Workers' Party (HWP). On 15 February 1951 he was arrested and sentenced to fifteen years of prison under trumped-up charges. He was released in July 1954. In the late spring of 1956, as vice-director of the Institute of Economics of the Hungarian Academy of Sciences, Donáth returned to public life.

On the night of 23 October 1956, in his absence, Donáth was elected secretary of the CC of the HCP, but the next day he resigned, as he did not agree with the assessment of the Hungarian uprising as a counterrevolution. Along with Géza Losonczy, he influenced Nagy's decision to return to political life. After 28 October Donáth joined negotiations in support of the consolidation process. On 1 November he became a member of the Executive Committee of the Hungarian Socialist Workers' Party, which was formed to replace the Hungarian Workers' Party. Along with Nagy, on 4 November Donáth formulated a manifesto condemning the Soviet military intervention, and after that he was granted asylum at the embassy of Yugoslavia. At the end of November, Donáth and others were interned in the town of Snagov in Romania. Donáth was delivered to the Hungarians, and in June 1958 he was sentenced to twelve years of prison as a secondary accused in the trial of Nagy. In April 1960 he was released under an individual pardon. In the 1960s Donáth withdrew from public life and concentrated on agrarian history and agricultural policy.

At the end of the 1970s Donáth became one of the leading figures of the political opposition that was forming at that time. He was one of the first to sign a manifesto, in 1979, expressing solidarity with the imprisoned members of the Czechoslovak Charter 77 group. He was the president of the editorial committee of Bibó István—emlékkönyv (The visitors' book of István Bibó), which was published in Switzerland. He supported efforts aiming at the creation of independent publications. He played a major role in building a dialogue among different groups of the opposition and also in the organization of meetings of these groups in Monor in 1985. (JT)

Sources: Bennet Kovrig, Communism in Hungary from Kun to Kádár (Stanford, 1979); Miklós Molnár, From Béla Kun to János Kádár: Seventy Years of Hungarian Communism (New York, 1990); Magyar Nagylexikon, vol. 6 (Budapest, 1998); A magyar forradalom és szabadságharc enciklopédiája, CD-ROM (Budapest, 1999); Nagy Képes Milleniumi Arcképcsarnok (Budapest, 1999).

DONTSOV Dmytro (29 August 1883, Melitopol, Tauris Province—30 March 1973, Montreal), Ukrainian journalist and politician, theoretician of Ukrainian nationalism. Dontsov came from a family of agrarian entrepreneurs but was orphaned at an early age. In 1900 he graduated from high school in Tsarskoe Selo, near Petersburg. During his law studies in Petersburg between 1900 and 1907 he was active in the Ukrainian revolutionary movement. In 1900 he was one of the founders of the Revolutionary Ukrainian Party (RUP) and in 1905 of the Ukrainian Social Democratic Workers' Party (USDWP). He remained a member of the Socialist Party at least until 1914, but his views evolved toward state ideology and later to integral nationalism, with a clearly declared sympathy for fascism and romantic conservatism. Dontsov began his journalistic career in 1906 with the Moscow Ukrainskaia Zhizn. He first began to publish books after his escape from Russia to Lvov in 1908. He presented his consistent anti-Russian and pro-independence standpoint for the first time in two books of 1913, Moderne moskvofilstvo (Modern Moscowphilism) and Suchasne politychne polozheniie natsii i nashi zavdania (Present political position of the nation and our tasks).

In 1914 Dontsov co-founded the pro-Austrian Union for the Liberation of Ukraine (ULU) in Lvov; he later moved to Berlin, where from 1914 to 1916 he organized the official news agency of the Ukrainian Parliamentary Club of the State Council in Vienna and published its bulletin, Korrespondenz. During that period he wrote works addressed to German government circles in which he attempted to explain that the reconstruction of an independent Ukrainian state was fundamental to the European balance of power, especially in view of the necessity of confining the spread of Russian influence in the central part of the continent after the war. From 1916 to 1917 Dontsov resided in Bern, where he headed the Office of the Peoples of Russia, an emigration center for refugees from the tsarist state. As the revolution in Russia broke out, he decided to return, first to Lvov, where he earned a Ph.D. in law, and then to Kiev. Among successive governments of the Ukrainian revolution he actively supported only the government of Hetman Pavlo Skoropadsky. As director, Dontsov co-founded its press bureau. He also established the Ukrainian Telegraphic Agency. In 1918 in Kiev he published (among other works) Mizhnarodne polozhennia Ukrainy i Rossiia (The international position of the Ukraine and Russia) and Ukrainska derzhavna dumka i Ievropa (Ukrainian state thought and Europe), in which he argued that the Ukraine was the eastern bastion of European culture. During the rule of the Directory Dontsov again lived in Bern (1919–21), where he directed the press and information section of the Ukrainian diplomatic mission. In 1921 in Vienna he published Pidstavy nashoi polityky (Foundations of our policy), in which, after the defeat of the Central Powers, he based the concept of Ukrainian statehood upon the Entente and Central European states that stood in the way of communism—Poland and Hungary.

Dontsov spent 1921–39 under the Polish government in Lvov, above all concentrating on programmatic and publishing activities. It was there in the mid-1920s that he formulated his final standpoint, which made him a proponent of Ukrainian nationalism. From 1923–24 he edited the biweekly Zahrova, where he displayed his anti-democratic and anti-egalitarian beliefs, as well as his sympathy for Italian fascism. Between 1922 and 1932 he was the editor-in-chief of Literaturno-Naukovy Vistnyk and from 1933, of Vistnyk, his own ideologically consistent periodical. He then rallied a group of writers of nationalist orientation and had a great influence upon the Galician younger generation. However, he was not a member of the Organization of Ukrainian Nationalists, which did not officially accept his ideology. In 1926 in Lvov his work Natsionalizm (Nationalism), a lecture on the doctrine of so-called active nationalism, was published. In it, Dontsov utterly criticized the national ideology hitherto accepted by the Ukrainian intelligentsia and depicted reality as a biologically understood space of conflicts among species-nations.

In the 1930s Dontsov developed an affinity to the Axis powers in Europe; he proposed to base Ukrainian policy on that of Hitler's Germany, and he outlined the prospects for a forthcoming downfall of the USSR. Arrested by the Polish authorities on 2 September 1939 and imprisoned in Bereza Kartuska, he soon escaped and fled to Bucharest, where, from 1940 to 1941 he edited the magazine Batava. After the outbreak of the German-Soviet war Dontsov moved to Prague, where he wrote articles about the Ukraine for the popular German press. He became increasingly absorbed in a mystical cult of the nation as set forth in the historic ideal of social harmony (Dukh nashoi davnyiny—The spirit of our past; 1944). In 1945 he emigrated first to Paris, then to London, and finally to the United States. From 1947 Dontsov resided permanently in Montreal. Between 1949 and 1952 he lectured in Ukrainian literature at a local university, but above all he continued writing. Despite certain editorial changes in his works, especially concerning his attitude toward the Axis powers, he maintained the views he had formed between the wars. The assessment of his ideology, as well as his influence upon the political events of the 1930s and 1940s, remains a subject of heated dispute in Poland and the Ukraine. (TS)

Sources: Encyclopedia of Ukraine, vol. 1 (Toronto, 1984); Myroslav Sosnowskyi, Dmytro Dontsov: Politycznyi portret (New York and Toronto, 1974); Hryhoriy Vaskovych, Dvi kontseptsji ukraïnskoyi politychnoyi dumky: Vyacheslavw Lypynskiy—Dmytro Dontsov (New York, 1990); Rostyslav Yendyk, Dontsov: Ideoloh ukraïnskoho natsionalizmu (Munich, 1955); Volodymyr Martynets, Idelohija orhanizovanoho i t. zv. volevoho natsionalizmu (Winnipeg, 1954); Stanisław Jedynek, Destruam et aedificabo: Studia z filozofii i myśli społecznej Zachodu (Lublin, 1998); Tomasz Stryjek, Ukraińska idea narodowa okresu międzywojennego (Wrocław, 2000).

DOROSHENKO Dmytro (8 April 1882, Wilno [Vilnius]–19 March 1951, Munich), Ukrainian historian and politician. Doroshenko came from a Cossack family that farmed in the Chernihiv region and was descended from the seventeenth-century hetman Petro Doroshenko. After completing his secondary education at the Vilnius Gymnasium, Doroshenko began historical studies in 1901 in Warsaw, continuing in Petersburg and graduating in 1909 in Kiev. From the beginning of his studies he was active in the Revolutionary Ukrainian Party and the Ukrainian Radical Party. In 1906 in Kiev he became involved in editorial work (Rada, Ukrainina) and scientific work (the Ukrainian Scientific Society). From 1908 he was a member of the Society of Ukrainian Progressives. From 1909 to 1913 he worked as a teacher in Ekaterinoslav and carried out extensive educational activities in Ukrainian villages (the Prosvita Society). During World War I he undertook charity work in the All-Russian Union of Towns. In April 1917 he joined the Ukrainian Socialist Federalist Party, and in August 1917 the Central Council (Rada) of the Ukraine nominated him provincial commissar of the Chernihiv region.

After the German Army entered the Ukraine and the government of Hetman Pavlo Skoropadsky was established in May 1918, Doroshenko became minister for foreign affairs in the hetman's government. He attempted to bring a national Ukrainian character to the regime. When the regime fell in the winter of 1919, he organized a university in Kamenets Podolski and later conducted the Ukrainian Red Cross mission in Belgrade and Bucharest. He spent 1920–21 in Vienna, and in 1922 he edited the periodical Ukrains'ke Slovo in Berlin. From 1922 to 1926 he lectured in Ukrainian history at the Ukrainian Free University in Czechoslovakia and at Charles University in Prague. In 1926 he assumed the management of the newly founded Ukrainian Institute of Sciences in Berlin. He held this post until 1930 and at the same time continued his academic work in Prague. Because of increasing personal conflicts among the hetman's people (Doroshenko was, for example, a mediator in a conflict between Skoropadsky and Vyacheslav Lypynsky), Doroshenko resigned from the institute in 1930. Between 1931 and 1939 he lived in Warsaw, where he lectured in the Department of Orthodox Theology at Warsaw University and worked at the Ukrainian Institute of Sciences. After the Polish defeat in 1939 Doroshenko went to Prague and resumed lecturing at the Ukrainian Free University, continuing his scholarly work until the spring of 1945. Fearing arrest by the Soviets, he fled with the staffs of the Ukrainian scientific institutions to the American safety zone in Augsburg and Munich. From 1946 until his death Doroshenko remained president of the Ukrainian Free Academy of Sciences. In 1948–50 he was in Canada, where he lectured at, for example, St. Andrew College in Winnipeg.

Doroshenko left nearly one thousand publications on the history of Ukrainian statehood, biographies, Slavic history, the history of Ukrainian churches, regional history, records of Ukrainian relations with Western Europe, political thought, and Ukrainian historiography. Among his works the most noteworthy are the syntheses Narys istorii Ukrainy (An outline of Ukrainian history, 2 vols.; 1939) and Istoriia Ukrainy 1917–1923 (The history of the Ukraine, 1917–1923; 1930–32); the definitive work to date on the history of Ukrainian historiography, Ohliad ukrains'koi istoriografii (A survey of Ukrainian historiography; 1923; English edition, with O. Ohloblyn, under the title A Survey of Ukrainian Historiography, 1957); biographies of Mykola Kostomarov (1920), Vyacheslav Lypynsky (1925), Taras Shevchenko (1929), and Volodymyr Antonovych (1942); Die Ukraine und das Reich: Neuen Jahrhunderte deutsch-ukrainischer Beziehungen (Ukraine and the Reich: Recent centuries of German-Ukrainian relations; 1941); Z istorii ukrains'koi politychnoi dumky za chasiv svitovoi viiny (The history of Ukrainian political thought during World War I; 1936); Pravoslavna tserkva v mynulomu i suchasnomu zhyttii ukrainskoho narodu (The Orthodox Church in the past and present life of the Ukrainian nation; 1940); and Slovianskyi svit v joho mynulomu i suchasnomu (The Slavic world in the past and at present, 3 vols.; 1922). His biography of Petro Doroshenko remains in manuscript form. (TS)

Sources: Encyclopedia of Ukraine, vol. 1 (Toronto, 1984); Bibliografia prac profesora D. Doroszenka za 1899–1942 roky (Prague, 1942); Leonid Biłečkyj, Dmytro Doroszenko (Winnipeg, 1949); Iwan Korowytsky, ed., Vyacheslav Lypynsky. Arkhiv. Tom 6. Lysty Dmytra Doroszenka do Vyacheslava Lypynskoho (Philadelphia, 1973).

DOROSHENKO Volodymyr (30 October 1879, St. Petersburg–25 August 1963, Philadelphia, Pa.), Ukrainian historian of literature, bibliographer, and social activist. Doroshenko studied in Moscow, where he was active among Ukrainian students; later he was active in the Ukrainian Revolutionary Party and the Ukrainian Social Democratic Party. Monitored by the police, he escaped to Lemberg (Lviv, Lwów), where from 1908 to 1944 he worked in the library of the Taras Shevchenko Research Society (an informal Ukrainian academy of sciences). From 1925 he was an ordinary member of the society; in 1937–44 he was its director. From 1913 he was also a member of the Ukrainian Research Society in Kiev. During World War I Doroshenko sat on the Presidium of the Union of Liberation of Ukraine (Soyuz Vyzvolennia Ukraiiny), which advocated the secession of the Dnieper Ukraine from Russia and the formation of a Ukrainian state in connection with the Austro-Hungarian monarchy. In 1944–49 Doroshenko lived in Germany and then in the United States. He authored several bibliographical works, including a two-volume bibliography of Ivan Franko, sixteen volumes on Taras Shevchenko, and bibliographies of Olha Kobylyanska and Panteleymon Kulish. He translated into Ukrainian works by Nikolay Gogol, Leo Tolstoy, and Johann Wolfgang von Goethe. He published a volume of polemics with Serhiy Yefremov, Žhyttia i slovo (Life and word; 1918) and monographs on Vasyl Stefanyk (1921) and Franko (1926), as well as a history of Ukrainian literature. He summed up the activities of the Taras Shevchenko Research Society in Ohnyshche ukrainskoyi nauky (Center of Ukrainian science; 1951). In 1929–39 Doroshenko published the yearbook Dnipro in Lviv. He also published a great number of articles in the major Ukrainian periodicals: Ukrainskaya Zhizn, Kiyevskaya Starina, Literaturno-Naukovyi Vistnyk, Rada, Dilo, Svoboda, and Ameryka. (TS)

Sources: Encyclopedia of Ukraine, vol. 1 (Toronto, 1985); N. F. Korolevych, Bibliografichna diyalnist V. V. Doroshenki 1879–1963 (Kiev, 1995); Orest Subtelny, Ukraine: A History (Toronto, 2000).

DOUNAR-ZAPOLSKI Mitrafan (14 June 1867, Rechitsa [Rechytza]–30 November 1934 or 1935), Belorussian historian, ethnographer, and economist. In 1894 Dounar-Zapolski graduated from Kiev University. Between 1895 and 1897 he worked in the archives of the Russian Ministry of Justice in Moscow and taught at a private gymnasium. In 1899–1901 he was a docent (associate professor) in the Department of History and Philology of Moscow University, and in 1901–5, at Kiev University. From 1902 he was a full professor at this university. In 1907 he founded the Economic Institute in Kiev, and for ten years he was its director. In 1918 he directed the Belorussian Chamber of Commerce in Kiev. He took part in the formation of the Belorussian People's Republic (BPR). He was a member of the BPR commission on the creation of the Belorussian University in Minsk. In 1922–25 he worked as vice-rector of Baku University. He was also the founder of the Industrial and Commercial Museum of Azerbaijan. From 1925 to 1926 he was head of the History Department of the Belorussian State University, and then he worked in various research institutions in Moscow. In 1929 party reviewers questioned the contents of his book Historyia Belarusi (The history of Belorussia); it was completed in 1926, but the censors did not allow it to be printed. Subsequently, he was forced into an early retirement. The circumstances of Dounar-Zapolski's death are not clear. Arrested at the beginning of the 1930s, he was sent to a labor camp, and most probably died in the region of Narym.

Dounar-Zapolski's works are of great significance to Belorussian literature. In his first publications, he analyzed the natural environment of Belorussia and the culture of its people. He hypothesized that cultural and social processes would lead to the creation of a Belorussian political nation. He edited Kalandiary Paunochno-Zakhodniaha Kraiu (Calendars of the northwestern country), in which he published articles on the specificity of the Belorussian language, history, ethnography, and literature. From 1890 to 1895 he focused mainly on research on the family. In 1891 he published a work on the history of the lands of the Krivichi and Dregovichichi (ancient slavonic tribes) until the end of the twelfth century. He also wrote about the history of the Union of Lublin and about the Polish-Lithuanian fight for Volhynia. In 1901 he published Dzarzhaunaia haspadarka Vialikaha Kniasstva Litouskaha pry Jahielonakh (The economy of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania in the Jagiellonian period). The revolution of 1905 inspired him to do further research on the history of social revolts in Russia. He wrote several scholarly articles on the subject. In 1919 he edited Asnovy dzerzhavnoustsi Bielarusi (The basis of Belorussian statehood), which was translated into English and French. During the purge of "Belorussian nationalists," initiated in 1930, Dounar-Zapolski's writings were officially designated for destruction. (EM)

Sources: MERSH, vol. 9; Bielaruskaia savietskaia entsiklopedia, vol. 6, 1971; Bielaruskaie Slova (Ludwigsburg), 1955, no. 10; Batskaushchyna, 1964, nos. 617–618; N. Palonskaia-Vasilenka, "Dounar-Zapolski," Zapisy (New York), 1953, no. 1(3); Nicholas P. Vakar, Belorussia: The Making of a Nation (Cambridge, Mass., 1956); Vitaut Kipel and Zora Kipel, eds., Byelorussian Statehood (New York, 1988); P. Kruczok, Mitrafan Dounar-Zapolski (Minsk, 1995); Jan Zaprudnik, Historical Dictionary of Belarus (Lanham, Md., 1998).

DOVZHENKO Oleksandr (10 September 1894, Vyunyshche, near Chernikhov–25 November 1956, Moscow), Soviet Ukrainian film director. In 1914 Dovzhenko graduated from the Training Institute for Teachers in Glukhov, and later he worked as a teacher in Zhytomyr. From 1917 to 1919 he studied at the Trade Institute in Kiev. In 1917–20 he took part in the revolution as a member of the radical Socialist Borotbist Party. After the Bolshevik Revolution he worked in the Department of Folk Education and Art in Kiev, and in 1921–22, in the Soviet legations in Poland and Germany. In 1922–23 he studied painting in Berlin, and from 1923 to 1926 he worked as an illustrator for the newspaper Visti VUTsVK. He was a member of the Union of Proletarian Writers–Hart and of the All-

Ukrainian Academy of Proletarian Literature (Vseukrainska Akademiya Proletarskoyi Literatury [VAPLITE]). In 1926–28 Dovzhenko worked in a film studio in Odessa, where he shot his first movies, Vasya—Reformator (Vasya the Reformer; 1926) and Yahidka kokhannia (The fruit of love; 1926). His film Zwenyhora (1928) was recognized for its innovativeness. In 1929–41 Dovzhenko worked in a film studio in Kiev (later named after him), where he created a clear-cut satire of the Ukrainian national movement in 1918–20, Arsenal (1929), and an apotheosis of collectivization, Zemla (Land; 1930). The latter was rated among the twelve best films ever at the International Film Festival in Brussels in 1958. Dovzhenko's first sound film was Ivan (1932), about the construction of a power plant on the Dnieper River.

During World War II Dovzhenko used his talents on behalf of Soviet propaganda. After the Soviet invasion of the Eastern Borderland of Poland in September 1939, he shot a propaganda movie, Vyzvolennia (Liberation; 1940), praising the aggression as a "unification of Western Ukrainian territories with the Soviet Ukraine." In 1943 he created a documentary, Bytva za nashu Radyansku Ukrainu (Struggle for our Soviet Ukraine), and he wrote a novel, Ukraina v ohni (Ukraine on fire), that was, nevertheless, condemned by Stalin for "nationalist deviation" and was banned from publication. As a result Dovzhenko was not allowed to go to Kiev. In 1944 he shot a documentary, Peremoha na Pravoberezhniy Ukraini (Victory in the Ukraine west of the Dnieper). From 1944 he lived and worked in Moscow. In 1949–56 he lectured in the All-Union State Institute of Cinematography; from 1955 he was a professor there. In 1957 his autobiographical novel, Zacharovana Desna (Enchanted Desna; 1979), was published posthumously. From 1941 until his death he wrote a diary; it was not published until 1994. His selected writings were published as The Poet as Filmmaker by MIT Press in 1973. The most complete edition of his works is Tvory (Works, 5 vols.; 1964–66). (BB)

Sources: Encyclopedia of Ukraine, vol. 1 (Toronto, 1984); Ukrainska Literaturna Entsyklopediya, vol. 2 (Kiev, 1990); Pisarze swiata: Słownik encyklopedyczny (Warsaw, 1995); Malyi Slovnyk Istorii Ukrainy (Kiev, 1997); Dovidnyk z Istorii Ukrainy (Kiev, 2001); Roman Korohodskyi, Dovzhenko v poloni (Kiev, 2000).

DOWBOR-MUŚNICKI Józef (25 October 1867, Garbów, near Sandomierz–26 October 1937, Batorów), Polish general. After graduating from high school in 1884 Dowbor-Muśnicki joined the cadet corps in Petersburg, and in 1886–88 he studied at the Constantine Military Academy. Later he served in the 140th infantry regiment and in the 11th regiment of grenadiers. In 1899 he entered the Petersburg Military Academy, from which he graduated with distinction in 1902. During the Russo-Japanese War of 1904–5 Dowbor-Muśnicki was an officer on the staff of the First Siberian Corps. From 1910 he was chief of staff in subsequent infantry divisions. During World War I he fought on many fronts and advanced in the ranks. In November 1914 he became commander of the Fourteenth Regiment of Siberian Riflemen. In August 1915 he was promoted to major general. He fought in Asia Minor and on the German front. In January 1917 he became chief of staff of the First Army, and in May 1917 he was promoted to general of division. On 6 August 1917 he became commander of the First Polish Corps and started to form it in Belorussia, where Polish troops were trying to prevent the assaults, murder, and pillaging of Polish manor houses by Bolshevik squads. In March 1918 he recognized the Regency Council, but under German pressure he had to demobilize his corps, and he settled on the Staszów estate.

After the restoration of independent Poland, on 6 January 1919 Dowbor-Muśnicki became commander-in-chief of the Polish armed forces in the former German partition. In a short time he managed to form an army that was successful in the Greater Polish Uprising. On 19 March 1919 he was promoted to general of arms, but he was on a collision course with Józef Piłsudski. He opposed a war with Soviet Russia and the sending of the Poznań army to the eastern front, and in particular he disagreed with the way Piłsudski unified the Polish troops from the three partitions. Piłsudski was also ill-disposed toward a talented, experienced, and popular general, so he tried to marginalize him. After the failed Kiev operation in the spring of 1920, Dowbor-Muśnicki sharply criticized Piłsudski, but when in late August the Bolshevik offensive was repelled eastward, he offered his services. Piłsudski wanted to entrust him with the command of the southern front, but Dowbor-Muśnicki refused and stayed passive until the end of the war. With this refusal Dowbor-Muśnicki lost a lot of his earlier popularity. On 14 September 1921 he retired and settled in Batorów, where he ran an estate and wrote his memoirs. He returned to public life during the May 1926 coup, when the Poznań authorities wanted to send troops under his command to defend the legal authorities against Piłsudski. When President Stanisław Wojciechowski and Prime Minister Wincenty Witos resigned, this plan was abandoned, and although Dowbor-Muśnicki favored an armed defense of democracy, he decided not to lead the Poznań troops on Warsaw. He authored Krótki szkic do historii I Polskiego Korpusu (Outline history of the First Polish Corps; 1919); Na marginesie książki o pułkowniku Lisie-Kuli (Marginal notes on the book on Colonel Lis-Kula; 1933); and Moje wspomnienia (My memoirs; 1935). (PU)

Sources: PSB, vol. 5; Kto był kim w Drugiej Rzeczypospolitej (Warsaw, 1994); Encyklopedia historii Drugiej Rzeczypospolitej (Warsaw, 1999); Piotr Bauer, Generał Józef Dowbor-Muśnicki (Poznań, 1988); Tadeusz Kryśka-Karski, Stanisław Żurkowski, Generałowie Polski Niepodległej (Warsaw, 1991); Piotr Stawecki, Słownik biograficzny generałów Wojska Polskiego (Warsaw, 1994); Grzegorz Łukomski and Bogusław Polak, Powstanie Wielkopolskie 1918–1919 (Koszalin and Warsaw, 1995).

DRACH Ivan (17 October 1936, Telizhentsy, Kiev region), Ukrainian poet and political activist. In 1961 Drach graduated in Ukrainian philology from Kiev University. In 1962–64 he worked on the editorial board of Literaturna Ukraina, the weekly of the Association of Ukrainian Writers. From 1962 to 1964 he also studied at the Higher Course in Screenplay Writing of the State Cinema in Moscow, and then he worked as a screenplay writer for the Oleksandr Dovzhenko Memorial Film Studios in Kiev. After 1974 he was mainly involved with literary work. He was one of the pioneers of the revival of Ukrainian literature in the 1960s (the generation of shestidesiatniki). His poetry was distinguished by the freshness of its metaphors and neologisms and a variable rhythm, in contrast to the standards of Socialist realism. Drach was sharply criticized for the collections Nizh u sontsi (A knife in the sun; 1961) and Oda chesnomu boyahuzevi (Ode to an honest coward; 1963), but he nonetheless managed to publish a number of other collections, such as Sonyashnyk (Sunflower; 1962); Protuberantsi sertsya (Prominence of the heart; 1965); Balady budniv (Ballads of commonplaceness; 1967); and Khram sontsia (The sun temple; 1988). He authored screenplays for popular Ukrainian films: Krynytsia dla sprahlykh (The well for the thirsty; 1967); Kaminnyi khrest (Stone cross [based on short stories by Vasyl Stefanyk]; 1968); Idu do tebe (I am coming to you; 1971); and Propala hramota (The missing message [based on short stories by Nikolay Gogol]; 1972). A collection of Drach's poems was published in English as Orchard Lamps in 1989.

In 1989–92 Drach was first secretary of the Kiev branch of the Association of Ukrainian Writers. In 1989 he was among the organizers and leaders of the National Movement of Ukraine for Perestroika (Narodnyi Rukh Ukrainy za Perebudovu). From 1990 he was a deputy to the Supreme Council of the Ukrainian SRR and then of independent Ukraine (with a break in 1994–98). From 1991 he was chairman of the Council of the Society for Relationships with Ukrainians Abroad, and from 1995, chairman of the Congress of the Ukrainian Intelligentsia. In 1992–2000 he was chairman of the Ukrainian World Coordination Council (Ukrainska Vsesvitnia Koordynatsyina Rada), and in 2000–1 he presided over the State Committee for Information Policies, Television, and Radio. (BB)

Sources: Encyclopedia of Ukraine, vol. 1 (Toronto, 1984); Ukraińska Literaturna Entsyklopediya, vol. 2 (Kiev 1990); Pisarze świata: Słownik encyklopedyczny (Warsaw, 1995); Khto ye khto v Ukraini 2000 (Kiev, 2000); Mykola Inytskyi, Ivan Drach: Narys tvorchosti (Kiev, 1986); A. O. Tkachenko, Ivan Drach: Narys tvorchosti (Kiev, 1988).

DRAGANOV Pyrvan (5 February 1890, Lom–2 February 1945, Sofia), Bulgarian diplomat. According to some sources, Draganov was the illegitimate son of Tsar Ferdinand I and the stepbrother of Tsar Boris III. In 1909 he graduated from the Higher Military School in Sofia, and then he continued his studies in Germany. In 1914–18 he was a personal aide to Prince Boris, and in 1920–32 he was his aide-de-camp. From 1932 to 1936 he served as military attaché in Berlin and in 1936–38 as envoy to Vienna and then to Berlin. After the fall of Poland in September 1939, Draganov held talks with the Germans to secure Bulgaria's position in the case of Soviet ambitions to expand into the Balkans, but Berlin avoided giving any guarantees. When Bessarabia was annexed by the USSR in 1940, he tried to make Germany press Romania to cede Southern Dobrudja to Bulgaria, and he succeeded. In accord with Tsar Boris' tactics, he played for time in order to keep Bulgaria out of the Tripartite Pact as long as possible without jeopardizing relations with Germany. As early as September 1941 Draganov expected trouble for Germany on the eastern front and even the defeat of the Third Reich by the Soviet Union, but given the delicate situation, Tsar Boris had to support the Third Reich.

From 1942 Draganov was an envoy to Spain. In the name of the tsarist government he started negotiations with the Americans and the British. In February 1944 he became minister of foreign affairs in the government of Ivan Bagrianov. He tried to loosen the relationship with Germany, but a reduction in the number of trains going through Bulgaria to the eastern front and the evacuation of German troops from Bulgarian ports was not enough for the Allies, who demanded that Bulgaria renounce its territorial gains of 1940 and 1941. Bulgaria was not ready to comply. When Stoycho Moshanov became the main negotiator of the peace treaty in Cairo in August 1944, Draganov made an impolitic step by putting the blame for Bulgaria's alliance with the Third Reich on the Allies. Later he held talks with the Soviets, promising Bulgarian neutrality and disarmament of the Germans in return for the Soviets' not entering Bulgaria. The Kremlin rejected this condition, which resulted in the resignation of the Bagrianov cabinet on 1 September 1944. After the Red Army entered Bulgaria in September 1944, Draganov was arrested by the Soviet authorities and handed over to the Bulgarian authorities. Although the prosecution preparing the trial of the tsarist elite suggested that Draganov should remain alive, the Politburo of the Bulgarian Communist Party decided in December 1944 to include him in the group to be sentenced to death. The verdict was announced on 1 February 1945, and it was executed the following night. (AG)

Sources: Entsiklopediya Bulgariya, vol. 2 (Sofia, 1981); Marshall Lee Miller, Bulgaria during the Second World War (Stanford, 1975); Jerzy Jackowicz, Partie opozycyjne w Bulgarii 1944–1948 (Warsaw, 1997).

DRĂGHICI Alexandru (27 September 1913, Tisău, near Buzău–13 December 1993, Budapest), Romanian Communist activist. Drăghici completed five grades of primary school, and then he worked as a railroader. In 1933 he took part in a strike in Grivița. The following year he joined the Communist Party of Romania (CPR). In July 1935 he was sentenced to nine years' imprisonment in the trial of Ana Pauker. Lucrețiu Pătrășcanu was his lawyer. Drăghici served his sentence in Doftana Prison, where he met Gheorghe Gheorghiu-Dej and became a member of his group. From 1941 to 1944 he was incarcerated in Caransebeș and Tîrgu-Jiu. After the coup of August 1944 he was released, and with the support of the Communist Party, he assumed the post of prosecutor, although he did not have even a secondary education. In 1945 he was already a prosecutor in political trials, and in 1946, in the trial of Marshal Ion Antonescu. From October 1946 he was a deputy member, and from February 1948 a member, of the Central Committee (CC) of the CPR. As deputy head of the Political-Administrative Department of the party's CC, already in April 1948 he interrogated Pătrășcanu. A trusted partner of Gheorghiu-Dej, in December 1950 Drăghici was appointed head of the General Political Board of the Ministry of Interior and deputy minister of interior. He oversaw the preparations for the trial of Pătrășcanu. After the fall of Teohari Georgescu, in May 1952 Drăghici assumed the post of minister of interior. In September 1952 he became head of the new Ministry of Public Security. In October 1952 he was promoted to general. In September 1953 the Ministry of Interior and the Ministry of Public Security were merged, and Drăghici, as a member of the Secretariat of the CC of the CPR, was in charge of them. A deputy member of the Politburo from April 1954, on 20 August 1954 he was appointed deputy prime minister. In March 1957 he again became head of the integrated Ministry of Interior.

Drăghici was personally responsible for cruel Stalinist terror in Romania. He was in control of around 180,000 prisoners in concentration camps. He oversaw the construction of the Danube–Black Sea Canal, where forced labor was used. The security forces, of which he was in charge, bloodily suppressed the peasant resistance to collectivization; the suppression claimed the lives of tens of thousands. Drăghici approved of the use of torture to coerce testimony. When, at the CC plenum of the Romanian Workers' Party (RWP) at the beginning of April 1956, Iosif Chişinevschi and Miron Constantinescu attacked Gheorghiu-Dej for slowing down the de-Stalinization process, Drăghici stood up in his defense and became the backbone of Gheorghiu-Dej's regime. In October 1962 he also subordinated military intelligence to himself. After the death of Gheorghiu-Dej in March 1965 Drăghici was even mentioned as his successor, but he was too dangerous for other members of the leadership. Drăghici was the only member of the party leadership to vote against the succession of Nicolae Ceauşescu to the party leadership. In July 1965 Drăghici resigned as head of the Ministry of Interior, but as secretary of the CC of the RWP, he still had a powerful influence upon this ministry. On 25 April 1968, soon after the rehabilitation of Patraşcanu, Drăghici was dismissed from all his posts for "crimes and abuses" (the trial of Patraşcanu was also mentioned), and he was demoted to private. The authorities even considered putting him on trial, but they were afraid that he might divulge that the majority of party leaders were responsible for similar crimes. It was only after the dismissal of Drăghici that Ceauşescu could consolidate his power.

During the Ceauşescu regime Drăghici was completely sidelined. After the overthrow of Ceauşescu in December 1989 he left for Hungary, where he lived with his daughter in Budapest. The new Romanian authorities filed a request for his extradition, but the democratic Hungarian government refused. In May 1993 Drăghici was tried in absentia, but the trial was canceled owing to his death. (WR) Sources: Silviu Brucan, The Wasted Generation (Boulder, Colo., 1993); Dennis Deletant, Ceauşescu and the Securitate: Coercion and Dissent in Romania, 1965–1989 (Armonk, N.Y., 1995); Dennis Deletant, Communist Terror in Romania: Gheorghiu-Dej and the Police State, 1948–1965 (New York, 1999); Robert Levy, Ana Pauker: The Rise and Fall of a Jewish Communist (Berkeley, 2000).

DRAGOYCHEVA Tsola (18 August 1898, Byala Slatina–26 May 1993, Sofia), Bulgarian Communist activist. In 1918 Dragoycheva graduated from a high school for girls in Varna and in 1920 from the Higher Pedagogical Institute in Sofia. In 1919 she joined the Bulgarian Communist Party (BCP). In 1919–23 she worked as a teacher, but she frequently lost her jobs because of her illegal activities. She participated in the preparations for the September 1923 uprising. After its failure she was arrested and sentenced to fifteen years in prison. She was amnestied in May 1924, and she returned to clandestine work in the BCP military section in Ruse and Plovdiv. After the failed attempt on the life of Tsar Boris III in Sveta Nedela Church in Sofia—carried out by the BCP military section—Dragoycheva was arrested and sentenced to death. The execution was stopped as she was expecting a baby, and in January 1926 the sentence was commuted to life imprisonment. After Dragoycheva was released owing to another amnesty in 1932, she left for the USSR, where she worked with the Foreign Bureau of the BCP Central Committee. She also worked in the Women's Secretariat of the Communist International (Comintern) and studied in the Lenin School of the Comintern in Moscow (1933–35). In 1935 she took part in the Seventh Congress of the Comintern. In June 1936 she secretly returned to Bulgaria, where she was entrusted with editing the BCP organ, Zashtita. At the Second BCP Conference in the Vitosha Mountains in 1937 Dragoycheva was elected to the CC and remained a member until February 1990.

After the outbreak of World War II, in September 1940 Dragoycheva promoted the idea of a pact with the USSR that would guarantee Bulgaria its sovereignty and frontiers. In January 1941 she was elected a member of the Politburo and Secretariat of the BCP CC. After the German invasion of the Soviet Union in June 1941, the underground BCP authorities adopted the policy of "anti-Fascist armed struggle." In August 1941 Dragoycheva was arrested and detained in the Sv. Nikola Camp near Asenovgrad, from which she escaped at the end of 1941. During the trial of the BCP leadership in July 1942 she was again sentenced to death, this time in absentia. In the party leadership she was responsible for maintaining contacts with the Yugoslav Communist guerrillas of Josip Broz Tito.

Dragoycheva took part in the preparations for the uprising of 9 September 1944 and in the takeover of power by the Fatherland Front (FF). In 1944–48 she was general secretary of the FF National Committee, and from 1945 to 1950 she presided over the Bulgarian National Women's Union. With the decline of "home Communists" and with the purge of Traycho Kostov, in the late 1940s Dragoycheva lost her previous influence. From December 1947 to January 1957 she was minister of post, telephone, and telegraph. In 1948 she was dismissed from the top BCP leadership. From 1949 to 1952 she presided over the National Committee for the Defense of Peace, and in 1957–77 she presided over the All-National Committee of Bulgarian-Soviet Friendship. In 1966 she was reelected to the BCP CC Politburo.

She retired from this position in January 1984, but until 1986 she remained a member of the Council of State. She was a deputy to the parliament for forty-five years (1945–90). She authored the memoirs Powela na dylga: Spomeni i razmisli (Fulfillment of obligations: Memoirs and reflections, 3 vols.; 1972–79) and propaganda pieces on Bulgarian-Soviet friendship. (JJ)

Sources: Lazitch; Entsiklopediya Bulgariya, vol. 2 (Sofia, 1981); Elena Savova, Tsola Dragoycheva: Biobibliografiya (Sofia, 1974); J. F. Brown, Bulgaria under Communism (New York, 1975); Tasho Tashev, Ministrice na Bulgariya 1879–1999: Entsiklopedichen spravochnik (Sofia, 1999); Evgeniya Kalinova and Iskra Baeva, Bulgarskite prekhodi 1944–1999 (Sofia, 2000); Angel Tsurakov, Entsiklopediya: Pravitelstvata na Bulgariya. Khronologiya na politicheskiya zhivot 1879–2001 (Sofia, 2001).

DRAŠKOVIĆ Vuk (29 November 1946, Medja, Voivodina), Serbian politician. Drašković, who lost his mother in early childhood, graduated from a high school in Gacko and from the Law Department of the University of Belgrade in 1968. As a member of the Communist youth organization, he took part in the 1968 student demonstrations. Later he joined the League of Communists of Yugoslavia (LCY). From 1969 he worked as a journalist in the state press agency TANJUG, at first in Yugoslavia and then in Lusaka, Zambia. Recalled in 1978, after his disinformation about the outbreak of war between Zambia and Rhodesia caused a diplomatic incident, in 1978–80 he was press adviser to the Yugoslav Union of Trade Unions (Savez Sindikata Jugoslavije) and then editor-in-chief of the trade union paper Rad. In 1981 he made his debut as writer, publishing a novel, Sudije (Judges), in which he described a judge who resisted political pressure. In the novels Nož (Knife; 1982), Molitva 1–2 (Prayer 1–2; 1985), and Ruski konsul (Russian consul; 1988) he described the sufferings of the Serbs during World War II, and in Noć generala (The general's nights; 1994), he described the last days of Dragoljub (Draža) Mihailović.

At the beginning of the 1980s Drašković was expelled from the LCY and joined the opposition. At first, as a declared nationalist, he cooperated with Vojislav Šešelj in the Saint Sava Association. In January 1990 it turned into an extreme nationalist party called the Renewal of the Serbian Nation, which soon broke up. Drašković took the lead of a huge anti-government demonstration in Belgrade on 9 March 1990 in which two people were killed and dozens were wounded in scuffles with the police. Drašković was briefly arrested. On 14 March 1990 the Serbian National Renewal movement (Srpski Pokret Obnove [SPO]) was founded with Drašković at its head. When the war broke out in the former Yugoslavia, in the summer of 1991 the SPO created a paramilitary group that took part in the fighting against the Croats. Soon Drašković moved to a more moderate opposition, exhorting the Serbs during anti-war demonstrations not to take part in a war that would lead to the breakup of Yugoslavia. On 1 June 1993 he was imprisoned along with his wife. In prison he was beaten and went on a hunger strike. Both he and his wife were released in July 1993 as a result of external pressure.

Under Drašković's lead the SPO joined an opposition coalition called the Democratic Movement of Serbia (DEPOS), which in the parliamentary elections of December 1993 won forty-five mandates. In the November 1996 local elections the SPO ran in the coalition Together (Zajedno), along with the Democratic Party of Serbia and the Serbian Civic Alliance, winning in many places. When the authorities intended to invalidate the elections, Drašković was one of the organizers of demonstrations that lasted eighty-eight days and ended with success. Drašković demonstrated his charismatic leadership, capable of appealing to the crowds. He had more problems in dealing with his opposition partners and with Zoran Djindjić in particular. As a result, the coalition Together broke up. Drašković ran in the presidential elections of 1997, although other opposition parties boycotted them. In the first round he gained 20.6 percent of the vote, and in the second round, in December 1997, a mere 15.4 percent. In the elections to the Serbian parliament in September 1997 the SPO again won 45 out of 250 mandates. Drašković lost many followers when, in January 1999, he sided with Slobodan Milošević and joined his government as deputy prime minister responsible for foreign policy. During the NATO intervention Drašković condemned the Western operation, but when he began to criticize President Milošević and spoke in favor of inviting UN troops to Kosovo, on 28 April 1999 he was dismissed. In October 1999 he barely escaped death in a car crash, which was an attempt on his life. He was again wounded by two sniper bullets in his apartment in Budva (Montenegro) in June 2000. He accused Milošević's special services of both attempts. In 2000 he stayed out of the Democratic Opposition of Serbia (Demokratska Opozicija Srbije [DOS]), in which his rival Djindjić played a major role. While in the September 2000 elections the DOS defeated the Socialists of Milošević, the SPO failed to exceed the threshold and stayed out of the Serbian parliament. (AO)

Sources: Bogoljub Pejčić, Pisma Vuku (Belgrade, 1991); Milena Popović, Junska dogadanja (Belgrade, 1994); Laura Silber and Allan Little, The Death of Yugoslavia (London, 1995); Warren Zimmermann, Origins of a Catastrophe (New York and Toronto, 1996); Dejan Anastasijević, Out of Time (N.p., 2000); Bugajski; www.mirhouse.com/ce-review/anastasijevic1.pdf; www.rferl.org.

DRENČEV Milan (12 March 1917, Vinnitsa), Bulgarian Peasant Party politician. Drenčev studied law and economics. In 1941 he joined the youth organization of the Bulgarian Agrarian National Union (Bylgarski Zemedelski Narodni Syjuz [BANU]). He was imprisoned during World War II for organizing a protest against Bulgaria's alliance with the Axis. Released after the coup of September 1944, he resumed his BANU activities. After the party's leader, Nikola Petkov, was sentenced to death and the party broke up, Drenčev was arrested, and in 1948 he was sentenced to fourteen years in prison. Amnestied after several years, in 1955 he was detained again for trying to restore the BANU organization. He was sentenced to ten years. Released in 1962, until 1989 he remained under police surveillance; he was persecuted and forced to work as a blue-collar laborer at the most difficult "Socialist construction" sites.

In November 1989 Drenčev restored the BANU, taking Petkov as a symbol of the renewed organization and assuming the position of its general secretary. The party's program included the constitutional rule of law, the reprivatization of land, and respect for private property. After the collapse of the Communist dictatorship, the BANU quickly won wide support, and in 1990 it had fifteen thousand members. Drenčev tried to merge into it the BANU structure that had existed under Communist control, but in view of the mistrust of its leaders, especially with regard to Petkov's death, the attempt failed. The BANU–Nikola Petkov joined the Union of Democratic Forces (UDF), in which Drenčev became deputy chairman of the National Coordination Council. In the parliamentary elections of June 1990 the BANU candidates were not too successful.

In the spring of 1991 Drenčev favored a gradual dismissal of the post-Communists, and, contrary to the leaders of the UDF right wing, he opposed speeding up new elections. As a leader of the largest UDF faction (apart from that of the Social Democrats), Drenčev joined the UDF Center, founded in April 1991. In August 1991, however, the BANU–Nikola Petkov left the union as a result of the downgrading of its candidates on UDF lists. This step proved to be very costly, since in the elections of October 1991 the BANU–Nikola Petkov failed to exceed the 4 percent threshold and stayed out of the parliament. In February 1992 Drenčev was close to reaching an agreement with the post-Communist BANU, but the congress of the BANU–Nikola Petkov did not accept the agreement and removed Drenčev from the leadership, electing Anastasya Moser in his place. This choice split the party, since some of its members stayed loyal to Drenčev, who founded the Unifying Center of the Agrarian Movement and took the lead of the BANU–Nikola Petkov (Independent). In the elections of 1997 Drenčev tried to win a seat on behalf of the Alliance for National Salvation, but he lost. In 1998 his party left the alliance. (AG)

Sources: Koy koy e v Bulgariya (Sofia, 1998); Jerzy Jackowicz, Bułgaria od rządów komunistycznych do demokracji parlamentarnej 1988–1991 (Warsaw, 1997); Raymond Detrez, Historical Dictionary of Bulgaria (Lanham, Md., 1997).

DRLJEVIĆ Sekula (25 August 1884, Morača–1945, Austria), Montenegrin politician. Drljević graduated from a high school in Sremski Karlovac and in law from the University of Zagreb. In 1906 he became secretary of the Ministry of Finance of Montenegro; from April 1907 to January 1910 he was minister of justice, and from June 1912 to April 1913, minister of finance. In the elections of 1913 he won a seat in the National Assembly (Skupština), staying in opposition to the government of Janko Vukotić. In May 1917 he was temporarily interned by the Austrian authorities. In 1918 he was elected to the National Assembly, which abolished the monarchy and decided to merge Montenegro with the Kingdom of Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes (SHS). From the early 1920s Drljević was active in the Montenegrin Federalist Party (Crnogorska Federalistička Stranka) and sat in the SHS parliament on its behalf in 1925–29. In 1938 he was elected MP from the lists of the United Opposition. After the breakup of Yugoslavia, in April 1941 Drljević went to Cetinje, where in July 1941 he took the lead of the national committee set to cooperate with the Italian occupation authorities. From 1942 he was active in Zagreb, where he cooperated with the Ustashe regime. After the war he escaped to Austria, where he died. He authored a popular song, Oj, svijetla majska zoro!, considered by Montenegrin nationalists as a national anthem, as well as the book Balkanski sukobi (Balkan encounters; 1944). (WR) Sources: Enciklopedija Jugoslavije, vol. 3 (Zagreb, 1958); www.montenegro.org.au/crnogorske_vlade.html.

DRNOVŠEK Janez (17 May 1950, Celje), Slovene Communist activist and post-Communist politician. Drnovšek graduated in economics from the University of Ljubljana. In 1986 he received a Ph.D. in economics from the University of Maribor. At first he worked in the economic apparatus. From 1975 he was manager of the economics department of the construction enterprise Zasavje in Zagorje; from 1979 he was its deputy director, and from 1982 he was director of a branch of the Yugoslav Bank in Trbovlje. He was also economic counselor to the Yugoslav Embassy in Cairo, Egypt. From 1986 he was a deputy to the Lower House of the Federal Assembly and head of the Slovene trade union committee for foreign relations. From April 1989 he was Slovene representative to the Presidium of the Socialist Federative Republic of Yugoslavia; the Presidium served as a collective head of state. From May 1989 to May 1990 Drnovšek was chairman of the Presidium. He supported the Slovene proclamation of independence of 25 June 1991 and took part in negotiations that led to the conclusion of the Brioni Agreement of 7 July 1991 and to the withdrawal of the Yugoslav People's Army from Slovenia. In March 1992 he took the lead of the Liberal Democratic Party, which, after merging with other groups, as of 1994 was called the Liberal Democracy of Slovenia (Liberalna Demokracija Slovenije [LDS]). In April 1992 the National Assembly elected Drnovšek prime minister. He assumed this post on 14 May 1992. After the elections of December 1992 he remained as head of the government. He also remained prime minister after the elections of November 1996.

During his term Drnovšek focused on the economic and political transformation of Slovenia. He was very successful, maintaining the highest per capita GNP among the transforming East Central European countries and a steady economic growth rate. In foreign policy he made progress toward the integration of Slovenia into the European Union. On 10 June 1996 he signed a treaty of association, and in March 1998 he started accession negotiations. Since Slovenia failed to join NATO at the first stage of NATO's expansion in 1999, Drnovšek was criticized by the opposition. In April 2000 the Slovenian People's Party (Slovenska Ljudska Stranka [SLS]) withdrew from the ruling coalition, which included the LDS and the Democratic Party of Pensioners of Slovenia (DPPS). On 8 April 2000 Drnovšek's government failed to win a vote of confidence, and on 3 May 2000 Drnovšek resigned. As a result of the October 2000 elections the LDS reconstructed the coalition government with the SLS and DPPS, and Drnovšek again became prime minister. On 1 December 2002 he was elected president, and on 22 December he assumed the post of head of state. Under his presidency in a referendum on 23 March 2003, 54 percent of the Slovenes voted for entry into the European Union, and it took place on 1 May 2004. Drnovšek is an honorary doctor of Boston University and of Illinois Wesleyan University. (AO)

Sources: Leopoldina Plut-Pregelj and Carole Rogel, Historical Dictionary of Slovenia (Lanham, Md., 1996); Public Relations and Media Office, Government of the Republic of Slovenia 1999 (Ljubljana, 1999); Polish Press Agency, Noty biograficzne; Bugajski; www.gov.si.

DROBNER Bolesław (28 June 1883, Kraków–21 March 1968, Kraków), Polish Socialist politician. From 1898

Drobner was a member of the Polish Social Democratic Party of Galicia and Teschen Silesia, and in 1901 he started studies in Berlin. In December 1901 he was arrested for defending Germanized Polish children of Września. In 1902 he enrolled at the Polytechnic of Lemberg (Lwów, Lviv). Expelled for taking part in a student strike, he continued his studies in Switzerland. From 1902 he belonged to the leadership of the Polish Socialist Party–Proletariat. In 1905 he took part in revolutionary actions in Warsaw, Łódź, Częstochowa, and Sosnowiec. In December 1905 he returned to Zurich, where he received a Ph.D. in chemistry in 1907. After the outbreak of World War I he joined the Polish Legions, and from May 1915 he served in the Austrian Army. Drobner represented the Kraków Socialists at the Sixteenth Unification Congress of the Polish Socialist Party (Polska Partia Socjalistyczna [PPS]) in Kraków in April 1919. With a group of radical followers, in December 1921 he began to edit the periodical Głos Niezależnych Socjalistów. In March 1922 he left the PPS, and in 1924 he founded the Independent Socialist Party of Labor (ISPL), advocating Socialist revolution in cooperation with Communists and the creation of a dictatorship of the proletariat.

In view of marginal support for the ISPL and the PPS move into opposition against the sanacja government, in June 1928 Drobner returned to the PPS. Elected to the PPS Supreme Council in 1928, with Adam Próchnik (among others) he worked out the so-called yellow program (from the color of the cover) of the PPS left in 1935. He also took part in the activities of the Society of the Workers' University, and from December 1933 he was a member of the Kraków City Council. In January 1936 he visited the USSR, and after his return he delivered a number of lectures and published an apologetic booklet, Co widziałem w Rosji Sowieckiej? (What did I see in Soviet Russia?). In May 1936 Drobner called for a united front with the Communists, which led to his expulsion from the PPS. In 1937 he edited the Kraków version of the daily Dziennik Popularny. Arrested several times for brief periods of time, he had more than twenty trials for his speeches during strikes and rallies.

After the outbreak of World War II Drobner went to Lwów. Arrested by the NKVD on 28 June 1940, in October 1941 he was released and went to Cheboksary (Chuvash ASSR), where his family was deported. In 1942 he resumed contact with Wanda Wasilewska, and from May 1943 he was active in the Soviet-sponsored Union of Polish Patriots [ZPP]. At the First ZPP Congress in Moscow on 9–10 June 1943 Drobner was elected to its Main Board. He also became acting head of the ZPP Social Welfare Department and inspector of supplies for the Poles at the Soviet Commissariat of Trade. In July 1944 he joined the Home National Council (Krajowa Rada Narodowa [HNC]) delegation to the territories liberated from the Germans, and in September 1944 he became an HNC deputy and then head of the Department of Labor, Social Welfare, and Health of the Polish Committee of National Liberation. On its behalf Drobner co-organized the Communist authorities on the territories liberated from the Germans and became the first mayor of Wrocław (Breslau) from March to June 1945. At a PPS conference in Lublin (10–11 September 1944), later called the Twenty-fifth Congress, in the absence of most party leaders independent from Communists, Drobner was elected chairman of the PPS Provisional Supreme Council. From July 1945 to December 1947 he was deputy chairman of the new PPS. He supported a merger of the PPS with the (Communist) Polish Workers' Party and was a delegate to the Unification Congress in Warsaw in December 1948, at which the Polish United Workers' Party (Polska Zjednoczona Partia Robotnicza [PUWP]) was founded. For twenty years Drobner belonged to the PUWP, accepting both its Stalinist line and the reforms of the Władysław Gomułka period. From late October 1956 to mid-February 1957 he was the first secretary of the PUWP Provincial Committee in Kraków. Among other works, Drobner authored the memoirs Bezustanna walka (Never-ending struggle, 2 vols.; 1962–67). (WD)

Sources: Mołdawa; Słownik Biograficzny Działaczy Polskiego Ruchu Robotniczego (Warsaw, 1978); Henryk Jabłoński, Polityka PPS 1917–1919 (Warsaw, 1958); Józef Kowalski, Trudne lata (Warsaw, 1966); Krystyna Kersten, Narodziny systemu władzy: Polska 1943–1948 (Poznań, 1990); Andrzej Albert [Wojciech Roszkowski], Najnowsza historia Polski 1914–1993, vol. 2 (Warsaw, 1995).

DRTINA Prokop (13 April 1900, Prague–16 October 1980, Prague), Czech lawyer and politician, son of the philosopher František Drtina. After receiving a law degree from Charles University in Prague, Drtina worked as a clerk in a Czech financial prosecutor's office. In the 1920s he was active in the student movement; between 1925 and 1928 he presided over the student faction of the National Labor Party (Narodná Strana Práce). In 1928 he entered the Socialist-Nationalist Party, and a year later he began to work in the office of the president of the republic. He linked his political career with Edvard Beneš, and soon after Beneš had assumed the presidency, Drtina became his personal secretary. In the spring of 1939, Drtina, along with other Beneš co-workers, founded a conspiratorial organization, the Political Center (Politické Ustředí). When it had been exposed, he emigrated in the fall of 1939 and worked with Beneš, who was living in London. Among other things, under the alias of "Pavel Svaty," he spoke as political commentator in the Czech broadcasts of London Radio.

Between 1944 and 1945 Drtina was a member of the government delegation to the regained territories, and after the end of the war he was an MP, elected as one of the Socialist nationalist leaders; from November 1945 he was minister of justice. He remained at this post until the coup of February 1948, fighting for law abidance and the independence of the courts. Drtina was one of the most fervent defendants of democracy and the rule of law, opposing the Communists and their totalitarian methods. In the postwar period he was also an ardent supporter of the massive deportations of Germans from Czech territories. On 20 February 1948, along with eleven ministers from the democratic parties, Drtina resigned his post, and President Beneš accepted his resignation under pressure from the Communists. After the establishment of the Communist government Drtina had a nervous breakdown and attempted to commit suicide. From March 1948 he was under arrest, but not until December 1953 was he tried and sentenced to fifteen years' imprisonment. In 1960 he was released under an amnesty, and in 1969 he was fully vindicated, but at the time of "normalization," at the beginning of the 1970s, the vindication was suspended. At the end of his life Drtina used his authority to support Charter 77. He wrote Československo—Můj osud: Kniha života českého demokrata 20. století (Czechoslovakia—My assessment: A book of the life of a Czech democrat of the twentieth century, 4 vols.; Toronto, 1982; Prague, 1991–92). (PU)

Sources: ČBS; Josef Korbel, The Communist Subversion of Czechoslovakia, 1948–1960 (Princeton, 1959); Karel Kaplan, The Short March: The Communist Takeover in Czechoslovakia, 1945–1948 (London, 1981); Kdo byl kdo v našich dějinách ve 20. století, vol. 1 (Prague, 1998).

DUBČEK Alexander (27 November 1921, Uhrovec, Topolčany district–7 November 1992, Bratislava), Czechoslovak Communist leader. Dubček's parents got married as emigrants in Chicago. Both belonged to Slovak Socialist groups. In 1921 they returned to Czechoslovakia, and in 1925 they decided to go to the USSR, where they were members of the Czechoslovak cooperative Interhelpo in Pishpek (Bishkek), Kyrgyzstan, and (from 1935) in Gorki (Nizhny Novgorod). In 1938 they returned to Slovakia, where Dubček joined the Slovak Communist Party in 1939. He worked as a metalworker in the Škoda factory in Dubnica nad Váhom. Along with his brother, he took part in the Slovak National Uprising of 1944, in which his brother was killed and Dubček was wounded. After the war he worked in a yeast factory in Trenčín, and in 1949 he became a party functionary. From 1949 to 1951 he was first secretary of the District Committee of the Communist Party of Slovakia (CPS) in Trenčín, and then he worked in the CPS Central Committee (CC) in Bratislava. From 1952 he was first secretary of the CPS Provincial Committee in Banská Bystrica, and in 1953–55 he was a deputy member of the CPS CC. In 1955–58 he studied at the Higher Party School of the CC of the Soviet party in Moscow. In May 1958 he became a member of the CPS CC and soon also secretary of the CPS District Committee in Bratislava. From 1960 he worked in Prague as secretary of the CPS CC and was a member of the Presidium of the CC of the Czechoslovak Communist Party (CPC), responsible for metallurgy, the engineering and chemical industry, and construction, lobbying for funds to develop these lines in Slovakia.

At the Twelfth CPC Congress in December 1962 Dubček became a member of the so-called Kolder Commission, which investigated Stalinist repression against CPC members. This work changed his views on the role of the party in the society and convinced him of the necessity for reforms and for compensation for the harm done in the Stalinist period. Dubček appealed for the rehabilitation of many Slovak Communists, including Gustav Husak. He gained popularity by his public criticism of the Stalinist apparatchik Karel Bacilek. In April 1962 Dubček was elected first secretary of the CPS CC and member of the CPC CC Presidium. He supported the program of economic reforms designed by Ota Šik, and he demanded that Stalinist functionaries be made responsible for the repressions. It was against this background that Dubček entered into conflict with the first secretary of the CPC CC and president, Antonín Novotný. The conflict was aggravated by their differing views on the place of Slovakia in the Czechoslovak state system, as Dubček thought that the Slovaks were economically and culturally discriminated against in the unitary state.

The conflict reached a climax in the fall of 1967. At the CPC CC Plenum on 30 October 1967 Dubček demanded a decisive change in the way the Communist Party ruled the country and self-criticism by those responsible for Stalinist crimes. On 4 January 1968 he was elected first secretary of the CPC CC. He began to reform the party apparatus, aiming at a limitation of its role. He supported economic reforms aiming at a combination of planning and market mechanisms. He also developed a new party, the Program of Action. He strove to transform Czechoslovakia into a federal state. Despite protests by other Communist leaders from the Soviet bloc, he was determined to continue with these changes. During the Prague Spring of 1968 Dubček won enormous popularity and used it to promote reforms. His efforts to create “socialism with a human face” also won him great prestige abroad. He thought that as long as Czechoslovakia fulfilled its international obligations, it had the right to decide about its internal affairs. He rehabilitated all victims of Stalinism, agreed to eliminate censorship, and gave up control of cultural institutions. In June 1968 he supported the idea of an extraordinary congress of the CPC, which was to bring a substantial change in the mechanisms of power. During his meetings with Soviet leaders he defended his program and argued that each Communist Party had the right to determine its own lines of development and socioeconomic model. At the same time he declared his readiness to defend the Socialist system within the Warsaw Pact.

After the Warsaw Pact invasion, on 21 August 1968 Dubček condemned the military action, but he appealed to the society and to the army not to resist by force. On 22 August 1968, along with other members of the top leadership, he was interned by a Soviet special unit and transported to Moscow. On 26 August he signed the so-called Moscow Protocol, which sanctioned the Warsaw Pact intervention. From the text Dubček managed to remove only a clause reading that the Czechoslovak reforms were a counterrevolution. He also gained consent to make Czechoslovakia a federal state in September 1968. He still hoped that some of the reforms could be introduced in an evolutionary way. Soon, however, his hopes proved to be illusionary. He did not support the secret Fourteenth CPC Congress in Prague’s Vysočany quarter. He appealed to the society to cooperate with the occupation authorities, thinking that diffusing the social mood would accelerate the withdrawal of foreign troops. Increasingly isolated in the party leadership, in April 1969 Dubček resigned from the position of first secretary, and three months later he was recalled from the CPC CC Presidium. From April to September 1969 he was speaker of the Federal Assembly. In this capacity he signed Decree No. 99, which allowed the authorities to legitimately use force against those recognized as “anti-Socialist elements.” In December 1969 he became ambassador to Turkey. Realizing that the new party leadership wanted to force him to emigrate, after a few months Dubček returned to Czechoslovakia. Dismissed from the CPC CC, in December 1970 he took a job as a mechanic in the West Slovak State Forest Administration in Krasňany, near Bratislava. In 1981 he retired. At all times he was kept under strict police surveillance.

From November 1989 Dubček was active in the Slovak movement Public against Violence. His appearance at the side of Václav Havel during a demonstration on 26 November 1989 symbolized an alliance of the Czech and Slovak opposition. He became speaker of the Federal Assembly, which on 29 December 1989 elected Havel as president. Dubček supported the continuation of the Czechoslovak federation, and from March 1992 he presided over the Social Democratic Party in Slovakia. On 1 September 1992 he was severely wounded in a car crash and soon died as a result. His funeral in Bratislava was a mass demonstration of support for the joint state, which nonetheless soon split. Dubček authored the memoirs Nádej zomiera posledná (Hope dies last; 1993). (AGr)

Sources: ČBS; Kdo byl kdo v našich dějinách ve 20. století (Prague, 1994); Gordon H. Skilling, Czechoslovakia's Interrupted Revolution (Princeton, 1976); Vladimír V. Kusin, From Dubček to Charter 77: A Study of "Normalization" in Czechoslovakia 1968–1978 (New York, 1978); Zatajony dokument: Raport Komisji KC KPcz o procesach politycznych i rehabilitacji w Czechosłowacji w latach 1949–1968 (Warsaw, 1985); Zdeněk Mlynař, Nightfrost in Prague (New York, 1983); Dušan Kováč, Dejiny Slovenska (Prague, 1998); Petr Pithart, Osmadesátý (Prague, 1990); Slovenska otázka v dejinách Česko-Slovenska (1945–1992) (Bratislava, 1994).

DUBOIS Stanisław (9 January 1901, Warsaw–21 August 1942, Oświęcim), Polish Socialist activist. Dubois graduated from a high school in Warsaw. From 1914 he was active in scouting, and in 1916 he established a Socialist self-education circle. From September 1918 he belonged to the Polish Socialist Party (Polska Partia Socjalistyczna [PPS]), and in November 1918 he took part in the disarmament of German soldiers in Warsaw. In 1919 he participated in the First Silesian Uprising; in 1920, in the Polish-Soviet war (for which he received the Cross of the Brave); and in 1921, in the Third Silesian Uprising. In 1921–39 he was secretary of the editorial board of the periodical Robotnik. When in December 1922 the Society of the Workers' University (Towarzystwo Uniwersytetu Robotniczego [TUR]) was established, he joined its Central Youth Department. At the congress of the TUR cells in Warsaw in early February 1926, when these cells took the name TUR Youth Organization (Organizacja Młodzieży TUR [OMTUR]), Dubois was elected to its Central Committee. From 1926 he was chairman of the Supreme Council of Red Scouting. In the elections of 1928 he won a seat on behalf of the PPS, becoming one of the youngest MPs in the assembly. He advocated an intensification of opposition activities against the sanacja government. He took part in the formation of the centrist and leftist opposition bloc, the Centrolew, and in its Kraków congress on 29 April 1930. In September 1930 Dubois was arrested, along with other Centrolew leaders, and detained in the Brest Fortress Prison. Released on bail, he returned to political activity. At the Twenty-second PPS Congress in Kraków in May 1931, Dubois was elected to the PPS Supreme Council. In the Brest trial of January 1932, he was sentenced to three years in prison. Released in September 1934, at a meeting of the PPS Supreme Council in July 1935 he spoke in favor of a united front of the left, and in August 1935 he co-organized the first joint action of the OMTUR, the Communist Union of Polish Youth, and the Tzukunft.

After the German invasion of Poland in September 1939, Dubois volunteered for the Polish Army and served in an engineering battalion. After the lost campaign, in October 1939 he returned to Warsaw and joined the leftist conspiracy. He organized a group of left-wing Socialists, and from April 1940 he edited an underground periodical, Barykada Wolności. The left-wing group became the nucleus of the Polish Socialists' organization, which later adopted the name of the Workers' Party of Polish Socialists (Robotnicza Partia Polskich Socjalistów). In October 1940 Dubois was arrested by the Gestapo and detained in the Pawiak Prison in Warsaw, from where he was moved to the concentration camp in Auschwitz. In the camp he was one of the organizers of resistance. He died in the camp. In 1968 his Artykuły i przemówienia (Articles and speeches) was published. (WD)

Sources: PSB, vol. 5; Słownik biograficzny działaczy polskiego ruchu robotniczego (Warsaw, 1978); I. Rydłowski, Żołnierze lat wojny i okupacji (Warsaw, 1971).

DUCA Ion Gheorghe (26 December 1879, Bucharest–29 December 1933, Sinaia), Romanian lawyer and politician. Duca studied law in Paris (1897–1900). In 1902 he obtained a Ph.D. in trade law at the Sorbonne. He was an active member of the Romanian Union in Paris (1898–1902); a journalist of the leading Romanian newspaper, Universul, from 1902; and a contributor to the magazine Viața românească between 1906 and 1916. From 1903 he practiced in his profession. He was a member of the National Liberal Party (NLP). In 1907 he was elected to parliament, in which he sat until his death. In 1914–16 he was minister of education. During World War I he worked closely with Ion I. C. Brătianu, whom he represented in the negotiations with the Allies in August 1916. As a result of these talks Romania came out against the Central Powers. Duca accompanied King Ferdinand and Brătianu into exile in Iași (December 1916–December 1918). During the war he was particularly devoted to the idea of unity of the Romanian nation and represented the concept in London, Paris, and Washington.

Duca was a member of the Romanian delegation to the Paris Peace Conference in 1919. He favored the Little Entente, advocated reaching an alliance with Poland in 1921, and supported the establishment of close relations with France. Between March 1922 and March 1926 he was minister of foreign affairs. He was also one of the authors of the constitution of March 1923 and of the Dynastic Act of 4 January 1926, by which Prince Charles was excluded from the succession. Later, this led to tensions between Charles II and the NLP and finally brought about a split in the party. From January 1930 Duca was the president of the NLP, and from 14 November 1933, prime minister. He outlawed the Iron Guard under an act of 10 December 1933. On 29 December 1933, after a meeting with the king in Sinaia, Duca was shot dead by a fighting squad of the Iron Guard at the railway station. He was the author of several works, including Politica noastră externă (Our foreign policy; 1913); Raporturile unui ministru tânăr cu regele Carol I (Relations of certain young statesman with King Carol I; 1933); and Portrete și amintiri (Portraits and memoirs; 1935). In 1991–92 his Memorii (Memoirs) were published. (FA/TD)

Sources: Biographisches Lexikon, vol. 1; Larry L. Watts, Romanian Cassandra: Ion Antonescu and the Struggle for Reform, 1916–1941 (Boulder, Colo., 1993); Tadeusz Dubicki and Krzysztof Dach, Żelazny Legion Michala Archanioła (Warsaw, 1996); Stephen Fischer-Galati, Twentieth Century Romania (New York, 1991); Nicolae Iorga, Oameni care au fost, București 1936, vol. III; Paul Ștefanescu, Asasinatele politice în istoria României (Bucharest, 2000).

DUDÁS József (22 September 1912, Marosvásárhely–19 January 1957, Budapest), one of the leaders of the 1956 revolution in Hungary. An engineer by education, at the end of the 1920s Dudás joined a Communist cell in his hometown in Transylvania. In 1933 he was arrested by the Romanian authorities and spent five and a half years in prison. In August 1940, when Northern Transylvania was returned to Hungary, Dudás moved to Budapest, where he joined the local illegal Communist organization. He was a liaison among various groups of the opposition, and in September 1944 he belonged to an unofficial delegation to Moscow that discussed the conditions for armistice. Dudás co-founded the Hungarian National Insurgent and Liberation Committee, which aimed at the liberation of Hungary in cooperation with the Red Army. In 1945 he joined the Independent Smallholders' Party (ISP), and in 1946 he was elected to the Budapest City Council on its behalf. During a repression of ISP members he was arrested. In 1948 he was released but soon detained again and handed over to the Romanian security authorities, which, however, failed to prove that he had been a police informer before World War II. In 1954 Dudás was handed back to the Hungarian Communist authorities, which freed him. In August 1956 the Hungarian Foreign Ministry found his imprisonment in 1948–54 groundless.

After the outbreak of the revolution, on 29 October 1956, in the headquarters of the central press organ of the Communist party, Szabad Nép, Dudás founded the Hungarian National Committee, which demanded a coalition government, a multiparty political system, and the country's neutrality. He also founded the daily Magyar Függetlenség, which refused to recognize the Imre Nagy government. Dudás attracted about four hundred insurgents and tried to make the Soviets recognize him and not Nagy as the leader of the Hungarian authorities. He failed to make Attila Szigethy form a government alternative to that of Nagy. On 3 November Dudás and his subordinates entered into a conflict, which resulted in his dismissal from command and his brief arrest, based on false information. The next day, he was wounded and taken to hospital. Despite warnings, he did not leave the country, considering himself the leader of the insurrection. He trusted János Kádár and the party leadership, which lured him, on the pretext of negotiations, into the parliament building, where he was arrested by Soviet officers on 21 November. On 14 January 1957 the Supreme Military Court sentenced him to death without the right to a pardon for leading a plot against "the power of the people." A few days later he was executed. (JT)

Sources: Magyar Nagylexikon, vol. 6 (Budapest, 1998); A magyar forradalom és szabadságharc enciklopédiája, CD-ROM (Budapest, 1999); Új Magyar Életrajzi Lexikon, vol. 2 (Budapest, 2001); Ferenc A. Vali, Rift and Revolt in Hungary (Cambridge, Mass., 1961); Paul E. Zinner, Revolution in Hungary (New York, 1962).

DULA Matúš (28 June 1846, Blatnica–13 June 1926, Ružomberok), Slovak lawyer and politician. Born into a Protestant peasant family, Dula studied law in Vienna and Pest. In 1871 he opened his own barrister's office in Turčiansky Svätý Martin. In 1877–1901 and 1907–14 he served as vice-president, and, in 1914–18 as president, of the Slovak National Party (Slovenská Národná Strana [SNP]). He was the defense attorney in the trials of many national activists in Hungary. In 1900 he was sentenced to six months' imprisonment for organizing an ostentatious welcome for Ambro Pietor, a well-known national activist who was returning from prison. In 1906 he defended Reverend Andrej Hlinka and Vavro Šrobár in the courts in Ružomberok. In May 1914 he initiated the organization of the nonparty Slovak National Council (Slovenská Národná Rada [SNC]). The SNC followed the tradition of the main Slovak political organ from the period between 1848 and 1849. The formation of the SNC was interrupted by the outbreak of war.

In August 1914 Dula signed a declaration in which the SNP suspended its political activities. In September 1918 the leadership of the party entrusted him with the task of recreating the SNC. The SNC was formed mainly of SNP activists, and Dula became its president. The other main political currents—the Ludaks of Reverend Hlinka and the Social Democrats—recognized the authority of Dula and the SNP. In a forum of the Hungarian parliament on 19 October 1918, on behalf of the SNC, MP Ferdinand Juriga demanded the right of self-determination for the Slovak nation. After meeting with Mihaly Károlyi, the leader of the Hungarian opposition, at the beginning of October 1918, Dula talked in Prague about uniting the Czechs and Slovaks. Next, he summoned Slovak activists to Turčiansky Svätý Martin, where they finally established the SNC and formulated a program after the defeat of Austria-Hungary. On 30 October 1918 Dula co-created and signed, on behalf of the SNC, the so-called Martin Declaration, which proclaimed that the Slovak nation was a part of a “single Czechoslovak nation” and had the right to self-determination. In July 1919 Dula became vice-president of the Revolutionary National Assembly in Prague. In 1920 he was elected to the senate from the lists of the Slovak National Agrarian Party (Slovenská a rol’nícka národná strana), and after the party’s breakup he switched over to the Czechoslovak National Democracy (Československá Národní Demokracie). Dula was one of the presidents of the Slovak Matrix (Matica Slovenská), reactivated in 1919. He published (among other works) Stařešina národních pracovníků slovenských (The elders of the Slovak national activists; 1926). (MG)

Sources: Biographisches Lexikon, vol. 1; SBS; Reprezentačný biografický lexikón Slovenska (Martin, 1999); Politická elita meziválečného Československa 1918–1938: Kdo byl Kdo (Prague, 1998); M. Slávik, ed., Slovenský národovci do 30. októbra 1918 (Trenčín, 1945); Muži deklarácie (Martin, 1991); M. Pekník, ed., Slovenske národné rady (Bratislava, 1998).

DULGHERU Mișu [originally Dulbergher] (16 January 1909, Tecuci–?), Romanian functionary of the Communist political police. From the late 1920s Dulgheru worked as a bank officer and owner of an underwear shop in Galați. In 1940 he and his wife were employed in the Soviet legation in Bucharest; thus after the German invasion of the USSR, Dulgheru was suspected of contacts with Soviet intelligence and was detained in the Tîrgu-Jiu camp, where he met the top Romanian Communist leaders. Released after the coup of August 1944, he joined the Patriotic Guard of Emil Bodnaraș and then the Communist-controlled political police. From March 1945 he was an inspector, and after the establishment of the General Directorate of National Security (Direcția Generală Securității Poporului [DGSS]) in August 1948, he was head of the DGSS Investigation Directorate. Dulgheru was responsible for bestialities during the interrogation of prisoners. He personally interrogated many key political prisoners, including Lucrețiu Patrașcanu. Since he failed to prove or did not want to prove Patrașcanu’s guilt, in November 1952 Dulgheru himself was arrested. He underwent the “conveyer” and torture for about two years. He was accused of espionage and involvement in a Zionist plot, and then he was released without formal accusation. In the fall of 1967 Dulgheru testified before the party commission investigating the Patrașcanu case, pointing to the key role of Alexandru Draghici in this affair; the testimony was part of Nicolae Ceaușescu’s efforts aiming at the dismissal of Draghici. (WR) Sources: Dennis Deletant, Communist Terror in Romania: Gheorghiu-Dej and the Police State, 1948–1965 (New York, 1999); Robert Levy, Ana Pauker: The Rise and Fall of a Jewish Communist (Berkeley, 2000).

DURAY Miklós (18 July 1945, Lučenec [Losonc]), Hungarian politician from Slovakia. Duray graduated in geology and in 1977 he received a Ph.D. in geochemistry from the University of Bratislava. Initially he worked in the Institute of Pedology and the Institute of Geology of the Slovak Academy of Sciences; in 1977–90 he worked in a construction company. From 1964 he organized Hungarian youth clubs, and in 1968–69 he presided over the Hungarian Youth Association and was a member of the Presidium of the Democratic Community of Hungarians in Slovakia. In 1978 Duray founded the illegal Committee for the Defense of Hungarian Minority Rights in Czechoslovakia, which strove to eliminate the national and political discrimination of Hungarians. He signed Charter 77, and in numerous publications, both at home in the uncensored press and abroad, he criticized the nationality policy of Communist Czechoslovakia. Among other works, he published Szlovákiai jelentés (A report from Slovakia; 1982); Kutyaszorító I (Dead end I; 1983); Kutyaszorító II (Dead end II; 1989); Tegnap alighanem bolondgombát etettek velünk (Yesterday they probably fed us poisonous mushrooms; 1983); and Kettős elnyomásban (Under double pressure; 1989). From 1979 Duray was under constant surveillance by the security service. Arrested in 1982 and tried in 1983, he was released under international pressure. In 1984 he was arrested again, but after a year he was released owing to an amnesty.

In 1988 Duray was allowed to go on a year-long scholarship to the University of Indiana. After the Velvet Revolution, in December 1989 he was a candidate for minister of national minorities in the new Czechoslovak government, but the idea was opposed by the deputy prime minister and soon-to-be prime minister, Marian Čalfa. In February 1990 Duray co-founded the Coexistence movement (Együttélés-Spolužitie-Wspólnota-Soužití [ESWS]), aimed at a democratic state of law, a market economy, and equal rights for national minorities. From 1990 to 1998 he was its chairman. From January 1990 until the breakup of Czechoslovakia at the end of 1992, he was an MP to the Federal Assembly. In 1993 he worked out the idea that the Hungarians were not a national minority but “co-creators” of the Slovak state. The ESWS adopted this idea as the foundation of its program. Before the elections of 1994, the Hungarian parties from Slovakia founded the Party of the Hungarian Coalition (Magyar Koalíció Pártja/Strana Maďarskej Koalicie [MKP]). Duray was its chairman and (from 1999) deputy chairman. In 1994 he was elected MP on behalf of the MKP, and in 1994–96 he was the head of its parliamentary club. Elected to the parliament in 1998 and 2002, he was the co-author of an agreement with the Slovak Democratic Coalition that provided for the participation of representatives of the Hungarian minority in both governments of Mikulaš Dzurinda. (JT)

Sources: Magyar Nagylexikon, vol. 6 (Budapest, 1998); Ki kicsoda 2000 (Budapest, 2001); Slovensko 1996: Súhrnná správa o stave spoločnosti (Bratislava, 1997); Slovensko 1997: Súhrnná správa o stave spoločnosti (Bratislava, 1998); Slovensko 1998–1999: Súhrnná správa o stave spoločnosti (Bratislava, 1999); Slovensko 2000: Súhrnná správa o stave spoločnosti (Bratislava, 2000); www.novyberajusmev.sk/lidri-smk-duray.php.

ĎURČANSKÝ Ferdinand (18 December 1906, Rajec–15 March 1974, Munich), Slovak lawyer, politician, and journalist. Ďurčanský came from a landowner’s family. After studying law in Bratislava, Paris, and The Hague, in 1933 he started working as an international law specialist at the Law Department of Komenský University in Bratislava. From 1936 he also worked as a publicist, writing for Nástup, a journal run and edited by his brother, Ján. Politically aligned with the Populists (Ludaks) of Reverend Andrej Hlinka, he was a member of the radical anti-Czechoslovak wing of Hlinka’s Slovak People’s Party (HSL’S). In June 1938 he was one of the main authors of a proposal for Slovak autonomy, which soon was adopted by parliament. On 6 October 1938 in Zlín Ďurčanský took part in a proclamation of autonomy. In the government of autonomous Slovakia, he initially served as minister of justice and minister of health and welfare. Then he was minister of transport and social work. From 1938 he maintained contacts with the Germans. He was an avowed supporter of close cooperation between Slovakia and Nazi Germany, which, he believed, would bring independence to the Slovaks. From December 1938 he sat in the Slovak parliament.

On 13 March 1939, along with Reverend Jozef Tiso,

Ďurčanský took part in negotiations with Hitler in which the Nazi leader presented an ultimatum: either Slovakia announced its independence or Hungarian troops would invade the country. The next day the Slovak parliament proclaimed independence, and Ďurčanský became minister of foreign affairs. From 2 September 1939 he was also minister of interior and deputy prime minister. As a member of the government, he belonged to the radicals and substantially contributed to the suppression of civil rights in Slovakia. He was also much involved in the persecution of Jews. On 20 July 1940 he was dismissed from the government on the personal request of Hitler, who disapproved of his attempts to pursue a policy that was getting more independent from Germany. In the following years Ďurčanský, as a representative of the conservative wing of the HSL’S, was in opposition to Vojtech Tuka and Alexander Mach. He resumed his academic activities. Between 1940 and 1945 he was professor of international law at Bratislava University. In 1944 he organized propaganda against the Slovak National Uprising, and in January 1945 he initiated a congress of the youth wing of the HSL’S. Before the invasion of Slovakia by the Red Army in the spring of 1945 Ďurčanský fled to Austria and then to Italy. From 1947 to 1952 he hid in Argentina. In 1952 he arrived in the Federal Republic of Germany, where he was a spokesman for Ludak émigrés. He continued to criticize the Czechoslovak state and propagated the idea of an independent Slovakia. In 1947, as a war criminal, he was sentenced to death in absentia by the Czechoslovak National Court. (PU)

Sources: ČBS; Kdo byl kdo v našich dějinách ve 20. století, vol. 1 (Prague, 1998); Politická elita meziválečného Československa 1918–1938: Kdo byl kdo za první republiky (Prague, 1998); Joseph A. Mikus, Slovakia: A Political History, 1918–1950 (Milwaukee, 1963); Jerzy Tomaszewski, Czechosłowacja (Warsaw, 1997); Ferdinand Ďurčanský (1906–1974) (Martin, 1998); Dušan Kováč, Dejiny Slovenska (Bratislava, 1998).

DURCOVICI Anton (17 May 1888, Bad Deutsch Altenburg–10 December 1951, Sighet), Roman Catholic bishop of Iași. Durcovici was born into an Austrian family. After his father’s death in 1895, the extremely impoverished family moved to Iași and in 1898 to Bucharest, where Durcovici attended high school. In 1906 he graduated from the Sfintii Iosif Theological Seminary, and then he studied in Rome, receiving a Ph.D. in philosophy and theology. In 1911 he was ordained in Rome, and after his return to Romania he worked as a catechist in a high school in Bucharest and administrator of the Tulcea parish. After the outbreak of World War I, Durcovici was interned owing to his Austrian origins (his brother served in the Austro-Hungarian Army) but was released in 1915. In 1917 he was entrusted with the administration of the Țîrgoviște and Giurgiu parishes. In 1924 he became rector of the theological seminary and then of the newly founded Catholic Theological Academy, where he taught philosophy, theology, and canon law. From 1935 he was chief vicar of the Bucharest archdiocese and minister to its intellectual community. He also founded a theological research periodical, Farul Nou.

On 30 October 1947 Durcoviçi was appointed bishop of Iași. He also presided over the Church Tribunal. On 3 August 1948 the Communist authorities passed a law on the nationalization of all schools and other education institutions, hospitals, monasteries, and other institutions of the Roman Catholic Church. Priests were threatened with losing their wages and state subsidies if they failed to recognize the new law. After the imprisonment of most bishops, the authorities started arresting priests. Durcoviçi encouraged the clergy to keep the faith and to decline state subsidies. Along with Bishop Aron Marton, he drafted a church constitution maintaining the church's loyalty to the Holy See. On 26 June 1949 functionaries of the political police, Securitate, surrounded Durcoviçi's residence. He tried to escape the siege but was captured by the security officers. Placed in a Bucharest prison, he was then moved to the Jilava and Sighet prisons. He was accused of spying for the Vatican and the United States, insulted, and tortured. He died of hunger and from horrible torture. Securitate officers later showed a photo of him after he had been tortured to terrorize other prisoners. It showed a starving figure covered with wounds and dirt. Durcoviçi was buried in the local village cemetery, but in order to make identification of the grave impossible, it was soon leveled and ploughed as a regular field. (ASK)

Sources: Florian Mülker, Viața episcopului de Iași Anton Durcoviçi martir (Iași, 1993); Denis Deletant, Communist Terror in Romania: Gheorghiu-Dej and the Police State, 1948–1965 (New York, 1999); Robert Royal, Catholic Martyrs of the Twentieth Century (New York, 2000).

DVARCHANIN Ihnat (8 June 1895, Pohiry, near Slonim—8 December 1937, the White Sea–Baltic Canal), Belorussian national activist, poet, educator, and theoretician of literature. Between 1912 and 1915 Dvarchanin worked as a teacher in the village of Khmialnitsa, near Slonim. In May 1915 he was mobilized into the tsarist army. From the autumn of 1916 he fought on the western front. In June 1917 he joined the Belorussian Socialist Hromada in Minsk. Then he was a co-organizer of the All-Belorussian Congress. He also worked in the Belorussian Central Military Council. In April 1918 he became the secretary of the department of education of the Belorussian National Commissioners in Moscow. In July 1918 he spoke at a conference of the Belorussian schools and urged that the teaching of the Belorussian language be expanded. He also advocated the development of the national literature and historical research. After completing a gymnasium in Wilno (Vilnius) (as an extern), Dvarchanin studied in the history and philology department of Prague University, where in 1925 he received a Ph.D. in philosophy. He also worked in various organizations of Belorussian students and landowners in Prague.

After his return to Wilno, Dvarchanin lectured at a Belorussian gymnasium, directed Belorussian publishing houses, and (from 1926) belonged to the Belorussian Peasant and Worker Hromada, led by Bronislau Taraszkiewicz. He published Chrestomathy of the New Belorussian Literature (from 1905). After the delegalization of the Hromada by the Polish authorities in 1927, Dvarchanin continued to direct its cadres. In 1928 he was elected an MP to the Polish Assembly (Sejm) and took part in the creation of the Belorussian peasant and worker parliamentary club called Zmahannie, which continued the ideals of the Hromada and was considered by the Polish authorities as anti-state. In 1926 Dvarchanin published his doctoral thesis in Polish: Franciszek Skaryna jako kulturalny działacz i humanista na niwie białoruskiej (Franciszek Skaryna as a cultural activist and humanist in the Belorussian field). Dvarchanin was one of the directors of the Society of the Belorussian School. In 1930 he was arrested and sentenced to eight years of prison. On 15 September 1932 he left for the USSR as the result of an exchange of political prisoners between Poland and the Soviet Union. From November 1932 he worked in the Committee of Research on Western Belorussia at the Academy of Sciences of the Belorussian Soviet Socialist Republic (BSSR) and served as director of its Linguistics Institute. On 16 August 1933 he was arrested by the security organs of the BSSR in connection with the case of the so-called Belorussian Nationalist Center. On 9 January 1934 the council of the OGPU of the BSSR sentenced him to death, but the sentence was commuted to ten years of labor camp. Dvarchanin served the sentence on the Solovets Islands, and later he labored in the construction of the White Sea–Baltic Canal. On 25 November 1937 an NKVD troika sentenced him to death by firing squad. He was posthumously rehabilitated on 18 April 1956. (AS/SA)

Sources: Belarus: Entsylapedychny daviednik (Minsk, 1995); Aleksander Barszczewski, Aleksandra Bergman, and Jerzy Tomaszewski, Ignacy Dworzaniin, białoruski polityk i uczonek/Ihnat Dvarchanin, białoruski polityk i wuchony (Warsaw, 1990); V. Holubiev, "Ofiary rosyjskiego caratu i bolszewizmu na Białorusi," Narodnaia Vola, 25 February 2000.

DYNOV Petur, pseudonym “Beinsa Duno” (12 July 1864, Hadyrcha [now Nikolaevka, near Varna]–27 December 1944, Sofia), Bulgarian theologian, philosopher, and religious reformer. Dynov’s father, Konstantin Dynovski, was a well-known activist in the Bulgarian national revival, and his mother was a mystic. Dynov graduated from the American High School in Svishtov in 1887, and then he lived in the United States for seven years, where he worked as a blue-collar laborer and studied. In 1891 he graduated from Drew University in Madison, NJ, and then he studied medicine at Boston University. He acquired a sound knowledge of philosophy, astronomy, mathematics, and biology. In 1895 he returned to Bulgaria, and in 1896 he published his first work on the natural and social foundations of human life. In 1900 in Varna he founded a religious community called the White Brotherhood, guided by Divine Love, Wisdom, and Truth. From 1904 he lived in Sofia, expanding the circle of the community’s followers in Bulgaria and abroad, in, among other places, Yugoslavia, France, Italy, and the United States. One of his followers was Albert Einstein. Dynov’s social doctrine was based on the Gospel, but he opposed the formal hierarchical structures of Christian churches and preferred small groups of believers (dynovists) who met in open spaces, seeking contact with nature, in which they sought the source of existence. In his doctrine humanity was climbing from lower to higher civilizations; it had recently reached the stage of the “sixth race” and had an improved organization and clairvoyance. Dynov was respected by Tsar Boris III. Dynov supported the ruler’s attempts to loosen Bulgaria’s ties to the Third Reich and to save Bulgarian Jews from deportation and extermination. After the takeover of power, Bulgarian Communists persecuted Dynov’s followers and disbanded the White Brotherhood communities. (WDj)

Sources: Entsiklopediya Bulgariya, vol. 1 (Sofia, 1978); Atanas Slavov, Pytiat i vremeto: Svetska biografia na Petyr Dynov, vol. 1 (Sofia, 1998); Milka Kraveva, The Master Peter Dynov: His Life and Teaching (Sofia, 2001).

DŽABIĆ Ali Fehmi (1853, Mostar–5 August 1918, Istanbul), Muslim clergyman and politician from Bosnia. Džabić learned the Koran in his hometown of Mostar. When Bosnia was occupied by Austria-Hungary, he represented Muslims in the Bosnian delegation that went to Vienna and Budapest in November 1878. From then on he continued to be one of the leaders of the Muslim minority in the Habsburg monarchy. In 1884 he became the mufti of Mostar. From 1886 he openly advocated autonomy for Bosnia and Herzegovina. Under his influence the Muslim Congress in Sarajevo in 1893 adopted his stance.

In 1899 a proposal for an autonomous Muslim Bosnia-Herzegovina was launched, and Džabić was suggested as its leader. The tendencies toward autonomy resulted not only from historical and demographic circumstances, but also from a conflict between Muslims and Christians, mostly Roman Catholics supported by the bishop of Sarajevo, Josip Stadler, and the majority of Habsburg officials. Negotiations that Džabić held with the imperial officials failed. He was more successful in his talks with representatives of the Eastern Orthodox Church; these helped to widen religious and educational freedoms for both communities. Nevertheless, for his opposition activities, the Habsburg authorities deprived Džabić of the office of mufti of Mostar. Džabić also maintained contacts with religious and lay authorities of the Ottoman Empire. When in 1902 he went on an official visit to the Porte, the Austro-Hungarian authorities refused him the right to return. He became a professor at the University of Istanbul and lectured in Arabic studies. Meanwhile, lay landowners began to represent the interests of Bosnian Muslims, and the religious conflict faded away. A year after Austria-Hungary annexed Bosnia-Herzegovina, in 1909 Emperor Francis Joseph granted Bosnian Muslims cultural autonomy. (MC)

Sources: Biographisches Lexikon, vol. 1; Nusret Šehić, Autonomi pokret muslimana za vrijeme Austrougarske Uprave u Bosni Hercegovini (Sarajevo, 1980); Mushin Rizvić, Bosansko-muslimanska književnost u doba preporoda (1887–1918) (Sarajevo, 1990); H. T. Norris, Islam in the Balkans: Religion and Society between Europe and the Arab World (Columbia, S.C., 1993); “Ali Fehmi Dzabic (1853–1918),” www.bosanskialim.com/arhiva/alimi/ali_fehmi_dy-abic.htm.

DZEMYANTSIEY Mikalay (25 May 1930, Khotlino), Belorussian Communist activist. During the Nazi occupation Dzemyantsiey fought in a guerrilla unit. After graduating from high school he worked as a teacher in the Vitebsk region. In 1958 he started working in the Communist Party apparatus in Vitebsk. In 1959 he graduated from the Belorussian Agricultural Academy, and in 1964 from the Higher Party School of the Central Committee (CC) of the Soviet party. In 1964–74 he headed the Department of Agriculture of the Vitebsk Regional Committee of the Communist Party of Belorussia (CPB), and in 1974–77 he was secretary of the CPB Regional Committee in Vitebsk. In 1977 he became head of the Department of Agriculture of the CPB CC, and in 1979, secretary and member of the Politburo of the CPB CC. In 1989–90 he was chairman of the Supreme Council of the Belorussian SSR and deputy chairman of the Supreme Council of the Soviet Union. After the Supreme Council of the Belorussian SSR announced its sovereignty on 27 July 1990, Dzemyantsyey acted as the head of state. He was recalled for supporting the Moscow putsch of Gennady Yanayev in August 1991. From 1997 he was an MP to the National Assembly of Belarus, founded by President Alyaksandr Lukashenka. (EM)

Sources: Kto jest kto w Białorusi (Białystok, 2000); Kto iest kto v Respublike Belarus (Minsk, 1999); Entsyklapiedyia historyi Belarusi, vol. 2 (Minsk, 1994); Jan Zaprudnik, Historical Dictionary of Belarus (Lanham, Md., 1998); Belarus: Entsyklapedyczny davednik (Minsk, 1995).

DZERZHINSKY Feliks, pseudonyms “Astronom,” “Domański,” “Krzeczowski,” “Żebrowski” (11 September 1877, Dzierżynowo, near Oszmiana–20 June 1926, Moscow), top Bolshevik leader of Polish origin, head of the Cheka. Dzerzhinsky was born into a noble family of Edmund Dzerzhinsky and Helena née Januszevska. His father died when he was five years old. The widow with her children moved to Vilnius, where Dzerzhinsky began his education. After nine years of trouble he left school, intending to become a revolutionary. From 1894 he belonged to a Socialist circle, and in 1895 he joined the Social Democracy movement of Lithuania. In 1897 he was arrested and sent to Nolinsk, near Vyatka, from where he escaped two years later. He went to Warsaw, where he played a major role in the reorganization of the party and its transformation into the Social Democracy of the Kingdom of Poland and Lithuania (Socjal-Demokracja Królestwa Polskiego i Litwy [SDKPiL]). The aim of this internationalist party was social revolution. Dzerzhinsky already maintained that the struggle for the independence of Poland conflicted with the aims of the revolution. Arrested again in 1902 and sent to Siberia, he instigated a prisoner revolt in Irkutsk and fled, this time to Berlin. In 1904 he returned to Warsaw.

During the 1905 revolution Dzerzhinsky belonged to the chief agitators in Warsaw and Łódź. In 1906 his party became a part of the Bolshevik faction of Russian Social Democracy. He joined the CC of the Bolshevik party and personally met Vladimir Lenin. At the SDKPiL congress in Zakopane in 1906 Dzerzhinsky made the main speech and declared his support for a close union with the Bolsheviks. He even criticized the slogan of “the self-determination of nations.” In 1908 he was arrested again and placed in Warsaw Citadel, where he wrote Pamiętnik więźnia (Prisoner’s diary; 1951). He again escaped while being transported to Siberia and via Berlin arrived in Italy, where he visited Maksim Gorky in Capri. In 1912 he resumed underground activities in Warsaw, Częstochowa, and Dąbrowa Górnicza. Arrested again in 1914, he was sentenced to three years of prison and in 1916 to a further six years.

Released after the February 1917 revolution, Dzerzhinsky again became very active in the Bolshevik party. On 29 October 1917 he became a member of the Military-Revolutionary Committee, which prepared the Bolshevik coup. During the coup he was responsible for the post and telegraph, as well as for communications between the Smolny Institute and Bolshevik troops. After seizing power, he agreed with Lenin that they should establish a dictatorship rather than share the victory with other parties. On 20 December 1917 Dzerzhinsky was appointed head of the All-Russian Extraordinary Commission for Combating Counterrevolution and Sabotage (Cheka). He fanatically directed the Red Terror in the spirit of “revolutionary morality.” From April 1918 Cheka troikas executed “enemies of the revolution” without trial. Lenin approved of the atrocities perpetrated by Dzerzhinsky and the Cheka. During negotiations with the Central Powers in Brest Litovsk Dzerzhinsky opposed Lenin’s peace plans. In March 1919 he became commissar for internal affairs, and in spring 1920, a member of the Organization Bureau of the Bolshevik party’s CC.

When in July 1920 the Red Army began an offensive against Poland, Dzerzhinsky headed the Polish Bureau of the party, which formed the Provisional Polish Revolutionary Committee (Tymczasowy Komitet Rewolucyjny Polski [TKRP], or Polrevkom). He also became head of the committee after it was established in Białystok as the highest organ of the Bolshevik government in Poland. After the Polish counteroffensive the Polrevkom was dissolved in August 1920.

In March 1921, still as head of the Cheka, Dzerzhinsky became commissar for transport. When in February 1922 the Cheka was renamed the State Political Administration (Gosudarstvennoe Politicheskoe Upravlenie [GPU]) he remained its head, keeping at the same time the post of commissar for internal affairs. At the Tenth Congress of the Bolshevik party Dzerzhinsky sharply criticized “worker opposition” and consorted with Stalin. In 1922 he found himself in opposition to Lenin as he supported Stalin’s standpoint on terminating the autonomy of Georgian Bolsheviks. Gradually but steadily he increased his power. In September 1923 the GPU was renamed the OGPU (Obedinennoe Gosudarstvennoe Politicheskoe Upravlenie), and in February 1924 Dzerzhinsky was appointed head of the Supreme Council of the National Economy. He supported the New Economic Policy but monitored it so that it did not become a threat to party rule. In June 1924 he became a deputy member of the Politburo. Dzerzhinsky died suddenly during a debate of the CC.

For the interwar generation of Poles Dzerzhinsky was a symbol of revolutionary terror and crime. When the Communists seized power after World War II in Poland, Dzerzhinsky became one of their heroes. His memory was honored especially in the security organs of the Polish People's Republic. A monument was built to him in Warsaw, and streets and factories were named after him, but for many Poles he remained a symbol of Bolshevik lawlessness. On 17 November 1989 his monument in Warsaw was toppled, much to the joy of the public; it presaged the recovery of sovereignty and democracy in Poland. (WR) Sources: MERSH, vol. 10; Feliks Dzierżyński, Listy do siostry Aldony (Warsaw, 1951); Aleksander Solzhenitsyn, Archipelag Gulag, vols. 1–3 (Warsaw, 1990); Leonard Shapiro, The Origin of the Communist Autocracy (Cambridge, Mass., 1977); Edward Barszcz, Feliks Dzierżyński: Wielki Polak i internacjonalista (Warsaw, 1972); Michał Heller and Aleksander Niekricz, Utopia u władzy, vol. 1 (Warsaw, 1986); Richard Pipes, Rewolucja rosyjska (Warsaw, 1994).

DZHEMILEV Mustafa [also known as Adbul Dzhemil] (13 November 1943, Ayserez, Crimea), leader of the Crimean Tatars. In 1944 Dzhemilev, his family, and the whole Crimean Tatar community were deported to Uzbekistan. After graduating from high school in 1959, Dzhemilev tried to enroll in the Eastern Department of Tashkent University but was unsuccessful because Tatars were not accepted. He worked as a blue-collar laborer in Mirzachul and in an aircraft factory in Tashkent. At the end of 1961 he co-founded the illegal Union of Crimean Tatar Youth. When the organization was exposed and its leaders were arrested, he was fired from work and put under KGB surveillance. During the “second thaw,” in 1962 he started to study at the Institute of Land Drainage Engineering in Tashkent, from which he was expelled in 1965 for “nationalist and anti-Soviet views” and for questioning the deportation of the Crimean Tatars. In May 1966 he was sentenced to one and a half years in prison for refusing to serve in the Soviet Army.

In November 1967 Dzhemilev entered into contact with a Moscow group of human rights defenders and with foreign correspondents; through them he informed the world about the situation of the Crimean Tatars. He took part in the human rights movement—for instance, by signing protests against the repression of dissidents and against the Warsaw Pact intervention in Czechoslovakia. In May 1969 he was one of the fourteen organizers of the Initiative Group for the Defense of Human Rights in the USSR (Initsiativnaia Gruppy Zashchity Prav Cheloveka v SSSR). Arrested again in September 1969, Dzhemilev was sentenced to three years in prison. He was arrested for the third time in June 1974, tried, and sentenced to one year in prison for declining to serve in the Soviet Army. Three days before his term was up, he was accused of preparing documents “slandering Soviet state order” and expressing “anti-state propaganda.” In protest Dzhemilev started a hunger strike, which he continued for 303 days and which brought him world renown. In April 1976 he was sentenced to two and a half years in a hard labor camp. In February 1979 he was sentenced again to one and a half years. In November 1983 he was arrested again and sentenced to three years for “organizing unrest” when he tried to bury his father in the Crimea. In April 1987, at the First All-Union Congress of the Crimean Tatar Activists, Dzhemilev was elected to the Central Initiative Group of the Crimean Tatar National Movement (Organizatsia Krymskotatarskogo Natsionalnogo Dvizheniia). In May 1989 he became chairman of its Central Council, and he was allowed to settle in the Crimea. In June 1991 he became speaker of the Crimean Tatar parliament (Medzhlis). He was reelected to this position in 1996 and 2001. In March 1998 he became a deputy to the Supreme Council of the Ukraine on behalf of the National Movement of Ukraine, and in 2003 he was reelected on behalf of the Our Ukraine (Nasha Ukraina) coalition. (BB)

Sources: Khto ye khto v Ukraini 2000 (Kiev, 2000); Andrey Grigorenko, A kagda my vernyomsa (New York, 1977); Shest dnei: “Belaya kniga” (New York, 1980); Svetlana Chervonnaya, Krym '97: Kurultay protiv raskola (Moscow, 1998); Rossiiskaia Federatsiia protiv Mustafy Dzhemileva: Omski protsess, April 1976 (Kiev, 1998).

DZHUROV Dobri (5 January 1916, Vrabevo, near Troyan—17 June 2002, Sofia), Bulgarian general and Communist activist. In 1932 Dzhurov joined the Workers' Youth Union, and in 1938, the Bulgarian Communist Party (BCP). He graduated from high school in Sofia in 1937. In the same year he was sentenced to one year in prison for his revolutionary activities. During military service Dzhurov directed an illegal BCP cell in the infantry regiment in Dragoman (March 1939–December 1940). After he was released from service, he worked in the military party organization in Sofia. Arrested in 1942 and interned in the Krysto Pole concentration camp, he escaped. Sentenced to death in absentia, from June 1942 he operated in the Communist guerrilla movement; he was political commissar of the Chavdar unit from September 1942 and commander of the Chavdar Brigade from April 1944. After the uprising of 9 September 1944, he was promoted to the rank of colonel. In 1950–64 he advanced through successive ranks of general, and in 1978 he received a “marshal's star,” which distinguished him among the generals, although he was not formally nominated a marshal.

After the September 1944 coup Dzhurov served in the Ministry of Interior, and from June 1945, in the army. He graduated from the Frunze Military Academy in Moscow in 1947 and from the Military Academy of the Soviet General Staff in 1959. He commanded a division and then an army. In 1956 he became deputy minister of national defense, and from March 1972 to September 1990 he was minister of national defense. In 1958–62 he was a deputy member, and from 1962 to 1990 a member, of the BCP Central Committee (CC); in 1974–77 he was a deputy member, and from 1977 to 1990 a member, of the BPC CC Politburo. In 1962–90 he was a deputy to the National Assembly. In early November 1989 Dzhurov joined the reformers in the BCP leadership who ousted Todor Zhivkov on 10 November 1989. After the BCP was transformed into the Bulgarian Socialist Party (BSP), Dzhurov was a member of the Presidium of the BSP Supreme Council (2 February–25 September 1990). In June 1990 he was elected deputy to the Grand National Assembly. He left it in January 1991, attacked for his Communist past, having, for instance, placed the military as guards in concentration camps. Dzhurov authored Murgash: Spomeni (Murgash: Memoirs; 1966); Za voennata politika na partiyata (On the wartime policy of the party; 1977); and S vyarata i mech prez godinite: Izbrani proizvedeniya (With faith and sword: Selected works; 1984). (JJ)

Sources: Entsiklopediya Bulgariya, vol. 2 (Sofia, 1981); Raymond Detrez, Historical Dictionary of Bulgaria (Lanham, Md., 1997); Koy koy e v Bulgariya (Sofia, 1998); Tasho Tashev, Ministrite na Bulgariya 1879–1999: Entsiklopedichen spravochnik (Sofia, 1999); Evgeniya Kalinova and Iskra Baeva, Bulgarskite prekhodi 1944–1999 (Sofia, 2000); Angel Cyrakov, Entsiklopediya na pravitelstvata na Bulgariya: Khronologiya na politicheskiya zivot 1879–2001 (Sofia, 2001).

DZIAMIDAU Mikalay [also known as Mikolay Demidov] (10 December 1888 Gródek, near Białyostok–23 May 1967, Chicago, Ill.), Belorussian colonel and social activist. Dziauidau's parents—Stanisław Kontarowski and Aleksandra née Kalinowska—were Poles, but Dziauidau chose to use the Belorussian version of the name of his stepfather, Jan Demidov. He was brought up by his grandfather, Aleksander Kalinowski, who was the brother of Konstanty Kalinowski, one of the leaders of the January insurrection of 1863 in Belorussia. Dziauidau attended high school in Łomża, and in 1905 he graduated from a teachers' seminary in Świsłocz. In 1911–12 he worked for the railways in Białyostok and simultaneously studied at the Vilnius Pedagogical Institute. Mobilized by the Russian Army in 1914, he did office work and also studied at two military academies. After the October 1917 revolution he was a Bolshevik commissar in Novgorod. During the inspection of Russian troops at Dvinsk (German Dünaburg, now Daugavpils) Dziauidau was taken captive by the Germans. Released at the end of 1918, he left for Wilno (Vilnius), where he took part in the formation of Belorussian military formations in Lithuania.

In December 1918 Dziauidau arrived with a group of Belorussian officers in Grodno, and on behalf of the government of the Belorussian People's Republic he became the commandant of the town. There he created a few-hundred-strong garrison, as well as centers of recruitment for the Belorussian army in Grodno, Białyostok, and many other towns. After the Poles entered Grodno in June 1919, Dziauidau was arrested and imprisoned in Białyostok. In September 1919 he was released and incorporated into the Belorussian Military Commission, which was established with the consent of Józef Piłsudski. In the summer of 1920 Dziauidau joined the corps of General Stanisław Bułak-Bałachowicz, and, with the rank of colonel, he was in command of the seven-hundred-strong Independent Belorussian Battalion, which was formed of soldiers who came from the region of Białyostok. In November 1920 he took part in the offensive on Mozyrz led by Bułak-Bałachowicz. Then he covered the retreat of these troops. Dziauidau stayed on Soviet territory until the middle of January 1921 and conducted guerilla warfare.

Forced to withdraw to Polish territory, Dziauidau was interned and imprisoned, along with his soldiers, in a camp in Radom. Released in June 1921, he got a job as a schoolmaster in Gródek, near Białyostok. He organized a cooperative movement there and joined the electoral campaign of the Bloc of National Minorities. Under his influence the people of Gródek drove out the Polish teachers and demanded a school with Belorussian as the language of instruction. In November 1922 Dziauidau was accused of anti-state activities and was arrested. Released pending trial, he did not wait for his trial but managed to illegally get to Latvia. There he organized two Belorussian educational societies and worked as a teacher. After the Soviets occupied Latvia in 1940, he was put in a Moscow prison. Released in June 1941, he returned to Latvia. During the German occupation he organized and supervised Belorussian education in Latgalia. In 1943 he moved to Lida, where he organized schools and units of Belorussian self-defense.

In August 1944 Dziauidau went to Berlin and became deputy headmaster of a non-commissioned officers' school of the Belorussian National Defense. In December 1944 he tried to form Belorussian military formations in the army of General Alexander Vlasov. After the capitulation of Germany, he remained in the French occupation zone and organized aid for refugees from Belorussia. He also initiated the convention of the Council of the Belorussian Autocephalous Orthodox Church. In 1950 he went to the United States. He lived in Lansing and in Chicago, where he organized the religious and national life of the Belorussians in America. Dziamidau was a member of the board of the Belorussian-American National Council and of the board of the Belorussians of the State of Illinois. (EM)

Sources: O. Łatyszczek, "Mikołaj Demidow (1888–1967)," in Białoruskie Zeszyty Historyczne, vol. 1(3) (Białystok, 1995); Bieltarus (New York), 1967, nos. 123–124; Vitaut Kipel and Zora Kipel, eds., Byelorussian Statehood (New York, 1988).

DZURINDA Mikulaš (4 February 1955, Spišský Štvrtok, Spišská Nová Ves district), Slovak politician. In 1979 Dzurinda graduated in the economics of transportation at the university in Žilina, where he also received a Ph.D. in 1989. From 1980 he worked in the Bratislava railway administration, and from 1988 he was the head of its management automation department. In 1991–92 he was deputy minister of transportation and telecommunications of the Slovak Republic. After the split of Czechoslovakia, from March 1994 to December 1994 Dzurinda was minister of transportation, telecommunications, and public works in the Slovak government of Jozef Moravčík. In 1990 he was co-founder of the Christian Democratic Movement (Kresťanskodemokratické Hnutie [KDH]), and from 1993 he was its deputy chairman for economic affairs. In November 1996 he ran for chairman of the party but lost to Ján Čarnogurský. In 1992 he became a deputy to the Slovak National Council, and from November 1994 to September 1998 he was a deputy to the Slovak parliament.

In 1997 Dzurinda co-founded the Slovak Democratic Coalition (Slovenská Demokratická Koalicie [SDK]), and from 4 July 1998 he was its chairman. The SDK included five parties: the KDH, the Democratic Party, the Democratic Union of Slovakia, the Social Democratic Party of Slovakia, and the Green Party of Slovakia. After the SDK victory over Vladimír Mečiar's party, Dzurinda, as the leader of the largest faction of the coalition, assumed the position of prime minister on 30 October 1998. His cabinet, based on a coalition of the SDK, the post-Communists, the Party of the Hungarian Coalition, and the Party of Civic Understanding, radically changed the course of Slovak politics. Slovakia restored its credibility in the eyes of the West and made intensive efforts to accelerate its entry into NATO and the European Union. Dzurinda's government undertook economic reforms that aimed at a restructuring of the economy and an accelerated rate of growth. It also improved human rights standards and introduced direct presidential elections. All these policies resulted in the admission of Slovakia into the OECD in September 2000.

Dzurinda favored transforming the SDK into one party, which resulted in a conflict with the leaders of the parties that formed the coalition, especially the KDH chairman, Čarnogurský. In February 2000 Dzurinda left the KDH, created the Slovak Democratic and Christian Union (Slovenská Demokratická Kresťanská Únie [SDKÚ]), and took over its leadership. Despite numerous tensions in the ruling coalition, mainly with the post-Communists and the Hungarian minority, Dzurinda's government survived until the parliamentary elections of September 2002. Before these elections the four-group coalition was given little chance of success, but Dzurinda undertook effective steps to improve its ratings—for instance, by concluding alliances with a few small center and rightist parties—and he succeeded in winning 15 percent of the vote for the SDKÚ. Since his former coalition partners also did well, a new ruling coalition was created that included the KDH, the Hungarian minority, and the Alliance of the New Citizen, and Dzurinda became prime minister again on 16 October 2002. In a May 2003 referendum the entry of Slovakia into the European Union was supported by 92 percent of the Slovaks, and on 1 May 2004 Dzurinda led Slovakia into the union. (PU)

Sources: Slovensko 1996: Súhrnná správa o stave spoločnosti (Bratislava, 1997); Slovensko 1997: Súhrnná správa o stave spoločnosti (Bratislava, 1998); Slovensko 1998–1999: Súhrnná správa o stave spoločnosti (Bratislava, 1999); Slovensko 2000: Súhrnná správa o stave spoločnosti (Bratislava, 2000); www.sdkuonline.sk/predseda.php3; www.vlada.gov.sk/dzurinda/ktoje/zivotopis.php3; Bugajski.

DZYUBA Ivan (26 July 1931, Mykolayivka, Donetsk region), Ukrainian theoretician of literature, leader of the "generation of the 1960s" (shestidesiatniki). In 1953 Dzyuba graduated in Russian studies from the Pedagogical Institute in Donetsk, and in 1953–57 he completed doctoral studies at the Institute of Literature of the Academy of Sciences of the Ukrainian SSR. In 1957–62 he headed the review section of the monthly Vitchyzna, from which he was fired for "ideological errors." In 1964–65 he was a literary consultant of the Molod Publishing House. Fired for taking part in a protest against the arrests of dissidents in 1965, in 1966–69 Dzyuba was a proofreader for a biochemical periodical. In 1966 he published in the uncensored press (samvydav); in his major work, Internatsyonalizm chy rusyfikatsia? (Internationalism or Russification? 1968), he unmasked the Soviet Russification policy in the Ukraine. From 1969 to 1972 he was an editor of foreign literature books in the Dnipro Publishing House. Arrested and interrogated by the KGB many times, in April 1972 Dzyuba was excluded from the Association of Ukrainian Writers (AUW) and imprisoned. In May 1973 he was sentenced to five years for “anti-Soviet activities”; he submitted a self-criticism and was released in November 1973.

In 1974–82 Dzyuba was a proofreader and then a literary correspondent for the newspaper of a Kiev aircraft factory. In 1980 he was accepted back into the AUW, and from 1982 he did research. From 1988 to 1991 he presided over the Republican Association of Ukraine Specialists, and from 1991 he was editor-in-chief of the monthly Suchasnist, which he had earlier published in exile. Between April and October 1992 he was a member of the College for Humanitarian Policies of the Ukrainian State Duma. In November 1992 he became a member of the National Academy of Sciences of Ukraine (Nastionalna Akademiya Nauk Ukrainy [NANU]). From October 1992 to June 1994 he was minister of culture. In 1996

he became secretary of the NANU Department of Literature, Language, and History of Art. From 1999 he was chairman of the Taras Shevchenko Committee of Ukrainian State Awards. Head of the editorial board of Entsyklopediya suchasnoyi Ukrainy (Encyclopedia of contemporary Ukraine), Dzyuba authored many books on history of literature, including the following: Zvychayna lyudyna chymishchanyn? (A common man or a burgher? 1959); Hrani krystala (Edges of crystal; 1978); Avtohrafy vidrodzhenniya (Autographs of revival; 1986); and U vsyakoho svoya dola (Everyone has his own fate; 1989). (BB)

Sources: Encyclopedia of Ukraine, vol. 1 (Toronto, 1984); Ukrainska Literaturna Entsyklopediya, vol. 2 (Kiev, 1990); Khto ye khto v Ukraini 2000 (Kiev, 2000); Roman Rakhmannyi, Vohon i popil: Poryv i zlam Ivana Dzyuby (Montreal, 1974); Bogumila Berdychowska and Ola Hnatiuk, eds., Bunt pokolenia: Rozmowy z intelektualistami ukraińskimi (Lublin, 2000).

E

ECKHARDT Tibor (26 October 1888, Makó–10 September 1972, New York), Hungarian politician. Eckhardt studied in Berlin and Paris, and in 1908 he graduated in law from the University of Budapest. From 1908 he was head of the Makó district; in 1911–13 he was secretary of a province; from 1913 to 1914 he worked in the Ministry of Interior; from 1914 to 1916, as secretary of the government commissioner for Transylvania; and from 1916 to 1918, as head of a Transylvanian district. After the fall of the Habsburg monarchy, in the fall of 1918 Eckhardt formed a military unit that fought against Romanian insurgency in Transylvania but had to give up when the bulk of the Romanian Army entered this area. From June to August 1919 Eckhardt was head of the press department of the Foreign Ministry and Office of the Prime Minister (OPM) of the Szeged government; from November 1919 he headed the Foreign Policy Department of the High Command of the National Army of Miklós Horthy. In 1920–22 he headed the OPM Press Bureau, and from 1922 to 1926 he was an MP. In 1923 he left the ruling Unity Party. Along with Gyula Gömbös and Endre Bajcsy-Zsilinszky he founded a Fascist-like Hungarian National Independence Party (HNIP) and was one of its leaders. In the elections of 1926 he failed to win a mandate, and at the end of 1927 he left the HNIP and broke with the Fascist movement.

In 1928–30 Eckhardt was deputy chairman of the Hungarian Revisionist League, founded by Pál Teleki. During a trip to Western Europe and the United States he promoted the idea of a peaceful revision of the Hungarian borders fixed at Trianon in 1920. From December 1930 he belonged to the Independent Smallholders' Party (ISP), and in 1931–41 he was its MP. After the death of the ISP leader, Gaszton Gaál, in 1932 Eckhardt took the lead of the party. From 1933 to 1935 he was a delegate to the General Assembly of the League of Nations, where in 1934 he refuted accusations against Hungary connected with the assassination of the Yugoslav monarch, King Alexander I, and the French foreign minister, Louis Barthou. In the spring of 1934, in the name of the ISP, he concluded a secret cooperation agreement with Prime Minister Gömbös, but in view of electoral abuses he broke with Gömbös altogether. In the late 1930s Eckhardt was one of the leaders of the so-called defenders of the constitution, acting against dictatorial and Fascist tendencies. In foreign policy he favored a pro-British line. In 1940 he gave up the ISP leadership, and in the spring of 1941 he went to the United States to develop political contacts there. He founded the Movement for Independent Hungary there, but he failed to establish a government in exile. He also failed to improve the image of Hungary, since it finally declared war on the United States.

After World War II Eckhardt stayed in America. He lectured at Georgetown University in Washington, D.C. In 1948–54 he was a member of the Executive Committee of the Hungarian National Committee and headed its national defense commission. After numerous conflicts with key émigré politicians, in 1954 Eckhardt finally resigned from the committee. After the 1956 revolution he established First Aid for Hungary. Later he headed a Hungarian group in the American Republican Party. (JT)

Sources: Magyar Életrajzi Lexikon, vol. 3 (Budapest, 1981); Magyar Nagylexikon, vol. 6 (Budapest, 1998); Új Magyar Életrajzi Lexikon, vol. 2 (Budapest, 2001); Paul Nadanyi, The "Free Hungary" Movement (New York, 1942); John F. Montgomery, Hungary: The Unwilling Satellite (New York, 1947); Nicholas Horthy, Memoirs (Paris, 1954); Paul Ignotus, Hungary (London, 1972).

EDELMAN Marek (1 January 1919, Warsaw), Polish doctor and social activist of Jewish descent. From his youth Edelman was connected with the Socialist Bund. After 1939 he organized social life in the Warsaw Ghetto, strengthening the spirit of anti-German resistance; it resulted in the outbreak of an uprising on 19 April 1943. Edelman belonged to the command of the Jewish Fighting Organization (Żydowska Organizacja Bojowa [ŻOB]), and after the death of its leader, Mordekhai Anielewicz, he took the lead in the last stages of the fighting. After the uprising was suppressed by the Germans, Edelman was one of few survivors who managed to get out from the ruins. Along with a small ŻOB unit, he fought in the Warsaw Uprising of 1944. After the war he decided to stay in Poland, despite the Kielce pogrom of July 1946. In spite of pressure, he never joined the Communist Party. In the late 1950s he graduated in medicine from Łódź University and worked as a cardiologist in a hospital. Fired during the anti-Semitic Communist purge of 1967–68, he was also prevented from receiving his postdoctoral degree (habilitacja). Nevertheless, he continued to do research, the results of which were highly appreciated in Poland and abroad (for example, his study Zawał serca: Z doświadczeń oddziału intensywnej terapii [The infarct: From experience in an intensive care ward; 1979]).

In 1975 Edelman was a signatory of the "Letter of 101," protesting an amendment to the constitution that sanctioned the Communist Party's monopoly of power and a forced alliance with the USSR. From 1976 he was connected with the Committee for the Defense of Workers, and in September 1980 he joined the board of Solidarity for the Łódź region. Interned during the martial law period and released after protests from Western intellectuals, Edelman supported the underground Solidarity. In May 1984 he co-founded and was a member of a secret Łódź Solidarity Regional Executive Commission, rivaling the informal continuation of the union's Regional Board. In December 1988 he joined the Civic Committee of the Solidarity chairman, Lech Wałęsa, and became head of its commission for national minorities. In the spring of 1989 he took part in the Round Table Talks. During the dissolution of the Solidarity camp Edelman took the side of the Civic Movement–Democratic Action (Ruch Obywatelski-Akcja Demokratyczna [ROAD]) and then of the Democratic Union and Union of Freedom. As the last survivor of the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising command, Edelman belonged to the intellectual leaders whose opinions have always been noticed by the media. In 1999, his opinion, expressed in Germany, contributed to the decision to send Bundeswehr troops to the Balkans within the NATO land forces. He often criticized Israeli policies toward the Palestinians. He also sharply criticized the idea of the construction of a museum about Germans displaced from Eastern Europe after World War II. He authored the memoirs Ghetto Fights (1946; Getto walczy, 1983) and Strażnik: Marek Edelman opowiada (Guardman Marek Edelman tells his story; 1999), and he co-authored a book interview by Hanna Krall, Zdążyć przed Panem Bogiem (1977; To Steal a March on God, 1996). In 1998 Edelman was awarded the Order of the Polish White Eagle, and in 1999 he became an honorary citizen of Łódź. He was awarded honorary doctorates from Yale University and the University of Brussels. (AG)

Sources: Wielka encyklopedia PWN, vol. 8 (Warsaw, 2002) Opozycja w PRL: Słownik biograficzny 1956–89, vol. 1 (Warsaw, 2000); www.uml.lodz.pl/indeksik.php; zsm.interpab.com.pl/~comenius/jewish/edelman.htm, www.uw.org.pl/main/o_unii_wladze.php?id=18; www.midrasz.home.pl/1999/lis/lis99_1.html.

EENPALU Kaarel (originally Karl Einbund) (28 May 1888, Vesneri–28 January 1942, Kirov), Estonian politician. Eenpalu graduated in law from universities in Dorpat (Tartu) and Moscow. Later he worked as a journalist and belonged to a radical cultural-political organization, Noor Eesti (Young Estonia). From 1914 he was in the Russian Army. After graduating from an officer training school in St. Petersburg, he commanded an artillery division on the Austrian front. From 1918 he took part in the Estonian war of independence, organizing the police and territorial defense of Tartu, and he also commanded artillery units in battles against the Bolsheviks at Narva. From 1920

Eenpalu was president of the constitutional commission of the parliament and then minister of interior. He organized an efficient police force, so when on 1 December 1924 the Communists attempted a coup in Tallinn, the government quickly brought the situation under control. Eenpalu escaped an assassination attempt on his life. In 1926 he became president of the parliament, and he contributed to the consolidation of small peasant parties. From 19 July to 1 November 1932 he was riigivanen (president and prime minister), and then he again served as president of the parliament.

When in a referendum on 14–16 October 1933 the Fascist Estonian Union of Veterans of the War of Independence (Eesti Vabadussojalaste Liit [EVL]) gained ratification for its proposals for the constitution by a majority of Estonians (57 percent), Eenpalu supported the creation of a new government with Konstantin Päts at the head. This government was based on the Farmers' Party, Socialists, small groups from the center, and the minorities. When in January 1934 the constitution was implemented, Päts, as head of the government, was given great powers as interim head of state, and he would not renounce his prerogatives. Eenpalu joined the Farmers' Party, resigned from presiding over the parliament, and assumed the post of deputy prime minister and minister of interior. With arrests, he suppressed the discontent of the EVL, whose leadership planned an armed coup. As part of the Estonization of the country, in 1935 he changed his name to Eenpalu. After he stabilized his power, he pursued a more moderate policy and attempted to gain the support of wider circles of society for the government. From 9 May 1938 to 12 October 1939 Eenpalu was prime minister. He resigned after a treaty of mutual assistance between Estonia and the USSR was signed. The treaty provided for the partial occupation of the country by the Red Army. After Estonia was brought under complete control and was finally incorporated into the USSR, in July 1940 Eenpalu was arrested by the NKVD. Deported far inside the USSR, he died in a Soviet prison. (WR) Sources: Eesti Nookogude Entsuklopeedia, vol. 2 (Tallinn, 1974); Estonia: Population, Cultural and Economic Life (Tallinn, 1937); Jüri Poska, Probalica (Stockholm, 1965); Piotr Łossowski, Kraje bałtyckie na drodze od demokracji parlamentarnej do dyktatury (1918–1934) (Wrocław, 1972).

EGLĪTIS Andrejs (21 October 1912, Ļaudona, Livonia), Latvian poet. Eglitis graduated from high school in Riga in 1935. In 1937–40 he worked as a correspondent for the periodicals Brīvā Zeme and Rīts, and from 1939 to 1943 he edited Riga radio broadcasts. In 1943–45 he worked as a war correspondent at the Latvian Legion in Courland, created under the auspices of the Third Reich. In May 1945 he managed to escape to Sweden, where he settled down. His first collections, including Kristus un mīla (Christ and love; 1934), were characterized by a Romantic perception of the world and by trust in the vitality of a person and a nation. During the German occupation Eglītis published Nīcība (Meanness; 1942), and during his first years in exile, Uz vairoga (On the shield; 1946) and Nesaule (Non-sun; 1953), in which he contrasted good and evil, creating apocalyptic visions of the Latvian struggles for freedom and survival. The cantata-prayer Dievs, Tava zeme deg (O, God, Your land is burning! 1943) won recognition for its religious expression of the nation's suffering. In his five subsequent collections as well Eglītis combined a biblical style with Latvian folk song motifs, expressing the feelings of a nation in chains. He won numerous awards from Latvian organizations in exile. In 1998 he returned to Latvia, where he was awarded the Order of the Three Stars of Latvia. (EJ)

Sources: Latviešu rakstniecība biogrāfijās (Riga, 1992); Wileka encyklopedia PWN, vol. 8 (Warsaw, 2002); Vitauts Kalve, Mūžs un dziesma: Eglītis A. Uguns un vārdi (Eslingen, 1949); J. Zanders, Eglītis A. Vai vēl dievkociņš zied mātes kapu laukā (Stockholm, 1955); Edmunds Zirnītis, Andrejs Eglītis (Linkolna, 1980).

EHRlich Lambert (18 September 1878, Žabnice–26 May 1942, Ljubljana), Slovene Catholic priest and politician. Ehrlich studied in Innsbruck, Rome, Paris, and Oxford, and he earned his doctorate from the university in Innsbruck. He worked as a priest in Beljak and Klagenfurt, where between 1910 and 1919 he was professor at a theological seminary. As an expert on the issues of his native Carinthia, Ehrlich became a member of the Yugoslav delegation to the Paris Peace Conference in 1919. Then he lectured on the study of religion and on ethnography at the University of Ljubljana. An avowed opponent of communism, he was the spiritual leader of the Slovene Catholic youth. He had charge of the moderate academic club Straža (Guard), which was situated between the radical nationalism of the group Mladci (The Young) and the Christian socialism of the group Zarja (The Dawn). According to Ehrlich, Slovenia should have remained an independent country, confederated with a broader, supra-national European union. As an opponent of the guerrilla movement of Josip Broz Tito, Ehrlich was shot dead on the street in Ljubljana by a special Communist unit of the security service (Varnostno-Obščevalna Služba). (WR) Sources: Slovenski biografski leksikon, vol. 1 (Ljubljana, 1925); Enciklopedija Slovenije, vol. 1 (Ljubljana, 1987); Leopoldina Plut-Pregelj and Carole Rogel, Historical Dictionary of Slovenia (Lanham, Md., 1996).

ĒKIS Ludvigs (11 September 1892, Dobeles, Courland–7 July 1943, Washington, D.C.), Latvian diplomat. Ēkis was born into a peasant family. After graduating from a school in Riga, he studied at the Riga Polytechnic Institute. In 1914 he volunteered for the Russian Army. From September 1914 he was in German captivity, from which he was released in 1918. From December 1918 he was in the Latvian Army. In 1919, in recognition of his military merits, he was promoted to officer. Demobilized in 1920, he started working in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. From 1922 he was secretary of the legation in Germany and later in Finland. In 1925 he was appointed head of department in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. In 1928 he became councillor of the Latvian legation in London, and from 1931 he headed the Western States Department of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. From May 1934 to June 1938 he served as minister of finance, and then he was envoy to Poland and Hungary, with his headquarters in Warsaw. From September 1939 he was in Romania. He arrived there from Warsaw with the diplomatic corps and with the Polish government. From April to August 1939 he was also a Latvian envoy to Turkey. In July 1940 he left Romania for the United States. From January 1941 he served as economic councillor of the Latvian legation in Washington. In the United States, he published several works that promoted the Latvian cause—for example, Latvia: Struggle for Independence (1942) and The Truth about Bolshevik and Nazi Atrocities in Latvia. (EJ)

Sources: Latvijas darbinieku galerija (Riga, 1928); Latvijas vadošie darbinieki (Riga, 1935); Es viņu pazīstu (Riga, 1939).

EKREM Vlorë bey (1 December 1885, Valona [Vlorë]–29 March 1964, Vienna), Albanian politician. Ekrem was the son of Sürey bey Vlorë and Mihr Toptani, members of the most powerful Albanian families. Ferid Pasha Vlorë, the great vizier of Turkey from the beginning of the twentieth century, was his uncle. Ekrem was educated at home, and then in 1903 he graduated from the Gymnasium Theresianum in Vienna. In 1904, on the recommendation of his uncle, he became secretary for legal affairs in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of Turkey. In 1905 in Cannes he wrote his dissertation, Ziele und Zukunft der Albanesen (Goals and future of the Albanians), which was published in Österreichischen Rundschau in 1908. He increasingly identified with the issue of the independence of Albania, and after the Young Turk revolution of 1908 he founded the club Bashkimi (Unity) in Istanbul. At the beginning of the First Balkan War in 1912, Ekrem unsuccessfully attempted to gain support in Vienna for the cause of Albanian independence. After the proclamation of Albanian independence on 28 November 1912, Ismail Kemal appointed him senator and soon after vice-president of the Senate. In the summer of 1913, along with Ismail Kemal, Ekrem unsuccessfully tried to convince the Western powers to recognize Albania. When in March 1914, by will of the Western powers, Wilhelm von Wied became the ruler of Albania, Ekrem assumed the post of secretary general of the department of foreign affairs. After Wied left at the beginning of September 1914, Ekrem went to Italy, where he was interned throughout World War I. Released, he traveled in Western Europe.

In the elections at the end of 1922, Vlorë won a seat as a representative of Valona, and he aligned himself with Ahmed Zogu. After Fan Noli assumed power, Vlorë was temporarily arrested but was soon released. After the overthrow of Noli's government and the establishment of Zogu's dictatorship and his coronation, Ekrem again became an MP and a senator. In 1928 he became an envoy to London. After the Italian occupation of Albania in 1939 he took part in the Albanian government-in-exile, which was connected with King Zog. In 1944 he emigrated to Italy, where he was engaged in historical research and in writing his memoirs. He was the author of, for example, Kalaja e Kanines (Fortress in Kanines; 1961) and of two volumes of memoirs, published in 1968–73. A 1,500-page manuscript on the history of Turkish rule in Albania, written by Ekrem with Marie Amelie von Godin, is in the archives of the Südost-Institut in Munich. (WR) Sources: Biographisches Lexikon, vol. 6; Adalbert Gottfried, Das Problem der Albanischen Unabhängigkeit in den Jahren 1908–1914 (Vienna, 1970); John Swire, Albania: The Rise of a Kingdom (New York, 1971); Stefanaq Pollo and Arben Puto, The History of Albania from Its Origins to the Present Day (London, 1981); Jerzy Hauziński and Jan Leśny, Historia Albanii (Wrocław, 1992).

ELIADE Mircea (9 March 1907, Bucharest–22 April 1986, Chicago), Romanian historian of religions, writer, philosopher, and ethnologist. Eliade studied philosophy at the University of Bucharest and then at the University of Calcutta in India in 1928–31. In his youth, he was ideologically close to the extreme nationalist right. From 1933 to 1939 he lectured at the University of Bucharest. In 1940 he became cultural attaché in London and in 1941–44 in Lisbon. As he did not agree about the Sovietization of Romania, after the end of World War II he remained in exile. From 1945 to 1956 he lived in Paris, where he lectured at the École des Hautes Études for some time. Already then he was one of the leading researchers on myth and religion. From 1956 he lived in Chicago, where he was appointed to the chair of the history of religions at the University of Chicago. He was a critic of the Communist system, and he repeatedly spoke in defense of human rights, in Romania as well; therefore his works were not mentioned in Romania.

Eliade had a broad knowledge and tried to create an integral, autonomous scientific discipline. In his opinion, the modern world had lost the sense of the sacred. His philosophy aimed at trying to reconstruct human spirituality and a connection between humanity and the cosmos through giving a cosmic dimension to this connection and through uncovering the primordial myths and restoring the internal harmony of the world. Eliade won fame for his studies on the history of religion: Traité d'histoire des religions (1949; Patterns of Comparative Religion, 1958); Le mythe de l'éternel retour (1949; The Myth of the Eternal Return, 1954); The Sacred and the Profane (1959); De Zalmoxis à Gengis Han (1970; Zalmoxis, the Vanishing God: Comparative Studies in the Religions and Folklore of Dacia and Eastern Europe, 1972); and Histoire des croyances et des idées religieuses (1976; History of Religious Ideas, 1978). He also dealt with Indology—for example, he published Patanjali et le yoga (1962; Patanjali and Yoga, 1969); with Orientalism: Alchimia asiatică (Asiatic alchemy; 1934); Le chamanisme (1951; Shamanism: Archaic Techniques of Ecstasy, 1964); and with mythology: Images et symboles (1952; Images and Symbols: Studies in Religious Symbolism, 1961). Eliade thought that the revival of literature was possible only through discovering the function of myth. According to him, the role of literature was to capture the sacred in everyday life. In his prose we distinguish a realistic level—for example, in his works Isabel și apele diavolului (Isabel and the devil's waters; 1930); Maitreyi (1933; Bengal Nights, 1994); and Huliganii (The hooligans; 1935)—and a fantastic-mystical level—for example, La forêt interdite (1955; The Forbidden Forest, 1978; Romanian edition: Noaptea de Sânziene, 1971) and În curtea Dionis (1977; In Dionysus' Court, 1981). Sometimes a Hindu level is distinguished, as in Secretul Doctorului Honigberger (The secret of Dr. Honigberger; 1940). Diaries and memoirs play a special place in his writings: Șantier (1935); Mémoires (1907–1937) (Journey East, Journey West: 1907–1937, 1981); Fragments d'un journal (Fragments from a diary; 1973). Eliade also wrote essays: Soliloquii (1932); Oceanografie (Oceanography; 1934); Fragmentarium (“trans” 1939); Insula lui Euthanasius (The island of Euthanasius; 1943); Comentarii la legenda Mașterului Manole (Comments on the legend of Master Manole; 1943). Eliade went a long way from modernist obsessions to a peaceful and impersonal art of storytelling. He was also editor-in-chief of the sixteen-volume Encyclopedia of Religion (1987). (LW)

Sources: Dictionar Enciclopedic, vol. 2 (Bucharest, 1996); New York Times, 23 April 1986; Leonard S. Klein, Encyclopedia of World Literature in the Twentieth Century, vol. 2 (New York, 1982).

ELIAŠ Alois (29 September 1890, Prague–19 June 1942, Prague), Czech general, prime minister of the Protectorate of Bohemia and Moravia. During World War I Eliaš was an officer of the Czechoslovak Legions in Russia, and in 1917 he managed to get to France via the United States. In 1919 he took part in the Polish-Czechoslovak and the Czechoslovak-Hungarian fights in Slovakia. In 1921–23 he studied at a military academy in Paris. From 1924 he worked in the organization section of the general staff, and in 1929–31 he was head of the Czechoslovak delegation in the disarmament commission to the League of Nations in Geneva. In 1931–33 he was in command of an infantry brigade in Litoměřice; from 1933 to 1935 he commanded a division, and in 1935–38 he was commander of the Fifth Corps in Trenčín. From 1936 he was a major general. On 1 December 1938 he assumed the portfolio of communications. He served as minister of communications until the German invasion, and then on 27 April 1939 he became prime minister of the Protectorate of Bohemia and Moravia. Assuming this post, Eliaš pledged to President Edvard Beneš that he would do all he could for the occupied country, and he stated that if he did not accept the post, it would be taken over by villains. He repeatedly opposed Fascist pressure; for example, he refused to sign anti-Jewish laws and declined to swear loyalty to Hitler. Eliaš cooperated with the national resistance movement and was also in touch with the Czechoslovak government in London. After Berlin dismissed the diplomat Konstantin von Neurath as protector (Reichsprotektor) and Reinhard Heydrich assumed the post, on 27 September 1941 Eliaš was arrested, sentenced to death, and executed for cooperation with the resistance movement. He was promoted posthumously to the rank of general of the army. (PU)

Sources: ČSB; Kdo byl kdo v našich dějinách ve 20. Století, vol. 1 (Prague, 1998); Vojtech Masny, The Czechs under Nazi Rule (New York and London, 1971); T. Pasák, Generál Alois Eliaš a odboj, Slovo k historii (Prague, 1991); Robert Kvaček and Dušan Tomášek, General Alois Eliaš (Třebíč, 2001).

ENESCU Gheorghe (19 August 1881, Liveni, Romania–4 May 1955, Paris), Romanian composer, violinist, pianist, conductor, and teacher. Gifted with prodigious musical talent, at the age of five Enescu had already composed his first violin and piano work, România. At age seven he began his education at the Vienna Conservatory. As an eight-year-old, he played the violin part in the First Symphony by Johannes Brahms, under the baton of the composer. A year later he started to study at the Paris Conservatory, under the direction of Gabriel Fauré and Jules Massenet (among others). In January 1898 his Poema Română was performed publicly for the first time. After his studies, in 1899 Enescu began to tour the most important music stages of the world. He lived mostly in Paris, Bucharest, and Iași, where he conducted the local orchestras. Between 1901 and 1902 he composed the Romanian Rhapsodies, which won him great success. In 1902 in Paris he founded a trio, and in 1904 a quartet, named after him. In 1912 he funded an award for Romanian composers; it was granted until 1946. In 1920 he founded the Union of Romanian Composers and was its leader until 1948. As a violinist and conductor, he gave many concerts in (among other places) the United States and Great Britain. Each year he performed in France and Romania. He was a member of many artistic and scientific societies—for example, the Romanian Academy of Sciences and the Institut de France in Paris. Enescu's violin repertoire included works by Johann Sebastian Bach, Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart, and French composers. He educated many outstanding violinists—for example, Yehudi Menuhin.

Enescu's output in his early period is categorized under Neoromanticism. He used string instruments perfectly, and he often used counterpoint structures whose particular threads constantly dissipate. In this respect, he can be compared with such composers as Jean Sibelius, Béla Bartók, Manuel de Falla, and Karol Szymanowski. From Neoromantic technique and expression (e.g., The First Symphony of 1905), he moved toward a search in the field of Romanian folk music; therefore he is considered as the creator of the national style in Romanian music. He created many works of a national character—for example, Vox Maris. In 1936 the monumental opera Oedipus, the only one Enescu composed, was premiered. All together, he wrote five symphonies, the Violin Concerto (1921), two piano concertos, three orchestral suites, and many chamber works. After the overthrow of King Michael I in 1947 Enescu settled for good in Paris. Since he criticized the totalitarian system, he was almost ignored in Communist Romania. (LW)

Sources: Dictionar Enciclopedic, vol. 2 (Bucharest, 1996); Wielka encyklopedia PWN, vol. 8 (Warsaw, 2002); Bernard Gavoty, Les souvenirs de George Enescu (Paris, 1955); B. Kotlarov, George Enescu (Moscow, 1967); Gheorghe Sbârcea, Povestea vieții lui George Enescu (Bucharest, 1982).

ENGLIŠ Karel (17 August 1880, Hrabyně, Opava district–13 June 1961, Hrabyně), Czech economist, philosopher, lawyer, and politician. In 1904 Engliš graduated in law from the Czech University in Prague. After a short stay on scholarship in Munich, he worked as a clerk in a district statistical office in Prague. In 1908–11 he worked in the Ministry of Trade in Vienna. In 1910 he submitted his postdoctoral degree thesis; from 1911 he was associate professor, and from 1917 full professor, of economics at the Czech Polytechnic in Brno. On 15 November 1918, along with Alois Jirásek, he submitted a draft bill in parliament on the establishment of a second Czech university, with its seat in Brno, and soon he became a professor and the first rector of this university. From 1927 he was a member of the Czechoslovak Academy of Sciences and Arts. In 1939 he became professor at the Law Department of Charles University in Prague. From December 1947 to February 1948 he was its rector. In 1947 he was awarded the title of doctor honoris causa from Masaryk University in Brno.

In 1913–18, as a representative of the People's Progressive Party (Lidovo-Pokroková Strana), Engliš had a seat in the Moravian district parliament. In 1918 he was a member of the National Committee, and then until 1925 he was an MP of Czechoslovak National Democracy (Československá Národní Demokracie). He also sat on the parliamentary finance commission. In 1921, along with Jaroslav Stránský, Engliš formed the Moravian opposition wing of the party, which frequently criticized the party authorities. In the culmination of parliamentary conflict in 1925, he left the parliamentary club of the National Democrats, and he resigned his parliamentary seat. On three occasions—in 1920–21, 1925–28, and 1929–31—he served as minister of finance. Between 1934 and 1939, he was president of the Czechoslovak National Bank. In 1927 he carried out a budget and tax reform, cutting taxes and budget expenditures. In 1934 he devalued the Czech crown (koruna).

Engliš was the author of a teleological theory of the national economy. This theory put emphasis on the cognition of purposefulness in economic behavior. He was the author (among other works) of the following: Teleologie jako forma vědeckého poznání (Teleology as a form of scientific understanding; 1930); Peníze (Money; 1918); Národní hospodářství (1924; Economics: A Purpose Oriented Approach, 1992); Finanční věda (The science of finance; 1929); Teorie státního hospodářství (Theory of the state economy; 1932); Hospodářské soustavy (Economic systems; 1946); and the two-volume Soustava národního hospodářství (The system of the national economy; 1938), a synthesis of his economic views. Engliš developed his theory in Malá logika (Small logic; 1947) and in the manuscript “Velká logika” (Great logic). After the Communist coup in February 1948 Engliš was dismissed as rector of Charles University, and his works were removed from libraries. In 1952 he was forced to leave Prague. He went to his native

Hrabyně, where he wrote philosophical and economic works, the majority of which were never published. His scientific legacy is held in the archives of the National Museum in Prague. In 1990 in Prague the Karel Engliš Society was founded, and since 1994 Masaryk University in Brno has awarded the Karel Engliš Prize each year. (PU)

Sources: ČBS; Českoslovenští politici: 1918–1991 (Prague, 1991); Kdo byl kdo v našich dějinách ve 20. století, vol. 1 (Prague, 1998); Politická elita meziválečného Československa 1918–1938: Kdo byl kdo za první republiky (Prague, 1998); Slovník českých filozofů (Brno, 1998); Jaroslav Kolařík, Peníze a politika: Karel Engliš, bojovník o stabilizaci (Prague, 1937); František Vencovský, Karel Engliš (Brno, 1993); František Vencovský, Dějiny českého ekonomického myšlení (Brno, 1997).

ERBAN Evžen (18 June 1912, Vsetín–26 July 1994, Prague), Czech trade union activist and politician. From 1931 to 1935 Erban studied law at Charles University in Prague. In 1936–40 he was the secretary of several trade unions; between 1944 and 1945 he was a member of the Presidium of the illegal Central Council of Trade Unions, and until 1950 he was the council's secretary general. From 1945 to 1952 he had a seat in the National Assembly. Until 1948 he was a member of the leadership of Czechoslovak Social Democracy, and along with Zdeněk Fierlinger he sought cooperation with the Communist Party of Czechoslovakia (CPC). After the coup of February 1948 Erban was instrumental in liquidating the Social Democratic Party and incorporating it into the CPC. In June 1948 he became member of the Presidium of the Central Committee (CC) of the CPC, on which he sat until 1951. At that time he also served as minister of labor and social welfare. In 1952–63 he was head of the State Office for Social Welfare, and between 1963 and 1968 he was head of the State Administration of Material Reserves. In 1956 he became vice-president of the World Labor Confederation. In 1968 he was again made a member of the CC of the CPC; this was to show former Social Democrats that they were welcome in the CPC and that they should therefore not attempt to revive the Czech Social Democratic Party (ČSSD). However, the Social Democrats remembered Erban's role in the liquidation of the party and ignored the Communists' gesture. In 1969 Erban belonged to a commission that expelled reformers from the CC, and in 1971 he became a member of the Presidium of the CC of the CPC. In 1968 he initially served as secretary general of the CC of the National Front of the Czechoslovak Socialist Republic, and after František Kriegel was dismissed as chairman of the National Front, Erban took over Kriegel's post. In 1968–86 Erban was a member of the Czech National Council (CNC), and between 1969 and 1981 he served as CNC chairman. Between 1969 and 1990 he was also a member of the National Chamber of the National Assembly. In 1975–85 he was in charge of the Czechoslovak Society for International Relations. After an unsuccessful attempt to attend a congress of the revived Social Democracy, to which he was denied entrance, Erban left political life in 1990. (PU)

Sources: ČBS; Kdo byl kdo v našich dějinách ve 20. století, vol. 1 (Prague, 1998); Politická elita meziválečného Československa 1918–1938: Kdo byl kdo za první republiky (Prague, 1998); Who's Who in the Socialist Countries of Europe, vol. 1 (Munich, London, and Paris, 1989).

ERDEI Ferenc (24 December 1910, Makó–11 May 1971, Budapest), Hungarian writer and politician. The son of a landless peasant who acquired land through work, in 1933 Erdei graduated in law from the University of Szeged. Drafted into the army, he was sentenced to seven months in prison for an anti-government demonstration. As a student he was already interested in economics and sociology. His sociographic work, Futóhomok (Drift sand; 1937), won him recognition. Erdei joined a group of writers who explored the Hungarian countryside; in 1937 he was a co-founder of the leftist March Front, demanding land reform and political liberalization. In 1939 he co-founded the National Peasant Party (NPP), the creation of the so-called populist writers. In the 1930s and 1940s he published, among other things, Parasztok (Peasants; 1938); Magyar falu (Hungarian countryside; 1940); Magyar paraszt-társadalom (Hungarian peasant community; 1941); and Magyartanyák (Hungarian farms; 1942), in which he presented the situation of the Hungarian countryside. In 1939–44 he was active in the leftist political movement, and in 1943 he was briefly arrested.

In October 1944 Erdei joined the Hungarian National Independence Front, and in December 1944 he became deputy to the Provisional National Assembly in Debrecen. Later he was an MP until his death. From December 1944 to November 1945 he was minister of interior. In 1945 he was elected the NPP deputy chairman and in 1947, secretary general. Erdei favored unconditional cooperation with the Communists. From 1948 he was a corresponding member, and from 1956 a member, of the Hungarian Academy of Sciences (HAS), and from 1949 he was deputy chairman of the Hungarian Patriotic Front. From September 1948 to June 1949 he was minister of state, and until July 1953, minister of agriculture. He favored collectivization of the countryside. During the first government of Imre Nagy Erdei was minister of justice (July 1953–October 1954). From October 1954 to November 1955 he was minister of agriculture again, and then, until late October 1956, deputy prime minister. On 30 October 1956 he joined the second government of Nagy. He spoke in favor of a multiparty system and took part in the reorganization of the NPP. On 2 November he was appointed head of a delegation to negotiate the evacuation of Soviet troops from Hungary. The next day, during talks in the Soviet headquarters in Tököl, near Budapest, Erdei was arrested, along with other members of the delegation, by General Ivan Serov. After a month, he decided to support János Kádár, and he was released. From 1957 to 1964 he was the HAS general secretary; in 1964–70 he was secretary general of the Hungarian Patriotic Front and the HAS deputy chairman, and from 1970 until his death, he was HAS general secretary. From 1965 Erdei was a member of the Presidential Council and played an important role in the preparation of economic reforms that were never implemented. (JT)

Sources: Magyar Nagylexikon, vol. 7 (Budapest, 1998); A magyar forradalom és szabadságharc enciklopédiája, CD-ROM (Budapest, 1999); Új Magyar Életrajzi Lexikon, vol. 2 (Budapest, 2001); Paul Ignotus, Hungary (London, 1972); Ferenc Fekete, Erdei Ferenc agrárközgazdasági munkáiról, különös tekintettel a szövetkezeti elmétre (Budapest, 1984); Hans-Detlev Grothusen, ed., Ungarn (Göttingen, 1987); Steven Béla Várdy, Historical Dictionary of Hungary (Lanham, Md., 1997).

ERLICH Henryk [originally Hersz Wolf] (25 August 1882, Lublin–4 December 1941, Kuibyshev [now Samara]), Jewish Socialist activist and lawyer in Poland. The son of a miller, from his youth Erlich was active in Jewish leftist movements, and in 1903 he joined the Bund. Arrested in May 1904 and expelled from his studies at the University of Warsaw, after his release he went to study in Berlin, but after the outbreak of the 1905 revolution he returned to Warsaw, where he led a youth strike and edited the Bund paper Nasze hasło. Fearing arrest, Erlich left for Petersburg, where he graduated in law in 1908. Upon his return to the Congress Kingdom of Poland, he joined in Bund activities but was soon arrested and banned from the kingdom. In 1909–12 he traveled a lot on behalf of the party and was a consultant on Jewish affairs to Russian Social Democratic deputies in the Russian State Duma. He also represented the Bund in the Organization Committee of the Social Democratic Workers' Party of Russia (Mensheviks). In 1913 he was coopted to the Central Committee of the Bund, arrested, and released owing to tuberculosis.

From 1914 Erlich spoke in favor of the toppling of the tsar. After the February 1917 revolution he represented the Bund in the Executive Committee of the Petrograd soviet. He accepted the Bolshevik coup unwillingly and protested the idea of a dictatorship of the proletariat at the Second All-Union Congress of the Soviets (7–8 November 1917). From August 1918 he was back in Warsaw, where he co-organized the Executive Council of the Soviets. In 1919 Erlich was elected to the Warsaw City Council. He opposed the war against the Bolsheviks, which led to his brief arrest by the Polish authorities in 1920. From 1920 to 1939 he was active in the trade unions and in the Warsaw City Council, defending the interests of the Jewish poor. He was editor-in-chief of the Bund organ, Folks Tsaytung. He was against the entry of the Bund into the Communist International and opted for the party's cooperation with the Second International. He took part in its subsequent congresses as the Bund representative. Despite this, he defended Communists sued by the Polish authorities, and in 1934 he came out in favor of a united front of the left with the Communists.

After the German invasion of September 1939, Erlich left for eastern Poland, where, after the Soviet invasion, he was arrested by the NKVD on 4 October 1939. In July 1941 he was sentenced to death. The sentence was then commuted to ten years in a labor camp. After the outbreak of the German-Soviet war, Erlich was released as a Polish citizen in September 1941. Lavrenty Beria suggested that he preside over the International Jewish Anti-Fascist Committee. He agreed, but at the same time he resumed cooperation with the Polish government and favored the reconstruction of a united Polish army without separate Jewish units; the idea was supported by Polish National Democrats, on the one hand, and some Zionists, on the other. On 4 December 1941 Erlich was arrested again, along with Wiktor Alter, by the NKVD in Kuibyshev, this time on account of his alleged cooperation with Germany. On 23 December 1941 a Soviet court broke international law again by treating him as a Soviet citizen and sentencing him to death. Erlich was reported to have committed suicide. (AG)

Sources: Wielka encyclopedia PWN, vol. 8 (Warsaw, 2002); Słownik biograficzny działaczy polskiego ruchu robotniczego, vol. 2 (Warsaw, 1987); The Case of Henryk Erlich and Wiktor Alter (London, 1943); Henryk Erlich i Wiktor Alter (New York, 1951); Łukasz Hirszowicz, "NKVD Documents Shed New Light on the Fate of Ehrlich and Alter," East European Jewish Affairs, 1992, no. 2.

ESSAD Pasha Toptani (1863, Tirana–13 June 1920, Paris), Albanian politician. Essad was a member of a powerful feudal family from the area near Tirana. His family played an important role in the Turkish policy in Turkey and Albania. Essad was the son of Ali bey Toptani. From his father, he inherited one of the largest estates in Albania, between Tirana and Durrës. He started his career thanks to the support of his brother, Gani bey, a confidant of Sultan Abdulhamid. On behalf of the sultan, his brother committed many political murders, and then in 1902 he himself was murdered. After acquiring the family fortune, Essad served for some time as commander of the Turkish gendarmerie in Janina (now Ioánnina, Greece). In 1908 he joined the Young Turk movement and became deputy for Durrës in the Turkish parliament. During the Balkan Wars he played a rather dubious role, seeking to establish control over Albania. With his knowledge, and perhaps even on his orders, in January 1913 the Turkish commander of Shkodër, besieged by the Montenegrins, was murdered. This strengthened Essad's position as the rival of the Albanian government, which was created in December 1912 in Vlorë, under the leadership of Ismail Kemali. As a reward, Serbia and Montenegro supported his claims to the Albanian throne. At that time, the troops that were faithful to Essad controlled the middle of Albania, with Tirana and Durrës. In July 1913 Essad became minister of interior in the government of Ismail Kemali, but a month later he rebelled against him, and in October he established the Senate of Albania. When in February 1914 the great powers imposed Prince Wilhelm von Wied as the ruler of Albania, Essad was appointed minister of interior and of war in Wied's government. In May 1914 he attempted to lead another Albanian rebellion but was dismissed by the prince, and it was only owing to Italian intervention that he was allowed to leave for Brindisi.

The outbreak of World War I revived Essad's hopes. In August 1914 he arrived in Niš, where the Serb government evacuated from Belgrade was stationed. Essad obtained financial aid from Nikola Pašić, the Serb prime minister, in exchange for military actions against the Central Powers. After the departure of Prince Wied, in October 1914 Essad arrived in Durrës with a group of warriors, proclaiming himself head of the Albanian government and commander-in-chief of the army. Meanwhile, an anti-feudal uprising led by Haxhi Qamil undermined his power. The People's Assembly in Tirana, which was an emanation of the insurgent troops, issued a manifesto to the countries that were fighting. In this manifesto, they declared their neutrality and announced their intention of overthrowing Essad's government. The Serbian Army intervened, saving Essad from being surrounded in Durrës and bloodily suppressing the insurgents. When the Bulgarian Army seized Macedonia, the Serbs had to withdraw. Following the Serbian Army, Essad again escaped to Italy. The Italian government was willing to place him on the Albanian throne on condition that he sever ties with other countries. Essad did not agree to that, and he sought support in France. The French authorities were counting on the Albanian troops in the war in the Balkans; therefore they supported Essad and helped him to establish an Albanian “government-in-exile” in Salonika; however, they did not intend to give him power. Essad’s ambitions became unrealistic in the face of a secret London treaty in April 1915; in it the Entente agreed to the partition of Albania between Greece and Italy. In exchange, Greece and Italy would enter the war on the side of the Entente.

When the Austro-Hungarian Army seized a great part of Albanian territory in the spring of 1916, Essad again went to France. At the Paris Peace Conference in 1919 he still attempted to gain the Entente’s mandate for his “government-in-exile” but without success. Later, with the help of Osman Bali and Halida Lleshi, his co-workers, he tried to instigate a rebellion in Albania. In June 1920 he made an agreement with the Yugoslav authorities that in exchange for incorporating Albania into the Kingdom of Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes, he would be given a life governorship in the Albanian part of the kingdom. Essad was so hated in the country that many Albanians sought an opportunity to kill him. On 13 June 1920 he was shot and killed at the Hotel Continental in Paris by Avni Rustemi, an Albanian student. In 1919 in Paris Essad published his Mémoire sur l’Albanie (Memoirs from Albania). (WR)

Sources: Biographisches Lexikon, vol. 4; Neue Zürcher Zeitung, 11–15 June and 29–30 November 1920; Vlora Eqrem Bey, Lebenserinnerungen, vols. 1–2 (Munich, 1969–73); John Swire, Albania: The Rise of a Kingdom (New York, 1971); Stefanaq Pollo and Arben Puto, The History of Albania from Its Origins to the Present Day (London, 1981); Jerzy Hauziński and Jan Leśny, Historia Albanii (Wrocław, 1992); Miranda Vickers, The Albanians: A Modern History (London, 1995); Tadeusz Czekalski, Albania w latach 1920–1924–aparatus państwowy i jego funkcjonowanie (Katowice, 1998).

ESTERHÁZY János (14 March 1901, Nyitraújlak [now in Slovakia]–8 March 1957, Mírov, Bohemia), count, Hungarian politician from Czechoslovakia. Esterházy graduated from the Trade Academy in Budapest. After the Treaty of Trianon (1920) he stayed in Czechoslovakia and managed an estate of some six hundred acres, left after the confiscation of the family latifundium of about six thousand acres during the Czechoslovak land reform. In 1932–36 he presided over the Home Christian Socialist Party, and from July 1936 to November 1938, over the United Hungarian Party (UHP). From 1935 to 1938 he was a member of the Czechoslovak parliament. He spoke in favor of the full autonomy of Slovakia and Transcarpathian Ruthenia within the Czechoslovak state and of minority rights for the Hungarians compatible with international standards. An opponent of Nazism and communism, in the late 1930s Esterházy distanced his party from the radical methods of the Sudeten Germans, and he did not take part in the partition of Czechoslovakia.

After the First Vienna Award in November 1938, when Hungary was given South Slovakia, 85 percent of whose inhabitants were Hungarians, Esterházy remained within Czechoslovakia. After its dismemberment in March 1939, as the leader of the Hungarian Party (successor to the UHP), he became the leader of about seventy thousand Hungarians within the Slovak state. In 1939 he founded the so-called Hungarian Household Movement, aiming at the preservation of Hungarian national identity. Despite German and Slovak pressures, Esterházy refused to reorganize this movement along Fascist lines, and he distanced himself from the extreme right. In 1941 he founded and presided over the only Hungarian institution in Slovakia, the Savings Bank in Bratislava, and he was the only Hungarian deputy to the Slovak parliament. In May 1942 he was the only deputy to vote against the deportation of Slovak Jews. In December 1944 the (Fascist) Arrow Cross activists arrested him briefly in Budapest, and at the end of the war he went into hiding since he was wanted by the German police. In April 1945 he was arrested by the Czechoslovak authorities, which in June 1945 handed him over to the Soviet military organs. Deported to Russia, in June 1946 Esterházy was sentenced in Moscow to ten years of forced labor. In September 1947 in Bratislava he was tried in absentia for contributing to the “Fascistization” of Slovakia, and he was sentenced to death for “national treason.” In April 1949 the Soviet authorities transferred him to Communist Czechoslovakia, where his sentence was commuted to life imprisonment and, in May 1955, to twenty-five years in prison. Esterházy was already seriously ill with tuberculosis, which accelerated his death. In January 1993 he was rehabilitated in Russia and later also in Slovakia. (JT)

Sources: Magyar Nagylexikon, vol. 7 (Budapest, 1998); Nagy Képes Milleniumi Arcképcsarnok (Budapest, 1999); Új Magyar Életrajzi Lexikon, vol. 2 (Budapest, 2001); Gabor Szent-Irany, Count Janos Esterhazy: Life and Work of the Great Son of the Hungarian Highland (Astor, Fla., 1987); Imre Molnár, Esterházy János, 1901–1957 (Dunaszerdahely, 1997).

ESTREICHER Stanisław (26 November 1869, Kraków–28 December 1939, Oranienburg), Polish historian of law and bibliographer. Estreicher belonged to a well-known family of Kraków scholars. He was the son of the bibliographer and historian of literature Karol Józef Estreicher (1827–1908), brother of the chemist Tadeusz Estreicher (1871–1952), and father of the bibliographer Karol Estreicher (1906–1984). He graduated from the Jagiellonian University in Kraków; from 1902 he was a professor there, and in 1919–21, rector. From 1912 he was a member of the Academy of Arts and Sciences, and from 1919, a member of the Polish Academy of Arts and Sciences. During World War I he supported the Supreme National Committee and the pro-Austrian orientation. In independent Poland he was active in the (conservative) National Right Party (Stronictwo Prawicy Narodowej). Although he opposed the May 1926 coup d'état by Józef Piłsudski, he favored the cooperation of the conservatives with the ruling sanacja. After the Brest Trial of the opposition leaders (1931–33), Estreicher went into opposition against the sanacja's authoritarianism, and in 1933 he protested the limitations on the autonomy of universities. His major scholarly accomplishment was the continuation of the monumental Bibliografia polska (Polish bibliography), which recorded Polish publications and foreign Polonica from the fifteenth to the twentieth centuries; he started co-editing it with his father in 1887. After the latter's death, Estreicher edited the work by himself and published volumes 23 to 33 between 1910 and 1939; he also supplemented the bibliographical entries and subject bibliographies and made corrections. He also authored Początki prawa umownego (The beginnings of contract law; 1901); Kodeks Hammurabiego (The Code of Hammurabi; 1905); Najstarsze kodeksy prawne świata (The oldest legal Codes in the world; 1931); and Kultura prawnicza w Polsce XVI wieku (The legal culture in Poland in the sixteenth century; 1931). After Kraków was seized by the Germans, in early November 1939 Estreicher, along with a group of university professors, was arrested by the Gestapo, and he died in a concentration camp. (WR) Sources: PSB, vol. 6; Encyklopedia historii Drugiej Rzeczypospolitej (Warsaw, 1999); Wielka encyklopedia PWN, vol. 8 (Warsaw, 2002); Lista strat kultury polskiej, vol. 2 (Glasgow, 1945); Henryk Barycz, "Stanisław Estreicher i rozwój jego twórczości naukowej," Pamiętnik Literacki, 1946, nos. 1–2.

EVANGJELI Pandeli (1859, Korçë–September 1949, Korçë), Albanian independence activist and diplomat.

From his youth Evangjeli lived in Bucharest, where he was engaged in trade. His café there was a meeting place for the local Albanians. He also distributed printed materials that were published in Istanbul and Egypt and were devoted to the Albanian cause. In 1896 Evangjeli was elected president of the Dituria (Knowledge) association, and a year later he became head of the Albanian colony in Bucharest. After the creation of the government of Ismail Kemal in 1912 Evangjeli offered the government financial aid from the colony in Bucharest. After his return to Albania, in 1914 he served for a short time as prefect of Berat. He spent the war period in Bucharest, and in 1919 he was elected as a representative of the Albanian colony in Romania to the Paris Peace Conference. In 1921 he moved to Tirana, and the same year he became an MP for the Korçë district in the Constituent Assembly. He became minister of foreign affairs in the Ilias Bey Vrioni government, which was created in February 1921. On 16 October 1921 Evangjeli was elected prime minister for the first time, but on 6 December of that year he was forced to resign. He returned to politics after King Ahmed Zogu took over power in 1925. In 1927–30 he served as president of the parliament, and between 5 March 1930 and 22 October 1935 he was again head of the government. In 1935, confronted with famine, he called for aid from the International Red Cross. In 1937 he was reelected president of the parliament. He resigned after the Italian aggression, and he did not accept any political proposals put forward by the Italians. In 1947, owing to his difficult financial situation, Evangjeli left Tirana and moved to his native Korçë, where he spent the last years of his life. (TC)

Sources: Biographisches Lexikon, vol. 1; Michael Schmidt-Neke, Entstehung und Ausbau der Königsdiktatur in Albanien (1912–1939), Regierungsbildungen, Herrschaftsweisen und Machteliten in Einen Jungen Balkanstaat (Munich, 1987); Sejfi Vllamasi, Ballafaqime politike në Shqipëri (1897–1942) (Tirana, 1995); Tadeusz Czekalski, Albania w latach 1920–1924 (Katowice, 1998); Blendi Fevziu, "Pandeli Evangjeli, politikani pa fame," Klan, 14 January 2001.

F

FADENCHECHT Yosif (24 November 1873, Trapezunt–27 October 1953, Sofia?), Bulgarian lawyer and politician. Fadenchecht came from a Jewish family from the Habsburg empire. His mother came from Vienna and his father from Kraków. They were one of the few Ashkenazi families in the Bulgarian Jewish society, which was dominated by the Sephardim. Fadenchecht attended a gymnasium in Plovdiv and Sofia. He studied law and philosophy at the University of Leipzig and received a Ph.D. in 1897. He continued his studies in Sofia, Bologna, and Turin. After returning to Bulgaria, he became a professor of law at the university in Sofia, and in 1906 he became a member of the Academy of Sciences. He published many works, including the famous Sistema na bylgarskoto veshtno pravo (The system of Bulgarian press law; 1902). In 1908 he started to practice law and he gave up teaching. At that time he aligned himself with the opposition Radical Party, which was of a democratic and liberal nature. He was against Bulgaria's entry into World War I on the side of Germany. However, at the end of the war he accepted the post of minister of justice in the cabinet of Aleksandur Malinov (June–November 1918). In 1922–23, together with other members of the cabinet, he was imprisoned by the regime of Aleksandur Stamboliyski. After the war Fadenchecht was initially active as a member the Bar Council, and in 1930 he became its president. He also joined the Democratic Party. He published the monumental work Bylgarsko grazhdansko pravo (Bulgarian civic law; 1929). He was a champion of cooperation between Yugoslavia and Bulgaria. He survived World War II, and, like the majority of Bulgarian Jews, he avoided anti-Semitic persecutions. In July 1944 he was reelected president of the Bar Council. (MC)

Sources: Biographisches Lexikon, vol. 1; Entsiklopediya Bulgariya, vol. 7 (Sofia, 1996); Wer ist's? Zeitgenossenlexikon (Leipzig, 1909); Angel Dzhabazov, Pravosudatna sistema na Bylgariia, 1878–1944 (Sofia, 1990); Boris Spasov et al., Almanakh na uridicheskii fakultet pri Sofiiskii universitet "Sv. Kliment Okhridski," 1892–1992 (Sofia, 1992); Tzvetan Todorov, ed., The Fragility of Goodness: Why Bulgaria's Jews Survived the Holocaust (London, 1999).

FALTER Alfred (25 July 1880, Ropa–1954, New York), Polish businessman of Jewish descent, one of the richest industrialists in interwar Poland. Initially Falter was a spokesman of the Upper Silesian tycoons, mainly those connected with German coal mining. He was a delegate to the International Commission of War Indemnities, founded according to the Treaty of Versailles of June 1919. In 1922 he was an economic expert of the Polish delegation to the Geneva conference on Upper Silesia. In 1922–32 he was among the authorities of the Upper Silesian Union of Coal and Steel Entrepreneurs, and from 1932 he was one of the chairmen of the Central Union of Polish Industry. From 1924 to 1939 he was a member of the board of the Bank of Poland (Bank Polski), and from 1932 to 1939, a member of the board (and from 1935, deputy chairman) of the Polish Steel Convention and the International Trade Chamber. He chaired and owned the majority of shares in the Upper Silesian Union of Coal Mines–Robur, which controlled 35 percent of coal sales in Poland. In 1928 he founded the Polish-Scandinavian transportation society Polskarob S.A. From October 1939 he was deputy minister in the government-in-exile of General Władysław Sikorski. In 1942 he left for the United States, where, making use of capital deposited there before the war, he managed a shipping company. (WR) Sources: Encyklopedia historii gospodarczej Polski, vol. 1 (Warsaw, 1981); Wielka encyklopedia PWN, vol. 8 (Warsaw, 2002); Jan Kofman, Lewiatan a podstawowe zagadnienia ekonomiczno-polityczne Drugiej Rzeczypospolitej (Warsaw, 1986).

FALUDY György (22 September 1910, Budapest), Hungarian poet, writer, and translator. After graduating from a Calvinist high school in his hometown in 1928, Faludy studied at the universities in Budapest, Berlin, and Graz. He made his literary debut in periodicals of the Hungarian Social Democratic Party, which he joined in 1931. He won recognition for his translations of François Villon. From 1938 he lived in Paris; after the German invasion he lived in Algiers, and from 1941, in the United States. He was active in the Hungarian anti-Fascist émigré community, and for three years he also served in the U.S. Army. After returning to Hungary in 1946, Faludy contributed literary articles to the trade union daily Népszava. In 1950 he was arrested by the Communist police and put in a special camp for the intelligentsia in Recsk (in northern Hungary). For almost three years he created moving poems, memorized and later recorded by his prison mates after his release. After Stalin's death, in 1953 Faludy was released, but he refused to apply for rehabilitation. In 1954–56 he made his living by translating. After the suppression of the 1956 revolution he emigrated to Great Britain and later to Italy, Malta, and the United States. From 1967 he lived either in the United States or in Canada. From 1957 to 1962 he was editor of the leading periodical of the Hungarian émigré community, Irodalmi Újság. At the same time he was secretary of the International PEN club. From the mid-1960s he taught literature at American and Canadian universities. He returned to Hungary in 1989 and continued his literary activity. He founded his own cultural foundation (Faludy Alapítvány) and twice ran in parliamentary elections, though without success. Faludy's fascination with French lyrics and his great erudition placed him in the last generation of writers connected with the leading interwar literary periodical, Nyugat. Wartime travels, Communist repression, and long-term emigration added to Faludy's works a sad reflection on human nature. His major works include Villon balladái (Villon's ballads; 1937); My Happy Days in Hell (1962); East and West (1978); Notes from the Rainforest (1988); and Börtönversek 1950–1953 (Prison poems, 1950–1953; 1989). (MS)

Sources: Maty słownik pisarzy węgierskich (Warsaw, 1977); Béla Pomogáts, "Ezeregyszáz vers," Élet és Irodalom, 1989, no. 15; Faludy György költő, film, 1987; Béla Pomogáts, Faludy György (Budapest, 2000).

FARKAS Mihály (18 July 1904, Abaújszántó–6 December 1965, Budapest), Hungarian Communist activist. From his youth, Farkas was involved in the Communist movement in Hungary and Czechoslovakia. In the 1920s he went to the USSR, where he was active in Youth International. In July 1929, under the name "Wolf," he spoke on behalf of the Hungarian Communist Party (HCP) at a meeting of the Executive Committee of the Comintern. In 1935 he became a deputy member of the Presidium of the Comintern's Executive Committee. At that time he used the alias "Mikhail." In this role he went on special missions—for example, to Spain. During World War II he was the secretary of the Executive Committee of the Comintern, the highest-ranking Hungarian in this organization.

In 1944 Farkas came to Hungary and assumed the post of deputy minister of interior in the coalition government of General Béla Miklós-Dálnoki. In this role he co-organized many arrests and much torture and blackmail, which enabled the Communists, who were supported by the occupying Red Army, to come to power in Hungary. Farkas was responsible for (among other things) the arrest and investigation of Béla Kovács, the secretary general of the Smallholders' Party, and the arrests of other activists of the party. In September 1947 Farkas was a member of the Hungarian delegation to the founding congress of the Communist Information Bureau (Cominform) in Szlarska Poręba. In 1948 he became minister of defense, and in this role he carried out a brutal purge of the Hungarian Army. After the Communists absorbed the rest of the Social Democratic Party in June 1948 Farkas remained in the Secretariat and in the Politburo of the Central Committee (CC) of the Hungarian Workers' Party. In June 1948 he represented the party at the Cominform meeting in which Tito was denounced. Despite his Jewish origins, Farkas had no scruples about the anti-Semitic purge that was conducted at the end of the 1940s. In 1949, under the eye of Mátyás Rákosi, he supervised the case of László Rajk and prepared his trial. In 1952 Farkas was promoted to general. After Stalin's death and following the establishment, under pressure from Moscow, of the "collective leadership" in the summer of 1953 Farkas supported Imre Nagy, who became prime minister. After Nagy's fall in 1955 Farkas lost his post, and after the Twentieth CPSU Congress he was ousted from the party's CC.

Even before the revolution, on 13 October 1956, Farkas was arrested, soon after the arrest of his son, a colonel in the security police AVH (Államvédelmi Hatóság). However, he was released after the revolution was suppressed. Soon after he was imprisoned again; in April 1957 he received a fourteen-year prison sentence for the "infringement of socialist law and order," and he became the main scapegoat of Stalinism in Hungary. Released ahead of time in 1960, Farkas died of a heart attack. (WR) Sources: Magyar Eletrajzi Lexikon, vol. 1; Tamas Aczel and Tibor Meray, The Revolt of the Mind (London, 1961); Bennet Kovrig, Communism in Hungary from Kun to Kadar (Stanford, 1970); Branko Lazitch, Biographical Dictionary of the Comintern (Stanford, 1986).

FAZEKAS György (6 June 1914, Miskolc–22 May 1984, Budapest), Hungarian writer and journalist. After graduating from high school in Miskolc, Fazekas worked as a journalist, publishing mostly in the local paper, Felső-Magyarország. During World War II he served in the army and was taken prisoner of war by the Soviets. After the war he joined the Hungarian Communist Party (from 1948 the Hungarian Workers' Party) and worked for the central party organ, Szabad Nép. During the "thaw" after Stalin's death, Fazekas joined the group of reform-oriented followers of Imre Nagy. At the same time he published the novels Emberrabló (Thief of people; 1953) and Csodálatos utazás (Miraculous journey; 1954). During the 1956 revolution Fazekas was a member of Nagy's secretariat. When the Soviet troops entered Budapest, in November 1956 he sought shelter in the Yugoslav Embassy. On leaving it, he was deported to Romania. In the trial of Nagy and his aides in the summer of 1958, Fazekas was sentenced to ten years in prison. Amnestied in 1963, he was banned from working as a journalist and took casual jobs. In 1968 he was accepted back as editor of the Budapest daily Magyar Hírlap. In the 1970s and 1980s he wrote his memoirs, publishing Miskolci toronyóra (The Miskolc clock tower; 1976) and Menedékjog—1956 (The right of asylum—1956; 1989). (MS)

Sources: The Truth about the Nagy Affair: Facts, Documents, Comments (London, 1959); András Pályi, "Az újságíró önéletrajza," Élet és Irodalom, 1977, no. 6; Judit Ember, Menedék jog—1956: A Nagy Imre csoport elrablása (Budapest, 1989); Új magyar irodalmi lexikon (Budapest, 1994).

FEDAK Stepan (9 January 1861, Przemyśl–6 January 1937, Lwów [Lviv]), Ukrainian lawyer, banker, and social activist. Fedak graduated from the Academic Gymnasium in Lwów, and he completed his law studies at the local university. From 1890 he practiced law. He co-founded and participated in the government of many of the institutions of economic life in Lwów: the cooperative bank, Centrobank; the Audit Union of Ukrainian Cooperative Societies; the Land Mortgage Bank; and the life insurance society Karpatia. He was a member of the board of Narodna Torhivlia, a founding member of the mutual insurance society Dnister, and its director between 1909 and 1920; in 1913–18 he was vice-president of the National Bank in Lwów. In 1915 he was deported by the Russians to Kiev, where he conducted activities to aid war victims in Galicia. He returned to Lwów in 1916. From November 1918 he was secretary for provisions in the Western Ukrainian National Republic. In December 1918, after the capture of Lwów by Polish troops, Fedak founded the Civic Committee, which represented the Ukrainian people to the authorities and which helped captives, internees, and political prisoners. Until the end of his life Fedak chaired an unofficial committee for aid to political prisoners. He also remained a member of the Staupogipal Institute and an honorary member of the Prosvita Society. His daughters married the leaders of the Organization of Ukrainian Nationalists (OUN): Yevhen Konovalets and Andriy Melnyk. His son, Stepan Fedak (pseudonym "Dragon," 1901–45), a member of the Ukrainian Military Organization, made an unsuccessful attempt on the life of Józef Piłsudski, head of the Polish state, on 25 November 1921 in Lwów. (TS)

Sources: Encyclopedia of Ukraine, vol. 1 (Toronto, 1985); Matthew Stachiv and Jaroslav Sztendera, eds., Western Ukraine at the Turning Point of Europe's History, 1918–1923, vols. 1–2 (New York, 1971); Ryszard Torzecki, Kwestia ukraińska w Polsce 1923–1929 (Kraków, 1989).

FEDORCHUK Vitalyi (December 1918, Zhytomyr), Communist security officer in the Ukraine. After graduating from a military school and from a higher NKVD school, in 1939 Fedorchuk started his career in the security apparatus, quickly gaining the reputation of a ruthless Chekist. In 1940 he joined the Communist Party. In 1943–47 he was an officer of the "Smersh" and then, until 1970, of the military intelligence, GRU (glavnoe razvedyvatelnoe upravlenie). In 1944–47 he commanded MVD (Ministerstvo vnutryennikh del) troops fighting against the Ukrainian Insurgent Army, and in 1946 he took an active part in the liquidation of the formal structures of the Greek Catholic Church and in the persecution of its bishops and clergy. Then he was sent on a mission to Vienna. In December 1953 he took part in the kidnapping of the Czech émigré politician Bohumil Laušman, who was later imprisoned in Czechoslovakia. In 1955 he returned to Moscow, where he graduated from the Higher School of the KGB. From 1957 he headed the counter-intelligence of the Soviet Army stationed in East Germany. In 1967, when Yuri Andropov took over the KGB, Fedorchuk became head of its Military Intelligence Department.

In July 1970 Fedorchuk took over the KGB of the Ukrainian SSR. He used all means of repression against independent activists: arrests and deportations to labor camps, treacherous assassinations, and imprisonment in psychiatric wards. After the fall of Petro Shelest in 1973, in September 1974 Fedorchuk became a deputy member, and in 1976 a member, of the Politburo of the Central Committee of the Communist Party of Ukraine. In January 1972 he intensified the repression against the democratic opposition—for instance, against the Ukrainian Helsinki Group; therefore democratic opposition circles called him the "butcher of Ukraine." In the summer of 1981 Fedorchuk publicly warned about the dangers of alleged counterrevolution in Poland. Connected with the "Dnepropetrovsk Mafia" of Leonid Brezhnev and with the head of the KGB, Andropov, he gained a powerful position in the Soviet hierarchy. When Andropov was getting ready to succeed Brezhnev and resigned from the KGB, on 26 May 1982 Fedorchuk was appointed his successor. When Brezhnev died in November 1982 and when Andropov became secretary general of the Soviet party, Fedorchuk ceded the position of head of the KGB to Victor Chebrikov and assumed the position of the Soviet minister of interior. These steps strengthened Andropov's control of the ministry, which had rivaled the KGB. As minister of interior, Fedorchuk implemented Andropov's policies, which were aimed at sharpening discipline in the party and in the society. During perestroika, in January 1986 Fedorchuk was sidelined to the position of inspector in the Ministry of National Defense, and then he retired. He was never held responsible for his policies. (WR) Sources: Encyclopedia of Ukraine, vol. 1 (Toronto, 1984); Archie Brown, ed., The Soviet Union: A Biographical Dictionary (London, 1990); Peter Deriabin and T. H. Bagley, "Fedorchuk, the KGB, and the Soviet Succession," Orbis, 1982, vol. 26, no. 3; Zhores Medvedev, Andropov (New York, 1983); Michael Parrish, Soviet Security and Intelligence Organizations, 1917–1990 (New York, 1992); Bohdan Nahaylo, The Ukrainian Resurgence (Toronto, 1999).

FEDORYK Yosafat Yosif (20 December 1897, Yaroslavl–28 December 1979, Stryi), bishop of the Ukrainian underground Greek Catholic Church in the USSR. In 1924–28 Fedoryk studied theology in Rome, and he earned a Ph.D. there. Until 1939 he worked in a Greek Catholic parish in Ostrów, near Przemyśl. During the Soviet and German occupations he served as prior (hegumen) of the Basilian monasteries in the diocese of Przemyśl. In September 1945 he was arrested by the Soviet authorities but was released. After the decision of the “Lviv ecumenical council” of March 1946 to dissolve the Greek Catholic Church and after its absorption into the Orthodox Church, Fedoryk continued his unofficial pastoral work. Arrested again in 1952, he spent many years in prisons in Lviv and the Donbas and in many labor camps (for example, in Karaganda), where at the end of his life he was ordained bishop by Bishop Oleksandr Khira. Fedoryk died soon after his release. (WR)

Sources: Martirolohia ukrain's'kikh tserkov u chetyriokh tomakh, vol. 2 (Toronto, 1985); Bohdan R. Bociurkiw, The Ukrainian Greek-Catholic Church and the Soviet State (1939–1950) (Edmonton, 1996).

FEDUN Petro (also known under the pseudonym of Petro Poltava) (1919, Shniryv, county of Brody–23 December 1951, near Ivano-Frankivsk), Ukrainian nationalist politician. In 1940 Fedun was inducted into the Red Army. After the outbreak of the German-Soviet war he was taken prisoner but was released thanks to the efforts of his parents. In 1941 he enrolled in the department of medicine in the university in Lviv (Lwów). Between 1940 and 1943 he organized the OUN Youth (Yunatstvo OUN, the youth unit of the Organization of Ukrainian Nationalists), and he was the editor of its press organ, Yunak. In 1944 Fedun became a member of the OUN-B, Provid; a major in the Ukrainian Insurgent Army (UPA); and deputy president of the General Secretariat of the Ukrainian Supreme Liberation Council (USLC) and head of its Information Bureau. He was one of the most famous and one of the most imaginative publicists of the Ukrainian underground. He thought that the organized struggle of the underground and the insurgent units of the UPA helped to mobilize the masses and prevented them from capitulation. He emphasized the similarities between Nazism and communism. He also advocated the democratization of the OUN. In August 1950 he sent the Appeal of the Ukrainian Underground to the U.S. Department of State and to the Voice of America. Fedun was killed in the Ukraine in a clash with the functionaries of the Soviet security organs. He authored such works as Kontseptsia samostiinoi Ukrainy i osnovna tendentsiia politychnoho rozvytku suchasnoho svitu (The concept of an independent Ukraine and the basic tendencies of political development of the modern world; 1947) and Bezposeredn'o za shcho my vedemo nash bii (What we are actually fighting for; 1949). His works were secretly conveyed by couriers to the West, and in 1959 they were published under the title Zbirnyk pidpilnykh pysan' (Collection of underground writings) in Munich. (GM)

Sources: Entsyklopediia Ukrainoznavstva, vol. 4; Encyclopedia of Ukraine, vol. 4 (Toronto, 1993); The Ukrainian Insurgent Army in a Fight for Freedom (New York, 1954); Ryszard Torzecki, Polacy i Ukraińcy: Sprawa ukraińska w czasie II wojny światowej na terenie II Rzeczypospolitej (Warsaw, 1993); Anatol Kaminskyi, Vasyl Okhrymovich (Toronto, New York, and London, 1999).

FEIERABEND Ladislav (14 June 1891, Kostelec, on the Orlice River–15 August 1969, Villach, Austria), Czech politician and economist. Feierabend completed high school in Hradec Králové, and in 1915 he graduated in law from the Czech University in Prague. During his studies he was also on scholarship in Oxford and Neuchâtel, Switzerland. In 1915–17 he worked in the judiciary system, and then he co-organized the agricultural cooperative movement. In 1917–25 he was secretary of the Central Association of Cooperative Societies; then he was director, and from 1930 managing director, of Kooperativa, an association for purchasing agricultural farms. From 1930 he was president of Prague's agricultural exchange, and from 1934, president of the Czechoslovak Grain Association and vice-president of Czechoslovak Export Enterprises. One of the leading economists of the Agrarian Party, Feierabend published extensively. During the Second Republic (1938–39) he served as minister of agriculture, and initially he was also minister of justice. Until January 1940 he served as minister of agriculture in the government of the Protectorate of Bohemia and Moravia, and at the same time he was one of the co-founders of the national resistance movement. He represented the Agrarians in the Political Center (Politické Ústředí), and he maintained foreign contacts. In January 1940 he fled to France via Hungary and Yugoslavia. In France he started to work with the resistance movement. From 1941 he was finance minister in the Czechoslovak government-in-exile. He was often critical of President Edvard Beneš, especially about the latter's attitude toward the Communists and the USSR. In February 1945 Feierabend resigned in protest against the Beneš government policies and against the ban on the Agrarian Party after the war.

After his return to the country, Feierabend farmed on his estate in Mirošov, near Rokycany. Between 1946 and 1948 he was active in the Czechoslovak National Socialist Party (Československá Strana Národně Socialistická); in 1946 he was the party's candidate in the elections to the National Assembly, but he lost. After the Communist coup in February 1948 Feierabend went into hiding, and in April of the same year he left the country along with his family. Until 1950 he was in Great Britain and then in the United States, where he worked in the Center for Central European Studies, was editor of the Voice of America, worked with Radio Free Europe, and was active in the Council of Free Czechoslovakia (Rada Svobodného Československa). In the 1960s in the United States Feierabend published eight volumes of his memoirs from the period 1938–48. A selection of these memoirs was published in London under the title Soumrak Československé demokracie (The decline of Czechoslovak democracy; 1986–88), and in Czechoslovakia the whole work was published under the title Politické vzpomínky I–III (Political memoirs I–III; 1994–96). (PU)

Sources: ČBS; Českoslovenští politici: 1918–1991 (Prague, 1991); Politická elita meziválečného Československa 1918–1938: Kdo byl kdo za první republiky (Prague, 1998); Kdo byl kdo v našich dějinách ve 20. století, vol. 1 (Prague, 1998); Eduard Beneš, From Munich to a New War and New Victory (London, 1954).

FEJÉRVÁRY Géza (15 March 1833, Josefstadt [now Josefov]–25 April 1914, Vienna), Hungarian politician and general. Fejérváry was born into a family with a strong patriotic and military tradition. He graduated from the military academy in Bécsújhely in 1851 and from the Vienna Military Academy in 1857. As a staff officer in the rank of captain, he distinguished himself in the battle of Solferino (1859). He took part in wars against Denmark (1864) and Prussia (1866). In 1865, in the rank of major, he became personal aide-de-camp to Emperor Francis Joseph. After the Austro-Hungarian Agreement of 1867 he was entrusted with the task of organizing the Hungarian Army, assuming the position of deputy minister (1872–84) and then minister of defense (1884–1903). In 1904 he assumed command of the Imperial Guard. During the so-called crisis of dualism, when the conflict over the range of Hungarian autonomy caused street demonstrations and a deadlock in parliamentary proceedings, on 18 June 1905 Fejérváry took over a non-parliamentary Hungarian government formed by the emperor. The opposition scornfully called it the “government of dragoons.” A supporter of cooperation with Vienna on the condition of Hungarian autonomy, he mediated between the leaders of the Hungarian opposition and Emperor Francis Joseph. After resigning (8 April 1906), Fejérváry returned to the position of commander of the Imperial Guard and held it until his death. Among the Hungarian politicians, he was one of the most trustworthy supporters of the 1867 agreement. In domestic policy he favored a Bismarck type of rule. His strong personality and his commanding skills made him one of the leading Hungarian politicians at the turn of the twentieth century. (MS)

Sources: Gusztáv Gratz, A dualizmus kora (Budapest, 1934); Paul Ignotus, Hungary (London, 1972); 19. századi magyar történelem, 1790–1918 (Budapest, 1998).

FELCZAK Zygmunt (2 May 1903, Chorki, near Łęczyca–3 July 1946, Bydgoszcz), Polish political activist. From 1915, after finishing a village primary school, Felczak attended secondary school in Łęczyca, where in 1920 he volunteered to fight in the Polish-Soviet war. He graduated from high school in 1923 and began studying at Warsaw University and later at Poznań University, but he never graduated. At the same time he was active in the National Workers' Party (Narodowa Partia Robotnicza [NPR]) and in the Union of Working Youth–Unity (from 1934 he was president of the latter). He also edited the newspapers Obrona Ludu and Demokrata. He was a member of the left wing of the NPR, which opposed cooperation with the Christian Democrats. However, when in 1937 the NPR and the Christian Democratic Party merged into the Labor Party (Stronictwo Pracy [SP]), Felczak became a member of the SP Main Board and deputy editor-in-chief of Dziennik Bydgoski. As he was well known in Bydgoszcz, in September 1939 Felczak escaped from the Germans to Warsaw, where he was active in the underground. From March 1942 he was an SP representative in the Coordinating Political Committee (Polityczny Komitet Porozumiewawczy [PKP]). He favored cooperation with the Socialist and Peasant Parties, as well as radical social changes in Poland. This resulted in a clash between Felczak and SP leaders on 18 October 1942. Removed from the PKP, he became a leader of a group publishing the paper Zryw, and from May 1943 he was vice-president of the Party of National Upsurge (Stronictwo Zrywu Narodowego [SZN]).

During the Warsaw Uprising Felczak fought in a Home Army unit in downtown Warsaw, and after the failure of the uprising he escaped from a transport to a POW camp. He went into hiding in Włochy, near Warsaw, where he began to work with the Communists. In February 1945, on behalf of the Provisional Government, he was appointed governor (voivode) of Pomerania Province. On behalf of the SZN and with the approval of the Polish Workers' Party (Polska Partia Robotnicza [PPR]) he brought about the reactivation of the SP and in July 1945 became its president. He also founded the publishing cooperative Zryw, which published the Ilustrowany Kurier Polski (Illustrated Polish daily). After Karol Popiel returned to Poland Felczak became vice-president of the reactivated SP, and from December 1945 he was an MP of the National Home Council (Krajowa Rada Narodowa [KRN]) and leader of the SP Club. In 1946 during the campaign before a June referendum, Felczak supported the PPR's slogan, "Three times yes," against the majority of party members. He then led a campaign to take over the party by those members who favored collaboration with the Communists and opted for the removal of Popiel's followers from the leadership of the SP. Felczak died after he was severely beaten by unknown assailants in Bydgoszcz. (WR)

Sources: PSB, vol. 6; Kunert, vol. 1; Konstanty Turowski, "Dzieje Stronnictwa Pracy w latach 1945–1946," Chrześcijanin w Świecie, 1982, no. 1; Mirosław Piotrowski, Służba idei czy serwilizm? Zygmunt Felczak i Feliks Widy-Wirski w najnowszych dziejach Polski (Lublin, 1994).

FELDMANIS Jūlijs (21 July 1889, Nigrandas, Courland–16 August 1953, Washington, D.C.), Latvian diplomat. After graduating from a teachers' college in 1909, Feldmanis worked for two years as a teacher of German in Tukums. In 1915 he graduated in law from Moscow University. In 1915–18 he served in the Russian Army as a clerk, and he was also a social activist in the Caucasus. From January to July 1919 he was a lawyer in the government of Aleksandr Kolchak in Omsk, and then he returned to Latvia. From November 1919 he worked as head of the Eastern Department of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, and then he was a legal adviser of the ministry. Between 1921 and 1923 he worked as secretary of the legation in Paris, in 1923–25 he was head of a department in the League of Nations, and between 1925 and 1928 he served as chargé d'affaires in France. After his return to Latvia in 1928, Feldmanis became head of the Eastern Department, and in 1929 head of the Western Department, of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. From 1930 he served as a permanent delegate to the League of Nations; from 1932 he was also an envoy to Switzerland, and from September 1939 he was also an envoy to Denmark. In 1936 he was president of the League of Nations' commission for the affairs of Syrian refugees, and in 1939 he served as president of the commission for labor in the colonies. After Latvia's occupation by the Red Army and its incorporation into the USSR in 1940, Feldmanis was dismissed from his position. However, he was in charge of the legation to the League of Nations until 1946, and in Switzerland he was in charge of the legation until 1948. In 1948 he left for the United States. Appointed chargé d'affaires to the U.S. government in March 1949, he took an active part in the work of the Assembly of Captive European Nations (ACEN), and he sought the maintenance of the recognition of Latvian independence by the American government. (EJ)

Sources: Latvijas vadošie darbinieki (Riga, 1929); Es viņu pazīstu (Riga, 1939); "Miris Latvijas sūtnis Vašingtonā Jūlijs Feldmans," Laiks, 19 August 1953; "Miris Jūlijs Feldmans," Latvija, 22 August 1953; O. Rozītis, "Manas atmiņas par sūtni J. Feldmani," Austrālijas Latvietis, 29 August 1953; Adolfs Blodnieks, The Undefeated Nation (New York, 1960); "Latvijas pastāvīgais delegāts," Diena, 3 October 1992.

FERDINAND I Sachsen-Coburg-Gotha (26 February 1861, Vienna–10 September 1948, Berlin), tsar of Bulgaria. Ferdinand was the son of Prince August and the daughter of the king of France, Louis-Philippe Bourbon. In his youth he served in the Austrian Army. After Prince Alexander Battenberg was toppled in 1887, the Bulgarian National Assembly offered the crown to Ferdinand, who despite the opposition of some European powers, decided to take it. After ascending the throne, he initially remained in the shadows of Prime Minister Aleksandur Stambolov, who actually ruled, but in 1895 Ferdinand dismissed him, and later he probably organized the plot that resulted in his assassination. This paved the way for Ferdinand to assume full power. In domestic policy he played on the conflicts among party leaders; having little social support, the parties were largely dependent on the royal court. Ferdinand opened Bulgaria to foreign investments, which contributed to economic development. In 1893 he married Maria-Louise Bourbon-Parma, and after her death in 1908, he married a German princess, Eleonor von Reuss-Köstritz.

In foreign policy Ferdinand aimed at strengthening Bulgaria's political and territorial position. Taking advantage of the Young Turk revolution, on 5 October 1908, he assumed the title of tsar and proclaimed full independence from Turkey. Striving for domination in the Balkans, in October 1912 Ferdinand entered into an alliance with Serbia and Greece and ordered an attack on Turkey. Despite initial successes, the Bulgarian Army failed to seize Istanbul, while conflicts with the allies—with Serbia over Macedonia and with Greece over Western Thrace—made the victory problematic. Under the influence of nationalist officers and radical Macedonian organizations, which wanted the unification of Macedonia with Bulgaria, in June 1913 Ferdinand ordered an attack on Serbia. In the Second Balkan War Serbia and Greece allied with Turkey, and Bulgaria was defeated, losing a part of already occupied territory. There were rumors of Ferdinand's possible abdication.

After the Balkan Wars Ferdinand changed his tactics and entrusted the government to a follower of the Central Powers, Vasil Radoslavov, with a rapprochement with Austria-Hungary in mind. While Vienna and Berlin initially treated Ferdinand as an adventurer and did not trust him, after the outbreak of World War I they changed their minds. After a series of German victories on the eastern front, in September 1915 Ferdinand decided to send the Bulgarian Army to occupy a part of Serbia and Macedonia. This decision raised objections among the traditionally Russophile part of the Bulgarian society and elite. Several opponents of his policy, including the Peasant Party leader Aleksandur Stamboliyski, were imprisoned. Ferdinand did not change course even after it became clear that the defeat of the Central Powers was assured. Trying to save face, he dismissed Radoslavov, but his successor as prime minister, Aleksandur Malinov, continued the previous policy.

A drastic decline in the standard of living and the hopeless situation of troops on the front lines were symptoms of the coming revolution. When at the end of August 1918 the Allied Salonika offensive broke through the Macedonian front and the one-hundred-thousand-man Bulgarian Army was surrounded and forced to surrender, a part of the troops rebelled. On 24 September 1918 the general staff was imprisoned by the soldiers, and a military revolutionary committee was founded in Radomir. Ferdinand released Stamboliyski from prison and sent him to calm the troops. On 27 September, however, Stamboliyski proclaimed a republic. Troops loyal to the tsar temporarily mastered the situation, but on 29 September Ferdinand had to accept harsh conditions of armistice with the Entente, including his own abdication in favor of his son, Boris III; this followed on 3 October 1918. Ferdinand left for Berlin and then for his residence in Coburg, where he later took up ornithology and entomology. (AG)

Sources: Biographisches Lexikon, vol. 2; Ferdinand of Bulgaria: The Amazing Career of a Shoddy Czar (London, 1916); Josef Knodt, Ferdinand der Bulgare: Die Balkanmission eines Prinzen aus dem Hause Sachsen-Coburg und Gotha-Konary, 1887–1918 (Bielefeld, 1947); John M. A. Macdonald, Czar Ferdinand and His People (New York, 1971); Stephen Constant, Foxy Ferdinand, 1861–1948, Tsar of Bulgaria (London, 1979); Holger H. Herwig and Neil M. Heyman, Biographical Dictionary of World War I (Westport, Conn., 1982); Stefan Vlahov-Mitsov, Vladiteli v primka: Kniga za knyaz Batenberg, tsar Ferdinand I i tsar Boris III (Sofia, 1992).

FERDINAND I Hohenzollern-Sigmaringen (24 August 1865, Sigmaringen, Prussia [now in Germany]–20 July 1927 Sinaia, Romania), king of Romania. The son of Prince Leopold of Hohenzollern-Sigmaringen and Infanta Antónia of Portugal and the nephew of the childless King Charles I of Romania, Ferdinand was a descendant of the Swabian line of the Hohenzollern family. He was educated at the university in Tübingen and in Leipzig.

He did his military service in Kassel. On 29 December 1892 he married Lady Marie, daughter of the Duke of Edinburgh and granddaughter of Queen Victoria. On 18 March 1899 he was formally adopted as crown prince of Romania by Charles I. At the beginning of the twentieth century Ferdinand kept out of the limelight—an attitude that was consistent with his nature, described by his wife and his contemporaries as a combination of moderation and personal modesty. During the Second Balkan War in 1913 Ferdinand served as commander-in-chief of the Romanian Army.

When Charles died, Ferdinand succeeded him to the Romanian throne on 11 October 1914. His personal sympathies were on the side of the Central Powers because his two brothers served in the German Army, Emperor Wilhelm II was his cousin, and Emperor Francis Joseph was a close acquaintance. Moreover, Ferdinand expected that the Central Powers would win the war. However, from the beginning of the conflict Ferdinand supported the cautious and neutral policies of Prime Minister Ion I.C. Braţianu. In the summer of 1916, influenced by the Romanian political elite and by his wife, who firmly supported England and France, he accepted Braţianu's decision to enter the war on the side of the Entente. Although Ferdinand was pressed by German and Austrian diplomats and was described in Berlin as a “renegade from the Hohenzollern family,” he realized that he could not risk losing the throne. Formally, he was still commander-in-chief of the army, which in 1916 suffered a series of defeats and had to evacuate its soldiers to the eastern end of the kingdom at the beginning of 1917. The collapse of tsarism and the crisis in Russia additionally weakened the position of Romania. The morale of the Romanian Army was at its lowest ebb. Because of this, Ferdinand courageously decided to take an extraordinary step. At the beginning of April 1917 he gave a speech to the soldiers, who were mostly peasants. In this speech he promised them a radical land reform and greater participation in the public life of the country. The Constitutional Assembly gathered in Iaşi in July 1917 and amended the constitution to that effect. These steps definitely raised the morale of the army, although after the Bolshevik revolution in Russia and after the Brest-Litovsk Treaty of March 1918 Romania's situation became critical. However, Ferdinand was able to avoid personally signing the Bucharest peace treaty of May 1918 in which Romania agreed to cease activities against the Central Powers. In the summer of 1918 the position of Austria-Hungary deteriorated and Germany began seeking a truce, and on 10 November 1918 the Romanian Army resumed its activities against the Central Powers. At the end of November the royal family triumphantly returned to Bucharest.

At the Paris Peace Conference Ferdinand wrote a letter to the heads of the governments of England, France, and Italy presenting Romania's merits to the Entente. Thanks to the diplomatic talents of Brațianu and because of the activity of the Romanian Army against the Hungarian Soviet Republic, Romania finally achieved considerable territorial gains: Transylvania, Bukovina, Bessarabia, and a part of Dobruja were incorporated into a Greater Romanian state. On 15 October 1922 Ferdinand was crowned king of Greater Romania at Alba Iulia. Until the end of his life, he promoted a pro-Western foreign policy based on alliances with France, Czechoslovakia, Poland, and Yugoslavia and on the fulfillment of his 1917 promise of land reform. In 1926, at the request of Brațianu, Ferdinand appointed his grandson, Prince Michael, as crown prince instead of his son Charles, who had left his wife and was living with Magda Lupescu, which had aroused public indignation. Ferdinand also supported a system of rotating parties in power, as he wanted the royal court to remain the arbiter of political disputes. (WR) Sources: Biographisches Lexikon, vol. 1; Holger H. Herwig and Neil M. Heyman, Biographical Dictionary of World War I (Westport, Conn., 1982); Marie Queen of Romania, The Story of My Life, vols. 1–2 (New York, 1934); Gheorghe Tuțui and Mircea Popa, Hohenzollerni în România (Bucharest, 1962); Sherman Spector, Rumania at the Paris Peace Conference: A Study of the Diplomacy of I. C. Brațianu (New York, 1962); Robert William Seton-Watson, History of the Roumanians (Hamden, Conn. 1963); Vasile Alexandrescu, Romania in World War I (Bucharest, 1985); Glenn Torrey, General Henri Bertholet and Romania 1916–1919 (Boulder, Colo., 1987); Emile Turdeanu, Modern Romania: The Achievement of National Unity 1914–1920 (Los Angeles, 1988); Keith Hitchins, Rumania 1866–1947 (Oxford, 1994).

FESHCHENKO-CHOPIVSKYI Ivan (19 January 1884, Chudnov, Volhynia–2 Sept. 1952, Karelo-Finnish ASSR), Ukrainian politician. In 1908 Feshchenko-Chopivskyi graduated from the Polytechnical College in Kiev, and he started working there as an assistant in the Department of Metallurgy. He was active in the Ukrainian Party of Socialists-Federalists. In 1917 he became a member of the Ukrainian Central Council (Rada). At the end of February 1918 he was appointed minister of industry and trade. During the rule of Hetman Pavlo Skoropadsky he was in the opposition. At the beginning of 1919 he again joined the government of the Directorate of the Ukrainian National Republic (UNR). After the fall of the UNR he went to Poland. In 1922 he became professor of metallurgy at the Academy of Mining and Metallurgy in Kraków. In 1928 he became consultant in Baildon Steelworks in Katowice and director of the laboratory in Pokój Steelworks. During the Nazi occupation he was not active in politics. Arrested by the NKVD in March 1945 in Katowice, he was deported to a labor camp in the Karelo-Finnish ASSR, where he died. Feshchenko-Chopivskyi authored many works in the field of metallurgy, and he was a member of prestigious scientific societies. (WR)

Source: Encyclopedia of Ukraine, vol. 1 (Toronto, 1984).

FIELDORF Emil August, pseudonym “Nil” (20 March 1895, Kraków–24 February 1953, Warsaw), Polish general of the Home Army (Armia Krajowa [AK]). The son of a railroad worker, after completing high school in Kraków, Fieldorf attended a teacher training college. In 1912 he joined the Rifle Association. During World War I he fought in the Polish Legions and received the Order of Virtuti Militari for his courage in the battle of Hulewicze. After the oath crisis in July 1917 he was incorporated into the Austrian Army and fought on the Italian front. In September 1918 he joined the Polish Military Organization (Polska Organizacja Wojskowa [POW]) and in November 1918, the Polish Army. He participated in the disarmament of the Austrians in Kraków and in the fight for Lwów (Lviv) and Wilno (Vilnius). At the beginning of 1920 he fought in the battle of Dvinsk (Dünaburg, now Daugavpils). In April 1920 he took part in the Kiev campaign. Decorated with four Crosses of Valor, after the end of war he stayed in the army. As a company commander of the First Infantry Division, in May 1926 he supported Józef Piłsudski. In 1927 he completed a specialist training course for officers in Rembertów. From November 1935 he was a battalion commander of the Frontier Guards Corps in Troki, near Wilno, and from January 1938 he commanded an infantry regiment of the Frontier Guards Corps in Brzeżany.

In September 1939 Fieldorf's regiment fought in the Twelfth Tarnopol Infantry Division of General Gustaw Paszkiewicz. In October 1939 Fieldorf attempted to go to the West but was interned in Hungary. However, in January 1940 he reached France, where he served as an officer on General Kazimierz Sosnkowski's staff. After the fall of France, on 17 July 1940 he was sent from London to Poland as the first emissary of the Polish Armed Forces (Polskie Siły Zbrojne [PSZ]). At the beginning of September 1940 he reached Warsaw, where he became inspector of the High Command of the Union of Armed Struggle (Związek Walki Zbrojnej [ZWZ]). From the spring of 1942 he commanded the AK Białystok region, and from the fall of 1942 he had the Command of Diversion (Kedyw). He supervised all units involved in current actions, training, and production of weapons for sabotage and diversion. Involved in the work of the Command of Underground Struggle, in February 1944 he was recalled from the Kedyw command and formed the rudiments of the Nie organization in case of Soviet occupation. On 29 September 1944 the commander-in-chief promoted him to brigadier general. From October 1944 he was a deputy to Leopold Okulicki, the AK commander-in-chief. After the AK was dissolved and Okulicki assumed the command of Nie in January 1945, Fieldorf remained his deputy and commander of the South Region of the organization.

Arrested accidentally on 7 March 1945 under the name Walenty Gdanicki, unrecognized, Fieldorf was deported by the Soviets to a labor camp in the Ural Mountains. He then worked in a forced labor camp near Kazan, from which he was released in October 1947 and returned to Poland. In February 1948 he disclosed his identity. Applying for reinstatement to military service, in October 1950 Fieldorf contacted his former commander, General Paszkiewicz, not knowing that he was responsible for many arrests. On 10 November 1950 Fieldorf was imprisoned. The arrest warrant was signed in the General Military Prosecutor's Office only eleven days later. Fieldorf was charged with an alleged attempt to overthrow the system by force, actions against the USSR, and the liquidation of Communist activists. On 16 April 1952 he was sentenced to death under a decree that was issued by the Polish Committee of National Liberation for the prosecution of "Fascist-Nazi" criminals. Appeals had no effect, and Fieldorf was executed. In 1958 investigation into his case was "discontinued," but he was fully rehabilitated on 7 March 1989. (WR) Sources: Kunert, vol. 1; Maria Fieldorf and Leszek Zachuta, General "Nil" August Emil Fieldorf: Fakty, dokumenty, relacje (Warsaw, 1993); Andrzej Przewoźnik and Adam Strzembosz, General "Nil" (Warsaw, 1999).

FIERLINGER Zdenek (11 July 1891, Olomouc–2 May 1976, Prague), Czech Socialist, collaborator with Communists in their takeover of power in Czechoslovakia. After graduating from a trade school in Olomouc, from 1910 to 1914 Fierlinger worked as a representative of the McCormick Company in Russia. During World War I he volunteered for the Russian Army, and in 1917 he took command of the Jan Hus Regiment of the Czechoslovak Legion in Siberia. In 1918–19 he was head of a military mission in France, where he became a colonel. After his return to Czechoslovakia in 1920 he joined the Social Democratic Party. In 1921 he started a diplomatic career and became ambassador to the Netherlands. In 1924–25 he was ambassador to Romania; in 1925–28, to the United States; and in 1928–32, to Switzerland. He subsequently represented Czechoslovakia in the League of Nations. At the beginning of 1937 he returned to Czechoslovakia, becoming head of the political department of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. From the summer of 1937 to December 1939 he was ambassador to Moscow, where he became aligned with communism.

Between January 1940 and July 1941 Fierlinger was in London, working in the government-in-exile. At the beginning of 1942 he again became ambassador to Moscow. On 12 December 1943 in Moscow, Fierlinger, along with President Edvard Beneš, signed a treaty of friendship and mutual assistance with the USSR. Afterwards, Fierlinger mediated in talks between the Communists and the government-in-exile. These talks led to the formation of a coalition cabinet, and on 7 April 1945 Fierlinger became the head of this government. On 26 April 1945 he signed a treaty with Vyacheslav Molotov through which the Transcarpathian Ukraine, the prewar territory of Czechoslovakia, was ceded to Moscow. After elections, on 3 July 1946 Fierlinger resigned as head of government, retaining the post of deputy prime minister. As leader of the Social Democratic Party, he endeavored to merge his party with the Communist Party. However, at the Congress of Social Democrats in November 1946 he did not have the support of the majority for his efforts; therefore he had to resign as head of the party in favor of Bohumil Laušman. In September 1947 Fierlinger brought about an agreement with the Communists on the taxation of large incomes.

During the Communist coup of February 1948 Fierlinger supported Klement Gottwald. Soon afterwards, the supporters of a union with the Communists prevailed in the Social Democratic Party, and Fierlinger again assumed the leadership of the party. In June 1948 his efforts led to the incorporation of his party into the Communist Party of Czechoslovakia (Komunistická Strana Československa [CPC]). He also organized a purge of the opponents of this decision. At the same time he himself became a member of the Presidium of the Central Committee (CC) of the CPC. Between June 1948 and September 1953 he served as deputy prime minister. From April 1950 to January 1953 he was president of the state council for church affairs, and in this role he supervised the suppression of the church hierarchy, including the arrests and trials of Archbishop Josef Beran and Bishop Jan Vojtaššak. From September 1951 to June 1954 Fierlinger was a member of the political secretariat of the CC of the CPC, taking part in all decisions of the Stalinist leadership of the party. From September 1953 to June 1964 he was president of the National Assembly, and from June 1954 he belonged to the Politburo of the CC of the CPC. In the spring of 1968 he left the top leadership of the party but remained in the CC until 1971, when he retired as a "meritorious" party and national activist. His opportunism allowed him to stay at the top in politics throughout his life. He published Národní fronta: Vychovatelka revoluce (1945; The National Front: Teacher of the revolution; 1945); Poslání sociální demokracie v novém státě (The mission of social democracy in the new state; 1947); Ve službach ČSR (In the service of the Czechoslovak Republic, 2 vols.; 1948–49); and other works. (WR) Sources: ČBS; H. Kuhn and O. Böss, Biographisches Handbuch der Tschechoslovakei (Prague, 1961); William E. Griffith, ed., Communism in Europe, vol. 2 (Cambridge, Mass., 1966); Josef Korbel, The Communist Subversion of Czechoslovakia, 1948–1960 (Princeton, 1959); Karel Kaplan, The Short March: The Communist Takeover in Czechoslovakia, 1945–1948 (London, 1981).

FILARET [originally Mykhailo Denisenko] (23 January 1929, Blahodatne near Donetsk), metropolitan of the Ukrainian Orthodox Church (UOC). In 1946–48 Filaret studied at the theological seminary in Odessa and later in the Moscow Theological Academy (MTA). In January 1950 he chose the monastic vocation and adopted the name Filaret. In 1952 he received a Ph.D. in theology. In 1953 he became associate professor and senior lecturer at the MTA. Appointed head of a seminary (hegumen), he worked as an inspector of the Saratov and Kiev seminaries. In July 1958 he became archimandrite and rector of the Kiev theological seminary. In 1960 he was appointed parish priest of St. Vladimir Cathedral in Kiev. In 1961–62 he was in Alexandria (Egypt), where he directed the Alexander Nevski Church. In February 1962 he was consecrated bishop and became vicar of the Leningrad archdiocese. He was also to run the Riga bishopric, but in June 1962 he was appointed vicar of the Central European Exarchate, and in October 1962 he became bishop of Vienna and Austria. He worked there until December 1964, when he was appointed bishop of Dmitrov, vicar of the Moscow archdiocese, and rector of the MTA.

Following the resignation of Metropolitan Ioan, on 14 May 1966 Filaret became the exarch of Ukraine, archbishop of Kiev and Halich, and a member of the Holy Synod of the Russian Orthodox Church (ROC). On 25 February 1968 he was elevated to the rank of metropolitan. In connection with the role that the Communist authorities attached to the Orthodox Church in their international peace propaganda campaign, Filaret, as a member of the commission of the Holy Synod on Christian unity and inter-church relations, visited almost one hundred countries. In 1977 he became a member of the World Peace Council. In the 1980s he took part in the Communist-controlled preparations for the millennium of the baptism of Kievan Ruthenia in 1988. In this role he actively combated autocephalic tendencies in the Ukrainian Orthodox Church. After the death of the ROC patriarch, Pimen, in May 1990 Filaret was elected locum tenens of the patriarchic throne. Nevertheless, on 8 June 1990 he lost the position of patriarch to the metropolitan of Leningrad, Aleksiy II.

Supported by the new Ukrainian authorities and by Leonid Kravchuk in particular, in 1991 Filaret contributed to the proclamation of Ukrainian independence. In October 1990 the ROC Council (Sobor) granted the UOC, as the Ukrainian Exarchate was called, administrative autonomy, while Filaret was nominated metropolitan of Kiev and all of the Ukraine. On 1–3 November 1991 the UOC Council appealed to Patriarch Aleksiy for full autocephaly. In April 1992 the ROC Council refused the appeal, and on 27 May 1992 at the Council of Kharkiv some of the Ukrainian bishops opposing Filaret elected Volodymyr (Sobodan), recommended by Moscow, as the metropolitan of Ukraine. This part of the Orthodox Church stayed with the name UOC. Filaret rejected these decisions and, appealing to extreme nationalist forces, on 26 June 1992 united his followers with the Ukrainian Autocephalous Orthodox Church in the UOC-Kiev Patriarchate (UOC-KP). Mstyslav (Skrypnik) was elected its patriarch, and Filaret was to be his deputy. The unification failed since Filaret was not credible and was widely suspected of earlier cooperation with the KGB. In order to render the UOC-KP credible, Filaret brought about the election of a new patriarch, former dissident Volodymyr (Romanyuk), while he remained his deputy. They soon entered into a conflict that overshadowed later attempts to explain the sudden death of Volodymyr in July 1995. Violent demonstrations in Kiev on 18 July 1995, when Filaret, opposing an official ban, tried to bury the deceased patriarch in St. Sophia Cathedral, led to the strengthening of Filaret's image as a representative of the UOC national wing. At the subsequent council, on 21 October 1995, Filaret finally became the UOC-KP patriarch. He drew closer to President Leonid Kuchma, so in subsequent years he could sponsor the reconstruction of St. Michael Cathedral in Kiev, blown up owing to a decision by Stalin in 1935. In contrast to other Orthodox bishops, in June 2001 Filaret met with Pope John Paul II during his pilgrimage to the Ukraine. (TS)

Sources: Encyclopedia of Ukraine, vol. 1 (Toronto, 1984); Stephen K. Batalden, Seeking God: The Recovery of Religious Identity in Orthodox Russia, Ukraine, and Georgia (De Kalb, 1993); Bohdan Nahaylo, The Ukrainian Resurgence (Toronto, 1999); www.uaoc.org.ua; www.saveouruoc.com.

FILIPESCU Nicolae (17 December 1862, Bucharest–26 October 1916, Bucharest), Romanian politician. Filipescu graduated in law from the Sorbonne in Paris. In 1885 he took the lead of the Epoce Press and of a daily of the same name. He started his political career by winning a parliamentary seat in January 1888. In March 1888 he was arrested for anti-government pronouncements. In 1891–95 he was the mayor of Bucharest. In this capacity he contributed to the development of the capital—for instance, by building many boulevards. Then he was the mayor of Draite, and from July 1900 to February 1901 he was minister of agriculture in the conservative government of Petre Carp. Afterwards he stayed in the opposition, to both liberal and conservative governments. He favored the unification of all territories inhabited by Romanians under Habsburg rule. From January 1911 to April 1912 Filipescu was minister of war, contributing to the modernization and reorganization of the army. In the government of Titu Liviu Maiorescu (March 1912–January 1914), he was minister of agriculture again. In 1914 he founded National Action (Acțiunea Națională), which favored Romania's entry into war on the side of the Entente. In October 1915 he co-founded the Unionist Federation (Federația Unionista), and later, along with the Conservative Democratic Party, he co-founded the National Conservative Party (Parditul Naționalist Conservator). (PC)

Sources: Biographisches Lexikon, vol. 1; Constantine Gane, P. P. Carp și locul său în istoria politică a țării, vols. 1–2 (Bucharest, 1936); George Tașcă, Politică economico-socială a lui P. P. Carp (Bucharest, 1938); Titu Maiorescu, Inseminări zilnice (Bucharest, 1939–40).

FILIPOV Georgi (Grisha) (13 July 1919, Kadiyewka, Ukraine–2 November 1994, Sofia), Bulgarian Communist activist. Born into a family of Bulgarian refugees in the USSR, until the end of his life Filipov spoke with a Russian accent. In 1936 he came to Bulgaria with his family. He graduated from high school in Lovech (1938), and then he started his studies at the Physics and Math Department of the University of Sofia (1938–40); he failed to complete them owing to his Communist activities. In 1936 he became a member of the Workers' Youth Union, and in 1940, the Bulgarian Communist Party (BCP). Arrested for this activity, in 1942 he was sentenced to twelve years in prison. In 1943 this sentence was increased to fifteen years. Released as a result of the uprising of 9 September 1944, Filipov worked in the Fatherland Front and in the BCP structures in Lovech and Plevan and later in the Ministry of Industry in Sofia. In 1951 he graduated in the economics of industry and trade in Moscow, and in 1954 he became a candidate (doctor) in economics. Upon his return to Bulgaria he became head of the Higher Education Department in the Committee for Research, Art, and Culture, and he held the chair of Marxism-Leninism at the Higher Institute of Machines and Engineering in Sofia. He also lectured in political economy there. From 1957 Filipov was deputy head of the State Planning Commission and later head of the Department of Planning, Finance, and Trade of the BCP Central Committee (CC) (1958–64). From 1962 he was a deputy member, and from 1966 a member, of the BCP CC; from 1971 he was CC secretary and from 1974 also a CC Politburo member. In 1964 he became chairman of the government commission for economic reform and management (1964–68); he was then first deputy chairman of the State Planning Commission (December 1968–July 1971), and in 1971 he became a member of the Council of State. From 1966 to 1989 he was an MP.

From 16 June 1981 to 24 March 1986 Filipov was prime minister. Because of this he temporarily left the CC Secretariat and the Council of State. Although he was presented as an economist, he only simulated reforms, attempting to avoid real changes and strictly following the dogmatic line of Todor Zhivkov. After leaving the government, Filipov returned to the CC Secretariat and the Council of State, and he became chairman of the commission for economic and social affairs of the BCP CC Politburo (1986–89). After the fall of Zhivkov in November 1989, Filipov left the BCP leadership, and when the party was transformed into the Bulgarian Socialist Party (BSP), he was accused of contributing to the economic crisis of the 1980s, removed from the BSP in April 1990, and temporarily imprisoned for embezzlement in July 1990. Filipov authored Marxist economic works such as Izmeneniya v sistemata na pokazatelite w planiraneto (Changes in the system of planning indicators; 1966). (JJ)

Sources: Entsiklopediya Bulgariya, vol. 7 (Sofia, 1996); Raymond Detrez, Historical Dictionary of Bulgaria (Lanham, Md., 1997); Tasho Tashev, Ministrite na Bulgariya 1879–1999: Entsiklopedichen spravochnik (Sofia, 1999); Evgeniya Kalinova and Iskra Baeva, Bulgarskite prekhodi 1944–1999 (Sofia, 2000); Angel Tsyraikov, Pravitelstvata na Bulgariya: Khronologiya na politicheskiya zhivot 1879–2001 (Sofia, 2001).

FILIPOVIĆ Filip (9 June 1879, Čačak–April 1938, Moscow), Yugoslav Communist activist. After graduating from high school in Belgrade, in 1899 Filipović left for St. Petersburg, where he studied mathematics. In 1904 he completed his studies and started working as a teacher in a trade school in the Russian capital. As a student, he had joined the Russian Social Democratic Party, and he favored the Bolshevik faction of the party. In 1912 he returned to Serbia, and he became secretary of the Chamber of Labor and one of the leaders of the Serbian Social Democratic Party. During World War I Filipović edited the party's press. During the Austrian occupation of Serbia he was interned in Vienna. After the fall of the Habsburg monarchy he went to Budapest, where he worked with the Hungarian Communists, and in February 1919 he arrived in Belgrade and co-organized the founding congress of the Communist Party of Yugoslavia (CPY) in April 1919. As a secretary, he headed the CPY with Sima Marković. In August 1920 Filipović was elected mayor of Belgrade and an MP to the parliament of the Kingdom of Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes. After the CPY was declared illegal in 1921, he was stripped of his immunity, and in February 1922 he was sentenced to two years' imprisonment. Released in September 1923, he resumed his CPY activities, organizing the CPY's legal facade, the Independent Workers' Party of Yugoslavia. In March 1923 he became secretary general of the party, and in June 1924 he went to the Fifth Congress of the Communist International in Moscow, where he spoke as "Bošković" and became a member of the Executive Committee of the Comintern. Later he also used the pseudonym "Baum." In March 1926 he became a deputy member of the Presidium of the Executive Committee of the International and the Yugoslav delegate to the Balkan Bureau of the Comintern. During Stalin's struggle for power in the Bolshevik party, Filipović managed to maintain his position in the leadership of the Comintern, and in August 1930 he became interim president of the CPY. In June 1932 he was transferred to the International Agricultural Institute, which was the traditional place of employment for downgraded functionaries. However, in 1935 he was still a CPY delegate to the Seventh Congress of the Comintern. Arrested by the NKVD in February 1938, he was sentenced to death on 8 April, and he was soon executed by firing squad. He was rehabilitated posthumously by the Supreme Military Court of the USSR in October 1957. (WR)

Sources: Lazitch; Enciklopedija Jugoslavije, vol. 3 (Zagreb, 1958); Milutin Jakovljević, Filip Filipović: Životni put i revolucionarno delo (Gornji Milanovac, 1979); J. Bojović, ed., Filip Filipović: Revolucionarna misao i delo (Belgrade, 1983).

FILOV Bogdan (28 March 1883, Stara Zagora–2 February 1945, Sofia), professor of archaeology and regent of Bulgaria. In 1901 Filov received a scholarship from the Ministry of Education. He studied classical philology, ancient history, and archaeology in Würzburg, Leipzig, and Freiburg in Germany. In 1906 he defended his Ph.D. dissertation, and from 1907 to 1909 he worked in Bonn, Paris, and Rome. In 1910 he became head of the National Museum in Sofia, and in 1921–29 he directed the Bulgarian Archaeological Institute. In 1914 he also began working at St. Kliment Ohridsky University in Sofia. In 1926 he became full professor and in 1931–32 rector of Sofia University. In 1923 he joined a Berlin Freemasons' lodge. He published many scholarly works, such as Pomoshnite voiski na rimskata provintsia Miziia (The auxiliary forces in the Roman province of Moesia; 1906); Antichni pametnitsi v Narodniia Muzei (Ancient monuments in the National Museum; 1912); and Starobylgarskoto iskustvo (Old Bulgarian art; 1924); these works were also published in English, French, and German. Filov also published Starobylgarska tsyrkovna arkhitektura (Old Bulgarian church architecture; 1930) and Rimsko vladichestvo v Bylgariia (Roman rule in Bulgaria; 1931). Among other things, he was a full member of the German Archaeological Institute in Berlin and the Austrian Archaeological Institute in Vienna.

In 1937–44 Filov served as president of the Bulgarian Academy of Sciences and was also president of the Bulgarian PEN club. Between November 1938 and February 1940 he was minister of education. He favored the pro-German line of Bulgarian diplomacy. He enjoyed scholarly authority, but he did not have any significant political experience; for these reasons, on 15 February 1940, Tsar Boris III appointed him prime minister of the government, so that Filov would be a willing tool in the tsar's hands. In 1942 Filov published Ideitie i delata no dнешniia bezpartiiien rezhim (The objectives and achievements of the modern nonparty system).

Filov's government became entangled in a subtle struggle for influence in the Balkans between the Third Reich and the USSR; at first the latter two were allies, but from the end of 1940, they were more and more clearly rivals in this area. Moscow's pressure to conclude a Bulgarian-Soviet treaty of mutual assistance intensified in November and December of 1940, following the visit of a Soviet delegation to Sofia and the Communist-led collection of signatures on a petition demanding such a treaty. Nonetheless, Filov's government increased cooperation with the Third Reich; on 1 March 1941 Bulgaria acceded to the Tripartite Pact and on 25 November of the same year joined the anti-Comintern Pact. Despite a sudden deterioration of Bulgarian-Soviet relations after the Nazi invasion of the USSR in June 1941, Bulgaria did not join the war on the side of the Third Reich and retained its diplomatic agency in Moscow. In a way, Filov's government tried to pursue the Bulgarian raison d'état, but it more and more clearly yielded to pressure from Berlin. For example, on 13 December 1941 Filov declared a state of war with Great Britain and the United States.

After the German defeat at Stalingrad, Filov anxiously observed the collapse of German power. His situation changed suddenly with the death of Tsar Boris III. Filov became one of the key political figures. On 8 September

1943 the National Assembly elected him, General Nikolai Michov, and Kiril, Prince of Preslav as regents to rule on behalf of Tsar Simeon, who was not yet of age. Michov and Kiril had much less experience and less authority than Filipov. Filipov was more aware of the inevitability of the collapse of the Third Reich, and he realized that it was necessary for Bulgaria to join the Allied side. Because the stance of the USSR made such a step impossible, Konstantin Muraviev's government was not established until 2 September 1944, based on a broader coalition and attempting to reach an agreement with the Allies. It was too late: the opposition of the Fatherland Front, led by the Communists, was so strong that the concession only speeded up the coup of 9 September 1944 and the overthrow of the regency. Along with the other regents and with dozens of leading tsarist politicians, Filipov was arrested, sentenced to death, and executed. His Dnevnik (Diary) was published in 1986 in Sofia, and Putuvaniia iz Trakiia, Rodopite i Makedoniia, 1912–1916 (A voyage through Thrace, the Rhodopes, and Macedonia, 1912–1916) appeared in 1993. (WR) Sources: Entsiklopediia Bylgariia, vol. 7 (Sofia, 1996); Hans-Joachim Hoppe, Bulgarien: Hitlers eigenwilliger Verbündeter (Stuttgart, 1979); Stephane Groueff, Crown of Thorns (Lanham, Md., 1987); Jerzy Jackowicz, Partie opozycyjne w Bułgarii 1944–1948 (Warsaw, 1997); Tasho Tashev, Ministrice na Bylgariia 1897–1999 (Sofia, 1999).

FINDER Paweł [originally Pinkus Finder] (17 September 1904, Leszczyny, near Bielsko-Biała–20 July 1944, Warsaw), Polish Communist activist of Jewish origin. Educated in a German gymnasium in Bielsko, in 1920 Finder left for Palestine, where he was a laborer. In 1922 he returned to Bielsko, finished school, and then went to Austria, where he joined the local Communist Party. He also headed the Free Socialist Students' Union (Freie Sozialistische Studentenvereinigung). In 1926 he graduated from the Chemical Institute at Mulhouse in France, where he obtained a degree as an engineer. Later, he worked on his Ph.D. thesis under the supervision of Frédéric Joliot-Curie and was active in the Communist Party of France. In 1927 he joined the Paris committee of the party and worked in the Organization Department of the CC. He published in a German version of L'Humanité under the name Paul Reynot. In 1928 he was arrested for possession of a false passport and expelled from France. He returned to Poland and started working in a factory in Bielsko. After a short military service between 1928 and 1929 he was promoted in the Communist Party of Poland (Komunistyczna Partia Polski [KPP]). At that time he was active in the KPP Military Department. Temporarily arrested in 1931 and 1932, he continued to work as party secretary in Łódź and Zagłębie Dąbrowskie, and at the end of 1933 he became secretary of the KPP Warsaw organization. Imprisoned in April 1934 and sentenced to twelve years for anti-state activities on 25 April 1936, he served his sentence in the Mokotów and Rawicz prisons.

After the outbreak of war in September 1939 Finder escaped from prison and managed to get to Białystok, which was seized by the USSR. He worked there as president of a district planning committee. In 1941 he joined the All-Union Communist Party (Bolsheviks) in Mogilev. In July 1941 he went to special Comintern schools in Pushkino and Kushnarenkovo. On the night of 27–28 December 1941 he was parachuted into Poland near Warsaw in the first Initiative Group sent to reconstruct the Communist Party in Poland. He lived in Warsaw under the name "Stanisław Pilecki" and worked in the Warsaw power plant. At the same time he was an active member of the ruling troika of the CC of the Polish Workers' Party (Polska Partia Robotnicza [PPR]) and wrote articles for Trybuna Wolności. After the death of Marceli Nowotko, the party leader, on 28 November 1942, Finder became the first secretary of the party and was also responsible for communications with headquarters in Moscow. As first secretary, he tried to establish contact with the Polish independence underground. However, the conditions Finder proposed were unacceptable. Finder was the co-author of the PPR's program declaration of 1943, titled O co walczymy? (What are we fighting for?). Arrested by the Gestapo on 14 November 1943, Finder was identified during a brutal investigation on Szucha Avenue and executed by firing squad in the ruins of the Warsaw Ghetto. (WR) Sources: Kunert, vol. 2; Paweł Finder we wspomnieniach towarzyszy walki (Warsaw, 1956); S. Topol, Paweł Finder 1904–1944: Życie i działalność (Warsaw, 1978).

FISHTA Gjergj (23 October 1871, Zadrimë–30 December 1940, Shkodër), Albanian writer, folklorist, independence activist, and Catholic priest. After finishing school in his home town, Fishta left for Sutjeska (Bosnia), where he studied philosophy. After completing his studies, he returned to Albania, where he lectured at a seminary in Troshani. He then was a parish priest in Gomsiqe. From 1902, when he became director of a Franciscan school in Shkodër, he made efforts to replace the Italian language, which was obligatory in the schools, with Albanian. In 1908 he presided over a congress in Monastir (Bitoli), where he presented a proposal for the standardization of the Albanian alphabet. Fishta started his literary activities in the periodical Albania, which was edited by Faik Konitza. He initiated the creation of a religious-cultural journal, Hylli i Drites, which is still published today by the Albanian Franciscans. From 1917 to 1918 he oversaw the journal Posta e Shqypnies in Shkodër. He was a member of the Albanian delegation to the Paris Peace Conference in 1919. As a representative of the Shkodër district, he was elected to the parliament (1921–24) and became head of a committee on educational affairs. In 1930–31 he represented Albania at conferences of the Balkan states. The art gallery in Shkodër was created on his initiative, as well as the museum, of which he was the director.

Fishta has been ranked among the most outstanding Albanian writers. His most famous work, Lahuta e Malcis (The lute of the highlands; 1937), often called the “Albanian Iliad,” is a vast epic poem that reveals the richness of the Albanian folk culture. Fishta took a favorable attitude toward the Italian occupation of Albania. After the Communists came to power, he was regarded as a collaborator, and his body was removed from its grave. His corpse was found during the reconstruction of a Franciscan church in Shkodër, and a second funeral took place in December 1996. Fishta’s publications include Shqyptari i gjytetnuem (The Albanian townsman; 1911); Mrizi i zanave (The muses’ siesta; 1913); Juda Makabe (Judas Maccabeus; 1920); Vallja e Parrizit (Paradise dance; 1925); collections of poetry: Anzat e Parnasit (Parnassus’ wasps; 1907); Pika voeset (Drops of dew; 1909); Gomari i Babatasit (1923); and a work of criticism, Tarraloqja e Ballkanit (Balkan thoughtlessness; 1944). (TC)

Sources: Biographisches Lexikon, vol. 1; Eqrem Çabej, “Der albanische Dichter Gjergj Fishta 1871–1940,” Südostforschung, 1941, no. 6; Dukagjini Pal, Gjergj Fishta—jeta dhe veprat (Shkodër, 1992); Ressuli Namik, “Tribut Gjergj Fishtes, poetit shqiptar,” Hylli i Drites, 1993, no. 1; Tadeusz Czekalski, Zarys dziejów chrześcijaństwa albańskiego w latach 1912–1993 (Kraków, 1996).

FISZBACH Tadeusz (4 November 1935, Dobraczyn, near Lwów [Lviv]), Polish Communist and post-Communist activist. Born into a working-class family, Fiszbach received a Ph.D. in the technical sciences. From 1959 he was a member of the Polish United Workers’ Party (Polska Zjednoczona Partia Robotnicza [PUWP]), and from 1963 he worked in the party apparatus as secretary of the PUWP district committees in Elbląg and Tczew. In 1971–75 he was secretary of the PUWP Provincial Committee in Gdańsk, and from 1975 to January 1982 he was its first secretary. From 1975 to July 1981 he belonged to the PUWP Central Committee (CC). From December 1980 to July 1981 he was a deputy member of the PUWP CC Politburo. He lost the election to the CC during the Ninth Extraordinary PUWP Congress in July 1981. He was an MP from 1976 to 1985. Thought to be one of the supporters of party democratization, during the summer strikes of 1980 Fiszbach favored a compromise with the striking workers and took part in negotiations with the Interfactory Strike Committee in the Gdańsk shipyard. Respected by Solidarity and attacked by the party hardliners, after the declaration of martial law he was deprived of his party position in Gdańsk and sent to the embassy in Finland (1982–86). Later he was an adviser to the minister of foreign affairs. He returned to active political life at the beginning of 1989. Elected to the “contract” Assembly (Sejm) in June 1989, he became its deputy speaker. When the PUWP was dissolved at the Eleventh Congress in January 1990, Fiszbach opposed the group headed by Aleksander Kwaśniewski and Leszek Miller; he distanced himself from the PUWP tradition and co-founded the minority Social Democratic Union, which soon changed its name to the Polish Social Democratic Union. In 1990–91 Fiszbach was its chairman, but the party failed to play any significant role. From 2001 he was ambassador to Latvia. (PK)

Sources: Mołdawa; Jerzy Holzer, “Solidarność” (Warsaw, 1983); Antoni Dudek, Pierwsze lata III Rzeczypospolitej 1989–1995 (Kraków, 1997).

FLONDOR Iancu (16 August 1865, Flondoreni, Bukovina–19 October 1924, Flondoreni), Romanian politician and lawyer. Flondor was descended from a boyar family that was well known in Bukovina. He studied law and philosophy at Francis Joseph I University in Cernăuți (Chernivtsi) and in Vienna (1885–93), where in 1894 he earned his doctorate in law. He was one of the leaders of the Romanian National Movement in Bukovina; nevertheless, he initially accepted cooperation with the Austrian authorities. The Austrians trusted him and appointed him to important administrative posts. He was even given the title of baron by Emperor Francis Joseph. In March 1892 Flondor was one of the founders of the National Party of Romanian Bukovina (NPRB), which propagated the slogan of unification with Romania. In 1898–1918 he sat in the parliament of Bukovina. Between 1908 and 1910 he was president of the NPRB.

After the outbreak of World War I Flondor was interned by the Austrians until the winter of 1915, and between the spring and summer of 1918 he served as mayor of Storozhynets in Bukovina. On 27 October 1918 he was elected president of the Romanian National Council in Bukovina. This council proclaimed solidarity with the Romanians in Transylvania and Hungary. Flondor was against handing over power in Bukovina to the Ukrainian legionnaires. The president of Bukovina, Joseph Count Etdorf, handed over power to the representatives of both National Councils, the Romanian council and the Ukrainian council. Meanwhile, in November 1918 Romanian troops entered Cernăuți and then seized all of Bukovina. Between 12 and 28 November Flondor was head of the provisional government of Bukovina, and he simultaneously served as its minister of justice. At the General Congress of Bukovina, which was convened on 28 November 1918 in Cernăuți and was chaired by Flondor, the decision was made to incorporate Bukovina into Romania. This decision was backed by a delegation of Poles from Bukovina. From December 1918 to April 1919 Flondor served as minister of state for Bukovina in the Romanian central government, but he was in conflict with another Bukovinian, Minister Ion Nistor. Between September 1919 and April 1920 Flondor was president of the newly created Democratic and United Party of Bukovina. On 2 May 1920 he resigned all his public and political positions. (FA/TD)

Sources: Aurel Morariu, Bucovina, 1774–1914 (Bucharest, 1915); Simion Reli, Din Bucovina vremurilor grele: Schițe istorice (Cernăuți, 1926); Ilie Toronțiu, Românii și clasa intelectuală din Bucovina (Cernăuți, 1911); Ion Nistor, ed., Amintirii răzlețe din timpul Unirii (Cernăuți, 1938); Ion Nistor, Unirea Bucovinei 28 Noiembrie 1918 (Bucharest, 1928); Erich Prokopowitsch, Das Ende der österreichischen Herrschaft in der Bukowina (Munich, 1959); Emil Biedrzycki, Historia Polaków na Bukowinie (Kraków, 1973).

FOCK Jenő (17 May 1916, Kispeszt), Hungarian Communist activist. Born into a working-class family, Fock worked as a mechanic. In 1932 he joined the Trade Union of Metalworkers and then the illegal Hungarian Communist Party (HCP). He was also active in the illegal Communist Union of Young Workers and in the Red Fund, which supported families of arrested and/or fired Communist activists. In 1939 Fock was called up, and in 1940 he was accused of spying and sentenced to three years in prison. In 1943 he was sent to the front, from which he escaped and went into hiding in 1944. From 1945 he worked in the Budapest HCP committee and from 1947 in the economic administration; from January 1951 he was deputy minister of metallurgy and the machine-building industry. At the same time he graduated from the Economic Technical Academy. From October 1954 he was commercial councillor in East Germany, and from April 1955 to February 1957, secretary of the National Council of Trade Unions. From July to October 1956 he was a deputy member of the Central Committee (CC) of the Hungarian Workers' Party; from October 1956 to October 1989, a member of the CC of the Hungarian Socialist Workers' Party (HSWP); and in 1957–80 a member of the HSWP Politburo. From February 1957 to 1961 he was CC secretary for economic policy. Considered a supporter of reforms, in September 1961 Fock became deputy prime minister.

From 14 April 1967 Fock was prime minister. He took part in the elaboration and implementation of the so-called New Economic Mechanism (1968), which consisted of the abandonment of stiff planning procedures and the decentralization of economic decisions. Enterprises were to directly react to changes in domestic demand and to world prices. At the same time, the subsidization of factories bearing a deficit was maintained, along with central investment plans. When the reforms were curtailed in October 1973, Flondor wanted to resign, but it was not until 15 May 1975 that he was dismissed, along with other supporters of these reforms, such as György Aczél and Rezső Nyers. Nevertheless, Flondor stayed in the Politburo for five more years and in the HSWP CC for fourteen more years. In 1980 he was elected chairman of the Union of Technical and Natural Science Societies. At the end of December 1981 he was a member of a delegation that advised General Wojciech Jaruzelski on how to implement economic reforms during the period of martial law in Poland. In 1945–47, 1958–67, and 1971–85 Flondor was an MP. At a CC meeting in May 1988 he suggested that János Kádár resign from the position of HSWP general secretary and assume a purely representative function as its chairman. After the fall of the Communist regime Flondor retired. (JT)

Sources: Magyar Nagylexikon, vol. 8 (Budapest, 1999); A magyar forradalom és szabadságharc enciklopédiája, CD-ROM (Budapest, 1999); Ki kicsoda 2000 (Budapest, 2001); I. Friss, ed., Reform of the Economic Mechanism in Hungary (Budapest, 1971); Paul Ignotus, Hungary (London, 1972); Bennet Kovrig, Communism in Hungary from Kun to Kádár (Stanford, 1979); Miklós Molnár, From Béla Kun to János Kádár: Seventy Years of Hungarian Communism (New York, 1990).

FOKIN Vitold (25 October 1932, Novomykolayivka, Zaporozhye), Soviet Communist and post-Communist activist in the Ukraine. The son of a teacher, in 1954 Fokin graduated in mining studies in Dniepropetrovsk, and in 1970 he received a Ph.D. in this field in Moscow. From 1954 to 1963 he worked in a coal mine in Bokovoanratsyt in the Lugansk region, attaining the position of head engineer. In 1963–71 he was deputy head of Donbasanratsyt Works, head of the coal mining holdings in Pervomaysk, chief engineer of Kadiyivka Works, and head of Sverdlovanratsyt Works in Sverdlovsk. From 1971 he worked in the Planning Office of the Ukrainian SSR. In 1972 he became deputy chairman, and in 1987 chairman, of this office. He was also a member of the Central Committee (CC) of the Communist Party of Ukraine, a member of the CC of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union (1990–91), and a deputy to the Supreme Council of the Soviet Union (1989–91). In July 1989 Fokin took part in a government commission that negotiated conditions for the termination of a strike by Donbas miners, the first such mass protest of Ukrainian workers during perestroika. On 23 October 1990 he assumed the position of prime minister of the Ukrainian SSR. This appointment was a rather unexpected move by President Leonid Kravchuk, who decided to meet the demands of striking students and fired the former prime minister, Vitaliy Masol. During Fokin's term, Ukraine proclaimed sovereignty, held a referendum on independence, and had its first presidential elections. Fokin played no major role in these events, concentrating on economic policy, which was designed in accordance with the populist ideas of President Kravchuk and the parliament. As a result, the budget of 1992 closed with a deficit of 33 percent. When on 1 October 1992 Kravchuk decided to implement reforms and dismissed Fokin, the new government faced a dramatic financial crisis. Later Fokin lectured at the Institute of World Economy and International Relations, chaired the International Endowment for Charity and Economic Links with the Russian Federation, and sat on the Economic Council of the President of Ukraine. (TS)

Sources: Europa Środkowo-Wschodnia 1992 (Warsaw, 1994); Bohdan Nahaylo, The Ukrainian Resurgence (Toronto, 1999); Stanisław Kulczycki, ed., Uряды України у XX ст. (Kiev, 2001).

FORIȘ Ștefan (9 May 1892, Tărlungeni, near Brașov–summer 1946, Romania), Romanian Communist activist. Born into a family of Transylvanian Hungarians, after graduating in physics and mathematics from the University of Budapest in September 1919, Foriș returned to Brașov, where he founded Munkas, a Hungarian Socialist newspaper. In 1921 he joined the Romanian Communist Party (RCP), and in 1922 he moved to Bucharest, where he was active in the Communist underground. In 1926 he became secretary of Red Aid (Ajutorul Roșu), the Romanian section of the International Organization for Aid to Revolutionaries. In 1927 he became a member of the Central Committee (CC) of the RCP. In July 1928 he was arrested but was released owing to ill health, and he went to Moscow. At the end of 1930 he returned to Romania, where in August 1931 he was imprisoned again. Released in 1935, in 1938 he joined the secretariat of the CC of the Romanian party. In accord with the tactics of the Communist International, the RCP favored the separation of Transylvania, Bessarabia, and Dobrudja from Romania. It was also a result of the fact that the party was dominated by national minorities. While Romanians made up around 72 percent of the population of Romania, in the party they constituted only some 23 percent. In the case of Hungarians, Jews, Russians, Ukrainians, and Bulgarians, the proportions were reversed. In addition, the party was fractured because of arrests, and it did not have any financial support.

After Romania lost some territories to the USSR, Hungary, and Bulgaria, in October 1940 Foriș went to Moscow, where the Comintern appointed him secretary general of the RCP in place of the late Béla Brainer. After the outbreak of the German-Soviet war in June 1941 Foriș' contact with the Kremlin became more difficult and was often interrupted. When in 1942 Petre Gheorghe, the head of the party in Bucharest who acted as a liaison with the Kremlin, demanded on behalf of the Comintern that Foriș increase sabotage actions in the rear of the German Army, Foriș refused, justifying his decision by noting a lack of means and excessive risk. Soon Gheorghe was arrested and executed by the authorities of Marshal Ion Antonescu. This induced other members of the RCP leadership, who were in prison, to accuse Foriș of treason. In June 1943, in a prison hospital in the camp in Tîrgu-Jiu, Gheorghe Gheorghiu-Dej, Emil Bodnăraș, Chivu Stoica, Iosif Rangheț, and Constantin Parvulescu decided to remove Foriș from his position. It is not clear whether Foriș actually cooperated with the police of Antonescu, as it was later alleged by the propaganda of Gheorghiu-Dej, nor to what extent his removal was arranged with the cooperation of the Comintern. Bodnăraș played a key role. After being released, Bodnăraș hid Foriș, and on 4 April 1944 he demanded that Foriș hand over all party materials. After the coup of August 1944 Foriș was held under house arrest on the orders of Gheorghiu-Dej. On 7 June 1945 he was seen for the last time. Most probably, he was arrested two days later. As late as 1947 his mother was still inquiring in the Securitate about the fate of her son, and because of this she was cruelly murdered. According to a version established in 1967, Foriș was killed in the summer of 1946 by Panteleimon Bondarenko, an agent of the GRU who, as Gheorghe Pintilie, became head of the Securitate in August 1948. Foriș was buried in an unmarked grave, and his body was never found. (WR)

Sources: A. G. Savu, "Ștefan Foriș: Schiță pentru o viitoare biografie," Magazin Istoric, 1968, no. 7; N. I. Florea, "Ștefan Foriș," Analele de Istorie, 1972, no. 3; Robert R. King, History of the Romanian Communist Party (Stanford, 1980); T. A. Pokivailova, "1939–1940: Cominternul și Partidul Comunist din România," Magazin Istoric, 1997, no. 3; Denis Deletant, Communist Terror in Romania: Gheorghiu-Dej and the Police State, 1948–1965 (New York, 1999).

FORMAN Miloš (18 December 1932, Čáslav, Kutná Hora district), Czech and American film director and screenplay writer. In 1956 Forman graduated from the Film and TV Department of the Academy of Musical Arts in Prague.

Later he worked in Czechoslovak TV and in the Laterna Magica Theater in Prague. He made his debut with satirical movies showing the hypocrisy of small-town dwellers: Konkurs (Contest; 1963); Černý Petr (Black Peter; 1963); and Lásky jedné plavovlásky (Loves of a blonde; 1965). These films brought him world recognition as one of the leaders of the Czechoslovak New Wave. Soon he received an offer from Carlo Ponti, with whom he directed Hoří má panenko (The firemen's ball; 1967). During the Warsaw Pact invasion of Czechoslovakia in 1968 Forman was in the West, where he learned that his recent movie had been banned; thus he decided to stay abroad, and in 1977 he received American citizenship. From 1975 he was a professor in the Film Department at Columbia University in New York. In his first American film, Taking Off (1971), he used the techniques of his earlier works, but the commercial failure of this film made him adapt an American prose style. This brought him success with the adaptation of Ken Kesey's One Flew Over the Cuckoo's Nest (1975), for which he received an Oscar in 1975. Later he filmed the famous musical Hair (1979) and directed a masterpiece movie on Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart, Amadeus (1984), which was awarded eight Oscars, including Forman's second Oscar as director. His People vs. Larry Flynt (1997), about the porn tycoon, raised some doubts about why Forman had portrayed Flynt as a champion of the freedom of speech but brought him commercial success and a Golden Bear award at the Berlin Film Festival. Forman has received many other awards, including an honorary doctorate from the Prague Academy of Musical Arts (1997). He authored the memoirs Turnaround: A Memoir (1993). (PU)

Sources: ČBS; Kdo byl kdo v našich dějinách ve 20. století, vol. 1 (Prague, 1998); International Dictionary of Films and Filmmakers, vol. 2 (Chicago and London, 1991); Geoffrey Nowell-Smith, The Oxford History of World Cinema (Oxford, 1996); Josef Škvorecký, All the Bright Young Men and Women (Toronto, 1971); Antonín Liehm, Closely Watched Films (New York, 1974); Antonín Liehm, The Miloš Forman Stories (New York, 1975); Jan Foll, Miloš Forman (Prague, 1989); Jasmin Dizdarević, Konkurs na režiséra Miloše Formana (Prague, 1990).

FRANK Josip (10 April 1844, Osijek–17 December 1911, Zagreb), Croatian lawyer and politician. After graduating from a high school in Osijek, Frank studied law in Vienna; after graduation, from 1872 he worked as a lawyer in Zagreb. A close aide to the head of the Zagreb part of the province (banat), from the 1870s Frank was active in the Party of Law (Stranka Prava), and from 1877 he edited Agramer Presse and Kroatische Post. He won fame in 1880, publishing a study of the economic failure of the Hungarian-Croatian agreement, and for it he received a

Ph.D. After the electoral defeat of 1893 the Party of Law split, and Frank, along with Ante Starčević and his son, founded the True Party of Law (Čista Stranka Prava [TPL]) in 1895. The party's program was nationalist, anti-Serbian, anti-Hungarian, and anti-clerical. For tactical reasons the TPL leaders sought support in Vienna. After the senior Starčević died, in 1896 Frank took the lead of the party and made its program and style even more radical. In 1905 he refused to join the Rijeka Resolution and the Croatian-Serbian Coalition, which won the May 1906 elections. Going against the coalition and seeking a compromise with Budapest, Frank worked with the court in Vienna and used fanatical anti-Serb rhetoric, appealing to nationalist xenophobia and nationalist myths. He failed to create paramilitary Croatian "legions." In 1895 he published Govori dra Josipa Franka (Speeches by Doctor Josip Frank). After his death he became an ideological model for the Ustasha movement of Ante Pavelić. (WR)

Sources: Enciklopedija Jugoslavije, vol. 3 (Zagreb, 1958); Franjo Supilo, Politika u Hrvatskoj (Rijeka, 1911); Iso Kršnjavi, Zapisci iza kulisa hrvatske politike, vols. 1–2 (Zagreb, 1986); Robert Stallaerst and Jeannine Laurens, Historical Dictionary of Croatia (Lanham, Md., 1995); Aleksa Djilas, The Contested Country: Yugoslav Unity and Communist Revolution, 1919–1953 (Cambridge, Mass., 1996).

FRANKO Ivan (27 or 25 August 1856, Nahuyewychi, near Drohobich–18 May 1916, Lviv [Lwów]), Ukrainian poet, writer, translator, and political activist. From 1864 to 1867 Franko studied in a Basilian school in Drohobich; in 1875 he graduated from a Drohobich high school and enrolled in philological studies at the University of Lemberg (Lviv). Later he also studied in Tchernowitz (Chernivtsi) (1890) and Vienna (1890–93). In 1893 he received a Ph.D. from the University of Vienna. At the same time he was active in the Academic Circle. In 1878–81 he co-edited the first Socialist newspaper in Galicia, Praca, and was a member of a Polish-Ukrainian-Jewish Socialist committee connected with it. In 1881 he was one of the key authors of the Prohrama sotsialistiv polskykh i ruskykh Skhidnoyi Halychyny (Program of the Polish and Ukrainian Socialists of East Galicia). He agitated among the workers of Lviv, Boryslav, and Drohobich and among Galician peasants. He was imprisoned for this activity four times in 1877–93. He was also fired from working on Ukrainian papers and prevented from taking over the chair of Ukrainian literature at the University of Lviv.

At the turn of the twentieth century Franko's views evolved from Socialist to nationalist. In 1886–96 he worked on Polish and Ukrainian papers, trying to establish a political party capable of modernizing the Ukrainian society and economy in Galicia. In 1890 he co-founded the Ruthenian-Ukrainian Radical Party (Rusko-Ukraińska Radykalna Partiya) and was its chairman until 1898. On its behalf he ran for the Vienna parliament, but he lost in 1897 and 1898. In 1899 he left the party, and until 1904 he belonged to the Ukrainian National Democratic Party (Ukraińsko Natsionalno-Demokratychna Partiya [USND]). His entry into the USND was connected with the arrival of Mykhailo Hrushevskyyi to Lviv. Thanks to Hrushevskyyi's support, in 1899 Franko became a full member of the Taras Shevchenko Research Society (TSRS). In 1889–1901 and 1903–12 he presided over the Philological Section of the society, and in 1898–1900 and 1908–13, over its Ethnographical Section. He edited a number of TSRS publications. In 1898–1907, along with Hrushevskyyi and Volodymir Hnatyuk, Franko co-edited the periodical Literaturno-Naukovyi Visnyk. In 1906 he received an honorary doctorate from the University of Kharkiv.

Franko authored many literary, scholarly, and journalistic pieces in Ukrainian, Polish, and German. He translated from fourteen languages. He made his literary debut in 1874. His best known works include the following: Kamenyari (Stonecutters; 1878); Vichnyi revolutsiனர் (The eternal revolutionary; 1880); Ne pora, ne pora (Not the time, not the time; 1880); the poem Moysey (1905; Moses, 1987); Zachar Berkut (1883; English edition, 1944); the drama Ukradene shchastya (Stolen happiness; 1893); and the fable-poem Łys Mykyta (1890). Franko edited several Ukrainian and Polish periodicals, including Druh (1878), Svit (1881), Zorya (1883–86), Pravda (1888), Tovarysh (1888), Narod (1890–95), Hromadskyyi holos (1895), Zhytye i slovo (1894–97), Dilo (1883–86), Przyjaciel Ludu (1886), Kurjer Lwowski (1887–97), Przegląd społeczny (1886), and Khliborob (1891). In 1897 he gave up journalism because of an article of his in the Vienna paper Die Zeit in which he called Adam Mickiewicz a “poet of treason.” The most complete editions of Franko's works are Tvory u 30 tomakh (Works in thirty volumes; 1924–31) and Zibrannyya tvoriv u 50 tomakh (Collected works in fifty volumes; 1976–86). English translations include Poems and Stories (1956), Stories (1972), and Short Stories (1977). (BB)

Sources: Wielka encyklopedia PWN, vol. 9 (Warsaw, 2002); Dovidnyk z istoriyi Ukrainy (Kiev, 2001); Entsyklopediya ukrainoznavstva, vol. 9 (Lviv, 2000); Clarence A. Manning, ed., Ivan Franko: The Poet of Western Ukraine (New York, 1968); Karl Treimer, Ivan Franko (Vienna, 1971); Nicholas Wacyk, Ivan Franko: His Thoughts and Struggles (New York, 1975); Myroslav Moroz, Ivan Franko: Bibliografichnyi pokazchik (Kiev, 1987); Yaroslav Hrytsak, “Dukh shcho tilo rve do boyu . . .”: Sproba politychnoho portreta Ivana Franka (Lviv, 1990); Ivan Franko i nacyonalne ta dukhovne vidrodzennia Ukrainy (Ivano-Frankovsk, 1997).

FRASHËRI Mehdi (15 or 28 February 1872, Frashëri–25 May 1963, Rome), Albanian writer, politician, and diplomat. The son of Ragib Frashëri, Frashëri was a member of a powerful family of great influence in the Turkish empire. After completing schools in Ioánnina and Monastir (Bitola), he studied at the Istanbul Polytechnic, from which he graduated in 1897. From 1901 he worked as the subprefect of Peqin (1901–3) and Ohrid (1903–6). Later he was the prefect of Seridze (1908) and Serres (1908–9). In 1909 he became the Turkish governor-general in Samsun and subsequently in Palestine. He worked with the Balkan Committee in London. At the news of the proclamation of the independence of Albania in 1912, Frashëri resigned his post and returned home. Initially, he became prefect of Berat, and then, until September 1914, he was Albania's representative to the International Control Commission. During World War I, he was in Switzerland and Italy. He became minister of interior and later minister of foreign affairs in the government that was created by the all-Albanian congress in Durrës (1918). He was a member of the Albanian delegation to the Paris Peace Conference. In 1921 he again became minister of foreign affairs. From 1921 to 1924 he sat in parliament as a deputy from Elbasan.

In 1922 Frashëri became Albania's representative to the League of Nations. He headed the Albanian delegation at the conference in Lausanne (1923) and also participated in the work of the Delimitation Commission, responsible for the demarcation of the Albanian-Greek and Albanian-Yugoslav borders. In June 1926 he headed an Albanian delegation that held talks on a trade treaty and a consular convention with Greece in Athens. In 1928–30 he again represented Albania in the League of Nations. From 1929 on he served as speaker of the upper chamber of the Albanian parliament, except for a brief interval in 1930, when he assumed the portfolio of the ministry of the national economy. On 21 October 1935 Frashëri became head of the “government of liberals,” which had an ambitious reform program involving the development of the infrastructure, the extension of democratic liberties, and the ending of corruption. He also favored cooperation with Italy. After a month the conservative opposition caused the collapse of the government, and Frashëri abandoned his intensive political activities. On 16 October 1943, during the German occupation, he became head of the Regency Council. His policy of loyalty toward Germany in return for independence in foreign policy proved a failure. In 1944 he left his country and went to Italy, where he lived for many years. He authored a book on the philosophy of the Turkish revolution that was published in Turkish in 1911. He also wrote political pamphlets, novels, the drama Tradhti (Treason; 1925), and Lidhja e Prizrenit (The League of Prizren; 1927). (TC)

Sources: Biographisches Lexikon, vol. 1; Hugh Seton-Watson, The East European Revolution (London, 1950); Ernesto Koliqi, "Mehdi Frashëri si shkrimtar," Shëjzat, 1973, no. 17; Bernd J. Fischer, "German Political Policy in Albania 1943–1944," in R.B. Spence & L.L. Nelson, ed., Scholar, Patriot, Mentor: Historical Essays in Honor of Dmitrije Djordjević (New York, 1992); Michael Schmidt-Neke, Entstehung und Ausbau der Königsdiktatur in Albanien (1912–1939): Regierungsbildungen, Herrschaftsweise und Machteliten in einem jungen Balkanstaat (Munich, 1987).

FRASHËRI Midhat (25 March 1880, Istanbul–3 October 1949, New York), Albanian journalist, writer, and politician. Born into one of the richest aristocratic families of central Albania, Frashëri was the son of Abdyl bey Frashëri, a co-founder of the League of Prizren. He started his journalistic career by editing the periodical Kalendari kombinar in Sofia. He also edited the periodicals Liria (1908–10) and Dituria (1909), published by the Albanian community in Salonika. From 1905 he worked in the Turkish administration in Salonika and presided over the local political club. After returning to Albania in 1911, he took part in the anti-Turkish rebellion. At the Congress of Vlorë in 1912 he represented Gjirokaster. In the government of Ismail Kemal he became minister of public works. In 1915 he published Hi edhe shpuzë (Ashes and glowing embers). During World War I he was interned in Romania and then in Switzerland. Upon his return home in December 1918 he joined the government of Turchan Pasha Përmeti in Durrës, which failed to gain international recognition for Albanian independence in terms of ethnic borders at the Paris Peace Conference. In 1923–26 he was ambassador to Greece. Between the two world wars he wrote a lot and published under the pseudonym "Lumo Skendo."

After the Italian invasion of April 1939, Frashëri organized opposition activities and was interned by the Italians. Released in early 1942, he returned to his secret activities. In April 1942 he refused to participate in a conference of representatives of republican resistance, organized by the Communists in Pezë, because he did not trust them. In October 1942 he took the lead of the National Front (Belli Kombatër), whose aim was the liberation of Albania in its ethnic borders, including Kosovo, and the establishment of democratic rule. The organization planned a land reform and industrialization. On 2 August 1943, at a conference in Mukje (Mukaj), near Tirana, Frashëri agreed to work with the Communist guerrillas of Enver Hoxha against the Italians in the Committee of the Defense of the Homeland and on an effort to incorporate Kosovo into Albania.

This agreement was vetoed by the Yugoslav Communists, who were sponsoring Hoxha, so the Communist partisans started attacking activists of the National Front and slandering them in the eyes of the Albanians. Under these circumstances, after the Germans replaced the Italians as occupiers, Frashëri and his organization made use of the opportunity to organize substitute autonomous authorities in the shape of the Constitutional Assembly, called into being on 18 October 1943. Frashëri joined the Regency Council, representing monarchists and nationalists; this gave the Communists a reason to accuse him of treason. Conflicts among the nationalists and Allied support for the Communist guerrillas undermined the position of the National Front.

When the Communists brought Albania under their control, in mid-1944 Frashëri left for France, where he took the lead of the Committee of Free Albania, founded on 26 July 1949, the strongest political organization of Albanian émigré politicians. Then he went to the United States, where he suddenly died of a heart attack. It was suspected that the heart attack was caused by the Soviets. Frashëri's library, the largest in Albania (twenty thousand volumes), was taken over by the Communist authorities and became the core of the National Library created in Tirana. After the fall of the Communist regime, some of his works were published in Albania. (WR) Sources: Communist Takeover and Occupation of Albania: Special Report No. 13 of the House of Representatives Select Committee on Communist Aggression (Washington, D.C., 1954); Stavro Skendi, Albania (New York, 1956); Stefanaq Pollo, Arben Puto, Kristo Frashëri, and Skënder Anamali, The History of Albania (London, 1981); Raymond Hutchings, Historical Dictionary of Albania (Lanham, Md., 1996); Jerzy Hauziński and Jan Leśny, Historia Albanii (Wrocław, 1992); Ressuli Namik, Albanian Literature (Boston, 1987).

FRASYNIUK Władysław (25 November 1954, Wrocław), Polish trade union activist and politician. Frasyński graduated from a technical high school and worked as a driver and mechanic in the Town Transportation Enterprise. In August 1980 he co-organized a strike in the Wrocław bus depot, and from September 1980 he was a member of the Inter-Factory Founding Committee (IFC) of Solidarity. From 5 March 1981 he presided over the IFC and then over the Lower Silesian Regional Board (LSRB) of Solidarity. He was also a member of the National Coordination Commission and then of the Presidium of the National Commission of Solidarity. When martial law was introduced on 13 December 1981, Frasyński avoided arrest and worked as head of the underground LSRB and a member of the all-Polish Provisional National Coordination Commission of Solidarity. Arrested on 5 October 1982 and sentenced to six years, he was released through the amnesty of 1984. Arrested again in February 1985 and sentenced to four and a half years in prison, he was amnestied in the fall of 1986. From September 1986 he belonged to the open Solidarity authorities: the Provisional Council and (from November 1987) the National Executive Commission. At the same time he presided over the LSRB. A member of the Civic Committee from 1988, in early 1989 he took part in the Round Table Talks. In 1990 he was one of the Civic Committee leaders. In 1990–91 he belonged to the Presidium of Solidarity's National Commission and was in opposition to its chairman, Lech Wałęsa. In October 1990 he resigned from chairing the LSRB. In July 1990 he co-founded the Civic Movement–Democratic Action (Ruch Obywatelski-Akcja Demokratyczna [ROAD]). He was one of its two plenipotentiaries, and from January 1991 he was chairman of the ROAD Main Board. He favored the unification of the ROAD with other groups supporting Tadeusz Mazowiecki as candidate for president. From 1991 to 1994 Frasyński was deputy chairman of the Democratic Union, which had resulted from this unification, and later he was a member of the National Council of the Union of Freedom (Unia Wolności [UW]). Frasyński belonged to its liberal wing. He was an MP from 1991 to 2001, and in 1991–93 he was deputy chairman of an extraordinary parliamentary commission to investigate the effects of martial law. After the electoral defeat of the UW in September 2001, Frasyński became head of the party. In October he lost in local elections for the mayor of Wrocław. (AF)

Sources: Kto jest kim w Polsce (Warsaw, 2001); Jerzy Holzer, "Solidarność," (Warsaw, 1983); Jerzy Holzer and Krzysztof Leski, "Solidarność" w podziemiu (Łódź, 1990); Opozycja w PRL: Słownik biograficzny 1956–89 (Warsaw, 2000); Antoni Dudek, Pierwsze lata III Rzeczypospolitej 1989–2001 (Kraków, 2002).

FRENȚIU Valeriu Traian (25 April 1875, Reșița–11 July 1952, Sighet Marmăției), Romanian Greek Catholic bishop, victim of communism. Frențiu graduated from high school in Blaj. In 1894–98 he studied theology at the University of Budapest. In September 1898 he was ordained. Later he continued his studies in Vienna, where he received a Ph.D. in theology in 1902. After returning to Transylvania, he was chancellor of a parish, parish priest in Oraștie and Hețeg, and vicar of the Lugoj bishopric. In 1912 he was consecrated bishop of Lugoj. In early December 1918 he was, along with Bishop Iuliu Hossu, a delegate to the National Assembly in Alba Iulia that proclaimed the unification of Transylvania with Romania. In 1922 he was appointed bishop of Oradea (Arad). He strove to introduce the Marian and Pauline orders into Romania and to establish religious schools. When a part of Transylvania was incorporated into Hungary according to the terms of the 1940 Vienna Award, Frențiu protested against the discrimination of the local Romanian population; for this he was expelled to Romania. In 1941 he became apostolic administrator of the Alba Iulia and Fargaș archdioceses, and in 1947 he returned to his duties as bishop of Oradea. When the Communist authorities started to repress the Greek Catholic Church, on 28 October 1948 Frențiu was arrested; along with five other Greek Catholic bishops, he was placed in the Dragoslavele Monastery (a summer residence of the Orthodox patriarchs of Romania, turned into a prison). In early 1949 they were all moved to the Căldărușani Monastery, also turned into a prison, and from there Frențiu was the last of the group to be moved to the Sighet Marmăției Prison. After two years spent under inhuman conditions, he fell seriously ill and died. He was secretly buried at night in a collective grave in the prison yard. In order to avoid pilgrimages by believers, the cemetery was soon leveled. Frențiu's beatification proceedings are under way. (LW)

Sources: Józef Darski, Rumunia: Historia, współczesność, konflikty narodowe (Warsaw, 1995); Paul Caravia, Virgiliu Constantinescu, and Flori Stănescu, The Imprisoned Church of Romania, 1944–1989 (Bucharest, 1999); Denis Deletant, Communist Terror in Romania: Gheorghiu-Dej and the Police State, 1948–1965 (New York, 1999); www.bru.ro.

FRIEDRICH István (1 July 1883, Malacka [now in Slovakia]–25 November 1951, Vác), Hungarian politician. In 1905 Friedrich graduated in engineering from the Budapest Polytechnic. Then he studied at the polytechnic in Berlin, where he later worked as chief engineer in All-gemeine Elektrizitäts-Gesellschaft. In 1908 he founded a machine-building factory in Budapest, which he sold in 1920. He started political activities in 1912, joining the opposition Independence and 48 Party. In the fall of 1914 he volunteered for the army as a lieutenant in the artillery. Later, unable to fight on the front lines, he was directed to work in Plzeň and Vienna, and in 1917 he retired. He became famous for organizing a mass demonstration of support for the Hungarian National Council on 28 October 1918. Three days later he became secretary of state for political affairs in the Ministry of Defense in the government of Mihály Károlyi. He entered into closer contacts with the radical opposition to Károlyi's rule, so in February 1919 he resigned.

During the Hungarian Soviet Republic (HSR) Friedrich was active in the opposition. He was arrested and sentenced to death. He managed to escape and became one of the leaders of a counterrevolutionary organization called the White House. On 6 August 1919, with the support of the Italian mission of the Entente and the Romanian command, he forced the “trade union” government of Gyula Peidl to resign. The next day Archduke Joseph Habsburg entrusted him with the formation of a new government and on 15 August nominated him prime minister. Friedrich annulled the HSR legislation and introduced summary procedures that allowed for the mass persecution of the revolutionaries. Friedrich failed to stabilize his power, as the Hungarian territory east of the Danube was occupied by the Romanians, and the western part of the country, by the National Army under Miklós Horthy. The Entente and the successor states of the Habsburg monarchy did not recognize his government, fearing a restoration of the Habsburgs. On 24 November 1919 Friedrich resigned. In the new government of Károly Huszár he received the portfolio of national defense. After Horthy was elected regent in March 1920, Friedrich resigned with the whole cabinet. In 1920–39 he was an MP on behalf of small Christian Democratic parties. In the summer of 1921 he was accused of taking part in the murder of Prime Minister István Tisza, but he was acquitted. In November 1921 he was temporarily arrested for participation in the second return of Charles IV Habsburg. For this reason he worked with the opponents of István Bethlen. Soon, however, he was marginalized in political life and fell into oblivion. In July 1951 he was arrested by the Communists in connection with the show trial of Archbishop József Grósz. He was sentenced to fifteen years in prison under the false accusation of initiating and leading a plot aimed at overthrowing the government. Friedrich died in prison. In 1990 his sentence was invalidated, and Friedrich was rehabilitated. (JT)

Sources: Magyar Életrajzi Lexikon, vol. 1 (Budapest, 1967); Magyar Nagylexikon, vol. 8 (Budapest, 1999); Új Magyar Életrajzi Lexikon, vol. 2 (Budapest, 2001); Oszkar Jaszi, Revolution and Counterrevolution in Hungary (London, 1924); Rudolf L. Tótkés, Bela Kun and the Hungarian Soviet Republic (New York, 1967); Paul Ignotus, Hungary (London, 1972).

FRLEC Boris (10 February 1936, Ljubljana), Slovene diplomat. After high school in Ljubljana, in 1959 Frlec graduated in the natural sciences and technology from the University of Ljubljana, and in 1965 he received a Ph.D. in chemistry. From 1959 he worked in the Jožef Stefan Institute, and from 1975 he was its director. An associate professor from 1968 and a full professor at the University of Ljubljana from 1976, he also studied in the United States and the United Kingdom. He published numerous articles in inorganic chemistry. From 1982 to 1989 he was deputy chairman of the Executive Council (government) of the Slovene republic, and in 1989 he assumed the position of ambassador to Germany. After the breakup of Yugoslavia, in 1992 he became ambassador of Slovenia to Germany. After the dismissal of Zoran Thaler, in September 1997 Frlec became foreign minister. He pursued intense efforts to lead his country into the European Union. On 31 March 1998 Slovenia formally started accession negotiations. In the Slovene relationship with Croatia Frlec made some progress, but he failed to solve many problems, such as the final delimitation of the land and sea borders. In January 2000 he resigned for personal reasons, and in the summer of 2000 he became ambassador to the Netherlands. (AO)

Sources: Government of the Republic of Slovenia, 1999 (Ljubljana, 1999); Europa Środkowo-Wschodnia 1997–2000 (Warsaw, 1999–2002); www.rferl.org.

FUNDO L Lazar (1894?, Korçë–October 1944, Bica, near Kukës), Albanian Communist activist. Fundo came from a family of Wallachian origin. He was a member of the Bashkimi (Unity) organization. After the murder of Avni Rustemi, the founder of the organization, by Ahmed Zogu's people in 1924, Fundo assumed the leadership of the organization. At the same time he became editor-in-chief of the organization's newspaper, also called Bashkimi. He took part in the revolution of June 1924 in Albania, and after the fall of the Fan Noli government he went to Vienna. There he probably met groups of Balkan Communists. From Vienna he went to Moscow, and he was the first Albanian to attend the school of the Communist International there. In 1929 he attended the Eighth Conference of the Balkan Communist Federation. During the Stalinist purges Fundo left the USSR and went to Switzerland and then to Paris, where he studied law and became aligned with Trotskyism. During his stay in Moscow he had already been sending letters to Fan Noli, emphasizing his negative attitude toward Stalinism and the Soviet system. In 1938 Sejfulla Malëshova denounced him as a participant in Nikolay Bukharin's plot. Fundo was called to Moscow, but he did not go. In France he acted against the recruitment of Albanians to the International Brigades that fought in Spain. After he again refused to return to Moscow, the Comintern ordered his assassination. In Paris, Malëshova tried to kill him with an axe. After returning to Albania, Fundo made an unsuccessful attempt to found a Socialist party. In November 1939 he took part in a demonstration that was organized in Korçë on the anniversary of the proclamation of Albania's independence. Captured by the Italian police and interned in a camp on the island of Ventotene, from 1939 to 1943 Fundo was held there with the Kryeziu brothers. After his release from the camp, he joined the troops led by the Kryeziu brothers, which were active in the borderland between Kosovo and Albania. Captured by Communist guerrillas in September 1944, Fundo was tortured on the personal orders of Enver Hoxha, who wanted to extort information from him about the troops' aims and activities, as well as information about the British mission. After a short trial, Fundo was killed as an "agent of British intelligence." (TC)

Sources: Lazitch; Julian Amery, Sons of the Eagle: A Study in Guerilla War (London, 1948); Uran Butka, Ringjallje (Tetovë, 1996); Reginald Hibbert, Albania's National Liberation Struggle: The Bitter Victory (London and New York, 1991); Arshi Pipa, Albanian Stalinism: Ideo-Political Aspects (New York, 1990).

G

GAÁL Gaszton (30 November 1868, Székesfehérvár–26 October 1932, Balatonboglár), Hungarian politician. In 1889 Gaál graduated from the higher agricultural school in Magyaróvár. From 1890 he worked on various landed estates, and in 1894–1900 he worked in the Hungarian Ornithological Center as an assistant to Ottó Herman. From 1900 he ran his own farm, and from 1902, an estate in Balatonboglár. In 1905–6 he took part in the so-called national resistance action against the government of Géza Fejérváry, whom Emperor Franz Joseph had nominated prime minister without regard to the results of the parliamentary elections, which had been won by the so-called national coalition, which was critical of the 1867 agreement. In 1906–10 Gaál was an MP on behalf of the Independence and 48 Party, which belonged to this coalition. During the Hungarian Soviet Republic in 1919 his estate was taken over by the state administration and he had to go into hiding. From September 1919 to January 1920 he was a government commissioner for Baranya, Somogy, and Tolna Counties, as well as governor of Somogy County. In 1920–26 and from 1927 until his death he was an MP; from July 1920 it was as a member of the Christian Smallholders', Agrarian Laborers', and Burghers' Party. Two months later he left this party, but in February 1921 he returned and became its head. From January to August 1922 he was deputy chairman of the ruling Party of Unity of Count István Bethlen, and from August 1921 he was speaker of the parliament for a year. In protest against the government tax policy, unfavorable to the countryside, in August 1922 Gaál left the Party of Unity. He stayed in the opposition, appealing for a reduction of the tax burden imposed on agriculture and for the abolition of industrial protective tariffs. Having attracted well-to-do and medium-income farmers and peasants, in 1926 he founded the Hungarian Agrarian Party (HAP), which he headed and which won three seats in the elections of 1927. In December 1930 the HAP joined the Independent Smallholders' Party of Zoltán Tildy and Ferenc Nagy. From January 1931 until his death Gaál was its chairman and headed its parliamentary club. (JT)

Sources: Magyar Életrajzi Lexikon, vol. I (Budapest, 1967); Magyar Nagylexikon, vol. 8 (Budapest, 1999); Új Magyar Életrajzi Lexikon, vol. 2 (Budapest, 2001).

GABROVSKI Petar (9 July 1898, Razgrad–1 February 1945, Sofia), Bulgarian lawyer and politician. Gabrovski graduated from high school in Turnovo (now Veliko Turnovo) in 1916. After training at the Reserve Officers' School, he took part, as a platoon commander, in the final stages of World War I (1917–18). After the war he started to study law at Sofia University, graduating in 1923. Then he went to Vienna to pursue his field of specialization. After his return to Bulgaria, from 1924 he worked as a defense attorney in Sofia, and he was at the same time a member of the Supreme Bar Council and a member of the Presidium of the Union of Bulgarian Attorneys. In 1936 he was co-founder and one of the leaders of the pro-Fascist organization Soldiers for the Consolidation of Bulgarian National Identity (Ratnichestvo za Napredyka na Bylgarshinata). During World War II he served as minister of railways, post, and telegraphs in the governments of Georgi Kioseivanov and Bogdan Filov (October 1939–September 1943), and between 9 and 14 September 1943 he simultaneously served as prime minister. After the coup of 9 September 1944 Gabrovski was arrested, sentenced by the People's Court to death, and executed. In August 1996 the Supreme Court of Bulgaria quashed that sentence in extraordinary appeal proceedings. Gabrovski was the author of Politicheskite zadachi na momenta (Political tasks for today; 1943). (JJ)

Sources: Entsiklopediya Bulgariya, vol. 2 (Sofia, 1981); Jerzy Jackowicz, Partie opozycyjne w Bułgarii 1944–1948 (Warsaw, 1997); Tasho Tashev, Ministrite na Bylgaria 1879–1999: Entsiklopedichen spravochnik (Sofia, 1999).

GAFENCU Grigore (30 January 1892, Bucharest–30 January 1957, Geneva), Romanian lawyer and diplomat. Gafencu studied law at the University of Geneva. He earned a Ph.D. in law at the Sorbonne (1914). During World War I he fought as an aviator, receiving the Order of Michael the Brave in 1918 for his courage. He founded the magazine Revista Vremei, the economic periodical Argus, and one of the most popular Romanian daily journals, Timpul. He also directed the Orient-Radio (Rador) news agency in Bucharest. His press published works by Gheorghe M. Cantacuzino, Nicolae Iorga, Gheorghe Brătianu and others. In 1926 Gafencu was one of the founders of the National Peasant Party. He was an MP in 1928–30 and a senator between 1934 and 1937. He was secretary general of the Romanian Ministry of Foreign Affairs in 1928, deputy minister of public works and transportation (1929–30), deputy minister of foreign affairs (1932), deputy minister of industry and trade (1932–33), and foreign minister from December 1938.

As head of the Romanian diplomatic corps, Gafencu made efforts to preserve the neutrality of his country and peace in Europe. In September 1939, under his ministry, the Polish government and military units were interned in Romania, while other refugees found shelter there as well. After his departure from the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, in July 1940 Gafencu was appointed envoy and minister plenipotentiary to the USSR. Although he was a political opponent of the regime that came into power after the abdication of Charles II in September 1940, he served as minister to Moscow until Romanian troops entered the war against the USSR on the side of Germany in June 1941. Gafencu was interned by the Soviet authorities, and in July 1941 he was sent to Turkey along with members of the legations of Italy, Finland, and Slovakia. He went into political exile in Switzerland, where he maintained contacts with other opposition politicians in exile. He did not accept various posts that the Romanian authorities offered him, and he maintained contacts with the Polish government-in-exile.

After the war, Gafencu was an avowed opponent of the Communist regime, and he was the founder of the Romanian National Committee (1948). He was in constant touch with King Michael I, former prime minister General Nicolae Rădescu, and other politicians in exile. In November 1947, the Communist court in Bucharest sentenced Gafencu in absentia to twenty years' imprisonment for the "betrayal of his homeland." Gafencu was a member of the Academy of International Law. He attended the congresses of the European Movement in The Hague (1948) and Brussels (1949). He lectured in the United States, and in 1951 he was a signatory of the "Declaration of Aims and Principles of Liberation of the Central and Eastern European Peoples." He was also active in the Assembly of Captive European Nations in New York. In 1968 his body was buried in Budapest. Gafencu is known in historiography for his memoirs of his official visits in April and May 1939 and his talks with Józef Beck, Adolf Hitler, Neville Chamberlain, Benito Mussolini, and politicians in Paris, Brussels, Belgrade, and the Vatican: Prèliminaires de la guerre a l'Est (1944; Prelude to the Russian Campaign, 1945). In 1991 his Inseminari politice 1929–1939 (Political memoirs 1929–1939) were published, and in 1992, Jurnal (iunie 1940–iulie 1942) (Journal [June 1940–July 1942]). (FA/TD)

Sources: Biographisches Lexikon, vol. 2; The Times, 31 January 1957; Tadeusz Dubicki, Wojsko polskie w Rumunii 1939–1941 (Warsaw, 1994); Archive of New Records in Warsaw, Legation Bern, catalogue numbers: 320, 322, 327, 328, 331.

GAJDA Radola [originally Rudolf Geidl] (14 February 1892, Kotor–15 April 1948, Prague), Czech general and politician of German origin. Between 1912 and 1913 Gajda volunteered to serve as an artilleryman in the First Balkan War. During World War I he enlisted in the Montenegrin Army (1915), and after its defeat he managed to get to Russia, where he first joined the Serbian division in Odessa and then the Czechoslovak Legion (1917). As a battalion commander, he took part in a battle at Zborov (2 August 1917), after which he became a regiment commander. Following the "incident of Chelyabinsk," where the legionnaires at first lynched one of the prisoners on their way to Siberia and then forcefully released the participants of that event who were arrested by the Red Army, Gajda called for action against the Bolsheviks. In May 1918 he assumed the leadership of a military unit on the Omsk-Irkutsk trunk line in Siberia. Promoted to major general and divisional commander in September, in October 1918 he became commander of the northern Ural front, where he led the offensive that ended in the capture of Perm in December 1918. In 1919, in agreement with Milan R. Štefanik, Gajda fought in the Siberian army of Admiral Aleksandr Kolchak, and for a short period he was his chief of staff. However, because of a conflict with the Russian generals, Gajda left the army, and in November 1919 he tried to organize a rebellion against Kolchak. After the rebellion was put down owing to the intercession of the legionnaires, he was released on condition that he immediately leave Russia. His days in Siberia are described in Moje paměti (My memoirs; 1921).

Soon after returning to Czechoslovakia, Gajda left for Paris for one year, and he studied at the military academy. He later commanded an infantry division in Košice until 1924. In 1924–26 he was deputy chief of the General Staff, and from March to July 1926, chief of the General Staff. In 1925 he was co-founder of the National Fascist Community (Národní Obec Fašistická [NFC]). In 1926 rumors spread that Gajda, along with members of Andrej Hlinka's People's Party, was preparing a coup d'état. Gajda was put on leave and suspended from military duties but was not brought to trial until 1929, when he was sentenced to two months' imprisonment and expulsion from the army on the charge of betraying military secrets. His guilt was never proved beyond a reasonable doubt, the mild sentence attesting to the court's doubts. After his release from prison, Gajda became leader of the NFC and sat as its representative in the National Assembly from 1929 to 1931 and from 1935 to 1939. In 1933 a group of Fascists attempted to attack the barracks in Brno, a move that was intended to be the beginning of a coup. The coup perpetrators named Gajda as their leader, but he denied having been involved in the plot and was acquitted by the court. In August 1938, in the face of the collapse of Czechoslovakia, Gajda offered his services to President Edvard Beneš, who until then had been his enemy. However, his offer was rejected. In 1938–39 he was vice-president of the Party of National Unity, led by Rudolf Beran. On 11 March 1939 he was rehabilitated by a decree of Emil Hácha, and he was restored to the rank of general. After the proclamation of independence of Slovakia, at the negotiations for the creation of a new government Gajda offered to restore order in Slovakia within twenty-four hours. After 15 March 1939 he offered to collaborate with the occupier, and along with the Czech Fascists he tried to take over power in the Protectorate of Bohemia and Moravia. However, the Germans were not interested in his offer. Arrested in May 1945, two years later Gajda was sentenced to two years in prison, not for collaboration but only for promoting fascism. Since he had been held in detention pending trial, he was soon released. (PU)

Sources: ČBS; Kdo byl kdo v našich dějinách ve 20. století, vol. 1 (Prague, 1998); Politická elita meziválečného Československa 1918–1938: Kdo byl kdo za první republiky (Prague, 1998); F. G. Campbell, Confrontation in Central Europe (Chicago, 1975); Jerzy Tomaszewski, “Brno 1933: Porucznik Kobsinek maszeruje przeciw Masarykowi i Republice,” in Przewroty i zamachy stanu: Europa 1918–1939 (Warsaw, 1981); Antonín Klimek and Petr Hofman, Vítěz, který prohrál: General Radola Gajda (Prague, 1995).

GAŁ Fedor (20 March 1945, Terežín), Slovak sociologist and politician. Gál graduated from the Bratislava Polytechnic. In 1972–82 he worked in the Institute of Labor and Social Affairs and in the Institute of the Standard of Living, and from 1982 to 1989, in the Institute of Forecasting of the Slovak Academy of Sciences in Bratislava. In November 1989 he took part in student protests that initiated the Velvet Revolution, and then he co-founded the movement Public against Violence (Verejnosť proti Nasíliu [VPN]). In 1990 he headed the VPN coordination center; in 1990–91 he chaired its Slovak council and was director of the Institute of Social Analysis of Comenius University in Bratislava. As a member of the liberal-democratic wing of the VPN, Gál supported the economic reforms of Václav Klaus, which led to internal tensions within the VPN. In the spring of 1991, when a group of followers of Vladimír Mečiar founded the faction For a Democratic Slovakia and then transformed it into the Movement for a Democratic Slovakia (Hnutie za Demokratické Slovensko [HZDS]), breaking up the VPN, Gál resigned from his position. In 1991–92 he was an adviser to Prime Minister Marian Čalfa, and he took an active part in the negotiations on the Czechoslovak federation. He supported maintaining the federation, so when Czechoslovakia split up, he retired from political life. From 1992 he was an associate professor in the Sociology Department of Charles University in Prague, where he established the Center for Political Analysis. From 1990 he co-owned the G-Plus Press, and in 1993–94 he co-founded a private television station, NOVA. Gál co-authored Svet vedy a poznávania (The world of science and cognition; 1988) and Dnešní krize česko-slovenských vztahů (Today’s crisis of Czecho-Slovak relations; 1992); and he authored Možnost’ a skutečnost’ (Ability and reality; 1990), Z prvej ruky (At first hand; 1991), and O jinakosti (On dissimilarity; 1998). (PU)

Sources: ČBS; Jan Rychlík, Rozpad Československa: Česko-slovenské vztahy 1989–1992 (Bratislava, 2002); Eric Stein, Czecho/Slovakia: Ethnic Conflict, Constitutional Fissure, Negotiated Breakup (Ann Arbor, 1997); Verejnosť proti nasíliu 1989–1991: Svedectva a dokumenty (Bratislava, 1998).

GAŁCZYŃSKI Konstanty Ildefons (23 January 1905, Warsaw–6 December 1953, Warsaw), Polish poet. Following graduation from high school, Gałczyński started philological studies at the University of Warsaw, but he never completed them. During the 1920s he belonged to the Kwadryga (Quadriga) poetry group, and in 1926–33 he wrote for the satirical periodical Cyrułik Warszawski. Between 1930 and 1933 he worked as a censor at the Government Commissariat in Warsaw and then as an official at the Polish consulate in Berlin. From 1935 until 1939 he was affiliated with the right-wing Prosto z mostu. He fought the invading Nazis in September 1939 but was taken prisoner and spent the war in a German POW camp in Altengrabow, near Magdeburg. In 1946, he returned to Poland. Initially, he lived in Kraków, writing for the weekly Przekrój. Then he moved to Szczecin and Warsaw. Because of the official introduction of Socialist realism, from 1950 he was criticized for “formalism” and “petty bourgeois tastes,” which were alien to Communism.

Porfirion osietek czyli Klub Świętokradców (Porfirion the Donkey or the Club of the Sacrilegious; 1929) was Gałczyński’s prose debut, a novel full of humor and imagination. His novels combined the satirical and the grotesque with a touch of Romantic lyricism. In his rhymed novel, Koniec świata (The end of the world; 1929), and Utworach poetyckich (Poetic works; 1937), he expressed his catastrophic premonitions, masked by an absurdist ambience and surrealist humor. At the end of the 1930s, Gałczyński’s hero was a member of the Polish intelligentsia, full of dreams but powerless and backward. Gałczyński’s lyrical output is dominated by love poems and depictions of a happy family life. In the POW camp, he wrote patriotic poems (for example, Pieśń o żołnierzach z Westerplatte [Song about the soldiers of Westerplatte]), often adhering to the Romantic tradition. After his return to Poland, he continued lampooning the Polish intelligentsia—for instance, in his cycle of grotesque miniatures, Teatrzyk Zielona Gęś (The green goose theater), which was published in Przekrój. In it he created an original surrealist cabaret starring literary figures, animals, and even abstract ideas. His comprehensive collection, Zaczarowana dorożka (The magic cab; 1948), contained, among other pieces, his lyrical poems about Kraków. During Socialist realism Gałczyński succumbed to official pressure and wrote the propaganda song Ukochany kraj and a satirical poem, “Chryzostoma Bulwiecia podróż do Ciemnogrodu” (Chrysostom Bulwieć goes to Ignoranceville; 1954). His concept of “Ignoranceville” entered colloquial Polish as a symbol of backwardness and petty bourgeois conservatism. Between 1957 and 1960 his Dzieła w pięciu tomach (Works in five volumes) were published. (WR)

Sources: Literatura polska XX wieku: Przewodnik encyklopedyczny, vol. 1 (Warsaw, 2000); Wielka encyklopedia PWN, vol. 4 (Warsaw, 2001); Andrzej Stawar, O Gałczyńskim (Warsaw, 1959); Wspomnienia o Gałczyńskim (Warsaw, 1961); Andrzej Drawicz, Konstanty Ildelfons Gałczyński (Warsaw, 1973).

GALICA Shote [originally Qerime Halili] (1895 Radiševë, near Drenica–July 1927, Derven, near Fushe Krujë), Albanian fighter for the independence of Kosovo. In 1909 her native village was burned down by Turkish troops led by Džhevit Pasha. Her family went into hiding in the mountains. After returning to the village, her family lived in extreme poverty. In 1911 Galica joined one of the units fighting in Kosovo against the Turks, and from 1912, against the Serbs. In 1915 she married Azem Galica, one of the most famous warriors in Kosovo at that time, and joined his unit. In 1916–17 this unit was active on the borderland between two occupation zones: the Austro-Hungarian and the Bulgarian. During World War I Galica took part in dozens of battles against Serbian, Austro-Hungarian, and Bulgarian units. During an encounter in March 1917, when Azem’s unit was encircled by the Bulgarians in Obrij, Galica was one of the few who managed to escape from the siege, though she was wounded. When in 1919 the Serbian units were disarming the Albanian population in Kosovo, Azem and Shote decided to continue their struggle in the region of Drenica. Galica was a liaison to the Kosovo Committee, which was active in Albania. In 1922, when a neutral zone was established between Albania and Kosovo, the town of Junik, situated within that zone, became the unit’s base. Hoping for more active support from Tirana for the Kosovar cause, Azem and Shote backed Hasan bey Prishtina and Bajram Curri.

While the victory of the revolution in June 1924 in Albania created hopes for the internationalization of the Kosovar cause, it also brought an end to the neutral zone. When on 17 July 1924 Azem died of severe wounds, Galica took his place. She delivered reports on the situation in Kosovo to the Kosovo Committee, which was active in Shkodër, and she organized bases for the wounded members of the unit in northern Albania. When in December 1924 Ahmed Zogu came to power in Tirana, her unit fought in the region of Has against Serbian troops that supported Zogu. Galica led the guerrilla warfare in Kosovo until 1926, when she was seriously wounded again and decided to return to Albania. At first she lived in Shullaz, then in Derven. Although her friends appealed to the authorities for help for Galica, she lived in extreme poverty, without social or medical assistance. Thanks to her friends from Kosovo, in 1927 she was admitted to a hospital in Tirana, but after a few days of treatment she returned to Derven, where she died. (TC)

Sources: Fjalor Enciklopedik Shqiptar (Tirana, 1985); Ajet Haxhiu, Shota dhe Azem Galica (Tirana, 1982); Historia e popullit shqiptar (Tirana, 1994).

GALVANAUSKAS Ernestas (20 November 1882, Zizonys, near Panevežys [Poniewież]–24 July 1967, Aix-les-Bains, France), Lithuanian politician. In 1908 Galvanauskas completed engineering studies at the Institute of Mining in St. Petersburg. While a student, he became involved in independence activities. In 1905 he took part in the Grand Lithuanian Assembly in Vilnius (Wilno), and then he was a co-founder of the populist Lithuanian Peasant Union (Lietuvos Valstiečių Sąjunga). From 1908 to 1912 he studied at the university in Liege in Belgium, and then he worked in a French firm in Serbia. At the beginning of 1919 he returned to Lithuania and became secretary of the Lithuanian delegation to the Paris Peace Conference. From 7 October 1919 he served as prime minister. Among other matters, he dealt with the codification of laws and the organization of the administration and the army. He also had to deal with economic difficulties. In February 1920 he put down a rebellion in a garrison in Kaunas. He unsuccessfully attempted to force Poland to renounce its claims to the Vilnius (Wilno) region, and he did not gain international support for the Lithuanian stance. Galvanauskas held elections in April 1920, but as a result of these elections he had to resign on 19 June 1920. However, he remained minister of finance and trade. On 2 February 1922 he again became head of the government. He was unsuccessful in his efforts to prevent the international recognition of the incorporation of the Vilnius region into Poland. On 10 June 1924 he resigned his post.

In 1924–27 Galvanauskas was an envoy to London, from where he returned after the nationalist regime consolidated its power. He was in charge of the administration of the port in Klaipėda and worked as editor of the newspaper Vakarai; in 1934 he founded the Trade Institute and was its rector. In November 1939 he became minister of finance in the government of Antanas Merkys, and remained in office until the arrival of the Red Army in mid-June 1940. After the creation of the government of Justas Paleckis, Galvanauskas was appointed to a ministerial post, but realizing that this meant cooperation in the enslavement of the country, on 5 July he resigned and secretly left the country. In September 1940 he became head of the Lithuanian National Committee, which sought German support for the rebuilding of an independent Lithuania. After the Germans invaded Lithuania in June 1941 and arrested members of the Lithuanian provisional government, including Kazys Škirpa, the leader of this government, Galvanauskas withdrew from political life. After the war he lived in France, and between 1947 and 1962, in Madagascar, where he founded a technical high school for trade and handicrafts in Majunga (now Mahajanga). Owing to his state of health, at the end of his life Galvanauskas returned to France, where he died. (WR) Sources: EL, vol. 2; Saulius Sužiedelis, Historical Dictionary of Lithuania (Lanham, Md., 1997); Alfred E. Senn, The Great Powers, Lithuania, and the Vilna Question, 1920–1928 (Leiden, 1966); Bronis J. Kaslas, ed., The USSR-German Aggression against Lithuania (New York, 1973); David M. Crowe, The Baltic States and the Great Powers: Foreign Relations, 1938–1940 (Boulder, Colo., 1993).

GANEV Dimitur [originally Vurbanov] (28 October 1898, Gradets, Sliven County–20 April 1964, Sofia), Bulgarian Communist activist. After graduating from a high school in Varna in 1915, Ganev fought in World War I. From 1918 he was a member of the Bulgarian Communist Youth Union, and in 1921 he joined the Bulgarian Communist Party (BCP). From 1921 to 1923 he worked as a teacher in Sliven County. He took part in the preparation of the Communist uprising of September 1923. After the failure of the uprising he was temporarily arrested. From 1924 he served as secretary of the Supply Workers' Union. In 1925–29 he belonged to the Central Committee (CC) of the Independent Workers' Trade Union and was a member of the Regional Committee of the BCP in Sofia. In 1929, as a member of the CC of the BCP, Ganev went to Romania, where he was a secretary of the Revolutionary Organization of Dobruja. From 1934 he was a member of the CC and of the Secretariat of the CC of the Romanian Communist Party (RCP). From 1926 to 1934 he edited the newspaper Free Dobruja. Arrested and sentenced to ten years' imprisonment, he was released in 1940 after Bulgaria took over southern Dobruja. He then served as secretary of the county committee of the Bulgarian Workers' Party (BWP) in Dobrich (also spelled Dobrič). In 1942 he became a member of the Politburo of the CC of the BWP, secretary of the District Committee of the BWP in Sofia, and editor of the illegal newspaper Rabotnichesko Delo. From February 1944 he was a plenipotentiary of the CC of the BWP in the insurgents' operational zone in Varna.

On 9 September 1944 Ganev became a member of the Bulgarian delegation set up to establish contact with the staff of the Soviet Third Ukrainian Front in order to conclude a truce. He later served as head of the public relations department of the CC of the BWP; was again editor-in-chief of the daily, Rabotnichesko Delo and secretary of the BWP town committee and district committee in Sofia; and was a member of the National Council of the Fatherland Front. In 1947–48 he was an envoy to Romania, and from 1949, a deputy member of the Politburo of the CC of the BCP, which was formed from the merger of the BWP with a part of the Social Democratic Party. Between December 1948 and September 1952 Ganev was minister of foreign trade. In 1952 he fell into disfavor and spent two years as minister plenipotentiary in Czechoslovakia, but at the Sixth Congress of the BCP in March 1954 he returned to the Secretariat of the CC, and from September 1957 he was a member of the Politburo. He also represented the BCP at the Twentieth Congress of the CPSU in Moscow in February 1956. After the April plenum of the CC of the BCP in 1956 Ganev became head of a commission set up to investigate the case of Traicho Kostov. The commission found irregularities, but its verdict was not made public; it was used only in the internal strife among the top leaders. From 1945 until his death Ganev was a deputy to successive National Assemblies. In 1954–57 and 1962–64 he also served as president of the Presidium of the Second and Fourth National Assemblies. In 1987 his Izbrani proizvedeniia 1944–1964 (Selected works 1944–1964) were published. (JJ)

Sources: Entsiklopediya Bulgariya, vol. 2 (Sofia, 1981); J. F. Brown, Bulgaria under Communist Rule (New York, 1970); Tasho Tashev, Ministrite na Bulgariya 1879–1999: Entsiklopedichen spravochnik (Sofia, 1999).

GANEV Stoyan (23 July 1955, Pazardzhyk), Bulgarian lawyer and politician. Ganev graduated in law from the University of Sofia in 1973, and in 1985 he received his candidate's degree (doctorate) at the University of Moscow. In 1985–89 he lectured in constitutional law at the Law Department of the University of Sofia. From 1989 he began to play an important role in the opposition against the Communist regime, co-founding the Union of Democratic Forces (Sayuz na Demokratichnite Sili [UDF]). After the fall of Todor Zhivkov in November 1989, Ganev was deputy to the Grand National Assembly and then to the National Assembly (1991–94). He was also deputy chairman of the UDF parliamentary club (1991–92) and chairman of the United Democratic Center, which was a part of the UDF. From 8 November 1991 to 20 May 1992 he was deputy prime minister, and from November 1991 to the end of December 1992, also minister of foreign affairs in the government of Filip Dimitrov. In 1992 he presided over the Forty-seventh Session of the UN General Assembly. After leaving the government, he was dismissed from the UDF for his favorable attitude toward President Zhelyu Zhelev and for his close contacts with Dimitrov. He joined the Bulgarian Business Bloc. Ganev co-authored Dyrzhavnoto pravo na sotsialisticheskite strani (State law in the Socialist countries; 1986). (JJ)

Sources: Demokratiya, 9 September 1991; Raymond Detrez, Historical Dictionary of Bulgaria (Lanham, Md., 1997); Tasho Tashev, Ministrite na Bulgariya 1879–1999: Entsiklopedichen spravochnik (Sofia, 1999).

GANEV Venelin (4 February 1880, Ruse–25 March 1966, Sofia), Bulgarian politician and lawyer. Ganev completed his studies in philosophy and law in Leipzig (1897–98) and Geneva (1898–1901), and he received a higher musical education in Geneva (1901). From 1908 he worked as an associate professor (docent) at the Department of Encyclopedia and the Philosophy of Law of Sofia University. From 1913 he worked there as a professor of philosophy and the general theory of law, and between 1918 and 1947 he was full professor at the Department of Commercial Law. In 1914–15 and 1916–18 he served as dean of the Law Department. In 1919 he was elected a member of the Bulgarian Academy of Sciences. From 1908 Ganev belonged to the Radical Democratic Party, which he left after the military coup of 9 June 1923, and he joined the newly created Democratic Alliance. He was a member of the Bulgarian delegation to the Paris Peace Conference in 1919. Between May and October 1919 he served as minister of justice in the government of Teodor Teodorov. From 1920 to 1922 he was envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to France, and in 1923–27 he was deputy to the Twenty-first National Assembly. In 1925 he left the Democratic Alliance and joined the opposition. In 1926–40 he worked as a lawyer in Sofia. Along with Petko Stoyanov, he led a group of so-called independent intellectuals, creating the League for the Defense of Human Rights.

During World War II Ganev took part in the formation of the Fatherland Front (1942–43), and from 1944 he was a member of the National Committee of the Fatherland Front. From 9 September 1944 to 18 September 1946 he was one of the three regents of Bulgaria on behalf of the minor monarch, Tsar Simeon II, and he worked with the Communists. In March 1945 he put forward an initiative to revive the Radical Party, and the party was legalized in September of that year. Ganev was the author of a letter to the Allied Control Commission on the postponement of elections in Bulgaria, which had been called for 26 August 1945. Along with a group of independent intellectuals gathered around him, Ganev showed a growing disappointment with the Communists; therefore in 1947 he was removed from Sofia to Drianoovo and deprived of his pension, to which he was entitled as a former regent. In 1948 he was stripped of his membership in the Bulgarian Academy of Sciences, to which he was posthumously reinstated (March 1991) after his full rehabilitation (March 1990). Ganev was the author of (among other works) Chopin (1919); Istoričeskoto razvitie na tyrgovskoto pravo (Historical development of commercial law; 1921); Sistematičeski kurs po nesystoiatelnostta (Systematic course in bankruptcy law; 1926); Kurs po tyrgovsko pravo (Course in commercial law; 1923); Kurs po obshta teoriia na pravoto: Uvod, Metodologiiia na pravoto (Course in the general theory of law: Introduction, methodology of law; 1921–32, 1946); Učebnik po obshta teoriia na pravoto (Textbook on the general theory of law, 2 vols.; 1932–38); Stopanska deistvitelnost: Opit za edna sotsiologičeska sistema (Economic reality: Attempt at sociological synthesis; 1945); and Demokratiia (Democracy; 1946). (JJ)

Sources: Entsiklopediya Bulgariya, vol. 2 (Sofia, 1981); Georgi Dimitrov, Sychineniia, vol. 13 (Sofia, 1987); Jerzy Jackowicz, Partie opozycyjne w Bulgarii 1944–1948 (Warsaw, 1997); Tasho Tashev, Ministrite na Bulgariya 1879–1999: Entsiklopedichen spravochnik (Sofia, 1999).

GANIĆ Ejup (3 March 1946, Sebečevo, near Novi Pazar), Bosnian scholar and politician. In 1972 Ganić graduated from the Department of Technology of the University of Belgrade, and then he worked in the Institute of Chemistry, Technology, and Metallurgy in Belgrade. In 1976 he defended his Ph.D. thesis at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology in Cambridge and he worked as an assistant professor there. Later he worked in the Union Cambridge Corporation–Linde Division in New York, lectured at universities in New York and Chicago, and was a professor at the University of Illinois in Chicago. He authored many works in the thermo mechanics of liquids and co-authored six scholarly books in the United States. He founded and edited the periodical Experimental Thermal and Fluids Science, and he received a number of international awards. In 1982 Ganić returned to Bosnia and Herzegovina (B&H). He was a member of the board for research and development at UNIS in Sarajevo, professor at the Department of Engineering of the University of Sarajevo, and visiting professor at Lomonosov University in Moscow. On 18 November 1990 he was elected a member of the B&H presidency, and then he joined the Party of Democratic Action (Strana Demokratske Akcije [PDA]). He was its deputy chairman, and in 1992 he became de facto deputy president of B&H. During the kidnapping of President Alija Izetbegović (2–3 May 1992) Ganić was appointed acting president by Izetbegović, and he disapproved of the withdrawal of the whole Yugoslav People's Army (YPA) garrison from Sarajevo in exchange for Izetbegović's release. On 31 May 1994 Ganić was elected first vice-president of the Federation of Bosnia and Herzegovina, in which the president and vice-president rotated every year. From 1 January 2000 to 28 February 2001 he was president of the federation again. He headed the federation's commission in the Brčko arbitrage. Considered a Muslim extremist, Ganić entered into conflict with Prime Minister Haris Silajdžić and was expelled from the PDA in May 2000. According to President Vojislav Koštunica, Ganić bears the responsibility for the murder of YPA recruits on Dobrovoljacka Street in Sarajevo in 1992. Ganić is a member of the American Nuclear Society, and he authored Bosanska otrovna jabuka (Bosnian poisoned apple; 1995). (JD)

Sources: Ko je ko u bošnjaka: Vijeće Kongresa Bošnjačkih intelektualaca (Sarajevo, 2000); Warren Zimmermann, Origins of a Catastrophe (New York and Toronto, 1996); Bugajski.

GANOVSKI Sava (1 March 1897, Kunino–24 April 1993, Sofia), Bulgarian Communist activist. After graduating from the Reserve Officers' School, Ganovski fought in World War I. He was sentenced to fifteen years' imprisonment for his anti-war activities, but after the end of the warfare he was released under an amnesty. From 1918 he was a member of the Bulgarian Social Democratic Workers' Party (the so-called narrow Socialists). In 1922 he graduated in pedagogy and philosophy from Sofia University, and in 1923–28 he pursued specialization studies in Halle and Berlin. In Berlin, he became a member of the Communist Party of Germany. He was one of the initiators of Narstud, a Bulgarian radical leftist union of students abroad. In 1928–31 he graduated in philosophy from the Institute of Red Professorship in Moscow, and he simultaneously lectured at the University for Western Minorities in Moscow, at Moscow University (1929–30), and at the Institute of Literature in Moscow, where he held the chair of dialectical and historical materialism (1930–31). After his return to Bulgaria in 1931 Ganovski organized teachers' trade unions, co-founded the Union of Working and Struggling Writers (1932), and edited the newspapers Syvremennik, Zvezda, Syvremenna misyl, and Nauchen pregled. In 1941–43 he was repeatedly arrested and interned. At the beginning of 1944 he joined a guerrilla unit, becoming deputy political commissar in the military operational zone in Pleven. After the coup of 9 September 1944 Ganovski was a delegate of the government to Thrace, director of the press (1944–45), and envoy to Romania (1945–47) and Yugoslavia (1947–48). Then he was deputy minister for foreign affairs (1948–49); president (in the rank of minister) of the Committee of Science, Art, and Culture (December 1949–February 1952); and head of the Department of Science, Education, and Art of the CC of the Bulgarian Communist Party (1953–57).

In 1945 Ganovski was appointed professor at Sofia University; working in the Stalinist spirit, he held the chair of philosophy (1949–51) and then the chair of dialectical materialism and history of philosophy. In 1952 he became a member of the Bulgarian Academy of Sciences (BAS); a member of its Presidium; and secretary of the Department of History, Archaeology, and Philosophy of the BAS. In 1957–59 he was vice-president of the BAS; from 1959 to 1967 he was director of the BAS Institute of Pedagogy, and in 1977–87 he was director of the BAS Institute of Philosophy. Between 1954 and 1990 he was a member of the CC of the BCP and a deputy to the National Assembly. In 1965 and in 1966–71 he was president of the Bureau of the National Assembly. He was elected to membership in the Academies of Sciences of Czechoslovakia, the German Democratic Republic, Romania, and the USSR. Ganovski was the author of (among other works) Osnovni napravleniia v filosofiata (Basic trends in philosophy; 1934); Shto e zhivot (What is life; 1935); Osnovni zakoni na nauchnata filozofia (Basic principles of scientific philosophy; 1940); and Kratka istoriia na filozofiata ot drevnostta do nainovoto vreme (Short history of philosophy from ancient times to modern times; 1941, reissued many times). (JJ)

Sources: Entsiklopediya Bulgariya, vol. 2 (Sofia, 1981); 100 godini na BAN, vol. 1 (Sofia, 1969); Akademik Sava Ganovski: Iubileen sbornik (Sofia, 1971); Tasho Tashev, Ministrice na Bulgariya 1979–1999: Entsiklopedichen spravochnik (Sofia, 1999).

GARAMI Ernő (13 December 1876, Budapest–28 May 1935, Budapest), Hungarian writer and politician. From 1898 Garami was one of the leaders of the Hungarian Social Democratic Party (HSDP). An adherent of Marxist revisionism, in 1905–6 and 1907–18 he was editor of the party daily, Népszava, where he intensively campaigned for the introduction of universal suffrage in Hungary. In 1906 he founded Szocializmus, a theoretical organ of the Hungarian Social Democrats, and he co-edited it until 1918. Garami translated the works of Karl Marx, Friedrich Engels, and Karl Kautsky. He also wrote short stories and plays—for example, the play Megváltás felé (Toward the breakthrough; 1908). During the republican revolution in Hungary (November 1918–March 1919) Garami was minister of trade in the government of Mihály Károlyi. After the proclamation of the Hungarian Soviet Republic (HSR) in March 1919 he emigrated to Austria and then to Switzerland, as he disagreed with the policy of the HSDP, particularly with the party's decision to merge with the Hungarian Communist Party. Garami edited the newspaper Jövő, which was published in Vienna from 1921. In it, he sharply criticized the government of Regent Miklós Horthy, as well as Communist policies. Because of his articles, legal proceedings were instituted against him in Hungary. After his trial was discontinued in 1929, Garami returned to Hungary. From 1930 he was again a member of the leadership of the HSDP, and from 1934 he was editor of the daily Népszava. Rejecting the principle of the dictatorship of the proletariat, Garami promoted the need for a social agreement between workers and the bourgeoisie. In his public speeches as well as in his journalism, Garami warned against communism, pointing out to its anti-humanistic and anti-worker nature. (MS)

Sources: Biographisches Lexikon, vol. 1; Garami Ernő: Emlékkönyv (Budapest, 1939); Ferenc Mucsi, A Kristóffy-Garami-paktum (Budapest, 1970); Paul Igotus, Hungary (London, 1972); Lajos Varga, Garami Ernő: Politikai életrajz (Budapest, 1996).

GARBAI Sándor (27 March 1879, Kiskunhalas–7 November 1947, Paris), Hungarian politician. After completing primary school, Garbai worked as a farm laborer (1892–94) and then as a bricklayer in Budapest (1894–97). He later became a journeyman and joined the Hungarian Social Democratic Party (HSDP). In 1901–19 he was one of the HSDP leaders. In 1903 he co-founded the All-National Union of Hungarian Construction Workers and until 1919 served as its president. In 1903–19 he was president of the Workers' Insurance Institute. In 1907 he became vice-president, and in the following year head, of the All-National Workers' Insurance Fund. He became well known in Hungary after 1905, when his party started a struggle for universal suffrage and the secret ballot. From June 1917, as an HSDP delegate, Garbai was vice-president of the Suffrage Bloc, established under the leadership of Count Mihály Károlyi. After the victory of the republican revolution in Hungary, between November 1918 and March 1919 Garbai was president plenipotentiary of the All-National Housing Council.

Garbai declared himself in favor of merging the HSDP and the Communist Party. The two parties merged on 21 March 1919. Under the Hungarian Soviet Republic (HSR) he presided over the Revolutionary Governing Council, which served as the government. However, actual power was concentrated in the hands of Béla Kun, who formally was only the people's commissar for foreign affairs. Garbai served as minister of education in the so-called trade union government of Gyula Peidl, which was founded after the fall of the HSR and lasted only six days (1–6 August 1919). After the capture of Budapest, the Romanian troops arrested Garbai. They then released him and escorted him to Transylvania in November 1919. In February 1920 he traveled via Czechoslovakia to Vienna, where he lived until 1934 as one of the leaders of the Hungarians in exile. Between 1920 and 1927 he belonged to a Social Democratic group called Világosság (The Light). Later he founded the group Előre (Forward), which aimed at bringing about the unification of various factions in exile. Between 1927 and 1932 Garbai also edited his own newspaper, Előre. In the 1930s Garbai once again became an advocate of Social Democracy, and he condemned Bolshevism. Arrested in February 1934 during the Schutzbund uprising in Vienna, he was released on condition that he leave the country. He went to Bratislava and joined the Slovak Social Democratic movement. In November 1938 he moved to Paris. After the end of World War II he wanted to return to Hungary, but his former comrades in the country opposed that. In 1965 a special commission of the Politburo of the Hungarian Socialist Workers' Party, set up to investigate his activities in exile, decided that he represented an "inappropriate attitude" at that time. The authorities also refused permission for Garbai's ashes to be brought back to Hungary. (JT)

Sources: Magyar Nagylexikon, vol. 8 (Budapest, 1999); Új Magyar Életrajzi Lexikon, vol. 2 (Budapest, 2001); Rudolf L. Tókes, Béla Kun and the Hungarian Soviet Republic (New York, 1967); Lajos Varga, Garbai Sándor, 1879–1947: A Forradalmi Kormányzótanács elnöke (Budapest, 1987).

GARMUS Antanas (19 February 1881, Tursonas, near Kaunas–23 July 1953, Chicago, Illinois), Lithuanian doctor and politician. During the revolution of 1905 Garmus was arrested by the Russian authorities for his activities in the Social Democratic Party. In 1907–14 he studied medicine in Bern, Switzerland, where he earned his doctorate. After his return to Lithuania he was inducted into the Russian Army. During World War I he worked as a military doctor. Between the wars he lectured at the university, and he also worked in the Red Cross and in the Lithuanian anti-tuberculosis society. He was one of the leaders of the international movement against tuberculosis. In June 1940

Garmus agreed to stand as a candidate for the People's Assembly in the elections controlled by the occupying Red Army. He cherished the illusion that the assembly would be able to preserve at least the partial sovereignty of Lithuania. After Germany invaded Lithuania in 1942, Garmus publicly revealed Communist methods of fraud and abuse during the elections. Before the arrival of the Red Army in 1944, he was imprisoned in a German concentration camp. Liberated by the U.S. Army in the spring of 1945, he settled in Germany. In 1949 he moved to the United States, where he gave extensive testimony before the House of Representatives Select Committee to Investigate Incorporation of the Baltic States. (WR)

Sources: EL, vol. 2; Bronis J. Kaslas, ed., The USSR-German Aggression against Lithuania (New York, 1973); Joseph Pajauvis-Javis, Soviet Genocide in Lithuania (New York, 1980).

GAROFLID Constantin (14 September, Buzău–14 June 1943?), Romanian politician. Born into a landowner's family, after high school Garoflid studied medicine in Paris and graduated in 1894. His main interest, however, was in the disproportional land ownership structure in Romania, which he analyzed in Problema agrară și deslegarea ei (The agrarian question and its solution; 1908). He suggested the parceling out of selected large estates. He was elected to the parliament for the first time in 1914. Initially he belonged to the Conservative Party, and in 1919 he joined the People's Party of General Alexandru Avarescu. From February to October 1918 he was minister of agriculture, trying to implement King Ferdinand's promise of December 1917 concerning an extensive parceling out of land. Garoflid realized the necessity of parceling out for social reasons, but he feared that a radical liquidation of the large estates would undermine agricultural output. From April 1920 to July 1921 he was minister without portfolio, and from July to December 1921, minister of agriculture in the second government of Avarescu. In this capacity he worked out a draft land reform law that was passed by the parliament on 14 July 1920 and was implemented with July 1921 amendments referring to newly acquired territories (Transylvania, Bessarabia, and Banat). The land reform started a radical transformation of the Romanian system of land ownership. The proportion of large estates in the total area was seriously reduced, while about 1,400,000 settlers received land. Since the average allotment was small, the reform reduced the purchasing power of the countryside and hampered economic development. From March 1926 to June 1927 Garoflid was minister of agriculture again in the third government of Avarescu. In 1930–38 he was one of the founders of the Agrarian League. All through the interwar years he also presided over the Romanian Union of Vineyard Owners. (FAWR)

Sources: David Mitrany, The Land and the Peasant in Rumania (Oxford, 1930); Politics and Political Parties in Roumania (London, 1936); Șerban N. Ionescu, Who Was Who in Twentieth Century Romania (Boulder, Colo., 1994); Keith Hitchins, Rumania 1866–1947 (Oxford, 1994); Wojciech Roszkowski, Land Reforms in East Central Europe after World War I (Warsaw, 1995).

GÁSPÁR Sándor (15 April 1917, Pánd–16 April 2002, Budapest), Hungarian Communist activist. Born into a peasant family, after completing a vocational school, Gáspár worked as a mechanic. From 1935 he was a member of the Metalworkers' Trade Union; from 1936 he was in the Hungarian Social Democratic Party (HSDP), and in 1940 he joined the Hungarian Communist Party (HCP). In 1945–46 he was a member of the leadership of the Metalworkers' Trade Union and an organizer of the District Committee of the HCP in the Sixth District of Budapest. From 1946 he was a member of the CC of the HCP, and between 1948 and 1956 he belonged to the CC of the Hungarian Workers' Party (HWP). In 1947–88 he was an MP in the parliament. Between 1946 and 1947 he was a full timer in the CC of the HWP; in 1947–50 he served as deputy secretary general of the Metalworkers' Trade Union, and in 1950–52, as its secretary general. Between 1951 and 1952 he studied at the Higher Party School of the CPSU in Moscow. In 1952–54 he was deputy secretary general, and between 1954 and 1956 president, of the National Council of Trade Unions (NCTU).

From July 1956 Gáspár was a deputy member, and between 23 and 28 October a member, of the Politburo of the CC of the HWP. In September 1956 he co-organized the funeral of László Rajk and his associates. During the revolution of 1956 he tried above all to maintain his position. After 4 November he declared himself in favor of János Kádár, and he was one of the organizers of the Hungarian Socialist Workers' Party (HSWP). In a radio address of 13 November on behalf of Kádár's National Council of the Hungarian Free Trade Unions, formed in opposition to the workers' councils, Gáspár called on workers to resume work, and at the same time he stressed the necessity of a multiparty system. Between November 1956 and 1988 he was a member of the CC of the HSWP. A typical representative of the party apparatus, from the beginning of 1957 to 1959 Gáspár was secretary general of the reactivated NCTU; until 1961 he served as the first secretary of the Budapest Committee of the HSWP; until 1962 he was secretary of the CC; and until 1965 he again served as the first secretary of the Budapest Committee of the HSWP. In 1965–83 he again held the post of secretary general of the NCTU, and until 1988 he was its president. In 1959–62 he was a deputy member, and between 1962 and 1988 a member, of the Politburo of the CC of the HSWP. In 1954–88 he was a member, and between 1963 and 1988 vice-president, of the Presidential Council. From 1960 to 1964 he was also vice-president of the National Patriotic Front. One of the party dogmatists, at the beginning of the 1970s he contributed to the collapse of economic reforms. In 1972 along with (among others) Béla Biszku and Zoltán Komócsin, Gáspár took part in an attempt to remove Kádár from power, but he finally withdrew and took Kádár's side. Between 1978 and 1989 he was president of the Communist World Federation of Trade Unions (WFTU). In May 1988, as one of the conservatives, Gáspár left the leadership of the HSWP; a month later he resigned as president of the NCTU, and in March 1989 he left the WFTU. (JT)

Sources: Magyar Nagylexikon, vol. 8 (Budapest, 1999); A magyar forradalom és szabadságharc enciklopédiája, CD-ROM (Budapest, 1999); Ki kicsoda 2000 (Budapest, 2001); Bennet Kovrig, Communism in Hungary from Kun to Kádár (Stanford, 1979); Miklós Molnár, From Béla Kun to János Kádár: Seventy Years of Hungarian Communism (New York, 1990).

GAŠPAROVIČ Ivan (27 March 1941, Poltár, Lučenec district), Slovak lawyer and politician. In 1964 Gašparovič graduated in law from the University of Bratislava, and then he practiced in the Martin and Trenčín town prosecutor's offices for two years. In 1966–68 he was town prosecutor in Bratislava. From 1968 to 1990 he was assistant professor and then associate professor of criminal law at Bratislava University, and in 1990 he was briefly its deputy rector. From July 1990 to the beginning of March 1992 he was general prosecutor of Czechoslovakia. He was recalled from this office under pressure from MPs and the media, as he was accused of slowing down the prosecution of Communist crimes. In April 1992 he joined the Movement for a Democratic Slovakia (Hnutie za Demokratické Slovensko [HZDS]) of Vladimír Mečiar. He quickly gained Mečiar's trust and became one of Mečiar's closest aides as deputy chairman of his party. As a result of the June 1992 elections Gašparovič won a seat in the Slovak National Council, renamed the National Council of the Slovak Republic after the split of Czechoslovakia in January 1993. He was later reelected, and in 1992–98 he was deputy speaker of the parliament. Before the elections of 2002 he entered into conflict with Mečiar, who did not agree to place Gašparovič on the list of candidates for the parliament. In July 2002 Gašparovič left the HZDS, and, along with a group of activists displeased with Mečiar's leadership, he established the Movement for Democracy

(Hnutie za Demokraciu [HZD]). This secession harmed Mečiar's standing, as the HZDS won only 19.5 percent of the vote in the elections of September 2002. It did not help Gašparovič, though, as the HZD won only 3.3 percent and failed to reach the electoral threshold. Surprisingly Gašparovič got to the second round of the presidential elections; on 17 April 2004 he defeated Mečiar and became president, taking over office in mid-June 2004. (PU)

Sources: ČBS; Eric Stein, Czecho/Slovakia: Ethnic Conflict, Constitutional Fissure, Negotiated Breakup (Ann Arbor, 1997); Miroslav Pekník, ed., Slovenské Národné Rady (Bratislava, 1998); Jan Rychlík, Rozpad Československa: Česko-slovenské vzťahy 1989–1992 (Bratislava, 2002); www.hnutie-za-demokraciu.sk.

GAVRILO [originally Djordje Dožić] (17 May 1881, Vrujci u Morači, Montenegro–7 May 1950, Belgrade), Serbian patriarch. Gavriilo attended a people's school run by the monastery in Morača. His uncle, Mihailo Dožić-Medenica, was archimandrite at that monastery. Gavriilo was later educated at a high school in Belgrade, at a theological seminary in Prizren, and at a seminary on the island of Chalke, near Istanbul. In February 1900 he was ordained a monk at the monastery in Sićevo, and he adopted the monastic name Gavriilo. Later, he resided in the monasteries of Jošanica and Visoki Dečani. In 1905–9 he studied in the Department of Orthodox Theology in Athens. After graduation he was secretary of the Hilandar Monastery on Mount Athos, and he was the Serbian representative to the Ecumenical Patriarchate in Constantinople. On 1 December 1911 he was elected metropolitan of the Prizren diocese. After the end of the Balkan War in 1913, he was elected metropolitan of Peć (Ipek) in Montenegro. After the occupation of Serbia by the troops of the Central Powers and the capitulation of Montenegro at the end of 1915, he was interned in Cegléd in Hungary. However, owing to illness, he was released and transferred to Ulcinj.

After the collapse of Austria-Hungary Gavriilo attended the Grand National Assembly in Podgorica and headed the Serbian delegation that concluded an agreement with the Montenegrins. Following the death of Mitrofan Ban, the metropolitan of Montenegro, Gavriilo became his successor, and after the death of Patriarch Varnava, on 8 February 1938 Gavriilo was elected patriarch of the entire Serbian Orthodox Church. One of his first decisions was to annul the excommunication that Varnava had imposed on Prime Minister Milan Stojadinović for submitting a concordat with the Vatican to be ratified by the Skupština (Assembly). (That concordat did not come into effect, however.) Later, Gavriilo lent his support to a group of officers who, led by General Dušan Simović, executed a coup d'état and took over power in Yugoslavia from the pro-Axis government (27 March 1941); consequently, the Germans, after conquering Yugoslavia in April of that same year, recognized Gavriilo as one of their opponents. He was imprisoned for a short time in the Gestapo prison in Belgrade. Released, the patriarch was interned at the monasteries of Rakovica, near Belgrade, and Vojilovica, near Pančevo, for the next three years. In mid-September 1944 he was deported to the concentration camp at Dachau, and later he was sent to Vienna and Kutzbuehel, where in the spring of 1945 he was liberated by the U.S. Army. After a short stay in Rome and London, where he took part in the baptism of Alexander, the successor to the throne, Gavriilo accepted an invitation from Edvard Beneš, the president of Czechoslovakia, and he went to Karlovy Vary. In November 1946 Gavriilo decided to return to Yugoslavia, where he again ascended the throne of the patriarchate and remained in office until the end of his life. In 1974 his Memoari (Memoirs) were published in Paris. (AG)

Sources: Biographisches Lexikon, vol. 2; Enciklopedija Jugoslavije, vol. 3 (Zagreb, 1958); Robert J. Kerner, ed., Yugoslavia (Berkeley, 1949); Djoko Slijepčević, Istorija srpske pravoslavne crkve, vol. 2 (Munich, 1966); Waclaw Felczak and Tadeusz Wasilewski, Historia Jugosławii (Wrocław, 1985).

GAVRILOVIĆ Mihailo (8 May 1868, Aleksinac–1 November 1924, London), Serb historian and diplomat. Gavrilović completed high school in Niš and then graduated from the Department of Philosophy of Belgrade University (1891), where he started to work, and he was gradually promoted to the post of professor. He published extensively and dealt mainly with the history of the Middle Ages and nineteenth-century Serbia. In 1900 he became director of the State Archives in Belgrade. He investigated not only the Serbian archives, but also the Austrian, French, and Russian archives. On the basis of his research he wrote his main work, Knez Miloš Obrenović (Prince Miloš Obrenović, 3 vols., 1908–12). In 1910 he became an envoy of Serbia to Montenegro, and in 1914, envoy to the Holy See in Rome. In 1917 he assumed the post of adviser to the minister of foreign affairs of the Serbian government, which was on the island of Corfu. In 1918 he was deputy minister of foreign affairs, and in 1919–24 he was an envoy to London. A fourth volume of his work on Miloš Obrenović, which was in manuscript, was destroyed during World War I. (WR) Sources: Enciklopedija Jugoslavije, vol. 3 (Zagreb, 1958); R. W. Seton-Watson and the Yugoslavs: Correspondence, vol. 1, 1906–1918; vol. 2, 1918–1941 (London and Zagreb, 1976); Istorija srpskog naroda, vol. 6 (Belgrade, 1983).

GAWLINA Józef (18 November 1892, Strzybnik, Opole region–21 September 1964, Rome), Polish Roman Catholic bishop. After graduating from a high school in Rybnik, Gawlina studied theology in Breslau (now Wrocław, Poland). Mobilized into the German Army in 1914, he took part in the war as a stretcher bearer on the French front and later in Palestine, where he was taken captive by the English. After returning to Poland, he completed his studies and earned a doctorate. In June 1921 he received holy orders. He worked in various parishes of the Katowice diocese. In 1927 in Warsaw he organized the Catholic Press Office, which he directed for two years. In 1933 he was consecrated field bishop of the Polish Army. Wounded during the September campaign in 1939, he performed his duties in France and Great Britain, but he also visited Polish soldiers on many fronts of World War II. In May 1942 he made a pastoral visitation of the Polish Army in the USSR and later also in the Middle East, North Africa, and Italy. After the war he served as the ordinary for the Poles in Germany. He resided in Rome, where he was rector of St. Stanislaus Church. In 1949 the Holy See appointed him the spiritual patron of Poles in exile. He made numerous pastoral visits to the Polish communities in many countries. In 1952 Pope Pius XII named him archbishop and member of the Supreme Council of Exiles, and in 1954, director of the World Federation of Marian Sodality. Gawlina was secretary of the Preparatory Commission of the Second Vatican Council. A gifted preacher and a prolific publicist, he published extensively in the Catholic press in the interwar period. During World War II he edited the newspaper W imię Boże and supported the Veritas Publishing House in London. He was also the publisher of Hosianum and of the series Sacrum Poloniae Millennium. His writings were collected in the volume Z wojny i wygnania (From war and from exile; 1952). He also published his memoirs, Z teki biskupa polowego (From the portfolio of a field bishop; 1943) and Biskup polowy na biblijnym Wschodzie (Field bishop in the biblical East; 1943). Gawlina also organized and presided over the World Committee for the Celebration of Poland's Millennium of Christianity. However, he did not live to see the celebrations. (WR) Sources: Stanisław Łoza, Czy wiesz kto to jest (Warsaw, 1938); J. Bańka, Arcybiskup Józef Gawlina (Rome, 1970); K. Biegun, Arcypasterz Polski wygnaniej: Bp polowy Józef Gawlina (Warsaw, 1993); Krzysztof Dybczak and Zdzisław Kudelski, eds., Leksykon kultury polskiej poza krajem od roku 1939 (Lublin, 2000).

GEDVILAS Mečislovas (19 September 1901, Bubiai, near Šiauliai–1981, Vilnius), Lithuanian Communist activist. After high school Gedvilas studied at the Institute of Technology in Petrograd between 1919 and 1922. After returning to Lithuania, he worked as a teacher at a gymnasium (high school) in Palanga (1923–27). He was engaged in conspiratorial Communist activities. He also took part in an unsuccessful revolt of Socialists and members of people's parties in Tauragė in 1927, for which he was imprisoned for four years in an internment camp in Varniai. From 1931 to 1940 he was district director of the Health Insurance Fund in Telšiai, and from 1934 he was involved in the underground activities of the Communist Party of Lithuania (CPL). When the troops of the Red Army entered the country on 15 June 1940, Gedvilas became minister of interior in the government of Justas Paleckis. One of his first steps was to legalize the CPL on 25 June 1940. He falsely assured Lithuanians that the Red Army did not intend to incorporate Lithuania into the USSR but wanted only to restore "order." However, following the manipulated elections to the National Assembly in mid-July 1940, Lithuania was incorporated into the USSR, and Paleckis became president of the Supreme Soviet of the Lithuanian SSR. In August of that year Gedvilas was appointed president of the republic's Council of People's Commissars (government). In that role, he supervised the arrests of thousands of Lithuanians and their deportations deep into the USSR. He was responsible for the deaths of thousands of innocent people. After the reoccupation of Lithuania by the Red Army in 1944, Gedvilas resumed the duties of head of the republic's government, and he held his post until 1956. He was in charge of the administrative apparatus of the Lithuanian SSR during the worst years of the Stalinist persecutions. From 1956 to 1968 he served as minister of education and then he retired. (WR)

Sources: EL, vol. 2; Joseph Paujaujis-Javis, Soviet Genocide in Lithuania (New York, 1980); Romuald J. Misiunas and Rein Taagepera, The Baltic States: Years of Dependence, 1940–1990 (Berkeley, 1993).

GEGA Liri (1917, Gjirokastra–December 1956), Albanian Communist activist. Gega came from an intellectual family and graduated from a pedagogical school for girls in Tirana, and then she studied in Florence. Arrested during her stay in Italy in 1940, she spent twenty-one months in a prison in Florence. After returning to Albania, she became aligned with a Communist group from Shkodër. She was the only woman in the group of founders of the Communist Party of Albania (CPA). From March 1943 to November 1944 she was a member of the Politburo of the CC of the CPA. In 1944, on the orders of Yugoslav Communists, she murdered Mustafa Gjinishi, a member of the Politburo of the CPA who had entered into an agreement with the National Front (Belli Kombëtar) in August 1943 in Mukaj. From August 1944 she was secretary general of the Albanian Anti-Fascist Youth Union, and between 1944 and 1946, secretary general of the Anti-Fascist Women's Union. In 1945 she was elected deputy for Vlorë district. In the spring of 1948, at the Eighth Plenum of the CC of the CPA, Gega was accused of sectarianism, "political terror," and, above all, favoring separatist tendencies in the north of Albania. The accusations were connected with the fact that she had opposed the elimination of the units led by Gani bey Kryeziu and Muharrem Bajraktari, which had operated there soon after the war. As a result of attacks by Koçi Xoxe, Gega was expelled from the leadership of the Democratic Front. At a party conference in Tirana in April 1956, she was among a group of activists who dared to publicly attack Enver Hoxha. Arrested while attempting to escape abroad with her husband, Dali Ndreu, a member of the CC of the CPA, Gega was executed by firing squad at the end of 1956. She was charged with, among other things, collaboration with foreign intelligence. Nikita Khrushchev publicly claimed that at the time of execution Gega was pregnant, but his accusation was met with official denial by the Albanian authorities. (TC)

Sources: Bashkimi, 20 November 1945; William E. Griffith, Albania and the Sino-Soviet Rift (Cambridge, Mass., 1963); Hans-Detlev Grothusen, ed., Albanien (Göttingen, 1993); Uran Butka, Ringjallje (Tetovë, 1996); Marrëdhëniet shqiptaro-jugosllave 1945–1948: Dokumente (Tirana, 1996).

GEMINDER Bedřich (19 November 1901, Moravská Ostrava–3 December 1952, Prague), Czechoslovak Communist activist. Geminder came from a lower-middle-class Jewish family. As a high school student he belonged to a Zionist group. In 1919–21 he studied in Berlin. After returning to Czechoslovakia, he joined the Communist Party of Czechoslovakia (CPC). In 1924–26 he was in the USSR, where he worked in the Communist International apparatus. Later, using the pseudonyms "Otto Kramer" and "Vitavski," he was active in Czechoslovakia and in Western Europe. Between 1934 and 1935 he was again in Moscow, where, under the pseudonym "G. Friedrich," he worked in the Department of Agitation and Propaganda of the Comintern. After a short stay in Czechoslovakia he settled in the USSR, where he continued his work in the Comintern apparatus. Sent to Czechoslovakia in 1945, he became a member of the Secretariat of the Central Committee (CC) of the CPC, and he was in charge of the party's foreign relations department. In September 1947 he was a member of the Czechoslovak delegation to the founding congress of the Information Bureau of the Communist and Workers' Parties at Szklarska Poręba. During anti-Semitic purges connected with the disclosure of alleged "Titoists," in November 1951 Geminder was arrested in connection with the case of Noel Field, and he was accused of spying for the United States and Israel. In the trial of Rudolph Slánský and his comrades (20–27 November 1952), Geminder was tortured during interrogation and confessed to even the most absurd charges. As a “Jewish, bourgeois nationalist,” he was sentenced to death and then executed by firing squad. (WR) Sources: Lazitch; Edward Taborsky, Communism in Czechoslovakia, 1948–1960 (Princeton, 1961); Eugen Loebel, Stalinism in Prague: The Loebel Story (New York, 1969); Jiří Pelikán, The Czechoslovak Political Trials, 1950–1954 (Stanford, 1971).

GEORGESCU Teohari (31 January 1908, Bucharest–2 September 1976, Bucharest), Romanian Communist activist. After completing four grades of primary school, Georgescu started working as a printer’s apprentice. In 1928 he joined the printers’ trade union and co-organized a strike, for which he drew the attention of the security police. From 1929 he belonged to the Romanian Communist Party (RCP). In November 1933 he was arrested but was released after a few months. Arrested again in 1935, he was released pending trial, and in 1940 he was sentenced to two months in prison. In August 1940, on the orders of Georgi Dimitrov, the RCP sent Georgescu to Moscow, where he underwent NKVD training in cryptographic methods. In October 1940, after obtaining Soviet instructions, he became a deputy to Ștefan Foriș, the new head of the party. Rearrested in April 1941, Georgescu spent the following years in prisons in Bucharest, Caransebeș, and Țirgu-Jiu, where he was held along with the leaders of the RCP—for example, Gheorghe Gheorghiu-Dej, Gheorghe Apostol, and Alexandru Drăghici.

Released in August 1944, Georgescu became deputy minister of interior, representing the RCP in the government of General Nicolae Rădescu. In mid-January 1945 he defied orders from Rădescu, who was not only prime minister, but also his immediate superior in the ministry, to dissolve the Communist Patriotic Guard, and he subordinated the entire security apparatus to the Soviet services. Georgescu also refused to obey the prime minister’s demand that he resign. With Ana Pauker and Alexandru Nicolschi, Georgescu was in charge of expanding the RCP by recruiting around two hundred thousand former members of the Iron Guard and criminals. In August 1945 he even signed an agreement to that effect with Nicolae Pătrașcu, the head of the Iron Guard. At the party’s national conference in October 1945 Georgescu joined the Central Committee (CC) of the RCP and the Politburo of the CC. He also became one of the four secretaries of the CC. In 1947 he became minister of interior and supervised the organization of forced labor camps providing labor for the construction of the Danube–Black Sea Canal. He was also responsible for the suppression of the Greek Catholic Church and for cruel persecutions of its hierarchy. In 1948 he was in charge of manipulating parliamentary elections. At the party congress on 22 February 1948, he attacked Lucrețiu Pătrășcanu; later, along with Aleksander Sakharovski, chief Soviet adviser in the Ministry of Interior, Georgescu supervised the investigation against Pătrășcanu. Georgescu belonged to the group of Pauker and Vasile Luca. Attacked at the Plenum of the CC on 6 March 1952 for “rightist deviation” and for “loss of alertness and a class instinct,” two months later Georgescu was dismissed from all his posts. (WR) Sources: Ghita Ionescu, Communism in Romania, 1944–1962 (Oxford, 1964); Robert R. King, History of the Romanian Communist Party (Stanford, 1980); Șerban N. Ionescu, Who Was Who in Twentieth Century Romania (Boulder, Colo., 1994); Dennis Deletant, Communist Terror in Romania: Gheorghiu-Dej and the Police State, 1948–1965 (New York, 1999).

GEORGESCU Vlad (29 October 1937, Bucharest–13 November 1988, Munich), Romanian dissident and émigré activist. A trained historian, between 1959 and 1963 Georgescu worked at the Romanian-Russian Museum in Bucharest. At the time he became an informer for the secret police, the Securitate. From 1963 through 1979 he was a scholar at the Institute for Southeast European Studies, earning his doctorate in history and publishing a number of valuable historical works. In 1972, he lectured at Columbia University in New York. Following his return, he cooperated with the U.S. ambassador in Bucharest, Harry Barnes, who clandestinely sent Georgescu’s dispatches, critical of the regime of Nicolae Ceaușescu, to the West. Consequently, in March 1977 Georgescu was fired, but the Communist Party suppressed the investigation and reinstated him in his job in May 1977. He was awarded a Wilson Foundation fellowship, but the Romanian government refused to give him an exit visa. Only the intervention of Zbigniew Brzezinski allowed him to leave in April 1979. Between 1982 and 1988 Georgescu was the director of the Romanian section of Radio Free Europe. He rejuvenated the staff, released many of the old émigrés, and supported the people who had experienced life under communism. He penned several important historical works, including Politica și istorie: Cazul comuniștilor români 1944–1977 (Politics and history: The case of the Romanian Communists, 1944–1977; 1981). (AB)

Sources: Mihai Pellin, Opisul emigrației politice: Destine în 1222 de fișe alcătuite pe bază dosarelor din arhivele Securității (Bucharest, 2002).

GEORGIEV Kimon [originally Stoyanov] (11 August 1882, Pazardzhik–28 September 1969, Sofia), Bulgarian politician. After high school, Georgiev graduated from the Military Academy in Sofia. He took part in both Balkan Wars and in World War I. After the end of the war he belonged to the leadership of the radical national Military League (Voenen Syiuz [ML]). The ML gained support because people were deeply disillusioned with the results of the war: the Treaty of Neuilly of 27 November 1919 and the reduction in the Bulgarian Army to twenty thousand soldiers. The ML reached an agreement with National Concord (Naroden Sgovor), a secret organization led by Aleksandur Tsankov; with the Constitutional Bloc, created in July 1922; and with the Internal Macedonian Revolutionary Organization (IMRO). Then the ML played an important role in the overthrow of the dictatorship of Aleksandur Stamboliyski in June 1923. Georgiev represented the left wing of the ML. In the cabinet of Andrei Liapchev he held the portfolio of minister of railways, post, and telegraphs (1926–28). In 1927 he was one of the founders of the Zveno Group, a political organization of officers who from January 1933 planned to take over power. As the result of a bloodless coup d'état that overthrew the democratic cabinet of Nikola Mushanov, on 19 May 1934 Georgiev became prime minister of the government which was backed by and partially personally based on the army. The parliament was dissolved, and political parties were abolished. Georgiev represented a pro-Russian orientation, and he established diplomatic relations with the USSR. On 22 January 1935 he resigned his post under pressure from Tsar Boris III, who feared anti-monarchic attitudes in the army and wanted to improve relations with the Third Reich. The ML was dissolved, and some of its members were arrested. Removed from power, Georgiev did not enter parliament in the elections of 1938.

During World War II Georgiev was one of the leaders of the anti-tsarist opposition and was against aligning Bulgaria with the Third Reich. On 1 September 1940 he signed a protest letter to the government of Bogdan Filov against the adoption of a law for the “protection of the nation.” In the first half of 1942 he established contact with Communists and the agrarian left, and they formed the Fatherland Front. The program of the Fatherland Front, announced from Moscow on Khristo Botev Radio on 17 July 1942, provided for close cooperation with the USSR. After the death of Tsar Boris III, at the beginning of September 1943 Georgiev, along with other opposition activists, signed an appeal for the dissolution of the National Assembly, new elections, a broad government coalition, and the neutralization of foreign policy. Since none of these claims were granted, Georgiev questioned the legality of the election of the regents. On 7 August 1944, along with twelve other members of the opposition, he signed a declaration to the regents and to the government insisting on a fundamental change in foreign policy, rapprochement with the USSR, and the creation of a people's government. He was temporarily held under house arrest in Burgas, and after his release he became involved in the preparation of the September 1944 coup.

Although he was influential in the army, Georgiev was unable to control the Fatherland Front, which was dominated by the Communists. After the coup of 9 September 1944 in Sofia, the victory of which he announced on the radio, Georgiev was formally appointed prime minister. However, his government was controlled by the Communists. Although he never formally joined the Bulgarian Communist Party (BCP), he rendered great services to it. He accepted the bloody suppression of the entire political elite of the tsarist period, but he gradually lost influence. Removed as head of the government on 23 November 1946, he became a puppet in the hands of the Communists. Until December 1947 he still served as minister of foreign affairs, and until January 1950 he was also deputy prime minister, but he was gradually removed from power. From December 1947 to March 1959 he served as minister of electrification, and later he was president of a committee for construction and architecture. Georgiev accepted all the Communist policies and authorized terror directed against his former opponents, as well as against his former associates from the Zveno Group and the Fatherland Front. From December 1959 to March 1962 he again served as deputy prime minister, and then he retired. In 1982 his Izbrani proizvedeniia (Selected works) were published. (WR) Sources: Entsiklopediya Bulgariya, vol. 2 (Sofia, 1981); Dimo Kazasov, Burni godiny (Sofia, 1949); J. F. Brown, Bulgaria under Communist Rule (New York, 1970); Marshall Lee Miller, Bulgaria during the Second World War (Stanford, 1975); Jerzy Jackowicz, Partie opozycyjne w Bulgarii 1944–1948 (Warsaw, 1997); Tasho Tashev, Ministrите na Bulgariya 1879–1999: Entsiklopedichen spravochnik (Sofia, 1999).

GEORGIEVSKI Ljubcho (17 January 1966, Shtip), Macedonian politician. Georgievski graduated from the Philological Faculty of Ss. Cyril and Methodius University in Skopje. A member of the League of Communists of Macedonia, in 1990 he became leader of the Internal Macedonian Revolutionary Organization–Democratic Party for Macedonian National Unity (Vnatrešno-Makedonska Revolucionerna Organizacija–Demokratska Partija za Makedonsko Edinstvo [IMRO–DPMNU]), a nationalist party that adopted the name of the legendary liberation movement that sought to free Macedonian lands in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries.

In 1991 Georgievski served briefly as vice-president of the Republic of Macedonia. From 1992 to 1995 he was an MP on behalf of the IMRO-DPMNU. When the party won the 1998 elections, he became prime minister and held the post from 30 November 1998 to 7 October 2002. Accused of being pro-Bulgarian (a Macedonian taboo) in his early days as party leader, Georgievski is a nationalist and is opposed to according equal rights to ethnic minorities. This position was modulated somewhat when he took office as prime minister. Confronted with a mass influx of Albanians from Kosovo to Macedonia and the subsequent Albanian insurgency of 2001, his views hardened. He employed various tactics to delay the implementation of the Ohrid Agreement (signed in August 2001), which were aimed at bringing peace to the land. His policies were chaotic and erratic. His relations with Western states were strained by his government's failure to cooperate fully in addressing the Albanian insurgency. By 2002, Georgievski had become avowedly right wing, to the extent that he even attacked moderates in his own party; this brought the IMRO-DPMNU a serious defeat in the September 2002 elections. (DP)

Sources: Valentina Georgieva and Sasha Konechni, Historical Dictionary of the Republic of Macedonia (Lanham, Md., 1998); Duncan Perry, "Macedonia's Quest for Security and Stability," Current History, March 2000; Duncan Perry, "Macedonia: Melting Pot or Meltdown?" Current History, November 2001; Bugajski; RFE/RL Newline; OMRI Daily Digest; www.rulers.org.

GEREMEK Bronisław (6 March 1932, Warsaw), Polish historian and politician. Geremek graduated in history from Warsaw University in 1955, received a Ph.D. in 1960, and received a postdoctoral degree (habilitacja) in 1970. From 1989 he was a full professor. In 1955–85 and from 1989 he worked in the Institute of History of the Polish Academy of Sciences (PAS). In 1956–58 he was a fellow, and from 1962 to 1965 a lecturer, at the Sorbonne in Paris. From 1962 to 1965 he also worked as director of the Center of Polish Culture at the University of Paris, and from 1970 to 1985 he was head of the PAS Medieval History Workshop. From 1950 he belonged to the (Communist) Polish United Workers' Party, which he left in 1968, after the Warsaw Pact invasion of Czechoslovakia. In 1975 he joined the protests against the amendment of the constitution, signing the so-called Letter of Seven. From 1978 he was a member of the Society of Scientific Courses and its Program Board. In August 1980 he belonged to the Commission of Experts of the Inter-Factory Strike Committee in Gdańsk. Later he was one of the key advisers of the Inter-Factory Founding Committee of Solidarity and its National Coordination Commission. Head of the group of advisers to Lech Wałęsa, he also presided over the Program Board of the Center for Social and Professional Studies of the Solidarity National Commission. He headed the commission to work out the Solidarity program adopted by the union's First Congress in September 1981. Like Tadeusz Mazowiecki, he favored a moderate and cautious strategy for Solidarity.

After the introduction of martial law, on 13 December 1981 Geremek was interned. Released in December 1982, he was viciously attacked by the Communist propaganda. Fired from the PAS, he collaborated with the underground structures of Solidarity and was Wałęsa's adviser. He participated in several meetings with foreign politicians visiting Poland. In February 1988, in the official monthly Konfrontacje, he offered a compromise with Communist authorities in the form of an "anti-crisis pact." In 1988 he co-organized and became a member of the Civic Committee of the Solidarity Chairman. He was one of the architects and key negotiators during the Round Table Talks (February–April 1989), co-presiding over the political reform negotiating group. From 1989 to 2001 he was an MP. Initially he presided over the Civic Parliamentary Club and the parliamentary foreign relations commission, but during the "war at the top" in 1990 he was attacked by Wałęsa and his followers for slowing down systemic transformation, and he left the club. He co-founded Civic Movement–Democratic Action (Ruch Obywatelski–Akcja Demokratyczna [ROAD]), and later he was head of the parliamentary club of the Democratic Union (1991–94) and the Freedom Union (Unia Wolności) (1994–97). In 1992–93 he was professor with a chair in international affairs at the College de France. From October 1997 to June 2000 he was foreign minister. Thanks to his personal contacts, Geremek contributed to Poland's entry into NATO and played a key role in negotiations with the European Union. From December 2000 he presided over the Freedom Union. He resigned as a result of the electoral defeat of this party in September 2001. From early 2002 he headed the Chair of European Civilization at the College of Europe in Natolin, Warsaw. He authored a number of works in the medieval history of Europe, including the following: Najemna siła robocza w rzemiośle Paryża XIII–XV wieku (Hired labor in Paris handicrafts from the thirteenth to the fifteenth centuries; 1962); Ludzie marginesu w średniowiecznym Paryżu (1967; Margins of Society in Late Medieval Paris, 1987); Litość i szubienica: Dzieje nędzy i miłosierdzia (1989; Poverty: A History, 1994); and Common Roots of Europe (1996). In 2002 he received the Grand Prix de la Francophonie from the French Academy. He also received the Polish Order of the White Eagle. (AF)

Sources: Wielka encyklopedia PWN, vol. 10 (Warsaw, 2002); Nasi w Sejmie i Senacie (Warsaw, 1990); Geremek opowiada, Żakowski pyta (Warsaw, 1990); Jan Skórzyński, Uгода i rewolucja: Władza i opozycja 1985–1989 (Warsaw, 1995); Antoni Dudek, Pierwsze lata III Rzeczypospolitej 1989–2001 (Kraków, 2002); Janusz A. Majcherek, Pierwsza dekada III Rzeczypospolitej 1989–1999 (Warsaw, 1999).

GERMENJI Themistokli (1871, Korçë–9 November 1917, Salonika), Albanian independence activist and journalist. Germenji came from a merchant family. After completing his education at a Greek school in his home town, he left for Romania, where he was engaged in trade. He also worked with the Albanian national organizations Drita and Dituria. From 1901 he continued his patriotic activities, first in Albania and then in Monastir in Macedonia. In 1903 he worked with Macedonian organizations, supplying weapons for an anti-Turkish uprising that was being prepared. Germenji originally advocated the creation of an autonomous Albanian-Macedonian state, but he abandoned the idea a few years later. In 1911 he was imprisoned by the Turkish authorities on charges of preparing an uprising. For seven months he served his sentence in Ioánnina (Janina) and later in Korçë. Demonstrations by the Albanian population accelerated his release. In 1911–12 Germenji traveled to Italy and Corfu, where he sought support for the Albanian cause and coordinated the activities of the Albanian diaspora. Between 1913 and 1914 he was allied with Ismail Kemal, and he organized the state administration. When the Albanians got control of Korçë in March 1914, Germenji became head of a unit of local volunteers who were responsible for security in the town.

After the outbreak of World War I, in September 1914 Germenji left for Romania, where he co-founded the National League (Lidhja Kombëtare), which represented the interests of local Albanians. In January 1915 he moved to Bulgaria, where he edited the newspaper The Library of Zeri and Shqipërise. He returned to Albania when a chance arose to organize the Albanian administration under the French occupation. From December 1916 to June 1917 he was in charge of the autonomous republic in Korçë. He also organized the Albanian units that in the future would fight against the city's takeover by the Greeks. Germenji fell into disfavor with the French when he did not agree to the formation of Albanian units paid by the French. Probably his position was also undermined by the political intrigues of the Greeks and by the animosity of the adherents of Essad Pasha Toptani. Germenji was officially charged with maintaining contacts with representatives of Austria-Hungary and Bulgaria. The military court in Salonika sentenced him, as a foreign intelligence agent, to death by firing squad. His last words before the execution were, "Long live Albania; long live France." In 1933 his body was brought from Salonika to Korçë. (TC)

Sources: Fjalor Enciklopedik Shqiptar (Tirana, 1985); Stefanaq Pollo and Arben Puto, The History of Albania from Its Origins to the Present Day (London, 1981); Tako Piro, Themistokli Germenji (Tirana, 1988); Sejfi Vllamasi, Ballafaqime politike ne Shqiperi (1897–1942) (Tirana, 1995).

GERŐ Ernő [original name Singer] (8 July 1898, Terbegeg (now Slovakia)–12 March 1980, Budapest), Hungarian Communist leader. Gerő's father was an agricultural tenant and later a merchant. After finishing high school, Gerő was admitted to the Medical Academy in Budapest (1916), but he did not complete his studies. During World War I he worked in the Socialist Union of Young Workers, and in 1918 he became a member of the Hungarian Communist Party. During the Hungarian Soviet Republic he was active in the Communist Union of Young Workers (CUYW). He volunteered for the Hungarian Red Army but was not sent to the front. After the fall of the Soviet Republic Gerő fled to Vienna and joined the faction of Jenő Landler in the Hungarian Communist movement in exile. He worked in the office of the CUYW and later participated in the creation of unions of young workers in Slovakia and Romania. Sent to Hungary to direct the Communist organizations in the country (1922), Gerő was soon arrested and in May 1923 was sentenced to fifteen years' imprisonment.

As the result of an exchange of prisoners, in 1924 Gerő was sent to the USSR. At first he worked in a factory, and from 1925 he was active among Hungarian Communist exiles in France. In 1928 he returned to Moscow, where he studied at the International Lenin School. From 1931 Gerő worked in the Executive Committee of the Communist International, and on its behalf, he was active in France, Belgium, Spain, and Portugal. As an instructor of the Comintern, he took part in the Spanish Civil War. He became notorious for his purges of Trotskyites and anarchists. Between 1939 and 1941 he represented the Hungarian party in the Communist International. After its formal dissolution in 1943, he joined the ranks of the Red Army, where he led agitation and propaganda work in the enemy's rear and among captives. In November 1944 he took part in cease-fire talks with the Hungarian delegation in Moscow.

After his return to Hungary Gerő was elected to the parliament in December 1944. Until the return of Mátyás Rákosi to Hungary in February 1945, Gerő headed the Communist Party and was a member of its Central Committee (CC) and Politburo. In May 1945 he was put in charge of the Ministry of Trade and Transport, and in November 1945 he was appointed minister of transport.

In June 1948, at the founding congress of the Hungarian Workers' Party (HWP), Gerő became a member of the CC Secretariat and soon deputy secretary general of the party. From December 1948 he was minister of finance, and until February 1949 he was again minister of transport. In June 1949 he became president of the Council of the National Economy. From 1949 he was an honorary member of the Hungarian Academy of Sciences. On 14 November 1952 he became deputy prime minister.

After Stalin's death in March 1953 Gerő became aligned with the faction of Vyacheslav Molotov. After a conference in Moscow in June 1953 he was dismissed as deputy secretary general of the CC of the HWP, although he remained a member of the Politburo. In the first government of Imre Nagy in 1953 Gerő held the posts of deputy prime minister and minister of the interior until July 1954. Under his leadership the Committee of Economic Policy of the CC was created, and it was used to attack Nagy's economic policies. Gerő contributed to Nagy's fall in 1955. At a plenum of the CC of the HWP in July 1956 he was elected first secretary in place of Rákosi. This choice was an attempt to continue the "hard line" of his predecessor but without him.

On the evening of 23 October, 1956 Gerő gave a radio speech that was perceived as provocative. In a vague way, he spoke about chauvinists, anti-Semites, and reactionaries, as well as the manifestations of "nationalistic character." The speech contributed to the spread of the uprising; therefore Gerő soon phoned Nikita Khrushchev, asking for the assistance of Soviet troops. On the motion of Anastas Mikoyan and Mikhail Suslov, who arrived in Budapest for a meeting of the CC of the HWP, on 25 October 1956 Gerő was dismissed as first secretary of the party. He was also removed from all his posts, and on 28 October he was taken to Moscow, along with his family. In February 1957 the leadership of the Hungarian Socialist Workers' Party (HSWP) decided to ban him from returning to Hungary for five years. Finally, at the beginning of 1961, he was allowed to return. The CC of the HSWP found him guilty of violating laws in the period of the "cult of personality," and in 1962 he was expelled from the party. As a pensioner, Gerő made a living doing translations. In 1977 he asked for admission to the HSWP, but the party leadership rejected his request. Apart from Rákosi, Gerő best incarnated the Stalinist dictatorship in Hungary. (JT)

Sources: The Annual Obituary, 1980; Bennet Kovrig, Communism in Hungary from Kun to Kádár (Stanford, 1979); Miklós Molnár, From Béla Kun to János Kádár: Seventy Years of Hungarian Communism (New York, 1990); Magyar Nagylexikon, vol. 8 (Budapest, 1999); A magyar forradalom és szabadságharc enciklopédiája, CD-ROM (Budapest, 1999); Nagy Képes Milleniumi Arcképcsarnok (Budapest, 1999).

GESHOV Ivan (20 February 1849, Plovdiv–24 March 1924, Sofia), Bulgarian economist and politician. Geshov graduated from high school in Plovdiv, and in 1865–69 he studied finance and political science in Manchester. In 1872 he returned to Plovdiv, where he worked in trade. Because of information he published in The Times on Turkish atrocities against the Bulgarians during the April 1876 uprising, he was arrested and sentenced to death by the Turkish authorities in 1877. In prison he wrote Zapiski na edin osyden (Records of a condemned man). Thanks to the intervention of the British ambassador in Turkey, Geshov was pardoned. After Bulgaria gained independence in 1878, he was active in the political life of East Rumelia as one of the leaders of the pro-unification National Party (NP). He was a deputy and first speaker of the Regional Assembly (1879–80) and minister of finance of East Rumelia (1882–83). Later he moved to Sofia, where he was director of the Bulgarian National Bank (1883–86) and head of the Bulgarian delegation to the peace talks in Bucharest in 1886. He also presided over the first Bulgarian agricultural and industrial congress in Plovdiv in 1892. In 1887–94 he was in opposition to the government of Stefan Stambolov. From 1901 he headed the NP and then the United National Progressive Party, created when the NP and the Liberal Progressive Party merged in 1920.

Geshov held several government positions. He was minister of finance (August–November 1886 and May 1894–August 1897), head of the Ministry of Trade and Agriculture (October 1894–February 1896 and July 1896–January 1897), and prime minister and minister of foreign affairs (16 March 1911–1 June 1913). As the head of the diplomatic corps, he prepared Bulgarian–Serbian and Bulgarian–Greek agreements that were the foundations of the Balkan Alliance. After World War I he was considered one of the most responsible people for the Bulgarian defeat in the Second Balkan War of 1913. He was a deputy to the National Assembly (1894–99 and 1901–20) and to the Grand National Assembly (1886–87 and 1911). He was speaker of the National Assembly in 1901 and 1913. In 1915 he opposed Bulgaria's entry into the war on the side of the Central Powers. After the war he was in opposition to the Bulgarian Agrarian National Union government. In 1922 he emigrated to France, where he was active against the Aleksandur Stamboliyski regime. He took part in the creation of the Constitutional Bloc, and after the coup of 9 June 1923 he joined the Democratic Alliance.

Geshov was a full member of the Bulgarian Society of the Friends of Books from 1884, its treasurer (1884–98), and its chairman (1898–1911). When the society became the Bulgarian Academy of Sciences, he became its chairman (1911–24). Moreover, he was chairman of the Bulgarian Red Cross (1884–1924). One of the few Bulgarians awarded the Order of Ss. Cyril and Methodius, Geshov published (among other works) the following: Dumi i dela: Ikonomicheski i finansovi studii (Words and deeds: Economic and financial studies; 1899); Narodna partija (The national party; 1908); Balkanskiyat suyuz: Spomeni i dokumenti (The Balkan alliance: Memoirs and documents; 1915); and Spomeni i studii (Memoirs and studies; 1928). Geshov was also founder and editor-in-chief of the newspaper Maritsa (1878–85). (JJ)

Sources: Biographisches Lexikon, vol. 2; Entsiklopediya Bulgariya, vol. 2 (Sofia, 1981); Stefan Bobchev, Koy e Ivan Geshov? Rech (Sofia, 1908); Richard J. Crompton, Bulgaria 1878–1983: A History (Boulder, Colo., 1983); E. Stelova, Ivan E. Geshov (Sofia, 1994); Bulgarski dyzhavnitsi (Sofia, 1995); Raymond Detrez, Historical Dictionary of Bulgaria (Lanham, Md., 1997); Tasho Tashev, Ministrite na Bulgariya 1879–1999: Entsiklopedichen Spravochnik (Sofia, 1999).

GHEORGHIU-DEJ Gheorghe (8 November 1901, Bîrlad, Moldavia–19 March 1965, Bucharest), Romanian Communist leader. Gheorghiu-Dej came from a working-class family. After primary school, he started working as a porter at the port of Galati at the age of eleven. Then after completing the third grade of a vocational high school, he was a factory worker and a railroad electrician. From 1923 to 1925 he served in the army, attaining the rank of sergeant. In the mid-1920s he joined the Communist Party. He was arrested several times for revolutionary agitation. In 1931 he was sent by the party to work in Dej; hence he later added “Dej” to his surname. In February 1933 he was arrested for organizing the Grivița railway strike and was sentenced to twelve years’ imprisonment. At that time he was already a member of the Central Committee (CC) of the Romanian Communist Party. He served his sentence in the Doftana prison, near Câmpina; it was infamous for hard material conditions and the cruelty of the warders. In prison, he met the leading Romanian Communists and became their informal leader. Released, he came into conflict with the general secretary of the party, Ștefan Foriș, who refused to start sabotage actions in the rear of the German Army on the orders of the Comintern. In 1942 Gheorghiu-Dej was imprisoned again and accused of spying for the USSR. Along with the majority of Romanian Communists, he was held in a camp in Tîrgu-Jiu, where in April 1944 he caused the removal of Foriș as general secretary. On the orders of Gheorghiu-Dej, Foriș was killed in the summer of 1946.

Shortly before the coup of August 1944, which overthrew the dictatorship of Marshal Ion Antonescu, Gheorghiu-Dej escaped from prison, and after the establishment of the coalition government of General Constantin Sănătescu he assumed the minister of communications. In December 1944 and January 1945 Gheorghiu-Dej stayed with Ana Pauker in Moscow. Although Stalin had initially considered making Pauker head of the party, during this visit he appointed Gheorghiu-Dej secretary general of the party. After his return to Bucharest Gheorghiu-Dej started implementing a plan to accelerate the Communist takeover of power. For example, he personally directed the attacks of Communist raiding parties on the Malax plants in Bucharest at the beginning of 1945. He also played a key role in the removal of the government of General Nicolae Radescu. In 1945–48 a balance of power was maintained in the party leadership, in which Gheorghiu-Dej represented the “national wing”; therefore his leadership was at first rather nominal, and the decisive voice was that of the activists of non-Romanian origin who came from the USSR and Soviet MVD agents, who organized the General Department of State Security (Direcția Generală a Securității Poporului; for short, Securitate).

Gheorghiu-Dej gradually consolidated his position and was one of the most ardent Stalinists. In December 1947 he forced King Michael I to abdicate. In February 1948, after the incorporation of the remains of a split Social Democracy, he became the head of the Romanian Workers’ Party (Partidul Muncitoresc Român [RWP]). In the government that followed the overthrow of democracy in 1945, he was primarily responsible for economic affairs. In 1945–48 he headed the Supreme Economic Council; in 1946–48 he was minister of the national economy; between 1948 and 1949 he was head of the Planning Committee, and from 1948 he was also deputy prime minister in the cabinet of Petru Groza. He supervised extremely unrealistic economic plans, which were implemented with the use of the forced labor of prisoners. During the collectivizations of 1949–62 he played a key role in breaking up the opposition of peasants who tried to organize active resistance—for example, in the regions of Arad, Argeș, Bihor, and Timișoara. At that time, over eighty thousand people were arrested and sent to camps. He was co-responsible for the Stalinization of social life and purges connected with an anti-Titoist campaign. In 1946 he launched attacks against Lucrețiu Patrașcanu, who was a leading Communist of a more pro-national orientation. Later, Gheorghiu-Dej caused the expulsion of Patrașcanu from the party, his imprisonment in August 1948, his sentencing to death, and his execution in April 1954. In agreement with Andrey Vyshinsky and with the assistance of Soviet advisers in the Ministry of Interior, in 1952 Gheorghiu-Dej conducted a purge that affected leading functionaries of non-Romanian origin—for example, Pauker and Vasile Luca. Next, he dismissed Groza, and in June of the same year he assumed the post of prime minister, concentrating all power in his hands.

After Stalin's death in March 1953 Gheorghiu-Dej followed the Kremlin's directives concerning "collective leadership," and on 20 April 1954 he resigned as head of the party, retaining the post of head of government. Having realized that this step meant the risk of losing total power, on 30 September 1955 he changed posts, assuming the leadership of the party again. After the Twentieth Congress of the CPSU Gheorghiu-Dej decided that in Romania de-Stalinization had already taken place in the form of the purge of 1952; therefore the hard-line policy should be maintained. He closely cooperated with the Kremlin during the suppression of the Hungarian Revolution in the fall of 1956. At that time he consolidated the forces of the Securitate and in 1957 arranged the removal of potential rivals, such as Miron Constantinescu and Iosif Chişinevski, from party leadership. In 1958 he unleashed a campaign of "revolutionary vigilance," which resulted in widespread purges of the cultural circles. A new penal code in July 1958 increased the punishment for "anti-state" activities. The arrests intensified, and there was an increase in the number of labor camp prisoners, especially in the Danube delta (e.g., in Balta Brăilei, Feteşti, and Periprava), where the Danube–Black Sea Canal was being built.

Steadily consolidating his power, in 1961 Gheorghiu-Dej also became president of Romania. It is estimated that between 1949 and 1960, under his rule, 134,000 political trials were held, and around 550,000 people were convicted. Ruling by terror, at the same time he clearly sought a more independent foreign policy course. Romania stressed its national interests within the framework of the Council for Mutual Economic Assistance (Comecon). The personal dislike between Gheorghiu-Dej and Nikita Khrushchev grew. At the Third Congress of the RWP in June 1960, Gheorghiu-Dej backed the Chinese formula of equality among Socialist countries. At a CMEA meeting on 15 February 1963, the Romanian delegation openly opposed a coordination of the plans of member states, emphasizing the principle of national sovereignty. Despite pressure from the Kremlin, which put forward a plan for an ethnic referendum in Transylvania that would be dangerous for Bucharest, Gheorghiu-Dej did not yield. At the time of the mounting Chinese-Soviet conflict, the Romanian delegation went to Beijing in February 1963, and in March of the same year Bucharest restored diplomatic relations with Albania, which had been broken off by Moscow's satellites. Gheorghiu-Dej's efforts also led to an improvement of relations with Yugoslavia. Khrushchev's fall consolidated Gheorghiu-Dej's position in relation to the Kremlin. On 21 October 1964 he asked the USSR ambassador to withdraw KGB advisers from Romania. His determined stance toward Moscow won him much popularity among the Romanians, especially because he also released some political prisoners. In January 1965 it turned out that he was seriously ill, and soon he was diagnosed with lung cancer. However, information about his disease was announced to the public only a day before his death. (WR) Sources: Robert R. King, History of the Romanian Communist Party (Stanford, 1980); Vladimir Tismaneanu, Fantoma lui Gheorghiu-Dej (Bucharest, 1995); Stelian Tanase, Elite si societate: Guvernarea Gheorghiu-Dej, 1948–1965 (Bucharest, 1998); Dennis Deletant, Communist Terror in Romania: Gheorghiu-Dej and the Police State, 1948–1965 (New York, 1999).

GHIBU Onisifor (31 May 1883, Sălişte–31 October 1972, Sibiu), Romanian pedagogue and politician. In 1902, Ghibu graduated from a high school in Braşov. Between 1902 and 1905 he studied at the Theological Institute in Sibiu (Transylvania), and from 1905 through 1909, at universities in Bucharest, Budapest, Strasbourg, and Jena. In 1909, he successfully defended his Ph.D. dissertation in philosophy and pedagogy at Jena. Between 1910 and 1914, he worked at the Orthodox Archbishopric in Sibiu. His field of responsibility was the Romanian educational system. Concurrently, between 1911 and 1912, he was a substitute professor at the Theological-Pedagogical Institute in Sibiu. From 1912 through 1914 he served as secretary of the department of education of the Transylvanian Society of Literature and Culture of the Romanian Nation (Asociaţiunii Transilvane pentru Literatura Română și Cultura Poporului Român [ASTRA]) in Braşov. During World War I, he resided in Bucharest, Iaşi, and Kishinev, advocating the creation of a unified Romanian state embracing all Romanians. To expedite this goal, he founded and edited the periodical Scoala moldoveneasca and the dailies Ardealul in Basarabia and România noua. He also contributed to Cuvânt moldovenesc and Luminatorul. In 1919, he became a member of the Romanian Academy of Sciences. From 1919 he was a professor of pedagogy and the history of pedagogy at Cluj University.

Ghibu stressed the necessity to organize education in accord with the national spirit and based upon modern standards. His numerous works include the following: Ziaristica bisericască la români: Studiu istoric (Church periodicals of the Romanians: A historical study; 1910); Despre educație (On education; 1911); Școala românească în Transilvania și Ungaria: Dezvoltarea ei istorică și situația ei actuală (The Romanian school in Transylvania and Hungary: Its historical development and the current situation; 1915); Din istoria literaturii didactice românești (From the history of Romanian didactic literature, 3 vols.; 1916); and Dictatura și anarhie: Priviri critice asupra evoluției și directivei învățământului și educației românești sub regimul Antonescu 1940–1944 (Dictatorship and anarchy: Critical studies on the evolution and development of Romanian teaching and education under the Antonescu regime, 1940–1944; 1944). Ghibu criticized the Communist regime in Romania in a two-volume work, Chemare la judecata istoriei (A call before the court of history), which was not published until 1992 and 1993. After World War II Ghibu was imprisoned for many years in forced labor camps. Released at the beginning of the 1960s, he was removed from public life and died in obscurity in 1972. He left behind his unpublished memoirs. (LW)

Sources: Dictionar Enciclopedic, vol. 2 (Bucharest, 1996); Șerban N. Ionescu, Who Was Who in Twentieth Century Romania (Boulder, Colo., 1994); Dorina N. Rusu, Membrii Academiei Române 1866–1999 (Bucharest, 1999).

GICHEV Dimitur (28 November 1893, Perushchytsa–26 April 1964, Sofia), Bulgarian Peasant Party politician. Born into a teacher's family, Gichev studied in a theological seminary, but he chose a political career. From 1911 he belonged to the Bulgarian Agrarian National Union (BANU) of Aleksandur Stamboliyski. In 1923 he was elected to the National Assembly. After the fall of the Stamboliyski regime Gichev worked in the underground, and in 1925 he was arrested. After his release he returned to active political life in 1931, becoming minister of agriculture (June 1931–December 1932) and minister of trade (until May 1934) in the governments of Aleksandur Malinov and Nikola Mushanov. In the 1930s he became one of the leaders of the BANU Vrabcha-1 faction, more moderate and pro-Western than the leftist BANU Pladne. BANU Vrabcha-1 refused to support the military group Zveno, which staged a coup in May 1934. After the coup, Gichev was temporarily detained in the Klisura Monastery. The Vrabcha-1 faction stayed in opposition under the autocratic regime of Tsar Boris III after 1935. In 1939–40 Gichev favored cooperation with Great Britain, for which he was criticized by government circles.

Gichev opposed Bulgaria's accession to the Tripartite Pact. After the death of Boris III, he was one of the signatories of an appeal on 8 September 1943 by democratic leaders for new elections to the Grand National Assembly and the elaboration of a neutral foreign policy based on the broad consent of all political parties. Gichev maintained contacts with the Soviet embassy in Sofia, but he refused to join the Fatherland Front, which he considered too dependent on Moscow. At the same time he thought that the Communists and Zveno were threats to democracy. In the summer of 1944 he reconciled with the idea of close cooperation with the Soviet Union and stayed in touch with the Soviet chargé d'affaires in Sofia. In August 1944, along with twelve other politicians, he signed a declaration demanding a substantial change in Bulgarian foreign policy, rapprochement with the USSR, and the formation of a populist government. After a declaration of neutrality by the Ivan Bagrianov government was rejected by Moscow, on 2 September 1944 Gichev agreed to join the "government of last chance" headed by Konstantin Muraviev, a moderate BANU politician. This government was toppled by the coup of 9 September 1944. As a result Gichev was arrested, and in early 1945 he was sentenced to one year in prison. Released in September 1945, he resumed activity in the BANU faction of Nikola Petkov. Arrested again in October 1947, on 16 April 1948 he was sentenced by a Communist court to life imprisonment. Released in 1959, he did not return to politics. (WR)

Sources: Entsiklopediya Bulgariya, vol. 2 (Sofia, 1978); Marshall Lee Miller, Bulgaria during the Second World War (Stanford, 1975); Stephane Groueff, Crown of Thorns (Lanham, Md., 1987); Entsiklopediya na Bulgariya 1879–1999: Entsiklopedichen spravochnik (Sofia, 1999).

GIEDROYĆ Jerzy (27 July 1906, Mińsk Litewski–14 September 2000, Maisons Laffite, near Paris), Polish pundit, politician, and lawyer. Giedroyć came from an aristocratic family of Lithuanian origin. As a youth, he fought in the Polish-Soviet war. Later, he studied at the University of Warsaw. Following the May 1926 coup d'état, he supported Józef Piłsudski. Between 1929 and 1935 he was employed with the press office of the Council of Ministers, then at the Ministry of Agriculture, and between 1935 and 1939, he was the supervisor of a department at the Ministry of Industry and Trade. In 1930, at the behest of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, he initiated the publication of Wschód-Orient, editing its first issue. Between 1930 and 1939, he edited the bi-monthly Bunt Młodych and also the weekly Polityka. He was an ideologist of statism and of the anti-Soviet minorities' Promethean Movement; he was also the chairman of the Myśl Mocarstwowa organization. At the same time, he advocated concord with Poland's ethnic minorities and opposed nationalism and communism.

After the outbreak of World War II in September 1939, together with his government, Giedroyć left Poland for Romania. Between 1939 and 1940, he was secretary to the Polish ambassador, Roger Raczyński, in Bucharest, serving also as a liaison between the Polish and British embassies. After leaving the embassy, he served in the Independent Carpathian Rifle Brigade in Palestine between 1941 and 1943 and afterwards in the Second Free Polish Corps, participating in the battle of Tobruk. Between 1942 and 1944 he was the supervisor of publishing at the Department of Propaganda and Culture of the Second Corps. He founded its publishing house and published a daily and weekly Orzeł Biały. In 1945, he briefly sojourned in London, where he served as a department supervisor at the Ministry of Information. In 1946 he founded the Literary Institute (Instytut Literacki) in Rome. In 1947 the institute moved to Maisons Laffite, near Paris. A year later, Giedroyc began publishing the monthly Kultura and then books of the Literary Institute. In 1962, he started editing and publishing Zeszyty Historyczne, which continued to appear after his death. Between 1974 and 1982, he co-edited Kontinent. Along with Zofia and Zygmunt Hertz, as well as Józef Czapski, Giedroyc created an unreplicable center of Polish cultural life. Miniature editions of Kultura were smuggled into Poland illegally. They immensely influenced the nation's intellectual and political life. To a large extent, they shaped the Polish dissident milieu, in particular in its tolerant attitude toward Ukrainians, Belorussians, and Lithuanians.

After Poland regained its independence in 1989, numerous honors were piled upon Giedroyc. He received honorary doctorates from the Jagiellonian University in Kraków, the University of Wrocław, the University of Białostok, the University of Warsaw, the University of Maria Curie-Skłodowska in Lublin, and the University of Friburg. He was critical toward the Third Polish Republic and its new elite. He refused to accept the Order of the White Eagle from President Lech Wałęsa. However, he displayed an accommodationist attitude toward former Communists, and this made him many enemies. He advocated an active Eastern policy, based in particular upon good relations between Poland and Ukraine. In 1997, he accepted honorary citizenship from the Republic of Lithuania. In 1996, he published his memoirs in Warsaw: Autobiografia na cztery ręce (An autobiography for four hands). Yet Giedroyc never visited Poland after 1989. Following his death, according to his will, the publication of Kultura was discontinued. (PK)

Sources: Kto jest kim w polityce: Świat po roku 1860 (Warsaw, 1996); Słownik polityków polskich XX w. (Warsaw, 1998); Leksykon kultury polskiej poza krajem od roku 1939, vol. 1 (Lublin, 2000); Andrzej Friszke, Życie polityczne emigracji (Warsaw, 1999); Rafał Habielski, Życie społeczne i kulturalne emigracji (Warsaw, 1999); Jerzego Giedroycia doktoraty honoris causa (Lublin, 1999); Więź, 2000, no. 12; Krzysztof Pomian, W kręgu Giedroycia (Warsaw, 2000).

GIEREK Edward (6 January 1913, Porąbka–29 July 2001, Cieszyn), Polish Communist leader. Gierek came from a coal miner's family. In 1923 he left Poland with his mother for France, where in 1926 he began working in coal mining. In 1931 he joined the French Communist Party. In 1937, he moved to Belgium and joined the Belgian Communist Party. During World War II he was active in the Communist underground. From 1946 to 1948, as a member of the (Communist) Polish Workers' Party, he chaired the Council of Poles in Belgium. In 1948 he returned to Poland and quickly advanced through the ranks of the (Communist) Polish United Workers' Party (Polska Zjednoczona Partia Robotnicza [PUWP]) in Upper Silesia. First he worked in the Central Committee (CC) apparatus in Warsaw, but then he was transferred to Upper Silesia. He enjoyed the support of the top Communist leader, Aleksander Zawadzki, for having broken up a strike in the Dąbrowa Basin. Between 1951 and 1954 Gierek served as a secretary of the PUWP Provincial Committee in Katowice. In March 1953 he was appointed a member of the PUWP CC. From April 1954 through March 1956 he was head of the CC Department of Heavy Industry. In March 1956, during the Sixth Plenum of the CC, he was elevated to the membership of the CC Secretariat. On 28 June he was included in a party task force in charge of crushing demonstrations in Poznań. During the Seventh Plenum he was coopted to the PUWP CC Politburo. The reasons for the meteoric rise of such an activist, who enjoyed the trust of the Stalinists despite his sojourn of twenty years in the West, remain unclear.

On 19 October 1956, Gierek joined a top PUWP leadership delegation in negotiations with a Soviet delegation headed by Nikita Khrushchev concerning the takeover of power by Władysław Gomułka. At the Eighth Plenum Gierek was dropped from the Politburo but retained his post with the CC Secretariat. He remained neutral between the "liberal" Puławska group and the "conservative" Natolin faction. In March 1957 he was nominated as the first secretary of the PUWP Provincial Committee in Katowice. He played a moderating role in a conflict between Silesians and Dąbrowa Basin denizens and was adjudged a "good master" who was able to coerce the central authorities into channeling additional funds for the development of Katowice Province. He became the main representative of the heavy industry lobby, which thus enjoyed preferential treatment in budgetary matters. An increase in investments after 1959 allowed him to hone his lobbying skills further to benefit his province. In March 1959, during the Third PUWP Congress, Gierek was once again coopted to the Politburo. During the Fourth Congress, however, he lost his post with the Secretariat but remained in the Politburo.

Constantly solidifying his power in the Katowice region, he became the leader of the top economic bureaucrats, and his realm was dubbed “the Polish Katanga.”

During the political crisis of March 1968, Gierek prevented the spread of anti-government demonstrations in his realm by threatening the use of force. On 19 March 1968, during a rally of party activists with Gomułka, some of those present chanted their support for Gierek, who, like the first secretary, delivered a strongly anti-Semitic speech. During an inter-party struggle between Gomułka and the secret police boss, Mieczysław Moczar, Gierek emerged as the third force in the PUWP. In July 1968, during the Twelfth Plenum of the CC, he remarked that “the ways of governing must change because times are changing”; the comment reflected his growing self-assurance. According to an official communiqué following the parliamentary “elections” of June 1969, Gierek received the best results, topping even those of Gomułka.

In mid-December 1970, when Gomułka ordered that firearms be used to crush a workers’ rebellion on the Baltic Coast, Gierek adopted a wait-and-see attitude in Upper Silesia. On 18 December 1970 most top PUWP leaders backed a political solution to the crisis, thus spelling the end of Gomułka and his closest collaborators. Late on the night of 18 December 1970 Gierek arrived in Warsaw, where the members of the Politburo and the CC agreed to install him as first secretary. The CC approved this decision the following day. Gierek spoke on national television, admitting that some of the blame for the bloody events on the Baltic Coast also lay with the authorities.

Upon the assumption of power, Gierek attempted to consolidate his leadership and calm the nation. In February 1971, another batch of Gomułka’s followers was purged from the CC and Politburo. In May and June Gierek managed to sideline Moczar. Meanwhile, he personally traveled to Szczecin and Gdańsk, where he managed to convince the striking workers to end their protest. The government rescinded the price increases that had caused the rebellion and promised to rebuild the Royal Castle in Warsaw. The new first secretary endeavored to buy social peace by embarking upon a program of spectacular investments in consumption, including the production of the Fiat 125, the construction of highways, and a purchase of the Coca Cola license for Poland. As a result, levels of optimism rose among the population. At the same time, Gierek supported the Kremlin’s plans to use détente to build up the weapons potential of the Soviet bloc. To this end, he ordered the building of the gigantic Katowice Steelworks and embarked on other projects. The “great leap” in investments was facilitated by the willingness of Western nations to grant enormous credits to the Communists. However, the inefficient and wasteful economic system of Communist Poland prevented anyone from taking advantage of the opportunities, and the Gierek team never contemplated any serious changes, undertaking only cosmetic and counterproductive “reforms.” In February 1976, Gierek and his regime amended the constitution with a law about “the leading role of the party” and Poland’s alliance with the Soviet Union. The amendments triggered objections from the dissident intelligentsia. The regime’s relations with the Catholic Church were also poor. As early as 1975 there were signs of a looming economic crisis. Instead of improvements, loudly touted as imminent by Gierek’s propaganda machine, there were shortages. An attempt to raise the prices of basic necessities in June 1976 caused violent protests by workers in Radom and Ursus. The Communists brutally crushed the demonstrations, but they retracted the price increases. The incident led to the formation of an institutionalized democratic opposition, most notably the Committee for the Defense of Workers.

From the mid-1970s, the Gierek regime, which suffered from internal divisions, appeared increasingly rudderless. The deterioration of the economic situation fostered oppositionist attitudes and activities. The authorities were unable to crush them because they had pledged to respect human rights: the government of Poland was a signatory to the Helsinki Accord of August 1975, and it needed more bank credit in the West, the granting of which was increasingly tied to a nation’s human rights record. As a result, between 1976 and 1980, Poland’s economy deteriorated further, dissident activities intensified, and the bankrupt nature of Communist ideology was laid bare. In October 1978, the Polish nation was presented with an ideological alternative with the election of Cardinal Karol Wojtyła as Pope John Paul II, who made a pilgrimage home in June 1979. In 1979 and 1980, the Polish GNP continued to decline, and the Gierek team failed to elucidate any program of reform. Strikes in the summer of 1980 threatened the stability of the regime, but Gierek failed to react to the situation even then. At the end of August 1980, he admitted openly during a Politburo meeting that he had no idea what to do. The Gdańsk Agreement of 31 August 1980 and the permission of the regime for the founding of independent trade unions spelled the end of his rule. On 6 September, during the Sixth CC Plenum, Gierek was replaced by Stanisław Kania. On 2 December 1980, he was purged from the CC and the Council of State (he had occupied the latter post since 1976). On 19 December 1980 he resigned his parliamentary seat (which he had held since 1952). On 15 July 1981, during the Ninth Extraordinary PUWP Congress, he was expelled from the party. After martial law was imposed, he was even briefly interned.

The balance of Gierek's rule is negative. His "propaganda of success" spread optimistic slogans about building "a second Poland," but the nation sank into a swamp of economic and social crises. Although Gierek was impressed by the West, which he knew from his youth, he paid effusive homage to Leonid Brezhnev and the rulers of the USSR. He opened up Poland's economy to the West, but he also paved the way to corruption at the top. From being debt free, during the Gierek regime Poland became a debtor nation, saddled with gigantic financial obligations. Most of the U.S.$25 billion borrowed by his team was wasted or stolen. Despite all this, after Poland regained its independence in 1989, some of the temporarily destitute Poles recalled the "good old times," and Gierek was rehabilitated in the public opinion. In 1990, he published two massive interviews, Przerwana dekada (The interrupted decade) and Replika (A response). In 1993, he published his memoirs, Smak życia (The taste of life), in which he justified his policies. (WR)

Sources: Mołdawa; Andrzej Micewski, Współrzędzić czy nie klamać (Paris, 1978); Jean Woodall, ed., Policy and Politics in Contemporary Poland (London, 1982); Jakub Karpiński, Countdown: The Polish Upheavals of 1956, 1968, 1970, 1976, 1980 (New York, 1982); George Sanford, Polish Communism in Crisis (London and Canberra, 1983); Zbigniew Błażyński, Towarzysze zeznają: Dekada Gierka 1970–1980 w tzw. Komisji Grabskiego (London, 1987); Andrzej Albert [Wojciech Roszkowski], Najnowsza historia Polski 1914–1993, vols. 1–2 (Warsaw, 1993); Andrzej Paczkowski, Pół wieku dziejów Polski (Warsaw, 1995); Jacek Wegner, Sternicy: Od Nowotki do Rakowskiego (Kraków, 1997); Jerzy Eisler, Grudzień 1970 (Warsaw, 2000); Janusz Rolicki, Gierek (Warsaw, 2002).

GIERTYCH Jędrzej (7 January 1903, Sosnowiec–8 October 1992, London), Polish nationalist politician and pundit. Giertych came from an intelligentsia family. From 1913 he was active in the scouting movement. In 1920, he was wounded outside of Warsaw while fighting as a volunteer in the Polish-Soviet war. He graduated from high school in Wilno (1921). Afterwards, he completed a law degree at the University of Warsaw (1925) and a degree in international affairs at the School of Political Science in Warsaw (1926). Between 1925 and 1929 he supervised the Foreign Department of the Union of Polish Scouting (Związek Harcerstwa Polskiego). During the coup d'état of May 1926, he fought on the side of the government. From 1927 through 1929, he served in the Polish Navy. Later he worked at the Ministry of Foreign Affairs as an official in charge of the Polish diaspora (Polonia). In 1931, he was posted as an attaché to the Polish Consulate in Allenstein, Germany. From his youth, he was active in the nationalist movement. He advocated a corporatist nation-state, along with anti-liberalism, anti-Semitism, and extreme anti-Germanism. In 1932, he openly plunged into politics, joining the radical wing of the National Party (Stronnictwo Narodowe [SN]). First, he became the secretary of the Youth Department of the Executive Committee of the Camp of Great Poland (1932–33) and then a member of the SN Main Committee (1936–39) and Main Board (1937–39). He was coopted to the leadership of a secret part of the SN, where he opposed the majority group of his main rival, Tadeusz Bielecki. In 1933 he was elected to the Warsaw City Council on behalf of the SN.

During the September 1939 campaign, Giertych fought on the Hel Peninsula. Taken prisoner by the Nazis, he attempted to escape six times, and therefore he was the first Allied officer to be imprisoned in a special POW camp at Colditz. Liberated at the beginning of April 1945, he returned to active military service. In the fall of 1945, he clandestinely traveled to Poland as an emissary of the Polish government-in-exile and the SN. On the way back, he smuggled his family out to the West. Released from the military in 1947, for the next two years he was entrusted by the Polish government-in-exile with the mission of beaming radio programs to Soviet-occupied Poland from the SS Maria, a ship he commanded. However, he was critical of the Polish émigré authorities for their involvement with Western intelligence agencies. In 1961 he was expelled from the SN for having written an open letter to Nikita Khrushchev. He was active in the Latin Mass Society in Great Britain, which advocated the Tridentine Rite in the Catholic Church. Nonetheless, he was opposed to any break with Rome. He concentrated mainly on journalism, literature, history, and publishing. After 1956, he leaned toward cooperation with the regime in Warsaw.

Giertych's first article appeared in 1917 in the scouting movement's periodical Młodzież. Between 1932 and 1939, he was an editor of Warszawski Dziennik Narodowy. He also published in Myśl Narodowa, Kurier Warszawski, Kurier Poznański, and Słowo Narodowe. After the war, he worked with the following émigré periodicals: Horyzonty (Brussels), Życie (London), and Przemiany (Rome). He also wrote for the Catholic press, including The Tablet, The Catholic Herald, and The Catholic Times. Between 1969 and 1988, he published Opoka. He also ran a few of his own publishing ventures, putting out (among other things) the historiosophical works of Feliks Koneczny. He published a few dozen books in several languages. His most important works include My nowe pokolenie! (We, the new generation! 1929); Tragizm losów Polski (The tragedy of Poland's fate; 1936); Hiszpania bohaterska (Heroic Spain; 1837); O wyjście z kryzysu (To emerge from the crisis; 1938); Nacjonalizm chrześcijański (Christian nationalism; 1948); Poland and Germany (1958); Deutschland und die Polen von 1795 bis heute (Germany and Poland from 1795 until today; 1962); Józef Piłsudski 1914–1919 (1979); In Defense of My Country (1981); and Tysiąc lat historii polskiego narodu (A thousand years of history of the Polish nation; 1986). He also wrote memoirs: Wrześniowcy (The September war soldiers; 1957); Wspomnienia ochotnika 1920 r. (The memories of a volunteer of 1920; 1958); and Europa w niewoli (Europe enslaved; 1959). As an émigré, he supported himself as a blue-collar laborer and a language teacher. He raised nine children. (MC)

Sources: Jerzy Janusz Terej, Rzeczywistość i polityka: Ze studiów nad dziejami najnowszymi Narodowej Demokracji (Warsaw, 1979); Krzysztof Kawalec, Narodowa Demokracja wobec faszyzmu 1922–1939 (Warsaw, 1989); Zdzisław Zakrzewski, “Wspomnienia,” tape, June 1989; Barbara O’Driscoll, Just Say Hail Mary: The Story of Maria and Jędrzej Giertych (London, 1999); Leszek Żebrowski, “Jędrzej Giertych (1903–1992),” 25 October 2001; “Giertych, Jędrzej (1903–1992),” wiem.onet.pl/wiem/0041d6.html.

GIEYSZTOR Aleksander (17 July 1916, Moscow–9 February 1999, Warsaw), Polish historian and social activist. Gieysztor graduated from the Historical-Philosophical Department at the University of Warsaw in 1937. From 1935 to 1937 he worked at the Main Archive of Old Documents. In 1938 he enrolled at the École Pratique des Hautes Études in Paris, concentrating on medieval history. During World War II, in Poland under the Nazi occupation, he clandestinely defended his doctorate in 1942. He lectured at the Free Polish University (1943–44). In 1940 he joined the Union for Armed Struggle, and in 1942, the Home Army (Armia Krajowa [AK]). He worked at the Bureau of Information and Propaganda of the AK Main Command, eventually becoming its supervisor in June 1944. He participated in the Warsaw Uprising. Imprisoned in a German POW camp, he and Stanisław Płoski penned their account of the insurrection: Powstanie Warszawskie (The Warsaw Uprising), which was published in the underground only in 1981.

In June 1945 Gieysztor began to work at the Institute of Art History and Inventory of Historical Objects of the Ministry of Culture and Art, and in September 1945, at the Institute of History at the University of Warsaw. In 1946 he was awarded a postdoctoral degree. In 1949 he became an assistant professor and in 1960 a full professor. Between 1953 and 1955, he served as deputy director of the Institute of the History of Material Culture and from 1969 as the editor-in-chief of Kwartalnik Historii Kultury Materialnej. Between 1951 and 1953 he was deputy dean and between 1956 and 1959 deputy rector of the University of Warsaw. From 1955 to 1975 he was director of the Institute of History at the University of Warsaw. He was on the editorial board of Kwartalnik Historyczny and of the serial Polski Słownik Biograficzny (Polish biographical dictionary). In 1971 he became a corresponding member, and in 1980 a full member, of the Polish Academy of Sciences (PAS). In 1981–83 and 1990–92 he was the PAS president. After its reactivation in 1989, he became a member of the Polish Academy of Arts and Sciences. From 1947 Gieysztor was involved in an effort to reconstruct the Royal Castle in Warsaw. In 1971 he was coopted to the Civic Presidium for the Reconstruction of the Castle, and between 1980 and 1991 he served as director of the reconstructed castle. The deputy chairman of the Council for the Preservation of the Memory of Struggle and Martyrdom from 1990, he also served for many years as the president of the National Committee of the International Council of Museums (ICOM) and an honorary member of the International Council on Monuments and Sites (ICOMOS). In 1965 he was included on the board of the very prestigious International Committee for Historical Sciences, serving as its deputy chairman between 1975 and 1980 and as its chairman from 1980 through 1985. He was a member of many foreign scholarly academies and a honorary doctor of ten foreign and three Polish universities.

Although Gieysztor shied away from politics, his civic and patriotic involvement was significant. In 1964, he signed the “Letter of 34,” a protest by Polish intellectuals against the cultural policies of the Communist regime. During the period of martial law, he was an advocate for the prisoners and internees. In February 1989, he was endorsed by both the Communists and the opposition as an independent participant in the Round Table Talks. Gieysztor’s scholarly output comprises over one thousand items. His most important works include Władza Karola Wielkiego w opinii współczesnych (The power of Charlemagne according to contemporaries; 1938); Zarys pisma łacińskiego (An outline of Latin; 1973); and Mitologia Słowian (Mythology of the Slavs; 1982). He also co-edited many other works. (WD-JK)

Sources: Wielka Encyklopedia PWN, vol. 10 (Warsaw, 2002); Muzealnictwo, 1999, no. 41; Danuta Gawin, Ewa Gieysztor, Marian Sołtysiak, and Andrzej Tomaszewski, Aleksander Gieysztor o dziedzictwie kultury (Warsaw, 2000); Wielka Internetowa Encyklopedia Multimedialna.

GIGURTU Ion [originally Gigârtu] (24 June 1886, Turnu Severin–1959, Sighet), Romanian engineer, businessman, and politician. After completing a lycée in Craiova, Gigurtu studied at the Polytechnic College in Paris between 1906 and 1910. After 1918 he was active as an industrialist in several areas of the economy, including the mining industry, metallurgy, railways, and banking. Before 1937 he did not take an active part in political life, although from 1930 he financially supported King Charles II and his favorite, Elena Lupescu. Gigurtu belonged to the court camarilla of the king. Between December 1937 and February 1938 he served as minister of industry and trade, and when Charles II assumed full dictatorial power, Gigurtu became involved in the financial support of the regime. From 1937 he kept in close touch with German political and industrial circles—for example, with Hermann Göring. From November 1939 to July 1940 he was minister of public works. As prime minister of the last government during the reign of Charles II (between 4 July and 5 September 1940), Gigurtu allowed members of the Iron Guard to join the government for the first time. Horia Sima became minister of religious affairs, and Vasile Noveanu was appointed minister of finance in his government. This maneuver did not save Charles II from having to abdicate; the abdication came as a result of general discontent in the country caused by Romania's loss of nearly one-third of its former territory under the Second Vienna Award of 30 August 1940. Gigurtu was dismissed on 5 September 1940, when General Ion Antonescu came to power. After World War II Gigurtu was a long-term political prisoner. He died in the Sighet prison, but the exact date of death and place of burial are not known. (FA/TD)

Sources: Politics and Political Parties in Roumania (London, 1936); The International Who's Who (London, 1941); Șerban N. Ionescu, Who Was Who in Twentieth Century Romania (Boulder, Colo., 1994); M. Mușat and I. Ardeleanu, România după Marea Unire, vol. 2 (Bucharest, 1986); Al. Gh. Savu, Dictatura regală 1938–1940 (Bucharest, 1970); A. Simon, Regimul politic din România septembrie 1940–ianuarie 1941 (Cluj, 1976).

GIMES Miklós (22 December 1917, Budapest–16 June 1958, Budapest), Hungarian Communist activist, victim of the 1956 revolution. Gimes wanted to become a doctor, like his parents, but he did not complete his studies. In 1942 he established contact with the illicit Communist movement. Being of Jewish origin, he was called to labor service, but in summer 1944 he managed to escape and subsequently joined the Yugoslav guerrilla army of Josip Broz Tito. From January 1945 he was in Budapest, where he joined the Hungarian Communist Party and worked as a journalist for the party's central organ, Szabad Nép (1946–54). From February 1947 he was a member of the editorial board; he also authored a number of ideological articles. Initially Gimes was a protégé of József Rév, but after 1953 he became a supporter of reforms introduced by Prime Minister Imre Nagy. In 1954, he worked as a correspondent for Szabad Nép in Geneva, Berlin, and Paris. When Nagy was dismissed, Gimes was moved to another daily. In May 1955, at a party meeting, he demanded a review of the sentences pronounced in the László Rajk trial, as well as the show trials related to it; as a result, he was removed from the party and dismissed from his job. Gimes worked as a librarian and lecturer. He was one of the central figures of the so-called party opposition gathered around Nagy, but Gimes's views were more radical than those of the majority of his comrades as he supported a multiparty system. In July 1956, after Mátyás Rákosi had lost the position of first secretary of the party, Gimes was accepted back into the party. During the revolution he co-founded the Magyar Szabadság daily; after 4 November he became one of the most important figures of the intellectual resistance: he edited an illegal magazine, Október Huszonharmadika, and he established the Hungarian Democratic Independence Movement. On 5 December 1956 he was arrested by Soviet officers. On 15 June 1958, in the trial of Imre Nagy and his comrades, Gimes was sentenced to death without the right of appeal on a charge of initiating and leading a conspiracy against "the rule of the people." He was executed the following day. In June 1989, he had a solemn burial along with Nagy and other victims executed after the trial. (JT)

Sources: Magyar Nagylexikon, vol. 8 (Budapest, 1999); A magyar forradalom és szabadságharc enciklopédiája, CD-ROM (Budapest, 1999); Új Magyar Életrajzi Lexikon, vol. 2 (Budapest, 2001); Ferenc A. Vali, Rift and Revolt in Hungary (Cambridge, Mass., 1961); Paul E. Zinner, Revolution in Hungary (New York, 1962); György Litván, ed., Rewolucja węgierska 1956 roku (Warsaw, 1996); Sándor Révész, Egyetlen élet: Gimes Miklós története (Budapest, 1999).

GIRA Liudas (27 August 1884, Vilnius [Wilno]–1 July 1946, Vilnius), Lithuanian poet and literary critic. Gira graduated from the theological seminary in Vilnius in 1905. In December 1905, on behalf of the Catholic Church, he was secretary of the Grand Lithuanian Assembly in Vilnius, where he demanded autonomy for Lithuania. He did not take holy orders but undertook social, political, and literary activities instead. In 1913–14 he edited the first Lithuanian journal of literary criticism, Vaivorykštė. In 1912 he published his first volume of poetry, Lauky Dainos (Songs of the fields). He was among the founders of the Lithuanian Union of Farmers, and during World War I he joined the Christian Democratic Party. In 1915 he belonged to the Vilnius Civic Committee. From the end of 1918, despite a lack of military training, he was briefly head of the Lithuanian garrison in Vilnius. When the Bolsheviks seized the city at the end of December 1918, Gira was briefly arrested. After his release he went to the Lithuanian side of the front. In August 1919 he took part in putting down a plot by the Polish Military Organization in Kaunas aiming at the establishment of a pro-Polish Lithuanian government there. In 1921–26 Gira was director of the Lithuanian State Theater, and later he worked in the Ministry of Education. In 1921 he published Žiežyrbos (Sparks), and in 1929, Silko gijos (Silk threads). He also wrote dramas. Disappointed by subsequent Lithuanian governments, he went through an ideological evolution toward communism, and during the first Soviet occupation (1940–41) he was deputy commissar of education. After the German Wehrmacht entered Lithuania in June 1941, he escaped to the USSR and joined the Red Army. He served in it until 1944, when he was demobilized in the rank of captain and returned to Lithuania.

Under postwar Soviet rule Gira was one of the most touted Lithuanian writers, contributing to the intellectual Sovietization of his homeland. In 1945 he received the title of “people’s poet” and membership in the Academy of Sciences of the Lithuanian SSR. In 1949 he published the collection Thrys berželiai (Three birch trees). Gira’s literary output is subject to controversial evaluations. Appreciated by some as a folk poet, between the wars he mostly wrote in the spirit of patriotic pathos, and after 1940 he evolved toward Socialist realism in the Stalinist style. In 1952 his collected works were published in Russian as Izbrannoye (Selections), and in 1960–63 five volumes of his Raštai (Writings) were published in Lithuanian. (AG)

Sources: EL, vol. 2; Lietuvių literatūros istorija, vol. 4 (Vilnius, 1968).

GIRGINOV Aleksandur (29 April 1879, Turnovo–1 November 1953, Belene), Bulgarian politician and lawyer. Girginov graduated and received a Ph.D. in law in Leipzig. After returning home, he worked as a lawyer. He was one of the leaders of the Democratic Party and represented it in the National Assembly (1908–11 and 1913–34). After the June 1923 coup he joined the Democratic Alliance, but he left it in early 1924. Later he stayed in the opposition. He was minister of finance in the government of Aleksandur Malinov (June–October 1931) and minister of interior and minister of health in the government of Nikola Mushanov (October 1931–May 1934). He was the author of a restrictive press law. During World War II he declared himself in favor of Bulgaria’s neutrality, opposing the pro-German policies of subsequent governments. On 27 August 1944, along with twelve opposition politicians, he signed a declaration demanding the termination of the alliance with the Third Reich, a rapprochement with the Soviet Union, and the formation of a constitutional national government. In the short-lived government of Konstantin Muraviev

(2–9 September 1944) Girginov assumed the position of minister of finance and acting minister of trade, industry, and labor. After the coup of 9 September 1944 he was arrested and sentenced to one year in prison. After his release in early September 1945, Girginov, along with Mushanov, reactivated the Democratic Party, which, along with the Bulgarian Agrarian National Union and the Social Democratic Party, was active in opposition to the Communist-dominated Fatherland Front. For this activity he was detained in the Belene concentration camp on the Danube island of Persin, where he died. Girginov authored (among other works) the following: Parlamentarizum i poemato na vlastta (Parliamentarism and the acquisition of power; 1907); Durzhavnoto ustroystvo na Bulgariya (The state system of Bulgaria; 1921); Bulgariya pred velikata voyna (Bulgaria before the Great War; 1932); Narodnata katastrofa: Voynata 1912–1913 (The national disaster. The war of 1912–1913; 1926); and Izpitaniyata vuv voynata 1915–1918 (The experience of the 1915–1918 war; 1936). In 1946 he edited the daily Zname. (JJ)

Sources: Entsiklopediya Bulgariya, vol. 2 (Sofia, 1981); Charles A. Moser, Dimitrov of Bulgaria (Ottawa, Ill., 1979); Jerzy Jackowicz, Partie opozycyjne w Bułgarii 1944–1948 (Warsaw, 1997); Tasho Tashev, Ministrите na Bulgariya 1879–1999: Entsiklopedichen spravochnik (Sofia, 1999).

GJINI Frano (20 February 1886, Shkodër–11 March 1948, Shkoder), Albanian Catholic bishop. Gjini studied at St. Francis Xavier College and then in Rome, where he was ordained. After returning home, he worked as a parish priest in Laç, Vlorë, and Durrës. In 1930 he was consecrated bishop. He worked as auxiliary bishop in Durrës and (from 1932) in Oroshi, where he also became the abbot of the Mirdytes. After the expulsion from Albania of the apostolic delegate, Archbishop Giovanni Nigris, in 1945, Gjini was the first Albanian in history to assume these duties. In 1946, after the death of Archbishop Gasper Thaçi, Gjini became head of the Catholic Church in Albania; the Church worked under enormous pressure from the Communist authorities, which demanded the Church’s breach with Rome and its assistance in the construction of the totalitarian system. These demands were accompanied by threats that Gjini would meet the fate of Catholic priests who had been shot earlier. Gjini rejected the demands to break with Rome but offered assistance in the reconstruction of Albania. In an open letter to Enver Hoxha he stated that it was necessary to meet not only the material, but also the spiritual needs of the nation. As a result Gjini was arrested for “anti-Communist propaganda.” His imprisonment was also connected with repressions following an anti-Communist Mirdyte rebellion in Postrriba (9 September 1946). Gjini was accused of collaboration with the Vatican and the British mission and with taking part in the preparation of the rebellion. Weapons allegedly found in a church in Oroshi served as proof. Gjini was tortured in prison and tried in a show trial. He was sentenced to death and shot along with eighteen other priests and lay Catholics. According to the official report, his last words were, “Long live Christ the King, the Catholic religion, and all the Catholics in the world! Long live the Pope! Though my blood and flesh will stay here, my heart is with the Pope. Long live Albania!” His burial place has not been found. (TC)

Sources: Tadeusz Czekalski, Zarys dziejów chrześcijaństwa albańskiego w latach 1912–1993 (Kraków, 1996); Martirizimi i kishës katolike shqiptare (1944–1990) (Shkodër, 1993); Pjeter Pepa, Dosja e diktaturës (Tirana, 1995); Ndoc Dom Nogaj, Kisha Katolike Shqiptare 1944 nëntor 1990: Humbje dhe fitore (Shkodër, 1999); Robert Royal, Catholic Martyrs of the Twentieth Century (New York, 2000).

GLĄBIŃSKI Stanisław (25 February 1862, Skole–1943, Moscow), Polish economist and politician. Upon graduating from high school in Sambor, Głabiński enrolled in the Law School at the University of Lemberg (Lwów, Lviv) in 1880. He received his Ph.D. there in 1887 and a post-doctoral degree in 1888, becoming assistant professor in 1892 and full professor in 1895. For many years he served as dean of the Law School and, between 1908 and 1909, as rector of the University of Lwów. In 1902 he started his political career by winning a seat in the Council of State in Vienna. In 1904 he was also elected to the Galician Home Parliament. He served on both bodies until 1918. He was involved with the nationalist camp and in 1905 co-founded the Democratic National Party. Following the elections of 1907, as the leader of the strongest party in the Polish Club, Głabiński became its deputy chairman and then chairman, serving until 1911. From January to June 1911, he was minister of railroads. He attempted to carry out the decentralization and commercialization of the railroads, as well as to Polonize the Galician administration. During World War I, until 1917 he advocated loyalty toward Austria. In 1918 he came out for the independence of Poland, attacking the pro-Austrian orientation of the conservatives in the Council of State. From 23 October to 4 November 1918, he was foreign minister in the Regency Council government of Józef Świeżyński. Later, as an extraordinary government commissioner, he organized the Polish Liquidation Commission in Kraków and the Ruling Commission in Lwów. In January 1919 he was dispatched to Romania to secure permission to concentrate Polish military units in Constantinople, Odessa, and Bessarabia and to transfer them through Romanian territory to Poland.

From 1919 to 1928, Głabiński was an MP for the Popular National Union (Zjednoczenie Ludowo-Narodowe [ZLN]). He chaired the ZLN Supreme Council, and after the resignation of Roman Dmowski from this post, he became chairman of the ZLN parliamentary club. On 1 July 1920, he joined the Council for the Defense of the State. In 1923 he participated in negotiations with the Polish Peasant Party–Piast (PSL–Piast), which resulted in the so-called Lanckorona Pact, creating a coalition government of the Christian Union of National Unity and the PSL–Piast. On 28 May 1923 Głabiński became deputy prime minister and minister for religious confessions and public enlightenment. On 14 November 1923 he resigned and returned to chair the ZLN parliamentary club. From 1928 to 1935 he was senator and chair of the national-democratic club in the Senate. As a representative of the old, moderate, so-called professorial wing of the party, he lost influence in the 1930s. In September 1939 he was arrested by the Soviet NKVD and kidnapped to Moscow, where he died in jail. Głabiński’s main scholarly focus was macroeconomics. He co-authored (with Ludwik Finkel) Historia i statystyka monarchii austro-węgierskiej (History and statistics of the Austro-Hungarian monarchy; 1897) and authored Wykład ekonomii społecznej (A lecture on social economy; 1912); Nauka skarbowości (A study of the treasury; 1925); Ustrój skarbowy Rzeczypospolitej Polskiej (The treasury system of the Polish Republic; 1926); Ekonomika narodowa (The national economy, 2 vols.; 1927–28); Polskie prawo skarbowe (The Polish treasury law; 1928); and Historia ekonomiki (History of economy, 2 vols.; 1939). He also penned Wspomnienia polityczne (Historical memoirs; 1939). (PU)

Sources: PSB, vol. 8; Kto był kim w Drugiej Rzeczypospolitej (Warsaw, 1994); Encyklopedia Historii Drugiej Rzeczypospolitej (Warsaw, 1999); Roman Wapiński, Narodowa Demokracja 1893–1939 (Wrocław, 1980); Adam Próchnik, Pierwsze piętnastolecie Polski niepodległej (Warsaw, 1983); Władysław Pobóg-Malinowski, Najnowsza historia polityczna Polski, vol. 2 (London, 1983).

GLEMP Józef (18 December 1929, Inowrocław), cardinal, Primate of Poland. In 1950–56 Glemp studied at the Higher Theological Seminary in Gniezno and Poznań, and in 1956 he was ordained. From 1956 to 1957 he worked as a notary in the metropolitan curia in Gniezno; from 1957 to 1964 he was vicar in various parishes; and in 1958–64 he studied at the Pontifical University at the Lateran. From 1964 to 1967 he was secretary at the Higher Theological Seminary in Gniezno; from 1965 to 1967, notary in the metropolitan tribunal in Gniezno; and from 1970 to 1978, consultant of the Gniezno tribunal. From 1967 he worked at the Secretariat of the Primate of Poland in Warsaw and was personal secretary to Primate Stefan Wyszyński. From 1976 he was canon of the primate's chapter in Gniezno. On 4 March 1979 he was appointed bishop of Warmia and made his ingress in Frombork Cathedral on 6 May 1979. Later he presided over the Iustitia et Pax commission of the Polish Episcopate and was a member of its commission for ministry among workers.

After the death of Cardinal Wyszyński, on 7 July 1981 Glemp was appointed the archbishop metropolitan of Gniezno and Warsaw. He made his ingress in Gniezno on 13 September and in Warsaw on 24 September 1981. On 2 February 1983 he was appointed cardinal. In the fall of 1981 he tried to mediate between the Polish Communist authorities and Solidarity, meeting with General Wojciech Jaruzelski and Lech Wałęsa on 4 November, but it was in vain. He established the Primate's Social Council, which was inaugurated on 12 December. After the introduction of martial law, on 13 December 1981 Glemp appealed for peace and calm, at the same time undertaking efforts to release those interned and to moderate living conditions in internment camps and prisons. On 17 December he established the Primate's Committee of Relief for the Detained and Their Families. He followed a policy of cautious support for Solidarity but distanced himself from the ongoing political struggle and from underground Solidarity activities. He initiated the pilgrimages of Pope John Paul II to Poland in 1983 and 1987, which were aimed at keeping up spirits and integrating the society along the lines of religious and national values. In his contacts with the authorities Glemp appealed for an easing of the martial law regime. In 1984 he supported the official pressure aiming at the forced emigration of imprisoned Solidarity leaders; the effort failed because the leaders refused to leave. Glemp attempted to register the Church Agricultural Endowment. This initiative was blocked by the Communists, but it brought some foreign aid for individual farmers. In 1986 he encouraged lay Catholic activists to join the Consultative Council of the Chairman of the Council of State, hoping against all odds to establish a dialogue between the authorities and the moderate opposition.

In 1989 Glemp delegated representatives of the Episcopate as observers to the Round Table Talks. He succeeded in making the Communist authorities pass legislation concerning the legal status of the Roman Catholic Church, the freedom of conscience and religion (17 May 1989), and the resumption of diplomatic relations between Poland and the Holy See (17 July 1989). During the systemic transformations after 1989 Glemp strove to strengthen the Church's position in public life. He supported endeavors to regain Church property confiscated under communism, he managed to restore religious instruction in the schools (1990), and he strongly supported the ban on abortion and the anti-abortion campaign. Many times he criticized the liberal circles of Solidarity. After the dissolution of the union of the Gniezno and Warsaw archdiocese, on 25 March 1992 Glemp was released from his duties as archbishop of Gniezno, but he retained the title of Primate of Poland. He succeeded in bringing about a concordat with the Holy See (28 July 1993). In 1997 he criticized the version of the constitution that was finally passed by the parliament. Under his leadership the Episcopate supported Polish accession to the European Union. During the celebration of the Jubilee Year in May 2000, Glemp publicly confessed to the neglect and sins of the Church in Poland. He was a member of the Congregation of Eastern Churches, the Papal Council of Culture, and the Council of the Conference of European Bishops. In March 2004 his last term as chairman of the Conference of the Polish Episcopate ended. Glemp authored several collections of homilies: Kościół na drogach ojczyzny (The Church on the roads of the homeland; 1985); Służyć Ewangelii słowem (To serve the Gospel with the word; 1991); Gniezno—ciągła odnowa (Gniezno—constant renewal; 1992); and Od Kalwarii na drogi Europy (From Calvary onto European ways; 1997). (AF)

Sources: Grzegorz Polak, Kto jest kim w Kościele? (Warsaw, 1999); Kto jest kim w Polsce (Warsaw, 2001); Andrzej Micewski, Kościół wobec "Solidarności" i stanu wojennego (Paris, 1987); Jarosław Gowin, Kościół w czasach wolności 1989–1999 (Kraków, 1999); Antoni Dudek, Pierwsze lata III Rzeczypospolitej: 1989–2001 (Kraków, 2002); Caritati in iustitia: Dwadzieścia lat posługi prymasowskiej kardynała Józefa Glempa (Warsaw, 2001).

GLIGOROV Kiro (3 May 1917, Shtip), Macedonian politician. Born into a middle-class family, Gligorov graduated from high school in Skopje and in law from the University of Belgrade (1938). After his return to Skopje, he worked as a lawyer in a private bank. In 1941 he joined the Communist Party and the guerrilla movement of Josip Broz Tito. He was a member of the Anti-Fascist Council of the National Liberation of Macedonia and the Anti-Fascist Council of the National Liberation of Yugoslavia. After World War II he was secretary of the constitutional commission of the Macedonian republic. Delegated to Belgrade, from 1945 he worked in federal government institutions. In 1953–55 he was deputy director of the Federal Institute of Economic Planning and then secretary (minister) in the Federal Executive Economic Council. From 1962 to 1967 he was federal secretary (minister) of finance, and in 1967–69, deputy chairman of the Federal Executive Council. At this time he was a supporter of the centralization of power in Yugoslavia.

In the 1960s Gligorov co-authored the Yugoslav economic reform. In the spring of 1969 he resigned from the government, and in 1971–78 he was a member of the Presidium of the Socialist Federative Republic of Yugoslavia (SFRY). From 1974 to 1978 he was speaker of its parliament. As a result of his conflict with Tito over economic policy, in 1978 he was dismissed from all state positions. After the death of Tito, Gligorov was eliminated from the Central Committee of the League of Communists of Yugoslavia as he advocated full respect for market mechanisms. At the end of the 1980s he cooperated with Prime Minister Ante Marković, introducing market reforms. During the breakup of Yugoslavia, on 27 January 1991 the republican parliament elected Gligorov president of the Socialist Republic of Macedonia (as of November 1991, the Republic of Macedonia). In the spring of 1991 Gligorov, along with Alija Izetbegović, presented a plan to transform the SFRY into a loose federation; the plan was rejected by the Serbs.

On 8 September 1991, as a result of a referendum, Macedonia proclaimed independence, and Gligorov continued as its president. In October 1994 he won the presidential elections and remained the head of the new state, trying to overcome the country's international isolation. On 12 September 1995 he concluded an agreement with Greece, which for historical and national reasons initially did not accept "Macedonia" as the name of the country. The name that was settled on was the Former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia. Gligorov also established a formal relationship with Bulgaria, and despite economic problems, he kept his multi-ethnic country in equilibrium. On 3 October 1995 he was wounded in a bomb attack in Skopje, the perpetrators of which were never found. Owing to ailing health, Gligorov did not run in the presidential elections of November 1999. (AO)

Sources: Valentina Georgieva and Sasha Konechni, Historical Dictionary of Macedonia (Lanham, Md., 1998); Biographical Notes, Polish Press Agency PAP; Laura Silber and Allan Little, The Death of Yugoslavia (London, 1995); Warren Zimmermann, Origins of a Catastrophe (New York and Toronto, 1996); Irena Stawowy-Kawka, Historia Macedonii (Wrocław, 2001); Bugajski.

GLIWIC Hipolit (24 March 1878, Warsaw–9 April 1943, Warsaw), Polish economist and businessman of Jewish origin. Gliwicz graduated from the University of Odessa in 1901 and in 1906 from the Mining Institute in St. Petersburg, where he became an assistant professor in 1909. Between 1903 and 1907, he was active in the Polish Socialist Party. In 1911 he became the manager of the Warsaw branch of the Prodamet Company and joined the White Eagle Masonic lodge, which was a subsidiary of the Grand Orient lodge.

From 1914 to 1918 in St. Petersburg, Gliwicz was active in Polish independence organizations, and in 1918 he became the trade adviser to the plenipotentiary office of the Regency Council in Russia. At the end of 1918 he returned to Warsaw, where he co-organized the Union of Polish Democracy and the grand national lodge Copernicus. Between 1919 and 1922 he was the trade adviser for the Ministry of the Treasury, and from 1922 through 1925, the adviser and chargé d'affaires of Poland in the United States. Upon his return home, he became director of the Department of Trade at the Ministry of Industry and Trade. Following the coup d'état of May 1926, he served briefly as the minister of industry and trade in the government of Kazimierz Bartel. From 1927 to 1930, Gliwicz represented Poland at the League of Nations, including its Economic Advisory Committee. Closely tied to the industrial circles, he sat on many boards of banks and industrial enterprises. Among others, he co-organized the Unity of Mining and Steel Mill Interests in 1927 and 1928. From 1926 to 1934 he was on the board of overseers of the Trade Bank in Warsaw, chairing it from 1928 through 1932. Between 1928 and 1939, he was a professor at the Free Polish University (Wolna Wszechnica Polska) and a lecturer at the University of Lwów (1931–39) and the Jagiellonian University in Kraków (1934–39). From 1926 to 1928, he was active in the Labor Party and later in the Nonparty Bloc of Cooperation with the Government (BBWR). From 1928 through 1930 he served in the Senate and was its deputy speaker. He authored many books and articles on economic matters, including Ewolucja syndykatów (The evolution of syndicates, 2 vols.; 1916) and Podstawy ekonomiki światowej (Foundations of the world economy, 3 vols.; 1926–38). During the Nazi occupation Gliwicz was active in the underground. From 1942 to 1943 under the code name "Tomasz," he supervised the Economic Council with the Second Department (Intelligence) of the Supreme Command of the Home Army. Gliwicz was arrested by the Gestapo on 8 April 1943 and committed suicide in jail. (WR)

Sources: PSB, vol. 8; Encyklopedia historii gospodarczej Polski do 1945 roku, vol. 1 (Warsaw, 1981); Ludwik Hass, Masoneria polska XX wieku (Warsaw, 1996).

GOCŁOWSKI Tadeusz (16 September 1931, Piski, near Ostrołęka), archbishop metropolitan of Gdańsk. Gocłowski studied philosophy and theology in the Theological Institute of the Priests of the Mission in Kraków (1951–56). In June 1956 he was ordained in Kraków. Later he studied canon law at the Catholic University of Lublin (1956–59) and in 1969–70 at the Canon Law Department of the Angelicum Pontifical University in Rome, where he received a Ph.D. in 1970. He then lectured at the Theological Institute of the Priests of the Mission in Kraków and at the Episcopal Theological Seminary in Gdańsk, whose rector he was in 1970–73 and 1982–83. From 1973 to 1982 he was provincial of the Polish province of the Congregation of Priests of the Mission in Kraków. On 17 April 1983 he was consecrated bishop and appointed auxiliary bishop of Gdańsk. From 31 December 1984 he was ordinary bishop of Gdańsk. One of the chaplains of Solidarity, during martial law Gocłowski protected the underground activists of the union. In 1988–89, he represented the Episcopate in talks between the Communist authorities and the opposition in Magdalenka, near Warsaw, where the Round Table Talks were prepared. Gocłowski proved to be a sophisticated negotiator. He was also engaged in secret mediations in the political conflicts of the early 1990s. As the crisis in the Civic Committee of the Chairman of Solidarity grew, on 7 and 8 April 1990 Gocłowski organized a meeting in Gdańsk between Lech Wałęsa and Prime Minister Tadeusz Mazowiecki; Adam Michnik, Jacek Kuroń, and Bronisław Geremek also took part, along with a few other opposition leaders. The meeting failed to resolve the growing personal strife between Wałęsa and Mazowiecki. Trying to unite the dispersed anti-Communist groups before the parliamentary elections, in July 1993 Gocłowski helped establish the Homeland (Ojczyzna) Election Committee, headed by Wiesław Chrzanowski. In connection with changes in the Catholic Church organization in Poland, on 25 March 1992 Gocłowski became archbishop metropolitan of Gdańsk. One of the leading Polish Roman Catholic hierarchs, co-chairman of the Joint Commission of the State and Episcopate, and a member of the Permanent Council of the Polish Episcopate, he was responsible for the pilgrimage to Poland of Pope John Paul II in 1999. (PK)

Sources: Grzegorz Polak, Kto jest kim w Kościele? (Warsaw, 1999); Peter Raina, Droga do "Okrągłego Stołu": Zakulisowe rozmowy przygotowawcze (Warsaw, 1999); Antoni Dudek, Pierwsze lata III Rzeczypospolitej: 1989–2001 (Kraków, 2002).

GODMANIS Ivars (27 November 1951, Riga), Latvian politician. Godmanis graduated from the Department of Physics and Mathematics of the Latvian State University in 1974. Later he worked there as a lecturer, and in 1984–88 he was assistant professor at the Institute of Solid Body Physics. From 1986 to 1989 he lectured in informatics and received a Ph.D. in mathematics and physics. From the foundation of the Latvian Popular Front (LPF) he was an active member, working in its political committee. At the Second Congress of the LPF in May 1989 Godmanis was elected deputy chairman of its council. On 4 May 1990 the Supreme Council of the Latvian SSR proclaimed de jure sovereignty of the republic, removing the terms “Socialist” and “Soviet” from the country’s official name and electing Godmanis as prime minister of a new government. When Soviet special forces attacked the Ministry of Interior in Riga in January 1991, Godmanis continued efforts to secure the country’s freedom; during a referendum concerning the future shape of the Soviet Union in March 1991 he supported independence, so the referendum was not held in Latvia. During the Moscow putsch, on 19 August 1991, Godmanis, along with the chairman of the Latvian Supreme Council, Anatolijs Gorbunovs, signed an announcement refusing to recognize the new power in Moscow.

On the second day of the Moscow coup, on 20 August 1991 the Supreme Council of Latvia announced the country’s full independence. Godmanis remained prime minister and was the most popular Latvian politician at the time. The new state faced enormous problems, connected with having been the most highly Russified among the Baltic republics, the necessity to create an army and police force from scratch, and economic collapse and hyperinflation. One of the most difficult tasks was the introduction of a national currency. In July 1992 the Latvian ruble was initiated, and in March 1993 the Latvian lat was introduced. Privatization of the economy started. In foreign policy the Godmanis government established a special relationship with Sweden. Economic cooperation with Estonia and Lithuania was initially very weak owing to the substitutive nature of their economies. Struggling with these problems, Godmanis frequently reconstructed his cabinet, sacrificing ministers for the sake of the government. Despite Godmanis’s many successes in the systemic transformation of a Soviet republic into an independent state, the breakup of the LPF into various parties and a decline in the standard of living quickly eroded his popularity. In the spring and summer of 1992 nationalist radicals and post-Communists attempted to overthrow his government, but Godmanis managed to stay in power. In the elections of June 1993 his party won only 4 percent of the vote, and Godmanis lost his parliamentary seat. On 22 July 1993 he resigned as prime minister. In 1994–95 he was deputy chairman of a private company in Riga, and in 1995–97 he was chairman of the state bank, Latvijas Krājbanka. In 1998 he was elected to the parliament (Saeima) on behalf of the liberal Latvia’s Way (Latvijas Ceļš) party. As minister of finance in the government of Vilis Kristopans from November 1998 to July 1999, Godmanis counteracted the influence of the Russian financial crisis on the Latvian economy. (EJ-WR)

Sources: Who Is Who in Latvia 1996: Biographical Dictionary (Riga, 1996); Kas ir kas Latvijā (Riga, 1999); Romuald J. Misiunas and Rein Taagepera, The Baltic States: Years of Dependence 1940–1990 (Berkeley, 1993); Anatol Lieven, The Baltic Revolution (New Haven, 1993); Europa Środkowo-Wschodnia 1993 (Warsaw, 1995); Juris Dreifelds, Latvia in Transition (Cambridge, 1996); Policy of the Occupation Powers in Latvia, 1939–1991 (Riga, 1999); Andrejs Plakans, Historical Dictionary of Latvia (Lanham, Md., 1997).

GOGA Octavian (1 April 1881, Răsiniani–7 May 1938, Ciucea), Romanian poet, publicist, and politician. From 1900 to 1904 Goga studied philology and philosophy at Budapest University. He was one of the greatest Romanian poets of the twentieth century and also one of the leaders of the Romanian movement in Transylvania before 1918. The creator of “Romanism” and an ardent supporter of Greater Romania, he made his literary debut with a collection of patriotic poems, Luceafărul (Morning star), in 1904. The next year he published Poezii (Poems), which was a Bible of sorts for Romanian nationalists before 1918. Goga spent 1912–13 in a Hungarian prison in Szeged, where he was put for his anti-Hungarian activities. After his release he was engaged in intensive propaganda for the unification of Romania, which was also conducted outside the country—in France, Italy, and Russia. During World War I Goga represented a pro-Entente orientation.

In 1919 Goga joined the People’s Party of General Alexandru Averescu. In 1921 he became a member of the Romanian Academy. From 5 to 16 December 1919 he served as minister of education, and then he held this post on an interim basis until 18 March 1920, when he was appointed minister of education and religious affairs. Between 30 March 1926 and 14 July 1926 he was minister of interior. In 1932, having left the People’s Party, he formed the National Agrarian Party. In July 1935 his party merged with the League of National Christian Defense, the extremely rightist and anti-Semitic party of Alexandru C. Cuza. As a result, the National Christian Party was created, led by Goga and Cuza. This party had a strong Fascist tinge in the spirit of Italian corporativism, but it remained marginal on the Romanian political scene. At the same time Goga supported King Charles II in his political struggle against the National Peasant Party and the Iron Guard. After the elections of December 1937 Goga was appointed prime minister by the king, a move that was supposed to facilitate the assumption of full power by Charles II. Goga served as prime minister between 28 December 1937 and 10 February 1938, introducing anti-Semitic laws and shifting Romanian foreign policy toward Germany and Italy. After the royal coup d’état of 10 February 1938 he withdrew from political life. He died a few months later in unexplained circumstances.

His wife, Veturia Goga, was an adviser to Marshal Ion Antonescu in the field of social policy.

Goga authored a number of collections of poems and prose and political commentaries, including the following: O seamă de cuvinte (A handful of words; 1908); Inseminările unui trecător: Crâmpoie din zbuciumările de la noi (Notes of a passerby: Our disturbances and tensions; 1911); Strigăte în pustiu: Cuvinte din Ardeal într—o țară neutră (Scream in the dessert: Words on Transylvania and the neutral country; 1915); Mustul cara fierbe (Boiling juice; 1927); Precursori (Precursors; 1930); and . . . Aceiași luptă (. . .The same struggle; 1930). (FA/TD)

Sources: Biographisches Lexikon, vol. 2; Stephen Fischer-Galati, Twentieth Century Rumania (New York, 1991); M. Musat and I. Ardeleanu, România după Marea Unire, vol. 2 (Bucharest, 1986); I. D. Bălan, Octavian Goga (Bucharest, 1966); Al. Gh. Savu, Dic-tatura regală 1938–1940 (Bucharest, 1970).

GOJDIČ Pavel (17 July 1888, Ruski Peclani, near Prešov–17 July 1960, Leopoldovo), Greek Catholic bishop of Prešov. Gojdič was the son of a Greek Catholic priest. After completing a gymnasium in Prešov in 1907, between 1909 and 1911 he studied theology in Budapest. In July 1922 he joined the Order of St. Basil the Great in Mukačevo, and on 25 March 1927 in Rome he was ordained bishop of the Prešov diocese. In the fall of 1938 he supported the autonomy movement of the Transcarpathian Ukraine, and in October 1938 he mediated on the issue of changing the borders of Slovakia in favor of Hungary. After the liquidation of the Greek Catholic Church by the Communists in 1946, Gojdič continued his pastoral activities until his arrest on 28 April 1950. In January 1951 in Bratislava he was sentenced to life imprisonment. He served the sentence in Leopoldovo, where he died. In 1968 his body was buried in the Cathedral of St. John the Baptist in Prešov. On 5 November 2001 he was beatified by Pope John Paul II. (WR)

Sources: Martirologia ukrain’skikh tserkov u chetyriokh tomakh, vol. 2; SBS, vol. 2; J. E. Pavel Gojdič-jepiskop prjaševskij (Prešov, 1947); Proces proti vlastizradným biskupom Jánovi Vojtašš akovi, Michalovi Buzalkovi, Pavlovi Gojdičovi (Bratislava, 1961).

GOLDELMAN Solomon (5 December 1885, Soroka, Bessarabia–3 January 1974, Jerusalem), Jewish scholar and cultural activist in the Ukraine. From his youth Goldelman was connected with the Zionist left. In 1913 he graduated in economics from the Trade Institute in Kiev and worked there until 1915, when he started working in the Association of Landed Administrations (zemstvos). From July 1917 he represented the Zionist Socialist party Poale Zion in the Central Ukrainian Council (Rada). During the rule of Hetman Pavlo Skoropadskyi, Goldelman edited the Poale Zion daily Unser Leben in Odessa. In December 1918 he was appointed minister of labor and secretary for national minorities in the government of the Directorate of the Ukrainian National Republic in Kiev. Later he was deputy minister of trade and industry, and from August 1919 to April 1920, deputy minister of labor in the government of Izaak Mazepa. In mid-1920 Goldelman left for Vienna, and in 1922 he co-organized the Ukrainian Agricultural Academy in Poděbrady in Bohemia. He lectured there until 1939, when he emigrated to Palestine. Until his death Goldelman maintained contacts with Ukrainian political exiles and promoted Ukrainian-Jewish cooperation. He authored numerous works, including a textbook on economics and industrial policy (1923), a work on international economic policy (1924), and a study on the theory of joint stock companies (1925). In 1921 he published Lysty zhydivskoho sotsialdemokrata pro Ukraïnu (Letters of a Jewish Social Democrat on the Ukrainian question), in 1937 Löst der Kommunismus die Judenfrage? (Does communism solve the Jewish question?), and in 1973 Juden-Bauern in der Ukraine (Jewish peasants in the Ukraine). (WR) Sources: Encyclopedia of Ukraine, vol. 2 (Toronto, 1988); L. Bykovsky, Solomon I. Goldman: A Portrait of a Politician and Educator (1885–1974) (New York and Toronto, 1980).

GOLIAN Ján (26 January 1906, Dombóvár, Hungary–April 1945, Flossenbürg, Germany), Slovak general, leader of the Slovak National Uprising. Golian graduated from the Higher Military School in Prague. In 1938 he was attached to the Tenth Division in Banská Bystrica, and after the dismemberment of Czechoslovakia he was appointed a major and officer of the Slovak general staff. Despite his service in the Slovak army, he could not reconcile himself to the fall of the Czechoslovak Republic and did not identify himself with the new Slovak state. In 1942 and 1943 he fought on the eastern front, where he entered into contact with Soviet guerrillas. On his return to Slovakia he was relocated to Banská Bystrica, where he started an underground military organization. From the beginning of 1944 he held talks with the illegal Slovak National Council (SNC), and after a secret meeting in Bratislava, on 27 April 1944 he assumed military command of a planned armed uprising. The SNC entrusted him with the task of preparing the strategy and contacting guerrilla units acting in Slovakia. The uprising was to be coordinated with Red Army operations.

On 29 August 1944 Golian ordered insurgent troops to attack the German military units entering Slovakia. Thanks to this decision, after the war Slovakia was not marked as Hitler's ally. On 1 September 1944 President Edvard Beneš appointed Golian commander of the First Czechoslovak Army in Slovakia, and four days later he was appointed brigadier general by the London government in exile. For over a month he served as commander-in-chief of the Czechoslovak armed forces in Slovakia. After the assumption of this post by General Rudolf Viest, who was sent from London, Golian became Viest's deputy. The Soviet command, considering the Slovak resistance movement "politically suspicious," did not inform the Slovaks about its change of strategy in the fight against the Germans. As a result, the insurrection collapsed in October 1944 and the partisans went into hiding in the mountains, where they continued the struggle. On 3 November 1944 the Germans captured both leaders in Pohronský Bukovec. Golian perished in unknown circumstances in Flossenbürg. (PU)

Sources: ČBS; Kdo byl kdo v našich dějinách ve 20. století, vol. 1 (Prague, 1998); Joseph A. Mikus, Slovakia: A Political History 1918–1950 (Milwaukee, 1963); Reprezentatívny biografický lexikón Slovenska (Martin, 1999); Dušan Kováč, Dejiny Slovenska (Prague, 2000); http://www.muzeumsnp.sk/golian_s.htm.

GOMA Paul (2 October 1935, Măna, Bessarabia), Romanian writer and dissident. After Bessarabia and Northern Bukovina were annexed by the USSR in June 1940, Goma's family escaped to Romania. At the age of seventeen he was temporarily arrested by the political police, the Securitate, for "anti-state" views recorded in his personal diary. In 1956 he was expelled as a student of Bucharest University for stating that Romania was under Soviet occupation. He was sentenced to two and a half years in prison and five years of house arrest. After his release, he worked as a blue-collar laborer, a photographer, and a trumpet player. When Nicolae Ceaușescu refused to send Romanian troops into Czechoslovakia in August 1968, Goma was carried away with enthusiasm and joined the (Communist) Romanian Workers' Party, becoming a loyal follower of the regime. In early 1977 he failed to organize a Romanian equivalent of the Czechoslovak Charter 77. He sent out letters of support for Charter 77, including a letter encouraging Ceaușescu to endorse it, but his movement failed to gain wide support. He managed to collect two hundred signatures for a letter demanding a liberalization of the Romanian regime, but to no major avail.

On 1 April 1977 Goma was arrested, and in the fall of 1977 he was forced to leave Romania. He settled in Paris. He wrote most of his books while in France. The most important of them include the following: Ostinato (1971); Ura noastră cea de toate zilele (Our daily bread; 1972); Gherla (1976); În cerc (In a circle; 1977); Garda inversă (Opposite guard; 1979); Culoarea curcubeului (The color of the rainbow; 1979); Patimile după Pitești (Redemption after Pitești; 1981); Bonifacia (1986); Sabina (1991); Astra (1992); and an autobiographical novel, Altina—gradina scufandata (Altina—submerged garden; 1998). In 1988 a Securitate agent was assigned to kill him, but the agent himself revealed this plan. Called the “Romanian Solzhenitsyn,” Goma criticized Romanian writers for their submission to the Ceaușescu regime. He continued this criticism after 1989, contesting the post–Ceaușescu reality. He thinks of himself as an author not understood by contemporary Romanians. He created the so-called public novel, a sort of personal diary. Analyzing the human condition, Goma identified the most important issues of the twentieth century. Frequently his abstract meditations and reflections turned into polemics with specific Romanian authors. In 1991 he received an award from the Association of Romanian Writers for Ostinato. (LW)

Sources: Gheorge Glodeanu, Incursiuni in literatura diasporei și a disidenți (Bucharest, 1999); Costin Scorpan, Istoria României: Enciclopedie (Bucharest, 1997); Virgil Ierunca, Subiect și predicat (Bucharest, 1993).

GÖMBÖS Gyula (26 December 1886, Murga–6 October 1936, Munich), Hungarian right-wing politician. In 1905 Gömbös graduated from a cadet school in Pécs, in 1912 he took a course for senior officers in Budapest, and in 1914 he graduated from the Military Academy in Vienna. In May 1915 he was appointed captain of the General Staff. After the outbreak of World War I, he was sent to the Serbian front. From 1915 he fought against the Russians in the Carpathian Mountains. In June 1916 he was wounded; after his recovery, he was transferred to the National Defense Ministry (NDM). In 1917–18 he served in the army’s logistical department in Vienna. After the fall of the Austro-Hungarian monarchy in October 1918, Gömbös was recalled to Budapest. From December 1918 he was in charge of the Balkan office in the NMD Operations Department. He acted in right-wing officer organizations aimed at overthrowing the republican rule of Count Mihály Károlyi. In January 1919 he co-founded and soon afterwards assumed the leadership of the Hungarian Defense Association (Magyar Országos Véderő Egyesülete [HDA]). Dismissed from the ministry and threatened with detention after the Hungarian Soviet Republic (HSR) had been proclaimed in March 1919, he escaped to Vienna, where he joined the anti-Bolshevik committee of Count István Bethlen. As a committee representative, he went to Belgrade, where he held talks with French commanders about joint operations against the HSR. He made contact with the government-in-exile in Szeged, and he was appointed secretary of state in charge of national defense. He took an active part in organizing the National Army, whose commander was Admiral Miklós Horthy, and in creating the latter’s legend.

After the counterrevolutionary forces had entered Budapest, Gömbös moved to the reserves at the end of 1919. In January 1920 he was elected MP, and he soon became a leader of the extreme nationalist right wing and an advocate of the so-called free elections of the king. He demanded the introduction of a dictatorship, anti-Jewish laws, and a crackdown on HSR adherents and the “destructive” press. Mobilizing the HDA, in October 1921 he helped avert a second attempt by Charles IV Habsburg to return to the Hungarian throne. Owing to his anti-revolutionary attitude and considerable popular support, Gömbös became a politician with a future in the eyes of Regent Horthy. In February 1922, Gömbös became deputy chairman of the ruling Unity Party (Egységes Párt), newly established by Prime Minister Bethlen, but the conservative-liberal party majority, disapproving of Gömbös’ radicalism, pushed him into the background. Because of an ever-growing conflict with Bethlen, in August 1923 Gömbös left the party and founded the racist Hungarian National Independence Party. The success of Bethlen’s consolidation policy weakened Gömbös’ influence. Therefore, he dissolved his party in September 1928 and returned with the majority of its members to the government party.

From September 1928 to October 1929, Gömbös was secretary of state in the NDM. In 1929 Horthy awarded him the title of “hero” (vitéz) and promoted him to the rank of retired general. From October 1929 he was national defense minister, gaining considerable success in modernizing the army. On 1 October 1932, when the Great Depression was at its worst, Gömbös became prime minister, at the same time remaining minister of national defense. His so-called National Labor Plan, consisting of ninety-five points, was the first government program in Hungary. The plan included agrarian and fiscal reforms, debt conversion, support for exporters, and enhanced social benefits. However, its implementation encountered difficulties. Giving up some of his radical ideas, Gömbös had to search for compromise with more moderate political and economic groups. Initially, he was distinctly successful in matters to do with the economy and foreign policy. His government helped the country recover from the Great Depression. German-Hungarian trade agreements of 1933 and 1934 and the development of Hungarian-Italian-Austrian economic and political cooperation as of 1934 made it possible for Hungary to export large quantities of agrarian products at figures above world prices. As a result, the situation in the country improved. The economy also got a boost in 1932, when the Entente states wrote off the remainder of war damages, and in 1933, when the League of Nations lowered the installments on loans that Hungary had incurred in the 1920s. In foreign policy, Gömbös took advantage of the temporary vacuum in Central Europe, declaring, with Italian and Austrian support, a peaceful revision of the Treaty of Trianon. He also hoped for German support and was the first foreign politician to pay Hitler a visit in June 1933.

In spring 1934 Gömbös announced an accelerated implementation of reforms. He intended to abolish public elections, commence a wide-scale program of peasant colonization, and introduce a corporatist system similar to the one in Italy. He also sought to turn the government National Unity Party (Nemzeti Egység Pártja [NUP]), reorganized in 1932, into a mass, Fascist-type organization. Both conservative-liberal politicians and the legal left-wing opposition attacked the plans vigorously. Trying to break the resistance, in March 1935 Gömbös persuaded Horthy to dissolve the parliament and call for a new election. Gömbös won the election, and the regent again entrusted him with creating a cabinet. When Bethlen left the government party in March 1935, Gömbös assumed its de facto leadership, but his attempts to turn the NUP into a mass totalitarian organization ended in failure. In addition to Horthy's growing distrust of Gömbös and the resistance from conservative circles and left-wing forces, a major factor that thwarted Gömbös's plans was kidney disease. Terminally ill, he was treated in a clinic in Munich, but the treatment was unsuccessful. (JT)

Sources: Biographisches Lexikon, vol. 1; Magyar Nagylexikon, vol. 8 (Budapest, 1999); Nagy Képes Milleniumi Arcképcsarnok (Budapest, 1999); Új Magyar Életrajzi Lexikon, vol. 2 (Budapest, 2001); C. A. Macartney, October Fifteenth: A History of Modern Hungary, vols. 1–2 (Edinburgh, 1957–61); The Confidential Papers of Admiral Horthy (Budapest, 1965); 1932–1935: Drei Jahre Regierung Gömbös (Budapest, 1935); Steven Bela Vardy, Historical Dictionary of Hungary (Lanham, Md., 1997); Jenő Gergely, Gömbös Gyula politikai pályakép (Budapest, 2001); József Vongó, Gömbös Gyula és a jobboldali radikalizmus: Tanulmányok (Pecs, 2001).

GOMBROWICZ Witold (4 August 1904, Małoszyce, near Opatów–25 July 1969, Vence, France), Polish writer. Gombrowicz graduated from St. Stanislas Kostka High School in Warsaw in 1922 and from the Law Department at the University of Warsaw in 1927. Then he moved to Paris, where he studied philosophy and economics. After his return home, he briefly practiced law in Warsaw but soon devoted himself exclusively to literature. From 1934 he worked with the daily press and literary magazines, concentrating on literary criticism in (among others) Kurier Poranny. In August 1939 he traveled to Argentina, where he spent World War II. He remained without a steady job for some time until he was employed by the Polish Bank in Buenos Aires (1947–53). Because of his mocking attitude toward patriotism, he was ignored by most of the émigré community. In 1963 he received a Ford Foundation fellowship to travel to West Berlin. Later, he moved to France. In 1967, he was awarded the International Literary Prize of Publishers (Prix Formentor).

Gombrowicz's literary debut was a collection of semi-fantastic stories published as Pamiętnik z okresu dojrzewania (A memoir from the period of becoming mature; 1933), later enlarged and put out as Bakakaj (1957). The novel that brought him international acclaim was Ferdurdurke (1937; Ferdurdurke, 1961), a jeering attack on traditional morality and culture. In his drama Iwona, księżniczka Burgunda (1938, staged in 1959; Iwona, Princess of Burgundy, 1970), he focused on ugliness that, once allowed in, wreaks havoc in the ducal court. In Argentina he penned the drama Ślub (1953; Marriage, 1970) and the novel Trans-Atlantyk (1953; Trans-Atlantyk, 1994). The former was a transcript from a dream that served simultaneously as a parody of a Shakespearian tragedy. The latter best reflects Gombrowicz's critical attitude toward his native cultural tradition. In his Pornografia (1960; Pornografia, 1967), which is set in Poland under Nazi occupation, the author focused on the vital strength of youth but also its capacity for crime. In Kosmos (1965; Cosmos, 1967) he delved into the psychology of the erotic. The last play he wrote was Operetka (Operetta), published in the third volume of his Dziennik (Diary; 1988). Written in the convention of a historiosophical grotesque, the play reviews the events of the twentieth century cast as a fashion show. From 1953, Gombrowicz kept a diary, which was published in Paris in three volumes (1957–66). He mixed in it personal, often banal, observations with polemics and philosophical considerations, thus constructing a peculiar portrait of himself. He was a subversive and often sacrilegious writer, annoying with his egotism, skepticism, and anarchy but at the same time dazzling and intellectually prolific. The generation that survived World War II had a negative attitude toward his move to Argentina, which was treated as an escape, and his open dissociation from the war. He was sharply criticized both in the émigré community and in Poland for undermining the sense of Polishness. However, he was also appreciated for his originality and the acuteness of his criticism of the Polish national psyche. Almost all of his works have been translated into over a dozen languages. His eleven-volume Dzieła zebrane (Collected works; 1969–77) were published in the West and his fifteen-volume Dzieła (Works; 1986–97) in Poland. (PU)

Sources: Literatura polska XX wieku. Przewodnik encyklopedyczny, vol. 1 (Warsaw, 2000); Tadeusz Kępiński, Witold Gombrowicz i świat jego młodości (Kraków, 1974); Tadeusz Kępiński, Witold Gombrowicz: Studium portretowe, vols. 1–2 (Kraków, 1988); Jean-Claude Dedieu, Witold Gombrowicz (Paris, 1993); Jan Błoński, Forma, śmiech i rzeczy ostateczne: Studia o Gombrowiczu (Kraków, 1994); Joanna Siedlecka, Jaśnie panicz (Warsaw, 1997); Janusz Margański, Gombrowicz—wieczny debiutant (Kraków, 2001); Jerzy Jarzębski, Podglądanie Gombrowicza (Kraków, 2001); Agnieszka Stawiarska, Gombrowicz w przedwojennej Polsce (Kraków, 2002).

GOMUŁKA Władysław, pseudonym “Wiesław” (6 February 1905, Białobrzegi Franciszkańskie, near Krosno—1 September 1982, Warsaw), Polish Communist leader. Gomułka came from a working-class family. At fourteen, he finished his education, completing seven grades of school. Then he worked as a locksmith in Krosno, Drohobycz, and Warsaw. He joined the Polish Socialist Party–Left, and from 1925 to 1926 he belonged to the National Peasant Party. In 1926 he joined the Communist Party of Poland (Komunistyczna Partia Polski [KPP]). He also was a full-time organizer of the Trade Union of Chemical Industry Workers, a member of the KPP Central Trade Department (1931–32), and an activist in the Cultural-Educational Association of Workers–Siła (Strength). In 1930 and 1931 he traveled to Moscow to attend congresses of the Trade Unions of the Red International. In 1932 he was arrested and imprisoned in Poland. In 1934, with the assistance of the KPP, he fled to the USSR. He traveled to the Crimea and then to Moscow, where he attended the Lenin School of the Communist International. He returned to Poland under an alias, but he was rearrested and jailed between 1936 and 1939.

During the September campaign of 1939, Gomułka was freed and took part in the defense of Warsaw. Between 1939 and 1942 he lived in Białystok and Lwów (Lviv), joining the Soviet party in 1941. In 1942 he returned to Krosno and became involved with the (Communist) Polish Workers’ Party (Polska Partia Robotnicza [PPR]). He also founded the People’s Guard in Subcarpathia and later left for Warsaw. Gomułka became the secretary of the PPR Warsaw Committee, a member of the PPR Provisional Central Committee, and the party’s propaganda chief. From 18 to 25 February 1943 he negotiated with Poland’s official underground Office of the Delegate of the Government in Exile for the Homeland and with clandestine Jewish organizations. However, the PPR demands were unacceptable to those seeking independence for Poland, and the negotiations were broken off. Meanwhile Gomułka co-founded the People’s Army and from November 1943 served as the secretary of the PPR Central Committee (CC). His rise in the party hierarchy was facilitated by the deaths of the former leaders, Marceli Nowotko and Bolesław Mołojec, as well as by the Gestapo’s arrest of Paweł Finder. The turnover at the top involved a temporary lack of radio contact with Moscow and mutual suspicions regarding the infiltration of the Communist movement by the Nazi police. That notwithstanding, in August 1944 Gomułka became one of the founding members of the newly established Politburo, and in December 1945 he was proclaimed general secretary of the PPR.

Gomułka was one of the main co-founders of the Home National Council (Krajowa Rada Narodowa [KRN]); the KRN usurped power in Poland to the detriment of the Polish government-in-exile, which it did not recognize. After the KRN assembled a provisional government, Gomułka became the first deputy prime minister. In June 1945 he participated in negotiations in Moscow to create the Provisional Government of National Unity. In July 1945 he was a member of the Polish delegation to the Big Three Conference in Potsdam. In November 1945 he was appointed minister for the Recovered Territories, which greatly enhanced his political standing. Although the Soviet intelligence and security services most influenced the power balance in Poland, Gomułka, as the head of the PPR, condoned their actions, accepting brutal repressions against the independence forces. He was involved in the struggle against the post–Home Army organizations and the Polish Peasant Party, fanatically believing in the righteousness of communism and proclaiming that “we shall never give up the power that we have once captured.” His ideas are reflected in his book W walce o demokrację ludową: Artykuły i przemówienia (In the struggle for a people’s democracy: Articles and speeches; 1947). From 1947, Gomułka served as a deputy in the Constitutional Parliament.

Between 22 and 27 September 1947 Gomułka represented the PPR at the conference of representatives of Communist and proletarian parties in Szklarska Poręba, when the Information Bureau (Cominform) was founded. He delivered two speeches there, even though his position in the power structure was already weakened. Despite embracing communism, he opposed copying certain Soviet models on the “Polish road to socialism,” including an acceleration in the collectivization of agriculture. During the PPR CC Plenum of 3 June 1948 Gomułka was accused of “right-nationalist deviation.” In September 1948 he was purged as the general secretary of the PPR. However, during the Unification Congress of the Polish Socialist Party and the PPR in December 1948, at Stalin’s suggestion, Gomułka was included in the CC of the newly formed Polish United Workers’ Party (Polska Zjednoczona Partia Robotnicza [PUWP]). Following the liquidation of the Ministry for the Recovered Territories in January 1949, Gomułka was stripped of his post as deputy prime minister and demoted to deputy chairman of the Supreme Chamber of Control and then to director of the Warsaw branch of the Enterprise for Social Insurance. He was attacked in the media and investigated by the secret police, purged from the PUWP CC (November 1949), arrested (August 1951), stripped of his parliamentary seat, and, finally, thrown out of the party (October 1951). A show trial for him was prepared that involved the arrest and torture of many of his followers.

Gomułka was freed in December 1954 in the wake of the “thaw” following Stalin’s death. During an inter-party struggle within the top leadership, he became a candidate for chief of the PUWP. Both the dogmatic Natolin group and the more liberal Puławska faction wooed him. In October 1956 he returned to power triumphantly. Despite the pressure from Soviet armed forces stationed in Poland and the initial objections of the Soviet delegation under Nikita Khrushchev, who suddenly visited Warsaw, ultimately the Kremlin accepted the decision of the Eighth Plenum of the PUWP CC of 19–21 October 1956, when Gomułka was coopted to the CC and elected to the Politburo and to the post of PUWP CC first secretary. On 24 October 1956, Gomułka criticized Stalinism, speaking to several hundred thousand Warsaw citizens gathered at Parade Place. On 18 November 1956 he concluded an agreement in Moscow regulating bilateral relations, in particular the status of the Soviet Army in Poland. He accepted the decollectivization of agriculture and concluded a new agreement with the Catholic Church, permitting the release of Primate Cardinal Stefan Wyszyński from jail. From 1957 he served as a parliamentary deputy and a member of the Council of State.

Soon, however, Gomułka went back to his old ways. Widespread hopes engendered in the society by his return were quickly extinguished as he halted systemic and cadre changes, even restored some compromised party functionaries to their former positions, and turned to exercising power in an autocratic manner. The Gomułka team’s economic policies—renewed investments in heavy and industry and armaments at the expense of consumption, a halt in organizational changes, the promotion of a policy of autarky for Poland, and closing the nation off to modern technologies—brought about economic stagnation. In his intra-party policies, Gomułka struggled against so-called revisionism. The termination of the “liberal” party youth weekly Po prostu, the increase in censorship, and anti-revisionist undertakings caused the defection of many intellectuals from the party. Gomułka initiated the great move to build schools: “One thousand schools for the Millennium of Poland”; but during the Millennium of Poland’s Christianity (1966–1966), he stressed its secular character. His anti-clericalism ushered in a serious crisis in church-state relations during the celebration of the Baptism of Poland in 1966. He constantly invoked the danger from Germany. After the Polish Catholic episcopate published its famous letter to its German counterpart, vowing to “forgive and beg forgiveness,” Gomułka led a hostile propaganda campaign spreading hatred against the Church and Germany in 1965 and 1966.

Purges undertaken in Poland’s leadership following the Israeli victory over the Arab states in 1967 were of an openly anti-Semitic character. Following the banning of the play Dziady (Forefathers’ Eve) by Adam Mickiewicz, student demonstrations broke out in March 1968 calling for the freedom of speech. The demonstrations brought about an anti-Semitic and anti-intelligentsia propaganda campaign of the chauvinistic PUWP faction under Mieczysław Moczar. To defend his political standing, Gomułka temporarily supported the campaign. As a result, several thousand members of the intelligentsia of Jewish origin left Poland, damaging the nation’s reputation all over the world. The events of March 1968 weakened Gomułka. He strengthened his hand by unequivocally supporting the Soviet invasion of Czechoslovakia in August 1968. The March 1968 events negatively affected education and university life and further demoralized society.

In foreign policy, Gomułka believed that loyalty to the Kremlin would preempt any threat stemming from a possible accord between the USSR and West Germany. Along with other Warsaw Pact nations, on 7 December 1970 Poland concluded a pact with West Germany that normalized mutual relations. Since the pact confirmed Poland’s western borders, it is considered to be the most important achievement of Gomułka’s foreign policy. Increases in meat prices announced on 13 December 1970 triggered worker riots on the Baltic Sea Coast; the riots broke out the following day and were bloodily put down on Gomułka’s orders. Consequently, on 20 December 1970, he was purged as the first secretary of the PUWP CC. In February 1971 he was suspended as a member of the CC; in May 1972 he lost his membership in the Council of State and soon after was stripped of his parliamentary seat. When he retired, Gomułka wrote his memoirs, which were published in 1994 as Pamiętniki (Memoirs) in two volumes. (PK)

Sources: Słownik polityków polskich XX w. (Poznań, 1998); Słownik biograficzny działaczy polskiego ruchu robotniczego, vol. 2 (Warsaw, 1987); The Cambridge Biographical Encyclopedia (Cambridge, 1998); Nicholas Bethell, Gomułka, His Poland and His Communism (London, 1969); Nowotko-Mołojec: Z początków PPR. Nieznane relacje Władysława Gomułki i Franciszka Józwiaka (London, 1986); Andrzej Werblan, Władysław Gomułka, sekretarz generalny PPR (Warsaw, 1988); Paweł Machcewicz, Władysław Gomułka (Warsaw, 1995); Antoni Dudek, Państwo i Kościół w Polsce 1945–1970 (Kraków, 1995); Jerzy Eisler, Grudzień 1970 (Warsaw, 2000); Dariusz Stola, Kampania antysyjonistyczna w Polsce 1967–1968 (Warsaw, 2000).

GÖNCZ Árpád (10 February 1922, Budapest), Hungarian politician. Born into an educated family, in 1944 Göncz graduated in law from the University of Budapest. In February 1944 he was recruited into the army. He was taken prisoner of war by the Soviets several times but always managed to escape. In early 1945 he ran away from his unit in Germany and took part in the armed anti-German resistance as a member of the Freedom Front of Hungarian Students. In the summer of 1945 he joined the Independent Smallholders' Party (ISP). From 1946 to 1948 he worked in the ISP headquarters, and for some time he was a personal secretary to the party's general secretary, Béla Kovács. In 1947–48, Göncz presided over the Budapest committee of Independent Youth, which was the ISP youth organization. He also edited its weekly, Nemzedék, and was secretary of the ISP parliamentary club. When in February 1947 the Soviet security organs arrested Kovács, Göncz was arrested by the Hungarian security police, but he was released after a few weeks. After the ISP was crushed by the Communists, from 1948 Göncz worked as a blue-collar laborer. In 1951 he was employed as senior construction worker in a drainage company, and in 1952 he enrolled at the Crop Production Department of the Agricultural Academy in Gödöllő, near Budapest, where he completed four years of studies but did not graduate.

During the 1956 revolution Göncz worked in the re-organized Hungarian Peasant Union. He passed a memorandum to the ambassador of India, Krishna Menon, from the Hungarian Democratic Independence Movement; the memorandum was based on the work by István Bibó, Tervezet a magyar kérdés megoldására (Draft compromise solution to the Hungarian question). In February 1957 Göncz passed abroad a manuscript by Imre Nagy written in 1955–56. In May 1957 Göncz was arrested and tried, along with Bibó and his aides. On 2 August 1958 he was sentenced to life imprisonment. In March 1960 he took part in a hunger strike of political prisoners in Vác Prison. He learned English there and practiced translation. In 1963 he was amnestied, and from 1964 he worked in the drainage company again. He attempted to complete his agricultural degree but was expelled from the Agricultural Academy. From 1965 he worked as a writer and translator of literature. In 1978–81 he lectured at the University of Szeged. In 1979–80 he co-edited Bibó István-émlékkönyv (The István Bibó memorial book), finally published in the samizdat press and in Switzerland. He also signed democratic opposition addresses to the authorities.

In the fall of 1988 Göncz was one of the founders of the (liberal) Alliance of Free Democrats (Szabad Demokraták Szövetsége [AFD]); then he was its spokesman and a member of the AFD National Council. He also was among the founders and deputy chairman of the Committee for Historical Rectification, which succeeded in organizing a solemn memorial service for Imre Nagy, his aides, and all the victims of the 1956 revolution; it was aimed at maintaining the memory of the revolution and recognizing and honoring the insurgents. From 1989 Göncz presided over the Budapest committee of the League of Human Rights, and from December 1989 to September 1990, over the Association of Hungarian Writers. Later he was its honorary chairman. In May 1990 he was elected an MP on behalf of the AFD. On the basis of an agreement between the Hungarian Democratic Forum, which won the election, and the largest opposition faction, the AFD, Göncz became speaker of the parliament and, in accord with the constitution, provisional president. On 3 August 1990 he was elected president for the first term, and on 19 June 1995, for the second term. He held this position until 4 August 2000. During his terms in office, Göncz was the most popular politician in Hungary. He contributed substantially to the stabilization of the young Hungarian democracy and gained much prestige abroad. He strongly supported the economic transformation toward a market economy and a pro-Western course in foreign policy. He translated into Hungarian a number of contemporary and classical works by English, American, and Japanese authors, including J. R. R. Tolkien. In 1990 his Plays and Other Writings were published in the United States, and in 1994 he published his memoirs, Beszélgetések az elnökkel (Conversations with the president). (JT)

Sources: Magyar Nagylexikon, vol. 8 (Budapest, 1999); Ki kicsoda 2000 (Budapest, 2001); Europa Środkowa i Wschodnia, 1991–1999 (Warsaw, 1993–2001); Steven Bela Vardy, Historical Dictionary of Hungary (Lanham, Md., 1997); Jerzy Kochanowski, Węgry (Warsaw, 1997); Attila Szakolczay, Az 1956-os forradalom és szabadságharc (Budapest, 2001); www.rulers.org.

GOPPERS Karlis (2 April 1876, Planu, near Valka–June 1941, Dreilini, near Riga), Latvian general. In 1896 Goppers graduated from an officer training school in Vilnius. Afterwards he served in the Russian Army. In 1912 he became captain. During World War I he commanded a battalion, and from 1915, already a colonel, he was in command of a regiment. In 1917 he became commander of the First Brigade of the Latvian Rifles. Sent far inside Russia in December 1917, he took part in the domestic war; he commanded military units of the Whites at Samara and later assumed the command of the Twenty-first Infantry Division in Siberia. In June 1920 he returned to Latvia. On 13 August 1920 he was promoted to general. At this time he directed the founding group of Latvian scouting. He remained the chief of this scouting organization until his death. From 1924 he commanded an infantry division. Goppers published many works on the history and theory of military science. After the Soviet invasion of Latvia, in September 1940 he was arrested by the NKVD. He was kept in prison in Riga and was executed there before the German invasion. In 1944 his body was recognized among the victims murdered by the NKVD. (WR/EJ)

Sources: Latvijas darbinieku galerija 1918–1928 (Riga, 1929); Latviešu konversācijas vārdnīca, vol. 6 (Riga, 1931); Testimony by Ants Grantskalns before the House of Representatives Select Committee to Investigate Incorporation of the Baltic States, First Interim Report, 1st Session (Washington, D.C., 1954).

GORBUNOVŠ Anatolijs (10 February 1942, Pildas), Latvian post-Communist politician. Born into a Russified Latvian peasant family, Gorbunovs graduated from a technical high school in Riga in 1959, from the Construction Department of the Riga Polytechnic Institute in 1970, and from the Academy of Social Sciences in Moscow in 1978. From 1959 he worked as a technician in a kolkhoz. From 1966 he was a member of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union, and in 1967 he became head of the Komsomol in Riga. From 1974 he was active in various levels of the party structure in Riga, and from 1980 to 1985 he was secretary and first secretary of the Riga regional and city committee. As a result of his association with intellectuals, mainly the poet Jānis Peters, Gorbunovs' views evolved toward national communism. In 1984–85 he headed the Administration Department of the Central Committee (CC) of the Communist Party of Latvia (CPL), and in 1985–88 he was CC secretary for ideological affairs and a member of the CPL CC Politburo. On 30 September 1988 he became chairman of the Supreme Council of the Latvian SSR.

When on 4 May 1990 the Supreme Council of the Latvian SSR declared de jure the sovereignty of Latvia, removing the terms “Socialist” and “Soviet” from the country's name, Gorbunovs was recognized as the head of the new state. On 12 May, along with the chairmen of the Supreme Councils of the Estonian and Lithuanian republics, Arnold Rūitel and Vytautas Landsbergis respectively, Gorbunovs renewed the treaty of Baltic cooperation of 1934. Under threats from Moscow, in mid-May Gorbunovs suggested a suspension of the declaration of sovereignty, but he was outvoted in the Supreme Council. When Soviet special forces attacked the Ministry of Interior in Riga in January 1991, Gorbunovs continued efforts in favor of Latvia's independence. During a referendum on the future shape of the Soviet Union in March 1991, he stood up for Latvia's independence. During the Moscow putsch, on 19 August 1991 he, along with Prime Minister Ivars Godmanis, issued a declaration that the coup leaders had acted illegally. The next day, the Latvian Supreme Council proclaimed full independence, and Gorbunovs stayed in office as Latvia's head of state. After the breakup of the CPL, from April 1990 Gorbunovs belonged to the Independent Communist Party of Latvia. When the new constitution was passed, from 15 September 1992 he was the provisional president of Latvia. His very high ratings were hurt by his stand on the citizenship rights of Russians (he opposed excessively restrictive policies in this respect) and the economic problems of the new state, but he managed to avoid the most unpopular decisions. On 8 July 1993 he handed over power to the newly elected president, Guntis Ulmanis. From 1993 Gorbunovs was an MP on behalf of the liberal Latvia's Way (Latvijas Ceļš) party, and in 1993–95 he was speaker of the parliament. Later he headed several parliamentary commissions. From December 1995 to July 1999 he was deputy prime minister and then, until December 2002, minister of transportation. (EJ)

Sources: Latvijas Padomju Enciklopēdija, vol. 3 (Riga, 1983); Who Is Who in Latvia 1996: Biographical Dictionary (Riga, 1996); Kas ir kas Latvijā (Riga, 1999); Romuald J. Misiunas and Rein Taagepera, The Baltic States: Years of Dependence, 1940–1990 (Berkeley, 1993); Anatol Lieven, The Baltic Revolution (New Haven, 1993); Europa Środkowo-Wschodnia 1993 (Warsaw, 1995); Juris Dreifelds, Latvia in Transition (Cambridge, 1996); Andrejs Plakans, Historical Dictionary of Latvia (Lanham, Md., 1997).

GÓRECKI Henryk Mikołaj (6 December 1933, Czernica, near Rybnik), Polish composer. Górecki graduated from high school in Rydułtowy, and in 1955–60 he studied composition at the State Higher Musical School in Katowice. Later this school changed its name to the Musical Academy, and Górecki was its rector from 1975 to 1979 and professor from 1977. From 1994 he was a member of the Polish Academy of Arts and Sciences. Initially his compositions, such as Epitafium (1958), were influenced by dodecaphony and pointillism. The first performances of his works were spectacular events at International Festivals of Contemporary Music known as Warsaw Autumn. Górecki was one of the pioneers of aleatoric music but maintained his own style, characterized by vitality and an intensity of emotion. In his First Symphony (1959), Zderzenia (Clashes; 1960), and Genesis I–III (1961–63) he employed masses of sound and obsessional repetitions. Through archaizing his music in the late 1960s—recognizable in Trzy utwory w dawnym stylu (Three pieces in the old style; 1963) and Muzyka staropolska (Old Polish music; 1969)—he arrived at the neo-tonalism of his Second and Third Symphonies (1972 and 1976), the psalm Beatus Vir (1979), and Concerto for Harpsichord and String Orchestra (1980). In 1993 his Third Symphony became an unprecedented best seller, entering the charts and competing with pop music. More than seven hundred thousand copies of the record of this composition were sold, the most ever in the history of contemporary symphonic music. Górecki received the Recording of the Year award in 1993 and the Classical Music Award in 1994. (WR)

Sources: Thomas Adrian, Górecki (Oxford, 1997); Britannica: Edycja polska, vol. 14 (Poznań, 2000).

GÓRECKI Roman (27 August 1889, Stara Sól, Eastern Galicia–9 August 1946, Whitchurch, Shropshire, England), Polish general and politician. Upon graduating from a high school in Tarnów, Górecki enrolled in the law school at the University of Lvov, where he received his doctorate in 1914. He belonged to the Zarzewie (Spark) group, which was a splinter organization of the secret Union of Polish Youth–Zet. In 1909 he joined the Polish Riflemen Teams, training independent cadres for the struggle against Russia. Between 1914 and 1916, he fought in the Second Brigade of the Polish Legions. During the Oath Crisis, he remained in the service, but in 1918 he co-authored a plan for the Polish Auxiliary Corps to abandon the Austro-Hungarian forces and break through the Russian front near Rarańcza. Consequently, he was imprisoned at Huszt and court-martialed, but the charges against him were dropped because of an amnesty. Górecki described his adventures in Z moich wspomnień (From my recollections; 1924) and W obliczu śmierci (Facing death; 1933). He joined the Polish Army at the end of 1918. In 1919 he was dispatched to France to study military administration. In July 1923 he was promoted to general and appointed chief of the Military Controller Corps. Following the coup d'état of May 1926, he became deputy minister of military affairs. In 1927 he was nominated chairman of the Bank of the Home Economy (Bank Gospodarstwa Krajowego [BGK]) as a close confidant of Józef Piłsudski. He also sat on numerous boards of state-owned companies, exerting enormous influence on the functioning of the so-called state complex. From October 1935 to May 1936, he served as minister of industry and trade but later returned to his old post at the BGK. At the beginning of the 1920s he became a member of the Grand National Lodge. In 1928 he was appointed chairman of the largest veterans' organization subordinated to the ruling regime. Following the collapse of Poland in September 1939, he was an émigré in Paris,

London, and Glasgow, where he lectured on banking. Górecki authored several works, including Rola BGK w życiu gospodarczym Polski (The role of the BGK in Poland's economic life; 1928); Le développement économique de la Pologne (1935; Poland and Her Economic Development, 1935); and Gospodarczy dorobek Polski w latach 1918–1938 (The economic achievements of Poland between 1918 and 1938; 1946). (WR) Sources: PSB, vol. 8; Stanisław Łoza, Czy wiesz kto to jest (Warsaw, 1937); Janusz Jędrzejewicz, ed., Wspomnienia legionowe, vol. 1 (Warsaw, 1924); Stanisław Głabiński, Wspomnienia polityczne (Pelplin, 1939); Zbigniew Landau, Bank Gospodarstwa Krajowego (Warsaw, 1993); Ludwik Hass, Masoneria polska XX wieku (Warsaw, 1996).

GORKIĆ Milan [originally Josip Čižinski] (1904, Sarajevo–1937? USSR), Yugoslav Communist activist. The son of an Austro-Hungarian official from Transcarpathian Ruthenia, in 1919 Gorkić joined the radical leftist groups that founded the Communist Party of Yugoslavia (CPY). In 1922 he took part in a conference of Communist youth in Vienna, and then he went to Moscow. He studied in the Comintern school and advanced in the apparatus of the Communist Youth International (CYI) under his adopted name. From 1924 he was a member of the CYI Executive Committee, and in 1928 he became its secretary. He also joined the CPY Central Committee and its Politburo. Supported by Nikolay Bukharin, in 1932 Gorkić became CPY general secretary. He directed the party from Moscow and Vienna. He also undertook secret trips to Yugoslavia. For instance, in 1934 he presided over a clandestine national party conference in Ljubljana. In 1935 he headed the Yugoslav delegation to the Seventh Congress of the Comintern and became deputy member of its Executive Committee and the only representative of the Yugoslav party. In 1936 the party headquarters were moved to Paris, so Gorkić commuted between the Soviet and French capitals. In June 1937 he was called to Moscow by the Comintern leadership. Upon arrival, he was arrested, sentenced to death, and soon executed. His first wife, Betty Glane, met the same fate. (WR) Sources: Lazitch; Adam B. Ulam, Tito and the Cominform (Westport, Conn., 1952); Milovan Đilas, Memoir of a Revolutionary (New York, 1973); Ivan Očak, Gorkić: Život, rad i pogibja (Zagreb, 1988).

GOTOVAC Vlado (18 September 1930, Imotski, Dalmatia–7 December 2000, Rome), Croatian writer and politician. During the “Croatian Spring” of 1971 Gotovac edited the weekly Hrvatski Tjednik, demanding democracy and national freedoms. He was arrested for an interview he gave on Swedish television and spent three years in prison. In 1977 he was temporarily arrested again. In June 1981 he was sentenced to two years in prison for his contacts with émigré circles. In May 1989 he co-founded the Croatian Social Liberal Party (Hrvatska Socijalno-Liberalna Stranka [HSLS]), the first non-Communist party in Croatia. During the rule of Franjo Tuđman it was the second largest political party in Croatia. Gotovac openly criticized the nationalist and authoritarian regime of Tuđman. In 1993, along with five other intellectuals, he demanded Tuđman's resignation because of Croatia's intervention in the Bosnian war. From 1995 Gotovac was an MP, and in 1996–97 he was the HSLS chairman. In 1997 he ran in the presidential elections against Tuđman, but he lost. After the elections of January 2000 the HSLS entered the ruling coalition. Gotovac authored intellectual lyricsthat alluded to the poetry of T. S. Eliot, including Pjesme od uvijek (Eternal poems; 1956), Tri slučaja (Three cases; 1981), as well as essays collected in Princip dela (The principle of the work; 1966) and Moj slučaj (My case; 1989). (WR)

Sources: Wielka encyklopedia PWN, vol. 10 (Warsaw, 2002); Ante Čuvalo, The Croatian National Movement 1966–1972 (Boulder, Colo., 1990); Milovan Baletić, ed., Ljudi iz 1971: Prekinuta šutnja (Zagreb, 1990); Robert Stallaerst and Jeannine Laurens, Historical Dictionary of Croatia (Lanham, Md., 1995); www.rulers.org.

GOTTWALD Klement (23 November 1896, Dedice–14 March 1953, Moscow), Communist leader of Czechoslovakia. Gottwald came from a peasant family but was born out of an illegitimate relationship. At the age of twelve he was sent to Vienna, where he was to learn the trade of carpentry. It was there that he joined the youth unit of the Social Democratic Party. After his return to his native Moravia, in 1915 he was inducted into the Austrian Army. On the wave of radical Socialist agitation in October 1918 he deserted from the Italian front, and he joined the then forming Czech army in Brno. There he was one of the most ardent revolutionary agitators, and Lenin's work State and Revolution was a beacon for him. When the Czechoslovak Social Democratic Party split in September, Gottwald supported the Bolshevik faction, which founded the Communist Party of Czechoslovakia (Komunistická Strana Československa [CPC]). From 1922 to 1925 Gottwald edited the Communist paper Pravda in Ostrava and also co-organized the Communist Party of Slovakia. At the Third Congress of the CPC in October 1925 he joined the Central Committee (CC) of the party, and in 1926 he entered its Politburo, where he was responsible for propaganda and agitation. In 1928 he was a member of the CPC delegation to the Sixth Congress of the Communist International, and he joined the Executive Committee of the Comintern.

At the Fifth Congress of the CPC in February 1929 Gottwald assumed the post of secretary general of the party, and soon he was elected an MP in Prague. As a member of official party delegations, he repeatedly went to congresses and plenums of the Executive Committee (EC) of the Comintern to Moscow. From 1929 he belonged to the Presidium of the EC, where he was a member of its strict leadership. From August 1934 he lived almost uninterruptedly in Moscow, taking part in Stalin's game as one of his close associates. From 1935 he was also a member of the EC Secretariat. As a representative of the Stalinist leadership of the Comintern, in 1937 Gottwald communicated the Kremlin's directives on the civil war in Spain to seventeen representatives of West European parties. In November 1938, after the Munich Agreement, he returned to Moscow, where he worked in the Comintern's executive until its formal dissolution in 1943. In fact, he continued to exercise his functions within the framework of a special department of the CC of the All-Russian Communist Party (Bolsheviks). At that time he translated Stalin's Problems of Leninism into the Czech.

During talks with President Edvard Beneš in Moscow (December 1943) Gottwald came to the fore as the leading representative of Communists within the framework of the Czechoslovak National Front. In the coalition cabinet that was installed in Košice in April 1945, Gottwald served as deputy prime minister, supporting, for example, the ceding of the Transcarpathian Ukraine to the USSR. In return, he counted on the Kremlin's support on the incorporation of the western part of Teschen Silesia (Zaolzie) and the Kłodzko Basin into Czechoslovakia, but Stalin agreed to only the former. After the elections of 26 May 1946 Gottwald, as leader of the party that obtained a relative majority of votes (31 percent), became head of the government, formed of nine Communists and twelve members of other parties. He still presented himself and the Communist Party as the guardians of democracy, but in practice he supervised the CPC's takeover of full power, appointing party functionaries to the key posts of ministers of interior and information. After a meeting with Stalin in September 1946 Gottwald announced that Czechoslovakia would follow its own version of socialism, planned by the CPC and based upon a parliamentary majority. At the same time, though, he supported the arrests of the Slovak Ludaks (the followers of Reverend Andrej Hlinka) and the Czech agrarians, who were accused of "plotting" against the state. Although at first Gottwald did not want to recognize the Polish minority in Zaolzie, under Soviet pressure in March 1947 he finally signed a treaty of friendship and cooperation with the Polish government of Józef Cyrankiewicz. In July 1947 Gottwald's government rejected the American offer to include Czechoslovakia in the Marshall Plan. In September 1947 he signed an agreement on a special property tax bill with the Socialists; this added to the popularity of the Communists, who dominated the trade unions and the security apparatus and had collaborators in all other parties, especially among the Socialists.

On 17 February 1948 Gottwald suspended a government meeting, at which non-Communist ministers demanded the withdrawal of the appointments of Communists to key posts in the Ministry of Interior. When on 20 February these ministers resigned, Gottwald did not announce the resignation of the government, but taking advantage of Communist-prompted street demonstrations and blackmail on the part of the USSR Embassy, a few days later he reconstructed the cabinet with a Communist majority. Despite his declarations that the government's activities would be "constitutional" and "democratic," in practice he forced ailing President Beneš to step down, and on 14 June 1948 Gottwald assumed the presidency. In a short time the CPC leadership, with Gottwald as head, carried out the Sovietization of Czechoslovakia by outlawing opposition parties, persecuting their activists, and unleashing police terror. Gottwald supervised changes in the economic system, the collectivization of agriculture, mass arrests, and purges in the party, all in the name of a struggle against Titoism and cosmopolitanism. During the party purges he removed (among others) his close party associate Rudolph Slánský, against whom he gave extensive testimony. Slánský and thirteen others were sentenced to death and executed in 1952. Gottwald was known for his excessive use of alcohol. At Stalin's funeral in March 1953 he was taken ill, and soon after he died. His publications include Deset let (Ten years; 1946). After his death a collection of his writings was issued as Spisy (10 vols.; 1955–58). (WR) Sources: ČBS; Lazitch; The Times, 16 March 1953; Klement Gottwald: Bibliografická pomůcka (Brno, 1976); Jitka Bilková, Klement Gottwald: Život a dílo. Výberove bibliografie (Prague, 1983); Klement Gottwald: Revolucionář a politik. Sborník statí (Prague, 1986); Karel Kaplan, The Short March: The Communist Takeover in Czechoslovakia 1945–1948 (London, 1987).

GOŹDZIK Lechosław (21 January 1931, Tomaszów Mazowiecki), Polish social activist. From 1945 Goździk belonged to the (Communist) Union of Struggling Youth and then to the Polish Youth Union (Związek Młodzieży Polskiej [ZMP]). In 1946 he joined the Polish Workers' Party, and from December 1948 he was a member of the (Communist) Polish United Workers' Party (Polska Zjednoczona Partia Robotnicza [PUWP]). From 1953 he worked in the Passenger Car Factory in the Warsaw quarter of Żerań. In 1955 he became secretary of its PUWP Factory Committee. He criticized social and political relations in Poland at a meeting of Warsaw PUWP activists in April 1956. He entered into contact with critical journalists—for example, from the weekly Po prostu—and with ZMP activists from Warsaw University, making the Żerań factory a center of spontaneous political activity. He co-initiated the first workers' council, the statute for which was announced in September 1956. During the breakthrough days of 19–21 October 1956 Goździk organized rallies in support of party reformers, which made it difficult for the neo-Stalinists to act. In agreement with the PUWP Warsaw Committee, he spoke at a rally in the Warsaw Polytechnic, bringing emotions under control and stopping a demonstration heading for the Soviet Embassy. Goździk enjoyed huge popularity as the leader of Warsaw workers. After the October 1956 breakthrough he favored extending the power of the workers' councils by granting them the right to elect directors and to share in management responsibilities. This was meant as a step toward a truly socialized Socialist economy. He also advocated the necessity to reform the party itself—for instance, through vertical contacts among party organizations and direct elections of delegates to the party congresses in large factories and offices.

Gradually sidelined by the party apparatus, before the parliamentary elections of January 1957 Goździk was placed low on the candidate lists, which practically prevented him from being elected. In 1958 he was recalled from his party functions, and in 1959 he was moved to an electronics factory, Warel. In 1964 he graduated from an evening technical high school, and in 1965 he left for Świnoujście, where he became a fisherman and owner of a fish cutter. In 1970 he left the PUWP. In September 1981 he was an honorary guest at the Solidarity congress. In 1984–90 he was deputy chairman of the Main Administration of the Fishermen's Association; in 1991 he co-organized the Association of Fish Shipowners and was its chairman from 1991 to 1994. In 1993 he ran in the parliamentary elections on behalf of the Democratic Union, but he lost. In 1994–95 he presided over the Świnoujście City Council. (AF)

Sources: Wielka encyklopedia PWN, vol. 10 (Warsaw, 2002); Kazimierz Kłoc, Historia samorządu robotniczego w PRL 1944–1989 (Warsaw, 1992); Jerzy Eisler and Robert Kupiecki, Na zakręcie historii—rok 1956 (Warsaw, 1992); Paweł Machcewicz, Polski rok 1956 (Warsaw, 1993); Wiesław Władyka, Październik '56 (Warsaw, 1994); Paweł Machcewicz, ed., Kampania wyborcza i wybory do Sejmu 20 stycznia 1957 (Warsaw, 2000).

GRABSKI Stanisław (5 April 1871, Borów, near Łowicz–6 May 1949, Sulejówek), Polish politician, economist, and pundit. Grabski was born into a family of landed nobility and was the brother of Władysław Grabski. He encountered socialism at his Warsaw high school. Subsequently, he began to work with the editorial board of Głos and participated in educational activities for the working class. In 1890 he joined the Union of Polish Workers (UPW). While at the mathematical-biological department of the University of Warsaw, he met Roman Dmowski. After beginning studies in the social sciences and philosophy in Berlin in 1891, he established contacts with the local worker activists and edited Gazeta Robotnicza. To escape arrest, he fled to Paris, where he enrolled at the École des Sciences Politiques. He represented the UPW at a Paris congress in 1892 that founded the Polish Socialist Party (Polska Partia Socjalistyczna [PPS]). As a PPS representative, Grabski participated in the International Socialist Congress in Zurich. Gradually, however, he came to embrace the ideology of the National League. In 1893 he enrolled at the University of Bern, where he received a Ph.D. in 1894. In 1899 he became the librarian of the National Polish Museum in Rapersville. He contributed articles to Przedświt. He came to abandon the principles of class struggle in favor of social and national solidarity. However, he continued to maintain good personal relations with various Socialists, including Józef Piłsudski.

In 1903, Grabski arrived in Kraków, where he taught at the Philosophy Department of the Jagiellonian University. He also lectured in economics and became involved in charity and social work, supporting the Farming Society and participating in the founding of milk firms. In 1905 he moved to Lwów (Lviv), where he became an agricultural official in the Homeland Department and a professor at the Agricultural Academy in Dublany. As an assistant professor, he taught philosophy and methodology in the social sciences at the University of Lwów. In 1906 he joined the National League and was coopted to its Central Committee. In 1906 he became a secretary and an expert on agriculture and homeland autonomy in the Polish Club in the Russian State Duma. Following the dissolution of the First Duma, Grabski returned to Lwów, where he was active in the National Democratic Party as its deputy chairman. He supervised the publication of Słowo Polskie. On his initiative, the National Democrats began organizing paramilitary units to compete with the Riflemen Teams and Unions.

In 1914 Grabski co-founded the Galician Central National Committee, which opposed insurrection against Russia. He published Zjednoczenie. In 1915, as Austro-Hungarian troops approached Lwów, he left for Kiev. Following the fall of the tsar in March 1917, he advocated the formation of a Polish army in Russia. He participated in the Council of the Polish Inter-Party Union in Moscow, working for its Department of Foreign Affairs. After the Bolshevik revolution, Grabski was coopted in Kiev to the Supreme Polish Military Committee (Naczpól), leading the organization of Polish military units in Russia. Then he traveled via England to France, where he was invited to join the National Polish Committee (Komitet Narodowy Polski [KNP]), a legally recognized representative of Poland in the West. He authored an ethnographic map of Poland and a proposal for its eastern borders; Grabski's version was more moderate than that espoused by Dmowski. Grabski assisted in the work of the Polish delegation at the Paris Peace Conference. Following the establishment of the government of Jędrzej Moraczewski in Warsaw, Grabski returned home as a delegate of the KNP and of the supreme commander of the Allied armies, Marshal Ferdinand Foch. In 1919, Grabski was elected to the Constituent Assembly (Sejm). He also continued to represent the National Democrats in the parliament between 1922 and 1928. He initiated the foundation of the rightist Popular-National Union. As chairman of the parliamentary commission for foreign affairs, he participated in negotiations with the Czechs to resolve the conflict over Tsechen. He opposed the agreement between Piłsudski and Symon Petlura. Following the armistice of October 1920, Grabski participated in the Polish delegation negotiating with the Bolsheviks. He opposed the annexation of Minsk to Poland. In the Treaty of Riga of March 1921, his concept of the Polish-Soviet border was the one accepted; it included the annexation of a swath of land known as "the Grabski Corridor." In 1921 he participated in a Polish diplomatic mission to Paris concerning Upper Silesia; there he convinced the French to delegate the matter to the League of Nations.

In 1920 Grabski advocated the dissolution of the National League, and when his proposal was rejected, he left the organization. His political influence visibly waned. He opposed secret and Fascist nationalist organizations. The slogan "Poland for the Poles" he answered with "Poles for Poland." He returned to lecturing at the university and took over as editor-in-chief of Słowo Polskie. In October 1923 he was nominated minister for religious confessions and public enlightenment, but in December 1923 he quit, along with the entire government of Wincenty Witos. In 1924 Grabski joined a commission to establish the official language in the eastern territories. He submitted a proposal about the language for the schools, but it was vetoed by the left and the national minorities. Grabski then led a mission to the Holy See to conclude a concordat, and he became its co-author in February 1925. In March 1925 he was once again nominated minister of religious confessions and public enlightenment, conducting a school plebiscite in eastern Poland. Following the collapse of the government led by his brother Władysław, he remained at his post in the succeeding governments of Aleksander Skrzyński and Witos.

After the coup d'état of May 1926, Grabski withdrew from public life. Following the Soviet invasion of 17 September 1939, he was arrested in Lwów and later sent to Moscow. Released in 1941 because of a Soviet-Polish treaty, he left Moscow for London, where he supported the policy of General Władysław Sikorski. He launched the bi-monthly Jutro Polski. In 1942 he joined the National Council of the Polish Republic, an advisory organ of the president and government-in-exile, and was elected its chairman. He drew close to the populists. In August 1944, with Stanisław Mikołajczyk, Grabski participated in talks with Stalin in Moscow. Accepting the Yalta agreement and the pact founding the Provisional Government of National Unity for Poland, he returned home on 30 June 1945 and became deputy chairman of the Communist-controlled National Home Council. He participated in the Potsdam conference. In 1947 he took over the chair of social systems at the Law School of the University of Warsaw. Grabski authored numerous works in political science and economics, including the following: Rewolucja (Revolution; 1921); Uwagi o bieżącej chwili historycznej Polski (Remarks on the contemporary historical moment of Poland; 1922); Kryzys myśli państwowej (A crisis in state thought; 1927); Ekonomia społeczna (Social economics; 1927–32); Państwo narodowe (A nation-state; 1929); Ku lepszemu Polsce (Toward a better Poland; 1937); and Na nowej drodze (On a new road; 1946). In 1989 his Pamiętniki (Memoirs, 2 vols.) were published. (JS)

Sources: PSB, vol. 8; Słownik polityków polskich XX wieku (Poznań, 1998); Roman Wapiński, Narodowa Demokracja 1893–1939 (Wrocław, 1980); Adam Próchnicki, Pierwsze piętnastolecie Polski niepodległej (Warsaw, 1983); Władysław Pobóg-Malinowski, Najnowsza historia polityczna Polski, vol. 2 (London, 1983), vol. 3 (London, 1986); Krystyna Kersten, Narodziny systemu władzy: Polska 1943–1948 (Poznań, 1990); Jan Zamoyski, Powrót na mapę (Warsaw, 1991); Andrzej Nowak, Polska i trzy Rosje: Studium polityki wschodniej Józefa Piłsudskiego (do kwietnia 1920) (Kraków, 2001).

GRABSKI Tadeusz (14 March 1929, Warsaw–2 February 1998, Warsaw), Polish Communist activist. In 1951 Grabski graduated from the Higher School of Economics in Poznań, where he received a doctorate in economics. He then served in the military. In 1956 he joined the (Communist) Polish United Workers' Party (Polska Zjednoczona Partia Robotnicza [PUWP]) and assumed managerial posts in industry, including one as the director of the Provincial Conglomerate of Regional Industry Enterprises in Poznań and one as chairman of the board of the Provincial Union of Labor Cooperatives in Poznań. Between 1972 and 1973 he served as chairman of the presidium of the Provincial National Council in Poznań, and from 1973 through 1975, as the provincial governor (voivode) of Poznań. Between 1975 and 1979 he was first secretary of the PUWP Provincial Committee in Konin. He was a parliamentary deputy (1976–80) and a member of the PUWP Central Committee (CC) (from December 1975 to February 1980 and from August 1980 to July 1981). In 1979 and 1980, he worked as chief executive of Metra Automatic Systems Enterprises in Poznań. Between 1980 and 1981, Grabski was considered to be the most conservative and pro-Soviet and pro-East German activist in the Communist leadership of Poland. In August 1980 he joined the Politburo, and in September he became secretary of the PUWP CC, while holding the post of deputy prime minister (August–September 1980). In the party leadership he oversaw industry, construction, transportation, and finance. He advocated the need to crush Solidarity with force; this accounted for his popularity with the Kremlin. Relying on the protection of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union, he openly criticized the top PUWP leadership for its lack of resolve in dealing with Solidarity. During a meeting of the PUWP CC on 9 June 1981 Grabski attempted to procure the dismissal of First Secretary Stanisław Kania, openly accusing him of lacking the trust of Poland's Soviet ally. During the PUWP Ninth Congress in July 1981, Grabski failed to be included in the top leadership of the party. Afterwards, he was sidelined and shifted to diplomatic work. (PK)

Sources: Mołdawa; Włodzimierz Janowski and Aleksander Kocharński, Informator o strukturze i obsadzie personalnej centralnego aparatu PZPR 1948–1990 (Warsaw, 2000); Andrzej Paczkowski, Droga do "mniejszego zła": Strategia i taktyka obozu władzy lipiec 1980–styczeń 1982 (Kraków, 2002).

GRABSKI Władysław (7 July 1874, Borów, near Łowicz–1 March 1938, Warsaw), Polish politician, economist, and historian. Grabski came from a family of landed nobility; he was the brother of Stanisław Grabski. While at a Warsaw high school (1883–92), he became a Socialist. He studied in Paris at the École des Sciences Politiques (1892–94) and at the Sorbonne (1892–95). His views evolved toward liberalism and national solidarity. Between 1896 and 1897 Grabski studied agriculture in Halle, Germany. After returning home, he took over the management of the family estate. In 1899 he established an experimental agricultural post in Kutno. He also organized village cooperatives. His Historia Towarzystwa Rolniczego, 1858–61

(History of the Agricultural Society, 1858–61; 1904) won a prize from the Academy of Arts and Sciences in Kraków. In 1904 Grabski co-founded the illegal Union of National-Political Work (Związek Pracy Narodowo-Politycznej), and in 1905 he joined the National League. He was then briefly imprisoned by the Russian authorities. In 1906 he became involved with National Democracy. Between 1905 and 1912 he was a deputy to the State Duma. He refused to run for the Fourth Duma and instead concentrated on social and charity work at the Central Agricultural Society and the Office for Social Work, which published his Rocznik Statystyczny Królestwa Polskiego (The statistical yearbook of the Polish kingdom).

Following the outbreak of World War I, Grabski joined the National Committee of Poland (Komitet Narodowy Polski [KNP]), and in 1915 he founded and chaired the Central Civic Committee. Before the Germans took Warsaw, he left for Russia. He was active in the Council of the Societies to Assist War Victims in Poland. After the fall of the Romanovs, Grabski became involved in the Polish Liquidation Commission. Following the Bolshevik revolution of 1917, he returned home, where he was arrested by the Germans and imprisoned at Modlin. While in jail, he wrote a textbook on the agricultural history of Poland. After the collapse of the German administration in Poland, on 26 October 1918 Grabski became minister of agriculture in the government of Józef Świeżyński. In the resurrected Poland he focused on economic matters, including organizing and chairing the Main Liquidation Bureau. In 1919 he participated in the Polish delegation to the Paris Peace Conference. Between 1919 and 1922 he was an MP on the ticket of the Popular-National Union. From December 1919 through November 1920 he served in the government of Leopold Skulski. On 23 June 1920 he became prime minister and organized the Council for the Defense of the State. He quit on 24 July 1920, objecting to the decisions of the conference at Spa in which the Western powers offered to compromise with the Soviets at the expense of Poland. However, he remained minister of the treasury until November 1920. From 1921 to 1922 he served as extraordinary commissar for the repatriation of Poles from Russia, and in 1922 he was director of the Polish-American Committee to Aid Children.

In January 1923 Grabski once again became minister of the treasury in the government of General Władysław Sikorski. In May 1923, after the majority government of Wincenty Witos took over, he kept his post. He intended to introduce a new currency (replacing the Polish mark with the złoty) but first planned to balance the budget and decrease inflation. Since Witos failed to support him, Grabski quit on 1 July 1923. However, after the Witos cabinet collapsed, Grabski assembled his own “extraparliamentary” government and became prime minister and minister of the treasury on 19 December 1923. Facing hyperinflation and economic crisis, he managed to balance the budget by introducing an extraordinary property tax and reducing spending. He also succeeded in reforming the currency. On 28 April 1924 the newly created Polish Bank introduced the złoty. Grabski carried out his plans relying solely on domestic resources. His intention was to maintain Poland’s independence of action; this was reflected in, among other things, a rejection of the expert services of the British mission under Hilton Young. However, Grabski’s reforms collapsed because of economic recession, the inauspicious international situation, and the return of inflation (the so-called second inflation). The reforms also suffered because of the opposition of Józef Piłsudski and his followers to the government. In the fall of 1925, Grabski lost the confidence of leaders in banking, industry, and commerce. He tendered his resignation on 14 November 1925.

In May 1926 Grabski was a candidate for prime minister in an “extraparliamentary” government. However, he failed to gain sufficient support from the political parties. This put an end to his political career, and he began to focus on academic work. From 1923 he was a professor at the Main School of Agricultural Economics in Warsaw. Between 1928 and 1934 he headed the Society of Polish Economists and Statisticians in Warsaw. Later, he was elected an honorary member of the society. In 1936 he organized the Institute for the Sociology of the Countryside and launched the Rocznik Socjologii Wsi (The yearbook for the sociology of the village). He believed that a land reform would facilitate economic development in the Polish countryside and, as a consequence, in the entire national economy. He founded and became an ordinary member of the Warsaw Scientific Society. Along with Eugeniusz Kwiatkowski, Grabski was considered to be the most outstanding political economist of the Second Polish Republic. He was decorated with the Order of the White Eagle. He authored numerous scholarly works, including the following: Materiały w sprawie włościańskiej (The evidence on the peasant question, 3 vols.; 1907–19); Spoleczne gospodarstwo agrarne (A social agrarian economy; 1923); Reforma agronomii społecznej (The reform of the social agrarian economy; 1928); Historia wsi w Polsce (History of the Polish countryside; 1929); Wieś i folwark (The village and the demesne; 1930); Idea Polski (The idea of Poland; 1935); and “Parcelacja agrarna wobec struktury, koniunktury i chwili dziejowej Polski” (Agricultural partitioning in the light of the structure, timing, and history of Poland, Ekonomista, 1938, vol. 4). He also published his memoirs: Dwa lata pracy u podstaw państwowości naszej 1924–1925 (Two years of work at the foundations of our state; 1927). (JS)

Sources: PSB, vol. 8; Słownik polityków polskich XX wieku (Poznań, 1998); Jan Hupka, Z czasów wielkiej wojny (Lwów, 1927); Stefan Dziewulski, "Profesor Władysław Grabski i jego prace," Przegląd Statystyczny, 1938, no. 2; Antoni Żabko-Potopowicz, "Śp. Władysław Grabski," Ekonomista, 1938, no. 1; Jerzy Tomaszewski, Stabilizacja waluty w Polsce (Warsaw, 1961); Zbigniew Landau and Jerzy Tomaszewski, W dobie inflacji (Warsaw, 1967); Władysław Pobóg-Malinowski, Najnowsza historia polityczna Polski, vol. 2 (London, 1983); Stanisław Grabski, Pamiętniki, vols. 1–2 (Warsaw, 1989).

GRANIĆ Mate (19 September 1947, Baska Voda), Croatian politician. Granić studied medicine in Zagreb (1966–71) and specialized in diabetes in 1976–77. In 1977 he became assistant professor at the Vuk Vrhovac Institute of Diabetes and Endocrinology. In 1980 he received a Ph.D. in medical science, and in 1985 he became professor and deputy director of the institute. In 1990 he became dean of the Department of Medicine of the University of Zagreb. He was also a visiting professor at Harvard University and at the University of Munich. In 1989 he joined the Croatian Democratic Union (Hrvatska Demokratska Zajednica [HDZ]) and soon became its deputy chairman. In June 1993 he assumed the position of deputy prime minister and minister of foreign affairs. He played an active role in shaping Croatian foreign policy, taking part in the peace talks in Dayton, Ohio, where on 21 November 1995 a peace treaty was signed terminating the war in Bosnia and Herzegovina. Granić made efforts to facilitate the rapprochement of Croatia with the European Union and NATO, but he faced the reluctance of the Western powers, who accused the Zagreb authorities of insufficient support for the Dayton agreement and violations of democratic principles. Croatia's relations with the Western powers improved after 24 March 1999, when NATO started an intervention in Yugoslavia. The next day Granić issued a statement fully supporting the NATO operation. After the death of Franjo Tuđman in December 1999, the ruling HDZ was defeated in the parliamentary elections of 3 January 2000. In consequence Granić left the HDZ Presidium and gave up all his party and government positions. He ran in the presidential elections of January 2000 but came in third and failed to qualify for the second round. In March 2000 he left the HDZ, which, in his opinion, had become too rightist. He co-founded the Croatian Democratic Center, later renamed the Democratic Center, and became its chairman. (AO)

Sources: Europa Środkowo-Wschodnia 1993–1999 (Warsaw, 1995–2001); Richard Holbrooke, To End a War (New York, 1998); Saša Cvijetić, "News Report for Croatia," Central Europe Review, 10 January 2000; Biographical Notes, Polish Press Agency PAP, November 2001; Bugajski; www.rferl.org.

GRAŻYŃSKI Michał, pseudonym "Borelowski" (12 May 1890, Gdów, near Wieliczka–10 December 1965, Putney, Great Britain), Polish politician. The son of a teacher, after graduating from Nowodworski High School in Kraków, Grażyński studied at the Philosophy Department of the Jagiellonian University (1909–14), where he received his doctorate. While a student, he joined the Polish Riflemen Squads. In October 1914 he volunteered for the Thirteenth (Austro-Hungarian) Infantry Regiment and left for the eastern front. In 1915 he was seriously wounded at the battle of Gołaczów. In 1918, he joined the newly created Polish Army. He participated in preparing the plebiscite in Spiš and Orava. In August 1920, he arrived in Upper Silesia on an assignment from the Second Department (Intelligence) of the General Staff of the Polish Army. His orders were to prepare the clandestine structure of the Upper Silesian Polish Military Organization, which he commanded from December 1920. Upon the outbreak of the Third Silesian Uprising in May 1921, Grażyński became chief of staff of the East Operation Group, the largest of the insurgent units. He endeavored to intensify insurgent operations as much as possible, which led to a serious conflict with the political leadership of the uprising, Wojciech Korfanty in particular. An attempt by the officers of the East Operation Group to take over political leadership ended with Grażyński's arrest in June 1921. However, the charges against him were soon dropped.

Following his dismissal from the armed forces, Grażyński returned to Kraków. Between 1921 and 1923 he worked in various official capacities, including a position at the Ministry of Land Reform. At the behest of military intelligence, he conducted operations among the Polish minority in Opole Silesia. After the May 1926 coup d'état, he was nominated provincial governor of Silesia, holding that post for over a decade (August 1926–September 1939). He contributed to the manifold development of the province. He also established his own political camp. To this end, he took advantage of the specific autonomous cultural and economic institutions of Silesia, positioning himself in the Union of Silesian Insurgents (Związek Powstańców Śląskich) and the Union for the Reform of the Republic (Związek Naprawy Rzeczypospolitej). However, he opposed local separatism. Contrary to Korfanty, who was ready to obey international agreements, Grażyński used all methods at his disposal to try to weaken German influence in Upper Silesia. In education policy in particular, he often curtailed German minority schooling, which led to numerous complaints against Poland in the League of Nations and the International Justice Tribunal in The Hague. He opposed both the Volksbund, which represented the German minority, and the Christian National camp of Korfanty. Grażyński initiated numerous economic and cultural undertakings in Upper Silesia. From 1931 he headed the Union of Polish Scouting, attempting to carry out a program of “civic formation.” In September and October 1938, he prepared and completed a plan for the annexation of Zaolzie to Poland. In September 1939 he became minister for information and propaganda. When the war began, he escaped to Romania and then to France. He spent the war in Great Britain, sidelined by the government of General Władysław Sikorski. Grażyński died in an accident. He published numerous scholarly articles on numismatics and social and educational topics. (AGr)

Sources: PSB, vol. 8; Kto był kim w Drugiej Rzeczypospolitej (Warsaw, 1994); Encyklopedia Historii Drugiej Rzeczypospolitej (Warsaw, 1999); Henryk Rechowicz, Wojewoda śląski dr Michał Grażyński (Warsaw and Kraków, 1988); Wanda Musialik, Michał Tadeusz Grażyński 1890–1965: Biografia polityczna (Opole, 1989); Tomasz Fałęcki, Powstańcy śląscy 1921–1939 (Wrocław and Warsaw, 1990); Jan Łączewski, Michał Grażyński (1890–1965): Sylwetka polityka (Częstochowa, 2000).

GRINBERGS Teodors (2 April 1870, Dundaga, Courland–14 June 1962, Eslingen, Germany), Lutheran archbishop of Latvia. Grinbergs graduated from a high school in Jelgava and from the Department of Theology at the University of Dorpat (Tartu) in 1896. He also studied history and philosophy there. He was auxiliary pastor and tutor in Pope, Courland. From 1899 he was vicar in Lutriņi, Courland, and from 1907 to 1934, pastor in Ventspils. In 1918–19 he presided over the commission of education in this town. In 1922–23 he was an MP on behalf of the Union of Christian Democrats, and from 1919 to 1932, high school headmaster in Ventspils. In 1931 he was appointed deputy archbishop of the Lutheran Church in Latvia, and in March 1932 he was elected archbishop. From 1931 he was also associate professor and chair of the Institute of Theology and later full professor at the University of Riga. He edited a number of religious periodicals, including one for children, Bitīte. He authored several articles on the history of the Lutheran Church and theology. During the first Soviet occupation (1940–41) he avoided deportation. In 1943 he signed a letter of protest against German occupation policies, demanding Latvia’s independence. In October 1944 he left for Germany, where in 1944–62 he continued as archbishop of the Latvian Lutheran Church in exile. (EJ)

Sources: Latviešu konversācijas vārdnīca, vol. 6 (Riga, 1931); Es viņu pazīstu (Riga, 1939); Arhibīskaps Dr. Teodors Grinbergs: Rakstu krājums 100. dzimundienas atcerei (n.p., 1970).

GRINIUS Kazys (17 December 1866, Selema Buda, near Marijampole–4 June 1950, Chicago), Peasant Party politician, president of Lithuania. The son of wealthy peasants, Grinius became familiar with the Lithuanian literature and national traditions in his childhood. After graduating from a gymnasium in Marijampole, in 1887 he began medical studies in Moscow, where he became involved in the secret Lithuanian Student Association, headed by Petras Leonas. In 1888 Grinius, along with Vincas Kudirka and others, co-organized a conference of Lithuanian Democrats in Marijampole. He was arrested for the first time in 1889. After completing medical studies in Moscow in 1893, he worked as a doctor in the Russian fleet, and then he started a private practice in Marijampole. He took part in the underground Liberal Peasant Movement and co-founded the newspaper Varpas; in 1902 he was a co-author of the program of the Democratic Party of Lithuania. In 1905 the tsarist authorities forced him to go to Vilnius (Wilno), where he wrote for the local Lithuanian periodicals. He subsequently returned to Marijampole, where he organized the theater, took part in the work of the educational association Sviesa, and initiated many patriotic demonstrations. Arrested in 1906 and 1908, he was forced to go to Vilnius again. After his return to Marijampole in 1911, he organized the first agrarian exhibition in Lithuania.

During World War I Grinius was in Russia. In 1917 he was a member of the Lithuanian Council. During the Bolshevik revolution, in 1918 his wife, Joana, and his daughter, Gražina, were murdered in Kislovodsk. At the end of 1919 Grinius returned to Lithuania via Turkey and France, where he temporarily directed the repatriation of Lithuanians to their country. Elected an MP to the Lithuanian Constituent Assembly, he served as prime minister from 19 June 1920 to 1 February 1922. On 12 July 1920 he signed a peace treaty with Soviet Russia and proclaimed Lithuania’s neutrality in the Polish-Soviet conflict. He also signed the Suwałki agreement of 7 October 1920, concerning a demarcation line. After the Vilnius region had been seized by Polish units under the command of General Lucjan Żeligowski, Grinius asked the League of Nations to intervene. As a result, a special commission put an end to the Polish-Lithuanian struggle. In 1922 Grinius took charge of the health service in Kaunas. On 7 June 1926 he was elected president as a representative of the Populists (Laudininkai) and signed a treaty of non-aggression with the USSR on 28 September 1926. As an anti-clericalist, Grinius pursued a conciliatory policy toward the extreme leftist opposition, which consolidated the rightist camp.

Nationalist conspirators began a coup d’état on 17 December 1926, Grinius’s birthday, when many officers arrived in the capital to celebrate. As a result of the coup (led by Major Povilas Plechavičius), the leader of the Nationalists, Antanas Smetona, became head of state. Grinius accepted the resignation of the government of Mykolas Sleževičius and entrusted Augustinas Voldemaras with the mission of forming a new cabinet. Then he resigned on 19 December 1926. He returned to the municipality of Kaunas, where he served as head of the local health service. After the Soviet invasion of 1940, he avoided arrest. When in June 1941 the Germans invaded Lithuania, he supported national opposition, and therefore he was temporarily put under house arrest in Azoulu Buda. Before the return of the Red Army, in the summer of 1944 he went to Germany, where after the end of the war he found shelter in a refugee camp in Hanau. In 1947 he emigrated to the United States, where he lived in Philadelphia and Chicago. He represented the Lithuanian peasant activists in the International Peasant Union. He published Lithuania in a Post-War Europe as a Free and Independent State (1943) and the memoirs Atsiminimai ir mintys (Memoirs and Reflections) (vol. 1, 1947; vol. 2, 1962). His work on the coup d'état of 1926, Apie 1926 m. gruodžio 17-os dienos perversmą (The Coup of 17 December 1926), was published posthumously in 1954. (WR)

Sources: EL, vol. 2; Piotr Łossowski, Kraje bałtyckie na drodze od demokracji parlamentarnej do dyktatury 1918–1934 (Wrocław, 1972); Algirdas Banevicius, 111 Lietuvos valstybes 1918–1940 politikos veikeju (Vilnius, 1991); Liudas Truska, Algimantas Lileikis, Gediminas Ilgunas, and Rimgaudas Geleževičius, Lietuvos prezidentai (Vilnius, 1995); Alfonsas Eidintas and Vytautas Žalys, Lithuania in European Politics: The Years of the First Republic, 1918–1940 (New York, 1997); www.ktl.mii.lt/prezidentai.

GRĪNS Aleksandrs Jēkabs (15 August 1895, Biržu, Courland–25 December 1941, Astrakhan), Latvian writer. After graduating from a gymnasium in Cesis (1914), Grīns volunteered for the Russian Army in 1915. The same year he graduated from the Aleksei Cadet School in Moscow. From August 1916 he fought in the Fourth Latvian Regiment of Riflemen and was severely wounded in August 1917. Later, he described his experiences of that period in his novel Dvēseļu putenis (Blizzard of souls; 1932–34). Mobilized into the army of Soviet Latvia in April 1919, he deserted the next month and joined the Latvian army. From 1920 he was a captain. Between 1920 and 1924 he was the deputy editor of Latvijas Kareivis, a journal of the War Ministry. Transferred to the reserves in 1924, he worked on the editorial staffs of several magazines. In 1936–40 he returned to military service in the corps for the territorial defense of the country, and from 1939 he was an officer in the army staff. Grīns wrote plays, poetry, and historical novels. He was the author of (among other works) the trilogy Saderinātie

(Plights: 1938–40). After the seizure of Latvia by the USSR in September 1940 he was enlisted into the Red Army, and on 14 June 1941 he was arrested along with other Latvian officers. Deported to a prison in Astrakhan, he was executed by firing squad. (EJ/WR)

Sources: P. Ērmanis, Aleksandra Grīna dzīve: Grīns A. Kopotie raksti (Riga, 1939); Rolfs Ekmanis, Latvian Literature under the Soviets, 1940–1975 (Belmont, Mass., 1978); H. Hiršs, Vēl viena atgriešanās: Grīns A. Dvēseļu putenis (Riga, 1989); Romuald J. Misiunas and Rein Taagepera, The Baltic States: Years of Dependence, 1940–1980 (Berkeley, 1993); A. Bambals, “Orderis man paziņots . . .” Latvijas Arhīvi, 1997, no. 2.

GRIŠKEVIČIUS Petras (19 July 1924, Kriaunai–14 November 1987, Vilnius), Lithuanian Communist activist. After the Soviet invasion of Lithuania in June 1940 Griškevičius joined the Communist youth organization Komjaunimas, and during World War II he fought in the Soviet guerrilla movement in Lithuania. In 1945 he became a member of the Communist Party of Lithuania (CPL). From 1948 he worked in the Department of Propaganda of the CPL Central Committee (CC), and in 1956–64 he advanced in the Vilnius party organization, reaching the position of secretary. In 1964 he became head of the Organization Department of the CPL CC, and in 1971, head of the CPL Vilnius City Committee. After the death of the head of the Lithuanian party, Antanas Sniečkus, in 1974 Griškevičius became his successor as first secretary of the CPL CC. He was known as a colorless apparatchik, zealous in implementing the Kremlin’s policies and supporting all the decisions of Leonid Brezhnev and his aides, including those having to do with the Russification of Lithuania. He was hostile to the Catholic Church and religion, and he suppressed all hints of social discontent and the nuclei of the democratic opposition. Perestroika and glasnost catalyzed the national and democratic movements and undermined the determination of the party apparatus. In 1986 many writers from the Association of Writers of the Lithuanian SSR signed a petition defending the natural environment, threatened by the search for oil under the Baltic Sea bottom, and in November 1987 they elected new authorities supporting perestroika. Soon after that Griškevičius died of a heart attack. (WR)

Sources: Saulius Sužiedelis, Historical Dictionary of Lithuania (Lanham, Md., 1997); The International Who’s Who 1984/85 (Europa 1985); Alfred Erich Senn, Lithuania Awakening (Berkeley, 1990).

GROL Milan (31 August 1876, Belgrade–3 December 1952, Yugoslavia), Yugoslav writer and politician of Serb nationality. After graduating from the Department of Philosophy of Belgrade University in 1899, Grol studied literature in Paris. Later he returned to Serbia and worked in the National Theater in Belgrade, and between 1918 and 1924 he was its director. At the same time he wrote and published extensively. He was the author of, for example, Pozorišne kritike (Theater criticism; 1931) and Iz predratne Srbije (From prewar Serbia; 1939). From 1901 he belonged to leftist groups of the Serb intelligentsia, which stood in opposition to the regime of King Alexander Obrenović. After World War I he joined the Serbian Democratic Party (SDP), which advocated equal rights for the nations of Yugoslavia and a federal system of government. In 1929 he criticized the royal coup d'état. Between 1925 and 1927 he was an MP. He favored the Serbo-Croatian compromise of August 1939. In February 1940 he was elected president of the SDP. He supported the coup of 27 March 1941, and he joined the coalition government of General Dušan Simović. After the German invasion he along with the government went into exile.

As the result of an agreement in November 1944 between Josip Broz Tito and Ivan Šubašić, Grol joined the government dominated by the Communists as deputy prime minister. At first King Peter II wanted to name him one of his temporary regents, but Tito did not agree to that. After his arrival in Belgrade (February 1945), Grol was helpless in the face of the Communists' totalitarian methods of political struggle. Initially, he was allowed to publish the magazine Demokratija, but after six issues the Titoist authorities closed it down, despite the fact that Grol remained deputy prime minister. On 8 March 1945 he resigned his post, explaining to Tito that he could not perform his functions: the government met very seldom, and the most important decisions were made in the executive of the Communist Party, outside the government. Temporarily arrested, after his release Grol withdrew from political life. In 1990 his Londonski dnevnik, 1941–1945 (London diary, 1941–1945) was published in Belgrade. (WR) Sources: Enciklopedija Jugoslavije, vol. 3 (Zagreb, 1958); Constanin Fotitch, The War We Lost (New York, 1948); J. Jukic, The Fall of Yugoslavia (New York and London, 1974); Michał Jerzy Zacharias, Jugostawia w polityce Wielkiej Brytanii 1940–1945 (Wrocław, 1985).

GRONKIEWICZ-WALTZ Hanna (4 November 1952, Warsaw), Polish lawyer and political activist. Gronkiewicz-Waltz graduated in law with distinction from the University of Warsaw in 1975, and later she worked there, specializing in banking law, in particular the legal position of central banks. From 1980 she belonged to Solidarity. In 1982 she got involved with the Catholic Movement of Renewal in the Holy Spirit. In 1981 she received a Ph.D. and in 1993 a post-doctoral degree (habilitacja). She authored several dozen scholarly works. In 1989 she became a parliamentary expert in public law. In 1990–92 she was an associate professor at the Canon Law Department of the Academy of Catholic Theology (now the Cardinal Stefan Wyszyński University) in Warsaw. In 1991 she ran in the parliamentary elections on behalf of Victoria, the Lech Wałęsa committee. In 1992 she became adviser to the Supreme Council of Control. In March 1992 she was elected chairwoman of the National Bank of Poland (Narodowy Bank Polski [NBP]). During her term a banking reform was implemented in Poland. The Polish złoty was denominated, and its rate of exchange was made liquid in relation to hard currencies. In November 1995 Gronkiewicz-Waltz ran in the presidential elections on behalf of a group of small rightist parties, but she failed to get to the second round of the voting. In February 1998 she was reelected as NBP chairwoman. In 1998–2000 she also presided over the Council of Monetary Policy. She was rated among the best central bank chairpersons by the U.S. periodical Global Finance, and she was named the European Banker of 1998. In January 2001 she assumed the position of deputy chairperson of the European Bank of Reconstruction and Development in London. (IS)

Sources: Kto jest kim w Polsce (Warsaw, 2001); Wielka encyklopedia PWN, vol. 10 (Warsaw, 2002); Janusz A. Majcherek, Pierwsza dekada III Rzeczypospolitej (Warsaw, 1999); Antoni Dudek, Pierwsze lata III Rzeczypospolitej 1989–2001 (Kraków, 2002); Wojciech Roszkowski, Historia Polski 1914–2001 (Warsaw, 2002).

GRÓSZ József (9 December 1887, Féltorony [now in Austria]–3 October 1961, Kalocsa), archbishop and leader of the Hungarian Catholic Church. Grósz graduated from a Benedictine high school in Győr. After completing theological studies in the Vienna Pazmaneum in 1911, he took holy orders. He was sent to Farád and after a year to Oroszvár, where he worked as a vicar. From 1913 he worked in the bishop's chancellery in Győr. In 1914, he was appointed liturgist to the bishop, and in 1921, secretary to bishop Antal Fetsér. From 1924, he managed the bishop's chancellery. In December 1928, he was appointed auxiliary bishop of Győr, and in 1931 he was appointed canon. From 1933 he was the vicar of the chapter and subsequently chief vicar. From January 1936 he was the apostolic administrator of the Szombathely diocese. In July 1939 he was appointed diocesan bishop. As such, he became a member of the Upper Chamber of the parliament. In May 1943, he was appointed archbishop of Kalocsa; until March 1944 he was also in charge of the administration of the see in Szombathely. For most of the 1943–46 period, he was a member of the leadership of the Hungarian Academy of Sciences. After the death of Cardinal Jusztinián Serédi, from 25 March 1945 until the nomination of his successor, József Mindszenty, and then after his arrest, from February 1949 Grósz was the head of the Catholic Church in Hungary on the basis of an authorization issued by the Holy See. After Primate Mindszenty was arrested, the government urged Grósz to resign. Brutally pressed by the Communists, on 30 August 1950 he signed an agreement with the state on behalf of the Episcopate. The agreement, which was null and void in terms of canon law, guaranteed state control over the church, at the same permitting certain church activities. The majority of bishops still sought to retain independence. They refused to support the “peace priests” movement, organized by the Communist authorities, and declined to take an oath of loyalty to the Communist constitution. Moreover, they voiced their objections to the brutal abuses occurring in the denominational policies of the state.

In May 1951, Grósz was arrested and sentenced to fifteen years in prison on the fabricated charges of organizing activities aimed at the overthrow of the system. His trial, combined with another twenty-four cases, resulted in a total of fifteen death sentences. These verdicts were designed to intimidate the clergy and the faithful, as well as to facilitate the promotion of priests who obeyed the authorities. During Grósz’s trial, a number of bishops were kept under house arrest and forced to appoint the “peace priests” as vicars. Eventually, in July 1951 the Episcopate took an oath of loyalty to the Stalinist constitution. In October 1955, Grósz’s sentence was annulled, but he was still kept under house arrest. He was pardoned in May 1956 on the request of the Episcopate, and he was able to return to the position of archbishop. As chairman of the Episcopate for a second time, he collaborated with Communist authorities in order to secure conditions under which the Church could function. In 1957, a conference of bishops under his leadership joined a state-controlled peace movement of priests (which they had opposed before) and established its own peace committee, Opus Pacis. From 1957, Grósz was a board member of the National Front of the Patriotic People’s Front. On the occasion of his seventieth birthday, he was awarded the Order of the Flag of the Hungarian People’s Republic. In May 1990, the 1951 conviction was rendered invalid. (JT)

Sources: The Trial of József Grósz and His Accomplices (Budapest, 1951); Da Mindszenty a Grósz (Rome, 1952); Magyar Nagylexikon, vol. 8 (Budapest, 1999); A magyar forradalom és szabadságharc enciklopédiája (Budapest, 1999).

GRÓSZ Károly (1 August 1930, Miskolc–7 January 1996, Gödöllő), Hungarian Communist activist. Grósz’s father worked in a machine factory in Diósgyőr and in the 1930s was a member of the illegal Communist Party.

At first, Grósz did his apprenticeship in the same factory, and from the spring of 1945, in a printing house in Borsod. The same year he joined the Hungarian Communist Party. In 1948 he became the secretary of Borsod County’s National Union of Hungarian Youth, and he moved to Budapest. In 1950 he became a political worker of the Central Committee (CC) of the Hungarian Workers’ Party (HWP). Drafted into the army in 1950, he graduated from the Petőfi Military and Political Academy. He served as a political officer in Kaposvár and Marcali. In 1954 he completed his military service and became the head of the Agitation and Propaganda Department of the HWP’s party committee in Borsod County.

During the revolution of 1956 Grósz retained his posts. On 26 October 1956 he forbade journalists to write on current events, and on 28 October he removed the historical Hungarian emblem from the masthead of the newspaper Északmagyarország, which had been put there in place of the “Socialist” emblem of Rakosi. On 4 November Grósz became a member of the Revolutionary Council of Workers and Peasants and the head of the party organization of Borsod County. After the suppression of the revolution the authorities of the Hungarian Socialist Workers’ Party (HSWP) investigated Grósz’s activities during the October events and in December 1956 dismissed him from his posts. In 1958 he was in charge of publishing the newspaper Északmagyarország. Between 1959 and 1961 he attended the Higher Party School. After completing his studies at the school, Grósz started work in the CC Propaganda and Political Departments. In 1962 he was secretary of the party committee of Hungarian Radio and Television. From 1968 he was deputy head of the Agitation and Propaganda Department of the CC. From 1970 he was a member of the editorial team of the party paper, Pártélet. In 1973 he became the first secretary of the party committee of Fejér County, and in 1974, head of the Agitation and Propaganda Department of the CC of the HSWP. From 1979 he was the first secretary of the party committee of Borsod County.

In 1980–89 Grósz was a member of the CC of the HSWP, and from 1985 to 1989, a member of the Politburo. From 1984 he was the first secretary of the party committee in Budapest. On 25 June 1987 he became prime minister and held the post until 23 November 1988. In May 1988 he was elected first secretary of the HSWP, in place of János Kádár. However, between June and October 1989 the party was actually ruled by a quadrumvirate, in which Grósz did not have full power. He did not approve of the transformation of the HSWP into the Hungarian Socialist Party (HSP) and did not join the HSP. From December 1989 Grósz was a member of the CC of the splinter group that continued to function under the name of the HSWP. (JT)

Sources: Bennet Kovrig, Communism in Hungary from Kun to Kádár (Stanford, 1979); Miklós Molnár, From Béla Kun to János Kádár: Seventy Years of Hungarian Communism (New York, 1990); Magyar Nagylexikon, vol. 8 (Budapest, 1999); A magyar forradalom és szabadságharc enciklopédiája, CD-ROM (Budapest, 1999).

GROSZKOWSKI Janusz (21 March 1898, Warsaw–3 August 1984, Warsaw), Polish electronics and radio engineer. Between 1915 and 1919 Groszkowski studied at the Warsaw Polytechnic (WP). From 1918 to 1921 he served in the Polish Army, attaining the rank of captain in the corps of sappers. In 1922 he graduated from the Officers' School of Communications in Paris, and then he was hired as a lecturer at the WP, becoming an assistant professor in 1929. From 1929 to 1939 he served as the director of the Radio Technical Institute, and from 1933, the State Institute for Telecommunications. In 1934 he became a corresponding member, and the following year a regular member, of the Academy of Technical Sciences. Between 1926 and 1938 he belonged to the Freemasonic Grand National Lodge. During the Nazi occupation, Groszkowski was assigned by the Office of the Government Delegate for the Homeland and the intelligence services of the Union of Armed Struggle–Home Army to crack the Nazi V1 and V2 rocket systems. The fruit of his investigations and the parts of the rockets captured by the Polish underground were passed on to London. Between 1945 and 1946 Groszkowski worked at the Łódź Polytechnic but later returned to the WP. Between 1953 and 1963 he was also employed at the Institute of Basic Technical Problems. In 1949 he became a member of the Warsaw Scientific Society, and in 1953, the Polish Academy of Sciences (PAS). Between January 1963 and December 1971 he was the PAS chairman. He also served as deputy chairman (June 1968–June 1971) and chairman (June 1971–February 1976) of the All-Polish Committee of the Front of National Unity. Between 1972 and 1976 he was a deputy in the parliament, and from March 1972 through March 1976 he was deputy chairman of the Council of State. (WR)

Sources: Mołdawa; Ludwik Hass, Masoneria polska XX wieku (Warsaw, 1996).

GROTOWSKI Jerzy (11 August 1933, Rzeszów–14 January 1999, Pontedera, near Pisa, Italy), Polish director, theater reformer, and theoretician. Grotowski studied acting (1951–55) and directing (1956–60) at the Higher State Theatrical School in Kraków. In 1955 and 1956, he also studied directing at the State Institute for Theatrical Art in Moscow. In 1959 in Opole he founded the Theater of 13 Rows (later called Laboratorium). He moved his theater to Wrocław and continued as its supervisor until 1984. His was a “participatory theater,” where the emotional interaction between an actor and the audience was more important than the script. At the end of his life, Grotowski concentrated on theoretical and pedagogical work. He was internationally recognized as an innovator who changed the face of contemporary theater. He was greatly influenced by the Romantic output of Adam Mickiewicz. He authored a popular manifesto, Ku teatrowi ubogiemu (Toward a poor theater; 1968). Contending with frail health all his life and concentrating on his work, Grotowski was dubbed “the Magician of the Theater.” He preferred the reductionist mode of expression (empty sets and no seats for the audience). He was fascinated by Hindu mysticism (in 1970 he spent a few months in India) and Christian anthropology, even though his Apocalypsis cum figuris (1968) was criticized by the Catholic Church. From 1978 to 1982 Grotowski traveled extensively, studying the rituals of human behavior. After the imposition of martial law in Poland, he left for the United States in August 1982, and in 1986 he settled in Pontedera, Italy. In cooperation with the University of California and the Peter Brook Center, he created a theatrical group there, realizing his own artistic and research program. He received numerous honorary doctorates. The Chair of Theater Anthropology was established especially for him at the Collège de France. Considered the greatest reformer of European theater at the end of the twentieth century, he visited Poland several times in the 1990s; his last trip was in 1997.

Grotowski's creative career can be divided into four periods. First, it was performance theater (1957–69), when he staged plays based upon his own scripts of George Byron's Cain (1960); Adam Mickiewicz's Dziady (Forefathers' Eve; 1961); Stanisław Wyspiański's Akropolis (1962); Juliusz Słowacki's Książę niezłomny (Prince Valiant; 1965), based upon Don Pedro Calderón de la Barca; and Apocalypsis cum figuris (1968), and when he started implementing the idea of “a poor theater.” Second was the period of “participatory theater” (1969–78), when Grotowski conducted paratheatrical experiments combined with research on various forms of human expression; this period includes Uniwersytet Poszukiwań Teatru Narodów (The University in search of a theater of nations; 1975); Przedsięwzięcie Góra (The mountain undertaking; 1977); and Drzewo ludzi (The tree of humans; 1979). Third, Grotowski introduced the theater of sources (1976–82), which was a period of transcultural research and experimentation carried out in an international group. Fourth, Grotowski supervised the Ritual Arts (from 1983); this period included his time in California (1983–85) and Italy (1985–99). (JS)

Sources: Wielka encyklopedia PWN, vol. 10 (Warsaw, 2002); Tadeusz Burzyński and Zbigniew Osieński, Grotowski's Laboratory (Warsaw, 1979); Timothy J. Wiles, The Theater Event: Modern Theories of Performance (Chicago, 1980); Jennifer Kumiega, The Theatre of Grotowski (London, 1985); The Grotowski Sourcebook (London, 1997); Zbigniew Osieński, Grotowski: Źródła, inspiracje, konteksty (Gdańsk, 1998); Józef Kelera, Grotowski wielokrotnie (Wrocław, 1999); Stephan Wangh, An Acrobat of the Heart (New York, 2000); www.teatry.art.pl/inne/grotowski/.

GROZA Petru (7 December 1884, Bačia, near Hunedoary–7 January 1958, Bucharest), Romanian Peasant Party activist, cooperator with the Communists in their takeover. Groza came from the petty bourgeoisie. After completing studies in a Protestant school in Szászváros, he studied law at the universities in Budapest, Berlin, and Leipzig and received a Ph.D. In 1921–22 and 1926–27 he was in the Peasant Party governments. In 1927 he left the Peasant Party of Ion Mihalache after serious financial corruption had been revealed. In 1933 he founded the leftist Peasant Ploughmen's Front, linked with the Communist underground. During World War II Groza grew rich after taking over confiscated Jewish properties. In the fall of 1943 his organization entered into an agreement with the Communists and Socialists in the Patriotic Anti-Fascist Front. Temporarily arrested by the regime of Ion Antonescu, after Antonescu's overthrow Groza became deputy prime minister in the second government of General Constantin Sănătescu in November 1944. He remained in this post in the next cabinet of General Nicolae Rădescu.

The crisis caused by the Communists in February 1945 and the resignation of Rădescu's government caused great tension. As a result of a Soviet ultimatum presented unceremoniously to King Michael I by the Soviet deputy minister for foreign affairs, Andrei Vyshinsky, Groza was assigned the mission of forming a government. Although the leaders of the Peasant Party (Iuliu Maniu) and Liberal Party (Dinu Brătianu) demanded the majority in the government, Groza manipulated its membership in such a way that it gave the Communists full control over the country. On 6 March 1945 Groza became prime minister. He endorsed all the moves of the Communists: a bloody suppression of high-ranking officials of the Antonescu regime and the liquidation of the democratic opposition, mainly the National Peasant Party; these meant the death of thousands of people. On 30 December 1947, along with the head of the Communist Party, Gheorghe Gheorghiu-Dej, Groza submitted a demand to King Michael to abdicate. On 4 February 1948 he signed a treaty of "friendship" in Moscow that subjected Romania to the USSR. He also accepted the constitution of 13 April 1948 and a policy of rapid industrialization and brutal collectivization, as a result of which thousands of peasants were murdered. On 2 June 1952, when Gheorghiu-Dej became prime minister, Groza was appointed president of the Grand National Assembly. In 1955 he had a heart attack that removed him from active political life, but until his death he formally remained the head of the parliament of Communist Romania. Groza was a cynic and sybarite who frenziedly amassed material goods. (WR) Sources: Arthur Gould Lee, Crown against Sickle: The Story of King Michael of Romania (London, 1950); Ghita Ionescu, Communism in Rumania, 1944–1962 (Oxford, 1964); Andrzej Koryn, Rumunia w polityce wielkich mocarstw 1944–1947 (Wrocław, 1983); Josif Toma Popescu, Świadectwo (Warsaw, 1996); Dennis Deletant, Communist Terror in Romania: Gheorghiu-Dej and the Police State, 1948–1965 (New York, 1999).

GRUDZIEŃ Zdzisław (6 October 1924, Escaudain, France–30 January 1982, Warsaw), Polish Communist activist. The son of a coal miner who emigrated to France, Grudzień himself worked as a coal miner in France and Belgium. In 1941 he joined the French Communist Party and became active in the Communist resistance against the Nazis. In 1946, he returned to Poland and joined the (Communist) Polish Workers' Party. From December 1948 he was active in the (Communist) Polish United Workers' Party (PUWP) and became a functionary of the Union of Youth Struggle and then the Union of Polish Youth (UPY). At the Second UPY Congress in 1955 Grudzień was coopted to its presiding body, along with Jan Szydlak and Stanisław Kania. In 1957 he graduated from the Academy of Mining and Metallurgy. He was one of the closest collaborators of Edward Gierek, who facilitated his ascent in the party hierarchy. In 1957 Grudzień became secretary of the PUWP Provincial Committee in Katowice. Between 1965 and 1981 he was a parliamentary deputy, where he served as, among other things, chairman of the national defense commission. After Gierek became first secretary of the PUWP Central Committee (CC) in December 1970, Grudzień was promoted to his sponsor's post of first secretary of the PUWP Provincial Committee in Katowice. At the Sixth PUWP Congress in December 1971 he became a deputy member, and later a member, of the Politburo (December 1975–October 1980). Between 1973 and 1980 he also served as the chairman of the Provincial National Council in Katowice. He used the construction of the Katowice Steel Works as the symbol of the Communist "propaganda of success." Grudzień was stripped of all of his party and government posts following the purge of Gierek at the Sixth Plenum of the PUWP CC on 6 September 1980. In June 1981 he was expelled from the PUWP, and in July 1981 he gave up his parliamentary seat. (PK)

Sources: Mołdawa; Słownik polityków polskich XX wieku (Poznań, 1998); Antoni Czubiński, Dzieje najnowsze Polski 1944–1989 (Poznań, 1992).

GRUEV Damian (Dame) (January 1871, Smilevo, near Bitola–10 December 1906, Rusinovo, near Maleševo), Macedonian revolutionary activist. In 1889–91 Gruev studied history in Belgrade and Sofia, where he got in touch with Macedonian freedom fighters. Expelled from the university and arrested on account of his alleged participation in the assassination of Minister Khristo Belchev in 1891, after his release he left for Macedonia under Turkish rule. From 1899 he worked as a teacher in Salonika, Smilevo, Shtip, and Prilep. In 1893 he tried to establish a Macedonian revolutionary committee in Bitola, similar to the one existing in Bulgaria, but he failed. In November 1893, at a meeting in Salonika, he was among the founders of the Internal Macedonian Revolutionary Organization (Vnatrešna Makedonska Revolucionerna Organizacija [IMRO]), and he became its secretary. Along with Goce Delchev, Gruev created a network of Macedonian revolutionary conspiracy. In 1900 he was arrested and sent deep into Asia Minor. He returned home in early 1903, on the eve of an anti-Turkish uprising. During a Bitola insurrection committee meeting in Smilevo on 2–7 May 1903, Gruev expressed skepticism as to the chances of the uprising, but he joined the closed circle of its leadership and took part in the final stages of its preparation. After its outbreak on 2 August 1903, St. Elijah Day (thence the name Illinden Uprising), he fought in several battles against the Turkish troops. After the uprising was suppressed, Gruev remained in the country and restructured the IMRO organization. During the Macedonian Congress in the Rila Monastery in 1906 Gruev joined the IMRO Central Committee and was one of its top leaders. After the organization split, he supported the IMRO left against its pro-Bulgarian wing. Gruev was killed in a skirmish with Turkish troops. (WR) Sources: Entsiklopediya Bulgariya, vol. 2 (Sofia, 1981); Gane Todorovski, Dame Gruev (Skopje, 1968); Duncan M. Perry, The Politics of Terror: The Macedonian Liberation Movements, 1893–1903 (Durham, N.C., 1988); Dušan Konstantinov, Damjan Gruev: Diplomat, Strateg i državnik (Skopje, 1993); Raymond Detrez, Historical Dictionary of Bulgaria (Lanham, Md., 1997); Irena Stawowy-Kawka, Historia Macedonii (Wrocław, 2000); www.vmro-istorija.com.mk/Foto/Dame.g.htm.

GRUJIĆ Sava (25 November 1840, Kolari, near Smerdev–21 October 1913, Belgrade), Serb politician. In 1861 Grujić graduated from the School of Artillery in Serbia, and then he studied in military academies in Prussia (1861–63) and Russia (1864–70). From June 1876 he commanded the Serbian artillery in the war against Turkey. He advanced to the rank of colonel, and in October 1876 he became minister of war. He carried out a reform of the military and stayed in office until the end of the war with Turkey in 1878. Later he worked in diplomacy. In 1879 he was the Serbian envoy to Bulgaria, in 1882 to Greece, and from 1885 to Russia. In 1887 he was promoted to the rank of general. From June to December 1887 he was minister of the armed forces, and then, until April 1888, prime minister. He was one of the leaders of the Radical Party. From February 1889 to February 1891 he was prime minister again, combining this position with that of foreign minister, and from March 1890 he was minister of the armed forces. From 1891 to 1893 he was the Serbian envoy to Istanbul. From June to November 1893 he was minister of the armed forces again, and then, until January 1894, prime minister, minister of war, and foreign minister. From 1897 to 1899 he was envoy to Russia, and from 1900 to 1903, envoy to Turkey. After the coup of May 1903, when a group of officers assassinated King Alexander Obrenović and helped Peter Karadjordjević ascend the throne, Grujić became head of the Council of State (June 1903). On 21 November 1903 he became prime minister again and stayed in power until 27 November 1904. Later he was prime minister and minister of war again from 1 March 1906 to 17 April 1906. From 1906 to 1910 he presided over the Council of State. He authored many works, including Vojna organizacija Srbije (The military organization of Serbia; 1874) and Osnovi vojnog uredzjenja kneževine Bugarske (Foundations of the military structure of the principality of Bulgaria; 1880). (AO)

Sources: Enciklopedija Jugoslavije, vol. 3 (Zagreb, 1958); Michael Petrovic, A History of Modern Serbia, 1804–1918, vol. 2 (New York, 1976); www.mfa.gov.yu/History/ministri/SGrujic_s.html.

GRÜNBAUM Icchak (24 November 1879, Warsaw–1970, Gan Shemuel, Israel), Zionist politician in Poland. Grünbaum spent his childhood in Płońsk, where he joined the Zionist movement in 1898. He participated in the Zionist Congress in Basel in 1905. During the congress in Helsinki in 1906, he advocated Gegenwartsarbeit, or working for Jewish rights in individual states. In 1908 he became secretary general of the Central Committee of the Zionists of Russia in Vilnius (Wilno). He was arrested on numerous occasions by the Russian authorities. He graduated from the law school at the University of Warsaw and worked as a litigator. In 1914, he launched the journal Dos Yidische Folk in Warsaw. Following the outbreak of World War I, Grünbaum was evacuated to Russia. From 1915 to 1917 he published the Petrograder Togblat in St. Petersburg. In 1918 he returned to Poland, where he unveiled a plan of cultural and national autonomy for the Polish Jews. He was elected MP to the Constitutional Assembly in January 1919, and he was a member of its Constitutional Commission. He was consistently reelected in 1922, 1928, and 1930. In 1922 he initiated and co-organized the National Minorities Bloc in the parliament, which led to altercations within the Zionist movement. He opposed the Polish-Jewish agreement of 1924. He spoke critically about the Polish state on numerous occasions. He competed for power within the Zionist movement with Leon Reich. After the coup d'état of May 1926, Grünbaum opposed the sanacja regime. He co-founded the Tarbut movement to promote the use of Hebrew by Polish Jews. In the early 1920s he became the editor-in-chief of Hajnt.

In 1932 Grünbaum left for France, and then he settled in Palestine, where he was elected a member of the executive board of the Jewish Agency. He also supervised the Committee to Rescue Polish Jews. In 1946 he was arrested by the British. Upon his release, he became a signatory to the act of Israeli independence. Between May 1948 and February 1949 he served as the minister for internal affairs in the first government of Israel. He organized the first parliamentary elections, but upon the defeat of his Zionist party he withdrew from public life and concentrated on academic pursuits. Two of his children were active in the Communist movement. Among other works, Grünbaum published the Encyclopedia of the Jewish Diaspora. (WR) Sources: Who's Who in Israel, 1968 (Tel Aviv, 1968); Encyclopedia Judaica, vol. 7 (Jerusalem, 1971); New Encyclopedia of Zionism and Israel, vol. 1 (New York, 1994); Postowie i senatorowie Rzeczypospolitej Polskiej 1919–1939: Słownik biograficzny, vol. 1 (Warsaw, 1998); J. Marcus, Social and Political History of Jews in Poland, 1919–1939 (New York, 1983); R. Prister, Without Compromise: Yitzhak Gruenbaum, Zionist Leader and Polish Patriot (N.p., 1987).

GRYDZEWSKI Mieczysław [originally Grützhändler] (27 December 1894, Warsaw–9 January 1970, London), Polish journalist and editor. During law studies in Moscow and Warsaw Grydzewski worked with the periodical Pro Arte et Studio, and in 1918–19 he was its editor-in-chief. After graduation he worked on the editorial staff of the Warsaw daily Kurier Polski. During the Polish-Soviet war of 1919–21 he volunteered to work in the Press Office of the High Command. In 1922 he received a Ph.D. in history. From 1920 to 1928 and from 1935 to 1939 he was editor-in-chief of the poetry periodical Skamander. He also co-founded and was editor-in-chief of Wiadomości Literackie (1922–39) and La Pologne Littéraire (1926–36). In 1931–32 he wrote the “Foreign Chronicle” column in the periodical Kultura. In September 1939 he left for France and then moved to London in 1940. In 1939–44 he edited Wiadomości Polskie, Polityczne i Literackie, closed down by the British authorities in 1944. In 1944–46 he wrote reviews of English books on Poland for Polish émigré periodicals. From 1946 to 1966 he was publisher and editor-in-chief of Wiadomości, the leading periodical of the Polish political émigrés in London. He signed his columns “Silva Rerum.” On the basis of the results of a questionnaire in Wiadomości in 1957, which aimed at ranking Polish writers abroad, Grydzewski established the Academy of Literature and an annual award for the best book published in exile and the best work published in his periodical. These awards were granted until 1990. Grydzewski authored (among other works) the following: Kalejdoskop warszawski (The Warsaw kaleidoscope; 1945); Niezlomni (The unshaken; 1946); and Listy do Tuwima i Lechońa, 1940–43 (Letters to Tuwim and Lechoń, 1940–1943; 1986). He edited and published the anthologies Kraj lat dziecińczych (The homeland of the childhood years; 1942 and 1987) and Wiersze polskie wybrane (Selected Polish poems; 1946). He also edited the book series Biblioteka wczoraj i dziś (The library of yesterday and today) and Biblioteka Ziemi Naszej (The library of our land). (JS)

Sources: Współcześni polscy pisarze i badacze literatury: Słownik bibliograficzny, vol. 3 (Warsaw, 1994); Rafał Habielski, Niezlomni, nieprzejednani: Emigracyjne “Wiadomości” i ich krąg 1940–1981 (Warsaw, 1991); Adam Supruniuk, ed., “Wiadomości” i okolice: Szkice i wspomnienia, vols. 1–2 (Toruń, 1995–96); Leksykon kultury polskiej poza krajem od roku 1939, vol. 1 (Lublin, 2000).

GRZEŚKOWIAK Alicja (10 June 1941, Świrz), Polish lawyer and political activist. In 1963 Grzeškowiak graduated in law from the Department of Law and Administration of Nicholas Copernicus University in Toruń. In 1971 she received a Ph.D. and in 1978 a postdoctoral degree (habilitacja); in 1990 she became a professor of criminal law. In 1969 she qualified to be a judge. From 1966 to 1996 she worked at Toruń University and from 1990 at the Catholic University of Lublin. In 1968–85 she belonged to the Communist-controlled Democratic Party, and from 1980, to Solidarity. In the 1980s she participated in several citizen initiatives, including the Association against the Death Penalty and the Polish Helsinki Committee. From 1988 she also practiced as a lawyer. In June 1989 she was elected to the Senate. She chaired its constitutional commission and headed the Polish delegation to the European Parliamentary Assembly. She was elected to the Senate in 1991, 1993, and 1997. In 1991–93 she was deputy speaker, and in 1997–2001 she was speaker of the Senate. From 1992 she was a member of the Administrative Council of the John Paul II Foundation in Rome, and from 1993, a consultant to the Pontifical Council for the Family. She was awarded the pontifical order Pro Ecclesia et Pontifice. She is Dame of the Order of the fratres Cruciferi Dominici Sepulchri Hierosolymitani. Among other works she has authored Kara śmierci w polskim prawie karnym (The death penalty in Polish criminal law; 1978); Zagadnienie prawnokarnej ochrony dziecka poczętego w pracach Sejmu i Senatu Rzeczypospolitej Polskiej w latach 1990–91 (The question of legal protection of the fetus in the proceedings of the Assembly and Senate, 1990–91; 1994); and W trosce o rodzinę (Taking care of the family; 1996). (IS)

Sources: Kto jest kim w Polsce (Warsaw, 2001); Wielka encyklopedia PWN, vol. 10 (Warsaw, 2002); Antoni Dudek, Pierwsze lata III Rzeczypospolitej 1989–2001 (Kraków, 2002).

GUCWA Stanisław (18 April 1919, Przybysławice, near Brzesko–14 August 1994, Warsaw), Polish Communist peasant activist. Before World War II Gucwa was active in the Beacon's Fire Union of Rural Youth of the Polish Republic (Związku Młodzieży Wiejskiej Rzeczypospolitej Polskiej "Wici"). During the war he belonged to the Peasant Battalions; from 1945 he was a member of the Communist-controlled Peasant Party (Stronnictwo Ludowe), and from 1949, the United Peasant Party (Zjednoczone Stronnictwo Ludowe [ZSL]). Later he advanced in the economic administration. In 1956–57 he worked in the Ministry of State Purchasing; in 1957–69 he was deputy minister of agriculture, and from 1969 to 1971, minister of the food-processing industry and state purchasing. From 1961 to 1989 he was an MP. Gucwa climbed the ZSL apparatus all the way up, always strictly following the directives of the ruling (Communist) Polish United Workers' Party. In 1959–84 he was a member of the ZSL Chief Committee (CC), and in February 1971 he took over the position of chairman of the ZSL CC, succeeding Czesław Wycech and proclaiming a renewal of the party, a task in which he failed altogether. In 1971–72 he was deputy chairman of the Council of State, and from 1971 to 1985, speaker of the Assembly. Gucwa symbolized the submission of the parliament to the Communist Party. In the Solidarity era, after Stefan Ignar was elected head of the ZSL in May 1981, Gucwa lost his top position in the party, and he was slowly dropped from the top state positions. (PK)

Sources: Mołdawa; Słownik polityków polskich XX w. (Poznań, 1998); Michał Czajka and Marcin Kamler, Leksykon Historii Polski (Warsaw, 1995); VII Kongres Zjednoczonego Stronnictwa Ludowego (Warsaw, 1976).

GURAKUQI Luigji (20 February 1879, Shkodër–2 March 1925, Bari), Albanian politician, diplomat, and journalist. Gurakuqi was educated in a school run by the Italians in Shkodër. Because of his exceptional abilities, he was sent to San Demetrio School in Calabria, where he continued his education under the direction of outstanding representatives of the Albanian diaspora in Italy. He attended the Albania national activist congress in Monastir in 1908 at which the latin alphabet was adopted for the Albanian language. In 1909 he was appointed director of the pedagogical school in Elbasan, the first institution on Albanian soil that educated teachers. In 1910–11 he took part in an anti-Turkish insurrection, at first in Kosovo and then in the region of Malesia e Madhe. He represented Shkodër at a congress in Vlorë (November–December 1912), and he was one of the closest associates of Ismail Kemali. In the provisional government that was formed in December 1912, Gurakuqi assumed the post of minister of education. After the seizure of Shkodër by Montenegro (1914), he was interned in Cetinje. During the Austro-Hungarian occupation, he founded new schools in the region of Shkodër. When Albania regained independence, in January 1920 Gurakuqi assumed the Ministry of Education. In 1921–24 he was a deputy to the parliament, representing the district of Shkodër. He directed the political weekly Ora e Maleve, which was edited in Shkodër. During the revolution of 1924 he was a close associate of Fan Noli, served as finance minister in his government, and sought international recognition for the new cabinet. After the fall of Noli's government Gurakuqi went into exile in Italy. An active opponent of Ahmed Zogu, he was shot by one of Zogu's agents in Bari. In 2000, at the seventy-fifth anniversary of Gurakuqi's death, a monument to him was unveiled in Bari. His publications include Vargimi ne gjuhen shqipe (Foundations of the Albanian language; 1906). (TC)

Sources: Biographisches Lexikon, vol. 2; Selenica Teki, Shqipria me 1927 (Tirana, 1928); Piro Tako, Luigj Gurakuqi, jeta dhe vepra (Tirana, 1980); Vllamasi Sejfi, Ballafaqime politike ne Shqiperi (1897–1942) (Tirana, 1995).

GUZEVIČIUS-GUDAITIS Aleksandras (12 May 1908, Moscow–18 April 1969, Vilnius), Lithuanian Communist activist and writer. From his youth Guzevičius-Gudaitis acted in the underground Communist Party of Lithuania (CPL). In 1928 he was sent to Germany, where he edited a Lithuanian paper. After two years of work for the Communist International (1929–31) he returned to Lithuania. Almost immediately arrested, he spent the years 1931–38 in prison. After the Red Army occupied Lithuania in mid-June 1940, he became co-organizer of the apparatus of Communist terror and deputy minister of interior in the government of the Lithuanian SSR. He played a key role in the organization and execution of mass arrests and the deportation of thousands of Lithuanians during the first Soviet occupation (1940–41). Among others, on 28

November 1940 he signed a deportation instruction in which he broadly defined various categories of “enemies of the people.” Therefore he was directly responsible for the genocidal actions that followed. Until June 1941 about twenty-eight thousand people were deported from Lithuania. After three years spent in the USSR, in the summer of 1944 Guzevičius-Gudaitis returned as minister of state security to continue the same activities, ruthlessly persecuting Lithuanian and Polish freedom fighters. He was a member of the Central Committee (CC) of the CPL from 1940. In 1949 he temporarily fell out of favor, but in 1952 he returned to the CPL CC. In 1953–56 he was minister of culture of the Lithuanian SSR and deputy to the republican Supreme Council. His widely publicized literary works were just typical Socialist realist propaganda. For example, in the two volumes of Kalvio Ignoto teisybė (The truth about Ignoto the locksmith; 1948–49) he tried to create a legend about the Communist movement in Lithuania. (WR)

Sources: EL, vol. 2; Joseph Paujaujis-Javis, Soviet Genocide in Lithuania (New York, 1980).

GWIAZDA Andrzej (14 April 1935, Pińczów), Polish social activist. Gwiazda graduated from the Gdańsk Polytechnic in 1966. Until 1973 he worked there as an assistant professor, and then he was employed in the Elmor Company. In 1976 he sent a letter to the Assembly supporting the demands of the Committee for the Defense of Workers (Komitet Obrony Robotników [KOR]) that the Communist authorities release participants of the June 1976 protests and allow those who had been fired to return to work. On

29 April 1978 he was one of the three members of the Founding Committee of the Free Trade Unions (Wolne Związki Zawodowe [WZZ]) in Gdańsk. Later he was also editor of its periodical, Robotnik Wybrzeża. Gwiazda was arrested many times for forty-eight-hour periods. In August 1980 he belonged to the Inter-Factory Strike Committee in Gdańsk. From September 1980 to July 1981 he was deputy chairman of the Inter-Factory Founding Committee of Solidarity’s Gdańsk Region and then a member of the union’s Gdańsk Regional Board. From February to September 1981 he was deputy chairman of the National Coordination Commission of Solidarity. Gwiazda gradually came to oppose Lech Wałęsa, attracting more radical activists of the Gdańsk WZZ from before 1980. In September 1981 he was a delegate to the First Congress of Solidarity. He was elected to its National Commission, but he lost the election for chairman to Wałęsa. Upon the introduction of martial law, on 13 December 1981 Gwiazda was interned, and in 1982 he was arrested. Amnestied in 1984, he was active in the underground Solidarity in opposition to Wałęsa. In 1987 he co-founded the so-called Working Group, demanding that the National Commission elected in 1981 be convened. He opposed the Round Table Talks. After the breakup of the Working Group, in 1990 Gwiazda tried to organize free trade unions in opposition to Solidarity, but he failed. (AF)

Sources: Jerzy Holzer, “Solidarność” (Warsaw, 1983); Jerzy Holzer and Krzysztof Leski, “Solidarność” w podziemiu (Łódź, 1990); Jan Skórzyński, Ugoda i rewolucja: Władza i opozycja 1985–1989 (Warsaw, 1995); Opozycja w PRL: Słownik biograficzny 1956–89 (Warsaw, 2000).

H

HABRMAN Gustáv (24 January 1864, Česká Třebová–22 March 1932, Prague), Czech journalist and Social Democratic politician. Habrman came from a poor working-class family. At seventeen he left for Vienna, where he learned the trade of a wood-carver and a turner. It was there that he was introduced to Socialist thought, and he became active in the Czech workers' movement. In 1884 he was arrested and sentenced to three years of prison for his activities. After his release he emigrated to France and then to the United States, where he spent eight years, acting in the workers' movement. After his return to Bohemia, he edited the Brno magazine Rovnost from 1897. In 1901 he moved to Plzen, where he became editor-in-chief of Nova doba and the leader of local Social Democracy. In 1907, as a representative of Social Democracy, he was elected to the Viennese parliament, in which he sat until the collapse of Austria-Hungary.

After the outbreak of World War I Habrman took a stand against Austria-Hungary, opposing the Social Democratic faction of Bohumír Šmeral. In 1915 he left for Switzerland, where he started working with Tomáš Garrigue Masaryk, becoming a member of the "Mafia," a committee established to coordinate activities with the emigrant community. In 1917 he attended the international conference of Socialists in Stockholm, where he advocated the formation of an independent Czechoslovakia. In July 1918 he became a member of the National Committee, and in October in Geneva he took part in the negotiations on the creation of the state. After his return to Bohemia, he became a member of the Revolutionary National Assembly (provisional parliament) and minister of schools and education in the first government of Karel Kramář. He held this post until 1920, and in 1921–25 he was minister for social affairs. After the electoral defeat of the Social Democrats in 1925 Habrman left the government, became a senator, and held the post until his death. In 1924 he published Z mého života vzpomínky (The memoirs of my life). (PU)

Sources: ČBS; Kto bol kto za I. ČSR (Bratislava, 1993); Kdo byl kdo v našich dějinách ve 20. století, vol. 1 (Prague, 1998); Politická elita meziválečného Československa 1918–1938: Kdo byl kdo za první republiky (Prague, 1998).

HÁCHA Emil (12 July 1872, Trhové Sviny, district of České Budějovice–27 June 1945, Prague), lawyer and politician, president of Czechoslovakia and of the Protectorate of Bohemia and Moravia. Born into the family of a fiscal clerk, after graduating from high school in České Budějovice, in 1895 Hácha graduated in law from the Czech University in Prague. After doing a legal internship as a trainee from 1895 to 1898, he started working as a clerk in a Bohemian district council. He also worked as a legal counselor of the Supreme Administrative Tribunal in Vienna. During World War I he cooperated with Ferdinand Pantůček, who was active in a secret committee that was later called the "Mafia" (Maffie). After the war Pantůček was appointed president of the Supreme Administrative Court (SAC), and Hácha became a member of the SAC. In 1925 Hácha assumed the post of president of the SAC. In 1920 he became a docent (associate professor) at Charles University. In his academic work he mainly dealt with English public law. He was the author of O správním soudnictví v Anglii (On the administrative judiciary system in England; 1913) and other works and a contributor to Slovník československého práva veřejného (The dictionary of Czechoslovak public law, 4 vols.; 1929–38). He was also a literary scholar and a translator of English fiction. A recognized professional, Hácha was a judge of The Hague Tribunal and a member of the legislative council of the Czechoslovak government.

On 30 November 1938, following the Pact of Munich; the resignation of President Edvard Beneš; the passage of a law on the autonomy of Slovakia and Subcarpathian Ruthenia and the change of the name of the state to Czechoslovakia; and given the reluctance of other politicians to assume the leadership of the state, Hácha became president of the Second Republic. In December 1938, on a visit to Slovakia, he was assured by Father Jozef Tiso that autonomy was the highest aspiration of the Slovaks. On 14 March 1939 he went with František Chvalkovský to Berlin, where he conducted negotiations with Adolf Hitler. After Slovak independence was hurriedly declared that very day under German pressure, the unified Czech and Slovak state ceased to exist. A day later, before dawn, blackmailed by Hitler and Hermann Göring, who threatened to bomb Prague, Hácha agreed to the incorporation of Czech territories into the Third Reich, accepted the creation of the Protectorate of Bohemia and Moravia, and assumed the post of president of the Protectorate.

During the first two years of the Protectorate, while showing loyalty to the Germans, Hácha also tried to maintain a minimum of autonomy. He was supported in his efforts by a group of his associates led by Jiří Havelka. In October 1939 Hácha refused to swear allegiance to Hitler. He also intervened on behalf of prisoners and protested against the Germanization of the Protectorate of Bohemia and Moravia. He also objected to the enactment of anti-Jewish laws, and after they were introduced by Konstantin von Neurath, Hácha tried to minimize the number of people affected by such laws. With Prime Minister Alois Eliáš, Hácha maintained contact both with the national and foreign resistance movement and with President Beneš in London. A breakthrough came after Reinhard Heydrich's appointment as Reich protector of Bohemia and Moravia, the arrest and execution of Eliáš, and the imprisonment of Havelka. Hácha succeeded in the difficult task of saving Havelka's life, but he did so at the price of significant concessions to Germany, such as the introduction of Walter Bertsch, a German, and Emanuel Moravec, an open collaborator, into the government. Hácha finally broke down after the assassination of Heydrich (27 May 1942). At Heydrich's funeral Hitler announced the end of the Protectorate, and Hácha expressed his condemnation of the assassins. Soon afterwards, Hácha withdrew from public life and lived at Lány castle. In 1943, owing to progressing arteriosclerosis, he ceased to perform his duties. From May 1944, those duties were routinely performed by the prime minister of the Protectorate (first Jaroslav Krejčí, then Richard Bienert). On 13 May 1945 Hácha was arrested and taken to a prison hospital in Pankrac, where he died. (PU)

Sources: ČBS; Českoslovenští politici: 1918–1991 (Prague, 1991); Kdo byl kdo v našich dějinách ve 20. století, vol. 1 (Prague, 1998); Politická elita meziválečného Československa 1918–1938: Kdo byl kdo za první republiky (Prague, 1998); Vojtech Masny, The Czechs under Nazi Rule (New York and London, 1971); Vladimír Kadlec, Podivné konce našich presidentů (Hradec Králové, 1991); Robert Kvaček and Dušan Tomášek, Causa Emil Hácha (Prague, 1995); Tomáš Pasák, JUDr. Emil Hácha (Prague, 1997); Vít Machálek, Prezident v zajetí: Život činy a kříž Emila Háchy (Prague, 1998); <http://www.hrad.cz/president/hacha.html>.

HADLEUSKI Vintsuk (16 December 1898, Porazovo, near Volkovysk–December 1942, Trostsiants, Catholic priest, Belorussian national activist. The son of a peasant, Hadleuski graduated from a seminary in Wilno (Vilnius) in 1912 and from the Catholic Theological Academy in Petrograd in 1917. Ordained while a student in 1914, he joined the Belorussian movement. After completing his studies, he was a curate in one of the parishes of Minsk. In March 1917 he attended the First Congress of Belorussian Parties and Organizations, which called for autonomy for Belorussia within the framework of a federal Russia; Hadleuski became a member of the Belorussian National Committee. He initiated the congress of Belorussian Catholic priests in May 1917 and advocated the Belorussianization of religious life in the Catholic Church on Belorussian territory. After the Belorussian People's Republic (BPR) proclaimed its independence on 25 March 1918, Hadleuski became a member of its council (parliament). He co-organized the Belorussian Catholic seminary in Minsk and the Belorussian Christian Democratic Party. He was also an editor of the party's organ, Krynitsa (later Byelaruskaya Krynitsa).

From January 1920 Hadleuski was in Wilno (Vilnius), where he participated in the creation of the Belorussian National Committee and of the Frantsysk Skaryna Belorussian Publishing House. Appointed parish priest of Žodziszki in 1924, he celebrated one of the Sunday masses in Belorussian; this gave rise to protests by the local Poles and caused the intervention of the authorities. Arrested on 25 June 1925, Hadleuski was accused of anti-state activities but was released on bail after a few months. Arrested again in March 1926, in March 1927 he was sentenced to two years in prison for instigating a rebellion against the government. Released in 1929, he became a chaplain in a hospital in Wilno. He took an active part in the national life of the Belorussians in the Wilno region. In 1930 he completed a translation of the New Testament into Belorussian. In 1936 he started publishing the periodical Belaruski Front, in which he analyzed the international situation in Europe, predicted an imminent war, and called on the Belorussian elite to take advantage of the anticipated change in the European order to unite the country and establish an independent state.

Escaping from the Red Army, in September 1939 Hadleuski went to Kaunas and in June 1940 to German-occupied Warsaw. On 19 June 1941 he became a member of the Belorussian National Committee in Berlin. He was in favor of cooperation with the Germans, the end goal of which was an independent Belorussian state. From September 1941 he worked as a school inspector for the General District of Belorussia created by the occupiers. He was also one of the senior leaders of the Belorussian People's Mutual Aid Association; in his plans, the leadership of this organization was to serve as the Belorussian government. While forming the structures of the Belorussian government, Hadleuski went beyond the limits allowed by the occupiers. Arrested by the Gestapo on 24 December 1942, he probably perished in a concentration camp at Trostsiants, near Minsk. (EM)

Sources: V. Panutsevich, "Ks. Vintses Hadleuski—dziarzhauy muzh i pravadyr narodu," Belaruskaia tsarkva (Chicago), 1965, no. 28; Batskaushchina (Munich), 1965, no. 632; Belaruskaia Trybuna (New York), 1952, nos. 1–2; Vitaut Kipel and Zora Kipel, eds., Byelorussian Statehood (New York, 1988).

HADZHIYSKI Ivan (13 October 1907, Troyan–3 October 1944, Visoka Čuka, Yugoslavia), Bulgarian writer, psychologist, and sociologist. Hadzhiyski graduated in philosophy (1932) and law (1936) from the University of Sofia. During his studies he became engaged in the activities of a leftist student union, and in 1929 he joined the Bulgarian Workers' Party, a legal superstructure of the illegal Bulgarian Communist Party. He was a white-collar worker in Velyko Turnovo and Troyan and then a lawyer in Sofia. He was arrested several times, and in 1936 he was sentenced to three months on the basis of the state protection law. After the coup of 9 September 1944 and Bulgaria's entry into the war on the Soviet side, Hadzhiski volunteered for the army and was killed as a war correspondent in unknown circumstances. He authored several works, including the following: Avtoritët, dostoyinstvo i maska (Authority, dignity, and mask; 1933); Psikhologia na Aprilskoto vystaniye (Psychology of the April uprising; 1943); and Byt i dushevnost na nashiya narod (The existence and spirituality of our nation, 3 vols.; 1940–45). In the last work he presented an extensive image of various groups of Bulgarian society over the centuries. (JW)

Sources: Entsyklopediya Bulgariya, vol. 7 (Sofia, 1996); Wielka encyklopedia PWN, vol. 11 (Warsaw, 2002); Yordan Vasiliev, Ivan Hadzhiski v bulgarskata kultura (Sofia, 1988).

HAJDARI Azem (11 March 1963, Tropojë–12 September 1998, Tirana), Albanian politician, youth movement and trade union activist. Hajdari came from a Muslim family. He studied at the Philosophy Department at the University of Tirana. In recognition of his role in the creation of an independent student movement he was called a hero of the events of December 1990. After the failure of Prime Minister Adil Çarçani's negotiations with striking students, on 9 December 1990 a group of fourteen students under Hajdari's leadership was received by Ramiz Alia, leader of the party. Soon after Hajdari co-formed the first non-Communist Democratic Party. He contended with Sali Berisha for the post of party chairman and after losing the elections assumed the post of deputy chairman of the party. During the election campaign of March 1991 Hajdari was often attacked by the post-Communist press, which suggested that he had avoided military service on account of mental disturbances. He spent 1992 at an American university, where he continued his education. From 1996 to 1997 he was deputy from Tropojë, and until 1996 he served as president of a parliamentary commission for special services. At the end of 1996 he was elected president of the Federation of Independent Trade Unions. He was unsuccessful in his attempts to take political control of a student strike in 1997. When the financial pyramids collapsed in the same year, Hajdari began to openly criticize Berisha, but a few months later the two politicians became reconciled again. In July 1997 Berisha even proposed Hajdari as minister of interior, but his candidacy was not accepted by the parliament. On 18 September 1997 Hajdari fell victim to an assassination attempt by Gafurr Mazreku, a Socialist deputy, who shot at him several times in the parliament building. The shooting was a consequence of a conflict in parliament over a value added tax rate increase by the government. Hajdari survived the attempt, but one year later he was shot dead along with his bodyguard near the head office of the Democratic Party in Tirana. Speculating about the motive for the murder, the press suggested a family vendetta or Hajdari's links with weapons trafficking. (TC)

Sources: Nicolas J. Costa, Albania: A European Enigma (Boulder, Colo., 1995); Panajot Barka, Kryengritja e tradhtuar (Tirana, 1998); Elez Biberaj, Shqipëria në tranzicion: Rruga e vështrisë drejt Demokracisë (Tirana, 2001).

HÁJEK Jiří (6 June 1913, Krhanice–22 October 1993, Prague), Czech Communist activist, lawyer, historian, diplomat, and democratic opposition activist. In 1936 Hájek graduated in law from Charles University in Prague and later he worked as a financial clerk. After the partition of Czechoslovakia he was active in the then forming resistance movement, but in November 1939 he was arrested by the Gestapo, and throughout World War II he was held at a Nazi camp. An active member of the Social Democratic movement since his student days, he resumed this work after the war. In 1945–48 Hájek belonged to the left wing of the Social Democratic movement, actively promoting its incorporation into the Communist Party of Czechoslovakia (CPC). From 1945 to 1946 he was an MP of the Provisional National Assembly, and from 1946 to 1948, secretary general of a workers' academy. After Social Democracy joined the Communist Party, Hájek was a member of the CC of the CPC (1948–69). From 1948 to 1954 he was an MP; in 1949–53 he was a professor in the School of Political and Economic Sciences in Prague, and from 1954 he was a professor at Charles University. In 1955 he became ambassador to Great Britain, and in 1958, deputy foreign minister. From 1962 to 1965 he was permanent representative of Czechoslovakia to the United Nations. In 1965 he became minister of education and culture, and from 1967 to 1968 he served as minister of education.

In the 1960s Hájek was one of the initiators and supporters of the reform process in Czechoslovakia. Between April and September 1968 he was minister of foreign affairs. In August 1968 he protested at the United Nations against the invasion of Czechoslovakia by the Warsaw Pact troops. Soon he was dismissed from his post, and in 1970 he was expelled from the CPC. Until 1972 he was a researcher at the Historical Institute of the Czechoslovak Academy of Sciences, but in 1973 he was retired and in 1976 he was deprived of membership in the Academy by government decision. In late 1976 and early 1977 Hájek was a co-founder of Charter 77, a manifest of the then forming democratic opposition, and he was one of its first three spokesmen (along with Jan Patočka and Václav Havel). He served as Charter 77 spokesman until April 1978 and subsequently from June 1979 until the beginning of 1980. He was constantly kept under surveillance by the Czechoslovak special services. Detained on many occasions, in May 1981 he spent a short time in jail, pending trial. From November 1988 he presided over the Czechoslovak Helsinki Committee, and in November 1989 he was one of the founders of the Civic Forum. From 1990 to 1992 he was the adviser to the president of the National Assembly, Alexander Dubček, and he served as a consultant to the Institute of State and Law of the Czechoslovak Academy of Sciences. Hájek was the author of many historical works, including the following: Wilsonovská legenda v dějinách ČSR (The Wilson legend in the history of Czechoslovakia; 1953); Německá otázka a československá politika (The German cause and Czechoslovak policy; 1954); Mnichov (Munich; 1958); Deset let poté (Ten years later; 1978); and Paměti (Memoirs; 1997), which were published posthumously. (PU)

Sources: ČBS; Českoslovenští politici: 1918–1991 (Prague, 1991); Who's Who in the Socialist Countries of Europe, vol. 1 (Munich, London, and Paris, 1989); Gordon H. Skilling, Czechoslovakia's Interrupted Revolution (Princeton, 1976); Vladimír V. Kusin, From Dubcek to Charter 77: A Study of "Normalization" in Czechoslovakia, 1968–1978 (New York, 1978); Vilém Precan, ed., Charta 77 (1977–1989). Od morální k demokratické revoluci: Dokumentace (Bratislava, 1990); Alexander Dubček, Hope Dies Last (New York, 1993).

HALECKI Oskar (26 May 1891, Vienna–17 September 1973, White Plains, New York), Polish historian. The son of an Austrian general and a Croatian woman, Halecki graduated from high school in Vienna and later completed historical studies at the Jagiellonian University in Kraków, where he earned a Ph.D. in 1913 and was awarded a postdoctoral degree in 1916. Between 1916 and 1918 he lectured as a docent (associate professor) at the Jagiellonian University, and in 1918 he took the chair of East European history at Warsaw University, where he lectured until 1939. In the academic year 1920–21 he was dean of the Philosophy Department and in 1930–31, dean of the Humanities Department. He was a member, and between 1930 and 1939 president, of the Polish Academy of Arts and Sciences (Polska Akademia Umiejętności). He also belonged to the Polish Heraldic Society, the Warsaw Scientific Society, and the Lwów (Lviv) Scientific Society. In 1919 Halecki was an expert in the Polish delegation to the Paris Peace Conference; between 1921 and 1924 he was secretary of the Commission for Intellectual Cooperation (Commission de Coopération Intellectuelle) of the League of Nations; and from 1924 to 1926 he was director of the University Section of the Institut de Coopération Intellectuelle in Paris. The outbreak of war in 1939 found him in Switzerland. From there he went to France, where he organized the Polish University in Exile. After the fall of France Halecki went to the United States, where he co-organized the Polish Institute of Arts and Sciences under the auspices of the Kościuszko Foundation. From 1942 he was its director and from 1952 its president. In 1944 he took the chair of East European history at Fordham University, where he worked until his retirement in 1961. He also lectured at Columbia University in New York, the University of Montreal, the University of California at Los Angeles, and Saint Ignatius Loyola University in Rome.

Halecki left a vast scholarly legacy; it includes a two-volume history of the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth, Dzieje Unii Jagiellońskiej (The history of the Jagiellonian Union; 1919–20); works on the history of Western and Eastern Christianity: Rome et Byzance au temps du Grand Schisme (Rome and Byzantium at the time of the Great Schism; 1937) and From Florence to Brest (1958; also published in Polish in 1997); a synthesis of Polish history, The History of Poland (1942; also published in French, Spanish, and Polish); and syntheses of European history: The Limits and Divisions of European History (1950; also published in German) and Borderlands of Western Civilization (1952; also published in German and Polish). Halecki was also the author of dozens of monographs and articles in many languages. He stressed the unique character and historical significance of the Polish-Lithuanian Union, the Brest-Litovsk Union of 1596, and the role of Christianity in the history of Europe. The theme underlying many of his later works was the distinctive character and sense of European culture, in which he saw a synthesis of Greek philosophy, Roman law, and Christianity. He strongly emphasized the place and role of Poland in the history of Europe, a role that had been belittled either deliberately for political reasons or out of ignorance. Enjoying great respect among American historians, Halecki was awarded honorary doctorates by the universities in Lyon, Montreal, and New York. (WR) Sources: Polacy w historii i kulturze krajów Europy Zachodniej (Poznań, 1981); Hans A. Schmitt, ed., Historians of Modern Europe (Baton Rouge, 1971); Walerian Meysztowicz, To, co trwałe (London, 1974); Janusz Pajewski, "In memoriam Oskar Halecki," Kwartalnik Historyczny, 1975, no. 4; Rafał Habielski, Życie społeczne i kulturalne emigracji (Warsaw, 1999).

HALIPPA Pantelimon (Pan) (1 August 1883, Cubolta, Moldavia–30 April 1979, Bucharest), Romanian journalist and politician. After finishing a seminary in Edineț and an Orthodox theological seminary in Kishinev (Chișinău), in 1903 Halippa took up studies at the Department of Physics and Mathematics of the University of Dorpat (Tartu), but in 1905 he discontinued his studies because of the outbreak of the revolution in Russia. He returned to Kishinev and joined the young Romanian intellectuals who were calling for the independence of Bessarabia, which was then part of the Russian empire. From 1905 to 1908 Halippa contributed to the periodical Revistă Basarabiei, in which he published the Romanian national anthem, Deșteaptă-te române! (Awaken thee, Romanian), for which he was arrested and tried by the Russian authorities. At that time he also founded the national daily Basarabia. In 1908 Halippa published a book, Pilde și povețe (Examples and pieces of advice), and left for Romania. Until 1913 he lived in Iași, where from 1908 to 1913 he studied at the Department of Literature and Philosophy of the University of Iași. In 1912 he published Basarabia, schiță geografică (Bessarabia, a geographical outline). He contributed to the periodical Viața românească, in which he published Scrisori din Basarabia (Letters from Bessarabia). In 1913 he returned to Kishinev, where he edited the daily Cuvânt Moldovenesc.

After the outbreak of World War I Halippa actively worked for the unification of Moldavia and Romania. In 1917 he founded the Moldavian National Party (Partidul Național Moldovenesc) and the People's University in Kishinev. Between 1917 and 1918 he was vice-president, and then president, of the Council of the Country (Sfatul Țării), which in January 1918 voted for the creation of the Independent Republic of Moldavia and in April of that year, for its unification with Romania. Halippa was a member of similar Romanian national assemblies in Bukovina and Transylvania that voted to unite with Romania. In 1918–21 Halippa was leader of the National Peasant Party of Bessarabia (Partidul Național Țărănesc din Basarabia). In 1921, after a conflict within the National Peasant Party of Bessarabia, he joined the Peasant Party (Partidul Țărănesc). In 1918 he became a member of the Romanian Academy of Sciences. After 1918 he held numerous government positions in Romania. Between 1919 and 1920 he was minister/secretary of state for the affairs of Bessarabia, in 1927 minister of public works, and in 1930 minister of public works and transport and minister of health and social welfare. In addition, from 1928 to 1930, in 1932, and from 1932 to 1933, he was minister/secretary of state, and between 1918 and 1934 he served as senator or MP. In 1932 he published and edited the periodical Viața Basarabiei. In 1940 he founded the Bessarabian Writers' and Publishers' Association. After World War II Halippa was critical of the Communist government. Consequently, he was removed from public life, and in 1950 he was arrested and imprisoned without trial in a prison in Șighet Marmăției. After two years he was handed over to the NKVD in Kishinev, where he was tried and sentenced to twenty-five years of hard labor in Siberia. In 1955 the deportation sentence was commuted to a prison term, and he was handed over to the Romanian authorities. Until 1957 Halippa was held in prisons in Aiud and Gherla. After his release from prison he settled in Bucharest. (LW)

Sources: Dictionar Enciclopedic, vol. 3 (Bucharest, 1999); Julius Demel, Historia Rumunii (Wrocław, 1986); Șerban N. Ionescu, Who Was Who in Twentieth Century Romania (Boulder, Colo., 1994); Dorina N. Rusu, Membrii Academiei Române 1866–1999 (Bucharest, 1999); Ion Alexandrescu, Ion Bulei, Ion Mamina, and Ioan Scurtu, Enciclopedia de istorie României (Bucharest, 2000).

HALL Aleksander (20 May 1953, Gdańsk), Polish politician. Hall graduated in history from the University of Gdańsk in 1977. From his school years he was connected with the democratic opposition and was active in academic ministry groups. In 1977–79 he was active in the Movement for the Defense of Human and Civic Rights, and in 1977–81 he co-founded and edited an uncensored periodical, Bratniak. In 1979 he co-organized and became leader of the Movement of Young Poland, whose program was based on democratic, national, and Catholic values and which played an important role in the Gdańsk region, particularly during the summer strikes of 1980 and after the formation of Solidarity. From September 1980 Hall was a member of Solidarity. After the introduction of martial law on 13 December 1981, he went into hiding. In 1981–84 he belonged to the Solidarity Regional Coordination Commission in Gdańsk. After coming out of hiding, in 1984–89 Hall wrote for the periodical Przegląd Katolicki and from 1982 for the underground Polityka Polska. In 1986–89 he was a member of the Social Council of the Primate of Poland, and in 1988–89 he was deputy chairman of the Dziekania Political Thought Club. In December 1988 he joined the Civic Committee of Solidarity Chairman Lech Wałęsa. He took part in the Round Table Talks (February–April 1989), and from September 1989 to December 1990 he was minister for contacts with political organizations. During the so-called war at the top in 1990 Hall supported Prime Minister Tadeusz Mazowiecki. From November 1990 he presided over the Forum of Democratic Right (FDR), and from May 1991 he was deputy chairman of the Democratic Union (DU). In 1992, along with the FDR Hall left the DU and co-founded the Conservative Party. In 1991–93 he was an MP. From 1997 he was chairman of the Political Council of the Conservative Popular Party (Stronictwo Konserwatywno-Ludowe), which joined Solidarity Electoral Action (Akcja Wyborcza Solidarność [AWS]). An MP from 1997 to 2001, Hall was deputy head of the AWS parliamentary club. He authored several works, including Polemiki i refleksje (Polemics and Reflections; 1989); a book-interview, Spór o Polskę (Debate over Poland; 1993); Polskie patriotyzmy (Polish patriotisms; 1997); and Widziane z prawej strony (Seen from the right side; 2000). (AF)

Sources: Mołdawa; Kto jest kim w Polsce (Warsaw, 2001); Jan Skórzyński, Ugoda i rewolucja: Władza i opozycja 1985–1989 (Warsaw, 1995); Antoni Dudek, Pierwsze lata III Rzeczypospolitej 1989–2001 (Kraków, 2002).

HALLER Józef (Haller de Hallenburg) (13 August 1873, Jurczyce–4 June 1960, London), Polish general. Haller attended a high school in Košice and Hranice and then studied at the Jagiellonian University in Kraków and the Technical Military Academy in Vienna. He joined the Austrian Army, where he rose to the rank of captain. In 1912 he retired from active service and devoted himself to the Falcon Movement (Ruch Sokoli) and to scouting among the Galician Poles. After the outbreak of World War I Haller organized the Eastern Legion (Legion Wschodni), which was dissolved by the Austrians; therefore he joined the Polish Legions, assuming command of the Second Brigade. During the crisis of July 1917 he remained in the army and pledged an oath of loyalty to the emperors of Austria-Hungary and Germany, becoming the head of the Polish Auxiliary Corps. At the news of the Brest-Litovsk peace treaty between the Central Powers and the Bolsheviks, the conditions of which were unfavorable to Poland, Haller and his units fought their way through the front, fighting a severe battle against the Austrians at Rarańcza. Haller attached his units to the Second Polish Corps in Russia and assumed its command. On 11 May 1918 the corps lost a battle at Kaniów, was surrounded by the Germans, disarmed, and interned. However, many officers and soldiers, including Haller, escaped captivity and in the spring of 1918 forced their way to Murmansk via territories controlled by the Bolsheviks. On 12 July 1918 Haller arrived in France. In Paris he became a member of the Polish National Committee, and on 4 October 1918 he was appointed commander-in-chief of the Polish Army in France.

In June 1919 Haller, at the head of his army (called the “Blue Army”), crossed the borders of the Republic of Poland and then was the commander in battles against the Ukrainians in Eastern Galicia. Later he organized the defense of Pomerania. On 10 February 1920 in Puck he conducted a symbolical “marriage” of Poland with the Baltic Sea. In the Polish-Soviet war he commanded the northern section of the front. He was politically tied with Christian Democracy and was its representative in the Assembly (1922–27). During the crisis connected with the election and assassination of President Gabriel Narutowicz in 1922, the national right considered Haller a charismatic leader. After the coup of May 1926 he was dismissed from service. In February 1936 he joined the agreement of the Center Right, which was formed in the Swiss residence of Ignacy Paderewski in Morges (Morges Front) and was in opposition to the sanacja (i.e., moral and political cleansing) regime. In 1937 Haller was one of the founders of the Labor Party.

In October 1939 Haller joined the government of General Władysław Sikorski as a minister without portfolio and held the post until July 1943. After the end of the war Haller remained in England, where he was active in the political life of the Polish emigrant community. In December 1949 he became a member of the Political Council, which was in opposition to President August Zaleski. In February 1952, as a representative of the Labor Party, Haller became a member of the Presidium of the Political Council. He signed the Act of Unification of the Polish emigration in March 1953. He gradually withdrew from politics owing to declining health. (WR) Sources: Dziesięciolecie Rzeczypospolitej Polskiej 1918–1928 (Warsaw, 1928); Polacy w historii . . .; Andrzej Friszke, Życie polityczne emigracji (Warsaw, 1999); Janusz Zabłocki, Chrześcijańska Demokracja w kraju i na emigracji 1947–1970 (Lublin, 1999).

HALLER Stanisław (26 April 1872, Polanka-Haller, near Bielsko–April 1940, Kharkiv), Polish general. Haller came from a landowning family of bourgeois origin and was the cousin of Józef Haller. After graduating from high school in Bielsko in 1892, he volunteered for the Austrian Army, and in 1894 he became a regular soldier. In 1901 he graduated from the Military College in Vienna. He commanded a battalion and was a general staff officer and chief of staff of the Kraków fortress. He served as chief of staff until 1915 and then became deputy chief of the corps staff and commander of an artillery regiment. From May 1918, as colonel, he commanded an artillery brigade on the Italian front. In November 1918 he volunteered for the Polish Army and became deputy commander of Kraków and later chief of staff of the Kraków district of the Polish Army. On 1 January 1920 Haller was nominated general, and he assumed the duties of chief of the General Staff of the Polish Army. With Józef Piłsudski, he worked out the plan for the Kiev expedition of April 1920. During the retreat from the Ukraine he resigned and took command of the Thirteenth Infantry Division and then the Sixth Army. He was also a member of the War Council. After the end of the Polish-Soviet war Haller served as an army inspector in Lwów (Lviv), and in 1923 he became chief of the General Staff. His hitherto good relations with Piłsudski deteriorated when Haller became aware of preparations for a coup d'état. In December 1925 he resigned and withdrew to his family estate. During the coup of May 1926, he was appointed chief of staff of the government forces in Warsaw, and he cooperated in the defense of the constitutional government. After the coup he was interned. Following his release, he obtained a dismissal from the army and settled permanently at Polanka. In 1926 he published a book about the May coup, Wypadki warszawskie (Warsaw events), and Naród i armia (The nation and the army), in which he was critical of Piłsudski. Haller was a member of Catholic Action, and in his political sympathies he became increasingly closer to National Democracy. In September 1939 he declared his readiness to serve in the army. Seeking an assignment, he went eastward, where he was captured by the Red Army. Haller was sent to the camp in Starobielsk, and in the spring of 1940, by decision of the Kremlin leadership, he was murdered by the NKVD in Kharkiv. (WR)

Sources: PSB, vol. 9; Kto był kim w Drugiej Rzeczypospolitej (Warsaw, 1994); Encyklopedia historii Drugiej Rzeczypospolitej (Warsaw, 1999); Norman Davies, White Eagle Red Star: The Polish-Soviet War, 1919–20 (London, 1972); Andrzej Nowak, Polska i trzy Rosje: Studium o polityce wschodniej Józefa Piłsudskiego (do kwietnia 1920 roku) (Kraków, 2001).

HALUBOK Uladzimir (15 May 1882, Lasnaia, near Nowogródek [now Novogrudok, Belarus]–28 September 1937), Belorussian writer, actor, and director. After completing primary school in Minsk, Halubok worked as a porter, locksmith, and warehouseman. In 1906 he started publishing his poems and stories in the newspaper Nasha Niva in Vilnius and later in the newspapers Luchinka and Maladaya Belarus. From 1915 he was one of the organizers of the Belorussian Relief Committee for War Victims. In 1920 he was involved in the organization of theater life in Slutsk. Between 1920 and 1922 he worked at the Art Department in the People's Commissariat of Education of the Belorussian SSR and was also in charge of the theater section of the Belorussian Workers' Club in Minsk. Halubok was the director of a workers' theater and belonged to the writers' societies Maladnyak and Polymia. He wrote forty plays, gathering motifs from the everyday life of Minsk and from local folklore. He staged some of his plays in the theater he directed. He also wrote many theater reviews and published newspaper articles on the Belorussian theater. In the late 1920s, like most Belorussian culture activists, Halubok was accused of nationalism. In 1931 the Soviet authorities banned the publication of his works. Until 1937 he worked as an actor. Arrested in September 1937, according to the official report, Halubok died of coronary disease in prison. (EM)

Sources: Entsyklapiediya historyi Bielarusi, vol. 2 (Minsk, 1994); A. Atroshchanka, Uladzimir Halubok (Minsk, 1969).

HAMPL Antonín (12 April 1875, Jaroměř–17 May 1942, Berlin), Czech Social Democratic politician. A graduate of the State Industrial School in Prague, Hampl was already taking part in the workers' movement as a student. From 1910 he was secretary of the Metalworkers' Union, an organization that grew rapidly to become the strongest trade union in Bohemia. From 1918 he was a member of the leadership of the Czechoslovak Social Democratic Party, and from 1924 to 1938, president of the party. In 1918 he was a member of the Czechoslovak National Committee, and later he was an MP throughout the interwar period. From 1919 and 1920 he served as minister of public works in the cabinet of Vlastimil Tusar. At that time he worked for social welfare legislation, the protection of workers' rights, social insurance, and workers' self-government. From the beginning of the 1920s Hampl was the de facto leader of the Social Democratic movement, which was then going through hard times because its left wing had broken off to form the Communist Party. Hampl tried to consolidate Czech Social Democracy. Thanks to his leadership abilities, by the mid-1930s the party doubled its membership. Many former secessionists returned to the party. As a result of the Munich Agreement and the stance of the international community, Czechoslovak Social Democracy left the Socialist International. In the autumn of 1938 a new political party was created, the National Labor Party (NLP), which grouped anti-Nazi political activists. Hampl became president of the NLP. However, when Hitler created the Protectorate of Bohemia and Moravia on 15 March 1939, the National Labor Party was dissolved. Arrested by the Gestapo in May 1941, Hampl died in prison in Berlin. (PU)

Sources: ČBS; Kto bol kto za I. ČSR (Bratislava, 1993); Kdo byl kdo v našich dějinách ve 20. století, vol. 1 (Prague, 1998); Politická elita meziválečného Československa 1918–1938: Kdo byl kdo za první republiky (Prague, 1998).

HAMVAS Béla, pseudonym "Pál Antal" (24 March 1897, Eperjes [Prešov]–7 November 1968, Budapest), Hungarian philosopher and writer. After graduating from a high school in Bratislava, Hamvas volunteered for the army and fought on the eastern front. Displaced along with his family from Bratislava in 1919, he settled in Budapest, where he studied Hungarian and German language and literature. After graduating in 1923, he contributed to the daily Buda-pesti Hírlap, in which he published short stories, as well as articles on art and literature. From 1927 Hamvas worked as a librarian and devoted himself mostly to philosophy. Among other projects, he interpreted and creatively developed observations made by Bertrand Russell in The Prospects of Industrial Civilization and by Sigmund Freud in Das Unbehagen in der Kultur. In 1935 he established a debating salon and a periodical, both named Sziget, where, along with friends like László Németh, he published on the topics of culture, beauty, and the capacities of human cognition. In 1937 Hamvas married Katalin Kemény, with whom he wrote Forradalom a művészetben: Absztrakció és szürrealizmus Magyarországon (Revolution in art: Abstraction and Surrealism in Hungary; 1947). The work was later sharply criticized by the Marxists.

In World War II, Hamvas again fought on the eastern front, from where he deserted in 1944. During the war he lost some of his notes and parts of the study Scientia Sacra, which consisted of nearly twenty essays. The study, devoted to interrelations among metaphysics, anthropology, and culture, was finally published in 1988. One of the conclusions he reached was that religion is the foundation of all human civilizations. He continued his scholarly work after the war. From 1945 to 1948 he edited a series of papers presenting the most prominent figures among twentieth-century European historians of the idea. In 1946 he published his collected essays, Anthologia humana: Ötezer év bölcsessége (Anthologia humana: Five thousand years of wisdom). Hamvas was criticized and attacked by adherents of Marxism, and in 1948 a ban was placed on the publication of his works that was maintained nearly until the end of Communist rule in Hungary. Hamvas lost his job as a librarian and made his living working as an unskilled laborer. In 1951 he started work on another monumental work, Karnevál (Carnival; 1997), a novel that is a catalogue of ethical positions available to individuals, depicted in the context of different epochs, traditions, and continents. Patmosz (1992), a three-volume collection of essays written in 1959–66, is the quintessence of his work; in it Hamvas arrived at the conclusion that contemporary civilization was in deep crisis. His works are being edited and published by the Hamvas Institute, established in Budapest in 2001. (MS)

Sources: Gyémántnál keményebb: 100 éve született Hamvas Béla (Budapest, 1997); Zoltán Bódis, Hamvas-írás: A hamvasi nyelvselélet megközzelítése (Debrecen, 1997); Új magyar irodalmi lexikon (Budapest, 2000); Pál Darabos, Hamvas Béla: Egy életmű fiziognómiája (Budapest, 2002).

HANCHAR Viktor (29 April 1957, Augustovo, near Lahoisk–1999?, Minsk), Belorussian politician. Hanchar graduated from the Law Department of the Belorussian State University in Minsk. From 1986 he worked at the Belorussian Institute of the National Economy. He was deputy to the Supreme Council of Belarus from 1990 to 1995 and from 1995 to 1999. In 1994 President Alyaksandr Lukashenka appointed him deputy prime minister of the Belorussian government. From September 1996 Hanchar served as president of the Central Electoral Committee (CEC). He opposed Lukashenka's policy of restricting the role of parliament and objected to a referendum on constitutional amendments planned by Lukashenka. In November 1996 Hanchar stated that the referendum ordered by Lukashenka was being held in violation of the law. In retaliation he was dismissed as head of the CEC. After the referendum, he was one of the leaders of the Supreme Council, which was not recognized by the president, and a member of the liberal United Citizens' Party of Belarus, created in the autumn of 1995. Hanchar often spoke out against Lukashenka's dictatorship and his aim to unite Belarus with Russia. Kidnapped on a street in Minsk on 16 September 1999, Hanchar disappeared without a trace. According to opposition sources, he was a victim of the so-called death squads headed by Lukashenka's security officers. (EM)

Sources: Kto iest kto v Respublike Belarus (Minsk, 1999); Jan Zaprudnik, Historical Dictionary of Belarus (Lanham, Md., 1998); David R. Marples, Belarus: A Denationalized Nation (Amsterdam, 1999); Jan Czuryłowicz, "Trójkąt białoruski," Wprost, 1 July 2001.

HARASZTI Sándor (18 November 1897, Czinderybogád–19 January 1982, Budapest), Hungarian Communist activist and publicist. After passing his high school graduation exams in Pécs, Haraszti worked as a railway clerk. In 1919 he joined the Hungarian Social Democratic Party (HSDP), and under the Hungarian Soviet Republic he fought in the Red Army. In 1920 he went into exile in Austria and in the Kingdom of Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes, where he worked as a journalist. In 1929 he returned to Hungary. He was active in the Hungarian Communist Party (HCP) and was arrested on several occasions. In 1930 he began working as the Budapest editor of the Transylvanian newspaper Korunk. During World War II Haraszti was active in various anti-Fascist organizations, and when the Germans occupied Hungary in March 1944, he went underground. Between 1945 and 1948 he worked as editor of the daily Szabadság and as deputy head of the Propaganda and Agitation Department of the CC of the HCP. From 1949 he was director of the Athenaeum Publishing House. Arrested in November 1950, a year later Haraszti was sentenced to death in the trial of János Kádár and comrades. After spending a few years in a death cell, Haraszti had his sentence commuted to life imprisonment. Released and rehabilitated in mid-1954, he assumed the post of editor-in-chief of the newspaper Béke és Szabadság. A close associate of Imre Nagy in 1956, Haraszti presided over the Hungarian Union of Journalists. During the 1956 revolution he was editor-in-chief of the central party daily, Népszabadság. After the Soviet Army occupied Budapest, Haraszti took refuge in the Yugoslav Embassy, and after he left the embassy, he was interned in Romania. In the trial of Nagy and associates in the summer of 1958 Haraszti was sentenced to six years in prison. Released under an amnesty in 1960, he worked in the Akadémia Publishing House between 1963 and 1979. His political memoirs, Befejezetlen számvetés (Unfinished accounts; 1986), were published posthumously. (MS)

Sources: Judit Ember, Menedék-jog 1956 (Budapest, 1989); Ferenc Donáth, "Haraszti Sándor és amiért nem kellett," Liget, 1989, no. 2.

HARETSKI Maksim, pseudonyms "Maksim Bielarus," "A. Mstsislauski," "Dzed Kuzma," "Maciej Myszka," "Mizerus Monus" (18 February 1893, Malaya Bahatskauka, near Mstsislav–10 February 1938, Smolensk), Belorussian writer and literary critic. After graduating from the School of Bailiffs and Agronomists in Gorki in 1913, Haretski worked as a bailiff in Lithuania. Mobilized into the Russian Army in 1914, he was seriously wounded in Prussia. In 1916 he graduated from the Military College in Petrograd. In 1918 he worked in the editorial offices of the newspapers Izvestia Smolenskovo Sovieta and Zviazda in Smolensk, and from 1920 he was a teacher at a Belorussian high school in Wilno (Vilnius), where he edited the newspapers Nasha Dumka and Belaruskiia Vedamasti. In 1922 he was arrested by the Polish authorities for cooperation with the Communists. In 1923 he went to the Belorussian SSR. He lectured in literature at the Belorussian State University and at the Belorussian Communist University, and he worked as a professor at the Belorussian Academy of Sciences. In July 1930 he was arrested along with other intellectuals for being a member of an actually nonexistent organization, the Belarus Liberation Union, and he was sentenced to five years in a labor camp in Viatka. Arrested again in November 1937 and sentenced to death by an NKVD court, Haretski was executed by firing squad.

In 1913 Haretski made his literary debut with a short story published in the newspaper Nasha Niva in Vilnius.

His writing reflected the life of the Belorussian nation during the epoch of war, revolution, and political and territorial rift. His novels—Dzvie Dushy (Two souls; 1919); Melankholia (Melancholy; 1920); U chim zakluchalasia iaho kriuda? (What is his harm? 1926); Tsihaia plyn (Silent current; 1930)—were literary analyses of the spiritual life of the Belorussians, their constant choices and inner conflicts caused by the existing political and social reality. In the novel Na imperialistycznej wojnie (At the imperialistic war; 1926) Haretski presented the drama of soldiers fighting on the German-Soviet front. The novel Usiebielaruski Ziezd 1917 hoda (The All-Belorussian Congress of 1917), written to "uplift hearts," depicted a nation that was bursting the fetters of alien domination. Haretski was the author of the first history of Belorussian literature, Historiia belaruskai literatury (History of Belorussian literature; 1920) and of works about past and contemporary Belorussian literature. (EM)

Sources: Nicholas P. Vakar, Belorussia: The Making of a Nation (Cambridge, Mass., 1956); D. Buhaiou, Maksim Haretski (Minsk, 1968); T. Dasayeva, Letapis zhytsia i tvorchastsi Maksima Haretskaha (Minsk, 1993); Jan Zaprudnik, Historical Dictionary of Belarus (Lanham, Md., 1998).

HARETSKI Radzim (7 December 1928, Minsk), Belorussian geologist and social activist. In 1952 Haretski graduated from the Oil Institute in Moscow. In 1952–71 he worked in the Institute of Geology of the Academy of Sciences of the USSR; in 1972–93 he was director of the Institute of Geochemistry and Geophysics of the Belorussian Academy of Sciences (BAS); and in 1992–97 he was deputy chairman of the BAS. From 1993 he was chairman of the Belorussian Geological Society and a member of the American Geophysical Society. From 1995 he held a chair at the Belorussian State University in Minsk. In 1993–2001 he was chairman of Batskaushchyna, the World Association of Belorussians. Haretski organized a number of conferences and congresses of Belorussians living abroad. He is the author of several scholarly works, including Tektonika Belarusi (Tectonics of Belorussia; 1976). (EM)

Sources: Kto iest kto w Respublike Belarus (Minsk, 1999); Jan Zaprudnik, Belarus: At a Crossroads in History (Boulder, Colo., 1993); Jan Zaprudnik, Historical Dictionary of Belarus (Lanham, Md., 1998); Kto jest kim w Białorusi (Białystok, 2000).

HARUN Ales [originally Aleksandar Prushynski] (11 March. 1887, Novy Dvor–28 July 1920, Kraków), Belorussian politician, writer, and poet. Born into the large and poor family of a craftsman, in 1897 Harun finished a parish school in Minsk and in 1902 a school of crafts.

He worked as a carpenter in Minsk. A member of the Russian Socialist Revolutionary Party from 1904, he was involved in printing and distributing revolutionary literature. Arrested in 1907, he was sentenced to two years in prison by a court in Wilno (Vilnius) but was later acquitted. Arrested again in 1908, he was sentenced to exile in the Irkutsk guberniya (province). While in exile, Harun wrote poems that were published in the periodicals Nasha Niva and Belarus. Harun worked floating wood on the Lena River and in gold mines. After the February 1917 revolution he first lived in Moscow, becoming a member of the Belorussian People's Hromada; then in September of that year he went to Minsk, and in October 1917 he joined the Central Committee (CC) of the Belorussian Socialist Hromada. Harun participated in the preparations for the First All-Belorussian Congress in December 1917, and as its vice-president, he took part in the formation of the Belorussian People's Republic (BPR). As editor of the newspaper Belaruskii Shlachh, he promoted the idea of an independent Belorussian state. During the German and Bolshevik occupations of Minsk Harun was in charge of shelters for orphans and homeless children. After the arrival of the Polish troops in the spring of 1919, he became president of the Belorussian Provisional National Committee, and in that role he greeted Józef Piłsudski, thanking him for the liberation of Belorussia from Russian imperialism. In October 1919 Harun became a member of the Belorussian Military Committee (BMC). He founded publishing houses, promoted BMC activities, and edited the periodical Run'. In July 1920, following the Polish troops, Harun withdrew to Poland, where he died and was buried at the Rakowice Cemetery in Kraków.

Harun made his literary debut as a poet in 1905. In 1918 he published Matchin dar (A gift from mother), his collected poems from 1907–14, in which the fate of Belorussia and the Belorussian nation was the main theme. The “mother” in the title refers to his enslaved homeland. The liberation of Belorussia from alien domination is even more strongly emphasized in Harun's second collection, Novaia pesnia (New song), from the years 1917–20. In his journalism, Harun treated the Bolshevik slogans of freedom, equality, and social justice as demagogy and the 1919 Polish declarations and assurances of freedom for the Belorussians as hypocrisy. The idea of independence for Belorussia was of crucial importance in his writing. Unlike most Belorussian intellectuals of his time, Harun considered social and economic issues as less important. Between 1912 and 1915 Harun also wrote several stories, the best known of which are Maladoie (The young), Chalavek bez kryvi (A man without blood), and Pan Szabuniewicz (Mr. Szabuniewicz). (EM)

Sources: Entsyklapiedyia historyi Bielarusi, vol. 2 (Minsk, 1994); Belaruskiiia pismenniki 1917–1990: Davednik (Minsk, 1994); Belaruskaiia entsyklapiedyia, vol. 5 (Minsk, 1997); Maksim Haretski, Historyia belaruskai litaratury (Vilnia, 1920); M. Larchanka, “Tvorchasts Alesia Haruna,” Belarus, 1945, no. 5; Nicholas P. Vakar, Belorussia: The Making of a Nation (Cambridge, Mass., 1956); Vitaut Kipel and Zora Kipel, eds., Byelorussian Statehood (New York, 1988); A. Loika, Historyia belaruskai litaratury: Dakastrychnitski peryiad, vol. 2 (Minsk, 1989); U. Kazbiaruk, Svetlai voli zychny zvon: Ales Harun (Minsk, 1991).

HASANI Sinan (14 May 1922, Požaranje, near Kosovska Vitina), Yugoslav Communist activist of Albanian nationality, writer, and journalist. Hasani graduated from the Djuro Djaković Higher Party School in Belgrade. In 1942 he joined the Yugoslav Communist Party. He was a political commissar in one of the Communist guerrilla units in Serbia. After the war he was secretary of the regional committee of the League of Communists of Yugoslavia (LCY) in Gniljane and secretary of the regional committee of the Popular Front. Advancing in the party ranks, he joined the ideological commission in the regional party structure in Kosovo, where he was responsible for cultural policy. In 1965–67 he headed Rilindja, the Albanian language press. In 1959–85 he was a member of the Central Committee of the League of Communists of Serbia; in 1967–71 he was deputy speaker of the Serbian parliament, and from 1971 to 1974 he was ambassador to Denmark. In 1975 Hasani became deputy speaker of the federal parliament. At the end of the 1980s, he was, apart from Fadil Hoxha, the only Albanian among the top federal authorities. In March 1981 he belonged to those Kosovo leaders who condemned the demonstrations of Albanian students. From May 1982 he belonged to the party leadership in the autonomous region of Kosovo-Metohija. From 15 May 1986 to 15 May 1987 he was chairman of the Presidium of the Socialist Federative Republic of Yugoslavia. In 1987 he was dismissed from the leadership. Hasani published a couple of novels, including Gde se reka deli (Where the river forks; 1967), and a collection of essays, Kosovo istine i zablude (Kosovo truths and errors; 1986). (TC)

Sources: Jugoslavenski savremenici: Ko je ko u Jugoslavii (Belgrade, 1970); Ana Lalaj, Kosova: Rruga egjate drejt vetevendosjes 1948–1981 (Tirana, 2000); Who's Who in the Socialist Countries of Europe (Munich, London, and Paris, 1989).

HAŠEK Jaroslav (30 April 1883, Prague–3 January 1923, Lipnica, Havlíčkův Brod district), Czech writer. In 1899–1903 Hašek studied at a trade academy, and then he worked as a shop assistant and bank officer. Soon he gave up steady employment, and for four years he wandered around Central Europe, writing columns, humorous sketches, and short stories that were published in various periodicals. From 1907 he lived in Prague, where he contributed to satirical magazines and was a habitual guest of the Prague pubs. Mobilized during World War I, he went over to the Russian side and joined the Czechoslovak Legion in 1916. Hašek edited the Čechoslovan, the press organ of the Legion, in which he led anti-Habsburg and pro-Russian agitation. At this time he favored the restitution of Czech statehood under the Russian Romanovs. Demoted, in 1918 he joined the Red Army and the Bolshevik party. He returned home in 1920 with revolution in mind, but in view of the unreceptive atmosphere among Czech workers, he took a job as a comedian. He performed in the Red Seven Cabaret and returned to the lifestyle of a bohemian. From 1921 he lived in Lipnica.

From the beginning of his literary career Hašek was fascinated with folktales and the simple country folk life. He made his literary debut in 1900 with columns written from his trip to Slovakia. In the collection of tales from his trips around Central Europe, Průvodčí cizinců a jiné satiry z cest i domova (A guide for foreigners and other satires from my trips and from home; 1913), he described the everyday life of simple people, based on stories heard in pubs, full of humor and satire. A double-dealing trickster, in 1909 Hašek published articles about fictitious animals in a professional zoological periodical, Svět Zvířat. In 1911 he founded the Party of Moderate Progress within the Limits of the Law, ridiculing Austro-Hungarian political life, ideological programs, and election campaigns. In the parliamentary campaign of the party in 1911 he was joined by (among others) Franz Kafka and Egon Erwin Kisch, and the party's program included (for instance) the rehabilitation of dogs and the nationalization of doorkeepers. He described the party's activities in 1912 in Politické a sociální dějiny Strany mírného pokroku v mezích zákona (The political and social history of the Party of Moderate Progress within the Limits of the Law).

Hašek was skeptical of any authority and norm of behavior. He thought that all political systems limited personal freedom and the pursuit of happiness. He stressed the absurdity of human life and of the world order. His anarchic or even nihilistic attitude is revealed in the collections Trampoty pana Tenkráta (Mr. Tenkrat in trouble; 1912); Můj obchod se psy (My dog trade; 1915); Dva tucty povídek (Two dozen stories; 1920); Pepíček Nový a jiné povídky (New Joe and other stories; 1921); Tři muži se žralokem a jiné poučné historky (Three men with a shark and other instructive stories; 1921); and Mírová konference a jiné humoresky (The peace conference and other humorous sketches; 1922). Hašek contrasted folk wisdom with the absurdity of politics, ideology, and the state administration. His most famous novel, which brought him world renown, Osudy dobrého vojáka Švejka za světové války (1921–23; Good Soldier Schweik, 1930; The Good Soldier Svejk and His Fortunes in the World War, 1973), was constructed with such a contrast. The hero of the title is a simpleton who thoughtlessly but exactly follows orders, unmasking the stupidity of the Austro-Hungarian Army. Hašek worked on the novel for a great part of his life. The adventures of Švejk were to be the story of a man entangled in history. Hašek never completed his novel. The unfinished work was rather unsuccessfully continued by Karel Vaněk. Hašek's work was twice translated into English and also into many other languages. It was also filmed and adapted as a play in Czechoslovakia and abroad. (PU)

Sources: Kdo byl kdo v našich dějinách ve 20. století, vol. 1 (Prague, 1998); Gustav Janouch, Jaroslav Hašek, der Vater des braven Soldaten Schwejk (Bern and Munich, 1967); Cecil Parrott, The Bad Bohemian: The Life of Jaroslav Hašek (London, 1978); Radko Pytlík, Lidský profil Jaroslava Haška (Prague, 1979); Cecil Parrott, Jaroslav Hašek: A Study of Švejk and the Short Stories (Cambridge, 1982); Ladislav Soldan, Jaroslav Hašek (Prague, 1982); Jiří Hájek, Jaroslav Hašek (Prague, 1983); Zdeněk Hoření, Jaroslav Hašek novinář (Prague, 1983); Boris Měďflek, Bibliografie Jaroslava Haška (Prague, 1983); Přemysl Blažíček, Haškův Švejk (Prague, 1991).

HAURYLIK Yazep (6 April 1893, Kalodchin, near Vileika–8 December 1937, Leningrad), Belorussian activist. In 1914 Haurlyk graduated from a teachers' college in Boruny. He worked in schools run by the Orthodox Church in the region of Kaunas and was a conductor of an Orthodox choir. In 1919 he was dismissed from work for criticizing the clergy. In 1920 he became aligned with the Belorussian national movement and promoted the idea of struggle for Belorussian statehood. Between 1921 and 1922 he worked in a school in Oszmiana, and in 1922 he organized a Belorussian high school in Radoszkowicze. From 1924 he was active in the Belorussian School Society, and from 1925 he was a member of the Belorussian Peasant and Worker Hromada. In 1927, after he refused to cooperate with the Polish police, Haurlyk was deprived of the right to practice as a teacher. In 1928 he was elected an MP from the lists of the Union of Workers and Peasants. In May 1930 he joined the Communist Party of Western Belorussia. Arrested in August 1930 for anti-state activities, in January 1931 he was sentenced to eight years. In September 1932, as a result of the exchange of political prisoners, he was sent to the USSR. He worked in the Commissariat of People's Education of the Belorussian SSR in Minsk. Arrested by the NKVD in 1933 for being a member of a nonexistent organization called the Belorussian National Center, Haurlyk was sentenced to ten years in a labor camp. He was held prisoner on the Solovets Islands, and he labored on the construction of the White Sea Canal. On 25 November 1937 the NKVD Leningrad District Court sentenced Haurlyk to execution by firing squad. (EM)

Sources: Entsyklapiedyia historyi Bielarusi, vol. 2 (Minsk, 1994); Posłowie i senatorowie Rzeczypospolitej Polskiej 1919–1939: Słownik biograficzny, vol. 1 (Warsaw, 1998); Nicholas P. Vakar, Belorussia: The Making of a Nation (Cambridge, Mass., 1956).

HAVEL Václav (5 October 1936, Prague), Czech playwright and dissident, president of Czechoslovakia and the Czech Republic. Born into an upper-middle-class family from Prague, owing to his “bourgeois” origins, Havel was not allowed to study in a regular high school under Stalinist rule. In 1951–55 he worked as a laboratory assistant and took classes in an evening high school. In 1955–57 he studied in the Department of Economics of the Prague Polytechnic. In 1957–59 he did his military service. In 1951 he became interested in literature. His first texts were reviewed by Jaroslav Seifert. From the mid-1950s Havel published in the periodicals Květen, Divadlo, Literární noviny, Tvář, and Sešity pro mladou literaturu. In 1959–60 he worked as a stage assistant in the ABC Theater and then as directorial assistant and playwright in the Na Zábřadlí Theater in Prague (1961–68). In 1967 he graduated from the Academy of Theater and Musical Arts in Prague. In the mid-1960s he attracted attention as the author of dramas of the absurd, publishing Zahradní slavnost (1963; Garden Party, 1969) and Vyrozumění (1965; Memorandum, 1967). From 1965 Havel was a member, and from 1968 chairman, of the editorial board of the literary monthly Tvář, which was suspended during “normalization” in 1969. After a conflict with the Communist-controlled Association of Czechoslovak Writers, in 1968 he became chairman of the Club of Independent Writers.

During the “Prague Spring” of 1968 Havel supported reforms and joined the Club of Engaged Nonparty Members (Klub Angažovaných Nestraníků), acting in favor of the reconstruction of the Czechoslovak Social Democracy. After the Warsaw Pact invasion he helped edit radio broadcasts condemning the “brotherly help” of the Soviet bloc. In August 1969 he was the key author of the “Ten Points” address to the federal government, the Federal Assembly, the Czech government, the Czech National Council, and the Central Committee of the Czechoslovak Communist Party; the address protested the “normalization.” In the early 1970s Havel was banned from publishing for political reasons, so in 1974 he took a blue-collar job in the Trutnov Brewery. In 1975 he authored an extensive letter to Gustáv Husák analyzing the social and political situation in Czechoslovakia. The letter was not answered by the authorities but was widely noticed at home and strengthened Havel’s reputation as one of the leaders of the intellectual opposition. In the 1970s he wrote several plays: Audience (Audience; 1975); Vernisáž (Varnishing day; 1975); Horský hotel (Mountain hotel; 1976); and Protest (1978), published and staged only abroad or in the uncensored press at home. He also authored the famous essay Moc bezmocných (1978; Power of the Powerless, 1985).

In 1976 Havel was one of the initiators and authors of Charter 77, announced on 1 January 1977. A year later he became its spokesman. Soon he was arrested for the first time, but he was released in the same year. On 24 April 1978 he co-founded the Committee for the Defense of the Unjustly Prosecuted (Výbor na Obranu Nespravedlivě Stíhaných). In 1978 he was arrested again, and in 1979 he was sentenced to four and a half years in prison for an “attempt to overthrow the republic.” Released in March 1983 for health reasons, he was already an unquestionable leader of the democratic opposition in Czechoslovakia. He still wrote a lot—for instance, the dramas Largo desolato (1984; English version, 1987); Pokoušení (1985; Temptation, 1987); and Asanace (Garbage removal; 1987). In 1987–89 he belonged to the editorial board and wrote for the uncensored Lidové Noviny. He was true to liberal and democratic values, resisting the illusion of “socialism with a human face.” He also pointed to the egoism of Western societies, interested in consumption and unwilling to help the nations enslaved by communism.

On 16 January 1989 Havel took part in a demonstration in Venceslas Square in Prague on the twentieth anniversary of the death of Jan Palach. After the demonstration he was arrested, but in May 1989 he was conditionally released. After a demonstration on 17 November 1989 commemorating the fiftieth anniversary of the death of Jan Opletal, brutally crushed by the police, Havel took the lead of the Velvet Revolution. On 19 November he co-founded the Civic Forum (Občanské Forum [OF]). After negotiations with the Communist authorities and the creation of the “government of national reconciliation,” Havel agreed to run for president. His election on 29 December 1989 sealed the fall of the Communist regime in Czechoslovakia. Havel tried to remove the adjective “Socialist” from the name of the country; this led to his first conflict between the Czechs and Slovaks concerning their relationship within the federation.

Havel’s legitimacy was confirmed by the first free parliamentary elections in June 1990: the newly elected parliament reelected him president in July 1990. He was very active on the international scene and tried to save the Czechoslovak federation. Nevertheless he made mistakes in relation to the Slovak question, antagonizing the ambitious Slovak leaders. After the parliamentary elections of June 1992 the breakup of Czechoslovakia seemed inevitable, and on 3 July 1992 the Federal Assembly refused, owing to the Slovak votes, to approve Havel's presidency for the next term. On 20 July 1992 he resigned from the remaining three months of his presidency. On 1 January 1993 the federation ceased to exist, and on 26 January 1993 the Czech National Council elected him the first president of the Czech Republic. On 20 January 1998 he was re-elected for another five-year term. As president Havel did not have broad powers, but thanks to his unquestionable authority and the support of most Czechs, he had a strong influence on Czech politics, especially in crisis situations. As a nonparty person, he frequently criticized various actions of politicians, especially those of Prime Minister Václav Klaus; this resulted in frequent conflicts between the two men. Havel remained a key figure in Czech foreign policy. As someone who was very popular in the West, he was undoubtedly responsible for the Czech entry into NATO (12 March 1999) and the European Union (1 May 2004). (PU)

Sources: ČBS; Kdo byl kdo v našich dějinách ve 20. století, vol. 1 (Prague, 1998); Slovník českých spisovatelů od roku 1945, vol. 1 (Prague, 1998); Eda Kriseová, Václav Havel: Životopis (Brno, 1991); Ortwin Ramadan, Václav Havel: Ein Portrait (Munich, 1991); Michael Simmons, The Reluctant President: A Political Life of Václav Havel (London, 1991); Halina Janaszek-Ivančíková, ed., Literatury zachodniosłowiańskie czasu przełomów 1890–1990, vol. 2: Literatura czeška (Katowice, 1999); John Keane, Václav Havel: A Political Tragedy in Six Acts (London, 1999).

HAVELKA Jiří (25 July 1892, Oryol, Russia–5 June 1964, Hostomice pod Brdy, near Beroun), Czech lawyer and politician. Havelka completed law studies at the Czech University in Prague. Between 1919 and 1921 he worked in the State Roads Administration, and from 1921 to 1933, in the Ministry of Railways. From 1931 he was a docent (associate professor) in the Law Department of Charles University in Prague. In 1933 he became legal counselor to the Supreme Administrative Court in Prague, where he met Emil Hácha and became his closest co-worker. Havelka was the author of many works in the field of railway and administrative law. He also edited Slovník československého veřejného práva (Dictionary of Czechoslovak public law). After the Pact of Munich, from December 1938 to April 1939 Havelka was minister without portfolio and minister of transport, and he simultaneously acted as head of the chancellery of the president, later receiving a formal appointment to this position. In 1939–40 he also served as deputy prime minister of the government of Alois Eliáš. Havelka had a great influence on the policy of Hácha. Havelka himself often represented the government in talks with Konstantin von Neurath, the Reich protector of Bohemia and Moravia, and other Nazi officials, and he did not hesitate to oppose them on many occasions. In September 1939 he protested the arrests of Jews; a month later, he persuaded Hácha not to adopt anti-Jewish laws. With Eliáš, he worked with the national and foreign resistance movement. The information that Havelka provided was valuable for the Czech underground. Dismissed from all his government positions in April 1941, he resumed work in the Supreme Administrative Court. After Reinhard Heydrich was appointed as Reich protector in September 1941, Havelka was arrested and imprisoned. Released from Pankrac Prison owing to the intervention of President Hácha, who threatened to resign, he was held under house arrest until the end of World War II. After the war he was accused of collaboration and imprisoned, but in March 1947 the People's Court acquitted him of charges. Persecuted by the Communists in the 1950s, Havelka had to leave Prague, and until the end of his life he lived in seclusion in the countryside. (PU)

Sources: ČBS; Českoslovenští politici: 1918–1991 (Prague, 1991); Politická elita meziválečného Československa 1918–1938: Kdo byl kdo za první republiky (Prague, 1998); Kdo byl kdo v našich dějinách ve 20. století, vol. 1 (Prague, 1998).

HÁY Gyula (5 May 1900, Abony–7 May 1975, Ascona, Switzerland), Hungarian writer. After graduating from high school, Háy studied at the Budapest Polytechnic but did not complete his studies. In 1919 he worked in the People's Commissariat of Education of the Hungarian Soviet Republic (HSR). From 1920 he was in exile in Germany, where he worked as an interior decorator. After returning to Hungary in 1923, he worked with the press and with leftist organizations. In 1929 he again went to Germany, where he joined the Communist Party. Later, he was in exile in Austria, Switzerland, and the USSR (1935–45). Háy made his debut as a writer in the 1920s. In 1929 he published the novel Színhely: Budapest; idő: tíz év előtt (Place of action: Budapest; Time: Ten years ago), which included numerous autobiographical elements, yet the historical drama Isten, császár, paraszt (God, Caesar, and peasants), staged in Berlin in 1932, brought him greater acclaim. From then on Háy turned to writing drama. After returning to Hungary, he also wrote film scripts, and as head of the chair of drama in the School of Drama in Budapest, he promoted Socialist realism. After Stalin's death in 1953, Háy became a prominent figure of the Hungarian thaw in literary circles. He also wrote articles in which he ironically commented on the Communist reality. During the invasion of Budapest by the Soviet Army in November 1956, Háy was the author of the Hungarian Writers' Union's dramatic call for resistance broadcasts on the radio. Arrested and sentenced to six years' imprisonment in a show trial in 1957, Háy was released under amnesty in 1960. In 1964 he emigrated to Switzerland, from where he contributed to the leading periodicals issued by Hungarians in exile, Irodalmi Újság and Új Látóhatár, which also published his later dramas. Háy was also occupied with translations, particularly of works by German and Russian authors. In 1974 he published his memoirs, Born in 1900: Memoirs. (MS)

Sources: Paul Ignatus, Hungary (London, 1972); Péter Gál Molnár, "Nekrológ helyett," Kritika, 1975, no. 6; Lóránt Czigány, Nézz vissza haraggal! Államosított irodalom Magyarországon, 1946–1988 (Budapest, 1990); János Szabó, Der "vollkommender Macher" Julius Hay: Ein Dramatiker im Bann der Zeitgeschichte (Munich, 1992); Éva Háy, Auf beiden Seiten der Barrikade (Leipzig, 1994).

HEBRANG Andrija (21 October 1899, Bačevac, near Virovitica–11 June 1949, Belgrade), Croatian Communist activist. Born into a peasant family, Hebrang studied in a trade school (1912–14), and in 1917 he joined the army, serving in an artillery regiment in Osijek and Zagreb. From 1919 he belonged to the Socialist Workers' Party of Yugoslavia, renamed the Communist Party of Yugoslavia in June 1920. From 1923 he lived in Zagreb, and in 1925 he became secretary of the local party committee. In 1928 he was sentenced to twelve years in prison for his Communist activities. He served in prisons in Leopoglava and Sremska Mitrovica. After his release, in 1941 he returned to Zagreb and became a member of the Central Committee of the Croatian Communist Party and head of its military committee. Wounded in action, in February 1942 Hebrang was caught by the Ustasha authorities, but in September 1942 he was exchanged. He was active in the Zagreb Anti-Fascist Council of National Liberation of Croatia, created in 1943. From October 1944 he was commissar of trade and industry, and from March 1945, minister of industry. In January 1948 he became head of the Federal Planning Commission. Probably owing to Soviet provocation, Josip Broz Tito lost confidence in Hebrang. Monitored from March 1948, the following month Hebrang was put under practical house arrest, and in May 1948 he was dismissed from his position and arrested. He was accused of sending secret reports to Moscow. Tito considered him a rival who enjoyed the support of the Kremlin; this was particularly dangerous for Hebrang after the Cominform's condemnation of Tito in June 1948. Hebrang was put in the Belgrade prison of Glavnjač, where he was brutally interrogated and died or committed suicide. His burial place is not known. After decades of effort by his family, Hebrang was rehabilitated in 1989. (AO)

Sources: Stephen Clissold, ed., Yugoslavia and the Soviet Union 1939–1973: A Documentary Survey (London, 1975); Zvonko Ivanković-Vonta, Hebrang (Zagreb, 1988); Živorad Mihajlović, Hebrang: Izdajnik ili žrtva političke igre (Belgrade, 1989); Nada Kisić-Kolanović, Andrija Hebrang: Iluzije i otrežnjenja (Zagreb, 1996); www.posta.hr/markeasp/index_e.asp; www.andrija-hebrang.com.

HEGEDÜS András (31 October 1922, Szilsárkány–23 October 1999, Budapest), Hungarian Communist activist. Born into the family of a medium-size estate owner, Hegedüs lost his father in early childhood. During the German occupation he was the secretary of the Union of Communist Youth, and in January 1945 he became regional secretary of the Hungarian Union of Democratic Youth, which was created at the initiative of the Communists. Later, he was appointed national organizational secretary of the union. In 1946 he underwent a three-month training course at a higher party school. From the end of 1947 Hegedüs was agricultural adviser to Ernő Gerő and deputy head, later becoming head, of the Department of Agriculture and Collective Farms of the Central Committee (CC) of the Hungarian Communist Party. From 1950 he was a member of the CC of the Hungarian Workers' Party (HWP) and its Secretariat. At the Second Congress of the HWP, held in February 1951, Hegedüs was elected to the organizational committee of the Politburo and to the CC. From November 1951 he was deputy minister of agriculture, and from January 1952 he was minister of the state-owned agricultural and forest farms. In the first government of Imre Nagy in 1953 Hegedüs served as first deputy prime minister and minister of agriculture. On 18 April 1955 he was appointed president of the Council of Ministers, and in this capacity he signed, on behalf of Hungary, the treaty establishing the Warsaw Pact.

During the revolution, on 24 October 1956 Hegedüs was dismissed as premier and was appointed deputy prime minister. On 28 October he signed the government's formal request for the assistance of Soviet troops, which were stationed in Hungary. He antedated the document five days. The Politburo had already made this decision on the night of 23–24 October. On 29 October, along with other discredited executive activists Hegedüs was taken to the USSR. In Moscow, he worked at the Institute of Philosophy of the Soviet Academy of Sciences. After his return to Hungary in September 1958, he worked at the Institute of Economic Sciences of the Hungarian Academy of Sciences (HAS), and from 1962 he was vice-president of the Central Statistical Office. From 1963 he headed the Sociology Research Group, which was created at the HAS, and from 1966 he lectured at the Karl Marx University of Economics.

In the mid-1960s Hegedüs's views underwent a gradual metamorphosis. In 1968 he condemned the intervention of Warsaw Pact troops in Czechoslovakia. As a result, he was dismissed from his post and went to work at the Industrial Research Group of the HAS. In 1973 the Politburo of the Hungarian Socialist Workers' Party passed a resolution on the "anti-Marxist views of certain sociologists," among them Hegedüs; in May the same year he was accused of revisionism in the so-called trial of philosophers, expelled from the party, and dismissed from work. In 1975–90, because of the great interest he attracted (owing, for example, to his complicated career path), Hegedüs toured the world, giving lectures; in these lectures he subjected socialism to scholarly and political criticism, trying to draw the world's attention to Eastern Europe. In 1979 he signed a declaration of solidarity with the imprisoned members of the Czechoslovak Charter 77 movement. In December 1986 he took part in an illegal conference devoted to the events of 1956. In December 1988 he delivered a lecture at the first legal and public conference on the revolution of 1956. In 1988 he was elected titular professor of the Karl Marx University of Economics. Among other works, Hegedüs published his memoirs, A történelem és a hatalom igézetében (Life under the spell of history and power), and Élet egy eszme árnyékában (Life in the shadow of one idea). (JT)

Sources: Bennet Kovrig, Communism in Hungary from Kun to Kádár (Stanford, 1979); Miklós Molnár, From Béla Kun to János Kádár: Seventy Years of Hungarian Communism (New York, 1990); Magyar Nagylexikon, vol. 9 (Budapest, 1999); A magyar forradalom és szabadságharc enciklopédiája, CD-ROM (Budapest, 1999).

HEL Ivan (17 July 1937, Klitsko, near Horodka), Ukrainian dissident and politician. The son of a soldier of the Organization of Ukrainian Nationalists who was sentenced to twenty years in 1950, Hel was expelled from tenth grade in 1952 for refusing to join the Komsomol. In 1954 he graduated from high school in Sambor. In view of his background, he was not allowed to study at Lviv University, so he became a metalworker. He was accepted into an extramural program of the study of history only after he did military service (1956–59). Thanks to his acquaintance with Mykhailo Horyn, Hel joined the opposition and mainly dealt with the distribution of uncensored samizdat publications. Arrested in August 1965, in March 1966 he was sentenced to three years of labor camp. He served his term in Mordovian camps. In 1967 he twice addressed the Presidium of the Supreme Council of the Ukrainian SSR to legalize the Ukrainian Greek Catholic Church. After his return to Lviv, he was not allowed to complete his studies, and he worked as a metalworker and teacher in Sambor. From 1968 to 1971 he published eleven uncensored books, including those by Valentyn Moroz and Ivan Dziuba. In November 1970 he turned to the Supreme Court of the Ukrainian SSR in defense of Moroz. In January 1972 Hel was arrested again, and in August 1972 he was sentenced to ten years in labor camp and five years of forced settlement. All together he spent three hundred days on hunger strikes in the camps of the Mordovian and Komi ASSRs, demanding the status of a political prisoner. Under the pseudonym "Stepan Howerlja," he wrote and published in London Hrani kultury (Edges of culture; 1984), which was a polemic with Dziuba's Hrani krystala (Edges of crystal). From the spring of 1987, along with Vyacheslav Chornovil and Horyn, Hel co-edited the reconstructed Ukraiinskyi Visnyk. When Yosif Terelya emigrated, Hel took the lead of the Committee for the Defense of the Ukrainian Catholic Church. He edited the informal organ of the committee, Khrystyanskyi Holos, and then Vira batkiv. In 1989 he co-founded the Ukrainian Popular Movement (Rukh). In 1990–94 he was deputy chairman of the Lviv regional Council of Deputies, and then he presided over the regional commission for rehabilitation of those repressed under communism. (TS)

Sources: Encyclopedia of Ukraine, vol. 2 (Toronto, 1988); Visnyk represiy v Ukraini, Zakordonne predstavnytvo Ukraiinskyi Helsynskoyi Hrupy (New York, 1980–81); Ludmila Alekseyeva, Istoriya inakomysla v SSSR (Vilnius and Moscow, 1992); Heorhiy Kasyanov, Nezhodni: Ukraiinska intelihentsiya v rusi oporu 1960–80 rokov (Kiev, 1995); Anatoli Rusnachenko, Natsionalno-vyzvolnyi rukh v Ukraini (Kiev, 1998); T. Batenko, "Ya povstayu, otzhe, i isnuyu . . .": Politychnyi portret Ivana Hela (Narysy z istoriyi ukraiinskoho rukhu oporu kintsia 1950-kh–pochatku 1990-kh rokov) (Lviv, 1999).

HENDRYCH Jiří (28 December 1913, Lom, near Most–16 May 1979, Prague), Czech Communist activist. Between 1932 and 1933 Hendrych studied law at Charles University in Prague, but because of his political activities, he was expelled from the university. In 1931–34 he was a member of a Communist youth organization, and in 1934 he joined the Communist Party of Czechoslovakia (CPC). In the late 1930s he was active as a party functionary in the districts of Teplice and Kladno. Between 1937 and 1938 he was editor of the party newspaper, Svoboda, in Kladno, and from 1939 to 1941 he was a member of an illegal district committee of the CP in Kladno. Arrested in 1941, Hendrych was held at the concentration camp of Mauthausen until the end of the war. In 1945–71 he was a member of the CC of the CPC; from 1951 to 1952 and from 1954 to 1968 he was secretary and member of the Secretariat of the CC of the CPC, and between 1958 and 1968 he was a member of the Politburo (later Presidium) of the CC of the CPC. In 1963–65 Hendrych was president of an agricultural commission, and between 1965 and 1968 he was president of an ideological commission of the CC of the CPC. Between 1950 and 1969 he sat in the National Assembly, and then, until 1971, in the Federal Assembly. In the 1950s and 1960s he was the main party ideologist, and he actively fought against revisionism and against “ideological diversion.” He was a close associate of Antonín Novotný, whom he knew from the concentration camp. Before the Prague Spring Hendrych was considered the second most important figure in the party, and during the struggle within the party in 1967 he declared himself against the reformation movement. Denounced in the spring of 1968, he was dismissed from all important party and state posts. Hendrych’s downfall was considered the greatest success of the cabinet policy of the reformers. (PU)

Sources: ČBS; Kdo byl kdo v našich dějinách ve 20. století, vol. 1 (Prague, 1998); Galia Golan, Reform Rule in Czechoslovakia: The Dubček Era, 1968–1969 (Cambridge, 1973); Kieran Williams, The Prague Spring and Its Aftermath (Cambridge, 1997); Jaromir Navrátil, ed., The Prague Spring 1968 (Prague, 1998); Kenneth N. Skoug, Jr., Czechoslovakia’s Lost Fight for Freedom, 1967–1969 (Westport, Conn., 1999).

HENIUSH Larysa (9 August 1910, Voupa, near Volkovysk–7 April 1983, Zelva), Belorussian poet. In 1928 Heniush graduated from a Polish gymnasium in Volkovysk, and in 1937 she went to Prague, where her husband, Ivan, was studying. She was secretary to Vasil Zakharka, the president of the Belorussian People’s Republic (BPR) in exile. She also cared for the Belorussian émigrés from Poland and the USSR and was in charge of the documentation of the BPR. She made her literary debut in 1939, and in the 1940s she published poems in Ranitsa and Belaruskí Rabotnik, Belorussian newspapers that came out in Berlin. She attended the Second All-Belorussian Congress convened in German-occupied Minsk in June 1944. In 1948 she was arrested by the NKVD in Prague, although she had Czechoslovak citizenship. She was held in Soviet prisons in Vienna and Lviv. In 1949, in a trial held in a Minsk court, she was sentenced to twenty-five years in a concentration camp in the Komi ASSR for collaboration with the Germans. In 1956 a commission of the Supreme Soviet of the USSR commuted the sentence to eight years but did not rehabilitate her. After returning from the camp, Heniush settled in Zelva, where she spent the rest of her life. In 1942 the first collection of her poems, Ad rodnykh niu (From native fields), appeared in Prague. From 1963 her poems were published in the Soviet press. The most important collections of her works include Nevadam z Niomana (With a fishing net from the Neman River; 1967); Bely son (White dream; 1992); and a work for children written in verse, Kazki dla Michaški (Fairy tales for Michaška; 1972). Heniush’s autobiography, Spoved (Confession; 1993), was published after her death. In it, the tragic fate of the Belorussian intelligentsia of the twentieth century was depicted. (EM)

Sources: Nicholas P. Vakar, Belorussia: The Making of a Nation (Cambridge, Mass., 1956); B. Sachanka, “Larysa Heniush,” Maladosts, 1988, no. 10; Bielaruskiya pismenniki (1917–1990): Davednik (Minsk, 1994); Bielaruskaia entsiklopediya, vol. 5 (Minsk, 1995).

HENLEIN Konrad (6 May 1898, Maffersdorf bei Reichenberg [now Vratislavice, near Liberec, Czech Republic]–10 May 1945, Plzeň), German politician in Czechoslovakia. During World War I Henlein volunteered for the Austro-Hungarian Army and in 1917 was taken captive in Italy. It was there that his nationalistic and Greater Germany views crystallized. In 1919 he returned to his newly created fatherland, Czechoslovakia, where he initially worked as a bank clerk. From 1925 he worked as a gymnastics teacher. He perceived gymnastics as a vital element in bringing up the youth in a nationalistic spirit. From 1931 he was leader of the German Gymnastic Union in Czechoslovakia. After the activities of the NSDAP (Nationalsozialistische Deutsche Arbeiterpartei) were outlawed in Czechoslovakia, in October 1933 Henlein founded the Sudeten German Home Front (Sudetendeutsche Heimatfront), which later changed its name to the Sudeten German Party (Sudetendeutsche Partei [SdP]). The SdP initially tried to distance itself from Fascist Germany, declaring formal support for the republic. During the Great Depression the SdP became a leading force in Czechoslovak politics, gaining 1.2 million votes in 1935, becoming the second strongest party in the parliament. Henlein increasingly firmly demanded autonomy for the Germans in Czechoslovakia, and from 1937 he began openly to call for the incorporation of the Czech Sudetenland into the Third Reich; a secret memorandum to this effect was presented to Hitler in the autumn. Over the course of the following year German demands, transmitted by Henlein (which were, in fact, Hitler’s demands), gradually increased, and the Czechoslovak side submitted to virtually all of them in an attempt to save the country. Following the Munich Diktat and the German annexation of the lands inhabited by the German population, Henlein became Gauleiter (regional governor) of the Sudetenland (Reichsgau Sudetenland). At the beginning of May 1945 Henlein was taken captive by the Americans, and he committed suicide in a Plzeň camp. (PU)

Sources: Deutsche Biographische Enzyklopädie, vol. 4 (Munich, 1996); Kto bol kto za I. ČSR (Bratislava, 1993); Kdo byl kdo v našich dějinách ve 20. století, vol. 1 (Prague, 1998); Stanislav Biman, Kariéra učitele tělocviku (Usti n. Labou, 1983); Ralf Gebel, Heim ins Reich! Konrad Henlein und der Reichsgau Sudetenland (1938–1945) (Munich, 2000).

HERBERT Zbigniew (29 October 1924, Lwów [now Lviv, Ukraine]–28 July 1998, Warsaw), Polish poet, essayist, and playwright. The son of a bank director, Herbert was a student at the Kazimierz Wielki Gymnasium when the Red Army entered Lwów in 1939. He attended an underground high school during the wartime German occupation of Poland and also completed a cadet officers' school of the Polish Home Army in 1942. In 1943 he passed his high school final exams and began studying at the underground Jan Kazimierz University in Lwów. In 1944 he went with his family to Kraków. After the war he simultaneously gained admission to drama, economics, and art studies in Kraków. He chose the Academy of Commerce, from which he graduated in 1947. He also studied law and philosophy, first at the Jagiellonian University in Kraków and then at the Mikołaj Kopernik University in Toruń, under the direction of Henryk Elzenberg, his professor and mentor. In 1946 he moved to the Gdańsk-Sopot-Gdynia area (the Triple City) and in 1949 to Toruń.

In 1948 Herbert started writing columns for Tygodnik Wybrzeża and Arkona, and he became a candidate member of the Gdańsk branch of the Polish Writers' Union, but he left it that very year, before the political verification of its members. In 1949 he earned a degree in law from Toruń University. In order to avoid training as a prosecutor for the military, he moved to Warsaw, where for a number of years he worked at a variety of odd jobs, such as shop assistant, calculator and time-study man at a cooperative society, designer in the peat industry, and administrative manager of the Union of Polish Composers. In 1950 Herbert made his literary debut with the poems Napis (Register), Pożegnanie września (Goodbye to September), and Złoty środek (Golden mean). Before 1956 he wrote columns, reviews, and short essays in Słowo Powszechne (1949–51), Dziś i jutro (1950–53, under the pseudonyms of Patryk and Stefan Martha), Przegląd Powszechny (1952, under the pseudonym of Bolesław Hertyński), and Tygodnik Powszechny (1950–53). From 1955 he contributed to the literary review Twórczość.

During the “thaw” Herbert published his first collection of poems, Struna światła (The Chord of light; 1956), which, along with the drama Jaskinia filozofów (Philosophers' den; 1956) and his second collection of poems, Hermes, pies i gwiazda (Hermes, a dog and a star; 1957), put him among the most prominent Polish postwar poets. Herbert resumed writing for the revived Tygodnik Powszechny. In 1958 he went abroad for the first time, traveling to France, England, Italy, and Greece. He came into contact with émigré circles, including the Paris-based Kultura group. The year 1961 saw the publication of a volume of his poems, Studium przedmiotu (A study of the object). In 1962 he published Barbarzyńca w ogrodzie (A Barbarian in the Garden; 1985), a collection of essays inspired by his visits to France and Italy, and in 1969 another collection of poems, Napis (Register), came out. He also wrote dramatic works and plays for the radio. In recognition for his work, both in Poland and abroad, Herbert received the Kościelski Foundation Prize (1963), the Jurzykowski Foundation Award (1965), the Internationaler Nikolaus Lenau Preis (1965), and the Herder Prize; he was also granted membership in the Akademie der Kunste in Berlin and the Akademie der Schönen Kunste in Munich. His poetry was translated into English, German, Danish, Czech, Hungarian, Serbo-Croatian, Norwegian, Swedish, and Romanian. The German editions (1964 and 1967, translated by Karl Dedecius) and the English editions (1968, translated by Czesław Miłosz and Peter Dale Scott) have influenced contemporary German- and English-language poetry. After 1965 Herbert traveled a lot, and he lived in France, the Federal Republic of Germany, the United States, and other countries.

In 1971 Herbert returned to Warsaw. The 1974 publication of Pan Cogito (Mr. Cogito; 1993), a volume of his verse, was an important literary and social event. This work was read as a program for reconstructing the foundations of individual existence within a totalitarian or consumerist order that erodes the human conscience. For the leading poets of the younger generation, the so-called New Wave (including Stanisław Barańczak, Adam Zagajewski, and Ryszard Krynicki), Herbert was the main reference. In 1975 Herbert signed the “Letter of 59,” a protest against amendments to the constitution of the Polish People's Republic. This act consolidated his position as the leading poet of moral resistance against the Communist dictatorship. Polish Communist censors imposed a ban on the publication of his works. Between 1975 and 1981 Herbert lived in Germany, Austria, and Italy. In 1977 he became a member of the clandestine literary periodical Zapis. Upon returning to Poland in 1981, he became involved in the Solidarity movement. After the imposition of martial law in Poland he worked with underground publishing houses. In 1983 Polish independent publishers and the Literary Institute in Paris published Herbert's Raport z obleżonego miasta (Report from the Besieged City; 1985), a volume of verse that was a continuation of the poetic and moral program of Pan Cogito. From 1986 to 1992 Herbert lived in France. The year 1990 saw the publication of another collection of his poetry, Elegia na odejście (Elegy for the Departure and Other Poems). After returning to Poland, Herbert published a collection of essays, Martwa natura z wędzidłem (Still life with a bridle; 1993), and his last two volumes of poetry, Rovigo (1993) and Epilog burzy (Epilogue of the storm; 1998). Herbert received awards in Poland and abroad, including the German Petrarch Prize (1978), the Andrzej Strug Award (1981), the Solidarity Honorary Cultural Award (1983), the Sęp-Szarzyński Award (1984), the Hungarian Bethlen Prize (1987), the Polish-Jewish-American Bruno Schulz Prize (1988), and the Jerusalem Prize (1990). He died after a prolonged illness in Warsaw. A volume of his essays, Labirynt nad morzem (Labyrinth by the sea), was published in 2000. Herbert exerted a powerful influence upon Polish poetry in the second half of the twentieth century, and since the 1970s, his work has shaped the attitudes of both the intellectual elite and a wider audience. (DT)

Sources: Jan Błoński, "Tradycja, ironia i głębsze znaczenie," Poezja, 1970, no. 3; Julian Kornhauser and Adam Zagajewski, Świat nie przedstawiony (Kraków, 1974); Karl Dedecius, Polnische Profile (Frankfurt am Main, 1975); R. Przybylski, To jest klasycyzm (Warsaw, 1978); B. Carpenter and J. Carpenter, "The Poet as Conscience," Slavic and East European Journal, 1980, no. 1; Stanisław Barańczak, Uciekinier z Utopii: O poezji Zbigniewa Herberta (London, 1984); E. Balcerzan, Poezja polska w latach 1939–1965 (Warsaw, 1988); A. Franaszek, Ciemne źródło (o twórczości Zbigniewa Herberta) (London, 1998); Joanna Siedlecka, Pan od poezji: Rzecz o Zbigniewie Herbercie (Warsaw, 2002).

HERCZEG Ferenc (22 September 1863, Versec [Vršac], Banat—24 February 1954, Budapest), Hungarian writer and politician. Born into a middle-class German family, Herczeg wrote his first works in German since he only learned the Hungarian language at the Piarist Gymnasium in Szeged later on. Between 1878 and 1881 he studied law at the university in Budapest, where he also started his law practice, which he continued in his native Versec and in Timișoara. Leading a stormy life and gambling, Herczeg began writing and publishing novels. After a duel that ended in the death of his adversary, Herczeg landed in prison for a few months. His first novel, Fenn és lenn (Up and down; 1890), was a history of nightclub and casino life. In 1891 Herczeg became editor-in-chief of the capital's daily, Budapesti Hirlap, and one year later he published a short story collection, Mutamur (We are changing), about the love adventures of women. This collection earned him nationwide fame and culminated with a trilogy on the life of the Gyurkovics family (1893–99), the first part of which, A Gyurkovics leányok (The Gyurkovics girls), was adapted for the theater and was staged throughout Europe. From 1894 to 1944 Herczeg was editor-in-chief of Új idők, the most popular magazine of the conservative upper and middle classes of Hungary.

Herczeg began his political career in 1896, becoming a member of the lower chamber of the parliament and, in 1927, an MP in the upper chamber. An adviser and close friend of Prime Minister István Tisza, in 1899 Herczeg became a member of the Hungarian Academy of Sciences, where he served as vice-president on several occasions. Under the Hungarian Soviet Republic (HSR) Herczeg was dismissed from his job and was even imprisoned for a short time. Herczeg belonged to many literary societies. He wrote and published a lot, including fairy tales—Napnyugati mesék (Fairy tales at sunset; 1894); serious novels—Simon Zsuzsa (1894), Az aranyhegedű (Golden violin; 1916); historical novels—Pogányok (Pagans; 1902), Hét sváb (Seven Swabians; 1916), Az élet kapuja (The gates of life; 1919); and dramas, the most popular of which were Ocskay brigadéros (Brigadier Ocskay; 1901), Bizánc (Byzantium; 1904), and Kék róka (The blue fox; 1917). Herczeg's works were characterized by simple composition and dialogues that contained imaginative ideas and references to old Hungarian mythology. During the interwar period Herczeg was called the "prince of literature" and was the Hungarian government's most promoted writer, exerting a significant influence upon the literary life of his country during the first decades of the twentieth century. Beginning in 1929, he held the influential position of president of the Revisionist League, an association of intellectuals who aimed at changing the Hungarian borders established by the Treaty of Trianon. Herczeg was fascinated by Italian fascism. However, he rejected German Nazism from the beginning and tried to influence Regent Miklós Horthy against it. After the end of World War II Herczeg was dismissed from all his positions, and his works were banned from publication in Hungary until the mid-1980s. (MS)

Sources: Erzsébet Hamvai, Herczeg Ferenc stílusa és nyelve (Budapest, 1911); Herczeg Ferenc, Emlékkönyv (Budapest, 1943); József Fitz, Herczeg Ferenc irodalmi munkássága (Budapest, 1944); Mały słownik pisarzy węgierskich (Warsaw, 1977).

HERLING-GRUDZIŃSKI Gustaw (20 May 1919, Kielce—4 July 2000, Naples, Italy), Polish writer and publicist. Born into an impoverished landowning family, between 1929 and 1937 Herling-Grudziński attended high school in Kielce. In 1935 he made his literary debut in the Warsaw youth periodical Kuźnia Młodych. In 1937 he began studying Polish philology at Warsaw University, but his studies were interrupted by the war. As a student, he contributed to the periodicals of the Union of Polish Democratic Youth. He wrote for the bi-weekly Przemiany, where he worked as editor of the literary section, and in 1938 he started publishing in Orka na Ugorze. Before 1939 he published a number of reviews and critical essays in major literary magazines—Ateneum, Nasz Wyrzaz, Pion, and Pióro.

In October 1939 Herling-Grudziński co-founded and was chief-of-staff of the underground Polish People's Independence Action (Polska Ludowa Akcja Niepodległościowa [PLAN]). He went to the territories occupied by the USSR. In December 1939 he was in Białystok, then in Lwów (Lviv), where he became acquainted with Polish literary circles. Lacking prospects for further activities, he went to Grodno and worked there as a carpenter's apprentice in a puppet theater. Warned of possible arrest, in March 1940 he went into hiding near Sokółka. Arrested by the NKVD while trying to cross the Lithuanian border, he was sentenced to five years in prison on the charge of spying for Germany. His German-sounding name was used as evidence in his case. He was taken from the prison in Vitebsk to Leningrad and Vologda, and finally he was sent to a labor camp in Yertsevo in the region of Archangel. He worked unloading railway cars, and after the outbreak of the German-Soviet war, he was employed in the so-called general works section. In November 1941, following the proclamation of "amnesty" for the Poles imprisoned in the USSR, Herling-Grudziński went on a hunger strike in protest against being held in the labor camp. Thanks to his protest, in January 1942 he was released, and in March, along with the Tenth Division of the army of General Władysław Anders, he left the USSR. Via Iran, Iraq, Palestine, and Egypt, he reached Italy, where in May 1944 he served as a radio operator for the Third Carpathian Rifle Division in the battle of Monte Cassino. Decorated with the Virtuti Militari Cross for his valor in the battle, he also fought in the battles of Ancona and the Gothic Line. As a soldier, he wrote articles for Kurier Polski (published in Baghdad), the monthly W drodze (published in Jerusalem), the weekly Orzeł Biały, and other periodicals.

In 1945 in Rome, Herling-Grudziński published his first book, Żywi i umarli (The living and the dead), a collection of essays from 1943–45, and he took over the literary section of Orzeł Biały. In June 1947, also in Rome, along with Jerzy Giedroyć, Jerzy Czapski, and Zofia and Zygmunt Hertz, he founded the monthly Kultura and the Literary Institute. However, he did not move with the Kultura group to Paris but went to London, where he began contributing to Wiadomości. In 1951 Inny Świat (The other world), a literary account of his prison and labor camp experiences, was published in English as A World Apart, with a preface by Bertrand Russell. The book, whose original Polish edition appeared in 1953 in London, was translated into Swedish, Spanish, German, Italian, French, Russian, Czech, Arabic, Chinese, and Japanese and became a classic of labor camp literature. After the death of his first wife in 1952 Herling-Grudziński moved to Munich, where he worked in the Polish section of Radio Free Europe. He was in charge of the cultural desk, reviewed Polish publications, and gave a regular talk, "A Letter to a Communist."

In 1955 Herling-Grudziński settled in Naples. He married Lidia Croce, daughter of Benedetto Croce. At the invitation of the writers Ignazio Silone and Nicola Chiaromonte, he began contributing to Il Tempo Presente, and he continued doing so until 1968. He also contributed to Il Corriere della Sera, Il Mondo, Il Giornale, and other periodicals. In 1956 he resumed his work with Kultura, where he published stories, essays, sketches, articles, reviews, and translations. In the Literary Institute in Paris his subsequent collections of stories and sketches were published: Skrzydła ołtarza (1960; The Island: Three Tales, 1994); Drugie przyjście (Second coming; 1963); and Upiory rewolucji (Specters of revolution; 1969). In 1971 in Kultura, he began to publish his Dziennik pisany nocą (The journal written at night; 1996), an intellectual record of everyday impressions and opinions interwoven with pieces of literary fiction. In 1974, along with Czapski and Giedroyć, Herling-Grudziński joined the editorial committee of a Russian émigré quarterly, Kontinent. In the second half of the 1970s, the independent Polish periodicals (among them Zapis, Puls, and Krytyka) and publishing houses (such as NOWa, KOS, CDN, BAZA, and Enklawa) began to publish his works. Herling-Grudziński supported the opposition in Poland. He was, among other things, a trustee of the underground Polish Alliance for Independence (Polskie Porozumienie Niepodległościow [PPN]) and a member of the Fund to Aid Independent Polish Literature and Science. Until 1988 his works were officially banned in Poland. From 1989 onward, he was a frequent visitor to Poland and commented on current Polish political and cultural events. He received many foreign and Polish awards, as well as awards from the émigré community, including the Jurzykowski Foundation Award (1965), the French PEN Club Prize and the Prix Gutenberg Award (1986), the Polish PEN Club Prize (1990), and the Premio

Viareggio Prize (1994). In 1996, as a result of differences in political opinions with Giedroyć, Herling-Grudziński left Kultura and transferred his Journal Written at Night to Rzeczpospolita, published in Poland. (DT)

Sources: Włodzimierz Bolecki, Ciemny staw: Trzy szkice do portretu Gustawa Herlinga-Grudzińskiego (Warsaw, 1991); R. K. Przybylski, ed., Być i pisać: O prozie Gustawa Herlinga-Grudzińskiego (Poznań, 1991); J. Paszek, Gustaw Herling-Grudziński (Katowice, 1992); Włodzimierz Bolecki and Gustaw Herling-Grudziński, Rozmowy w Dragoniei (Warsaw, 1997); Zdzisław Kudelski, ed., Herling-Grudziński i krytycy: Antologia tekstów (Lublin, 1997); Włodzimierz Bolecki and Gustaw Herling-Grudziński, Rozmowy w Neapolu (Warsaw, 1999).

HERMAIZE Josyf (1892, Kiev–?), Ukrainian historian of Karaite origin. During the revolution in the Ukraine Hermaize was a member of the Ukrainian Social Democratic Workers' Party (USDWP). He took part in the Ukrainian Military Congress and in the Small Council (Rada), an organ of the Ukrainian Central Council. He completed his studies in history and then lectured at Kiev University. In the 1920s he also served as secretary of the historical section and director of the archaeographic commission of the All-Ukrainian Academy of Sciences. He was a student and a close co-worker of Mykhaylo Hrushevsky. Arrested and accused of being a member of the Union for the Liberation of Ukraine in 1929, in 1930 Hermaize was sentenced to six years in prison. He served his sentence in Yaroslavl and on the Solovets Islands. After his release he settled in Saratov but was arrested again and sentenced to ten years. His further fate is unknown. Hermaize published Narysy z istorii revoliutsiinoho rukhu na Ukraïni (Essays in the history of the revolutionary movement in the Ukraine; 1926); Koliyivshchyna v svitli novoznaidenykh materiiativ (Koliyivshchyna in the light of newly discovered materials; 1924); and a number of articles devoted to important figures of Ukrainian social and political life in the nineteenth century (for example Decembrists, Mykhaylo Drahomanov and Volodymyr Antonovych). He also edited and published Kodenska khyha sudovykh aktiv (The Koden judicial book; 1931), a collection of documents about the Polish trials of participants of the Koliyivshchyna (peasant uprising). (TS)

Sources: Encyclopedia of Ukraine, vol. 2 (Toronto, 1988); W. Prystayko and Yu. Shapoval, Sprava "Spilki vyzvolennia Ukraïny" (Kiev, 1995); Mykhaylo Hrushevskyi i GPU-NKVD: Trahichne desiatylittia: 1924–1934 (Kiev, 1996).

HEYROVSKÝ Jaroslav (20 December 1890, Prague–27 March 1967, Prague), Czech chemist and physicist, Nobel Prize winner. The son of a lawyer, from childhood Heyrovský showed an interest in the natural sciences. After a year of studies in Prague, he moved to University College in London, where he began to work with the Nobel Prize winner William Ramsay. World War I found Heyrovský in Prague. He was mobilized and worked in a military hospital as a druggist and X-ray operator. In 1920 he received a postdoctoral degree at Charles University in Prague, and in 1926 he became a professor of physical chemistry there. Heyrovský's major accomplishment was the creation of a new line of electrochemistry—polarography. In 1922 he discovered electrolysis by means of a mercury drop electrode, and in 1925 he co-created the first polarograph. From 1925 Heyrovský belonged to the National Scholarly Council (Národní Rada Badatelská); from 1932 he was a full member of the Czech Royal Scholarly Society; in 1933 he lectured at the University of California at Berkeley; and from 1938 he was a full member of the Czech Academy of Science and Art. In 1929, along with Emil Votoček, he founded the scholarly periodical Collection of Czechoslovak Chemical Communications. In 1950 he organized the Institute of Polarography of the Czechoslovak Academy of Sciences, and until 1963 he was its first director. In 1959 he received the Nobel Prize in chemistry for discovering polarography and its applications in analytic chemistry. In 1965 he became a member of the Royal Society in London and an honorary doctor at Charles University in Prague. He authored and co-authored several works, including Použití polarografické metody v praktické chemii (The uses of the polarographic method in practical chemistry; 1933); Polarographie (Polarography; 1941); and Základy polarografie (Foundations of polarography; 1962 [with Jaroslav Kůta]). His works were translated into many languages. (PU)

Sources: ČBS; Wielka encyklopedia PWN, vol. 11 (Warsaw, 2002); Jiří Koryta, Jaroslav Heyrovský (Prague, 1990); Kdo byl kdo v našich dějinách ve 20. století, vol. 1 (Prague, 1998); Le prix Nobel en 1959 (Stockholm, 1960).

HLINKA Andrej (27 September 1864, Černová–16 August 1938, Ružomberok), Roman Catholic priest, founder of the Slovak national movement. Born into a peasant family, Hlinka was ordained in 1889. He worked for the revival of national consciousness among the Slovaks and was also active in the temperance movement. Along with Anton Bielek, he edited the periodical L'udové Noviny, which soon became immensely popular among peasants. Proceeding from the principles of the papal encyclical Rerum novarum of Pope Leo XIII, Hlinka appealed for the creation of a Slovak social program based upon the principles of Catholic social teaching. Following his example, many Slovak priests began establishing cooperative societies, people's banks, and temperance organizations.

Hlinka also defended the Catholic and national identity of the Slovaks and protested the introduction of Hungarian as a compulsory language in rural elementary schools because it led to an increase in illiteracy in Slovakia and made teaching religion among Slovak children more difficult. From 1905 Hlinka worked as a parish priest in Ružomberok. In 1913 he co-founded the Slovak People's Party (Slovenská Ľudová Strana) and sat as its representative in the parliament in Budapest. Initially he supported Slovak autonomy within the Hungarian state and was against a union of Slovakia with the Czechs within the framework of a projected federalist Habsburg monarchy. At that time he formed an electoral alliance with the Hungarian Catholic People's Party. In 1906 his involvement in the political campaign led to a conflict between him and his diocesan bishop, Sándor Párvy, an ardent advocate of the policy of denationalization of the Slovaks, who suspended Hlinka in his pastoral duties. Slovak as well as Moravian Catholics stood in defense of Hlinka. Pope Pius X also took his side and ordered the lifting of all church penalties that had been imposed on him.

In October 1907 dramatic events took place at Černova, Hlinka's native village. On his initiative, the local Catholics built a church there and wanted Hlinka to consecrate it. The Hungarian state and church authorities refused permission and sent another priest. As a result of protests by the local people, the Hungarian gendarmerie intervened, discharging a volley at the defenseless crowd and killing fifteen people. The killings in Černova led to protests in Europe and America, especially after a series of articles by Robert W. Seton-Watson, a British scholar, and after speeches by the Nobel Prize winner M. Bjørnstjerne Bjørnson. The Hungarian authorities arrested Hlinka, accusing him of anti-Hungarian agitation, but this only consolidated his position as one of the most important leaders of the Slovak nation. While in prison in Szeged (1907–10), Hlinka translated the Old Testament into the Slovak language. After his release he still maintained that autonomy within the Hungarian kingdom was the goal of the Slovaks. He rejected proposals for a common state with the Czechs as he feared that it would result in domination by liberal and Masonic elites. In 1917 he was appointed apostolic prothonotary.

With the collapse of the Habsburg state and the revolution in Hungary in 1918, Hlinka supported a program of federation with the Czechs. On 24 May 1918, as one of the leaders of the Slovak National Party, Hlinka stated at a meeting in Turčiansky Svätý Martin that it was time for the Slovaks to choose whether they wanted to be with the Hungarians or with the Czechs. Declaring for union with the Czechs, he joined the supporters of the Czechoslovak orientation. He was one of the signatories of a declaration issued on 30 October 1918 in Turčiansky Svätý Martin. The declaration was a political manifesto of Slovakia's sovereignty within a federal Czechoslovakia. In December 1918 Hlinka founded the Slovak People's Party, a Christian party later renamed the Slovak People's Party of Hlinka (Hlinkova Slovenská Ľudová Strana [HSL'S], also known as the Ludaks). The HSL'S supported the integration of the Slovaks and the Czechs but according to principles specified in the so-called Pittsburgh agreement of May 30, 1918, which foresaw the creation of a federation of two equal nations. The Ludak movement dominated the political life of Slovakia in the interwar period. From 1919 Hlinka edited the newspaper Slovak, the largest Slovak daily, in which he promoted Slovak autonomy and opposed the imposition by Prague of so-called Czechoslovakism, which in practice denied the Slovaks the right to their own national identity and viewed the Slovak language as a variant of Czech. In 1919, using a false passport, Hlinka traveled via Poland to Paris. At the Paris Peace Conference he made efforts to secure favorable provisions for Slovakia. After his return he was imprisoned by the Czechoslovak authorities.

In the 1920s Hlinka grew more and more disappointed with the development of national relations in Czechoslovakia. He considered the possibility of a federation of Slovakia with Poland, which he regarded as closer to Slovakia in terms of religion. However, when in 1927 a chance appeared for a change in the centralist policy of the Prague government, he decided that two HSL'S politicians would take part in a Czechoslovak government. After the arrest of Vojtech Tuka, who spied for Hungary but in whose guilt Hlinka did not believe, the members of the HSL'S left the government and until the end of the interwar period remained in opposition. The respect that Hlinka enjoyed allowed the HSL'S to maintain unity within its ranks in the 1930s, despite the clashing views of four factions: pro-Czech, pro-Hungarian, pro-Polish, and (the biggest one) the Slovak autonomists. Hlinka himself wanted to save the federation with the Czechs, although he criticized the current policies of the Prague government. During the celebration of the 1100th anniversary of the consecration of the first church in Nitra and the creation of the petty state of Prince Pribina, Hlinka did not support the radical Slovak nationalists, who openly called for the dismantling of Czechoslovakia. In 1935 he supported the election of Edvard Beneš to the post of president of Czechoslovakia. In the late 1930s he again considered the possibility of a federation with Poland. In the summer of 1937, on the initiative of the Polish Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Hlinka made a visit to Krynica and Zakopane, where he was greeted enthusiastically and was assured that Poland supported the autonomy aspirations of Slovakia. Hlinka was then decorated with the Grand Ribbon of the Order of Polonia Restituta.

Disappointed by the lack of major changes in the policies of the Prague government, in 1938, along with the leaders of German and Hungarian national minority organizations, Hlinka demanded that the Prague government declare Slovak autonomy. At that time he favored the nationalist, extremely anti-Czech wing in his party. At the end of his life Hlinka still considered that a federation with the Czechs was the best solution for the Slovaks, and he opposed attempts at control of the HSL'S by politicians like Tuka and Ferdinand Ďurčanský, who sought inspiration in the Third Reich. Hlinka's Zápisky z Mírova (Notes from Mírov) were published posthumously in 1941. (AGr)

Sources: Kdo byl kdo v našich dějinách ve 20 století (Prague, 1994); The Political Trial against the Rev. Father Andrew Hlinka, the Rev. Father Joseph Tomík, Dr. Srobar, and Others (New York, 1906); Alois Kolísek, Andrej Hlinka (Bratislava, 1924); Karol Sidor, Andrej Hlinka (Bratislava, 1934); Słowacja i Słowacy, vol. 2 (Kraków, 1938); Janusz Bazydło, "Hlinka Andrej," Encyklopedia katolicka, vol. 6 (Lublin, 1993); Joseph Mikus, Slovakia, A Political History: 1918–1950 (Milwaukee, 1963); Henryk Batowski, Z polityki międzynarodowej XX wieku: Wybór studiów z lat 1930–1975 (Kraków, 1979); Ewa Orlof, Dyplomacja polska wobec sprawy słowackiej w latach 1938–1939 (Kraków, 1980); Bohdan Cywiński, Ogniem próbowane: Z dziejów najnowszych Kościoła katolickiego w Europie Środkowo-Wschodniej, vols. 1–2 (Rome, 1982; Lublin, 1990); Dušan Kováč, Dejiny Slovenska (Prague, 2000).

HLOND August (5 July 1881, Brzeczkwice, Upper Silesia–22 October 1948, Warsaw), cardinal, Primate of Poland. Born into the large family of a railwayman, in October 1893 Hlond started his secondary education in a Salesian school in Valsalice, near Turin, Italy. Later he studied at Lombriasco and Rome. In October 1897 he took vows in the Salesian Order. In 1904 he graduated from high school in Lemberg (Lwów, Lviv), and in July 1905 he was ordained a priest. Later he studied in Kraków and Lwów, but he did not graduate, as he started his ministry in Przemyśl. From 1909 Hlond was the superior of a Salesian monastery in Vienna, and in 1912 he obtained confirmation in the order in the Habsburg monarchy. In 1919, he became provincial of the Austro-Hungarian-German province of the Salesian Order. During the Polish uprisings in Silesia (1919–21) Hlond was active in favor of Poland. On 7 November 1922 he was appointed apostolic administrator of the part of the Breslau (Wrocław) archdiocese that had been granted to Poland after World War I. From June 1923 he was a permanent participant of the Conference of the Polish Episcopate. He organized the Episcopal curia and diocese institutions, and he established the weekly Gość Niedzielny (1923), the Diocese Charity Secretariat, and the Silesia Relief Committee to aid the jobless. He co-organized a Holy Year pilgrimage to Rome and the coronation of the picture of the Holy Virgin Mary in Piekary Śląskie. After Pope Pius XI reorganized the Polish Church by means of the papal bull Vixdum Poloniae unitas (28 October 1925), on 14 December 1925 Hlond became the first ordinary bishop of the Katowice diocese.

After the death of Cardinal Edmund Dalbor, on 24 June 1926 Hlond was appointed archbishop of Gniezno and Poznań, the Primate of Poland, and chairman of the Conference of the Polish Episcopate. He made his ingress in both towns in October 1926. In January 1927 he established the Chancellery of the Primate of Poland, and on 23 June 1927 he was appointed cardinal. He contributed to the reactivation of religious life by organizing Catholic Action and establishing its Chief Institute in 1930. He cared for the ministry among the Polish diaspora and received special authority in this respect from Pope Pius XI in 1931. For this purpose he established the Christ Society for the Emigration. In November 1933 he established the Social Council of the Primate of Poland. In August 1936 in the Jasna Góra Monastery in Częstochowa he convened the first synod of the Polish Church after the regaining of independence. In numerous homilies and pastoral letters Hlond stressed the necessity of the Church's engagement in contemporary social problems, including those of unemployment. In view of the totalitarian threats stemming from the Third Reich and the Soviet Union he stressed the importance of strengthening Polish statehood. He supported Christian trade unions, as well as youth and cooperative organizations. After the death of Cardinal Aleksander Kakowski, Hlond took over the duties of the head of the Warsaw archbishopric in December 1938.

After the German invasion of Poland, on 14 September 1939 Hlond left via Romania to Rome, where he informed Pope Pius XII about the dramatic situation in Poland and made his case in favor of Poland. In 1940 Hlond published in Italian, French, English, and Spanish a report on the persecution of the Polish Church under the German occupation. From 1940 he lived in Lourdes, France, and from June 1943, in Hautecombe in French Savoy. Arrested by the Germans in February 1944, Hlond was interned in Bar-le-Duch in the Department of Meuse and in the Wiedenbrück Monastery in Westphalia. Released on 1 April 1945 by the U.S. Army, he went to Rome, where on 8 July 1945 he received special authority from the Pope to organize the church administration of the northern and western territories newly gained by Poland after the war. At the end of July he went to Poznań, and on 15 August 1945 he erected five apostolic administrations for the dioceses whose German bishops were still alive: in Wrocław, Gorzów, Opole, Gdańsk, and Olsztyn. For political reasons, the new Communist authorities did not recognize this decision and demanded that Hlond make the Pope appoint Polish ordinary bishops, which was impossible in the light of Church tradition. In view of the Church's refusal, the Communists started arguing that the Church question the Polish nature of these territories. Contrary to this propaganda, Hlond did a lot to help the new Polish settlers take root in the new Catholic parishes established in the acquired territories. In June and July 1947 he made a long visitation to these territories. On 4 March 1946 Hlond resigned from the Poznań archbishopric and took over the Warsaw archbishopric, remaining the Primate of Poland. In this way he wanted to avoid the traditional rivalry of the Gniezno and Warsaw provinces over primacy. He made his ingress into the Warsaw cathedral on 10 May 1946. The bibliography of Hlond's works includes about four hundred articles, pastoral letters, and homilies. A collection of his writings and speeches was published in the United States as Na straży sumień (On guard of the conscience; 1951). (WR)

Sources: Encyklopedia historii Drugiej Rzeczypospolitej (Warsaw, 1999); Nasza przeszłość, vol. 42 (Kraków, 1974); Feliks Lenort, ed., Na stolicy prymasowskiej w Gnieźnie i Poznaniu: Szkice o prymasach Polski w oresie niewoli narodowej i w II Rzeczypospolitej (Poznań, 1982); Jerzy Lis, August Hlond 1881–1948: Prymas Polski, kardynał, działacz społeczny, pisarz (Katowice, 1987); Franz Scholz, Zwischen Staatsräson und Evangelium: Kardinal Hlond und die Tragödie der ostdeutschen Diözesen (Frankfurt am Main, 1988).

HODŽA Milan (1 February 1878, Sučany, Slovakia–27 June 1944, Clearwater, Florida), Slovak politician. Hodža came from a Protestant landowning family. He studied in Budapest and Cluj and completed law and philosophical studies in Vienna. He worked with Vavro Šrobár and Pavol Blaho, members of a group of editors for the periodical Hlas. They saw hope for Slovak autonomy in the democratization of Austria-Hungary. From 1900 to 1902 Hodža edited Slovenský denník, and from 1903 to 1914, Slovenský týždenník. From 1905 to 1910 he was a deputy to the parliament in Budapest and secretary of the parliamentary club of national minorities. From 1906 he served as vice-president of the Slovak National Party (Slovenská Narodná Strana [SNS]) and was leader of its agrarian wing. In the program of the SNS, he declared that the peasants were the social base of the modern political movement that was struggling for equal rights for Slovaks. Hodža and Alexandru Vaida-Voevod, a Romanian Peasant Party politician, worked with Archduke Franz Ferdinand, aiming at the transformation of the Habsburg monarchy into a federation of national states. After the assassination of Franz Ferdinand in Sarajevo this plan had to be abandoned.

After the outbreak of World War I, Hodža served as an officer in the Austro-Hungarian Army. From 1915 to 1916 he was a military censor and later an editor in an Austrian press agency. At that time his views shifted to a pro-Czechoslovak orientation, and in 1918 he participated in the preparation of a proposal to organize a joint state of Czechs and Slovaks. During Czech and Slovak negotiations in Geneva in October 1918 Hodža represented the Slovak side. Soon after the adoption of the Declaration of Turčiansky Svätý Martin on the Slovak accession to a common state with the Czechs, he arrived there on 30 October 1918 with the information that the state had been proclaimed two days earlier in Prague. As a result of Hodža's efforts, an article on sending a separate Slovak delegation to the Paris Peace Conference was removed from the declaration.

From 1918 to 1919 Hodža was a plenipotentiary representative of Czechoslovakia in Budapest. On 6 December 1918 he signed a treaty with the war minister of the Hungarian Republic on the withdrawal of Hungarian troops from the greater part of Slovakia. He described his mission in his work Slovenský rozchod z Mad'arami roku 1918 (The Slovak parting with the Hungarians in 1918; 1928). The book was a response to attacks by Šrobár and Edvard Beneš, who accused Hodža of a pro-Hungarian attitude. In 1920 Hodža published Československý rozkol (Czechoslovak split) about the political aspects of the creation of the Slovak literary language. In 1921 he became professor of the modern history of Slavic nations at Komenský University in Bratislava. In 1919 he formed the Peasant Party (Národná Republikánska Strana Rol'nická), which represented the Czechoslovak program and competed with the autonomists of Reverend Andrej Hlinka, who sharply criticized Hodža for favoring the Czech policy toward Slovakia. Hodža's party worked in alliance with the Czech Agrarians of Antonín Švehla and in 1922 united with them. Hodža became vice-president of the National Executive Committee of the Republican Agrarian Party (Republikánská Strana Zemědělského a Maloroľnického Lidu) and co-founder and member of the leadership of the International Agrarian Bureau in Prague, an organization that consisted of fifteen European agrarian parties. From 1919 to 1920 and from 1926 to 1927 Hodža served as minister for unification of legislation; from 1922 to 1926 and from 1932 to 1935, as minister of agriculture; and between 1926 and 1929, as minister for education. In 1929, after the fall of Švehla's government, Hodža withdrew from political life in the midst of a corruption scandal. Between 1930 and 1934 six volumes of his collected works, Články, reči, štúdie (Articles, speeches, studies), were published.

In 1932 Hodža was again appointed minister of agriculture, and on 5 November 1935, prime minister of the Czechoslovak government. He declared a need for rapprochement among the states of Central Europe, particularly in the economic sphere. He was against a treaty between Czechoslovakia and the USSR, which was signed by Beneš in 1935. In 1937 he unsuccessfully attempted to reduce tension in the Danube Basin through an agreement of the Little Entente, Hungary, and Austria. In the face of German provocations and the increasingly aggressive claims of the Third Reich, in February 1937 Hodža's cabinet worked out a plan for the decentralization of the administration in the Sudetenland to satisfy German demands. However, the agreement with moderate German groups was not enough to prevent a crisis. Hitler constantly used the demonstrations of the Sudeten Nazis to fuel war hysteria. As the policy of concessions pursued by France and Great Britain was ineffective, Hodža accepted the ultimatum of Berchtesgaden, and on 22 September 1938 he resigned as prime minister. Hodža saw an increase in the popularity of the Slovak People's Party of Hlinka (Hlinkova Slovenská Ľudová Strana [HSL'S]) and Hlinka's program for the emancipation of Slovaks; therefore, after the Munich conference of 1938, he also expressed himself in favor of the decentralization of the state and Slovak autonomy, signing an agreement with the HSL'S at the beginning of October 1938.

Hodža later emigrated to France, where he organized the Slovak National Council (Slovenská Národná Radá), which was in opposition to the Czechoslovak National Council (Československý Národní Výbor). Unlike the camp of President Beneš, Hodža and his council opted for the future autonomy of Slovakia. In 1940 he refused to accept the post of deputy prime minister in the London government-in-exile. In 1941 he left for the United States, where he was one of the initiators of the Green International. In 1942 in London he published Federation in Central Europe, in which he warned against the expansionism of the USSR and called for the creation of a union of Central European nations as a protectorate of the United States. However, his concepts did not gain much support, and after 1945 they were no longer valid. Hodža died before the end of World War II. His son Fedor was a secretary of the Democratic Party between 1945 and 1948, and after the upheavals of 1948 he emigrated to the United States. (MG/WR)

Sources: ČBS; Encyklopédia Slovenska, vol. 2 (Bratislava, 1978); Mala československa encyklopedie, vol. 2 (Prague, 1987); Who's Who in Central and Eastern Europe 1933–34

(Zurich, 1935); Risto Kovijanić, Milan Hodža a Juhoslavia (Bratislava, 1938); Słowacja i Słowacy, vol. 2 (Kraków, 1938); Anton Štefanek, Milan Hodža (Bratislava, 1938); Joseph A. Mikus, Slovakia: A Political History, 1918–1950 (Milwaukee, 1963); Milan Hodža—štatnik a politik (Bratislava, 1994); Karol Kollár, Milan Hodža: Moderný teoretik—pragmatický politik (Bratislava, 1994); Jan Juríček, Milan Hodža: Kapitola z dejin slovenskej, československej a európskej politiky (Bratislava, 1994); Jan Kukli and Jan Němeček, Hodža versus Beneš: Milan Hodža a slovenska otázka v zahraničnom odboji za druhej svetovej války (Prague, 1999); Samuel Cambel, Štatnik a národohospodar Milan Hodža (Bratislava, 2001).

HOŁÓWKO Tadeusz, pseudonyms “Kirgiz,” “Otwinowski,” and “Hołodyński” (17 September 1889, Semipalatsk, Kazakhstan—29 August 1931, Truskawiec), Polish politician. Hołowko's father was head of a customs house and a participant of the January 1863 Insurrection. As a high school student in Verny (now Almaty) in 1905–7, Hołowko had contacts with a military organization of Socialists-revolutionists. From 1909 he studied in the Department of Natural History at St. Petersburg University, and later he was a student at the Jagiellonian University in Kraków (1912) and at the law school of St. Petersburg University. Linked with the Polish Socialist Party (PPS)—Revolutionary Faction, he took part in the Coalition Committee, which headed strikes at universities in 1911. In 1912 he was arrested in Moscow but was acquitted after a trial. Along with Mieczysław Niedziałkowski, he published Głos Młodych. In 1914 he co-organized the Polish Military Organization (Polska Organizacja Wojskowa [POW]) in Warsaw. Arrested after the German seizure of Warsaw, Hołowko spent 1915–16 in Salzwedel and Stendal. After his release, between 1917 and 1918 he edited the press organ of the POW, Rząd i Wojsko. At the beginning of 1918 he traveled via the Ukraine to Moscow, where, as a representative of the PPS—Revolutionary Faction and the POW, he tried to consolidate pro-independence trends among Polish military units in Russia. He also talked with Bolshevik leaders, among them Leon Trotsky and Vladimir Lenin. However, he failed to persuade them to support the Polish Socialists in their quest for the independence of Poland.

Hołowko was one of the co-founders of the Lublin government of Ignacy Daszyński (7–11 November 1918), co-author of its manifesto, and deputy minister of propaganda in the Daszyński cabinet. He was later head of a department in the Ministry of Labor and Social Welfare and a Warsaw councillor (1919–27). He fought in the Polish-Soviet war and was wounded. From 1921 to 1925 he was a member of the PPS leadership and editor-in-chief of Trybuna. He was a leading representative of the Promethean current in Polish eastern thought among Józef Piłsudski's followers. From 1925 Hołówko stayed in Paris, where in 1926 he participated in the creation of the society called La Prométhée, as well as a periodical of the same name; they propagated the idea of the separation of non-Russian nations from Russia. Hołówko had wide contacts among the emigrants from Russia. As a representative of the PPS, he took an active part in the congress of the Labor and Socialist International in Marseilles (1925). After returning to Poland, he dealt with "prometheism," national minorities, and Poland's eastern policy. He also directed the Ethnic Research Institute.

In 1926 Hołówko supported the May coup d'état staged by Piłsudski. In 1927 he left the PPS and was appointed head of the Eastern Department of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. He strove for the consolidation of Ukrainian anti-Soviet forces in Poland, called for a liberal treatment of national minorities, and opposed anti-Semitism but allowed for the re-Polonization of the Germanized Polish population. In 1930 he was elected MP of the Nonparty Bloc for Cooperation with the Government (BBWR), representing Vilnius, and he became head of the Assembly club of the BBWR. He resigned from his post at the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. Along with Janusz Jędrzejewicz, Hołówko held talks with Ukrainian organizations on the implementation of federative concepts. Hołówko was murdered by Ukrainian nationalists who held him responsible, against the facts, for the pacification actions in Eastern Galicia. (PK)

Sources: PSB; Słownik Polityków Polskich XX w. (Poznań, 1998); Jerzy Lewandowski, Litwa i Białoruś w polityce obozu belwederskiego (Warsaw, 1962); Piotr Wandycz, "Czy Hołówko rozmawiał z Leninem i Trockim w 1918 roku?" Zeszyty Historyczne (Paris), 1974, no. 41; Iwo Werschler, Z dziejów obozu belwederskiego: Tadeusz Hołówko—życie i działalność (Warsaw, 1984); B. Stoczeńska, Litwa, Białoruś, Ukraina w myśli politycznej Leona Wasilewskiego (Kraków, 1998); W. Bączkowski, O wschodnich problemach Polski (Kraków, 2000).

HOLUBOVYCH Vsevolod (February 1885, Moldavka, Podolia—16 May 1939, Yaroslav), Ukrainian politician. The son of a priest, Holubovych graduated from a theological seminary and from the Kiev Polytechnic Institute (1915). In 1916–17 he worked as head of the road department on the Romanian front. From 1903 he belonged to the Ukrainian Revolutionary Party, and in February 1913 he joined the Kiev organization of the Ukrainian Party of Socialist Revolutionaries (UPSR). In the spring of 1917 he took the lead of the UPSR committee in Odessa. Elected to the Odessa City Council and to the Ukrainian and Russian Constituent Assemblies, at the Second UPSR Congress he became a member of the Ukrainian Central Council (UCC). In July 1917 he became minister of transportation, and in October 1917, minister of industry and trade in the UCC General Secretariat (government). He did his best to secure war supplies and means of transportation for the army of the Ukrainian National Republic (UNR). From December 1917 to January 1918 he was a member and later head of the Ukrainian delegation to the peace talks in Brest-Litovsk.

In view of the Ukrainian declaration of independence (Fourth UCC Universal) and the resignation of the Volodymir Vynnychenko government, on 18 January 1918 Holubovych became prime minister of the UNR, holding on to the Ministry of Industry and Trade. From the end of January 1918 to the conclusion of the Brest-Litovsk Peace Treaty in early March 1918, the Bolshevik offensive forced Holubovych to leave Kiev, and his government stayed in Volhynia. He returned to Kiev with the German troops, but from then on his activity was largely depending on their consent. Since he planned a land reform, his cabinet was toppled on 29 April 1918 by the followers of Hetman Pavlo Skoropadksyi, who had German support. In June 1918 Holubovych was arrested and sentenced to two years in prison. Released as a result of the takeover by the Directorate on 16 December 1918, in the winter of 1918–19 Holubovych stayed in opposition to the new authorities, but he soon agreed to edit the government newspaper, Trudova Hromada (1919–20). While in Kamenets Podolskyi, in the second half of 1919 Holubovych took part in leading a UNR anti-Bolshevik insurgency, also directed against General Anton Denikin. An opponent of the Directorate's alliance with Poland, he stayed in Kamenets Podolskyi until June 1920, when the town was taken by the Red Army. He joined in organizing the local university, but in August 1920 he was arrested. Accused of preparing an anti-Bolshevik uprising, in May 1921 he was sentenced to five years of forced labor. Amnestied at the end of 1921, he worked as head of the construction department in the Ukrainian Council of the National Economy. In March 1931 he was arrested again for alleged participation in the so-called Ukrainian National Center. Tortured, he confessed to being guilty and died in prison. (TS)

Sources: Encyclopedia of Ukraine, vol. 2 (Toronto, 1988); Hryhory Kostyuk, Stalinist Rule in the Ukraine (New York, 1960); Matthew Stachiv and Jaroslav Sztendera, eds., Western Ukraine at the Turning Point of Europe's History, 1918–1923, vols. 1–2 (New York, 1971); Stanisław Kulczycki, ed., Uryady Ukrainy u XX st. (Kiev, 2001).

HÓMAN Bálint (29 December 1885, Budapest—2 June 1951, Vác), Hungarian historian and politician. Born to a German burgher family, in 1908 Hóman graduated from the History Department of Budapest University, where he later worked as a librarian, lecturer (from 1918), and professor and head of the chair of Hungarian medieval history (1925–31). Between 1922 and 1923 he was director of the National Széchenyi Library and later managing director of the National Museum until 1932. From October 1932 to May 1938 and from February 1939 to March 1942 he served as minister of religious affairs and education in the governments of Gyula Gömbös, Kálmán Darányi, Pál Teleki, and László Bárdossy. Hóman designed and implemented a program to develop elementary education and to establish new institutions of higher education, particularly technical and economic universities, so as to enhance the competitive abilities of the Hungarians and the Hungarian economy in the world. In foreign policy he advocated rapprochement with Germany. From 1932 he was an MP. At the end of 1944 he fled to Austria. Wanted as a war criminal by the postwar Hungarian government and handed over to Hungary by the Western Allies in 1945, Hóman was charged with treason and in 1946 sentenced to life imprisonment. He served his sentence in Vác, the most severe penal institution for political prisoners, where he died.

An outstanding medievalist, Hóman was an expert on and a popularizer of the era of the Árpáds, whose politics and activity he considered paragons to be followed. Initially he was a representative of the positivist school but was gradually drawn to the concept of the creative role of the spirit (Geistesgeschichte). His most important works include Magyar pénztörténet 1000–1325 (History of finance in Hungary; 1916); A magyar királyság pénzügyei és gazdaságpolitikája Károly Róbert korában (Finances and economic policy of Hungary under Charles Robert; 1921); Szent István (St. Stephen; 1939); and Geschichte des ungarischen Mittelalters (History of the Hungarian Middle Ages, 2 vols.; 1940–43). Along with Gyula Szekfű, Hóman authored the monumental seven-volume Magyar Történet (History of Hungary; 1929–33) and co-authored the four-volume Egyetemes történet (General history; 1935–37). Hóman described his experiences from his first term as minister in Művelődéspolitikai (Cultural and educational policy; 1938). (MS)

Sources: Biographisches Lexikon, vol. 2; László Tóth, Hóman Bálint, a történetíró (Budapest, 1939); Ferenc Glácz, Nemzeti kultúra—kulturált nemzet (Budapest, 1988); Béla László, Hóman Bálint utolsó évei (Budapest, 1993); Steven Bela Vardy, Historical Dictionary of Hungary (Lanham, Md., 1997).

HONCHAR Oles (Oleksandr) (3 April 1918, Sukha, Poltava province–14 July 1995, Kiev), Ukrainian writer, journalist, and political activist. In 1933–37 Honchar studied at the Technical School for Journalists in Kharkiv. He made his literary debut in 1937. From 1937 to 1941 he studied philology at the universities in Kharkiv and Dnepropetrovsk. After the outbreak of the German-Soviet war in June 1941, he volunteered for the front. Twice wounded and captured by the Germans, Honchar spent a few months in a German camp. After escaping from captivity, he returned to the front. He ended his military activity in Prague at the end of war. In 1946–48 Honchar wrote the novels Alpy (The Alps; 1946); Holubyi Dunay (Blue Danube; 1948; awarded the Stalin Prize); and Zlata Praha (Golden Prague; 1949; awarded the Stalin Prize); these constituted a trilogy, Praporonostsi (The standard-bearers). In 1959–71 Honchar presided over the Association of Ukrainian Writers (Spilka Pysmennykiv Ukraïny), and in 1959–86 he was secretary of the Association of Writers of the USSR. He was a deputy to the Supreme Councils of the Ukrainian SSR and the USSR and editor-in-chief of the monthly Vitchyzna. In the 1950s and 1960s he wrote several novels, of which the most important was Sobor (Assembly; 1968), referring to the protection of Ukrainian cultural relics. Although Honchar always behaved the way the authorities expected, in April 1968 he was attacked by official propaganda because the regional party secretary in Dnepropetrovsk recognized himself in one of the negative characters in Honchar's work.

Honchar authored screenplays for several films produced in the Oleksandr Dovzhenko Film Studios, including Partyzanska iskra (Partisan spark; 1958); Abituryentka (Woman graduate; 1973); and Vse peremahaye lyubov (Love will overcome all; 1987). From 1973 Honchar was chairman of the Ukrainian republican Committee for the Defense of Peace and a member of the World Peace Council. In 1978 he became a member of the Academy of Sciences of the USSR. At the turn of the 1990s he worked with the Taras Shevchenko Society of the Ukrainian language and with the Ukrainian National Movement for Perestroika (Narodnyi Rukh Ukraïny za Prebudovu). During a student strike in 1990, whose aim was to accelerate political change in the Ukraine, Honchar gave up his party membership. The most complete collection of his works, Tvory (Works), was published in Kiev in 1987–88. His works were translated into almost forty languages. (BB)

Sources: Encyclopedia of Ukraine, vol. 2 (Toronto, 1988); Pisarze swiata: Słownik encyklopedyczny (Warsaw, 1995); Dovidnyk z istoriyi Ukraïny (Kiev, 2001); Shevchenkivski laureaty 1962–2001: Entsyklopedychnyi dovidnyk (Kiev, 2001); Mykhailo Strelbytskyi, Proza monumentalnoho istoryzmu: Dorobok Olesia Honchara (Kiev, 1988); Vinok pamyati Olesia Honchara (Kiev, 1997).

HOPKO Wasył (21 April 1904, Hrabské, near Prešov–23 July 1976, Prešov), Greek Catholic auxiliary bishop of Prešov. Hopko graduated from a theological seminary in Prešov and from theological studies in Prague, and then he worked in various parishes in Czechoslovakia, among them Prague, where he earned a Ph.D. in theology at Charles University. In 1934 he founded the first Greek Catholic parish in Prague. In 1936 he was appointed papal chamberlain. From 1945 he edited the newspaper Blagovisnik. On 11 May 1947 he was ordained auxiliary bishop of Prešov. During the suppression of the Greek Catholic Church by the Communist authorities, on 28 April 1950 Hopko was arrested by the Czechoslovak security police and was sentenced to fifteen years in prison. Meanwhile, the Uniate Church was formally incorporated into the Orthodox Church under the jurisdiction of the Russian metropolitan. Hopko served his sentence in Leopoldov, Waldince, Mirovo, Ružin Prison in Prague, and other prisons. Released in 1964, he was kept under surveillance. In 1968 he returned to Prešov and sought the legalization of the Greek Catholic Church. However, as part of the policy of “normalization,” on 2 April 1969 he was again removed from the administration of the eparchy of Prešov. In September 2003 Pope John Paul II beatified Hopko during a pilgrimage to Slovakia. (WR) Sources: Martirologia ukrainskikh tserkov u chetyriokh tomakh, vol. 2 (Toronto, 1985); Encyclopedia of Ukraine, vol. 2 (Toronto, 1988).

HORAKOVA Milada (25 December 1901, Prague–27 June 1950, Prague), Czech lawyer and politician. From 1929 Horakova belonged to the Czechoslovak National Socialist Party and was active in the women’s movement. After the German invasion of Czechoslovakia in March 1939, she started activities in the resistance, cooperating with the Political Center (Politické Ustředí) of Prokop Drtina and the largest non-Communist clandestine group, We Shall Remain Faithful (Věrní Zůstaneme). On 2 August 1940 she was arrested along with her husband by the Gestapo and imprisoned in Pankrác Prison and in Terezín. In October 1944 she was sentenced to eight years but was released in April 1945. After returning to Prague and to political activity, Horakova joined the National Socialist leadership and won a parliamentary seat. In 1945–48 she presided over the Council of Czechoslovak Women and was deputy chairperson of the Union of Liberated Political Prisoners. After the Communist coup of February 1948, she gave up her parliamentary mandate and worked in the Prague City Council. On 27 September 1949 she was arrested. Between 31 May and 8 June 1950 she was the main defendant of the first show trial in Czechoslovakia, staged by the Soviet advisers. As a result Horakova, along with three other defendants, was sentenced to death. Despite numerous protests (by, among others, Albert Einstein), she was executed. Her rehabilitation, started during the Prague Spring of 1968, was suspended during the “normalization” of the 1970s. Horakova was not fully rehabilitated until 1990, after the Velvet Revolution. (PU)

Sources: ČBS; Kdo byl kdo v našich dějinách ve 20. století, vol. 1 (Prague, 1998); Jiří Pelikán, The Czechoslovak Political Trials, 1950–1954 (Stanford, 1971); Miroslav Ivanov, Justiční vražda aneb smrt Milady Horakové (Prague, 1991); Karel Kaplan, Největší politický proces “M. Horáková a spol” (Prague and Brno, 1995); Zora Dvořáková and Jiří Doležal, O Miladě Horákové a Milada Horáková o sebě (Prague, 2001).

HORBOVYI Volodymir (30 January 1889, Dolina–21 May 1984, Obolonia, near Dolina), Ukrainian lawyer and nationalist activist. Horbovyi completed law studies in Prague, where he started his political activities. After World War I, he practiced law in Poland and Czechoslovakia. At the beginning of the 1930s he joined the Ukrainian Military Organization and for some time commanded one of its units, carrying on activities against the Polish authorities in Eastern Galicia. On 28 October 1933 he was arrested and sent to a camp in Bereza Kartuska. Released in December 1934, he joined a group of lawyers representing the defendants charged with the murder of Minister Bronisław Pieracki, and he also defended Stepan Bandera and Yaroslav Stetsko in Lwów (May and June 1936).

After the occupation of Eastern Galicia by the USSR in September 1939, Horbovyi arrived in Kraków, where he headed the Relief Committee for Ukrainian POWs and for refugees from Soviet labor camps. He became aligned with the Bandera faction of the Organization of Ukrainian Nationalists (OUN), and in April 1941 he became head of its commission for statehood planning. At the end of June 1941 he was named president of the Ukrainian National Committee, which demanded independence for the Ukraine from the Germans. Horbovyi was arrested by the Gestapo, but in July 1942 he was released owing to ill health. For some time he lived in German-occupied Prague and later became a judge of the Court of Appeals in German-occupied Poland. Having Czechoslovak citizenship, at the end the war Horbovyi went to Prague, where he worked as a legal counselor in the Ministry of Agriculture. On 1 August 1947 he was arrested for collaboration with the Germans and expelled to Poland. In July 1948 he was handed over to the Soviet Ministry for Internal Affairs and deported to the USSR. On 1 August 1949 he was sentenced to twenty-five years in labor camp. He wrote numerous protests against his imprisonment and his trial, citing, among other things, his Czechoslovak citizenship, but to no avail. Released in August 1972, Horbovyi had to settle in his native village and was not even allowed to visit his son, who lived in Czechoslovakia. (WR)

Sources: S. P. de Boer, E. J. Driessen, and H. L. Verhaa, eds., Biographical Dictionary of Dissidents in the Soviet Union (The Hague: Martinus Nijhoff, 1982); ABN Correspondence, 1984, nos. 3–4.

HORN Gyula (5 July 1932, Budapest), Hungarian Communist and post-Communist activist. The son of a laborer murdered by the Gestapo in 1944, after high school Horn studied at the Higher Economic and Financial School in Rostov (USSR), from which he graduated in 1954. In the same year he joined the (Communist) Hungarian Workers' Party (HWP). In 1954–59 he was a white-collar worker in the Ministry of Finance. During the revolution, from late October to early November 1956, he belonged to the Revolutionary Home Guard. After 4 November he joined the Hungarian Socialist Workers' Party (Magyar Szocialista Munkáspárt [HSWP]). From December 1956 to June 1957—on the orders of the party Central Committee (CC)—Horn belonged to a special group of political police whose aim was to search for and arrest insurgents. From 1959 he worked in the Department of the USSR of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, dealing with economic matters. From 1961 he was attaché in Bulgaria, and in 1963–69, in Yugoslavia. Later he advanced in the HSWP CC apparatus, first as deputy head (1969–83) and then head of the Foreign Affairs Department. In 1970 he graduated from the Higher Political School in Budapest, and in 1977 he received a Ph.D. in economics on the basis of a study of the Yugoslav economic model. In March 1985, at the Thirteenth HSWP Congress, he was elected to the CC, and in the same month he became undersecretary of state in the Foreign Ministry.

From May 1989 to May 1990 Horn was minister of foreign affairs in the government of Miklós Németh. In September 1989 he decided to open the Hungarian-Austrian border to thousands of East German refugees; this accelerated the fall of the Berlin Wall in November 1989. For this decision, in January 1990 Horn was awarded a gold medal from the Gustav Stresemann Society, and later he received the Charlemagne Prize in Aachen, Germany; the Great Cross of the Order of Merit of the German Federal Republic; and other German awards for his contribution to the unification of Europe. In 1991 he became a member of the Honorary European Senate. During Horn's term as minister, Hungary entered into diplomatic relations with South Korea, the Holy See, Israel, and South Africa. In the presence of the representatives of the Hungarian opposition, in early March 1990, Horn signed an agreement in Moscow on the withdrawal of Soviet troops from Hungary by the end of June 1993. From June to October 1989 he was a member of the Politburo of the HSWP CC, and then he was elected to the top leadership of the newly created Hungarian Socialist Party (Magyar Szocialista Párt [HSP]). In May 1990 he was elected the HSP chairman. In September 1992 the HSP was accepted into the Socialist International. In the first free elections in March 1990 Horn won a parliamentary seat on behalf of the HSP and became head of the parliamentary commission of foreign affairs. In January 1993 he resigned from this position in view of the strong criticism of the ruling parties.

In the elections of May 1994 Horn led his party to victory. The HSP won 54 percent of the mandates. In order to strengthen the legitimacy of his government abroad, Horn invited the (liberal) Alliance of Free Democrats into the ruling coalition. From 15 July 1994 to 6 July 1998 Horn was prime minister. His government negotiated Hungary's entry into NATO (finally materialized in March 1999), stabilized the economy, and stimulated its growth. Because of a number of corruption scandals, in the elections of May 1998, both coalition parties lost. As a result, in September 1998 Horn resigned from the chair of the HSP and from its top leadership, but he stayed in the party and retained his parliamentary seat. He was reelected in May 2002, when the HSP returned to power. From 1996 Horn was deputy chairman of the Socialist International. In 1991 he published one part of his memoirs, Cölöpök (Border stones), and in 1999, a second part, Azok a kilencvenes évek! (Oh, these 1990s!). (JT)

Sources: Magyar Nagylexikon, vol. 9 (Budapest, 1999); Ki kicsoda 2000 (Budapest, 2001); Steven Bela Vardy, Historical Dictionary of Hungary (Lanham, Md., 1997); Europa Środkowo-Wschodnia 1994–1999 (Warsaw, 1996–2000); Eastern Europe and the Commonwealth of Independent States 1999 (London, 1999).

HORTHY Miklós (18 June 1868, Kenderes–9 February 1957, Estoril, Portugal), regent of Hungary. Horthy came from a noble family. After graduating from the Naval Academy at Fiume (now Rijeka, Croatia), in 1886 he began his military service in the Austro-Hungarian Navy. Between 1892 and 1894 Horthy sailed around the world as an officer on the corvette Saida. Later, he went on numerous foreign missions, gaining diplomatic experience. From December 1909 to July 1914 Horthy served as aide-de-camp to Francis Joseph, the emperor of Austria and king of Hungary. From December 1914 he was captain of the Novara, one of the monarchy's most modern cruisers. At the beginning of May 1916 he twice broke through the English and French naval blockades on the Strait of Otranto. He repeated a similar feat the following year, using three cruisers. Horthy was wounded during the struggle but continued to command the battle lying on a stretcher. In February 1918 King Charles IV appointed Horthy rear admiral and commander-in-chief of the monarchy's navy. After the collapse of the Habsburg monarchy, in the autumn of 1918 Horthy presided over the Austro-Hungarian fleet's transfer to the Yugoslav National Council, and then he returned to his family estate in Kenderes.

Under the Hungarian Soviet Republic (HSR), on 6 June 1919 Horthy became national defense minister in Gyula Károlyi's counterrevolutionary government, formed in Szeged. Three days later he issued a manifesto on organizing a new army, and in August he established the High Command of the National Army, independent from the revolutionary Ministry of Defense. Soon afterwards, Horthy was officially appointed commander-in-chief of all Hungarian military forces. In reaction to the "Red Terror" of the HSR, Horthy tolerated the "White Terror" against leaders and activists of the HSR. Around one thousand people fell victim to the "White Terror." On 16 November 1919, mounted on a white horse, Horthy led the National Army into Budapest. On 1 March 1920 the Hungarian parliament elected him regent. He served as regent for twenty-five years, though this was initially intended to be only an interim position. Horthy's powers were similar to those of the king, except for the right to grant nobility. In order to avoid military actions by the Entente but also because of personal ambition, on two occasions (March–April and October 1921) Horthy thwarted the efforts of Charles IV to recover his throne. He also contributed to the dethronement of the Habsburgs in November of that year. Horthy supported the social and political consolidation of the government of István Bethlen (1921–31). He was instrumental in the establishment of the Order of Heroes (Vitézi Rend), a society of well over ten thousand Hungarians considered to be the most effective in the "struggle for the homeland." From then on, the status of hero bestowed by Horthy was a substitute for a noble title.

With his modesty and exemplary family life, Horthy won great respect and popularity. Initially he had little to do with public affairs, but from the mid-1930s he was more and more involved in politics. His conservative views led him to take a stand not only against the Communist left, but also against the extreme right. For example, in 1938 Ferenc Szálasi, the leader of the fascist Arrow Cross Party, was sentenced to three years in prison. In domestic affairs, Horthy tried to maintain the political balance and constitutionality of the government. He opposed tendencies to solidify the dictatorship, and he supported Bethlen's efforts to leave some room for maneuver to the liberal-democratic and Social Democratic opposition. At the same time, he considered Fascist Italy and later the Third Reich as allies in his efforts to revise the 1920 Treaty of Trianon. At a time when Hungary was regaining some of the territories it had lost through the Treaty of Trianon—southern Slovakia in November 1938, Transcarpathian Ruthenia in March 1939, a part of Transylvania in August 1940, and Voivodina in April 1941—Horthy enjoyed great popularity among the Hungarians, although Hungary had to pay a price for these territorial gains by joining the anti-Comintern Pact in February 1939 and the Tripartite Pact in November 1940. In September 1939 Horthy called for neutrality but played a major role in ensuring that tens of thousands of Poles, and later French and English prisoners of war, as well as Jews, could find refuge in Hungary.

Gradually, however, Horthy increasingly yielded to German pressure. In April 1941 he abandoned the policy of military neutrality pursued by Prime Minister Count Pál Teleki; under Horthy's leadership, Hungary became part of the German-led alliance. After the German aggression against the USSR on 21 June 1941, Horthy called for severing diplomatic relations with Moscow, and five days later he decided to declare war on the USSR. In 1942 Horthy's eldest son was elected deputy regent by the parliament, but in the same year he died in an air crash on the eastern front. For a long time Horthy believed that Germany would not be able to defeat the Anglo-Saxon powers but that it would be able to control the European continent. He agreed to the enactment of laws that restricted the rights of Jews (1938, 1939, and 1941), but he refused permission for their deportation or liquidation. After Germany occupied Hungary on 19 March 1944, Horthy remained the country's head of state and appointed a government that met German expectations. However, he entrusted the mission of forming the government to General Döme Sztójay instead of Béla Imrédy, the man proposed by the Germans. Horthy left the majority of Hungarian Jews to their own fate and tolerated their confinement in ghettos, although in July he still managed to prevent the deportation of Budapest Jews to death camps. He passively observed the German arrests of both leftist and conservative underground activists.

After Romania joined the Allies in August 1944, Horthy dismissed the government of Sztójay and made efforts to extricate Hungary from the war. On October 11 of that year the Hungarian delegation, authorized by Horthy, signed a preliminary cease-fire with the USSR in Moscow. According to the provisions of the cease-fire, four days later the regent was to announce the breakup of the alliance with Germany, but because of the quick reaction of the Germans, the plan ended in failure. Since the Germans had abducted Horthy's youngest son, Miklós, and threatened to kill him, Horthy withdrew his cease-fire proclamation, and on 16 October resigned as regent and appointed Szálasi as prime minister. The following day the Germans interned Horthy along with his wife in Hirschberg Palace, near Weilheim in Bavaria, where he was under house arrest until May 1945. After the end of World War II he was taken captive by the Americans. The Allies unanimously agreed not to denounce Horthy as a war criminal and refused to hand him over to Yugoslavia, which considered him as such. At the same time the Allies recommended that he remain out of Hungary. During the Nuremberg trial Horthy was twice interrogated as a witness. In December 1948 he left Weilheim and along with his family settled in Estoril in Portugal. Horthy attentively followed the events of the Hungarian Revolution in 1956; the suppression of the revolution shook him so deeply that he died soon afterwards. His ashes and the remains of his wife were brought back to Hungary in September 1992, and they were buried with ceremony in Kenderes. In 1954 Horthy's Memoirs were published. (JT)

Sources: Biographisches Lexikon, vol. 2; Steven Bela Vardy, Historical Dictionary of Hungary (Lanham, Md., 1997); Magyar Nagylexikon, vol. 9 (Budapest, 1999); Nagy Képes Milleniumi Arcképcsarnok (Budapest, 1999); Magyarország 1944–1956, CD-ROM (Budapest, 2001); C. A. Macartney, October Fifteenth: A History of Modern Hungary, vols. 1–2 (Edinburgh, 1957–61); The Confidential Papers of Admiral Horthy (Budapest, 1965); Zoltan Vas, Horthy (Budapest, 1977); Peter Gosztony, Miklós von Horthy: Admiral und Reichsverweser (Göttingen, 1973); Tibor Zsiga, Horthy ellen, a királyért (Budapest, 1989); Thomas L. Sakmyster, Hungary's Admiral on Horseback: Miklós Horthy, 1918–1944 (Boulder, Colo., 1994); Gábor Bencsik, Horthy Miklós: A kormányzó és kora (Budapest, 2001).

HORVÁTH Márton [originally Schiller] (8 October 1906, Budapest–7 June 1987, Budapest), Hungarian Communist activist. The son of an antiquarian, in 1931 Horváth joined the illegal Hungarian Communist Party (HCP) and discontinued his studies at a polytechnic in Budapest. In 1932 he was arrested and interned for organizing strikes. Imprisoned in 1935 for distributing Vasas, an opposition trade union newspaper, he was released in 1939; despite being banned from Budapest, he remained in the capital and continued underground activities. As one of the party leaders, in 1941 Horváth conducted talks with Árpád Szakasits on cooperation between the Communists and Socialists. From the end of 1941 Horváth was editor of Szabad Nép, an illegal central organ of the HCP. Horváth was arrested again in 1942 and sentenced to twelve years in prison, but in March 1944 his term was suspended owing to a simulated illness. After taking part in blowing up the monument of Gyula Gömbös in October 1944, Horváth was arrested again but managed to escape.

From 1944 Horváth was a member of the HCP CC, and from June 1948, a member of the CC of the Hungarian Workers' Party (HWP). Between January 1945 and October 1946 he was a member of the Politburo of the HCP. From June 1948 to September 1949 he was a deputy member, and until June 1953 a member, of the Politburo of the CC of the HWP. From 1945 he was an MP, and between 1949 and 1953, a member of the Presidium Council. From 1945 to 1950 he was editor of Szabad Nép. Between 1950 and 1954, as head of the Propaganda and Agitation Department of the CC of the HWP, Horváth was also a member, and from 1954 to 1956 president, of the editorial board of Szabad Nép. From 1948 to 1953, as a co-worker of József Révai, Horváth played a major role in the implementation of Stalinist educational and cultural policies, which included a transformation of the fine arts in the spirit of Socialist realism. His collected articles, Lobogóknk: Petófi (Our banner: Petófi; 1950), came to symbolize the ideology of the time of Mátyás Rákosi. In June 1956 Horváth took part in the famous debates of the Petófi Circle on the state of the Hungarian press, after which the CC of the HWP banned the Petófi Circle's activities. On October 23, in an editorial in Szabad Nép, Horváth agreed with the demands of a the young demonstrators and gave his support to Imre Nagy. After 4 November Horváth did not hold any political positions. In May 1957 he was deprived of his parliamentary seat. From 1957 he was director of the Petófi Literary Museum; from 1960 he was head of Hunnia Film Studios, and from 1963 until his retirement in 1966, he was again head of the Petófi Literary Museum. (JT)

Sources: A magyar forradalom és szabadságharc enciklopédiája, CD-ROM (Budapest, 1999); Magyar Nagylexikon, vol. 9 (Budapest, 1999); Bennet Kovrig, Communism in Hungary from Kun to Kádár (Stanford, 1979); Miklós Molnár, From Béla Kun to János Kádár: Seventy Years of Hungarian Communism (New York, 1990).

HORWITZ-WALECKI Maksymilian [originally Horwitz] (6 September 1877, Warsaw–after June 1937, USSR), Polish Communist activist. Born into an assimilated Jewish middle-class family, Horwitz-Walecki graduated from Wojciech Górski High School in Warsaw, and then he left to study in Ghent, Belgium. From 1895 he belonged to the Belgian Socialist Party and the Foreign Union of Polish Socialists. After his returned to Russian Poland in 1898, he was active in the Polish Socialist Party (Polska Partia Socjalistyczna [PPS]). Arrested in December 1899, in August 1901 he was sentenced to exile in Siberia, but he escaped during transport and went to the European west, where he criticized both the pro-independence followers of Józef Piłsudski and the internationalist extreme left of the party. During the 1905 revolution Horwitz-Walecki was active in Kraków and then in Warsaw, where he was imprisoned again but released on bail. In December 1905 he was arrested again, but in April 1906 he organized a daring escape of prisoners facing the death penalty. Caught and sentenced to exile, he escaped during transport and returned to underground Socialist activities. At the Third PPS Council he opposed both wings of the party, but he was closer to the internationalist wing, and he co-founded the PPS–Left.

During World War I Horwitz-Walecki was engaged in the anti-war faction of the Second International and took part in both Zimmerwald conferences in 1915 and 1916. He gradually drew closer to the Social Democracy of the Kingdom of Poland and Lithuania (Socjaldemokracja Królestwa Polskiego i Litwy [SDKPiL]). After returning to Poland, in December 1918 he took part in the conference at which the PPS–Left and the SDKPiL merged into the Communist Workers' Party of Poland (Komunistyczna Partia Robotnicza Polski [KPRP]). Arrested by the Polish police in October 1919, in the summer of 1920 Horwitz-Walecki escaped from the Dąbie camp near Kraków, and from then on he was mainly active abroad. On behalf of the Communist International he took part in the activities of the Italian and French Communist Parties, and in 1922 he was active in the United States. From 1923 he lived in Berlin, where he edited Die Rote Fahne and headed the local KPRP post.

An opponent of the extreme left of the party, along with Maria Kostrzewa-Koszutska and Adolf Warszawski-Warski, Horwitz-Walecki advocated the necessity of creating a broad front of workers and peasants and elaborating a party program attractive to Poles. Such a program prevailed at the Second KPRP Congress in Bolshevo, near Moscow, in September and October 1922. Horwitz-Walecki joined the KPRP Central Committee and the Politburo. He was also a member of the Presidium of the Executive Committee (EC) of the Communist International (CI). The Polish Commission of the Fifth CI Congress in July 1924, headed by Stalin, condemned this program, and Horwitz-Walecki was removed from the KPRP leadership. He continued his Comintern activities, especially with regard to CI relations with the Second International. He was also active in the Spanish, Greek, and Belgian Communist Parties. In 1928–35 he was deputy head of the EC of the CI Secretariat; from 1935 he edited the periodical Kommunisticheski Internatsional. Arrested during the Great Purge on 22 June 1937, Horwitz-Walecki was killed in prison. He was rehabilitated after the Twentieth Congress of the CPSU. In 1967 his Zbiór pism (Collection of writings) was published. (WR) Sources: PSB, vol. 10; Lazitch; Słownik biograficzny działaczy polskiego ruchu robotniczego, vol. 2 (Warsaw, 1987); Jan Kancewicz, "Maksymilian Horwitz-Walecki," Z pola walki, 1958, no 4; Feliks Tych, PPS-Lewica w latach 1914–1918 (Warsaw, 1960); Anna Żarnowska, Geneza rozłamu w PPSP 1904–1906 (Warsaw, 1965); Aleksander Kochański, SDKPiL 1907–1910 (Warsaw, 1971); James P. Cannon, The First Ten Years of American Communism (New York, 1973).

HORYN Bohdan (10 February 1936, Knisel, Bóbrka [Bibrka] County), Ukrainian politician and art historian, brother of Mykhailo Horyn. In 1959 Horyn graduated from the University of Lviv, and then he worked in a folk culture house in Lviv. Later he taught painting and drawing in a Lviv high school. In 1960 he started publishing in literary and art journals. From 1962 he worked in the Museum of Ukrainian Art in Lviv (Lvivskiy Muzei Ukraïnskoho Mystetstva). He organized the publication and distribution of materials in the uncensored press (samizdat). Arrested in August 1965 and accused of anti-Soviet agitation and propaganda, Horyn was sentenced to four years of labor camp. After his release, in 1968–76 he worked as a blue-collar laborer. In 1976–89 he worked as a junior scholar in the Lviv Gallery of Painting, and in 1988 he was co-founder of the Ukrainian Helsinki Union (Ukraïnska Helsinska Spilka [UHS]), the first official opposition organization in the Ukraine. In 1988–90 Horyn chaired the UHS Lviv organization. In 1989 he co-founded the Ukrainian Popular Movement for Perestroika (Narodnyi Rukh Ukraïny za Perebudovu), and in 1990, the Ukrainian Republican Party (Ukraïnska Respublikanska Partiya [URP]). In 1990–92 he headed its Lviv organization. From 1990 to 1997 Horyn was a member of the URP Board and Council. He was a deputy to the Supreme Council of the Ukrainian SSR and then Ukraine in 1990–94 and 1994–98. In 1994–96 he was director of the Research Institute of the Diaspora (Instytut Doslidzhen Diaspory). Horyn was a member of the editorial boards of several samvydav periodicals, such as Ukraïnskyi visnyk (1988–89), Kafedra (1988–89), and Lvivski novyny (1989, editor-in-chief). He authored books on foreign policy and the arts, including the following: Na puti v Yevropu (On the road to Europe; 1994), Krym ne tilky zona vidpochynku (Crimea is not only a holiday resort; 1994; co-author); Opanas Zalyvakha: Vybir shlahku (Opanas Zalyvakha: Choice of the way; 1995). (BB)

Sources: Encyclopedia of Ukraine, vol. 2 (Toronto, 1988); Khto ie khto v Ukraïni 2000 (Kiev, 2000); Lykho z rozumu: Portrety dvana-dtsiaty "zlochynstiv." Zbirnyk materialiv uklal Vyacheslav Chornovil (Paris, 1967); Taras Batenko, Opozytsiyna osobystis': Druha polovyna XX stolittia. Politychnyi portret Bohdana Horynia (Lviv, 1997); Bohdan Nahaylo, The Ukrainian Resurgence (Toronto, 1999).

HORYN Mykhailo (20 June 1930, Knisel, Bóbrka [Bibrka] County), Ukrainian dissident and politician, brother of Bohdan Horyn. From 1949 Horyn studied logic and psychology at Ivan Franko University in Lviv. In 1953 he was expelled from the university for refusing to join the Komsomol, but he graduated thanks to the help of the rector. In 1954–61 he taught logic, psychology, and Ukrainian language and literature in a high school. From 1961 he was a researcher in an experimental laboratory of psychology and the physiology of labor in a truck factory in Lviv. From the early 1960s he organized the publication and distribution of materials in the uncensored press (samizdat). In August 1965 he was arrested and accused of anti-Soviet agitation and propaganda. In April 1966 he was sentenced to six years of hard labor camp and in July 1967 to an additional three years in prison for distributing samizdat materials among his prison mates. Released in August 1971, Horyn worked as an engine driver and stoker and from 1977 as a psychologist once again. At this time he published the underground Byuletyn of the Ukrainian Helsinki Group (Ukraińska Helsińska Hrupa) and helped the families of political prisoners. In November 1981 he was arrested again, and in June 1982 he was sentenced to ten years of hard labor camp and five years of forced settlement as a “dangerous recidivist.” Horyn served his sentence in the Kuchino camp, along with Vasyl Stus, Valery Marchenko, Levko Lukyanenko, and Oleksa Tykhyi.

Released in July 1987, one month later Horyn joined Vyacheslav Chornovil in publishing the periodical Ukrainskyi Visnyk. In 1988, along with his brother Bohdan and Chornovil, he co-founded the Ukrainian Helsinki Union (Ukraińska Helsińska Spilka). At the founding congress of the Ukrainian Popular Movement for Perestroika (Narodnyi Rukh Ukrainy za Perebudovu) in September 1989, Horyn was elected chairman of its secretariat. He organized spectacular actions, such as the “chain of unification” between Lviv and Kiev and celebrations of the Cossack tradition. In 1990 Horyn co-founded the Ukrainian Republican Party (Ukraińska Respublikanska Partiya [URP]). In 1990–94 he was a deputy to the Supreme Council of the Ukrainian SSR (from 1991, Ukraine), where he headed the Popular Council (Narodna Rada) faction. In 1992–95 he was the URP chairman, and then he became its honorary chairman. After a split in the URP in 1997, Horyn co-founded the Ukrainian Christian Republican Party (Ukraińska Khrystyansko-Respublikanska Partiya), and in May 2000 he became head of the Ukrainian World Coordination Council (Ukraińska Svitova Koordynatsyina Rada), dealing with Ukrainians abroad. (BB)

Sources: Encyclopedia of Ukraine, vol. 2 (Toronto, 1988); Khto ie khto v Ukraini v 2001 (Kiev, 2001); Bohdan Nahaylo, The Ukrainian Resurgence (Toronto, 1999); Ukraińska Hromadska Hrupa sprianniia vykonanniu Helsińskych uhod (Kharkiv, 2001); Tadeusz Andrzej Olszański, Historia Ukrainy XX w. (Warsaw, n.d.).

HOSSU Iuliu (30 June 1885, Milasul Mare [Transylvania]–5 March 1970, Caldarusami), Romanian cardinal, Eastern-rite bishop of Cluj-Gherla diocese, political prisoner of communism. The son of a Uniate priest, Hossu was ordained in March 1910 and then went to Rome to continue his studies at the college of the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith. On 21 April 1917 he was consecrated bishop and was appointed diocesan bishop of the Eastern-rite diocese of Cluj. Because of his involvement in efforts toward the unification of Transylvania and Romania, Hossu was persecuted by Hungarian authorities, who accused him of promoting Romanian nationalism. Hossu attended the Grand National Assembly, which was held in Alba Iulia on 1 December 1918, to vote on behalf of the Romanian people for the incorporation of Transylvania and Banat into the Old Kingdom of Romania. He and the Orthodox bishop, Miron Cristea, were delegated to submit the resolution to King Ferdinand I, who signed the union of Romania and Transylvania on 14 December 1918. Between the wars Hossu was engaged in social work, supported the development of the Christian Democratic movement, and he organized many educational and charitable events in his diocese. Although under the Romanian constitution of March 1923 the Uniate Church was recognized as a national religion on an equal footing with the Orthodox Church, the authorities, on the initiative of the Bucharest Patriarchate, encouraged the Uniates to unite with the Orthodox Church. Hossu protested and exhorted the people of Transylvania to remain faithful to the Holy See. Persecutions of the Uniates during the interwar period ceased in 1929, when a coalition led by Iuliu Maniu, a Uniate from Transylvania and the head of the National Peasant Party, came to power. In the 1930s Hossu was one of the initiators of the establishment of the Pontifical Romanian College in Rome.

Between 1940 and 1944, when the Transylvanian territories became part of Hungary under the so-called Second Vienna Award of August 1940, Hossu protested the persecutions of Jews. He sheltered many Jews, saving them from deportation to concentration camps. He also defended members of the Orthodox Church, particularly the bishop of Cluj, Nicolae Colan, who subsequently turned against the Uniates and personally seized the cathedral of Bishop Hossu in 1948. The Hungarian authorities tried to suppress Hossu, considering him a Romanian nationalist. They also attempted to force the Catholicization of the Transylvanian people.

After the Communists took power in Romania, they began to introduce a plan to destroy Christianity there. Particularly repressive measures were taken against the Uniate Church. Hossu defended the rights of the faithful, especially the right to teach religion in schools. The situation became more difficult in August 1948, when the government broke a concordat with the Holy See and issued decrees on education and against cults. The Catholic episcopate and the Uniate episcopate refused to obey these decrees. On 3 October 1948 the authorities assembled the Uniate clergy in Cluj-Napoca, where they urged them to break off the union with Rome and join the Romanian Orthodox Church. Hossu protested and exhorted the priests and the people to remain faithful to Rome. The state authorities formally abolished the union in Romania on 1 December 1948. The faithful and the clergy were forced into the Romanian Orthodox Church, and those who resisted were arrested. On 29 December 1948 Hossu, along with six other Romanian Uniate bishops, was arrested on charges of working in support of global imperialism, allegedly represented by the Vatican. He was visited in prison by Jeremiah, the Romanian patriarch of the Orthodox Church, who promised Hossu freedom at the price of his joining the Orthodox Church, but Hossu, like the other Uniate bishops, rejected this offer. Hossu was transferred to a penitentiary in Sighet and was held there for years. Five Uniate bishops died in prison, and Hossu was released in 1956. He was interned in Orthodox monasteries and was banned from performing any pastoral duties until the end of his life. Despite persecution, he managed to get in touch with the underground Uniate clergy. Hossu was a symbol of the persevering resistance of the Romanian Uniates. He died at the Orthodox monastery of Caldarusami. In 1969 the Pope appointed him cardinal in pectore—that is, without public announcement of the nomination. The appointment was revealed in March 1973. The beatification process of Hossu is under way. (AGr)

Sources: Franz Hummer, Bischöfe für den Untergrund: Zur Praxis der Geheimbischöfe in der katholischen Kirche (Vienna and Munich, 1971); Robert Royal, The Calvary of Romania; Bohdan Cywiński, Ogniem próbowane: Z dziejów najnowszych Kościoła katolickiego w Europie Środkowo-Wschodniej, vols. 1–2 (Rome, 1982; Lublin, 1990); S. A. Prunduș, O.S.B.M., and C. Plăianu, Cardinalul Iuliu Hossu (Cluj, 1995); Dennis Deletant, Communist Terror in Romania: Gheorghiu-Dej and the Police State, 1948–1965 (New York, 1999).

HOXHA Enver (16 October 1908, Gjirokastër–11 April 1985, Tirana), Albanian Communist leader. The son of a Muslim cloth merchant from the southern Albanian Tosks, Hoxha was educated at the French lycée in Tirana, and from 1930 to 1934 he studied at the University of Montpellier. Because of his poor academic performance, his state scholarship was withdrawn. However, he remained in France, where he met Ali Kelmendi and other Albanian Communist activists. He worked at the Albanian consulate general in Brussels and wrote, under a pseudonym, articles for L'Humanité in which he vehemently attacked the government of King Zog I. In 1936 he returned to Albania and taught French at a lycée. In 1939 he was imprisoned for a short time for his criticism of the royal dictatorship. After Italy invaded Albania, in November 1941 Hoxha organized a small party, called the Communist Party of Albania, and guerrilla units that developed broader activities with the support of the Yugoslav Communists after the attack of Germany against the USSR (June 1941). At a state conference of the party in Labinot (March 1943) Hoxha was elected secretary general, and he headed the party for the next forty-two years. In July 1943 he became commander of the Communist National Liberation Front. On 2 August 1943 Hoxha reached an agreement with other parties of the national resistance—royalists and the democratic organization of Belli Kombëtar; however, he almost immediately started to suppress them. When on 28 May 1944 the Communists formed the Anti-Fascist Council for National Liberation, based on the Yugoslav model, they concealed the true nature of the council in the guise of “national” and “people’s” rhetoric. In October 1944 Hoxha became head of the provisional government and commander-in-chief of the army, with the rank of general.

After the invasion of Tirana, on 4 December 1944 Hoxha announced the total liberation of Albania from Nazi occupation. Industry, banking, and transportation were nationalized, and the political system began to be changed along the Soviet pattern. The Allies recognized the provisional government of Hoxha on condition that free elections would be held. Meanwhile, from the beginning of 1945 Hoxha and the Communists conducted a bloody crackdown on the opposition, mainly against royalists and Belli Kombëtar. In the elections of 2 December 1944, which despite obvious falsifications were recognized as valid by the Great Powers, the Communists gained complete domination of the country. Because the party had support mainly among the Tosks in the south, their dialect was recognized as the official language of Albania. On 11 January 1946 Hoxha assumed the post of prime minister of Albania, and he also became Albanian foreign minister, defense minister, commander-in-chief of the armed forces, and head of the party. After the liquidation of the opposition he started to remove members of the party executive who were not obedient enough.

In 1946 Hoxha signed a political and economic agreement with Yugoslavia. In Belgrade, the unification of Albania and Yugoslavia into one state was considered. However, Hoxha aimed at maintaining a separate state. In connection with Albania’s role as a base for the Communists during the continuing civil war in Greece, as well as Albania's blowing up English ships in the Corfu Channel, the Western powers withdrew recognition of Hoxha's regime. Because of Belgrade's economic help and Stalin's vague attitude toward the independence of Albania, Hoxha cooperated closely with Josip Broz Tito. In May 1947 mass arrests were made among Hoxha's opponents, who favored a pro-Yugoslav course at that time. Albania signed a treaty of friendship and cooperation with Bulgaria, which was a sign of its independence, but it was not invited to the founding conference of the Cominform at Szklarska Poręba in September 1947. At the Eighth Plenum of the Central Committee (CC) of the party in February 1948 the pro-Yugoslav course won, and Hoxha's position was weakened. Thus, he welcomed the denunciation of Tito by the Cominform in June 1948, and he vehemently attacked the Yugoslav leader. All relations with Belgrade were broken off, and the adherents of cooperation with Tito fell victims to another bloody purge. At the First Congress of the Albanian Party of Labor in November, Hoxha's main rival, Koci Xoxe, was expelled from the party. In May 1949 Xoxe was secretly sentenced to death and executed. Thanks to Kim Philby's cooperation with the Soviet services in 1949, Hoxha foiled an attempt at the overthrow of his regime by a group of Albanians who were trained in Greece and the Federal Republic of Germany. Nearly all participants of the action were caught and executed. Having concentrated all power in his hands, Hoxha also increased the persecution of religious organizations, above all the Catholic Church.

After Stalin's death in March 1953 and the Twentieth Congress of the CPSU in February 1956, Hoxha became a spokesman of doctrinal Stalinism; he not only failed to change course, but he organized new purges as well. For example, all the delegates to the party conference of April 1956 who expected democratization were arrested, and most of them were murdered. Such a fate befell Liri Gega, for example. As an open supporter of the Stalinist terror, Hoxha found himself in conflict with Nikita Khrushchev's pragmatic course and his policy of "thaw." Thus, during his visit to Beijing in May 1956 Hoxha reached rapprochement with China. During Khrushchev's visit to Albania in May 1959, Hoxha did not agree to improve relations with Yugoslavia and refused to begin de-Stalinization. At the congress of the Romanian party in June 1960 Khrushchev openly criticized the attitude of the Albanians, and at a conference of the Communist parties in Moscow (November 1960), Hoxha sharply attacked the Soviet leader, gaining the support of the Chinese delegation. This sealed the split in the Communist movement.

In 1961 Hoxha finally broke off relations with the USSR and its European satellites, choosing the People's Republic of China as his strategic partner. This resulted in another purge, the victims of which were (among others) the secretary of the CC, Liri Belishova, and Admiral Teme Sejko. In the second half of the 1960s in Albania the "Cultural Revolution" was carried out. It was based on the Chinese model and had similar results. For example, parents were induced to give "Illyrian" rather than Christian or Muslim names to their children. In 1967 Albania was declared the first atheist country in the world because religious practices were regarded as a crime. All temples were closed; the Church of the Virgin Mary of Shkodër, Patroness of Albania, was destroyed; all Muslim, Orthodox, and Catholic clerics were put in prisons or in camps, and many of them perished. For example, Father Shtjefen Kurti was executed by a firing squad for baptizing a child.

In the 1960s and 1970s Hoxha's Albania was a completely isolated country, dependent on economic assistance from Beijing. Hoxha's xenophobic policy was evident, for example, in the fact that the country was surrounded by a net of thousands of concrete bunkers; this led to stagnation in the housing industry. The first tensions between Tirana and Beijing appeared with the normalization of relations between China and the United States. After the death of Mao Zedong in 1976 and the adoption of a more pragmatic course by the Chinese leadership, Hoxha also broke off relations with Beijing, considering himself the only true follower of Marxism in the Leninist and Stalinist tradition. He began another purge, whose victims were (among others) Minister of Defense Beqir Balluku and (in 1980) Prime Minister Mehmet Shehu. There are suppositions that Hoxha took a direct part in Shehu's killing, which was staged as a suicide. The conflict between Serbs and Albanians in the Yugoslav province of Kosovo was an additional source of trouble for Hoxha's regime, and from 1981 this conflict intensified. Tirana wanted to believe that the conflict was the effect not only of Serb chauvinism, but USSR influence as well.

Hoxha's totalitarian regime, one of the bloodiest in history, engineered great social transformations. However, although illiteracy was eliminated and the emancipation of women was achieved, the regime, ruling by terror, kept the Albanian people in blind obedience, fear, and isolation. Armaments took up most of the public funds, and this led to a domestic poverty that was unprecedented in Europe. An intelligent and gifted tactician, Hoxha raised the principles of the Balkan vendetta to the rank of a factor organizing social life. At the end of his life Hoxha ruled with the assistance of a narrow camarilla, in which the leading role was played by his wife, Nexhmije Hoxha, and his potential successor, Ramiz Alia. There was no chance for creating the rudiments of a democratic opposition; therefore several years had to pass after his death before the system he had built collapsed. In Albania, countless works by Hoxha were issued in various languages, mainly his speeches and memoirs (e.g., With Stalin, 1981; Titoites: Historical Notes, 1982; and Laying the Foundations for a New Albania, 1984); these have to be approached with a critical eye because they are written in “newspeak” and often contain false information. (WR) Sources: Current Biography, 1950; Peter R. Prifti, Socialist Albania since 1945 (Cambridge, Mass., 1978); New York Times, 12 April 1985; Rodger Swearingen, ed., Leaders of the Communist World (New York, 1971); Pero Zlatar, Enver Hodza: Politička biografija (Belgrade, 1986); Arshi Pipa, Albanian Stalinism (Boulder, Colo., 1990); Gabriel Jandot, L'Albanie d'Enver Hoxha: 1944–1985 (Paris, 1994); Miranda Vickers, The Albanians: A Modern History (London, 1995); James S. O'Donnell (James Salibur), A Coming of Age: Albania under Enver Hoxha (Boulder, Colo., 1999).

HOXHA Nexhmije [née Xhuglini] (7 February 1921, Monastir), Albanian Communist activist, from January 1945 wife of Enver Hoxha. Hoxha graduated from a pedagogical school for girls in Tirana in 1941, and then she worked as a teacher in a Tirana school. From 1937 she was connected with a group of Communists from Shkodër. From 1941 she belonged to the Communist Party, and from 1943 she edited the periodical for women Gruaja Shqiptare. Sentenced in absentia to twelve years in prison for her Communist activities, in 1944 Hoxha fought in the First Striking Division of the Communist guerrilla army. She took part in all the most important sessions of the Front of National Liberation; from 1943 she belonged to its Supreme Council, and from 1944, to the Secretariat of the First Albanian Anti-Fascist Union of Women. From 1946 she presided over this organization, which soon took the name of the Albanian Union of Women. From 1945 to 1991 Hoxha was a deputy to the parliament, initially as a member of its foreign affairs commission and then the commission of culture. From 1948 she was a member of the Central Committee (CC) of the Albanian Party of Labor (APL), holding various positions connected with culture, education, and propaganda. From 1966 she directed the Institute of Marxist-Leninist Studies of the CC. Between 1950 and 1962 she was chairperson of the Society of Albanian-Soviet Friendship. In 1976 she belonged to a commission for the elaboration of a new constitution. After her husband's death in April 1985, Hoxha was considered to be at the core of the group of hard-liners, and from March 1986 she was presented as the chairperson of the Democratic Front. In June 1991 she was expelled from the APL and criticized by the party organ, Zeri i Popullit, for her pompous way of life. On 4 December 1991 she was arrested. At the end of January 1993 she was sentenced to nine years in prison for the embezzlement of 750,000 leks. After appeal, this sentence was increased to eleven years, but Hoxha was released from prison in January 1997. She authored Jeta imë më Enverin: Kujtime (My life with Enver: Memoirs; 1998). (TC)

Sources: Raymond Hutchings, Historical Dictionary of Albania (Lanham, Md., 1996); Stavro Skendi, Albania (New York, 1956); Fjalori Enciklopedik Shqiptar (Tirana, 1985); Arshi Pipa, Albanian Stalinism: Ideo-Political Aspects (New York, 1990); Elez Biberaj, Shqipëria në tranzicion: Rruga e veshtrise drejt Demokracise (Tirana, 2001).

HRABAL Bohumil (28 March 1914, Brno–3 February 1997, Prague), Czech writer. In 1934 Hrabal graduated from high school in Nymburk, and then he started law studies at Charles University in Prague. In 1939 he interrupted them owing to the closing of the university by the Germans, but in 1945 he began to study again, and in 1946 he received a Ph.D. in law. During the German occupation he worked as a notary assistant, teacher, storekeeper, and railway worker; after graduation he was a travel agent, ironmaster, and theater worker. From 1962 he devoted himself only to writing. His literary debut was difficult. An early volume of lyrics, Ztracená ulička (Lost street), was not published because the press was closed down in 1949; in the 1950s the Communist censors banned his collection of short stories, Skřivánek na niti (Fettered lark); and his first book, Hovory lidí (People's talks; 1956), went unnoticed. The breakthrough came with Perlička na dně (Pearl at the bottom; 1963). Both this collection of stories and the subsequent volumes—Pábitelé (Petty chatterbox; 1964); Taneční hodiny pro starší a pokročilé (Dance classes for the elderly and advanced; 1964); and Ostře sledované vlaky (1965; Closely Watched Trains, 1968)—were based on the counterpoints of ugliness and beauty, brutality and sensitivity, and life and death. Hrabal combined the literary with the colloquial language and showed a deep knowledge of various groups of people. He also combined satire or even the grotesque with naturalism. He wrote in contrast to the obligatory, artificial, and bombastic prose of Socialist realism. In his subsequent books, such as Inzerát na dům, ve kterém už nechci bydlet (House for sale in which I do not want to live anymore; 1965) and Obsluhoval jsem anglického krále (1971; I Served the King of England, 1989), he was increasingly critical of the social reality, particularly in the latter book, which presents the agony of the Czech middle class.

Hrabal turned to memoirs in the trilogy Městečko u vody (A town on the water), comprised of Postřižny (Hair clipping; 1976), Krasosmutnění (Beautiful mourning; 1979), and Harlekýnovy milióny (Harlequin's millions; 1981). His tales in the volumes Slavnosti sněženek (The snowdrop festival; 1978) and Příliš hlučná samota (1976; Too Loud a Solitude, 1990) were in the Czech tradition of “beer stories” and brought back the charm of the Prague suburbs. Hrabal continued to present the panorama of Czech social life in the novel Kouzelná flétna (The magic flute; 1990). In the 1980s he published an autobiographical trilogy abroad: Proluky (Empty spaces in urban development; 1986); Vita nuova (1987); and Svatby v domě (Wedding at home; 1987). His Sebrané spisy Bohumila Hrabala (Collected works of Bohumil Hrabal) were published in 1992–97. His works were translated into many languages and in various collections. They were also staged and filmed by Jiří Menzel. (PU)

Sources: ČBS; Kdo byl kdo v našich dějinách ve 20. století, vol. 1 (Prague, 1998); Slovník českých spisovatelů od roku 1945, vol. 2 (Prague, 1998); Susanna Roth, Laute Einsamkeit und bitteres Glück: Zur poetischen Welt von Bohumil Hrabals Prosa (Bern, 1986); Radko Pytlík, Bohumil Hrabal (Prague, 1990); Jaroslav Kladiiva, Literatura Bohumila Hrabala: Struktura a metoda Hrabalových děl (Prague, 1994); Monika Zgustová, V rajské zahradě trpkých plodů: O životě a díle Bohumila Hrabala (Prague, 1997); Alexander Götz, Bilder aus der Tiefe der Zeit: Erinnerung und Selbststilisierung als ästhetische Funktionen im Werk Bohumil Hrabals (Frankfurt am Main, 1998); Radko Pytlík, The Sad King of Czech Literature, Bohumil Hrabal: His Life and Work (Prague, 2000).

HRECHUKHA Mykhailo [also known as Grechukha] (19 September 1902, Moshny, near Cherkasy–15 May 1976, Kiev), Ukrainian Communist activist. The son of a peasant, from 1916 Hrechukha worked in a sugar refinery. In 1922 he began his career in the Komsomol in his home region. Quickly promoted during the Great Purge, in 1938 he graduated from the Institute of Motorization and Highways in Kharkiv and became party secretary of the town and district committee in Zhytomyr and a member of the Politburo of the CC of the Communist Party (Bolshevik) of Ukraine. In 1939 he moved to Kiev and assumed the post of president of the Supreme Soviet of the Ukrainian SSR. After the Red Army occupied the then Polish territories of Eastern Galicia and Volhynia in September 1939, in October of that year Hrechukha arrived in Lwów (Lviv), where he monitored the preparations for and the course of the manipulated elections to the People’s Assembly of Western Ukraine, as well as the motion to incorporate those territories into the Ukrainian SSR. He also authorized religious persecution and the deportation of Polish citizens to the Soviet interior. A close associate of Nikita Khrushchev, in 1954 Hrechukha moved from the post of formal head of the republic to the post of deputy prime minister of the Ukrainian SSR, and in 1956 he became a deputy member of the CC of the CPSU. In 1961 he resigned from all his party and government posts.

For some time he served as transportation adviser to the administration, and then he retired. (WR) Sources: Encyclopedia of Ukraine, vol. 2 (Toronto, 1988); Prominent Personalities in the USSR (Metuchen, N.J., 1968); Boris Levytsky, The Soviet Political Elite (Stanford, 1969); Istoria Ukraïnskoi SSR, vols. 7–8 (Kiev, 1984); David R. Marples, Stalinism in Ukraine in the 1940s (London, 1992).

HRIBAR Ivan (19 September 1851, Trzin (Trnovče)—18 April 1941, Ljubljana), Slovene politician. After graduating from high school in 1867, Hribar started working in the banking sector, serving as manager of the Ljubljana branch of the Czech Banka Slavija from 1876 to 1919. His interests in culture and literature led to his involvement in the Slovene national movement. He was influenced by the Young Czech movement and later the neo-Pan-Slavic movement promoted by Karel Kramář. In 1884 Hribar founded the periodical Slovan, and soon afterwards, along with Ivan Tavčar, he assumed the leadership of a radical national group that opposed the conciliatory policy of the Slovene liberals. He called for national unity of the Slovenes and endeavored to create a political group that would counterbalance both the liberals and the Slovene clerical conservatives. In the elections to the local parliament of Krajina in 1883 and 1886 the radical nationalist faction failed to win the support of the voters. At the beginning of the 1890s Hribar was drawn to social Catholicism, working with the theologian Anton Mahnič. In 1894, along with Tavčar, Hribar formed the National Liberal Party, renamed the National Progressive Party in 1905. This brought him success. He was repeatedly elected to the local parliament of Krajina (1886–1906), and then he sat in the Vienna parliament (1907–11). He was a long-time mayor of Ljubljana (1886–1910), where he founded a Slovene bank and a university and implemented an ambitious modernization program. During World War I Hribar was interned by the Austrian authorities because he promoted Pan-Slavism and Russophilia. After the war he played an active role in the establishment of the Kingdom of Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes, serving as its ambassador to Prague and Sofia (1919–23) and then as viceroy in Slovenia. In 1925 he withdrew from active politics in protest against the Serb domination of the state. Between 1928 and 1932 he published four volumes of memoirs, Moji spomini (My memoirs). After the German invasion and defeat of Yugoslavia Hribar committed suicide. (MC)

Sources: Biographisches Lexikon, vol. 2; Enciklopedija Slovenija, vol. 4 (Ljubljana, 1990); Taja Cepic and Janja Rebolj, eds., Homo sum: Ivan Hribar in njegova Ljubljana: Zbornik ob razstavi Mestnega muzeja Ljubljana (Ljubljana, 1997); Irena Gantar Godina, “Novoslovanska ideja in Slovenci,” Zgodovinski Casopis, 1989, no. 4; “Ivan Hribar (1851–1941),” www2.arnes.si/~fyakel/hribar.htm.

HRINCHENKO Borys, pseudonyms “Vartovyi,” “Vilkhivskiy,” “Yavorenko,” and others (9 December 1863, Vilkhovyi Yar, Kharkiv Province–6 May 1910, Ospedaletti, Włochy), Ukrainian writer and social and political activist. Born into an impoverished noble family, after graduating from high school, Hrinchenko worked as a teacher in eastern Ukraine. In 1891 (or 1892), along with Ivan Lypa, Mykola Mikhnovskiy, and others, he founded the secret nationalist Taras Brotherhood (Bratstvo Tarasivtsiv). In 1894 he settled in Chernikhov, where he worked in the local land office. Thanks to the support of Ukrainian patrons, he organized the largest press in the Russian part of Ukraine, publishing popular Ukrainian literature. From 1902 he lived and worked in Kiev. From 1904 he was one of the leaders of the Ukrainian Democratic Party (Ukraiinska Demokratychna Partiya [UDP]), belonging to its left wing. The left wing soon turned into the Ukrainian Radical Party (Ukraiinska Radykalna Partiya), which, in turn, reunited with the UDP to form the Ukrainian Democratic Radical Party (Ukraiinska Demokratychno-Radykalna Partiya [UDRP]) at the end of 1905. From 1906 Hrinchenko contributed to the newspaper Hromadska dumka and edited the periodical Nova hromada, and in 1906–9 he presided over the Kievan organization Prosvita (Education). On behalf of Hromada (Community), a Kievan organization of the Ukrainian intelligentsia, in 1902–9 he edited Slovar ukraiïnskoyi movy (Dictionary of the Ukrainian language).

Hrinchenko made his literary debut in the 1880s. He authored almost fifty short stories, including “Chudova divchyna” (Magic girl; 1884), “Sama, zovsim sama” (Alone, all alone; 1885), and “Olesya” (1890); the novels Sonyashnyi promin (Sunray; 1890) and Sered temnoyi nochi (In the middle of a dark night; 1900); the collections of poetry Pid silskoyu strikhoyu (Under a village roof; 1886) and Pid khmarnym nebom (Under clouded skies; 1893); and historic dramas, such as Sered buri (In the storm; 1897). He translated works by Friedrich Schiller, Johann Wolfgang Goethe, Heinrich Heine, Victor Hugo, and Henrik Ibsen. His ethnographic output includes the three-volume Ethnografichni materialy, zibranni v Chernihivskiy i susidnykh z neyu huberniakh (Ethnographic materials gathered in Chernikhov and neighboring provinces; 1895–96) and a couple of collections of folktales. Hrinchenko was an outstanding pedagogue, fighting for instruction in the Ukrainian language in the schools. He presented his views on this subject in Yaka teper narodna shkola v Ukraini (What should be a popular school in the Ukraine today; 1896). He authored a number of school textbooks—for instance, on Ukrainian grammar. He was among the leaders of the Ukrainian Narodnik movement.

Hrinchenko presented his political views in detail in the UDRP program, which he authored, and in Lysty z Naddnyprianskoyi Ukrainy (Letter from the Dnieper Ukraine), published in the newspaper Bukovyna in 1892–93. (BB)

Sources: Encyclopedia of Ukraine, vol. 2 (Toronto, 1988); Dovidnyk z istoriyi Ukrainy (Kiev, 2001); Borys Hrinchenko and Mykhailo Drahomanow, Dialohy pro ukraiïnsku natsionalnu spravu (Kiev, 1994); Valentyna Statyeyeva, Ukraiïnski pysmennyky pro problemy literaturnoy movy ta movoznavstva XIX-pochatku XX st. (Uzhhorod, 1997); Adventyna Zhyvotenko-Pyankiv, Pedagogichno-prosvitnytska pratsia Borysa Hrinchenka (Kiev, 1999).

HRONSKÝ Jozef [originally Cíger] (23 February 1896, Zvolen–13 July 1960, Luján, Argentina), Slovak writer. Hronský graduated from a pedagogical college in Léva (now Levice, Slovakia). From 1914 he worked as a teacher in Krupina, Kremnica, and Martin, and between 1917 and 1918 he fought in the Austro-Hungarian Army on the Italian front. From 1928 to 1937 he was editor-in-chief of Slniečko, a well-known magazine for children. In 1933 he became secretary of the Slovak Matrix (Matica slovenská [MS]), and in May 1940 he was appointed head of the MS. After the creation of the Slovak state on 14 March 1939, Hronský backed the idea of independence. Under his leadership, the MS became the main institution representing Slovak science and culture. During the Slovak National Uprising in August 1944 Hronský was held prisoner by the insurgents. In 1945 he went into exile. He lived in Austria, Bavaria, and Italy, and in 1948 he settled in Argentina. Because he was in conflict with Ferdinand Ďurčanský's radical camp, which formed the nucleus of the Slovak political émigré community in Buenos Aires, until the mid-1950s Hronský kept away from émigré organizations. In 1956 he became honorary president of the Society of Slovak Writers and Artists in exile, and that very year he assumed the leadership of the Slovak National Council Abroad (Slovenská Národná Rada v Zahraničí [SNRvZ]), replacing Karol Sidor (who had died in 1953). In 1959 he founded the MS in exile.

Hronský is considered one of the leading Slovak prose writers. He began his literary career by publishing three collections of short stories: U nás (Here; 1923); Domov (Homeland; 1925); and Medové srdce (Heart of honey; 1929); these reveal the influences of the native realistic tradition combined with European modernism and impressionism. In Podpolianske rozprávky (Podpoliany stories; 1932) Hronský reassessed Slovak myths about highland robbers. He emphasized the relationship between mankind and the earth and a faith in the positive values of rural life. His novels Chlieb (Bread; 1931) and Jozef Mak (1933; English publication in 1985) constitute a transition between turn-of-the-century realism and contemporary Slovak literature. His novel Pisár Gráč (The writer Gráč; 1940) involved a clash between nature and civilization. In the novel Na Bukvovom dvore (At the Bukva court; 1944) Hronský analyzed the irrational sources of human behavior. In exile, he published Andreas Búr Majster (Mayor Andreas; 1948), a novel inspired by folk legends, and the famous novel Svet na trasovisku (The world in the swamp; 1960), a diatribe against the Slovak National Uprising, which he condemned as an act directed against Slovak statehood and instigated by external Communist forces. Hronský is also regarded as a precursor of the modern Slovak literature for children and youth. (MG)

