During World War II Novomeský joined the Communist resistance movement in Slovakia. He was arrested in 1940 and 1942. In 1943, along with Karol Šmidke and Gustav Husák, he signed the so-called Christmas agreement on behalf of the CPC; it united the efforts of the Communist resistance movement and the democratic resistance movement in Slovakia. During the Slovak National Uprising in 1944 Novomeský was one of the leaders of the Slovak National Council (SNC), and at the end of 1944 he was a member of a delegation that conducted negotiations with President Edvard Beneš in London. In March 1945 Novomeský took part in negotiations in Moscow that led to the adoption of the Košice program of the first postwar government of Czechoslovakia. From 1945 to 1950 he held the post of commissioner for education (the equivalent of a ministerial position in Slovakia), and he served as deputy chairman of the SNC. In 1951, along with a group of leading Slovak Communists, including Vlado Clementis, Novomeský was arrested and accused of “Slovak bourgeois nationalism.” He spent five years in prison. Released in 1956, he worked for the National Literature Monument in Prague. Rehabilitated in 1963, he worked at the Institute of Slovak Literature of the Slovak Academy of Science (1963–66). In 1969 he supported the “normalization” policy pursued by Husák. From 1968 to 1974 Novomeský was the chairman, and subsequently the honorary chairman of the national cultural institution Matica Slovenská. After he had been banned from writing in the 1950s, he returned to literature in the 1960s, writing Vila Tereza (1963), Do mesta 30 minút (Thirty minutes to the city; 1963), and Stamodtiaľ a iné (Out from there and other poems; 1964). Novomeský was a theorist of Czechoslovak context literature and an expert on modern culture, which was demonstrated in his political commentaries and essays, including Čestná povinnosť (An honorable duty; 1969), Manifesty a protesty (Manifestos and protests; 1970), and Zväzky a záväzky (Relations and commitments; 1972). He also translated Russian literature. (PU)

NOVOTNÝ Antonín (10 December 1904, Letňany, near Prague–28 January 1975, Prague), Czechoslovak Communist leader. Born into a working-class family, in 1921 Novotný joined the Communist Party of Czechoslovakia (CPC), and in 1929 he received his first administrative post in the party. In 1935 he was a delegate to the Seventh Congress of the Communist International, and in 1937 he became secretary of a party committee in Prague. After the German invasion in March 1939, Novotný went underground. Arrested by the Gestapo in September 1941, he was placed in the Mauthausen concentration camp and was held there until the end of the war. After returning home in May 1945, Novotný again became head of the party in Prague, and in 1946 he was elected to the party’s Central Committee (CC). He took a leading role in the Communist coup of February 1948. In September 1951 he was promoted to full membership in the CC Secretariat; this promotion was linked to his role in the dismissal of Rudolf Slanský. In December 1951 Novotný was elected to the Presidium of the CC of the CPC. In February 1953 he became deputy prime minister of Czechoslovakia. A dull apparatchik, Novotný owed all his promotions to his absolute faithfulness in following the Stalinist line of Klement Gottwald. After Gottwald died in March 1953, Novotný replaced him as first secretary of the CC of the CPC in September 1953. Initially he was a member of the “collective leadership,” whose members included Antonín Zápotocký and Prime Minister Viliam Široký. Despite signs of “thaw” in the Soviet bloc that followed the Twentieth Congress of the CPSU and the 1956 events in Poland and Hungary, the Czechoslovak leaders did not introduce any changes in the Stalinist system of government in Czechoslovakia.

Novotný gradually subordinated the party apparatus to himself and extended his powers. On 19 November 1957, after the death of Zápotocký, Novotný became president of Czechoslovakia. From 1959 to 1968 he also served as chairman of the National Front. When in 1961 a bad economic situation and Nikita Khrushchev’s “second thaw” in the Soviet Union gave rise to ferment, Novotný impeded changes and tried to prevent the disclosure of his role in the crimes of the system. In June 1961 he was instrumental in the dismissal of his main rival, Rudolf Barák, from the Ministry of Interior, and in January 1962 he personally took part in Barák’s arrest. Nevertheless, Novotný failed to deter the Slovak faction of the party in its efforts to square things with the past. Under a 1962 resolution of the Twelfth Congress of the CPC, the new CC reviewed some political trials from 1949–54 and in April 1963 decided that many “deserving comrades” had been unlawfully convicted. The removal of “scapegoats” did not help. Novotný was replaced as head of the Slovak party by Alexander Dubček. Khrushchev’s thaw in the Soviet Union induced the party authorities to limit censorship for the time being, but it also gave rise to student demonstrations for greater freedoms. In May 1964, the police, using truncheons, dispersed a demonstration of around three thousand students.

Despite the problems caused by the Kremlin’s thaw, the fall of Khrushchev in October 1964 actually weakened Novotný’s position because he was linked with Khrushchev. In the middle of the decade, an attempt to return to Stalinist orthodoxy increased the ferment within the Slovak party and among party intellectuals. Criticism of the party leadership was also voiced at a congress of Czechoslovak writers in June 1967. A crisis emerged at a CC plenum in October 1967. After the brutal quelling of a student demonstration in Prague’s Strahov district, Novotný and the hard-liners had to face increasing criticism. The pro-reform forces united with the Slovak autonomists in the party. Novotný tried to use the occasion of Leonid Brezhnev’s visit to Prague in December 1967 to consolidate his power, but without success. The pro-reform groups became so strong that Novotný had to perform a self-criticism. The balance tipped in favor of the reformists after they discovered that the dogmatists were plotting a coup. On 5 January 1968 Novotný was replaced as first secretary of the CC of the CPC by Dubček. On 22 March 1968, during the Prague Spring, he was also forced to resign as president of the state. He continued to serve, though, as a member of the party’s CC. After the invasion of Czechoslovakia by Warsaw Pact troops in August 1968, Novotný did not return to power. In 1971 he was finally expelled from the CPC CC. According to Milan Kundera, Novotný was the personification of “the Czech genius of shallowness.” (WR)

NOWAK Zenon (27 January 1905, Pabianice, near Łódź–21 August 1980, Warsaw), Polish Communist activist. Born into a working-class family, from 1917 to 1920 Nowak was a miner in Westphalia and later in Silesia. He also worked as an agrarian laborer and weaver in Pabianice. In 1924 he joined the Communist Workers’ Party of Poland (Komunistyczna Partia Robotnicza Polski [KPRP]), which in 1925 changed its name to the Communist Party of Poland (Komunistyczna Partia Polski [KPP]). From 1932 to 1938 Nowak was a member of the KPP Central Committee (CC). He cooperated with the Communist International and probably also with the NKVD. After KPP activists were murdered on Stalin’s orders (1936–39), Nowak, together with Bolesław Bierut, dissolved the KPP units in the Polish territories. From 1942 to 1945, Nowak worked in a German labor camp in the Sudeten, and from 1945 to 1947 he served in the Soviet Army. After returning to Poland in 1947, he joined the (Communist) Polish Workers’ Party (Polska Partia Robotnicza [PPR]) and served as secretary of the PPR Executive Committee in Poznań and Katowice, head of the PPR CC Cadres Department (September–December 1948), and member of the Organizational Bureau of the PPR CC (November–December 1948). In the summer of 1948 Nowak was one of the activists who attacked Władysław Gomułka.

From the foundation of the Polish United Workers’ Party (Polska Zjednoczona Partia Robotnicza [PUWP]) in December 1948, Nowak served as a member of its CC, a member of its Organizational Bureau, and head of its CC Cadres Department. In May 1950 he became a deputy member and in March 1954 a member of the Politburo. From May 1950 to March 1954 he served as secretary of the PUWP CC. In the party leadership Nowak was responsible for organizational affairs and the cadres. He sought to increase the party's influence in society along the lines of the Soviet model. From 1952 to 1956 he was an MP. From November 1952 to March 1954 he served as deputy prime minister. After the death of Bierut, in February 1956 Nowak's role increased. At that time he was one of the leaders of the dogmatic Natolin faction (Natolińcy) and the Kremlin's candidate to succeed Bierut as party head. Nowak was against the dissemination of the so-called secret report delivered by Nikita Khrushchev at the Twentieth Congress of the CPSU. In July 1956, on behalf of the Natolin faction, Nowak proposed a program to tighten cooperation with the Soviet Union and continue the collectivization policy; he also called for reducing the number of people of Jewish origin in the party leadership, releasing Primate Stefan Wyszyński from house arrest, and reinstating Gomułka as a member of the Politburo. At the Eighth Plenum of the CC in October 1956 Nowak was expelled from the Politburo but continued to serve as first deputy prime minister. Gradually, Gomułka began to cooperate with some members of the Natolin faction, including Nowak. From 1961 to 1972 Nowak again served as an MP. He left the post of deputy prime minister in December 1968. From 1968 to 1971 he was chairman of the Party Central Control Commission, and from 1969 to 1971 he was chairman of the Supreme Chamber of Control. From 1971 to 1978 Nowak was ambassador to Moscow, and from 1978 to 1980, a member of the Presidium of the All-Polish Committee of the National Unity Front. (PK)

NOWAK-JEZIORAŃSKI Jan [originally Zdzisław Antoni Jeziorański], pseudonyms “Janek” and “Jan Zych” (15 May 1913, Warsaw–20 January 2005, Warsaw), Polish journalist and political activist. Born into a family with patriotic traditions, Nowak-Jeziorański studied economics at the University of Poznań (1933–36), and then he worked there as an assistant professor (1937–39). In the September 1939 campaign he fought in Volhynia. Taken prisoner of war by the Germans, he escaped during transport, but he was arrested again and sent to the Vosswald Camp in Silesia. He escaped again and came to Warsaw in October 1939. Nowak-Jeziorański took part in underground activities, and from mid-1941 he worked for the Bureau of Information and Propaganda of the High Command of the Union of Armed Struggle (Związek Walki Zbrojnej [ZWZ]) and later of the Home Army (Armia Krajowa [AK]). With the consent of the Polish underground authorities, he worked in the Germany Commissary Management of Real Estate in Warsaw and managed several houses in which clandestine meetings took place. In the summer of 1941 he took part in an anti-German disinformation action, “N,” organizing the dissemination of propaganda materials in the Polish territories incorporated into Nazi Germany and in the Third Reich itself. As a courier of the AK High Command, Nowak-Jeziorański made several trips between Warsaw and London, serving as a messenger between the Polish government-in-exile and the leaders of the Polish underground state and army. It was then that he adopted the pseudonym “Jan Nowak.” In 1943 he was awarded the Cross of the Brave and in 1944 the Cross of Virtuti Militari. Before returning to Poland in the summer of 1944, Nowak-Jeziorański met with British prime minister Winston Churchill and foreign minister Anthony Eden. Upon arrival in Warsaw, he told the Polish underground leaders of his impression that the West was indifferent toward Poland and the planned uprising in Warsaw. During the Warsaw Uprising, in August and September 1944, he edited Lightning (Błyskawica), radio broadcasts in English.

At the end of the Warsaw Uprising Nowak-Jeziorański was ordered to get through to London with microfilms of the uprising. He left Poland in December 1944 and, via Switzerland, he got to London in January 1945. In February 1945 he was promoted to captain. After the war he stayed in London. In 1946–55 Nowak-Jeziorański belonged to the Main Board of the Polish freedom movement Independence and Democracy, and from 1947 he was active in the Association of Polish War Veterans (Stowarzyszenie Polskich Kombatantów). In 1948 he was decorated with the British King's Medal for Courage in the Cause of Freedom. In 1948–51 he edited Polish broadcasts on the BBC, and in 1951–76 he was director of the Polish section of Radio Free Europe (RFE) in Munich. The RFE's broadcasts were aimed against Communist propaganda and the Communist monopoly of information in Poland, but Nowak-Jeziorański frequently had to make political decisions that did not always correspond with the current policies of his American employers and German hosts. For instance, he always strove for the international recognition of the Oder-Neisse border. In October 1956 he worked to calm tensions in Poland, knowing that the West would not help Poland against the Soviets.

After retiring from the RFE, Nowak-Jeziorański moved to Washington, D.C., where in 1977–92 he was a National Security Council consultant. He also became a member of the Polish American Congress. Until 1996 he belonged to its Board of Directors, and in 1991–92 he was one of its deputy chairmen. He co-organized help for Solidarity. Nowak-Jeziorański visited Poland for the first time after the war in 1989. From 1990 to 1993 he edited a television series, Poland from a Distance (Polska z oddali), which was later continued on Polish Radio. Using his Washington contacts, Nowak-Jeziorański worked for Polish entry into NATO. Active in Polish affairs, he frequently spoke on sensitive issues—for instance, he explicitly defended Colonel Ryszard Kukliński and demanded an explanation of the Józef Oleksy case, which was before the court. In the presidential campaign of 2000 he supported Andrzej Olechowski against Aleksander Kwaśniewski. He was engaged in the Polish-Jewish reconciliation. In 1994 Nowak-Jeziorański received the Order of the White Eagle, in 1996 the U.S. Presidential Medal of Freedom, and in 1998 the Lithuanian Order of Gediminas. He authored numerous articles and several books, such as 63 Days: The Story of the Warsaw Uprising (under the pen name J. Zych; 1945); Rosja wobec Powstania Warszawskiego (Russia and the Warsaw Uprising; 1947); Polska droga ku wolności, 1952–1974 (The Polish road to freedom, 1952–74; 1974); Kurier z Warszawy (1978; edition in Poland, 1981); Courier from Warsaw, 1982); Polska pozostała sobą (Poland remained herself; 1980); Wojna w eterze: Wspomnienia 1948–1956 (War on the air: Memoirs, 1956–78; 1986); Polska z oddali: Wspomnienia 1956–1976 (Poland from a distance: Memoirs, 1956–74; 1988); W poszukiwaniu nadziei (In search of hope; 1993); Rozmowy o Polsce (Conversations about Poland; 1995); and Polska wczoraj, dziś i jutro (Poland yesterday, today, and tomorrow; 1999). Nowak-Jeziorański won numerous literary and journalism awards, honorary doctorates, and honorary citizenships in Polish towns. (JS) NOWOTKO Marcei, pseudonyms “Marian,” “Stary,” and others (8 August 1893, Warsaw–28 November 1942, Warsaw), Polish Communist activist. Born into a large family of an agrarian worker, after finishing four grades of a rural elementary school, Nowotko worked as an apprentice locksmith and in a sugar factory. In 1915 he lost his job. In 1916 he joined Social Democracy of the Kingdom of Poland and Lithuania (Socjaldemokracja Królestwa Polskiego i Litwy [SDKPiL]). From 1916 to 1918 he was an economic émigré in Germany, where he met the local revolutionaries. After returning home in December 1918, Nowotko became secretary of the Council of Workers’ Delegates in Ciechanów and a member of the Communist Workers’ Party of Poland (Komunistyczna Partia Robotnicza Polski [KPRP]). In October 1919 he was arrested for organizing a strike of agricultural workers. After his release, he became an activist in the Trade Union of Agricultural Workers. Arrested again for revolutionary agitation and then released, he was in hiding from mid-1920 until the Red Army marched into Poland in August 1920. Nowotko then became the commissar of the Polish Provisional Revolutionary Committee (Tymczasowy Komitet Rewolucyjny Polski) in Wysokie Mazowieckie and directed the Bolshevik terror in the territories where he was in charge. Wanted by the police after the retreat of the Soviet troops, he went to the Dąbrowa Górnicza mining district, where, under the name of Marcei Nowakowski, he worked in a factory. He also served as a KPRP district secretary and the chairman of the Metalworkers’ Trade Union. From 1921 to 1927 Nowotko directed the underground units of the KPRP in Poznań (Wielkopolska), the Dąbrowa Górnicza mining district, Lwów (Lviv), Warsaw, and Łódź. (The KPRP was renamed the Communist Party of Poland [Komunistyczna Partia Polski (KPP)] in 1925.) In 1927 Nowotko was a delegate to the Fourth Congress of the KPP in Moscow. Arrested in July 1929, one year later he was sentenced to four years in prison. After his release, he resumed his work for the KPP, becoming a member of the KPP National Secretariat. Arrested again in April 1935 and sentenced to twelve years in prison in October 1936, he was freed during the Nazi invasion in September 1939. In the meantime, the KPP had been dissolved and its leaders murdered on Stalin’s orders.

After making his way to the territories occupied by the Soviet Union, Nowotko worked for a Białystok unit of the International Organization for Aid to Revolutionaries. In mid-1940 he became chairman of a district executive committee in Łapy. In the spring of 1941 he went to Moscow, where he underwent training in a school of the Communist International. On 28 December 1941 he was parachuted close to Wiązowna, near Warsaw, with the first Initiative Group, which was to establish a new Communist party. While landing, Nowotko broke his leg. At the founding congress of the Polish Workers’ Party (Polska Partia Robotnicza [PPR]) on 5 January 1942 Nowotko was elected first secretary of the party. At that time he used the name of Jan Wysocki. Nowotko strictly adhered to the Soviet strategies, based on concealing ties to the Kremlin and on promoting a program of a national liberation struggle. He called for immediately taking up military struggle, which conflicted with the program of the pro-independence underground and with Polish interests because the German occupation forces had a disproportionate advantage in Poland, but it was advantageous to the Soviet Union, which was having difficulties on the front. As a result of internal rivalry in the PPR leadership, Nowotko was shot and killed by Zygmunt Mołojec, on the orders of the latter's brother, Bolesław, who aspired to become the leader of the party. NYERS Rezső (21 March 1923, Budapest), Hungarian Communist activist. The son of a laborer, after primary school Nyers worked in a printing house. From 1940 he belonged to the Hungarian Social Democratic Party (HSDP) and from 1942 to the Trade Union of Printers. In 1945–46 he was deputy secretary of the HSDP committee in the Budapest quarter of Kispeszt, and he worked for the central party organ, Népszava. In 1947–48 he was deputy secretary and secretary of the HSDP committee in Pest. From the merger of the HSDP and the Hungarian Communist Party into the Hungarian Workers' Party (HWP) in June 1948, Nyers was the HWP's secretary for organization in the Pest provincial committee. From 1948 to 1954 he was a deputy member, and from 1956 a member, of the HWP Central Committee (CC), and from 1948 to 1953 he was an MP. In 1949–51 Nyers worked in the CC apparatus, from 1951 to 1954 he headed a department in the Ministry of Domestic Trade, from 1954 to 1956 he was deputy chairman of the All-National Union of Consumer Co-Operatives (AUCC), and from July to October 1956 he was minister of consumer industry. In 1956 he graduated from the Higher Economic School in Budapest.

During the revolution, on 5 November 1956 Nyers joined the government of János Kádár, and a week later he became head of the Commissariat of Supplies. From February 1957 he belonged to the CC of the Hungarian Socialist Workers' Party (HSWP), and in 1958–98 he was an MP. From 1957 to 1960 Nyers chaired the AUCC again, and from January 1960 to November 1962 he was minister of finance. From 1962 he was a deputy member, and from 1966 a member, of the HSWP CC Politburo, and from 1962 he was CC secretary for economic policy and head of the State Planning Commission. Nyers co-authored the New Economic Mechanism of 1968, but in the early 1970s, when the reform was checked, he was dismissed. In March 1974 he left the CC Secretariat, and in 1975 he was dropped from the Politburo. From 1974 to 1988 he was director of the Institute of Economics of the Hungarian Academy of Sciences; from 1976, head of the editorial board of the periodical Közgazdasági Szemle; from 1983 to 1990, chairman of the Hungarian Economic Association; and from 1986, professor of the Higher Economic School in Budapest.

As the economic crisis became aggravated in the late 1980s, Nyers returned to the HSWP leadership. In December 1987 he co-founded and briefly led the New March Forum, referring to the March Front of 1937. In May 1988 he returned to the CC Politburo, and from November 1988 to June 1989 he was minister of state for coordinating economic reforms. From June 1989 to its dissolution in October 1989, Nyers was the HSWP chairman. From October 1989 to May 1990 he chaired the (post-Communist) Hungarian Socialist Party (HSP). In the first free elections in March 1990 the HSP won almost 11 percent of the vote, and Nyers became an MP again. In 1998 he retired from political life. (JT)

OBBOV Aleksandur (2 February 1887, Pleven–18 October 1975, Sofia), Bulgarian politician. Obbov finished a wine-making school in Pleven (1905) and completed law studies in Sofia (1913). In 1904 he joined the Bulgarian Agrarian National Union (Bulgarski Zemedelski Narodni Sayuz [BANU]). He was a member of its Standing Committee from 1908 to 1919 and the secretary of the Standing Committee from 1914 to 1919. Obbov served as a member and deputy speaker (1919–20) and then again as a member (1920–23) of the National Assembly. He was minister of agriculture and state property (May 1920–June 1923) and minister of interior and health (February–March 1923) in the government of Aleksandur Stamboliyski. After the overthrow of Stamboliyski in June 1923, Obbov organized a peasant resistance to the government of Aleksandur Tsankov in the Pleven district. After the uprising was suppressed, Obbov emigrated to Romania and then to Czechoslovakia. Along with Raiko Daskalov, he was a founding member of the BANU Foreign Representation in Prague (1923–25). After a split in the peasant movement in exile (1925), Obbov became the leader of its right wing.

After returning to Bulgaria in 1933, Obbov entered politics. He condemned the coup d'état of May 1934 and joined the legal opposition to the government of Tsar Boris III. From 1935 to 1944 he was one of the leaders of the Aleksandur Stamboliyski BANU. During World War II Obbov was interned in the Gonda Voda concentration camp. After his release, he was one of the founders of the Fatherland Front (1944). After the coup of 9 September 1944, he helped to organize and consolidate the BANU; for example, he was the editor-in-chief of the newspaper, Zemedelsko zname, and a member (1945–47) and secretary (1946–47) of the BANU Standing Committee. Obbov was minister without portfolio (August 1945–March 1946), minister of agriculture and state property (August–September 1945), and deputy prime minister and minister of agriculture and state property (March–November 1946) in the government of Kimon Georgiev. As deputy prime minister and minister without portfolio (November 1946–December 1947) in the cabinet of Georgi Dimitrov, Obbov endorsed the suppression of the non-Communist opposition. He served as deputy to the National Assembly (1945–46) and to the Grand National Assembly (1946–49). He was a member of the delegation that signed a peace treaty for Bulgaria with the Allies in Paris (10 February 1947). In the summer of 1947 Obbov opposed the transformation of the BANU into an appendage of the Communist Party; consequently, he was stripped of his posts and persecuted. After the plenum of the Central Committee of the Bulgarian Communist Party in April 1956, at which the “personality cult” was denounced, Obbov again became a member of the Fatherland Front. (JJ)

OBERSOVSZKY Gyula (1 January 1927, Pécs–15 March 2001, Budapest), Hungarian writer. Obersovszky was born into the family of an entrepreneur and cultural activist of Polish origin. For financial reasons, at the age of fifteen he began working as a trainee at a notary's office in Püspökladány. In 1944 he joined the Hungarian Communist Party, and in the spring of 1945 he worked on a commission for parceling out land. In 1949 he graduated from the Department of Drama of the School of Drama in Budapest and began working in the Department of Popular Education of the National Council in Debrecen. A co-founder of the provincial organization of the Association of Hungarian Writers and the periodical Építők, Obersovszky joined the Union of Hungarian Journalists in 1954. In the same year he was stripped of all his posts and expelled from the party. He moved to Budapest, and as an employee of the Institute of Popular Education, he organized drama courses. In the summer of 1956 he resumed his journalistic work.

On 23 October 1956 Obersovszky took part in the siege of the radio building in Budapest. The following day he founded and then edited Igazság, the first newspaper of the revolution. On 4 November he founded the underground periodical Élőink and joined a group of fighters from the hospital on Sándor Péterffy Street. He helped to organize the “silent” revolution of 23 November and a women's demonstration against the Soviet intervention and the suppression of the revolution on 4 December. Arrested in December 1956 and tried in the trial of Ilona Tóth and her comrades in April 1957, Obersovszky was sentenced to three years in prison. However, on 20 June 1957 the Supreme Court sentenced Obersovszky, along with another writer, József Gáli, to death on the charge of “plotting against the people's government.” As a result of international protests, Obersovszky was reprieved and the case was reviewed. He was sentenced to life imprisonment and Gáli to fifteen years. Obersovszky was released under an amnesty in 1963. From 1967 to 1989 he was an editor of the newspaper Sportfogadás. He could publish his works only under a pseudonym, "Oby Gyula." It was only after the fall of communism that he could publish under his real name again. In 1988 Obersovszky was co-founder of the Historical Compensation Committee, whose aim it was to bring about a solemn reburial of Imre Nagy, his associates, and all the victims of the 1956 revolution and to preserve the memory of its fighters. In 1990 for a short period Obersovszky revived and edited the periodicals Igazság and Élünk. From 1991 to 2000 he was the only editor of the periodical Vagyok. (JT)

OCHAB Edward (16 August 1906, Kraków–1 May 1989, Warsaw), Polish Communist leader. The son of a clerk of peasant origin, Ochab graduated from the Cooperative College affiliated with the Jagiellonian University in Kraków in 1927, and two years later he joined the Communist Party of Poland (Komunistyczna Partia Polski [KPP]). Imprisoned five times for his Communist activities in the interwar period, he spent a total of six years in prison. In September 1939 he got out of a prison in Warsaw and fought in the defense of the capital. After the Red Army seized the eastern territories of the Second Republic of Poland in September 1939, Ochab found himself in the Soviet-occupied territories. After the German invasion of the Soviet Union in June 1941, he volunteered to serve in the Red Army. Assigned to a stroybat (construction battalion), in March 1943 he organized the Union of Polish Patriots (Związek Patriotów Polskich [ZPP]) under the aegis of the Kremlin. From 1943 to 1944 he served as political officer in the units of the Polish Army under Soviet command. He enjoyed the trust of the Kremlin; therefore, he was soon promoted to responsible positions.

From July to November 1944 Ochab served as deputy commander of the First Polish Army for political and educational affairs and subsequently as deputy head of the Department of Public Administration of the Polish Committee of National Liberation (Polski Komitet Wyzwolenia Narodowego [PKWN]). After the establishment of the Provisional Government, he served as undersecretary of state in the Ministry of Public Administration, and from April to June 1945 he was head of this ministry. From July 1945 to February 1946 he was secretary of the Central Committee (CC) of the (Communist) Polish Workers' Party (Polska Partia Robotnicza [PPR]), and subsequently he served as first secretary of the PPR Provincial Committee in Katowice until April 1948. From May to September 1948 Ochab was chairman of the Central Board of the Cooperative Union, and from 1948 to 1949 he was chairman of the Central Commission of Trade Unions (Komisja Centralna Związków Zawodowych [KCZZ]). After Władysław Gomułka was dismissed in September 1948, Ochab again joined the PPR CC Secretariat and became a deputy member of the party's Politburo. At that time he was one of the top-ranking members of the Stalinist leadership of the party. In December 1948 he became a member of the CC of the Polish United Workers' Party (Polska Zjednoczona Partia Robotnicza [PUWP]), a deputy member of the Politburo, and a member of the PUWP CC Organizational Bureau. In April 1949 Ochab was appointed deputy minister of national defense and was promoted to general. In the first half of 1950 he also served as chief of the Main Political and Educational Board of the Polish Army. In May 1950 he became CC secretary and a member of the secretariat of the CC Organizational Bureau. In March 1954 he joined the PUWP CC Politburo. He also held many posts in the regime of Bolesław Bierut; for example, he was chairman of the Main Board of the Polish-Soviet Friendship Society.

After Stalin's death and when factional strife within the PUWP leadership increased, Ochab represented a neutral position, although he initially spoke dogmatically. For example, in September 1953 he sharply attacked the Catholic Church and Primate Cardinal Stefan Wyszyński. After the death of Bierut, at the Sixth Plenum of the CC on 20 March 1956, under pressure from Nikita Khrushchev, Ochab was elected the new first secretary of the PUWP CC. He maneuvered between the Puławska faction (Puławianie) and the conservative Natolin faction (Natolińscy) during the Poznań revolt in June 1956 and in the summer of that year, when both factions began to consider restoring Gomułka to power because they wanted to secure Gomułka's support for their position. Ochab still pointed to "kulaks," "imperialist agents," and "bourgeois scoundrels" as "class enemies," but he also promised "further democratization of the party and society."

At the beginning of October 1956, the Politburo, and particularly Ochab, along with Józef Cyrankiewicz and Aleksander Zawadzki, agreed to reelect Gomułka to the position of first secretary of the CC. Since the Puławska faction approved, the Natolin faction warned the Kremlin that a counterrevolution was breaking out in Poland. On 19 October 1956, shortly before the opening of the Eighth Plenum of the CC, a Soviet delegation headed by Khrushchev landed at the airport near Warsaw, and Soviet troops moved toward the capital. Ochab, Cyrankiewicz, and Zawadzki received this delegation and, after a dramatic discussion, succeeded in persuading Khrushchev that the reinstatement of Gomulka was the best solution. Ochab continued to be a member of the Politburo and the CC Secretariat.

As the man behind the compromise, Ochab joined the new ruling group. From January 1957 to October 1959 he served as minister of agriculture. In May 1961 he became deputy chairman of the Council of State, and in August 1964, after Zawadzki's death, he was appointed chairman of the Council of State. From April 1965 to April 1968 he also served as chairman of the All-Polish Committee of the National Unity Front. As a result of the anti-Semitic campaign launched by the PUWP leadership in March 1968, Ochab submitted a letter to the CC Politburo and Secretariat protesting this campaign, and he resigned all his party and government posts. On 11 April 1968 the Assembly removed him as chairman of the Council of State. At the Twelfth Plenum of the CC in July of that year Ochab was also dismissed from the party leadership, and he retired from politics. In October 1977, along with Władysław Matwin, Jerzy Morawski, and several other former activists of the PUWP, Ochab signed a letter to Edward Gierek warning the authorities of the mounting economic and social crisis and calling for changes in economic policies and a reform of the system in Poland. However, until the end of his life Ochab remained a dogmatic Communist, which was amply manifested in a long interview given to Teresa Torańska during the period of martial law. (WR)

OHIYENKO Ivan (monastic name Ilarion) (14 January 1882, Brusilov, Kiev region–29 March 1972, Winnipeg, Canada), Ukrainian historian, linguist, metropolitan of the Autocephalous Orthodox Church. In 1909 Ohienko completed his studies in Slavic philology and literature at the university in Kiev, and then he lectured at the Kiev Trade Institute, as well as at his alma mater. After the February 1917 revolution, he worked on the Ukrainization of higher education and received a professorship at the newly established Ukrainian State University in Kiev. After the seizure of Kiev by the Bolsheviks, Ohienko was rector of the Ukrainian State University in Kamyianets Podilskyy (Kamieniec Podolski). In 1919, on behalf of the Ukrainian Party of Socialists-Federalists, he served as minister of education and religious affairs in the government of the Ukrainian National Republic (UNR). After the fall of the UNR Ohienko settled in Tarnów, Poland, where until 1924 he served as minister for religious affairs in the UNR government-in-exile. He taught at a gymnasium in Lwów, and in 1926 he took a professorship in the Old Church Slavonic language and paleography at the Department of Orthodox Theology of Warsaw University. In 1932, on the wave of anti-Ukrainian persecutions, Ohienko lost his post. He published in the magazines Ridna mova and Nasha Kultura. In 1937–39 he published the Ukrainian translation of the Old and New Testaments.

During the Nazi occupation Ohienko took holy orders and was consecrated bishop of the Chełm (Kholm) diocese in 1940. He carried out the Ukrainization of the Orthodox Church of Chełm, and in March 1944 he was elevated to the status of metropolitan. The day before the Chełm region was seized by the Red Army, Ohienko left for Austria, then for Switzerland, and in 1947 he was invited to Canada, where in 1951 he was appointed metropolitan of Winnipeg and became head of the Ukrainian Orthodox Church in Canada. He initiated the publication of the magazine Vira i kultura, revived Nasha Kultura, founded a theological society, and lectured at and served as dean at St. Andrew's College. Ohienko was the author of many important works in the field of the Ukrainian history and literature, among them the following: Ukraińska kultura (Ukrainian culture; 1918); Istoriia ukraińskoho drukarstva (History of Ukrainian printing; 1925); Kostiantyn i Mefodii: Ikh zhyttia ta diialnist (Constantine and Methodius: Their life and work, 2 vols.; 1927–28); and Suchasna ukraińska literaturna mova (The Ukrainian modern literary language; 1935); Ohienko also wrote dictionaries of the Ukrainian language and works in the history of the Church in the Ukraine—for example, Fortetsia pravoslaviia na Volyni: Sviata Pochayivska Lavra (The fortress of the Orthodox Church in Volhynia: Holy Lavra Pochayivska; 1961) and Kanonizatsiia sviatykh v ukraińskii tserkvi (The canonization of saints in the Ukrainian Orthodox Church; 1965). OKULICKI Leopold, pseudonyms “Kobra,” “Kula,” “Niedźwiadek,” and “Termit” (12 November 1898, Bratucice, near Bochnia–24 December 1946 Moscow), Polish general, last commander-in-chief of the Polish Home Army (Armia Krajowa [AK]). Okulicki graduated from elementary school in Okulice and from high school in Bochnia, as an extramural student, in 1919. In May 1913 he joined the Riflemen's Association, and in May 1914 he became a non-commissioned officer. On 6 August 1914 he joined the Polish Legions, but in September he was dismissed for health reasons. Okulicki got his second assignment to the Third Infantry Regiment of the Second Brigade in September 1915. He fought in the battles of Rarańcza (Rarancha) and Kostiuchnówka (Kostyukhnyvka), and in 1916 he was slightly wounded at the battle of Polska Góra. After the so-called oath of allegiance crisis of July 1917, Okulicki was inducted into the Austrian Army. In 1918 he finished a reserve officer training school in Košice. In August 1918 he deserted from the Austrian Army and joined the Polish Military Organization (Polska Organizacja Wojskowa [POW]) in Kraków. On 31 October 1918 he helped to disarm the Austrians and subsequently fought against the Ukrainians in the battle of Lwów (Lviv). He fought on the Polish-Soviet front near Volkovysk. In April 1920 he became a lieutenant. In June of that year he was slightly wounded at the battle on the Berezina River.

In 1925 Okulicki graduated from the Military College in Warsaw. He subsequently became head of the mobilization department of the Headquarters of Corps Area Three in Grodno. Promoted to major in March 1928, he later commanded a battalion of an infantry regiment in Rybnik and then taught tactics at the Infantry Training Center at Rembertów. From 1934 to 1935 he was chief of staff of the Thirteenth Infantry Division in Równe (Rivne) and then became head of the Wschód (East) Department of the Third Operational Department of the General Staff. In March 1936 he became lieutenant colonel, and on 1 April 1939 he was appointed deputy chief of the Third Department of the General Staff (from 1 September 1939 the Staff of the Commander-in-Chief). As officer for operational affairs of the local branch of the General Headquarters of the Commander-in-Chief, Okulicki remained in Warsaw after the Staff of the Commander-in-Chief left the capital on 6 September 1939. During the defense of Warsaw he served as chief of staff of the Warsaw West sector, and on 17 September he became commander of this sector.

After the capitulation of Warsaw, Okulicki helped to establish the underground Service for the Victory of Poland (Służba Zwycięstwu Polsce [SZP]). In October 1939 he became commander of the SZP for Łódź Province, and in January 1940, commander for the Łódź district of the Union of Armed Struggle (Związek Walki Zbrojnej [ZWZ]). In July 1940 Okulicki was promoted to colonel. Fearing arrest, in August 1940 he transferred to the ZWZ High Command in Warsaw. In October 1940 he was appointed commander of the ZWZ in Lviv. On 22 January 1941 Okulicki was arrested by the NKVD and placed in Lubyanka Prison, and in April 1941 he was transferred to Lefortovo Prison. After the outbreak of the Soviet-German war and the signing of the Sikorski-Maysky agreement, Okulicki was released under an amnesty. He took part in negotiations between General Władysław Anders and Stalin and was appointed chief of staff of the Polish Army in the Soviet Union. In March 1942 he became commander of the Seventh Infantry Division, formed in Kerman, Uzbekistan. He continued to hold this post after the army of General Anders left the Soviet Union.

After training in Great Britain for a special force of paratroopers to be dropped in occupied Poland, on 22 May 1944 he was parachuted to the Kos receiving unit near Wierzbno, not far from Kraków. Promoted to brigadier general on the same day, Okulicki became first deputy to the chief of staff and chief of operations in the AK High Command. On 27 July he became commander of the Independence organization (Niepodległość [NIE]), as a result of which he ceased working in the staff. However, he played a major role in the decision to start the Warsaw Uprising. After General Tadeusz Pełczyński was wounded, Okulicki served as interim chief-of-staff of the AK High Command. After the failure of the uprising, General Tadeusz Bór-Komorowski appointed Okulicki as his successor. On 2 October, along with the civilian population, Okulicki left Warsaw and went to Częstochowa, where on the following day he assumed the duties of the AK commander-in-chief. He was formally appointed in December 1944. On 19 January 1945 he ordered the dissolution of the AK and at the same time made the decision that the cadres should remain underground and weapons and equipment should be hidden.

On 27 March 1945, invited by the Soviet command of the First Belorussian Front, Okulicki went to negotiate with their representatives in Pruszków, where, along with fifteen other leaders of the Polish underground state, he was arrested by the NKVD for failure to obey the orders of the Soviet military command and was charged with organizing armed sabotage against the Red Army behind the front lines. They were all taken to Moscow and placed in Lubyanka Prison. In the so-called Trial of Sixteen (18–21 June 1945) before the Military Board of the Soviet Supreme Court in Moscow, a trial of the leaders of an Allied country, Okulicki received the stiffest sentence: ten years in prison. He died in Lubyanka Prison in Moscow. (JS)

OLECHOWSKI Andrzej (9 September 1947, Kraków), Polish economist and politician. In 1973 Olechowski graduated from the Socioeconomics Department of the Main School of Planning and Statistics (now the Warsaw School of Economics) in Warsaw. In 1979 he received a Ph.D. in economics. For many years he worked in the UN Conference on Trade and Development in Geneva and for the World Bank in Washington, D.C., cooperating with Polish Communist intelligence. In 1989 he became head of a department in the Ministry of Foreign Economic Relations. He took part in the Round Table Talks on behalf of the government. A member of the boards of directors of many banks and companies—including Bank Handlowy S.A. w Warszawie and Bank Inicjatyw Gospodarczych S.A., the latter being established by the Communist nomenclatura—from 1989 to 1991 Olechowski was deputy chairman of the Narodowy Bank Polski, and in 1991–92 he was secretary of state in the Ministry of Foreign Economic Relations. The main negotiator of a trade agreement between Poland and the European Communities, from December 1991 to June 1992 he was minister of finance in the government of Jan Olszewski. In 1992–93 he was an economic adviser to President Lech Wałęsa, and in 1993 he co-initiated and organized the Nonparty Bloc for the Support of Reforms. From October 1993 to January 1996 Olechowski was minister of foreign affairs in the governments of Waldemar Pawlak and Józef Oleksy. One of the most popular politicians of the 1990s, in 2000 Olechowski ran in the presidential elections, coming in second with 17.3 percent of the vote. In January 2001, along with Maciej Płażyński and Donald Tusk, he co-initiated the creation of the Civic Platform. In September 2002 he ran for mayor of Warsaw, but he came in third. (IS)

OLEKSY Józef (22 June 1946, Nowy Sącz), Polish Communist activist and post-Communist politician. In 1969 Oleksy graduated from the Foreign Trade Department of the Main School of Planning and Statistics (now the Warsaw School of Economics) in Warsaw. In 1971–72 he studied at the European Department of Comparative Law in Strasbourg and Pescara. In 1977 he received a Ph.D. in economics. During his studies Oleksy was active in the Association of Polish Students, and from 1968 he belonged to the Polish United Workers' Party (Polska Zjednoczona Partia Robotnicza [PUWP]). In 1977–81 he worked in the Department of Ideological Education of the PUWP Central Committee (CC), from 1981 to 1986 he headed the Office of the PUWP Central Commission of Inspection, and in 1987–89 he was first secretary of the PUWP Provincial Committee in Biała Podlaska. After the PUWP was dissolved in January 1990, Oleksy became a member of the Presidium of the Main Board of the Social Democracy of the Polish Republic (Socjaldemokracja Rzeczypospolitej Polski [SdRP]). From 1993 he was its deputy chairman and in 1996–97, chairman. From March to August 1989 Oleksy was minister for contacts with trade unions in the government of Mieczysław Rakowski. Elected in the breakthrough elections of June 1989, Oleksy was also an MP in subsequent terms of the parliament, and from October 1993 to March 1995, speaker of the Lower House. From 1 March 1995 to 24 January 1996 he was prime minister of the government based on a coalition of post-Communists and the Polish Peasant Party. Oleksy resigned as a result of accusations raised by the minister of interior, Andrzej Milczanowski, who claimed that Oleksy had been a Soviet and later a Russian agent. The case has not been sufficiently explained. In October 2000 the Lustration Court found Oleksy guilty of lying about his cooperation with Communist special services, but he appealed. From December 1999 Oleksy was a member of the National Board of the Democratic Left Alliance (Sojusz Lewicy Demokratycznej [SLD]). From 2001 Oleksy was deputy chairman of the SLD parliamentary club; from June 2003 he was deputy chairman of the SLD, head of the parliamentary European commission, and a Polish delegate to the European Union convention; in early 2004 he was briefly minister of interior, and in April 2004 he became speaker of the parliament. OLSZEWSKI Jan (20 August 1930, Warsaw), Polish lawyer and politician. During the Nazi occupation Olszewski was active in the underground scouting movement, the Gray Ranks (Szare Szeregi). In 1953 he graduated in law from the University of Warsaw. Later he worked in the Ministry of Justice (1953–54) and in the Institute of Legal Sciences of the Polish Academy of Sciences (1954–56). Editor of the weekly Po Prostu (1956–57), in 1956–62 Olszewski was a member of the Crooked Circle Club, which included young intellectuals critical of Stalinism, and he was a member of its board (1958–61). In 1962–68 and after 1970 Olszewski worked as a defense counsel in the political trials of Jacek Kuroń and Karol Modzelewski (1965), Melchior Wańkiewicz (1965), Janusz Szpotański (1967), and the organization Movement (1971). From 1968 to 1970 his legal license was suspended. Along with Jan Józef Lipski, Olszewski organized help for the politically oppressed and their families. In 1975–76 he took part in protests against amendments to the constitution, signing the “Letter of 59.” Counsel for the defense in the trials of workers participating in the June 1976 protests and participant in the Committee for the Defense of Workers (Komitet Obrony Robotników [KOR]) and the Committee of Social Self-Defense–KOR, Olszewski belonged to the leadership of the secret Polish Association for Independence (Polskie Porozumienie Niepodległościowe [PPN]) of Zdzisław Najder.

In 1980 Olszewski co-authored the statutes of Solidarity, and, with Wiesław Chrzanowski, he represented the union during the registration process. An adviser to the Solidarity National Coordination Commission and later to its National Commission and a member of the Program Council of the Solidarity Center for Social and Professional Studies, Olszewski advocated a moderate line, which drew him close to the Solidarity advisers connected with the Catholic Church. He called himself a Socialist-independent, and he was connected with Antoni Macierewicz’s periodical Głos. After the introduction of martial law in December 1981 Olszewski defended Solidarity activists, and in 1984–85 he was the spokesman for the family of Reverend Jerzy Popiełuszko during the trial of the priest’s murderers in Toruń. An adviser to the underground organization Solidarity, from 1988 Olszewski belonged to the Civic Committee of the Chairman of Solidarity. He took part in the Round Table Talks, but he was critical of the April 1989 agreement. Olszewski gradually became a critic of the Civic Parliamentary Club and of Lech Wałęsa, whom he had supported in the presidential elections of 1990. In December 1990 Olszewski was given the mission to form a government, but he failed. In 1990–92 he belonged to the Center Alliance (Porozumienie Centrum [PC]), and from 1991 to 1993 he was an MP on its behalf.

After the elections of October 1991, from 5 December 1991 to 5 June 1992 Olszewski was prime minister. His government, based on a minority center-right coalition, entered into conflict with President Wałęsa over the control of the army and the substance of the Polish-Russian treaty. The coalition collapsed when Minister of Interior Macierewicz started lustration. In 1992 Olszewski was excluded from the PC and formed the Movement for the Republic Party. He was the chairman of the new party, which advocated a radical de-Communization and lustration and presented the Round Table Talks as a plot to maintain Communist structures of power. In the elections of 1993 Olszewski lost, and his movement split in two. Olszewski drew closer to the new Solidarity leadership and co-authored its civic draft of the constitution. In 1995 Olszewski ran in the presidential elections, winning 7 percent of the vote. In November 1995 he formed the Movement for the Reconstruction of Poland (Ruch Odbudowy Polski [ROP]) and became its chairman. The ROP made references to the national tradition and anti-communism, and it called privatization a plunder of the national economy by domestic and foreign profiteers. Olszewski advocated the entry of Poland into NATO, but he was against a rapid integration into the European Union. In the elections of September 1997 the ROP gained 5.6 percent of the vote, and Olszewski won a seat. He ran in the presidential elections of 2000, but in view of his low ranking he withdrew before the first round, appealing to his supporters to vote for Marian Krzaklewski. In the parliamentary elections of September 2001 Olszewski won a seat on behalf of the League of Polish Families, but he belonged to the ROP club. (AF)

OLSZOWSKI Stefan (28 August 1931, Toruń), Polish Communist activist. Born into a teacher’s family, Olszowski graduated in Polish studies from the University of Łódź. From the late 1940s he was active in Communist youth organizations. In 1949–50 he commanded the Polish Scouting Association in Włocławek, from 1952 to 1954 he chaired the Łódź Association of Polish Students (Zrzeszenie Studentów Polskich [ZSP]), and in 1953–55 he was a member of the Łódź Presidium of the Union of Polish Youth. In 1956 Olszowski represented Poland at the International Student Union in Prague, where he began to make contacts with Soviet functionaries. In 1956–60 he chaired the ZSP Main Council and was a member of the Secretariat of the Central Committee (CC) of the Union of Socialist Youth. From 1952 a member of the Polish United Workers' Party (Polska Zjednoczona Partia Robotnicza [PUWP]), in the 1960s Olszowski quickly advanced in the party apparatus. In 1960–63 he was secretary of the PUWP Provincial Committee in Poznań.

In 1963 Olszowski became head of the Press Office of the PUWP CC. He became allied with Mieczysław Moczar and played an important role as the instigator of the anti-Semitic campaign of 1967–68, in March 1968 in particular. From June 1964 Olszowski was a member of the PUWP CC, and at the Fifth PUWP Congress in November 1968 he entered the CC Secretariat. From 1969 to 1980 he was an MP. In December 1970 he played an active role in the toppling of Władysław Gomułka. After Moczar's fall in the summer of 1971 Olszowski parted ways with him. He resigned from the CC Secretariat, but at the Sixth PUWP Congress in December 1971 he was promoted to the CC Politburo and he became foreign minister. In this capacity he became Edward Gierek's right-hand man in the policy of opening Poland to Western credits. Olszowski accompanied Gierek on his numerous trips—for example, to France and Germany. In December 1975 he returned to the CC Secretariat, but he gave up his position as foreign minister. Aware of the approaching economic disaster and the end of Gierek's rule, in February 1980 Olszowski left the Secretariat and Politburo, becoming ambassador to East Germany.

After the summer strikes and accords of August 1980, during a shuffling of the top party leaders, Olszowski returned to the CC Secretariat and Politburo, taking over the leadership of the hard-liners' faction, which strove for a crackdown on Solidarity and the democratic opposition. Despite his tactical declarations on the necessity to reach agreements with workers, Olszowski belonged to a special task force that analyzed the efficacy of the use of force against the workers. Within the CC apparatus Olszowski controlled the media, education, and culture. He supported the most dogmatic and pro-Muscovite tendencies in the Communist Party, among them the weekly Rzeczywistość. He also supervised youth organizations. Olszowski's role in the Bydgoszcz crisis of March 1981 remains unclear, but it is clear that during the campaign before the Ninth Extraordinary PUWP Congress in the spring of 1981 he presented a confrontational line, not only in relation to Solidarity, but also toward the party leadership of Stanisław Kania. During the congress in July 1981 he remained in the highest party organs, since he was perceived by the Kremlin as a potential alternative to Kania. During the period of martial law Olszowski belonged to the inner circle of decision-makers, although in July 1982 he left the CC Secretariat. In November 1985 he also left the Politburo; his departure was interpreted as a weakening of the extreme dogmatic stance of General Wojciech Jaruzelski in connection with the murder of Reverend Jerzy Popiełuszko and the Toruń trial of his security service assassins. In July 1986 Olszowski was dropped from the PUWP CC, and at the end of the 1980s he left for the United States; this raises the question of the political price he paid for the American consent to settle near New York. OLSZYNA-WILCZYŃSKI Józef [originally Wilczyński] (27 November 1890, Kraków–22 September 1939, Sopoćkinie), Polish general. The son of a bricklayer, Olszyna-Wilczyński graduated from a gymnasium in Kraków and started studies in the Department of Civil Engineering at Lwów (Lviv) Polytechnic College. In 1912–13 he served in the Austro-Hungarian Army, graduated from a school for reserve officers, and joined the Polish Riflemen Squads. After the outbreak of World War I, he entered the Polish Legions and commanded a company and later a battalion. In July 1917 Olszyna-Wilczyński refused to swear loyalty to the Austrian emperor, was forced to join the Austrian Army, and was sent to the Italian front and later to the Ukraine. He organized a cell of the Polish Military Organization, and in November 1918 he led his battalion into the Polish Army in-the-making. Olszyna-Wilczyński took part in the Polish-Ukrainian war in East Galicia. Taken prisoner of war, he was liberated by Polish troops in Buczacz (Buchach); from 1920 he commanded an infantry brigade. After the seizure of Kiev by Polish and Ukrainian troops in May 1920, Olszyna-Wilczyński became the town commander and was promoted to the rank of colonel. Until the end of the Polish-Soviet war he fought in Volhynia. In 1921–23 he served as head of engineering in the command of Corps District V in Kraków and later as commander of a brigade in the Border Protection Corps (Korpus Ochrony Pogranicza). In 1927 Olszyna-Wilczyński was promoted to the rank of general and appointed commander of the Tenth Infantry Division in Łódź. In January 1938 he was appointed commander of Corps District III in Grodno. During the September 1939 campaign he commanded the operation group Grodno, which organized the defense of the town and the Suwałki region. Captured by Soviet soldiers at the Lithuanian border, Olszyna-Wilczyński was shot dead by them. (WR)

OMAN Ivan (10 September 1929, Zminec, near Škofja Loka), Slovene Peasant Party politician. In 1943 Oman graduated from primary school. For most of his life he worked as a farmer, but thanks to his innate curiosity and talent, he gained considerable knowledge. In the 1980s he repeatedly criticized Yugoslav economic policies at the local self-government meetings in Škofja Loka, gaining authority among the local peasants. In 1989 Oman was co-founder of the Slovene Union of Farmers (Slovenske Kmečke Zveze), a trade organization that later turned into a political party. In the elections of April 1990 Oman became a member of the Presidium of the Slovene republican assembly, and after Slovenia gained independence, in the free elections of December 1992 he won a seat in the assembly. For some time he chaired the Slovenian People's Party (Slovenska Ljudska Stranka), but he left it as a result of conflicts in the leadership. He then joined Slovenian Christian Democracy (Slovenska Krščanska Demokracija [SKD]). A practicing Catholic, Oman is an authority on Janez Evangelist Krek. (WR)

OMELIANOVYCH-PAVLENKO Mykhailo (8 December 1878, Tiflis [Tbilisi]–29 May 1952, Paris), commander-in-chief of the Ukrainian Army. During the Russo-Japanese War of 1904–5 Omelianovych-Pavlenko commanded a company. In 1910 he graduated from the general staff school. During World War I he served as commander of a regiment, chief of staff of a corps, and commander of a cadet training school in Odessa. After the February 1917 revolution, he became the commander of a Ukrainian brigade in Yekaterinoslav (Dniepropetrovsk) and later the commander of the Third Riflemen's Division in Poltava. From December 1918 to June 1919 he served as commander of the army of the Western Ukrainian National Republic (Zakhidno-Ukrayins'ka Narodna Republika [ZUNR]). After its defeat in the war against Poland, Omelianovych-Pavlenko went over to the army of the Ukrainian National Republic (Ukrayins'ka Narodna Republika [UNR]) and served as commander of the UNR Zaporozhyan Corps. From December 1919 to November 1920 he served as commander of the UNR army. After the victory of the Bolsheviks, Omelianovych-Pavlenko settled in Prague and became the chairman of the Union of Ukrainian Organizations of War Veterans. After World War II, he served as minister of defense (1945–48) of the UNR government-in-exile and was promoted to general. His publications include Ukrainsko-polska viina 1918–1919 rr. (The Ukrainian-Polish war of 1918–1919; 1929), Zymovi pokhid (Winter campaign; 1934), and two volumes of memoirs published in 1933 and 1935. Omelianovych-Pavlenko's brother Ivan (1881–1962) served as commander of a cavalry division during the Polish-Ukrainian war. (WR)

ONYSZKIEWICZ Janusz (18 December 1937, Lwów [Lviv]), Polish politician. In 1960 Onyszkiewicz graduated in mathematics from the University of Warsaw (UW), and in 1967 he received a Ph.D. there. He worked as an assistant professor at the UW Department of Mathematics, and in 1976–79 he lectured at the University of Leeds. Later he also taught at other Western universities. A keen mountaineer and speleologist, Onyszkiewicz took part in many expeditions. He was the first to climb Gasherbrum III (26,027 feet) in the Himalayas. Onyszkiewicz took part in the March 1968 student protests at the UW. Active in the democratic opposition of the late 1970s, in 1980–81 he was a member of the Presidium of the Solidarity Region of Mazowsze and also its spokesman. From April to October 1981 he was a spokesman for Solidarity's National Coordination Commission and later a member of the Presidium of its National Commission. During the period of martial law Onyszkiewicz was interned, and in 1983 he was arrested. Amnestied but frequently harassed by the political police, he collaborated with underground Solidarity structures. From 1986 he was a spokesman for the Provisional Coordination Commission and later the National Executive Commission. Onyszkiewicz took part in talks with many Western politicians who came to Poland. In 1988–90 he was a member of the Civic Committee of the Chairman of Solidarity, and in early 1989 he took part in the Round Table Talks. From June 1989 he was an MP on behalf of the Civic Parliamentary Club and later of the Democratic Union and the Union of Freedom. In 1990–92 Onyszkiewicz was deputy minister and from July 1992 to September 1993 minister of national defense in the government of Hanna Suchocka. He was minister of national defense again in the government of Jerzy Buzek from October 1997 to June 2000. In this role he contributed to the Polish entry into NATO in March 1999. Married to the grand-daughter of Józef Piłsudski, Onyszkiewicz authored several works in mathematics. In July 2004 he was elected deputy speaker of the European Parliament. (AF)

OPLETAL Jan (31 December 1915, Lhota, near Náklo–11 November 1939, Prague), Czech medical student. Born into the family of a forester, in 1934 Opletal graduated from high school in Litovel. After doing his military service, he successfully passed his exams and was admitted to the Medical School of Charles University in Prague. He was a member and then vice-chairman of the student self-government in the dormitories. On 28 October 1939—the anniversary of independence—Opletal took part in a demonstration held in the center of Prague against the Nazi occupiers. At the intersection of Žitná and Mezibranšká Streets, he was shot in the stomach by a German policeman. Taken to a clinic, he died two weeks later. His funeral, on 15 November 1939, turned into another demonstration, which became a pretext for the Nazis to close down Czech universities two days later. Several student leaders were executed by a firing squad, and 1,200 students were sent to concentration camps. Opletal became a symbol of Czech resistance to occupation, both Nazi and Communist. Fifty years after his death, on 17 November 1989, Prague students, with the permission of the authorities, organized a mourning march to commemorate his sacrifice. This march turned into an anti-Communist demonstration that was dispersed by the police. This became the proverbial snowball that set off an avalanche toward the Velvet Revolution, which brought down the Communist regime in Czechoslovakia within a month. (PU)

ORBÁN Viktor (31 May 1963, Alcsúton, near Székesfehérvár), Hungarian politician. Born into a poor Calvinist peasant family, in 1981 Orbán graduated from Blanka Teleki High School in Székesfehérvár. After serving in the army in 1981–82, he enrolled in the Department of Law of Eötvös University in Budapest. In the spring of 1983 Orbán co-founded the College of Legal and Social Sciences in Budapest (later the Bibó Collegium), designed according to the pre-1939 pattern of exclusive colleges for poor but especially talented youth. In 1986 he started an uncensored quarterly, Századvég, which published articles contesting communism. On 30 March 1988 Orbán was co-founder of the Alliance of Young Democrats (Fiatal Demokraták Szövetsége [FIDESZ]; as of 1995, the Hungarian Civic Party [FIDESZ]), and in October 1988 he was elected its chairman. Orbán's master's thesis on self-government was based on the Polish Solidarity experience. During the ceremonial funeral of Imre Nagy and his aides in Budapest on 16 June 1989, Orbán made the most radical speech, demanding the withdrawal of Soviet troops from Hungary. In the fall of 1989 he took part in the Hungarian Round Table, but he refused to sign the final accord with the Communists because he thought it too compromising.

After the formation of the first freely emerged government of József Antall in May 1990, Orbán and FIDESZ stayed in the opposition; for instance, they criticized the government projects of land restitution to the former owners. In September 1992 Orbán became deputy chairman of the Liberal International. In 1992 he and his party were at the peak of their popularity, but when they refused to join the Democratic Charter (Demokratikus Charta) of the opposition parties (including the post-Communists), which claimed that democracy was in danger, Orbán and FIDESZ lost in the rankings. Orbán barely made it into the parliament in the elections of May 1994. In 1994–98 he chaired the parliamentary commission for European integration. At the same time he planned the transformation of FIDESZ from a liberal into a liberal-conservative party and a unification of the whole non-nationalist right under his leadership. After victorious parliamentary elections, on 6 July 1998 Orbán became prime minister. During his term talks were finalized on Hungary's access to the European Union, while the economy recovered and the negative demographic tendencies of the late twentieth century were reversed. Orbán spoke in defense of the Hungarian minorities in Romanian and Slovakia, creating some tensions in relations with these countries. In the parliamentary elections of April 2002 the FIDESZ won the largest number of votes (49 percent), but it was too little to form a government. The post-Communists joined with the Alliance of Free Democrats, and Orbán became the leader of the opposition. (MS)

ORDASS Lajos [originally Wolf] (6 February 1901, Torzsa [now in Yugoslavia]–14 August 1978, Budapest), Hungarian Lutheran bishop. Ordass was the son of a teacher. After graduating from high school, he studied theology in Budapest, Wittenberg, and Sopron. In 1924 he took holy orders. At the end of the 1920s he went on a scholarly journey to Sweden and later worked as a military chaplain. In 1931 he became the pastor of the Protestant community in Cegléd. In 1937 he was appointed dean of the superintendency and in 1939 chairman of the consistory for the region of Bányá. In 1941 Ordass went to Budapest, where he became pastor of a congregation in one of the districts of the capital. In his articles he called for the revival of the Lutheran Church and paid much attention to social issues. He sharply criticized National Socialism. After the Germans invaded Hungary in March 1944, Ordass changed his German name. He helped to save Jews during the time of their persecutions. In August 1945 Ordass was elected bishop of the superintendency of the Lutheran Church in Bányá. Under Communist rule Ordass defended the independence of his church and stood for freedom of religion. As he opposed the nationalization of church-owned schools, he was placed under house arrest at the end of August 1948. In September 1948, along with other secular Lutheran bishops, Ordass was arrested on trumped-up charges and sentenced to two years' imprisonment. He was released in May 1950. In April 1950, on the basis of a decree by the state authorities, the ecclesiastic disciplinary court deprived Ordass of his post as bishop. On 5 October 1956 the sentence he had received in 1948 was quashed; therefore, on 31 October 1956 he assumed the office of bishop of the South Region of the Church. In June 1958 Ordass was again removed from his office. In 1957 he was elected first vice-chairman of the Lutheran World Federation, and in 1963 he became an honorary member of its executive committee. He was granted honorary doctorates from universities in Allentown, Pennsylvania, and Reykjavik, Iceland. He was a symbol of courageous resistance to Communist religious persecution. In 1990 Ordass was rehabilitated in legal terms and in 1991 according to ecclesiastic law. (JT)

ÖRKÉNY István (5 April 1912, Budapest–24 June 1979, Budapest), Hungarian writer. The son of a pharmacist, Örkény studied chemistry but graduated in pharmacy from Budapest University in 1934. He published his first novellas in the 1930s; his first volume of short stories, Tengertánc (Ocean dance), appeared in 1941. In 1941 Örkény received a diploma in chemical engineering from the Technical University in Budapest. In 1942 he was inducted into the labor service units and sent to the eastern front. Taken prisoner by the Soviets in 1943, he did not return to Budapest until 1946. Örkény's experiences of 1946–47 became the subjects of one drama and two novels. Örkény worked in a theater, and in 1954 he also got a job in a publishing house specializing in belles lettres books. At the beginning of the 1950s he briefly identified with communism, complying with the canons of Socialist realism, but as early as 1952 he was attacked as the author of Lila tinta (Lilac ink). From 1955 to 1956 Örkény took part in actions organized by writers (mainly party members) who protested the dismissal of Imre Nagy as prime minister. In September 1956 he joined the leadership of the Association of Hungarian Writers (AHW).

After the outbreak of the 1956 revolution, Örkény condemned the propaganda role of Hungarian Radio, using words that would become proverbial: "We lied by night; we lied by day; we lied on all wavelengths." On 10 November 1956 Örkény was refused political asylum at the Polish Embassy in Budapest. At the beginning of December in Budapest, as a member and translator for an AHW delegation, Örkény met the ambassador of India, Krishna Menon, whom the AHW wanted to ask to be a mediator between the Soviet Union and Hungary. In September 1957, along with five associates, Örkény signed a self-critical open letter about his work before and during the revolution. Despite this, in 1957 a ban was placed on the publication of his works, and he worked as a pharmacist until 1963. From the mid-1960s onwards his works were published and staged again. Örkény's writing is characterized by a grotesque style. In 1966 he published his first "one-minute short stories"—prose miniatures—often translated into foreign languages; with these he started a new literary genre. Örkény's most famous works are Macskajáték (1963; Catsplay: A tragicomedy in two acts, 1976) and Tóték (1967; The Toth Family, 1982). The novel Pisti a vérzivatarban (Pisti in a bloodbath; 1973) was also very popular. Örkény's memoirs, Noteszlapok 1956-ból (Pages from the diary of 1956; 1991), were published posthumously. (JT)

ORZECZOWSKI Marian (24 October 1931, Radom), Polish Communist activist. Orzechowski studied history at the university in Leningrad. From 1952 he was a member of the Polish United Workers' Party (Polska Zjednoczona Partia Robotnicza [PUWP]). From 1955 he worked at the University of Wrocław. In 1969–72 he chaired its Institute of Political Science, from 1971 he was a professor, and in 1971–75 he was rector of the university. He published on the Marxist theory of the workers' movement in Poland. In July 1981 Orzechowski joined the PUWP Central Committee (CC). Thought dogmatic and close to the hard-liner faction of Tadeusz Grabski, from October 1981 to November 1983 he was CC secretary and, in 1982–83, secretary general of the Provisional National Council of the Patriotic Movement of National Reconstruction (Patriotyczny Ruch Odrodzenia Narodowego [PRON]), a Communist-controlled imitation of national agreement. Until 1984 Orzechowski was the PRON secretary general and until 1987 a member of its Presidium. From November 1983 to July 1986 he was a deputy member and then, until January 1990, a member of the CC Politburo. In 1984–86 he was rector of the Academy of Social Sciences of the PUWP CC in Warsaw. From November 1985 to June 1988 he was minister of foreign affairs, trying to reactivate foreign relations after Poland's years of isolation during the period of martial law. From June 1988 he was CC secretary again. Turning pragmatic in the late 1980s, Orzechowski had a considerable influence on the ideological modification of PUWP activities. In the elections of June 1989 he won a seat in the parliament. Believed to be a rival of Mieczysław Rakowski in the succession to General Wojciech Jaruzelski, who gave up the party leadership after being elected president, Orzechowski lost and left the CC Secretariat in July 1989. He became head of the PUWP parliamentary club, and after the party was dissolved in January 1990, he continued as head of the parliamentary club of the Democratic Left until the fall of 1991. Later Orzechowski retired from politics. (PK)

OSADCHUK Bohdan (1 August 1920, Kołomyja [Kolo-myia]), Ukrainian Sovietologist. The son of an activist of the Communist Party of Western Ukraine, Osadchuk studied at the University of Berlin (1941–45) and then at the Free Ukrainian University (FUU). From 1958 he lectured on East European history at the Freie Universität in Berlin, where he became a professor and director of the Institute of East European Studies in 1978. He also lectured at the FUU and was the dean of the Department of Law and Social Studies (1983–85) and deputy rector. For several decades Osadchuk wrote for the leading Ukrainian periodicals, such as Ukraiński Visti, and for German language papers, such as Die Zürcher Zeitung and Der Tagesspiegel, commenting on Soviet developments. Thought to be one of the leading authorities on the Soviet system and on Soviet Ukraine in particular, Osadchuk maintained good relations with Polish émigré journalists and politicians, and he regularly wrote for the Paris monthly Kultura. In 1985 he became a member of the Taras Shevchenko Research Society. After the fall of Communist rule in Poland and after the Ukrainian declaration of independence, Osadchuk frequently visited both countries, encouraging Polish-Ukrainian reconciliation. Osadchuk authored several works, including Die Entwicklung der Kommunistischen Parteien Ostmitteleuropas (The development of the Communist parties of East Central Europe; 1962) and Ukraiina, Polshcha, svit: Vybrany reportazh ta statti; Ukraine, Poland, the world: Selected reports and works; 2001). Osadchuk also co-edited Der Sowjet-Kommunismus (Soviet communism; 1964). (WR)

OSADCHYI Mykhailo (22 March 1936, Kurmany, near Sumy–5 July 1994, Lviv), Ukrainian writer and dissident. Born into a family of kolkhoz farm workers, in 1958 Osadchyi graduated in journalism from Lviv University. In 1962 he became a member of the Communist Party of Ukraine (CPU) and worked as a journalist in Lviv television, press consultant to the Lviv committee of the CPU, and editor of a university newspaper. In 1965 he began lecturing in the Department of Journalism of Lviv University. A member of the Association of Ukrainian Journalists, Osadchyi earned a doctorate in 1965. He wrote critical pieces and poems, but the entire printing of the first collection of his poems, Misiachne pole (Moon field; 1965), was destroyed. Arrested for "anti-Soviet agitation and propaganda" in August 1965, Osadchyi was sentenced to two years in a labor camp. He served his sentence in Mordovia. After his release, he could get only a blue-collar job at an institution for the deaf. Osadchyi wrote two novels: Geniy smikhu, abo zustrich iz vozhdem (Genius of laughter, or a meeting with the chief), about Ostap Vyshnya, a Ukrainian journalist from the 1920s, and the autobiographical Bilmo (Cataract), which was devoted to his experiences in a labor camp. The latter was published in the underground press (1971) and in the West (1976) and brought him international fame. Arrested again in January 1972, in September 1972 Osadchyi was sentenced to seven years in a labor camp and three years in exile. He again served his labor camp term in Sosnovka in Mordovia and his exile term in the village of Milva in the Komi Autonomous SSR. After returning to Lviv, Osadchyi did various blue-collar jobs. In November 1987 he was co-founder of the Ukrainian Association of the Independent Creative Intelligentsia, and in 1988 he edited the underground periodical Katedra. Osadchyi was beaten by unknown assailants and repeatedly threatened with a new trial. In 1991 he received a postdoctoral degree from the Ukrainian Free University in Munich, and in 1993 he became an associate professor in the Department of Journalism of Lviv University. An honorary member of the Swiss branch of the PEN Club, Osadchyi also published two collections of poems: Quos ego (1979) and Skytskyi oltar (Scythian altar; 1990). (TS)

OSÓBKA-MORAWSKI Edward, pseudonyms “Janusz” and “Tadeusz Wróblewski” (5 October 1909, Bliżyn, Kielce region–9 January 1997, Warsaw), Polish political activist. Osóbka-Morawski studied at the Free Polish University in Warsaw and at Warsaw University, but he did not complete his studies in law there. He worked in the municipal administration and in the cooperative movement. In 1928 he joined the Polish Socialist Party (Polska Partia Socjalistyczna [PPS]). During the Nazi occupation he was an activist in a secret leftist organization called the Polish Socialists (Polscy Socjaliści). In 1943 he helped to found the Workers’ Party of Polish Socialists (Robotnicza Partia Polskich Socjalistów [RPPS]). In January 1944 he became chairman of the RPPS. He supported close cooperation with the Communist Polish Workers’ Party (Polska Partia Robotnicza [PPR]). A prewar acquaintance of Bolesław Bierut, on 1 January 1944 Osóbka-Morawski joined the National Home Council (Krajowa Rada Narodowa [KRN]), becoming Bierut’s deputy. In March 1944 he was head of a KRN delegation to Moscow, where, thanks to the support of Wanda Wasilewska, he gained Stalin’s acceptance and was appointed chairman of the Polish Committee of National Liberation (Polski Komitet Wyzwolenia Narodowego [PKWN]), which was established on 21 July 1944 in Moscow. On 27 July Osóbka-Morawski signed an agreement on a new Polish-Soviet border, ceding the Polish eastern territories to the Soviet Union; it was a precondition for the PKWN’s being allowed to go to Poland. At the end of July Osóbka-Morawski arrived in Lublin, assuming power as head of the Polish executive authorities endorsed by the Soviet Union and head of the ministry of foreign affairs. Although he was completely obedient to the Kremlin and to the Polish Communists, during talks with Stalin he attempted to persuade Stalin to leave Lwów (Lviv) within Polish territory, and he defended Poland’s right to keep a part of the Białowieża Forest and Stettin (Szczecin).

As some of the RPPS activists opposed subordination to the Communists, in September 1944 Osóbka-Morawski effected a split within this party and established a new PPS under the tutelage of the PPR. From September 1944 to December 1948 he served as a member of the Chief Council and the Central Executive Committee of the PPS and a member of the PPS Political Commission. On 31 December 1944 he became prime minister of the Provisional Government, which was initially recognized only by the Soviet Union, but in the spring of 1945 it was also recognized by Yugoslavia, Czechoslovakia, and France. In this role Osóbka-Morawski endorsed the first stage of the Sovietization process of Poland, at a time when the Red Army was marching into Poland’s territory.

Under agreements reached by the Big Three, on 28 June 1945 the Provisional Government of National Unity (Tymczasowy Rząd Jedności Narodowej [TRJN]) was established, and Osóbka-Morawski became its prime minister. During the so-called people’s referendum in June 1946 and in the rigged elections to the Assembly on 19 January 1947, he helped to consolidate the new political system. From 1947 to 1952 he was an MP. He hoped for an independent role in governing Poland, but after democratic opposition had been suppressed, he was no longer useful to the Kremlin or to the Polish Communists. In the new government, established in February 1947, Osóbka-Morawski was offered the minor portfolio of minister of public administration. As he called for the independence of the PPS, he was removed from influence at a time when the PPS was being absorbed by the PPR. After the establishment of the (Communist) Polish United Workers’ Party (Polska Zjednoczona Partia Robotnicza [PUWP]) in December 1948, he was dismissed from his ministerial position. He became director of the Central Board of Health Resorts, which he held until 1968. From 1956 to 1970 Osóbka-Morawski again was a member of the PUWP, but his attempt to enter parliament on the ticket of the National Unity Front ended in failure. In 1968 he was forced to take early retirement. After 1989 he unsuccessfully tried to reenter politics and undertook to establish a revived PPS. In 1990 he became chairman of the marginal Provisional Central Executive Committee of the PPS. Osóbka-Morawski was the author of the memoirs Trudne drogi (Difficult ways; 1992). (WD/WR)

OSTAPENKO Serhiy (1881, Volhynia–1937?), Ukrainian economist and politician. After graduating from a cadet training school in Kiev in 1909, Ostapenko studied and worked at an institute of commerce in Kiev. In his youth he joined the Socialist Revolutionary Party, but he took part in the events of 1917–20 as a nonparty economist. In 1917 he became a member of the Ukrainian Central Rada (Council). In January and February 1918 he took part in the German-Ukrainian negotiations in Brest-Litovsk. During the rule of Hetman Pavlo Skoropadskyi, Ostapenko was a member of a delegation that negotiated peace terms with Soviet Russia. He served as minister of trade and industry in the government of Volodymyr Chekhivsky (December 1918–February 1919), which was the first government of the Ukrainian National Republic (Ukrayinska Narodna Republika [UNR]) after the overthrow of the hetman. Ostapenko was a member of a delegation that conducted negotiations on military aid for the Ukraine with the commanders of the French expeditionary corps in Odessa. In order to finalize these negotiations, the UNR authorities decided to dismiss representatives of Socialist parties from the government, believing they were not credible to the French. On 13 February 1919, after Chekhivsky and the president of the UNR Directory, Volodymyr Vynnychenko, resigned, Ostapenko became prime minister of a government supported by the republican right wing—that is, the Ukrainian Party of Socialists-Federalists, the Ukrainian Party of Pro-Independence Socialists, and the People’s Republicans. The Bolshevik victories over the UNR Army and the French decision to limit aid to the Ukraine undermined the position of the UNR government. Ostapenko’s government lost the support of the workers’ soviets. Pogroms of Jews, in which UNR troops took part, broke out throughout the country. As a result of the withdrawal of the French troops and opposition from the Socialist parties, Ostapenko’s government collapsed on 9 April 1919. After the Bolshevik victory, he remained in the Ukraine. In 1921 he was sentenced for being a member of the Party of Socialist Revolutionaries, but he was soon released. Ostapenko taught statistics and demography at the universities in Kamyanets Podilskyi and Kharkiv. He published articles in Chervonyi shliakh and other periodicals. In 1937 Ostapenko was arrested and executed by a firing squad. Ostapenko left a number of publications in the field of foreign trade in agricultural products and wrote many textbooks, including Ekonomichna heohrafiia Ukrainy (Economic geography of Ukraine; 1919) and Politychna ekonomiiia (Political economy; 1920). (TS)

OSUSKÝ Štefan (31 March 1889, Brezová pod Bradom—27 September 1973, Washington, D.C.), Slovak lawyer, journalist, diplomat, and politician. In 1906 Osuský emigrated to the United States, where, after graduating from high school, he studied philosophy, theology, law, and the natural sciences at the University of Chicago. In 1915 he began working as an attorney. Osuský supported the pro-independence movement of the Czechs and Slovaks and favored the idea of establishing Czechoslovakia. In 1916 he became vice-president of the Slovak League in the United States and established contacts with Tomáš Garrigue Masaryk, Edvard Beneš, and Milan Štefánik. From 1917 to 1918 Osuský directed a Czechoslovak press agency in Geneva. Along with Štefánik, he helped to organize the Czechoslovak Legions in Italy. In October 1918 he became the first ambassador of the independent Czechoslovak Republic to London.

In the interwar period Osuský played an active role in shaping Czechoslovak foreign policy. In 1919, as secretary general of the Czechoslovak delegation, he attended the Paris Peace Conference. He also had much influence on the provisions of the 1920 Treaty of Trianon with Hungary, and he signed treaties with Bulgaria and Turkey. From 1921 to 1940 Osuský was ambassador to France, and from 1920 to 1930 he was also a representative at the League of Nations. At that time he represented the interests of Czechoslovakia, Greece, Yugoslavia, Poland, and Romania in the Reparation Commission of the League of Nations. From 1922 to 1936 he served as chairman of the Control Commission of the League of Nations. In the early 1920s he also played an important role in the establishment of the Little Entente (Czechoslovakia, Yugoslavia, and Romania). Initially a supporter of “Czechoslovakism” and a critic of the Slovak drive for autonomy, Osuský gradually began to promote the cause of equal rights for the Czechs and the Slovaks within the state, which led to conflicts with President Beneš. After the Slovak Republic was established under the tutelage of the Third Reich, Osuský refused to hand over the Czechoslovak Embassy building in Paris and began to organize anti-Nazi resistance in France. Initially Osuský was Beneš’s main rival for the role of leader of the Czechoslovak resistance in exile.

From 1939 to 1940 he was a member of the Czechoslovak National Committee in Paris, and from 1940 to 1942 he was minister of the Czechoslovak provisional government and a member of the Czechoslovak State Council in London. However, he criticized Beneš's policy, and their relationship deteriorated further. As a result, Osuský lost all his positions in the Czechoslovak government-in-exile. When the war ended, he did not return to Czechoslovakia but went to the United States, where, after the February 1948 Communist coup in Czechoslovakia, he cooperated with the new political émigrés, including Josef Lettrich, in the Council of Free Czechoslovakia. Osuský wrote many political works, including a biography of Štefánik and Masaryk, Reparace (Reparations; 1935); Pravda vítazí; Victorious truth; 1942); and Úloha Československa w Európe (Czechoslovakia's task in Europe; 1955). OTČENÁŠEK Karel (13 April 1920, Český Mezeříč, near Opočno), Czech bishop. Otčenášek graduated from the archiepiscopal high school in Prague and left for Rome to study theology. He graduated from the Lateran University, and in March 1945 he was ordained. After the war he returned to Czechoslovakia and started working as a minister in the parishes of Tynec nad Labou, Horní Rovně, near Pardubice, Žamberk, and Vrchlabí. From 1949 he was deputy director of the theological seminary in Hradec Králové, and on 30 April 1950 he was secretly consecrated bishop by the bishop of Hradec Králové, Mořic Pícha. Otčenášek also became apostolic administrator of this diocese. The Communist authorities did not recognize these decisions and did not allow him to act. For the “illegal” consecration he was interned in Želiva Monastery in 1951. In 1953 he was imprisoned in Pardubice and soon sentenced to thirteen years in prison. Amnestied in 1963, he could find work only as a blue-collar laborer in a dairy. Thanks to the efforts by Pope John XXIII, in 1965 Otčenášek was allowed to work as a minister in a countryside parish in Northern Bohemia, but he was constantly harassed and subjected to eavesdropping by the political police. During the Prague Spring in 1968 he was rehabilitated and allowed to work in his archdiocese. In 1973 he was forced to leave Hradec Králové again. He settled in Usti nad Labou, where he was a parish administrator. He kept in touch with the underground Catholic Church and the democratic opposition. In 1987 Otčenášek was an adviser to Cardinal

František Tomašek, who worked out a ten-year program of “spiritual renaissance of the Fatherland” that contributed to the renewal of Czech Catholicism on the eve of the Velvet Revolution in the fall of 1989. Otčenášek returned to Hradec Králové on 21 December 1989 after the fall of Communist rule. His ceremonial ingress took place in the Hradec Králové cathedral on 27 February 1990. In the Czech Episcopate he presided over the Iustitia et Pax Commission. To honor his uncompromising behavior during the Communist rule, in March 1995 Charles University in Prague awarded him the Golden Medal of Memory. In April 1997 Otčenášek welcomed Pope John Paul II in Hradec Králové. In July 1998 the Pope accepted his retirement, and in September 1998 he appointed Otčenášek titular archbishop. (AGr)

OTTLIK Géza (9 May 1912, Budapest–9 October 1990, Budapest), Hungarian writer. His father, a clerk in the Ministry of Interior, died when Ottlik was a child. Ottlik had a modest childhood and was educated at cadet training schools. After graduating from the Department of Mathematics and Physics of Budapest University, he began working for the daily Magyar Hírlap, editing the bridge column. During World War II he served in the anti-aircraft forces. In 1945 he began working for Hungarian radio as a playwright and literary editor. In 1945–57 he served as secretary of the Hungarian PEN Club. Ottlik had made his literary debut as a student. During the war his first novels were published: Hamisjátékosok (False players; 1941) and Hajnali Háztetők (Roofs at dawn; 1944). An opponent of Socialist realism, in the late 1940s and early 1950s Ottlik was sidetracked as a writer and earned his living by doing translations. He rose to fame as the author of Iskola a határon (1959; School at the Frontier, 1966), which is one of the most frequently translated Hungarian novels. In it, he depicted his experiences in cadet schools and analyzed such concepts as patriotism, group solidarity, and individual autonomy. Another famous novel of his, Buda (1993), also takes place in a military school community. Ottlik's interests in bridge led him to publish Kalandos hajózás a bridz ismeretlen vizéin (Adventurous sailing over the uncharted waters of bridge; 1979), which is one of the most popular books on this game in the world. OZGA-MICHALSKI Józef (8 March 1919, Bieliny, near Kielce–10 February 2002, Warsaw), Polish Communist peasant activist and writer. In 1939 Ozga-Michalski graduated from a high school in Kielce. In 1936 he joined the Union of Rural Youth of the Republic of Poland called Wici (Związek Młodzieży Wiejskiej Rzeczypospolitej Polskiej–Wici [ZMW RP–Wici]). During the Nazi occupation he co-founded the Peasant Party–People’s Will (Stronnictwo Ludowe–Wola Ludu [SL–People’s Will]) in the region of Kielce. He also cooperated with the (Communist) People’s Army and with Soviet partisans. He was a deputy to the National Home Council (Krajowa Rada Narodowa [KRN]). After the Red Army entered Poland in the summer of 1944, Ozga-Michalski became secretary of the Provincial National Council in the Sandomierz bridgehead area. In September 1944 he joined the Provisional Main Board of the Peasant Party (Stronnictwo Ludowe [SL]), established by the activists of the SL–People’s Will and subordinated to the Communists.

From 1945 to 1947 Ozga-Michalski served as chairman of the Provincial National Council in Kielce and vice-chairman of the SL Provincial Board, and from December 1946 to April 1947 he was chairman of the Wici National Democratization Committee, which sought to subordinate the organization to the Communists through a “unification” of the Polish youth movement. In July 1948 Ozga-Michalski became deputy chairman of the Main Board of the Union of Polish Youth (Związek Młodzieży Polskiej [ZMP]), taking an active part in the Stalinization of Poland. After his party merged with the remnants of the Polish Peasant Party (Polskie Stronnictwo Ludowe [PSL]) in November 1949, he became a member of the Supreme Council and the Chief Committee of the United Peasant Party (Zjednoczone Stronnictwo Ludowe [ZSL]). From December 1956 to December 1980 Ozga-Michalski was deputy chairman of the ZSL Chief Committee. From 1944 to 1952 he was chairman of the Main Board of the Union of Peasant Mutual Aid Associations, and from 1959 to 1962 he was chairman of the Central Union of Agricultural Associations. From 1947 to 1989 he was an MP, from 1952 to 1956 he was deputy speaker of the parliament, and from March 1972 to March 1976 he was deputy chairman of the Council of State. He was also a leading activist of the Society of Atheists and Freethinkers. At a session of the parliament in April 1968 Ozga-Michalski particularly viciously attacked members of the Catholic parliamentary group called Znak. Ozga-Michalski made his literary debut in 1937, and the following year he published the volume of novels Łysica gwarzy: Godki Świętokrzyskie (Łysica’s stories: Legends from the Holy Cross Mountains). After the war Ozga-Michalski published many collections of stories and poems, including Oberek świętokrzyski (Oberek of the Holy Cross Mountains; 1945), Lutnia wiejska (Village lute; 1954), and Sowizdrzał świętokrzyski (A Picaro of the Holy Cross Mountains; 1972). P

PACEPA Ion Mihai (28 October 1928, Bucharest), head of Romanian Communist intelligence. After graduating in chemistry from Bucharest Polytechnic University in 1951, Pacepa started working in special services. In 1956–64 he worked in intelligence in (among other places) West Germany. In 1959 he became head of technical intelligence, and in 1961, head of foreign intelligence. From 1971 Pacepa was head of the Foreign Information Directorate (Direcția de Informații Externe) and deputy minister of interior with the rank of general. He developed scholarly intelligence and “operations of influence.” He was one of the most trusted aides of Nicolae Ceaușescu and was his personal friend. At the top of his career in July 1978, during a trip to Germany, Pacepa fled to the United States, where he received political asylum and protection. During a three-year interrogation he supplied the American services with a lot of valuable information on the functioning of the Ceaușescu regime and the Soviet system. Pacepa’s move not only shocked Ceaușescu and caused an extensive purge in the party and state apparatus, but also destroyed the Romanian foreign espionage network. In August 1978 Pacepa was sentenced to death in absentia. Romanian agents made numerous efforts to kill him. In 1985 in France Pacepa published an open letter to his daughter, Dana, who stayed in Romania and was not allowed to emigrate. In 1987 in the United States he published his memoirs, Red Horizons, in which he disclosed the criminal operations and hypocrisy of the Ceaușescu regime. After the fall of Ceaușescu, most of Pacepa’s information was confirmed. In view of a great deal of continuity of power, Pacepa was not welcome in Romania. It was only on 7 June 1999 that his death sentence was annulled. (ASK)

PACHA Augustin (26 November 1870, Maritzfeld [Măureni], Banat–4 November 1954, Timișoara), Roman Catholic bishop of Timișoara. The son of a German shoemaker from Banat, Pacha graduated from high school in Szeged, and then he studied theology in Temesvár [now Timișoara]. In 1893 he was ordained and later worked in various parishes in the Transylvanian countryside. In 1900 he became secretary to the bishop of Csanad, and in 1912, diocesan chancellor. After World War I, when Banat was incorporated into Romania, in 1923 Pacha was appointed apostolic administrator of the Romanian part of the Csanad diocese. On 16 October he was consecrated bishop of a newly established Timișoara diocese. While in the Kingdom of Hungary Roman Catholicism was a privileged religion, in Romania it became a religion of the Hungarian and German minority, exposed to Romanization policies of the Bucharest government. On 11 June 1929 Romania and the Holy See signed a concordat that improved conditions for the Catholic ministry. In his pastoral work, Pacha enjoyed the support of the German and Hungarian Episcopates, but it provided grounds for Romanian accusations that he had external ties. After the Nazi takeover in Germany and during growing pressure from the Third Reich on Romania in the late 1930s, Pacha’s cooperation with the German Church was even more troublesome, but he tried to maintain independence from political pressures.

After the postwar Communist takeover Pacha’s position grew even more complicated. The Communists sought every pretext to eliminate all religious institutions. In Pacha’s case this was his connection with Romanian Germans. Pacha became the permanent target of hate campaigns in which he was accused of a “hatred of democracy.” On the basis of a decree of September 1948 the number of Roman Catholic dioceses was reduced to two, and Pacha was removed from Timișoara. In June 1950 the eighty-year-old bishop was arrested and accused of espionage. Under brutal pressure he confessed to having been active in favor of Germany and to having taken part in an alleged “Vatican plot” since 1923. On 17 September 1951 he was sentenced to eighteen years in prison. Among other places, he worked on the construction of the Danube–Black Sea Canal. As a result he lost his sight. In 1954 Pacha was released and died soon thereafter. (WR)

PADEREWSKI Ignacy Jan (18 November 1860, Kuryłówka, Podolia–29 June 1941, New York), Polish pianist, composer, and politician. At the age of twelve Paderewski entered the Warsaw Music Institute. After completing his studies there, he taught music at the Warsaw conservatory. In 1880–81 and 1883–84 he continued music studies at the Royal Music Academy in Berlin, where he met many outstanding virtuosos of the period, such as Richard Strauss, Anton Rubinstein, and Pablo de Sarasate. These contacts, as well as the influence of Helena Modrzejewska, whom he met in Zakopane in 1884, induced him to begin a piano career. After his first successful performance in Kraków in October 1884, Paderewski gathered enough funds to go to Vienna, where he studied under the direction of Teodor Leszetycki. In 1885 he achieved his first success in Vienna. Then he played in Warsaw, Vienna, Strasbourg, Paris, London, and Berlin. His fame as a virtuoso spread after a very successful concert tour of the United States in 1891–92. Within 130 days Paderewski gave 107 concerts, including 32 in New York. This paved the way for his success in Europe, and he was acclaimed as one of the greatest virtuosos of the epoch. In the next decade Paderewski gave many concerts in Europe, North and South America, Australia, and South Africa. When in 1898 he came to Warsaw, the reception in his honor in the Town Hall changed into a patriotic demonstration.

Among Paderewski's earlier compositions, the Minuet Op. 17 of 1887 gained the greatest popularity. At that time he also composed his major works, including Sonata for Violin and Piano (1880), Piano Concerto in A minor (1888), Polish Fantasy for Piano and Orchestra (1893), and the opera Manru (1900). In his later period Paderewski created many piano compositions, including the Sonata in S minor, Variation and Fugue (1903) and the monumental Symphony in H minor, Polonia, which was performed for the first time at the Warsaw Philharmonic in 1905.

Paderewski was deeply involved in patriotic activities, both at home and abroad. As a famous artist, he could influence public opinion in many countries and draw attention to the Polish cause. He himself donated lavishly to national causes and to charity. During his first visit to the United States he contributed to the construction of a monument of Tadeusz Kościuszko in Chicago. In 1910 he founded the Grunwald Monument in Kraków to commemorate the 500th anniversary of the battle of Grunwald. The unveiling ceremony for the monument drew great crowds and changed into a patriotic demonstration. After the outbreak of World War I, along with Henryk Sienkiewicz, Paderewski founded the Committee for Assistance to War Victims in the Swiss town of Vevey and the Polish Relief Fund in London. Paderewski represented views close to those of National Democracy and supported its initiatives, which aimed at the revival of Polish statehood with the help of the Entente. From 1917 Paderewski was a representative of the Polish National Committee in the United States, and he propagated among Polish Americans the notion of the formation of a Polish army. As a personal friend of President Woodrow Wilson, he had influence upon the formulation of the thirteenth point (which concerned Poland) of Wilson's famous Fourteen Points speech of 8 January 1918.

At the end of 1918 Paderewski came to Poland. His arrival in Poznań on 26 December 1918 created enthusiasm and then indirectly, as a result of German provocation, gave rise to the Greater Poland Uprising. Trying to arrange a compromise between the pro-independence left and National Democracy, the provisional chief of state, Józef Piłsudski, appointed Paderewski head of the government. Between 16 January and 9 December 1919 Paderewski served as premier and minister of foreign affairs. He managed to mitigate internal tensions and to gain recognition for the Polish government abroad. He also represented Poland at the Paris Peace Conference and signed the Treaty of Versailles on behalf of the Republic of Poland. In 1920–21 Paderewski was Polish delegate to the League of Nations. Facing the opposition's criticism of Polish foreign policy and having concluded (partly under the influence of his wife Helen) that his efforts toward the revival of statehood had been disregarded, Paderewski withdrew from political life. After the coup of May 1926 he began to increasingly oppose the new system of government. In 1936 he was one of the main instigators of the Morges Front, which aimed at counteracting authoritarianism in Poland. The name of the organization came from Paderewski's residence in Switzerland.

During World War II Paderewski accepted the chairmanship of the National Council in exile and repeatedly spoke in support of the revival of an independent Poland. Paderewski left his memoirs, the first volume of which was published in New York in 1939 and in Poland in 1961. (WR)

PÄHN August (20 January 1904, Märdi–4 June 1963, Tartu), Estonian clergyman. After completing theological studies at the university in Dorpat (Tartu), Pähn worked as a pastor in Koeru. In 1941 he took up a post at the cathedral in Tallinn. At that time the Estonian Evangelical Lutheran Church (EELC) lacked a continuity of leadership because Bishop Johan Köpp, who had headed the EELC before World War II, had gone into exile, and Köpp's legal successor, Anton Eilart, had to go into hiding. Thus, in February 1945 the EELC Episcopal Council elected a provisional consistory and appointed Pähn acting bishop. The members of the Episcopal Council had to sign a declaration of loyalty to the Communist authorities and to dismiss pastors who were living abroad. In July 1945 the government appointed a plenipotentiary for religious affairs, and he was given broad prerogatives concerning the rights and duties of clergymen and the building of new churches. All of this led to the increasing vassalage of the EELC, which Pähn failed to resist. Recently discovered materials indicate that he collaborated with the NKVD. A new system of dividing and registering Lutheran congregations was introduced, the administration was given a wide scope to interfere in the Church's domestic affairs, and at the same time the influence of the faithful on the religious life of congregations became much more limited. People willing to serve the Communists were promoted within the EELC structures. Pastors and laymen suspected of views hostile to the Communists were arrested. On the day before the mass deportations of 1949, the EELC was already effectively paralyzed, and six out of seven consistory members collaborated with security services on a regular basis. Nonetheless, for reasons not exactly clear, the authorities began to distrust Pähn. On 2 February 1949 he was replaced as acting bishop by Jaan Kiivit, and on 12 April 1949 he was arrested and deported to Siberia, where he was held until 1956. After returning to Estonia, Pähn took charge of the parish of Võnnu, where he worked until the end of his life. (AG)

PAISI Vodica [originally Pashko] (June 1881, Vodice, near Kolonje—4 March 1966, Tirana), Albanian Orthodox bishop. Paisi studied at a Greek school in his home village and then in Kavalli (Greece). In 1910 he was ordained. At this time he got in touch with the Albanian pro-independence activists. Arrested by the Turks in 1912, Paisi was tortured and held in prison in Përmeti. After his release he returned to pastoral work, and in 1920 he became archimandrite and deputy ordinary bishop of Kolonje (Ersekë). Working with Fan Noli, Paisi belonged to a group of clergy who prepared a proclamation of the autocephaly of the Albanian Orthodox Church. In October 1940 Paisi was arrested by the Italian occupation authorities. After a short imprisonment in Korça and Tirana, he was interned in Bari, Italy, where he remained until 1941. After his release and return to Albania, Paisi became involved in the resistance movement in the Kolonje region, where in November 1914 he was elected to the local structure of the Front of National Liberation (FNL). Paisi actively supported the Communist guerrillas, and in July 1943 he was elected to the Chief Council of the FNL. In July 1948 he gained the position of ordinary bishop of Korça, thanks to the support of the Communists. He initiated close cooperation with the Russian Orthodox Church.

Under pressure from the Communists, on 28 August 1949 the Holy Synod elected Paisi archbishop and head of the Autocephalous Albanian Orthodox Church. The hitherto head of the church, Kristofor Kissi, opposed this decision as contrary to Church statutes, but the Communists interned him. At a congress of Orthodox laypeople and clergy in February 1950 Paisi insisted that the Albanian Orthodox Church had never had such amenable conditions for development. Paisi was also active in war veteran circles. His support for the Communist authorities gave the Albanian Orthodox Church a privileged place among other denominations, minimizing Communist attacks on the Orthodox community. Until his death Paisi enjoyed the trust of both the believers and the state, but his policies failed to stop the Communists from declaring Albania the first fully atheistic state in 1967. (TC)

PAJDAK Antoni (7 December 1894, Biskupice, near Wieliczka—20 March 1988, Warsaw), Polish Socialist politician. The son of a miner, while still in school, Pajdak joined the Riflemen's Association. In 1914 he graduated from the Nowodworski Gymnasium in Kraków. In August 1914 he set out as a sergeant with the cadre company of Józef Piłsudski. Later, he followed the battle trail of the First Brigade of the Polish Legions, taking part, for example, in the battles of Krzywopłoty, Łowczówek, Kostiuchnowka, and the Stochód (Stokhid) River. In the fall of 1914 Pajdak was detached to work in the Polish Military Organization in the Lublin region. Arrested by the Austrians, he ended up on the Italian front in the ranks of the Austrian Army. After the end of the war Pajdak took up law studies at the Jagiellonian University in Kraków, and he completed his studies in 1922. He worked in the district administrations in Radomsko, Konin, and Słupca. In 1928 he became a starost (local representative of the authorities) of Radomsko. In 1931 he returned to Kraków, where he completed his training as an attorney and ran a law practice. In May 1939 he was named deputy mayor of Kraków, but the German aggression of September 1939 prevented him from assuming this post. During the September 1939 campaign Pajdak was assigned to the provincial police headquarters with the rank of major.

In October 1939 Pajdak returned from the front to Kraków and began underground activities in the Polish Socialist Party–Freedom–Equality–Independence (Polska Partia Socjalistyczna–Wolność–Równość–Niepodległość [PPS–WRN]). He also joined a Socialist military unit called the People’s Guard (Gwardia Ludowa; not to be confused with the Communist People’s Guard), and as commanding officer of the Militia of the PPS–WRN, the security branch of the party, Pajdak became a member of the High Command of the People’s Guard. On behalf of the PPS–WRN, in 1943 Pajdak was appointed deputy delegate of the Polish Government-in-Exile for the Homeland and minister of the Polish government in London. He left for Warsaw, where he was active under the pseudonym “Traugutt.” In the Delegation (Delegatura), Pajdak was responsible for transportation and social welfare. He participated in the Warsaw Uprising, and after its collapse he left the capital, along with the civil population, to continue his activities near Warsaw. On 27 March 1945 Pajdak was arrested by the Soviets, along with fifteen other leaders of underground Poland. Taken to Lubyanka Prison in Moscow and subjected to severe interrogations, Pajdak was excluded from the June 1945 Trial of the Sixteen. Between July and November 1945 he was held in Butyrki Prison and then sentenced in a secret trial to five years. After leaving the prison, in 1950 he was deported to Siberia for an unlimited period. He lived in the Arbansky region of Krasnoyarsk, where he worked as a woodcutter.

Pajdak returned to Poland in August 1955 and started working in law chambers. The legend of his underground work, his imprisonment in the USSR, his truly Socialist and patriotic convictions, his religiousness, and his great kindness to people won him immense authority in independent social circles. Thus, although he was advanced in years, after the events of 1976 in Radom, Pajdak became a member of the Committee for the Defense of Workers (Komitet Obrony Robotników [KOR]). In March 1981 he was severely beaten by an “unknown perpetrator.” After recovering, he joined Solidarity and was a member of the Social Committee for the celebrations of the twenty-fifth anniversary of the June 1956 events in Poznań. Pajdak was decorated with (among other awards) the Golden Cross of Merit, the Order Pro Fide et Patriae, and the Home Army Cross. (WR) PAKSAS Rolandas (10 June 1956, Telšiai), Lithuanian politician. Paksas studied at the Polytechnic College in Vilnius and at the Civil Aviation Academy in Leningrad. In 1979–85 he worked at a design office and as a pilot of an acrobatic aviation squad. He was a Soviet and Lithuanian champion in air acrobatics. Later he chaired the Vilnius Air Club, and in 1990–91 he was head of the air section of the National Volunteer Defense. From 1992 to 1997 Paksas chaired a building company, Restako. In March 1997 he was elected to the City Council of Vilnius, and in April 1997 he became mayor of Vilnius. He managed to reconstruct the historical center of the city, which added to his popularity. A member of the Homeland Union–Lithuanian Conservatives (Tėvynės Sąjunga–Lietuvos Konservatoriai), from 18 May to 27 October 1999 Paksas was prime minister, enjoying strong support in the parliament. Trying to meet popular expectations, he resigned in protest against the sale of a state oil concern to the American Williams group; the sale had been promoted by President Valdas Adamkus.

Before the parliamentary elections of October 2000, aware of the declining ratings of the conservatives, Paksas left his party and took the lead of the Lithuanian Liberal Union (Lietuvos Liberalų Sąjunga), which gained 17.3 percent of the vote and thirty-four mandates, becoming the third largest parliamentary faction. On 26 October 2000 he became prime minister of a minority cabinet, based on a coalition of liberals and the Socialist-Liberal New Union. Paksas also cooperated with the Lithuanian Poles’ Electoral Action. He accelerated talks on Lithuania’s entry into NATO and the European Union, but he failed to prevent the collapse of the coalition on account of differing attitudes on the privatization of the power sector. Paksas was accused of overly close links with Russian business and on 20 June 2001 he resigned. In 2002 he became head of the Lithuanian Liberal Democratic Party (Lietuvos Liberaldemokratų Partija). In the campaign before the presidential elections of December 2002, Paksas used radical populist rhetoric and advanced to the second round, in which he won 54.9 percent of the vote and defeated Adamkus. In the spring of 2003 Paksas supported Lithuania’s entry into the European Union in a referendum that confirmed this decision. In November 2003 it was disclosed that Paksas’s closest aides had cooperated with the Russian mafia, but Paksas stated he had nothing to do with that. Nevertheless, impeachment procedures were started, and they ended up in his recall from office on 6 June 2004. (WR)

PALACH Jan (11 August 1948, Všetaty–19 January 1969, Prague), Czech student. Between 1967 and 1968 Palach was a student at the Higher Economic School, and from 1968, in the Department of Philosophy of Charles University in Prague. On 16 January 1969 in protest against the August 1968 Soviet invasion and against the Soviet occupation, Palach set himself on fire at Venceslas Square in Prague. Seriously burned, he was taken to a plastic surgery clinic, where he died. His funeral on 25 January 1969 became a nationwide demonstration against the occupiers and their Czech adherents. Buried at Olšany Cemetery in Prague, Palach was secretly exhumed in 1973, his body was cremated, and the urn with the ashes was carried to the cemetery in Všetaty. On 25 February 1969 another student, Jan Zajic, followed Palach's example in an attempt to protest the lack of social response to Palach's death. Both graves became places of pilgrimage and anti-government demonstrations. On the twentieth anniversary of Palach's burning himself to death, Prague became the scene of mass anti-Communist demonstrations, brutally suppressed by the police. These were the first heralds of the Velvet Revolution, which ten months later overthrew the Communist regime in Czechoslovakia. In 1990 Palach's ashes were again placed at Olšany, and on 19 January 2000 a monument commemorating his death was unveiled at Venceslas Square. (PU)

PALECKIS Justas (22 January 1899, Telšiai–21 February 1980, Vilnius), Lithuanian Communist activist. Paleckis spent his childhood in Riga, where he later studied journalism and also worked as a teacher. He published his first articles in the Latvian Communist newspaper, and in 1921–23 he wrote for the Lithuanian leftist press. In 1925 Paleckis founded the periodical Naujas Žodis, which came out in Riga for two years and in Kaunas until 1933. After the formation of a Socialist-populist government, in 1926 Paleckis became the head of the Lithuanian News Agency ELTA and held the post until May 1927. After a visit to the USSR in 1933, Paleckis published SSSR musu akimis (The USSR in our eyes), in which he rather critically described Soviet life. Nonetheless, he intensified his cooperation with the Lithuanian Communist underground. In 1937 he also attempted to organize an overt People's Front.

After the establishment of Soviet garrisons in October 1939, Paleckis's attitude induced the Lithuanian authorities to put him under detention. On 17 June 1940 the Kremlin deputy, Vladimir Dekanozov, appointed Paleckis the head of the so-called people's government and then the acting president of Lithuania. Paleckis presented himself unofficially as a rather moderate politician who could prevent further arrests. Following instructions from the Kremlin, on 6 July Paleckis issued a decree changing the electoral law so that only the Communist Party could propose candidates. On 14–15 July 1940 he staged the "elections" for the new People's Assembly, and then he arranged the incorporation of Lithuania into the USSR as a Soviet republic. After that on 25 August 1940 Paleckis assumed the post of president of the Supreme Council of the Lithuanian SSR. After the German invasion in June 1941 Paleckis fled to Moscow, only to resume his former post in the summer of 1944. While holding this post until 1967, he endorsed two great waves of deportations of Lithuanians far inside the USSR, in 1944 and 1949. In 1952 Paleckis became a deputy member of the CC of the CPSU. In 1966–70 he was also the president of the Council of Nationalities of the USSR and headed many Soviet delegations to conferences of the Interparliamentary Union. These aimed at the validation of the incorporation of Lithuania into the USSR. Paleckis published many articles praising the Soviet government in Lithuania; these were collected in, for example, V dvukh mirakh (In two worlds; 1974), and the memoirs Driejuose pasauliuose: Atsiminimai (1983). PÁLFFY György [originally Oesterreicher] (16 September 1909, Temesvár [Timișoara]–24 October 1949, Budapest), Hungarian officer. Before World War I Pálffy's family moved from Transylvania to Budapest, where his father worked as a bank clerk. After graduating from high school, Pálffy did his military service. In 1932 he graduated from the Ludovika Military Academy, Budapest, and served in the army. After one year of training in Italy, he graduated from the General Staff Military Academy in Budapest (1938). In 1939 he left the army because of his anti-German views and the Jewish origin of his wife. During World War II he worked in a steelworks. In 1942 he became a member of the illegal Hungarian Communist Party (HCP). On the party's orders, in 1943 Pálffy also joined the Independent Smallholders' Party (ISP) and conducted anti-war agitation among the ISP members. In the autumn of 1944 he was appointed commander of the HCP Military Commission.

In December 1944 Pálffy joined the effort to establish an army of the Provisional National Government in Debrecen. In March 1945 he became commander of the Military Policy Department (counterintelligence) in the Ministry of National Defense. He was responsible for hunting down war criminals, but in practice he was more involved in imposing HCP control over the army and eliminating rivals to the Communists from public life. In the latter endeavor Pálffy competed with the political police, led by Gábor Péter. In 1945 Pálffy was promoted to colonel and in 1946 to brigadier general. In 1946 he became commander of the border guard and secretary of the HCP Military Commission. In 1947 he was promoted to major general and inspector general of the Hungarian Army. In February 1948 in Moscow Pálffy negotiated a Hungarian-Soviet agreement of friendship and mutual assistance. In June 1948 he became a member of the Central Committee (CC) of the Hungarian Workers' Party (HWP). At the end of 1948 Pálffy was appointed deputy minister of national defense and chief of training. On 5 July 1949 he was arrested at the instigation of Mihály Farkas, the minister of defense. Pálffy's case was linked with that of László Rajk, but Pálffy was tried separately, sentenced to death, and executed. On 6 October 1956 he was reburied, along with Rajk and other co-defendants who had been executed at the same time. Partially vindicated in 1955, Pálffy was fully rehabilitated in September 1963. PALIIV Dmytro (17 May 1896, Perevozets, near Kalush, Galicia–19 or 20 July 1944, Brody, Galicia), Ukrainian political and military leader. Born into the family of a Uniate clergyman, during World War I Paliiv was an officer in the Ukrainian Sich Riflemen. He co-organized the Ukrainian Military Committee and helped to prepare the Ukrainian Uprising in Lemberg (Lwów, Lviv) in November 1918. He served in the Ukrainian Galician Army (UGA) as an adjutant to General Miron Tarnavskiy. Paliiv was against reaching an agreement with Anton Denikin or transforming the UGA into the Red Galician Army. A founding member of the clandestine Ukrainian Military Organization (Ukrainska Viyskova Orhanizatsiya [UVO]), Paliiv belonged to the UVO Supreme Command from 1921 to 1926. He served as a member of the UVO probably until 1931. He opposed subordinating the UVO to the Organization of Ukrainian Nationalists (OUN). Paliiv was one of the founding members of the Ukrainian Party of National Work (UPNW) and co-edited its periodical, Zahrava. From 1923 to 1926 Paliiv was an editor of Novyi Chas. He supported the 1925 merger of the UPNW with the Ukrainian People's Labor Party into the Ukrainian National Democratic Alliance (Ukrainske Natsionalno-Demokratychnе Obyednannya [UNDO]), and in the same year he became a member of the Central Committee of the UNDO. Paliiv was an MP in the Assembly of the Republic of Poland from 1928 to 1930. Arrested on 10 September 1930, he was held in various prisons, including the Brześć (Brest) prison, until 6 July 1933. Paliiv opposed the OUN's use of terrorism in the political struggle and especially the involvement of youth in such actions. Nevertheless, he served as liaison officer between the UNDO and Yevhen Konovalets until July 1933, when he was expelled from the UNDO. A supporter of so-called constructive Fascist work, on 1 November 1933 Paliiv established the Front of National Unity (Front Natsionalnoy Yednosti). He edited the periodicals Batkivshchyna (1934–39) and Ukrainski visty (1935–39). After the outbreak of World War II in 1939, Paliiv went to the German-occupied Krynica. One of the most devoted founding members of the SS Galician Division, Paliiv served as officer of this division. He was killed in the Battle of Brody. (GM)

PÁLINKÁS Antal [originally Pallavicini] (30 July 1922, Budapest–10 December 1957, Budapest), victim of the 1956 Hungarian Revolution. Pálinkás was born into an aristocratic family. After passing his high school final exams, he worked as a laborer from 1940. He later studied at the Ludovika Military Academy in Budapest and served in the army. After the Germans occupied Hungary in March 1944, Pálinkás joined the anti-Nazi resistance movement and helped to establish the Hungarian Front. Sent to the Soviet Union at the end of 1944, he served as the commander of a battalion in a division of soldiers who volunteered to serve with the Russians, and later he became the commander of a field hospital in an NKVD camp in Nikolayev. After returning to Hungary in 1946, Pálinkás was vetted and returned to the army. In 1947 he joined the Hungarian Communist Party, and in June 1948, the Hungarian Workers' Party (HWP). In 1948 Pálinkás was decorated with the Order of Hungarian Freedom for his services during World War II. In 1951 he became chief of staff of an armored regiment in the town of Aszód. It was then that he changed his name to Pálinkás, which sounded less aristocratic. In 1955 he became chief of staff of a regiment in the town of Rétság.

In October 1956 Pálinkás was elected chairman of the Revolutionary Military Council of the regiment and supplied weapons and ammunition to local units of the National Guard. On 31 October, on the orders of his superiors, he escorted Cardinal József Mindszenty, who had been held under house arrest near Rétság, to the archbishop's palace on Castle Hill in Buda. Upon the second Soviet invasion, on 4 November, on the orders of the regiment commander, Pálinkás raised an alarm. Men who had done military service were given weapons and ammunition. However, on the orders of the Ministry of National Defense, the arms were laid down without a struggle in front of Soviet units. At the beginning of January 1957 Pálinkás left the army on his own request, and in February he was arrested. By linking his aristocratic descent, which Pálinkás had rejected in his youth, with the fact that he had been randomly assigned to escort Cardinal Mindszenty, the authorities tried to falsely prove that the revolution was a counterrevolution organized mainly by former landowners and clerical reactionaries. On 16 September 1957 the court of first instance sentenced Pálinkás to life imprisonment, but on 11 November of that year the Supreme Court changed this sentence to death. One month later Pálinkás was executed. (JT)

PANA Gheorghe (9 April 1927, Gherghița), Romanian Communist activist. During his studies in economics in Bucharest, in 1944 Pana joined the Union of Communist Youth, and in 1947, the Romanian Communist Party (RCP). In 1958–65 he was secretary of the RCP Committee in Bucharest, and from 1959 he also headed its Department of Propaganda. PANIĆ Milan (20 December 1929, Belgrade), Yugoslav politician of Serb nationality. As a teenager, Panić served in the Communist guerrillas. In the early 1950s he became a well-known cyclist, and in 1955 he fled to the West. In 1956 he went to the United States, where he graduated from college, received American citizenship, and established the International Chemical and Nuclear Pharmaceuticals Company (ICN). In the late 1980s, thanks to the support of Slobodan Milošević, Panić gained control over the Yugoslav pharmaceutical company Galenika. In early July 1992 he came to Yugoslavia with a peace mission. Taking this as an opportunity in his international game, Milošević agreed to appoint Panić prime minister of the Yugoslav government on 14 July 1992. Panić surprised Milošević by criticizing aggressive Serbian operations in Bosnia-Herzegovina, which he called an independent state. He appealed for an end to these operations, calling ethnic cleansing “shameful” and dismissing extreme nationalists from the government. In the presidential elections Panić gained the support of a group of independent citizens. In the first round, on 20 December 1992 he gained 34 percent of the vote, but in the second round he lost to Milošević. At the end of December 1992, Panić lost a no-confidence vote in the parliament, and on 9 February 1993 he resigned. He returned to the United States and continued to run ICN. (WR)

composer and conductor. From 1932 to 1936 Panufnik studied at the Warsaw Conservatory, from which he graduated as a student of composition under Kazimierz Sikorski. From 1937 to 1938 he studied conducting at the Vienna Academy. He then completed his studies in Paris (1938–39). During World War II Panufnik was in occupied Poland. In 1945 he became the conductor of the Kraków Philharmonic, and in 1946, director of the Warsaw Philharmonic. At an early age Panufnik achieved creative maturity and gained the recognition of music critics—for example, for his Sinfonia rustica (1948). From 1947 Panufnik performed in Germany, France, England, and the Soviet Union. During the heyday of Socialist realism, however, Polish Communist officials began criticizing the style and content of his works; therefore, in 1954 Panufnik decided to remain in the West. As a result, he became the target of vicious propaganda attacks and was subsequently totally blacklisted by censors in the Polish People's Republic. Panufnik settled in England, where in 1957 he became musical director of the City of Birmingham Symphony Orchestra. In 1963 his Sinfonia sacra won first prize at the International Composers' Competition in Monaco; consequently, his works were more and more often performed in Great Britain and the United States. In stylistic terms, Panufnik's music was based on intellectual constructions. He used carefully planned symmetric schemata and characteristic "note cells," but his music is nevertheless not void of romantic warmth and emotional elements. Although his were not programmatic compositions, religious and patriotic inspiration played an important role. Such was the character of his greatest works, including Piano Concerto (1962), Katyń Epitaph (1969), Universal Prayer (1969), Sinfonia mistica (1977), Sinfonia votiva (1981), Harmony (1987), and Sinfonia di speranza (1987). Panufnik's works were not performed in Poland until 1977. In 1987 he published his autobiography, Composing Myself. In 1990 he visited Poland for the first time in thirty-six years. In January 1991 Panufnik received a British knighthood. (WR)

PAPÁNEK Ján (24 October 1896, Brezová pod Bradlom, Senica district–30 November 1991, New York), Slovak journalist and diplomat. During World War I Papánek served in the Austro-Hungarian Army and was taken prisoner by the Italians in 1916. He soon enlisted in the Czechoslovak Legions in Italy, where he also worked as an editor of the newspaper V boj. From 1919 to 1923

he studied international law and political science at the Sorbonne, Paris, and afterwards he entered the diplomatic service. Papánek worked in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs in Prague and served on diplomatic missions in Budapest and Washington. He was a close associate of Edvard Beneš, whom he supported in his conflict with Milan Hodža. From 1935 to 1938 Papánek was a consul in Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania. He firmly opposed the partition of Czechoslovakia and the establishment of a separate Slovak state. During World War II Papánek was head of the Czechoslovak information office in the United States and one of the leaders of the émigré community linked with President Beneš. In April 1945 Papánek was secretary of the Czechoslovak delegation to an international conference in San Francisco at which the United Nations was established. He helped to draft the Charter of the United Nations and was one of its fourteen co-authors and signatories. From 1946 to 1948 Papánek was a delegate to the United Nations and took an active part in UN work. During the Communist coup in February 1948 he submitted a protest to the UN secretary general against Soviet interference in Czechoslovakia's domestic affairs. Soon he was recalled as ambassador by the new Communist government, but he refused to accept this recall and remained in exile. From 1948 to 1986 Papánek was chairman of the American Fund for Czechoslovak Refugees (Americký Fond pre Československých Utečencov), and in 1949 he helped to establish the Council of Free Czechoslovakia (Rada Svobodného Československa). Papánek was also an active member of other émigré organizations and published in their newspapers and periodicals. (PU)

PARHON Constantin (28 October 1874, Câmpulung, Argeş County–9 August 1969, Bucharest), Romanian doctor, endocrinologist, biologist, and political activist. Parhon attended high school in Focşani, Buzău, and Ploieşti. In 1893–1900 he studied medicine in Bucharest. In 1900 he earned the title of doctor of medicine. Parhon initially practiced as a neurologist and then as a psychiatrist. In 1909 he co-authored Secreţiile interne (Internal secretions), the first book on endocrinology ever written. From 1913 to 1933 Parhon was a professor at the Neuro-psychiatric Department of the University of Iaşi Medical School. He simultaneously was an active member, and from 1915 to 1916 the president, of the Doctors' and Naturalists' Society in Iași. He subsequently founded the Neurology, Psychiatry, Physiology, and Endocrinology Society. In 1913 he demonstrated the role of hormonal pathologies in psychosis. Parhon was also active in political life. In 1918 he was one of the founders of the leftist Workers' Party (Partidul Muncitor), which merged with the leftist Peasant Party (Partidul Țărănesc), led by Ion Mihalache, in 1919. In 1933 Parhon moved to Bucharest, where he worked as a university lecturer at the Medical School from 1930 to 1940 and subsequently became director of the Institute of Nervous, Mental, and Hormonal Diseases. In 1928 he became a member of the Romanian Academy of Sciences and served as its honorary president from 1948 to 1969.

After World War II, Parhon supported the new authorities and joined the Romanian Communist Party (Partidul Comunist Român). From April 1948 to June 1952 he served as president of the Presidium of the Grand National Assembly (parliament). In 1947 he became a member of the Soviet Academy of Sciences. From 1949 to 1957 he was the director of the Institute of Endocrinology, and from 1952 to 1957 he was also the director of the Institute of Geriatrics. Parhon conducted research on the influence of hormonal activity on the normal and pathological functioning of the organism and on mental functions. The author of numerous works on the aging of the organism and the chances of extending human life, he was a member of many international scientific societies. Parhon's publications include Les sécrétions internes au point de vue morphologique, chimique, physiologique, pathologique, et thérapeutique (Internal secretions from the morphological, chemical, pathological, and therapeutic point of view, 3 vols.; 1923–33; co-author); Psihozele afective (Affective psychoses; 1925); and Biologia vârștelor: Cercetări clinice și experimentale (The biology of old age: Clinical and experimental research; 1955). PÄRT Arvo (11 September 1935, Paide), Estonian composer and conductor. Pärt was studying at a secondary music school in Tallinn when he was drafted into the Soviet Army in 1955. He played in a military band. Later he graduated, and in 1957–63 he studied under Heino Eller. From 1958 to 1967 Pärt was head of the music section of Estonian Radio. In 1962 he won an all-Soviet contest for young composers with the cantata Meie

Aed (Our garden) and the oratory Mailmaa Samm (The march of light). Creating Western-style music based on atonality and the so-called serial technique, Pärt evoked strong responses, from the esteem of experts (first prize in an all-Soviet contest for young composers in 1969 and an award from the Estonian SSR in 1978) to political attacks and censorship (for example, his Credo of 1969 was banned). Despite Moscow's accusations of "mysticism," Pärt's Perpetuum mobile was well received at the Warsaw Autumn Festival in 1964. Unconducive living and working conditions in the USSR made Pärt go abroad. In 1980 he went with his family to Vienna, and in 1981 he settled in Berlin.

Pärt is the best known Estonian composer. His works have been frequently performed by the Hillard Ensemble and the Chamber Choir of the Estonian Philharmonic, as well as by leading conductors and violinists. Pärt's chief publisher was Universal Editions in Vienna, and from 1984 he worked with ECM Records. Pärt won several Estonian and international awards, including the German Johann Gottfried von Herder Prize in 2000. He composed three symphonies (I, Polyphonic, 1964; II, 1966; III, 1971); two sonatas, Mirror in Mirror, for violin and piano (1958–59); the Obituary (1960); Collage B-A-C-H, for a symphony orchestra (1964); Pro et contra, a concerto for cello and symphony orchestra (1966); Trivium (1976); Tabula rasa, a concerto for two violins (1977); Cantus, in memory of Benjamin Britten, for string orchestra (1977); De profundis (1977–80); Annum per annum, for organ (1980); Te Deum (1984); Festina lente (1988); Magnificat (1989); Miserere (1990); Silounans song (1991); Litany (1994); I Am a True Wine (1996); Penitential canon, for mixed choir (1996); Missa syllabica, for choir and organ (1996); and Como an-hela la vine, for soprano and symphonic orchestra (1999). Pärt also composed film music. (AG)

PÁRTAY Tivadar (6 September 1908, Dombóvár–8 August 1999, Balatonszárszó), Hungarian politician. Pártay was the son of a railway worker. After graduating from a teacher training college in Miskolc (1929), he worked as a teacher and organist in the town of Arnót. He also ran his own farm. In 1932 he joined the Independent Smallholders' Party (ISP). In 1933 he became secretary of an ISP organization in Upper Hungary, and in 1939 he became one of its national leaders. From 1938 to 1943 Pártay worked as a journalist for the newspapers Független Magyarág and Miskolci Holnap in Miskolc. In 1938–41 he served in the army in the territories of Transcarpathian Ruthenia and northern Transylvania, which had been returned to Hungary. In September 1943 Pártay organized an anti-war demonstration in Miskolc. Because of this, he was sent to the eastern front, from which he returned in February 1944. In 1945 he was again elected chairman of the ISP in Upper Hungary. In September 1946 he became one of the senior leaders of the ISP, and from 1945 to 1948 he served as a member of parliament. In March 1945 Pártay became owner and editor of Miskolci Hírlap, and in September 1946, co-owner and editor-in-charge of the Budapest newspaper A Reggel. From 1945 to 1946 Pártay was head of the ISP organizational department. In March 1947 he left the party as a result of a conflict with Prime Minister Ferenc Nagy. In May 1947, after the Communists had forced Nagy to go into exile, Pártay returned to the ISP, but he soon came into conflict with its leaders, who were increasingly dependent on the Communists. Arrested in February 1949, Pártay was imprisoned in Kistarcsa and then in a forced labor camp in Reck (1950–53). After his release, he worked as a blue-collar laborer. During the 1956 revolution Pártay helped to reorganize the ISP, and on 30 October 1956, he became its deputy secretary general. Arrested in May 1957, he was released in July 1958, and no legal proceedings were instituted against him. Pártay later worked in transport companies. He retired in 1973. In 1988 he took an active part in reviving the ISP. He was elected chairman of the party in November 1988 and its honorary chairman in 1989. In 1988 he was also one of the founders of the Historical Compensation Committee. In 1989–91 he was the editor-in-chief of Kis Újság, an ISP newspaper. In June 1991 Pártay left the ISP in protest against its demagogic political line. Pártay's memoirs, Veszélyes évszázad (Dangerous century), were published in 1997. (JT)

PÂRVULESCU Constantin (1895, Oltenia–11 July 1992, Bucharest?), Romanian Communist activist. Pârvulescu was connected with the revolutionary movement from 1917, when he deserted from the Romanian Army and joined the Red Army. In 1921 he co-founded the Socialist Communist Party of Romania, which in 1922 took the name of the Communist Party of Romania (Partidul Comunist din România [PCR]). After it was made illegal in 1924, Pârvulescu was active in the underground. From 1929 he was a member of the PCR Central Committee (CC), and for a brief time in 1930 he was its general secretary. In 1934 Pârvulescu was arrested and put in jail. After a few years he managed to escape, and shortly before 1939 he got to the Soviet Union. In 1942 he married an NKVD agent, Ana Toma. In early April 1944 Pârvulescu was sent to Romania, along with Emil Bodnaraș and Iosif Ranghet, and the three of them ran the party until the coup of 23 August 1944. In 1945–61 Pârvulescu headed the Central Control Commission of the party (in 1948–65, the Romanian Workers' Communist Party). In 1948–49 and 1953–61 he was speaker of the parliament, and in 1955–60 he was a member of the CC Politburo. At the end of 1961, as a result of the power struggle in the party leadership, Pârvulescu was dismissed from all positions and disappeared from public sight. At a CC meeting he was criticized for “ideological deviation” and for his links with Iosif Chișinevschi and Miron Constantinescu. In 1989 Pârvulescu briefly returned to political life, signing the “Letter of 6”—written by former high-ranking Communist officials and criticizing Nicolae Ceaușescu for violating human rights. PAŠIĆ Nikola (31 December 1845, Zaječar–10 December 1926, Belgrade), Serb politician, prime minister of Serbia and prime minister of the Kingdom of Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes. Pašić studied in Belgrade and then graduated from the Zurich Polytechnic in 1872. In 1878 he was elected to parliament, and as leader of the opposition, he resisted the authoritarian monarchy of Milan Obrenović. Pašić's aim was to establish a parliamentary democracy. He was one of the founders of the Radical Party (1881). When a popular uprising against the government, organized by the Radicals in 1883, led to persecutions, Pašić fled to Bulgaria. He returned to Serbia after Milan's abdication in favor of his son, Alexander (1889), and he became president of the parliament. Pašić was also twice elected mayor of Belgrade. He served as prime minister for the first time from February 1891 to August 1892. Appointed minister plenipotentiary of Serbia to St. Petersburg in 1893, he returned to Serbia the following year. In 1899 there was an unsuccessful attempt on Alexander's life, and charges were brought against members of the Radical Party. Pašić was sentenced to death but was granted amnesty and left the country. After the coup d'état of 1903 and the restoration of the Karadjordjević dynasty, Pašić returned to Serbia and became one of its most important political figures.

As prime minister and minister of foreign affairs

(10 December 1904–28 May 1905, 29 April 1906–20 July 1907, and 24 October 1909–4 July 1911), Pašić broke away from the pro-Viennese policy of Obrenović and strengthened relations with Russia and France. In 1906–1911 he showed great skill in a trade war against Austria-Hungary. In 1911 his most powerful political rival, Milovan Milovanović, became prime minister. After his sudden death, on 12 September 1912 Pašić again became premier and minister of foreign affairs. Under his government Serbia was victorious in the two Balkan Wars.

After the assassination of Archduke Francis Ferdinand in Sarajevo on 28 June 1914, Pašić tried to avoid war against Austria-Hungary, as Serbia was militarily and economically exhausted after the Balkan Wars. His government accepted the humiliating ultimatum issued by the Viennese government with the exception of one point concerning the inquiry into the assassination being conducted by the Austrian authorities in Serbia. Nevertheless, on 28 July 1914 Austria-Hungary declared war on Serbia. After the defeat of the Serbian forces as a result of the Austro-Hungarian, Bulgarian, and German offensive, which began in October 1915, Pašić's government withdrew to Corfu (winter 1915). During World War I Pašić was prime minister of the government-in-exile. As an advocate of the concept of a Greater Serbia, he did not agree to the formation of a federal Yugoslavia in which Slovenes, Croats, and Serbs would be autonomous and equal. After the collapse of the ruling coalition in 1917, Pašić became the head of a government formed by the Radicals alone. His position was further weakened after the fall of the tsarist regime in Russia in 1917. Pašić took part in negotiations with the Yugoslav Committee in London (which also had claims as a government in exile), which resulted in the Corfu Declaration (20 July 1917). According to the declaration, the common aim of both political centers in exile would be the unification of Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes into one kingdom under the rule of the Karadjordjević dynasty.

On 1 December 1918 the Kingdom of Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes was formed. Pašić, with Ante Trumbić, a Croat, and Ivan Žolger, a Slovene, represented the new state at the Paris Peace Conference in 1919. After assuming the premiership on 1 January 1921, Pašić co-established the Vidovdan Constitution, which was passed on 28 June 1921. On 28 July 1924 he stepped down, but on 6 November 1924 he resumed the duties of prime minister. In February 1925 Pašić dissolved parliament and brought drastic measures against the opposition, including the imprisonment of Stjepan Radić and the delegatization of his Croat Peasant Party. However, after the elections an agreement was reached between Pašić and Radić, the latter becoming minister of education in Pašić's government, but the attempt at cooperation was not successful. Pašić would not withdraw his support for a Greater Serbia and his centralist concept, and he ignored the requests of Croats and Slovenes to create a federation based on the equality of the nations. On 8 April 1926 Pašić resigned and died soon afterwards. (AO)

PASKAI László (8 May 1927, Szeged), primate of Hungary. Paskai graduated from a Piarist high school in Szeged. In 1949 he took vows in the Franciscan order, and in 1951 he was ordained. In 1952–55 he was an assistant to the bishop of Szeged, and then he taught philosophy at the theological seminary there. In 1965–69 he worked as minister at the Central Theological Seminary (CTS) in Budapest, and he taught philosophy at Elte University there. In 1973–78 he was CTS rector. On 31 March 1978 Paskai was appointed bishop of Veszprém; on 5 April 1982, archbishop of Kalocsa-Kesckemét; and on 3 March 1987, archbishop of Esztergom and primate of Hungary. On 28 June 1988 he became a cardinal. In 1986–90 he chaired the Conference of the Hungarian Episcopate. After he turned seventy-five years of age, on 7 December 2002, Paskai retired. As primate of Hungary, Paskai continued the policies of compromise of his predecessor, László Lékai. After the fall of Communist rule, he prevented Church involvement in public life, even in moral debates. Until 1999 Paskai objected to a synod aimed at clearing the past accounts of many priests, at internal reforms in the Hungarian Catholic Church, and at the strengthening of the Church's position in its relations with the state. PASTUKHOV Kristio (15 October 1874, Sevlievo–25 August 1949, Sliven), Bulgarian Social Democratic politician. In 1895 Pastukhov completed law studies in Sofia, between 1897 and 1898 he specialized in Germany, and then he practiced at the bar. From 1903 he belonged to the Bulgarian Social Democratic Workers' Party, and from the beginning he sided with the moderate majority faction of the party. From 1909 he was a member of the Central Committee (CC) of the party. From 1911 Pastukhov was an MP, and in 1911–34 he was the editor of the journal Narod. Between May and October 1919 he was minister of interior. In the interwar period he gradually moved toward the leadership of the Social Democratic party. In the 1930s Pastukhov opposed a rapprochement between Bulgaria and Germany. In February 1935 he appealed in an open letter to Tsar Boris III for the restoration of the Turnovo Constitution; because of this he was temporarily interned on St. Anastasia Island. Pastukhov was a co-organizer of a democratic agreement of five parties, called the Petorka (The Five), which in May 1936 demanded that the tsar restore democracy. He supported cooperation with the Western democracies, for which he was sharply attacked by the Communists, especially in 1939–40. In February 1941, along with the leaders of the opposition, Pastukhov submitted a letter to the tsar demanding the neutrality of Bulgaria. He refused to join the Fatherland Front, which was formed in the summer of 1942, because he thought it was too dependent on the USSR. In the summer of 1943 Tsar Boris III considered entrusting Pastukhov with the task of forming a government that was to announce Bulgaria's neutrality. After the sudden death of Boris, Pastukhov was one of the signatories of an appeal for the establishment of the Grand National Assembly and the withdrawal of Bulgaria from the war. He intended to join the government of Konstantin Muraviov, but the leaders of the party dissuaded him from that step. On 7 August 1944, along with twelve other leaders of the opposition, Pastukhov signed a declaration demanding a fundamental change in Bulgarian policy: withdrawal from the alliance with the Axis powers and rapprochement with the Allies.

After the coup of 9 September 1944 in Sofia, Pastukhov courageously defended the independence of Social Democracy and opposed the Communist dictatorship. On 25 January 1945 he was expelled from the leadership and from the ranks of the Social Democrats by the pro-Communist faction. From June 1945 Pastukhov worked toward the creation of a Social Democratic party that would be independent of the Communists. From 1945 to 1946 Pastukhov was the editor of the journal Svoboden Narod. On 22 February 1946, he published an article in it asking, "Why Do You Tempt Me, You Hypocrites?" It was the reason for his arrest four days later. In June 1946 Pastukhov was sentenced to five years of prison for "anti-people activities." In prison, he was strangled by a criminal. Pastukhov was the author of several works, including Koi e iskal voinata? (Who sought war? 1913); Desetgodishninata na ruskata revolutsiia: Borбата me- zhdu Stalin i Trotsky (The tenth anniversary of the Russian Revolution: The fight between Stalin and Trotsky; 1928); Demokratiia i diktatura (Democracy and dictatorship; 1929); and Petiletka i protsesi (The five-year plan and the trials; 1931). (JJ/WR)

PATEK Stanisław (1 May 1866, Rusinów, near Kozienice–22 August 1944, Warsaw), Polish diplomat. After graduating from high school in Radom, Patek studied law at Warsaw University, graduating in 1889. He subsequently did a legal internship, and in 1894 he became an attorney in Warsaw. He was the defense counsel in many political trials. During the 1905 revolution Patek established ties with the Polish Socialist Party (Polska Partia Socjalistyczna [PPS]) and with Józef Piłsudski, whom he sheltered in his flat. In April 1905 Patek signed a memorandum calling for autonomy for the Kingdom of Poland. In February 1908 he was arrested on charges of maintaining contacts with revolutionary groups. After his release, Patek was disbarred (May 1911), which led to protests by Russian liberal lawyers. They published Delo prisiazhnago paverennago Patka (The case of Defense Counsel Patek; 1911), which documented his case. Patek became chairman of the Mutual Credit Company (Towarzystwo Wzajemnego Kredytu) in Warsaw. After the outbreak of World War I, he went to Kraków, where he attended sessions of the Supreme National Committee (Naczelny Komitet Narodowy). He subsequently went westward and used his Masonic contacts to present Piłsudski's political goals to prominent Entente politicians, including Georges Clemenceau, and British diplomats. After returning to Warsaw, Patek established contacts with Russian Constitutional Democratic politicians. After the Germans seized Warsaw in 1915, Patek joined the Civic Guard. Briefly detained, in July 1916 he became a member of the City Council, and from September 1917 until the end of November 1918 he was chairman of the criminal department of the Court of Appeals. Patek was a member of the Le Rénovateur Masonic lodge, which was linked with the Grand East lodge in Paris; as a representative of the latter he helped to organize Polish Masonic lodges, including Zmartwychwstanie (Resurrection) and Kopernik.

After Poland regained its independence, Patek became a judge of the Supreme Court, but as early as December 1918 he went to France, where, as a representative of Piłsudski, he joined the Polish National Committee (Komitet Narodowy Polski [KNP]). Patek was supposed to become Poland's representative to Czechoslovakia, but he did not take up that appointment because he was too busy working with the KNP and the Polish delegation to the Paris Peace Conference. In November 1919, as a result of his efforts and the support of Clemenceau, the Supreme Council of the Entente rejected a decision concerning East Galicia that was unfavorable to Poland. In December 1919 Patek became minister of foreign affairs in the government of Leopold Skulski, and he strictly followed Piłsudski's policies. After this cabinet resigned in June 1920, Patek entered the army. He attended the Spa Conference and later took part in the battles of the First Light Cavalry Regiment. From 1921 to 1925 Patek was an envoy of the Republic of Poland to Japan. After the coup of May 1926, Piłsudski appointed him envoy to the Soviet Union. Patek enjoyed the respect of some Soviet government officials who remembered his courageous defense of revolutionaries. He brought about a certain degree of détente in Polish-Soviet relations: on behalf of Poland, he signed the Litvinov Protocol on 9 February 1929 and the Soviet-Polish Non-Aggression Pact on 25 July 1932. In January 1933 Patek became ambassador to the United States and an envoy to Cuba. In April 1936 he was recalled because of illness. Soon afterwards Patek was appointed to the Senate by President Ignacy Mościcki. Patek published Ze wspomnień obrońcy (From the memoirs of a defense attorney). During the Nazi occupation Patek continued writing his memoirs, but they were destroyed during the Warsaw Uprising. Patek was killed in a bomb explosion during the 1944 fighting in Warsaw's Old Town. His illegitimate son, Aleksander Sonie, was a Soviet diplomat. (WR)

PATOČKA Jan (1 June 1907, Trutnov, near Semily–13 March 1977, Prague), Czech philosopher. After passing his high school final exams in Prague (1925), Patočka began studies in philosophy and Romance and Slavic languages at Charles University in Prague. In 1928–29 he studied at the Sorbonne in Paris, where he met Edmund Husserl for the first time. After receiving a Ph.D. in 1931, Patočka continued his studies in Berlin and Freiburg, where he worked with Husserl and Martin Heidegger. From then on, phenomenology became the foundation of Patočka's philosophy. In 1936 he received the postdoctoral degree from the Department of Philology, Charles University. Until 1944 Patočka taught at a Prague high school. After World War II, he worked as a lecturer at the universities in Prague and Brno. In 1950 he was banned from teaching for political reasons. Until 1954 he worked at the Tomáš Garrigue Masaryk Institute, and after its closure he began working at the Jan Ámos Komenský Pedagogical Institute, where he was responsible for editing the works by Komenský. Patočka was also engaged in editorial work from 1956 to 1968, when he worked in the editorial department of the Institute of Philosophy of the Czechoslovak Academy of Sciences. In 1968 he was appointed professor of philosophy and was allowed to resume teaching in Prague and Brno. He was often invited to lecture at many European academic centers and was granted an honorary doctorate by the University of Aachen. Retired for political reasons in 1971, Patočka was banned from giving public speeches. He was an active lecturer of the secret "flying university," which attracted informal groups of academic youth.

Patočka drew on the thought of Komenský, Masaryk, and Husserl. He emphasized the need to anchor the moral dimension of the human being in an epoch that negated this dimension. In Prirozený svět jako filozofický problém (The natural world as a philosophical problem; 1936) he depicted and analyzed the "natural world," seeking its metaphysical foundations. Patočka defended the right of an individual to perceive himself as free despite a totalitarian system. He wrote studies, articles, and literary and philosophical essays. He made major contributions to the development of Czech philosophical thought in the twentieth century. He also analyzed Czech national consciousness in Dve studie o Masarykovi (Two studies on Masaryk; 1977), Náš národní program (Our national program; 1990), and Co jsou Češi? (Who are the Czechs? 1992). Patočka spiritually inspired the opposition in Czechoslovakia. He understood the activities of the opposition as the efforts of a community of "awakened" people who strove to conquer lawlessness and establish a society that would recognize human rights and give its citizens a chance for proper moral development. In 1976 Patočka joined protests against the harassment of the rock group Plastic People of the Universe. In January 1977 he was a co-founder and one of the first three spokesmen (along with Václav Havel and Jiří Hajek) for Charter 77. Patočka died as a result of exhausting secret police interrogations that lasted many days. His funeral turned into an anti-Communist demonstration. Patočka's publications also include Aristoteles: Jeho předchouci a dedičové (Aristotle: His forerunners and his heirs; 1964); Kacířské eseje o filozofii dějin (1975; Heretical Essays in the Philosophy of History, 1996); and Negativní platonismus (Negative Platonism; 1990). In 1997 Patočka's multi-volume Sebrané spisy (Collected works) began to be published. (AGr)

PĂTRĂȘCANU Lucrețiu (4 November 1900, Iași–17 April 1954, Bucharest), Romanian Communist activist. The son of a well-known writer, after completing law studies in Bucharest (1922), Pătrășcanu studied in France and Germany, earning a doctorate in law and economics from Leipzig University for a dissertation on Romanian agrarian reform. In 1921 he joined the Communist Party of Romania (CPR) and acted as defense counsel in the trials of Communist activists. In 1931 he was elected to the parliament on the ticket of a crypto-Communist bloc of workers and peasants whose mandates were invalidated. At the Second CPR Congress in 1932 Pătrășcanu was elected to its Central Committee (CC). At that time he called for cooperation with democratic and peasant parties in the spirit of a popular front, yet he did not question the territorial program of the Comintern, which called for incorporating Bessarabia into the USSR and separating Transylvania and Dobruđa from Romania. From 1933 to 1934 Pătrășcanu was a representative of the CPR in the Comintern. After returning to Romania, he worked in the propaganda apparatus in Iași. From 1924 to 1941 he was arrested six times.

From 1943 to 1944 Pătrășcanu was under house arrest in Poiana Țapului, near Sinaia, but he was kept informed about plans to withdraw Romania from an alliance with Germany by Colonel Octava Ulea, the master of ceremonies at the royal court. In April 1944 Pătrășcanu entered into close cooperation with Titel Petrescu, leader of the Social Democrats, and he even planned to establish a united workers' front. On 20 June 1944, on behalf of the Communist Party, Pătrășcanu signed an agreement with the liberals, the Peasant Party, and the Social Democrats. This agreement, known as the National Democratic Bloc (NDB), was supported by King Michael. The NDB wanted Romania to switch to the Allied side and planned to overthrow Marshal Ion Antonescu in case he objected. Pătrășcanu took part in the final preparations for a coup. On 23 August 1944 he became minister of justice in the coalition government established by General Constantin Sănătescu after the overthrow of Antonescu's regime, and he held this post in subsequent cabinets.

On 29 July 1944 Pătrășcanu became head of the Romanian delegation to cease-fire negotiations with the Soviet Union in Moscow. He became known as a tough negotiator, speaking more on behalf of the new coalition government than on behalf of the Romanian Communist Party (RCP, as the party was renamed in 1943), a position that the Kremlin did not like. The overthrow of Antonescu and Romania's switch to the Allied side had interfered with Stalin's plans to destroy Antonescu's regime by Red Army forces and to treat Romania as a Third Reich satellite and a subjugated country. Pătrășcanu confirmed his independent position in an interview for the Soviet news agency TASS in December 1944, when he criticized the RCP leadership for overthrowing the government of General Sănătescu, who, according to Pătrășcanu, was more agreeable to the Communists than the new prime minister, General Nicolae Rădescu. In June 1945 Pătrășcanu spoke at a rally in Cluj and attacked those who had spread rumors that the Romanian administration in Transylvania was only provisional. Actually, such rumors had been started by the Kremlin, which wanted to hold the Romanians in check by keeping them uncertain over the fate of this region. At the party's national conference in October 1945 Pătrășcanu joined the RCP CC but failed to enter the Politburo. As head of the ministry of justice, he purged the judiciary by filling key posts with simpletons obedient to the RCP. He also endorsed court trials, not only against representatives of Antonescu's regime, but also against leaders of democratic parties. In that way he precipitated his tragic end.

Neither Stalin nor the RCP leadership, headed by Gheorghe Gheorghiu-Dej, liked Pătrășcanu's genuine popularity and his intellectual manners. From 1946 he was the target of increasing criticism. In February 1947 he nonetheless attended the Paris Peace Conference, which led to a peace treaty with Romania. On 22 February 1948, at the "unification" congress of the Communist Party and the Socialist Party, Pătrășcanu was frontally attacked by Teohari Georgescu, the minister of interior; Vasile Luca, a member of the Politburo; and others for "yielding to bourgeois influences." The CC Plenum openly denounced his tactic of making alliances with peasant parties and his policy of "nationalism," and soon "Titoism" was added to these accusations. Detained under house arrest on Lake Snagov, near Bucharest, on 28 April, Pătrășcanu was formally arrested on 24 August. From January 1949 he was brutally interrogated by security officers, who were ordered by Gheorghiu-Dej to force Pătrășcanu to admit to working with King Michael's security services. Although some of Pătrășcanu's co-workers testified against him under torture, he himself did not admit to the charges. In September 1952, the fall of the Ana Pauker-Luca faction, which had opposed executing Pătrășcanu, sealed his fate. Chief Investigating Officer Mișu Dulgheru was arrested for delays in conducting the investigation, and the case was taken over by Aleksandr Sakharovsky, the MGB adviser to the Romanian Ministry of Interior. In January 1954 a Romanian Workers' Party delegation headed by Miron Constantinescu presented charges against Pătrășcanu to Soviet Prime Minister Georgy Malenkov and was given permission to execute him. During the trial Pătrășcanu was falsely accused of spying for the United States and Great Britain, knowingly maintaining informers of the royal security services in the party leadership, and even of cooperating with Antonescu's regime against the RCP and the Soviet Union. Pătrășcanu did not admit to these charges. After one week of "trial," the RCP Politburo decided to close his case. He was sentenced to death on 14 April 1954. He refused to ask for a pardon and was soon afterwards executed. At an RCP CC Plenum in April 1968 Nicolae Ceaușescu brought about Pătrășcanu's rehabilitation, which was part of Ceaușescu's attempt to gain full control over the party, in which people responsible for Pătrășcanu's death were still playing a leading role. PÄTS Konstantin (23 February 1874, Tahkuranna–18 January 1956, Burashevo, near Kalinin [Tver], USSR), Estonian politician. Born into a peasant family, after graduating from a high school in Pärnu, Päts studied law at the University of Dorpat (Tartu), earning the title of candidate of law in 1898. He served in the army for one year and then worked in the office of an influential attorney in Tallinn, Jaan Poska, in 1900–1. Influenced by leftist ideology, Päts treated national liberation and social reforms as equally important issues. He supported the democratic movement in Russia because he hoped to reduce the economic advantage of Germans in Estonia and wanted to implement social reforms that could win the support of Estonians for the idea of a national state. In 1901 Päts founded Teataja, a radical newspaper in which he promoted his views and published articles by representatives of the Estonian elite, including Eduard Vilde, Anton H. Taamsaare, Jaan Teemant, and Mihkel Martna. In 1904 he became a member of the Tallinn City Council. During the 1905 revolution he was deputy mayor of Tallinn and one of the leaders of an Estonian revolutionary uprising in Tallinn. After the fall of the revolution, a court martial sentenced him to death in absentia. Päts fled Estonia and lived in exile in Switzerland and Finland from 1906 to 1909. In 1909 he gave himself up to the St. Petersburg court authorities, who mitigated his sentence to a nine-month imprisonment, which he served in Kresty Prison, St. Petersburg. He continued to publish his articles in Peterburi Teataja. After his release, he edited Tallina Teataja (1911–16).

From 1916 to 1917 Päts briefly served in the tsarist army. After the February 1917 revolution, he was instrumental in the establishment of Estonian statehood. He was elected chairman of the Estonian National Council (Maapäev [ENC]), an autonomous body within the framework of the Russian state, and on 12 October 1917 he became head of the Estonian Provisional Government (Ajutine Maavalitsus). After the ENC was abolished by the local Bolsheviks and German forces entered Estonia, the offices of the Estonian state went underground. In February 1918 Päts became chairman of the Estonian Salvation Committee (Eesti Päästmises Komitee [ESC]), and, along with Jüri Vilms and Konstantin Konik, he assumed full power. On 24 February 1918 the ESC issued a declaration of Estonian independence, and Päts became prime minister of the Provisional Government of the Republic of Estonia and minister of interior. Arrested by the Germans, Päts was sent to a detention camp in the Polish territories, where he was held for half a year. On 11 November 1918 he returned to Estonia and again assumed the post of prime minister.

Päts's term was a particularly difficult time in the war of independence, but he managed to control the situation, and Estonian troops forced the Bolsheviks out of the country. However, because of Päts' opposition to revolutionary proposals to expropriate land from German owners without compensation, as suggested by the left wing, the Rural Union (Maaliit), under Päts's leadership, lost in the elections to the Constitutional Assembly in May 1919. Päts was forced to resign. He reorganized the Rural Union into the Farmers' Union (Pollumeeste Kogu [FU]), which ran in the November 1920 elections under the slogan of using the reforms to modernize the country. As a consequence Päts not only regained the public trust, but also won the support of many previously landless peasants to whom the left wing gave ownership of land. The FU—on the right side of the parliamentary political spectrum—enjoyed the stable support of some 20–40 percent of the voters. As a result, Päts served as riigivanem (equivalent to president and prime minister) of Estonia from 25 January 1921 to 21 November 1922, from 2 August 1923 to 26 March 1924, and from 12 February 1931 to 19 February 1932. The FU was part of most of the cabinets. Päts was also an influential businessman and served as chairman of the Estonian branch of Lloyd's and chairman of the board of the Estonian Chamber of Industry. The collapse of the agrarian bank, with which he was linked, became a public scandal.

Päts early on sought to strengthen the executive branch of government, and from 1926 onwards he repeatedly proposed relevant constitutional amendments. The beginning of his third term as riigivanem in February 1931 coincided with the Great Depression, increased social discontent, and a looming threat of a takeover of power by the extremely rightist Estonian League of War of Independence Veterans (Eesti Vabadussojalaste Liit [EVL]). A constitutional bill proposed by Päts in 1932 was rejected because of the opposition of the Socialists; therefore, Päts supported a proposal by the EVL that received the support of the majority of voters in an October 1933 referendum. On 21 October 1933 Päts established a new government, this time as an interim cabinet until a new constitution came into force. With the help of an ally, General Johan Laidoner, who wielded great influence in the army, on 12 March 1934 Päts staged a coup and then introduced an authoritarian regime. Political parties were disbanded, censorship was introduced, and the police were given greater powers. Päts's regime was politically based on the bureaucracy, the army, and the Fatherland League (Isamaaliit), established in 1935. In August 1937 the National Assembly adopted a new constitution, which came into force at the beginning of 1938. It gave great legislative powers to the president, the post Päts assumed on 24 April 1938. Economic prosperity in the second half of the 1930s strengthened public support for the regime, which interfered in the freedom of economic activities through the trade unions. The struggle against the opposition continued until 1939, but in comparison with other dictatorships of that time Päts's regime had a relatively mild character.

In late September 1939 Päts accepted a treaty that allowed for the de facto occupation of Estonia by the Soviet Union and for the establishment of Soviet military bases without real control by Estonian authorities. This treaty was a consequence of the Molotov-Ribbentrop Pact of 23 August 1939. In June 1940, after the Soviet Union had given a new ultimatum; new units of the Red Army had entered Estonia; and Moscow's delegate, Andrey Zhdanov, had arrived in Tallinn, Päts appointed the government of Johannes Vares, which consisted of Communists or Communist adherents, thus sealing the end of Estonian independence. Following the so-called people's elections of July 1940, the results of which were falsified by the Communists, Päts was dismissed and a few days later deported to Siberia, where he died after the end of World War II.

Päts's role as one of the founding fathers and head of an independent Estonia and then his deportation made him a martyr for the national cause. The respect he enjoyed among the Estonian people increased when, in 1977, his letters from prison were published in the West. In these letters he exhorted the Estonians to keep up their resistance and hope. In 1990 thousands of Estonians gathered at a ceremony at which his remains were returned to Estonia on the day before Estonia regained independence. Meanwhile, in 1999, after ten years of searching in the Moscow archives, the Estonian historian Magnus Iilmjärv declared that in the 1920s Päts had regularly received $4,000 from Soviet security services, which allegedly took advantage of the collapse of the agricultural bank to induce Päts into cooperation by offering him cash to save him from financial troubles. The documents Iilmjärv published also indicated that until the end of the 1920s Päts was on the payroll as the director of the Estonian-Soviet Chamber of Commerce, whose losses were defrayed by the Kremlin. These revelations became the subject of heated polemics. Because of disagreements among historians, the key question—that is, the impact of Päts's possible cooperation with Soviet services on his policies—remains without a clear-cut answer. (AG)

PAUKER Ana [née Rabinsohn] (12 December 1893, Codăești–14 June 1960, Bucharest), Romanian Communist activist. Pauker was born into an Orthodox Jewish family, and her grandfather was a rabbi. She completed university studies and after that, from 1915 to 1921, belonged to a Social Democratic party. In 1921, along with her husband, Marcel Pauker, she joined the newly created Communist Party of Romania (CPR). The next year, partly because of an intimate relationship with its leader, Elek Köblös, she became a member of the Central Committee of the party. Between 1928 and 1932 Pauker studied in the Comintern School in Moscow, while her husband was the leader of the party. She went as a Comintern agent to France (1931) and to other countries. In 1932, when Marcel Pauker was dismissed as the secretary general of the CPR, she became a member of the Secretariat of the Central Committee. Marcel Pauker was arrested in the USSR during the Great Purge, and his wife distanced herself from him and accused him of "Trotskyism." Soon afterwards Marcel Pauker was executed. On 14 July 1935 Ana Pauker was arrested by the Romanian authorities and on 5 June 1936 sentenced to ten years of prison in a trial that won her popularity. In 1940 she was exchanged for Romanian prisoners in the USSR and returned to Moscow. She was active in the Executive Committee of the Comintern and was a member until 1943. She spoke on radio broadcasts in Romanian and organized the Tudor Vladimirescu Division among Romanian captives in the USSR. At that time she opposed the establishment of treaties with King Michael I by the Communists and spoke in favor of an overthrow of the regime of Marshal Ion Antonescu directly by the Red Army.

In September 1944 Pauker, who played a major role in the Communist takeover of power, went to Bucharest. She belonged to both the Secretariat and the Politburo of the CC of the CPR. She directed the organizational affairs of the party; among other things, the party admitted thousands of former members of the Iron Guard, who were otherwise threatened with death. In February 1945 Pauker spoke in favor of a possibly swift overthrow of the government of General Nicolae Radescu. From November 1947, after the deposal of Gheorghe Tătărescu, she was the minister of foreign affairs, and in February 1948, the secretary of the CC for agriculture. In the latter role Pauker was responsible for forced collectivization, which began in March 1949 and during which thousands of peasants perished. Pauker attended conferences of the Communist Information Bureau (Cominform). From 1949 she was deputy prime minister. She took an active part in the deposal and conviction of Lucrețiu Pătrășcanu and in the personnel purges in the party at the end of the 1940s. However, during a mounting anti-Semitic campaign Pauker's situation became increasingly difficult. Her Jewish origins and her contacts with Communists who had fought in the International Brigades in Spain gradually turned against her. Stalin was already insisting on her deposal. Pauker was attacked, along with Vasile Luca and Teohari Georgescu, for hesitation about a monetary reform that would deprive people of their savings, and she was accused of disloyalty at a meeting of the Politburo on 26 May 1952. On 12 September 1952 Pauker was deposed from all her posts, which was a signal of a new purge in the party. Imprisoned in February 1953, Pauker remained for some time under house arrest, but she was released in February 1954 and was even given a job as an editor in the Editura Politică publishing house. The New York Times announced her death, but the Romanian press made no mention of it at all. (WR)

PAUKER Marcel (1901, Bucharest–16 August 1938, Moscow), Romanian Communist activist. Pauker came from an intellectual Jewish family. At first he was a trade union activist. After graduating from a Lutheran school and after obtaining a Ph.D. in law in Paris, he joined the Communist Party, which was being organized at that time. In June 1921 he married Ana Rabinsohn (Pauker), who later played a leading role in postwar Romania. In November 1921 Pauker represented Romania at a congress of trade unions of the Balkan countries in Sofia. In 1922 he joined the CC of the Communist Party of Romania (CPR), being a favorite of Khristian Rakovski. As such, he had a strong influence on the activities of the party on behalf of the Communist International. Pauker attended the Fourth Congress of the Comintern in 1922. When in 1924 the CPR was declared illegal, Pauker left for the USSR. Under the pseudonyms "Popescu" and "Luximin," he worked in the head office of the Comintern, attending its subsequent congresses. At the end of the 1920s he took control of the party, appointing its ruling "directory," with himself as its head. In 1929 he arrived secretly in Romania but was arrested. Released under amnesty, for over two years he was active in the underground before returning to the USSR. In 1931, the Comintern appointed Alexandru Stefanski, who was a member of the Communist Party of Poland, to be head of the party for a short time. In 1932 Pauker was expelled from the leadership of the party for "Trotskyism." His wife also left him and denounced his views. Arrested during the Great Purge, Pauker was sentenced to death and executed. According to information obtained from Soviet archives by his daughter, Tatiana Brătescu, Pauker was executed by a firing squad at the rifle range of the NKVD in Butovo, near Moscow. (WR)

PAUL Karadjordjević (also spelled Karageorgevic) (28 April 1893, St. Petersburg–15 September 1976, Paris), regent of Yugoslavia from 1934 to 1941. The son of Arsen Karadjordjević (who was the brother of Peter I Karadjordjević) and Andra Dimidova, Paul was the cousin of Alexander I Karadjordjević. Educated at Oxford, he spent most of his youth in England. Absent from the country during both Balkan Wars and during World War I, Paul mainly dealt with art, and he knew little about the political problems of Yugoslavia. After the death of King Alexander I, who was murdered in Marseilles in October 1934, Paul became a member of the Regency Council, which exercised power on behalf of Alexander's minor son, Peter II. Actually, however, Paul became regent. He followed the policies of his predecessor, but in the face of tensions in Croatia and as the international situation of Yugoslavia deteriorated, on 6 June 1939 he authorized an agreement that granted the Croats some autonomy within the framework of the unitary state. Aligned with the British conservatives, who hoped for an agreement with Hitler, Paul worked toward a rapprochement between Berlin and London, although in fact he yielded to the mounting pressure of Germany. During Paul's visit to Berchtesgaden on 4 March 1941, Hitler informed Paul about his plans to attack the USSR. Nonetheless, Paul did not agree to Yugoslavia's accession to the Tripartite Pact. Finally, however, under pressure from Germany, the government agreed to sign the accession to the anti-Comintern Pact, which took place on 26 March 1941. The next day a group of officers and politicians overthrew the regents' rule and proclaimed Peter king. This led to the German invasion, the partition of Yugoslavia, and the occupation of a great part of Yugoslav territory by the Third Reich. Paul left for Greece and then for Kenya and South Africa, giving up his political role. At the end of his life he lived in France. (WR)

PAUĻUKS Jānis (24 November 1865, Lielsesavas, Courland–21 June 1937, Bauska), Latvian politician. In 1885 Pauļuks finished a Realschule in Mitava (Jelgava), and in 1892 he graduated from the Technical University in Riga. From 1892 to 1894 he was an engineer with the railroad board in Riga, and from 1894 to 1897, an engineer during the construction of the Yekaterinburg–Chelabinsk railroad line. In 1897–1905 Pauļuks held responsible posts during the construction of the Transbaikalian Railroad and later in the Urals, Northern Caucasia, and Stavropol Province. From 1920 to 1921 he was held prisoner by the Soviet authorities. In February 1921 Pauļuks returned to Latvia and became an engineer in the Latvian Main Railroad Board in Riga. From January 1921 to December 1925 he served as minister of transportation, and from 25 January to 26 June 1923 he also held the post of prime minister. In 1926–27 Pauļuks was inspector general at the Ministry of Transportation and a member of the Railroad Construction Council. After retiring in 1927, he was a private entrepreneur. In 1934 Pauļuks was granted an honorary doctorate by the University of Latvia. (EJ)

PAVEL Ota [originally Otto Popper] (2 July 1930, Prague–31 March 1973, Prague), Czech journalist and writer. Pavel was born into the family of a Jewish peddler. His childhood coincided with the time of Nazi persecutions, and his father and brother were sent to concentration camps. In 1947 Pavel finished a two-year school of commerce. In 1949 he became a radio sports commentator. In 1956 he left radio and began writing sports reports for newspapers. In 1960 he passed his high school final examinations at a high school for adults. From 1964 until the end of his life Pavel struggled with mental illness, which forced him to quit work and claim a disability benefit in 1966. Pavel's best sports books include Dukla mezi mrakodrapy (Dukla among the skyscrapers; 1964), Plná bedna šampaňského (A barrel full of champagne; 1967), and Pohádka o Raškovi (A fable about Raška; 1974). Full of lyricism, the stories based on his childhood experiences are Pavel's greatest literary achievement. He combined idyllic descriptions of nature and the village of Berounki with reminiscences of the war. These stories make up a cycle of memoirs; they are full of humor, irony, and philosophical reflections that praise the basic values of life. Pavel did not idealize life, but he did not take a tragic view of things either. These stories were collected in two volumes, Smrt krásných srnců (The death of a beautiful roe deer; 1971) and Jak jsem potkal ryby (1974; How I Came to Know Fish, 1991). In 1991 the full collection of Pavel's stories Zlatí úhoři (Golden eels) was published, which included pieces previously excluded by the censors.

Some of his prose has been adapted for film. Pavel's works have also been frequently adapted for the stage, turned into radio plays, and translated into many languages, including English. (PU)

PAVELIĆ Ante (14 July 1889, Bradina, Bosnia–28 December 1959, Madrid), lawyer and head of the Ustaša Croatian state during World War II. After completing his studies, Pavelić worked as an attorney in Zagreb, where he joined the rightist and anti-Semitic National Party (Čista Stranka Prava) of Josip Frank. Elected to the Croatian Assembly (Sabor), in May 1917 Pavelić supported the declaration of the Yugoslav Club in the Austrian Reichsrat (Council of the Realm), which advocated the unification of Croats, Serbs, and Slovenes under Habsburg rule. This meant his separation from Frank's party. On 5 October 1918 the National Council of Slovenes, Croats, and Serbs was established, and Pavelić became a member of its board. Following the creation of the Kingdom of Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes, especially after the proclamation of the constitution of June 1921, Pavelić increasingly criticized centralization and the Serbianization of the country's political system. He voiced his criticism in parliament, in which he sat from 1927 to 1929.

When King Alexander Karadjordjević assumed dictatorial powers in 1929, Pavelić fled to Italy, where, in cooperation with fighters of the Internal Macedonian Revolutionary Organization (IMRO) and under the protection of the Italian Fascist authorities, he organized the terrorist organization called Ustaša (Insurgent) in 1930. His organization recruited young Croatian chauvinists and prepared them for action against the representatives of Yugoslavia, particularly against the Serbs. Ustaša training centers were created in Italy and Hungary. In Vienna in 1931 Pavelić published the work Aus den Kämpfe um den selbstständigen Staat Kroatien (From the struggles for an independent Croatia). On 9 October 1934 Vlada Makedonski, a member of the IMRO, murdered King Alexander and the French minister of foreign affairs, Louis Barthou, in Marseilles. The French court sentenced Pavelić, as a co-organizer of the plot, to death in absentia, since the Italian authorities refused to extradite him.

When Hitler's army invaded Yugoslavia in April 1941, the Ustaše had many supporters among the Croats, and as a result, some Croatian units capitulated without a fight.

Upon his arrival in Zagreb on 10 April 1941, Pavelić proclaimed the creation of the Independent State of Croatia (NHD), which also comprised a part of Bosnia and Dalmatia. Despite his racist views, Pavelić presented himself as a Catholic. In order to prevent the deterioration of the position of Croatian Catholics but at the same time to avoid the recognition of the Ustaša state, on 18 May 1941 Pope Pius XII gave Pavelić an audience as a private person, not as the head of government. Italian king Victor Emanuel II passed the Croatian throne on to his relative, Prince Aimone di Spoleto, but Pavelić was the de facto head (poglavnik) of the state, and he began implementing a program of exterminating the Serb minority and the Jews. This program was based upon a decree of 10 April 1941 about protecting Aryan blood. On the basis of this decree, the Ustaša minister of interior, Andrija Artuković, issued, among other things, a law that forbade "Serbs, Jews, Gypsies, and dogs" to enter parks in Zagreb. On 4 June 1941 the Ustaše, along with the German occupying authorities, decided that over 200,000 Slovenes, who were considered "Alpine Croats," were to be displaced from territories incorporated into the Third Reich to the NHD, and a similar number of Serbs were sent from Bosnia to Serbia. In fact, about 30,000 Serbs were displaced and around 170,000 fled to German-occupied Serbia. Even more people fell victim to massacres carried out by the Ustaše, especially in Bosnia, where under the supervision of Governor Viktor Gutić several concentration camps were established, such as those in the towns of Glina, Sanski Most, Klinč, and Karlovac. The estimated number of victims of Pavelić's regime range from 200,000 to 600,000, mainly Serbs, Jews, and gypsies. Among others, part of the Serbian Orthodox Church hierarchy was murdered. The atrocities perpetrated by the Ustaše and their close collaboration with the Third Reich (Pavelić met with Hitler on several occasions) evoked opposition and protests not only from Serbs, but also from Croatian politicians who had ties with the government in-exile in London. The hierarchy of the Catholic Church opposed these evil acts, although some priests collaborated in the exterminations.

Pavelić published Die kroatische Frage (The Croatian question; 1941) and other works. A collection of his speeches and works appeared under the title Putem hrvatskog državnog prava: Poglavnikovi govori, izjave i članci (Following Croatian state law: Speeches, statements, and articles of the head of state; 1942). Pavelić's government finally collapsed in the spring of 1945, when the Germans withdrew from Croatia and Communist guerrillas captured Zagreb. Pavelić fled to Austria and then went into hiding in Italy and Argentina. In 1957 he escaped an assassination attempt and went to Paraguay.

He later settled in Spain. Pavelić did not answer for his crimes against humanity, and his supporters continued terrorist attacks on the embassies of Communist Yugoslavia. Pavelić himself wrote a book in which he warned against the threat of communism: Strahote zabluda: Komunizam i boljševizam u Rusiji i svijetu (The dangers of mistakes: Communism and Bolshevism in Russia and the world), published posthumously in 1974. PAVLE [originally Gojko Stojčević] (11 September 1914, Kućani, near Donji Mohaljac, Slavonia), Patriarch of the Serbian Orthodox Church (SOC). Pavle graduated from high school in Belgrade, and then he studied theology in Sarajevo and Belgrade. In 1944–55 he was a monk at the Rača Monastery. In 1948 he took his vows, and from 1950 he taught music and Old Slavonic at Sts. Cyril and Methodius Seminary in Prizren. In 1954 he took eternal vows, adopting the name Pavle. In 1955–57 he studied at the Department of Orthodox Theology of the University of Athens, Greece. He was particularly engaged in the study of the New Testament and liturgy, and he published a lot. In 1957 Pavle became archimandrite. On 29 May 1957 he was elected bishop of Raška-Prizren in Kosovo. He presided over a commission of the SOC Synod supervising the first full translation of the Bible into Serbian; it was published in 1984.

On 1 December 1990 Pavle was elected the SOC Patriarch to succeed German Djorić, who resigned owing to ill health. Already in the 1980s, Pavle had warned against the growing Albanian (meaning Muslim) pressure in Kosovo and the emigration of the Kosovo Serbs. He alerted the public and protested the Albanian violence and desecration of Orthodox churches. Beaten by a group of Albanians in 1989, Pavle was hospitalized. As a result, he supported Serb nationalists in their attempts to gain full control over the rebellious province. He spoke in favor of a peaceful solution to the conflict, and in 1995 he supported the Dayton agreement, for which he was attacked by the extreme nationalists from the Serbian Orthodox hierarchy, including Bishop Atanasije Jevtić, who demanded Pavle's resignation. Under pressure from most Serb bishops, Pavle accepted a more militant attitude toward the Kosovo Albanians. In 1999, after the NATO intervention in Kosovo, he appealed to the Serbs to stay in the province. After the Serbian presidential elections of 24 September 2000, he recognized the victory of Vojslav Koštunica and appealed for a peaceful transition of power. Pavle authored several works, including Dieu voit tout: L'Église orthodoxe face au conflit yougoslave (God knows all: The Orthodox Church in light of the Yugoslav conflict; 1995), Kosovska iskušenja (Kosovo temptations; 2002), and many articles in Glasnik Srpske Patrijaršije. PAVLOV Asen (9 March 1898, Aleksandrovo, near Lovech–3 October 1977, Sofia), Bulgarian politician. In 1919 Pavlov joined the Bulgarian Agrarian National Union (Bulgarski Zemedelski Narodni Suyuz [BANU]). In 1923 he completed a pedagogical course in Leipzig and subsequently studied in Czechoslovakia, where in 1930 he graduated in agronomy from the Cooperative College in Prague. From 1924 to 1928 Pavlov served as secretary of the Bulgarian Peasant Student Union in Czechoslovakia, and subsequently he was secretary of the Bulgarian Section of the Green International until 1932. He also served as deputy chairman of an anti-Fascist student organization called Narstud and as secretary of the International Youth Agrarian Bureau. After returning to Bulgaria in 1932, Pavlov co-founded and became secretary (1932–33) of the Aleksandur Stamboliyski BANU (Pladne). From 1933 to 1934 he was a member of the leadership of the BANU (United), which was established with the merger of the Aleksandur Stamboliyski BANU and the BANU–Vrabcha 1. After the coup of May 1934, Pavlov was in opposition to the regime and supported the establishment of an anti-Fascist people's front. An executive member of the General Union of Bulgarian Agricultural Cooperatives (1939–44), Pavlov was arrested and placed in an internment camp because of his anti-government activities.

After the coup of 9 September 1944, Pavlov became a member of the BANU Standing Committee and served as minister of agriculture and state property in the government of Kimion Georgiev (September 1944–August 1945). Disappointed with the policies of the Communist-dominated government of the Fatherland Front (FF), he resigned and moved over to the opposition. Pavlov was one of the founders and leaders (August 1945–August 1947) of the opposition BANU, led by Nikola Petkov. He was also a deputy to the National Assembly (1945–46) and a deputy to the Grand National Assembly (1946–47). He edited Narodno zemedelsko zname, an opposition newspaper.

Shocked by Petkov's execution (September 1947) and under pressure from the police, Pavlov abandoned political activities. After the plenum of the Central Committee (CC) of the Bulgarian Communist Party in April 1956, at which the "personality cult" was denounced, he again joined the FF. From 1957 until the end of his life Pavlov was a member of the BANU Council and from 1962 to 1972 also of the BANU Standing Committee. Pavlov was a member of the FF National Council Bureau (from 1957), the secretary of the FF National Council (1963–72), and a deputy to the National Assembly (1958–77). (JJ)

PAVLOV Todor (14 February 1890, Štip–8 May 1977, Sofia), Bulgarian Communist activist and Marxist philosopher. Pavlov was born into a family of teachers in Macedonia. After completing pedagogical and philosophical studies in Sofia (1914), he began working as a teacher. In 1919 he joined the Bulgarian Communist Party (BCP), as a result of which he was dismissed from work in 1922. He was also active in the Bulgarian Communist Youth Union, editing its press organ, Mladezh. After the September 1923 Communist uprising was suppressed, Pavlov helped to found the legal Labor Party (Partiya na Truda), which was to serve as a facade behind which the Communists would continue their activities, but it was dissolved as early as 1924. In May 1924, at a conference called to settle accounts with the past and to find those responsible for the failure of the 1923 uprising, Pavlov was elected to the Central Committee (CC) of the illegal BCP. Arrested in connection with a terrorist attack in Sofia on Easter Sunday, 16 April 1925, he was put in prison, where he was held off and on until 1929.

After his release, Pavlov went to Moscow, where he taught dialectical materialism at the Institute of Red Professorship (1932–36) and at the Institute of Philosophy of the Communist Academy. In Moscow he published Teoriia otrazheniia (Reflection theory; 1936), in which he adapted the psychological theory of Ivan Pavlov to the needs of the Marxist-Leninist doctrine; as a result, Pavlov rose to the position of the leading party ideologue. After returning to Bulgaria in 1937, he led various BCP protests. In October 1939 he published an article praising the Soviet involvement in the partition of Poland. He later published a book in the same spirit. He advocated considering Macedonians as Bulgarians and called for the incorporation of the Macedonian territory into a Communist Bulgaria; as a result, the Bulgarian Communists came into conflict with the Yugoslav Communists. After the war with Yugoslavia broke out in April 1941, Pavlov was interned and sent to the Gonda Voda concentration camp, near Asenovgrad, where he was held until 1943.

After the coup of 9 September 1944, along with Venelin Ganev and Tsvetko Boboshevski, Pavlov became a member of a new, three-man Regency Council, which was given custody of the minor heir to the throne, Simeon II; he held this position until September 1946, when the monarchy was abolished. In 1945 Pavlov became an editor of the Marxist periodical Filosofska misul. In 1944–49 he served as chairman of the Bulgarian-Soviet Friendship Society. He taught philosophy at Sofia University, and in 1947 he was elected its rector for one year. From 1947 to 1954 Pavlov was a member of the Presidium of the Grand National Assembly. In 1957 he joined the BCP CC, and from 1966 to 1976 he was a member of the BCP CC Politburo. In 1962 he became honorary president of the Bulgarian Academy of Sciences and the Association of Bulgarian Writers. Pavlov was the author of many works typical of dialectical materialism, including Osnovni vŭprosi na estetkata (Basic issues in esthetics; 1949) and Ravnosmetka na edna idealisticheska reaktsionna filozofia (The balance of an idealistic reactionary philosophy; 1953). PAVLYCHKO Dmytro (28 September 1929, Stopchativ, near Stanisławów [now Ivano-Frankovsk]), Ukrainian poet, translator, and politician. In 1953 Pavlychko graduated in philology from Lviv University, and later he was literary director of the Maksim Gorky Young Spectators' Theater in Lviv. In 1953–56 he studied Ukrainian literature at Lviv University. From 1955 to 1958 he was head of the poetry section of the Lviv periodical Zhovten, and from 1964 to 1966 he worked in the Oleksandr Dovzhenko Film Studios, where he wrote screenplays for the movies Son (Dream; 1965) and Zakhar Berkut (1970; based on a novel by Ivan Franko). In 1971–78 Pavlychko was editor-in-chief of the periodical Vsesvit, in which translations from foreign literatures were published. In 1966–90 he was secretary of the Association of Ukrainian Writers and the Association of Soviet Writers. Co-organizer and in 1989–90 chairman of the Taras Shevchenko Ukrainian Language Society, in 1989 Pavlychko co-initiated the establishment of the Ukrainian Popular Movement for Restructuring (Narodnyj Ruch Ukraïny za Perebudovu [LRU], or Rukh) and he became a member of its Grand Council. From 1990 to 1994 Pavlychko was a member of the Supreme Council of the Ukrainian SSR, and from 1991, of Ukraine. He also chaired the parliamentary commission on foreign affairs. In 1990 he co-founded the Democratic Party of Ukraine (Demokratychna Partiia Ukraïny). From 1995 to 1998 he was ambassador to Slovakia. In March 1998 he was reelected to the Supreme Council of Ukraine, and then, until 2001, he was ambassador to Poland, contributing to Polish-Ukrainian reconciliation. Pavlychko authored more than thirty collections of poems, including Lubov i nenavist (Love and hatred; 1953); Hranoslov (1968); Tajmynitsa tvoho oblychia (The secret of your face; 1979); and a collection of translations, Svitovyi sonet: Antologia (Anthology of sonnets in world literature; 1983). PAWLAK Waldemar (5 September 1959, Model), Polish political activist. In 1983 Pawlak graduated in machine engineering from the Warsaw Polytechnic, and later he ran a family farm of forty acres in the village of Kamionka. In 1985–90 he belonged to the (Communist satellite) United Peasant Party (UPP). From 1988 he was a member of its provincial committee in Plock and head of the Communal National Council in Pacyna. In June 1989 Pawlak was elected MP on behalf of the UPP. After the name of the party was changed to the Polish Peasant Party (Polskie Stronnictwo Ludowe [PSL]), from June 1990 Pawlak chaired its Main Executive Committee. From 1992 he was chairman of the Main Board of the Union of Volunteer Fire Brigades. In early June 1992, after the Jan Olszewski government resigned, President Lech Wałęsa appointed Pawlak prime minister, but his mission to form a government failed because of a lack of parliamentary support. After early parliamentary elections, on 26 October 1993 Pawlak became prime minister of a government based on the PSL and the post-Communists. This government failed to make use of the economic prosperity to continue structural reforms. At the same time, many representatives from the Communist regime returned to high positions. On 1 March 1995 President Wałęsa made Pawlak step down because of errors made in the preparation of the budget. Pawlak was the PSL candidate in the presidential elections of 1995, but he lost. He was elected an MP in 1991, 1993, 1997, and 2001. In 1991–93 and 1993–97 he presided over the PSL parliamentary club. After the electoral defeat of 1997 Pawlak resigned as chairman of the PSL. From 2001 he was chairman of the Warsaw Commodity Exchange. (IS)

PAZNYAK Zianon (24 April 1944, Subotniki), Belorussian dissident, politician, art historian, and archaeologist. After high school, from 1962 to 1964 Paznyak headed a country club in Khilevichi. From 1964 he worked in the Minsk Theater of Opera and Ballet and in the Belorussian State Historical and Touring Museum. In 1967 he graduated from the Belorussian Institute of Art and Theater in Minsk, and in 1972 he started working at the Institute of Art History, Ethnography, and Folklore of the Belorussian Academy of Sciences (BAS). Paznyak worked to preserve the old Minsk architecture, criticizing the decisions of city authorities to demolish it. In 1975, under the pseudonym “Henryk Rakutowicz,” Paznyak published an analysis in the uncensored press of the situation in Soviet Belorussia, sharply criticizing its authorities for erasing references to or records of the repressions of the 1930s. He accused the Soviets of the extermination of the Belorussian intelligentsia. In 1975 Paznyak was fired for participating in the Academic Center, an informal BAS group. In 1976 he was rehired, this time in the BAS Institute of History. He directed excavations in Minsk, Miadziel, Losk, and other places. Not allowed to defend his Ph.D. in the Belorussian SSR, he received a Ph.D. in Leningrad in 1981.

In 1988, with a group of scholars, Paznyak studied mass graves in the village of Kuropaty, near Minsk, where remains of NKVD victims were found. It was estimated that the NKVD had murdered about 250,000 people there. In June 1988 in the weekly Literatura i Mastatsiva Paznyak published (with Yeuhien Shmyhalou) the article “Kuropaty: Doroha smerti” (Kuropaty: The way of death), which started a political breakthrough in Belorussia. In 1988 Paznyak co-founded a society commemorating the victims of Stalinism in Belorussia, Martyrs of Belorussia (Martyrolog Bialorusi) and the Belorussian Popular Front (Belaruski Narodni Front [BNF]). He was the BNF chairman from 1989 to 1999. He was also an MP to the Supreme Council of the Belorussian SSR (1990–91) and Belarus (1991–95), leading a group of opposition deputies in the council. Paznyak opposed the idea of a presidential republic, fearing it would lead to dictatorship. In 1994 he ran in the presidential elections but won only 13 percent of the vote. In the elections of 1995 the BNF lost, failing to win even one seat. Harassed by the political police of the Alyaksandr Lukashenka regime and fearing for his life, in 1996 Paznyak emigrated to the United States. From 1997 he published, in Warsaw, Poland, the periodical Wiadomości białoruskie. After the BNF split in 1999 Paznyak established the Christian Democratic BNF Party. In 1994 he published Kurapaty. (AS/SA)

PEČIULONIS Motiejus (31 January 1888, Ranciškės, near Sejny–26 January 1960, Ilguva), Lithuanian officer, leader of anti-Soviet guerrillas. After three years of studies in mathematics at Petersburg University, Pečiulonis was drafted into the Russian Army in 1914. In 1916 he graduated from an artillery school and fought on the German and Austrian fronts. In 1919 he returned to Lithuania and joined the Lithuanian Army. In the war against the Bolsheviks and German-Russian troops of Pavel Bermond-Avałov, he commanded an artillery battery. In 1922 Pečiulonis went to study in the Artillery School in Fontainebleau, France, and in 1925–26 he also studied at the Higher School of Artillery in Paris. In 1926 he was appointed head of artillery supplies for the Lithuanian Army, and in 1930, head of all supplies for the army. In 1936 Pečiulonis retired and worked in a trade company. He avoided deportation during the first Soviet occupation (1940–41), and in 1941–44 he was director of an oil mill in Vilnius. With the reentry of the Red Army into Lithuania in the summer of 1944, Pečiulonis retreated to the forests of Samogitia and organized anti-Soviet guerrilla units there. Captured in 1946, he was sent to the Vorkuta area, where he spent ten years in labor camps. In 1956 Pečiulonis was released and allowed to return to Lithuania but could not find any work and died in an invalid shelter. (WR)

PEČKAUSKAITĖ Marija, literary pseudonym “Šatrijos Ragana” (Witch of Šatrijos) (24 February 1878, Medingėnai, near Telshe [Telšiai, Telsze], Samogitia–24 June 1930, Židikai), Lithuanian writer. Born into the Pieczkowski family of Polish nobility, Pečkauskaitė had contacts with Lithuanians from her childhood. The education she received at home consolidated her religious outlook and sensitivity to the conditions of the common people. She wrote her first works in Polish, but under the influence of her friendship with Povilas Višinskis she opted for Lithuanian national identity. Although she shared Višinskis’s patriotic enthusiasm, she did not accept his religious indifference, and after making her literary debut in the Lithuanian liberal periodical Varpas, she began to publish her subsequent works in periodicals that had a Catholic orientation, including Tėvynės Sargas. In 1905 Pečkauskaitė won a scholarship to Switzerland, where she studied pedagogy in Zurich and Fribourg. It was there that she met Friedrich Foerster, whose pedagogical theories had a crucial influence on her. From 1909 to 1914 she taught at a high school for girls in Marijampolė. She subsequently settled in Židikai in northeastern Lithuania, where, despite modest living conditions, she continued writing and was engaged in charity work. Her prose, which consists of short stories and longer novellas, shows social changes in Lithuanian rural life and the emergence of a stratum of independent peasants aware of their Lithuanian national identity. Pečkauskaitė gradually gave up longings for the aristocratic Polish-Lithuanian commonwealth of the past and came to accept the new social requirements: the development of the educational system and a modern economy. In a masterly way she portrayed children and young people growing up in new social and national conditions. Her best stories include “Irkos tragedija” (The tragedy of Irka) and “Vincas Stonis.” A six-volume edition of her works appeared in 1928. Pečkauskaitė’s most important pedagogical work, Motina auklėtoja (Mother as a pedagogue), was published in 1936. (WR)

PEIVE Jānis (3 August 1906, near Pskov–13 September 1976, Moscow), Soviet activist of Latvian descent. In 1929 Pwicz graduated from the Timiryazev Agricultural Academy in Moscow. From 1930 to 1940 he was a researcher and from 1940 to 1942 deputy director and then director of a chemistry and agricultural research institute in Moscow. In 1940 he earned a Ph.D. in agricultural sciences and became a member of the All-Union Communist Party (Bolsheviks). In 1944 Peive was sent to Latvia, which had again been seized by the Red Army, and he was appointed rector of the Agricultural Academy. He also served as director of the Institute of Agricultural Sciences of the Academy of Sciences of the Latvian SSR (1946–48), secretary of the Academy of Sciences (1946–51), and head of the Institute of Biology of the Academy of Sciences (1946–66). In 1951–59 Peive was president of the Academy of Sciences of the Latvian SSR. From 1959 to 1962 he was chairman of the Council of Ministers of the Latvian SSR, and from 1958 to 1966, chairman of the Council of Nationalities of the Supreme Soviet of the USSR. Peive's appointment to the latter post was meant to give an impression of greater professionalism of the Latvian SSR authorities, while giving the Kremlin full control over the Latvian republic. In 1963 Peive returned to Moscow, where he served as a member (1966–71) of the Central Committee (CC) of the CPSU and a member and secretary (1971–76) of the General Biology Department of the USSR Academy of Sciences. PEJANI Bedri (10 June 1885, Peje [Peč]–6 July 1946, Prizren), Albanian politician and journalist. Born into a Muslim intelligentsia family from Kosovo, Pejani completed studies at the Galatasaray Lycée in Istanbul and at Munich University. He published extensively in Turkish and later in Albanian papers and periodicals. In 1907 he conducted negotiations with the Macedonians for a joint anti-Turkish uprising, and in 1908 he took part in Young Turk demonstrations. Pejani became involved in efforts to standardize the Albanian language. In February 1910 he co-organized a congress of Albanian national activists in Monastir (now Bitola, Macedonia), and then he became engaged in promoting the Albanian cause in Europe. In September 1910 a Turkish military court in Prizren sentenced him to death in absentia for his conspiratorial work. As a representative of Peje, Pejani attended the sessions of the National Assembly in Vlorë (November 1912) and was a signatory of the Independence Declaration. During World War I he was involved in the establishment of Albanian schools. One of the founders of the Committee for the Defense of Kosovo in 1919, Pejani was the author of its program. He considered that the most important goal for the Kosovo Albanians was to prevent cooperation between Rome and Belgrade on the Albanian issue. Pejani represented Kosovo Albanians at the Paris Peace Conference. He was also in charge of Populli, a sociopolitical periodical published in Shkodër.

From 1921 to 1923 Pejani was a member of parliament. After the collapse of the 1924 revolution, he went to Geneva—at that time the headquarters of the Committee for the Defense of Kosovo—and there he wrote numerous articles, attacking Ahmed Zogu and other leaders for their alleged plans to liquidate the political elite of Kosovo. In 1927 Pejani initiated the establishment of the Kosovo Liberation Committee in exile. In the late 1920s he traveled throughout Europe. Influenced by what he had observed in Spain, Pejani established ties with the Communist-dominated Balkan Federation. A contributor to the periodical Sazani, he worked with, among others, Ali Kelmendi. He also worked with Llazar Fundo and Riza Cerova. In 1932 Pejani was imprisoned in Turkey. After his release, he returned to Albania in the mid-1930s. In August 1935 he was arrested for his participation in an anti-government rebellion in Fier. Release in 1937, he went to France. After the Italian aggression in April 1939, Pejani sent memoranda to the prime ministers of Western countries in which he appealed to them to prevent the partition of Albania. In May 1941 he returned to Kosovo. Interned on one of the Italian islands and later in Porto Romano, near Durrës, he was released on 13 September 1943, after the capitulation of Italy. Fearing that Yugoslav rule would be restored in the province, Pejani entered into collaboration with the Germans and joined the Albanian government structures established under German supervision. In June 1944 he became head of the Second League of Prizren. He was one of the founders of the Twenty-first Skanderbeg Mountain Division of the Waffen SS, which was an Albanian unit fighting alongside the Germans. In 1945 Pejani was captured by the Yugoslav police. On 21 February 1946 the People's Court for Prizren District sentenced him to death for his active collaboration with the occupiers. Pejani died in a prison hospital. (TC)

PEŁCZYŃSKI Tadeusz, pseudonyms “Grzegorz,” “Robak,” “Wolf,” and others (14 February 1895, Warsaw–3 January 1985, London), Polish general. Born into an intelligentsia family, Pełczyński graduated from high school and commenced medical studies in Kraków in 1911. A member of the Union of Polish Youth called Zet and of the Riflemen's Association, in 1914 he began serving in the Polish Legions. After the so-called oath of allegiance crisis, Pełczyński was interned in a camp at Beniaminów (1917). In November 1918 he joined the Polish Army, and in 1923 he graduated from the Military College in Warsaw. He was a member of a secret organization, Honor and Fatherland (Honor i Ojczyzna), which from 1921 to 1923 comprised the opponents of Józef Piłsudski. In 1924 Pełczyński began working for the Bureau of the Supreme Council of War, first as acting head (1927) and then head (1929–32) of the Second Department (Intelligence) of the General Staff. He again became head of the intelligence department in October 1935. In 1927–29 he edited Przegląd Wojskowy. He was a member of the Chief Council of the National Youth Organization Seniors' Union, the Union of Polish Democratic Youth, and the High Command of the Polish Legionnaires' Union. He took part in the work of the Prime Minister's Committee for Ethnic Affairs.

During the September 1939 campaign, Pełczyński fought behind the German lines. He later lived in Warsaw under a false name. From October 1939 he conducted underground activities, first as a member of the Service for the Victory of Poland (Służba Zwycięstwu Polsce [SZP]), then of the Union of Armed Struggle (Związek Walki Zbrojnej [ZWZ]), and finally of the Home Army (Armia Krajowa [AK]). In July 1940 he became commander of the ZWZ Lublin district, with headquarters in Warsaw. Discovered by the Gestapo, Pełczyński changed his pseudonyms and continued his underground work, serving as deputy chief of staff (1941–44) and subsequently as chief of staff of the High Command of the ZWZ. (The ZWZ was transformed into the AK in 1942.) On 10 September 1943 Pełczyński became the AK deputy commander-in-chief, and on 24 November of that year he was promoted to brigadier general. He personally led units of the Directorate of Sabotage (Kierownictwo Dywersji [Kedyw]). He fought in the Warsaw Uprising, and after its failure he was held in POW camps in Langwasser and Colditz. After his liberation, Pełczyński went to London. As head of the office of the commander-in-chief, General Tadeusz Bór-Komorowski (July–November 1945), and chairman (until 1947) of the AK Historical Commission of the General Staff in London, Pełczyński was actively involved in fostering research on the history of World War II, and he supported the cultivation of the AK traditions. He was a co-founder and activist of the Polish Underground Movement's Study Trust (Studium Polski Podziemnej) and served as its chairman from 1956 to 1969. Pełczyński was decorated with the Cross of Valor (three times) and with the Order of Virtuti Militari. (PK)

PELŠE Arvīds (7 February 1899, Grīnvaldes, Courland–29 May 1983, Moscow), Soviet Communist activist of Latvian descent. Born into a peasant family, Pelše

graduated from a communal school and started polytechnic studies in Riga. In 1915 he joined the Social Democratic Workers' Party (Bolsheviks) of Latvia, acting within the All-Russian Bolshevik party. From 1915 he acted in the Bolshevik underground in Vitebsk, Kharkiv, Petrograd, and Arkhangelsk. In 1917 he became a member of the Petrograd Soviet. From 1918 Pelše worked for the Cheka in Moscow, and in early 1919 he was sent to Latvia as a member of the People's Commissariat of Construction and Public Works. After the failure of the Bolshevik revolution in Latvia Pelše was political commissar in the Latvian Riflemen's Division. From 1920 he lectured in military schools in Kharkiv and Leningrad. In 1926–29 he was secretary of the party committee of the Baltic Fleet. From 1929 he studied at the Academy of Red Professorship in Moscow, and in 1933–37 he worked in the party apparatus in Kazakhstan. During the Great Purge, in 1937 Pelše was deposed from all posts, but from the fall of 1937 he was allowed to return to Moscow and to lecture there. In the summer of 1940 he came to Latvia and co-organized its incorporation into the USSR. In 1941 he was appointed secretary of the Central Committee (CC) of the Communist Party of Latvia (CPL) for propaganda and agitation. After the German invasion (June 1941) Pelše left for Russia, but he returned in the same role after the reincorporation of Latvia into the USSR in the spring of 1945. After the so-called national Communists were deposed in 1959, Pelše became the head of the CPL. In this capacity he intensified Russification policies. He ruthlessly persecuted all those who showed signs of intellectual or national independence. In 1966 Pelše was recalled to Moscow, where he was appointed a member of the Politburo and head of the Central Party Control Commission of the CC CPSU. An impenitent hard-liner, he belonged to the closest co-workers of Leonid Brezhnev. In 1979 Pelše's Runu un rakstu izlase (Selection of speeches and articles) was published in Latvia. (EJ)

PENDERECKI Krzysztof (23 November 1933, Dębica), Polish composer, conductor, and pedagogue. Penderecki graduated from the State Higher Musical School (Państwowa Wyższa Szkoła Muzyczna [PWSM]) in Kraków in 1958. From 1958 he lectured at the PWSM, and in 1972 he became a professor at this school. Penderecki started his musical career with the vanguard works

Tren pamięci ofiar Hiroszimy (1960; Threnody for the Victims of Hiroshima), Anaklasis for strings and drums (written for the 1960 Donaueschinger Festival), and the First String Quartet (1960), in which he became known for an original style and enormous sound imagination. Penderecki gradually enriched his means of expression, reaching for rare kinds of works, such as Pasja według św. Łukasza (The Passion according to St. Luke; 1965) and the oratory Dies irae (1967), commemorating the victims of the Nazi concentration camp of Auschwitz. In 1969 Penderecki won world renown for the opera Diabły z Loudun (The devils of Loudun). In subsequent works, such as Magnificat (1974) and the opera Raj utracony (Paradise lost; 1978), he evolved toward the neo-Romanticism of Richard Wagner and Alexander Bruckner. Penderecki authored three symphonies; two cello concertos; concertos for violin and viola; the symphonic cycle De natura sonoris I–III (1966–70); and the operas Czarna maska (The black mask; 1986) and Ubu król (Ubu Rex; 1991). In his works he referred to the universal problems of human existence. Penderecki received a number of prestigious awards, including the German Johann Gottfried von Herder Preis (1977), the Artur Honegger Award (1979), the Jan Sibelius Award (1983), and the Grammy Award in 1988. He belongs among the most outstanding and the most often performed contemporary composers. In 1972–87 Penderecki was rector of the PWSM (renamed the Musical Academy [Akademia Muzyczna] in 1979) in Kraków. From the 1970s Penderecki was frequently a conductor in (among other places) Hamburg, Germany, and in 1987–90 he was artistic director of the Kraków Philharmonic. From 1973 to 1978 he lectured at Yale University. In 1980 he initiated a private music festival in his countryside residence in Lusławice. From 1994 Penderecki was a member of the Polish Academy of Arts and Sciences in Kraków. A presentation of his works was a part of the Kraków 2000 Festival. (WR)

PERL Feliks (26 April 1871, Warsaw–15 April 1927, Warsaw), journalist and politician, one of the leading ideologues of Polish socialism. Perl was brought up in a merchant family of Polonized Jews with Orthodox traditions. After graduating from a Russian high school, he studied law at Warsaw University and at Bern University in Switzerland, where in 1896 he received a Ph.D. in philosophy for the dissertation “Marx und Sismondi.” A member of the Proletariat Social Revolutionary Party, Perl attended the congress of the Polish Socialists (Paris, November 1892) at which the Union of Polish Socialists Abroad (Związek Zagraniczny Socjalistów Polskich [ZZSP]) was established. He became a member of the leadership (Centralizacja) of the ZZSP and held this position until December 1894. In 1898 Perl became active in the ZZSP section in Lemberg (Lwów, Lviv). After the ZZSP became incorporated into the Polish Socialist Party (Polska Partia Socjalistyczna [PPS]) in 1900, he became a member of the PPS Foreign Committee. In 1900–1901 Perl was in London. After returning home, he joined the underground publishing movement and was in charge of the clandestine printing house that published the journal Robotnik.

In 1902–4 Perl was a member of the PPS Central Workers’ Committee. After a split within the PPS in November 1906, he joined the PPS–Revolutionary Faction. He was a co-author of the agrarian program of the PPS that was adopted at the Tenth Congress of the party in 1907. From 1908 onwards Perl increasingly opposed Józef Piłsudski, whom he accused of abandoning the Socialist aims of the PPS. In 1911 Perl was finally expelled from the PPS–Revolutionary Faction. In December 1912 he was a co-founder of the PPS–Opposition, which existed until 1914. He then again joined the PPS and was a member (1914–19) of its Central Audit Commission. In 1918 he again began to edit Robotnik. A co-author of the PPS program of 1920 and a proponent of a pro-independence socialism and parliamentarism, Perl was a member of the PPS Supreme Council and Central Executive Committee from April 1919 until the end of his life (except for the years 1920–21) and chairman of the PPS Central Executive Committee from 1924 to 1926. Owing to deteriorating health, he gradually became less and less active. He treated Piłsudski’s plans for a coup with reserve. From 1919 to 1927 Perl was an MP and one of the leaders of the Union of Polish Socialist Deputies. Among Socialists, he was regarded as a representative of the “old” group and as one of its main ideologues. Perl’s publications include Kwestia polska w oświeceniu Socjaldemokracji Polskiej (The Polish question as seen by the Polish Social Democratic movement; 1906), in which he advocated that the PPS should give priority to national tasks; Dzieje ruchu socjalistycznego w zaborze rosyjskim (The history of the Socialist movement in the Russian part of Poland; 1910); and O bolszewizmie i bolszewikach (About Bolshevism and the Bolsheviks; 1918), in which he sharply criticized the Communist revolution. PEROUTKA Ferdinand (6 February 1895, Prague–20 April 1978, New York), Czech writer and political journalist. In 1914, after graduating from high school in Prague, Peroutka began working for the periodical Čas. From 1919 to 1924 he edited the daily Tribuna. From 1924 to 1939 he was in charge of the political and cultural periodical Přítomnost, and he was also a regular contributor to Lidové noviny. His was a lively and robust style, with a tendency toward irony, and he showed great perspicacity in his judgments. Peroutka generally supported the line of a political group called Hrad (Castle) and President Tomáš Garrigue Masaryk, and he was a member of the Friday Circle (Pátečníci), a group of intellectuals who met every Friday at the home of Karel Čapek, a close friend of Peroutka. Peroutka approached politics pragmatically, emphasizing the role of reason and experience and rejecting all manifestations of totalitarianism. He had close links to the Hrad group, but he often criticized the views of Masaryk and Edvard Beneš. During the interwar period Peroutka published several books, including Jací jsme (Who we are; 1924), an unfinished fundamental work on the beginnings of the Czechoslovak state; Budování státu (Building of the state, 5 vols.; 1933–38); and a collection of critical literary essays, Osobnost, chaos, a zlozvyky (Personality, chaos, and bad habits; 1939).

During World War II Peroutka was imprisoned in Nazi camps at Dachau and Buchenwald. He repeatedly rejected offers of collaboration from Emanuel Moravec and Karl H. Frank; for example, he refused the offer to edit Přítomnost, which they presented to him in 1943. After the war, Peroutka was the editor-in-chief of the daily Svobodné noviny (1945–48) and the periodical Dnešek (1946–48); the latter was a continuation of Přítomnost. In 1945–46 he was a National Socialist deputy in the Provisional National Assembly. Both in the parliament and in his press articles, Peroutka criticized the increasing totalitarian tendencies; as a result, he became the target of vicious Communist propaganda attacks. After the February 1948 coup and the Communist takeover, in April of that year Peroutka emigrated to England and in 1950 to the United States. From 1951 to 1955 he was a member of the Council of Free Czechoslovakia, and from 1951 to 1961 he was the director of the Czechoslovak section of Radio Free Europe, for which he wrote weekly political commentaries. After retiring in 1961, he continued his work with Radio Free Europe. Peroutka's postwar publications include Byl Edvard Beneš vinen? (Was Edvard Beneš guilty? 1949);

Demokratický manifest (Democratic manifesto; 1959); the dramas Oblak a valčík (A cloud and waltz; 1947) and “Šťastlivec Sulla” (Sulla the happy man; manuscript, 1947; its premiere in 1948 was called off for political reasons); and a historical fiction novel about the further life of Joan of Arc after she was miraculously saved, Pozdější život Panny (The later life of the maid; Toronto, 1980; Prague, 1991). Peroutka's memoirs from 1945–48 and from exile were published under the title Ferdinand Peroutka: Deníky, dopisy, vzpomínky (Ferdinand Peroutka: Diaries, letters, memoirs; 1995), and a selection of his radio speeches from the period between 1951 and 1977 was published as Úděl svobody (The fate of freedom; 1995). In 1991 Peroutka's ashes were returned to Prague. (PU)

PESHEV Dimitur (13 June 1894, Kyustendil–23 June 1975, Sofia), Bulgarian politician. The son of a lawyer, Peshev attended high school in Salonika and Kyustendil. From 1914 to 1919 he studied law at Sofia University. During World War I he fought on the southern front. He subsequently worked as a judge in Plovdiv and Sofia, and in 1932 he became a defense attorney. In November 1935 Peshev became minister of justice in the cabinet of Georgi Kioseivanov but was dismissed after half a year because he had appealed to Tsar Boris III to mitigate the sentence of Damian Velchev. From 1938 to 1940 Peshev was a member of parliament, and from 1940 to 1944 he was the parliament's deputy speaker. When in March 1943 a delegation from his native Kyustendil asked him for help to prevent a secretly prepared deportation of Jews from the newly incorporated territories and from the big cities, Peshev successfully intervened, organizing and collecting signatures in protest against the deportation of Jews. The government suspended the deportation orders, and then, as a result of further pressures, including those from the Orthodox Church, it called off the deportation action. Prime Minister Bogdan Filov, fearing the Germans, brought about Peshev's dismissal as deputy speaker of parliament. After the coup of 9 September 1944, Peshev was arrested and sentenced to a fifteen-year imprisonment. He avoided a death sentence only because of the intercession of an attorney of Jewish descent who emphasized Peshev's role in defending the Bulgarian Jews. Amnestied in October 1945 and released, Peshev lived in total isolation as one of five (out of a total of forty-seven) signatories of the “letter of Peshev” who had escaped death at the hands of the Communists. In the 1990s Peshev’s merits were again remembered, and his words were cited: “Small nations cannot underestimate moral values because these are their only capital.” (JW/WDj)

PÉTÉR Gábor (14 May 1906, Újfehértó–23 January 1993, Budapest), Hungarian Communist activist. Péter worked as a tailor’s assistant, and in 1931 he joined the illegal Communist Party. He took part in the activities of the Red Aid in Hungary and worked in the trade unions. From January 1945 he was head of the Political Department of the General Headquarters of the Hungarian People’s Militia in Budapest and then of the separate Office of State Protection. From 1948 he was head of the newly created Office of State Security (Államvédelmi Hatóság [ÁVH]), which had a few thousand permanent employees and around three hundred thousand part-time workers. Formally, the office was subordinated to the Ministry of Interior, but Péter was subordinated only to Mátyás Rákosi, to whom he was obligated to report on his activities. Thus in fact it was Rákosi himself who headed the ÁVH. However, Péter played a key role in preparing the show trials (for example, the trial of László Rajk) and in breaking the law; he was co-responsible for torture, murders without trial, executions, and sentencing of a few hundred political prisoners, including Communists, to long prison terms. At the end of 1952 Péter was dismissed from his post and expelled from the party. On 3 January 1953 he was arrested as a scapegoat for all Stalinist crimes in Hungary. In 1954 the Military Supreme Court sentenced him to life imprisonment. In 1957 the Military Council of the Supreme Court revised this judgment, and sentenced him to fourteen years of prison. In January 1959 Péter was released on pardon. Until his retirement he worked as a librarian. He died in his own flat in one of the urban blocks of flats in Budapest. From the time of his release until his death, no one called Péter to further account for his crimes. (JT)

PETER I Karadjordjević (also spelled Karageorgevic) (11 July 1844, Belgrade–16 August 1921, Topčider), king of Serbia and king of the Kingdom of Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes. In 1858 Peter’s father, Prince Alexander Karadjordjević, was forced to abdicate, and Peter lived with him in exile for forty-five years, at first in Hungary, then in France. He was educated mainly at military schools. In 1862 he entered a prestigious school in Saint-Cyr and continued his education at the Artillery School in Metz. In 1870, fighting on the side of the French in the war against the Germans, he was taken captive but managed to escape. In 1875 in Herzegovina Peter, under the pseudonym of Piotr Mrkonjić, commanded a group of Serb insurgents fighting against Turkish rule. In 1883 he became an honorary senator in Montenegro. The same year he married Zorka, the daughter of Prince Nicholas of Montenegro. Peter lived with his wife and children in Geneva. After a coup d’état organized by a group of officers and the assassination of the king of Serbia, Alexander Obrenović, on 29 May 1903 the army proclaimed Peter the new monarch. During his reign the parliamentary system developed in Serbia. Peter had the reputation of a liberal with no absolutist leanings. In foreign policy Serbia abandoned the pro-Viennese policy of Obrenović and hence improved its relations with Russia and France. On 24 June 1914 Peter named his son, Prince Alexander, regent. During World War I, after the defeat of the Serb forces by the Central Powers, Peter, who was severely ill, went to Corfu in the winter of 1915–16. At the end of the war he returned to Belgrade, and on 1 December 1918 he was proclaimed king of the Kingdom of Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes. (AO)

PETER II Karadjordjević (also spelled Karageorgevic) (6 September 1923, Belgrade–5 November 1970, Los Angeles, California), king of Yugoslavia. Peter was the son of King Alexander I and Mary, the daughter of Ferdinand, king of Romania. After the death of Peter’s father, who was assassinated in October 1934 in Marseilles, Peter formally succeeded to the throne. However, the regency was in the hands of a three-person council, headed by his father’s cousin, Prince Paul Karadjordjević. Paul’s conciliatory policy toward the Axis powers led to Yugoslavia’s accession to the Tripartite Pact and in consequence to a coup that on 27 March 1941 overthrew the existing government. A group of officers and politicians headed by General Dušan Simović declared Peter of age and proclaimed him king.

The coup led to the German invasion, partition, and occupation of a great part of Yugoslavia. Peter received verbal support from Great Britain and the United States, whose governments called the German attack “barbarity” and a “vicious rape.” Evacuated by the British Navy, in June 1941 Peter arrived in London, where he formed an émigré government. The Serb-dominated Yugoslav National Army of Colonel Dragoljub (Draža) Mihailović was the exponent of this government at home. In June 1942 Peter visited the United States, where he was warmly welcomed by President Franklin D. Roosevelt, who promised him diplomatic and military assistance.

Despite the fact that on 1 December 1942 Peter promulgated a declaration of equality for all citizens of Yugoslavia, the émigré government was undermined by political and ethnic conflicts between the Serbs and the Croats. This weakened the position of this government in the eyes of the Allies. Under Peter’s pressure, the government accepted a programmatic declaration announcing the revival of the state along the principles of democracy and federation. On 28 June 1943 Peter announced this declaration in a speech to the nation on the BBC. In August 1943 the royal government lost its coalition nature after Peter appointed Božidar Purić its head. Although Peter sought material support for the Chetniks headed by Mihailović, Great Britain and the United States, suspecting the revival of Serb nationalism among the Chetniks, more and more clearly shifted their support to the Communist Partisans of Josip Broz Tito, as the Partisans more and more actively frustrated the German forces in Yugoslavia.

In October 1943 Peter arrived with his government in Cairo, preparing for his return to Yugoslavia. In November 1943 the Communists, who controlled large parts of the country and fought with the Chetniks, created their own government and denied Peter the right to return. At the end of November in Cairo, Peter talked with Roosevelt, who promised him help in reaching an agreement with the Communists. However, in Tehran at the beginning of December 1943, the Big Three decided to abandon the Balkan offensive, and this additionally weakened Peter’s position and that of his government. As he was losing the support of the Allies, Peter attempted to bring about a compromise with the Communists. In June 1944 he appointed the more conciliatory Ivan Šubašić as head of a new cabinet. On 1 November 1944 Šubašić signed an agreement with Tito under which, in return for the Communist government’s inclusion of several émigré politicians in the government and vague promises to observe human rights, Peter agreed not to return to Yugoslavia without the consent of “the people” and to recognize the Communist-dominated Anti-

Fascist Council for the National Liberation of Yugoslavia (AVNOJ) as the provisional parliament. On 13 February 1945 Peter agreed to Šubašić’s departure for Belgrade and at the same time appointed Milan Grol and Juraj Šutej as provisional regents. Since Tito did not agree to these appointments to the Regency Council, Peter withdrew them and appointed men who would be acceptable to the Communist leader: Srdjan Budislavljević, Ante Mandić, and Dušan Sernec. When the AVNOJ objected to the return of the king, Tito adopted its decision as the expression of “the will of the people.” On 29 November 1945 the National Assembly, which was elected under great pressure from the Communists, finally abolished the monarchy. Peter, who was leaning toward federalism and democracy, and even toward tactical compromises with the Communists, got sidelined. After the war he lived mainly in France, and later he moved to the United States, where in 1967 he became an official at the Sterling Savings and Loan Association of California. By his marriage with Alexandra, the daughter of the Greek king, Peter left a son, Alexander. (WR)

PETERLE Lojze (5 July 1948, Cužnja vas), Slovene politician. Peterle studied history, geography, and economics. He graduated in the latter two, and in 1975–86 he worked at the Slovene Institute of Town Planning. He belonged to the Catholic intelligentsia connected with the periodical 2000. In 1989 he co-organized the Slovenian Christian Democrats (Slovenski Krščanski Demokrati [SCD]) and became its chairman. As a result of the electoral victory of the DEMOS coalition, which included the SCD, on 16 May 1990 Peterle became head of the republican government of Slovenia. Initially he favored a Slovene-Croat union within the Yugoslav federation, but the pressure from Serb nationalists under Slobodan Milošević made Peterle and other Slovene leaders seek a separate road to independence. On 2 July 1990 Peterle’s government announced the sovereignty of the Slovene republic, and in a referendum on 23 December 1990 most Slovenes voted in favor of independence. When talks on a confederation of Yugoslav republics failed, on 25 June 1991 the Peterle government announced independence, and the next day it was followed by a similar announcement from the Croat government. The Serb-dominated Yugoslav federal army tried to prevent the secession of Slovenia, but fifty thousand of its territorial defense soldiers managed to defend the country.

After the consolidation of independence, the ruling DEMOS coalition was fractured. In April 1992 Janez Drnovšek, the leader of the Liberal Democracy of Slovenia (Liberalna Demokracija Slovenije [LDS]), which emerged from a former Communist youth organization, created a new majority coalition, so on 14 May 1992 Peterle resigned. As a result of the December 1992 elections the SCD, led by Peterle, became the second largest parliamentary faction and joined a new ruling coalition. From December 1992 to October 1994 Peterle was minister of foreign affairs in the government of Drnovšek. For some time he was deputy chairman of the European Association of Christian Democrats. He gave up his ministerial position when his party went into the opposition. In the elections of November 1996 the SCD did not do as well, and in April 2000 it merged with the Slovenian People's Party (Slovenska Ljudska Stranka [SLS]) to form the SCD-SLS. In the elections of October 2000 this party won 9.6 percent of the vote, and Peterle won a parliamentary seat for himself. In June 2004 Peterle was elected a member of the European Parliament. (WR)

PETERSS Jēkabs (Jakov) (3 December 1886, Briņķu, Courland–25 April 1938, Moscow), Soviet Communist activist of Latvian descent. In his youth Peterss was an active member of Social Democratic parties in Libau (Liepāja). In 1904 he joined the Social Democratic Workers' Party of Latvia. He fought in the 1905 revolution. Arrested in March 1907, he was tortured during interrogation, but in September 1908 he was released for lack of evidence of his guilt. From 1909 to 1917 Peters was in political exile in London, where he was active among Latvian Social Democrats and British Socialists. After the February 1917 revolution, he returned to Russia, where in the summer of that year he became a representative of the Latvian Social Democratic Party's Bolshevik wing to the Central Committee (CC) of the Bolshevik party. As a member of the Military Revolutionary Committee, Peterss took part in the attack on the Smolny Institute and arrested some members of the Provisional Government during the November 1917 coup in Petrograd. A member of the Central Executive Committee, he became a member of the Presidium of the

All-Russian Extraordinary Commission for Combating Counterrevolution and Sabotage (Cheka) on 20 December 1917 and subsequently president of the Revolutionary Tribunal and a deputy to Feliks Dzerzhinsky, the head of the Cheka. In this role Peterss personally implemented the principle of revolutionary terror and murdered opponents of the revolution and rivals of the Bolsheviks. For example, he personally supervised the investigation of an assassination attempt on Lenin in August 1918. In 1919 he was commander of the Revolutionary War Council for the Petrograd region and later for the Kiev and Tula regions. In 1920 Peterss became Cheka plenipotentiary for the Northern Caucasus railroads and chairman of the Revolutionary War Committee in Rostov-on-Don. In 1920 he became a member of the Organizational Bureau of the CC of the party in Turkestan and subsequently a member of the Presidium and chairman of the Eastern Department of the political police, OGPU, in Moscow. In 1927 Peterss became a deputy member, and in 1930 a member, of the CC of the All-Union Communist Party (Bolsheviks). From 1924 to 1930 he worked in the People's Commissariat of Workers' and Peasants' Inspection of the Soviet Union. From 1930 to 1933 he was chairman of the Party Central Control Commission of the Moscow committee. In 1934 he became a member of the Party Central Control Commission of the All-Union Communist Party (Bolsheviks). Peterss was arrested and murdered during the Great Purge. The year 1942 is also given as the date of his death. (EJ)

PETKOV Dimitur (21 October 1858, Bashkoy, Northern Dobrudja–26 February 1907, Sofia), Bulgarian politician, father of Nikola Petkov and Petko Petkov. Petkov fought in the Serbo-Turkish war in 1876 and in the Russo-Turkish war of 1877–78. He distinguished himself in the battles of Stara Zagora and Shipka Pass. On the Mountain of St. Nikola he was seriously wounded in the left hand, which had to be amputated. The Russian tsar, Alexander II, personally decorated Petkov with the Cross of Merit. After the liberation of Bulgaria, Petkov worked as a clerk in the Department of the Interior (1878–82). Initially he belonged to the Liberal Party; after a split in its ranks in 1883, he supported the extremely leftist faction represented by Petko Karavelov. Petkov opposed the coup of April 1881 and the system of plenary powers introduced by Prince Alexander I Battenberg; as a result, in 1882 he was sentenced to life imprisonment and placed in one of the mosques. Released in 1884, he edited the satirical-humorous newspaper Svirka (1883–85) and other periodicals, including Narodno subranie (1885) and Nezavisimost (1885).

After leaving the Liberal Party in 1886, Petkov joined the newly established National Liberal Party (NLP) and edited its press organ, Svoboda. After the government of Stefan Stambolov was established, Petkov became mayor of Sofia (1887–93) and brought about its transformation into a city with a European character. Petkov served as a deputy to the National Assembly in 1884–94 and 1899–1907 and as chairman of the Grand National Assembly in 1892–93. From 1893 to 1894 Petkov was minister of public housing, roads, and transport. After the death of Stambolov in 1895, Petkov, who was Stambolov's closest co-worker, became NLP head. From May 1903 to October 1906 Petkov was minister of interior and minister of public housing, roads, and transport in the government of Racho Petrov. On 22 October 1906 he was appointed prime minister and minister of interior, and he continued as minister of public housing, roads, and transport. Petkov followed a pro-Western policy, in particular seeking rapprochement with Germany and Austria-Hungary. In domestic policy he used terror against political opponents. For example, in January 1907 he ordered that Sofia University be closed for half a year after students had booed Prince Ferdinand before the National Theater in Sofia. Petkov was shot by a political opponent near Eagle Bridge in Sofia. (JJ)

PETKOV Nikola (21 July 1893, Sofia–23 September 1947, Sofia), Bulgarian politician. The son of Dimitur Petkov and brother of Petko Petkov, in 1922 Petkov completed law studies in Paris. He fought in the Balkan Wars (1912–13) and in World War I. Later he worked in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs and served as secretary at the legation in Paris. He was dismissed from this post after the coup of 6 June 1923, in which the government of Aleksandur Stamboliyski was overthrown. In 1923, under the influence of his brother, Petkov joined the Bulgarian Agrarian National Union (Bŭlgarski Zemedelski Naroden Sŭyuz [BANU]). Until 1929 he lived in France, where he was active as a politician and journalist. Petkov worked with Georgi “Gemeto” Dimitrov, Aleksandur Obbov, and other politicians. He edited the periodical Narodna vola. In France he became a strong supporter of democracy. After returning to Bulgaria, Petkov took part in the shaping of the ideological direction of the BANU–Pladne and in the establishment of the Aleksandur Stamboliyski BANU. From 1931 to 1932 he edited the newspaper Zemlya. He served as a member of the BANU Standing Committee and edited a BANU press organ, Zemedelsko zname (1932–33, 1944). After the coup of May 1934, Petkov was in opposition to the authoritarian rule. He became a member of the BANU–Vrabcha 1 and joined a nonparty alliance called Petorkata (Five), which sought to restore constitutional rule. Petkov maintained contacts with all factions of the peasant movement but established the closest ties with the faction led by “Gemeto” Dimitrov. Elected to the National Assembly in 1938, Petkov was deprived of his parliamentary immunity for his part in the drafting of an appeal to Tsar Boris III in which the authoritarian system of government was criticized. In December 1938 Petkov was interned in Ivaylovgrad. At the beginning of 1939 he unsuccessfully attempted to organize a “people’s front” consisting of the BANU, the Zveno group, and the Communists.

During World War II Petkov was persecuted for his criticism of authoritarian rule, the pro-German policies of Boris III, and the governments that were obedient to the tsar. Sent to the concentration camp of Gonda Voda, near Asenovgrad (December 1940–June 1941), he worked on the construction of a road in the mountains, along with the Communists Todor Pavlov, Anton Yugov, and other prisoners. After his release, Petkov wrote an open letter to Tsar Boris in which he condemned the pro-German policy implemented by the tsar and the government, as well as the terror instigated against their political opponents. In the autumn of 1941 Petkov came to the conclusion that Bulgaria's peasant and workers' parties, including the Communist Party, should cooperate after the war. He maintained contacts with activists of the opposition parties and organized assistance for people who were persecuted, including the Communists. He co-founded the Fatherland Front (FF) and represented this party in the FF National Committee (August 1943). However, Petkov remained an opponent of military struggle, which was preferred by the Communists. Again interned in the Gonda Voda concentration camp, in early 1944 Petkov was deported to Svishtovo, where, along with twelve other opposition leaders, on 7 July 1944 he signed a petition to the regents and to the government demanding fundamental changes in foreign policy and calling for Bulgaria's withdrawal from the war on the side of Germany, rapprochement with the Soviet Union, and the establishment of a constitutional people's government. Petkov refused to join the government of Konstantin Muraviev.

Petkov took part in secret preparations for the takeover of power by the FF (9 September 1944). After the coup, he became minister without portfolio in the government of Kimon Georgiev (September 1944–July 1945). Petkov was a member of the Bulgarian delegation that signed an armistice treaty with the United States, Great Britain, and the Soviet Union in Moscow on 28 October 1944. From January to July 1945 he was the BANU secretary general, and from March to July 1945 he was a member of the FF National Committee. On 30 July 1945 Petkov left the government in protest against a limitation of the BANU's role in governing the country, and he founded an opposition party, the Bulgarian Agrarian National Union–Nikola Petkov (BANU–Nikola Petkov). He was an editor of the opposition newspaper Narodno zemedelsko zname (1945–47). From July 1945 to June 1947 he was the leader not only of the BANU, but also of the entire anti-Communist opposition. As deputy to the Grand National Assembly (1946–47), Petkov led the struggle against the Communist dictatorship and fought for the rule of law and respect for democratic principles.

On 28 May 1947 Minister of Interior Yugov informed Prime Minister Georgi Dimitrov that materials had been compiled that incriminated Petkov. On 5 June 1947 the Grand National Assembly deprived Petkov of his parliamentary immunity, and then he was arrested in the sessions hall. In a rigged political trial (5–16 August 1947) Petkov was sentenced to death by hanging for allegedly preparing a coup d'état. After his sentence was announced, Petkov sent letters to Prime Minister Dimitrov, President Vasil Kolarov, and the Soviet minister plenipotentiary, Stepan Kirsanov, asking for a pardon. These letters did not satisfy the Communist leaders because they could not be used as a basis to fully discredit Petkov, who, although admitting that his opposition activities had been erroneous, acted in a dignified way. Thus on 16 September 1947 the Supreme Court of Appeals rejected Petkov's plea for a pardon, and Kolarov did not use his right to grant mercy. The sentence was carried out. Petkov was buried in a cemetery in Sofia, and later his body was taken to an unknown place. On 15 January 1990 he was posthumously rehabilitated. In July 1993 in Sofia a bust of Petkov was unveiled, and in February 1998 the Bulgarian Supreme Court of Appeals quashed the sentence of 1947. Petkov's publications include Aleksandur Stamboliyski: Lichnost i idei (Aleksandur Stamboliyski: Personality and ideas; 1930). (JJ)

PETKOV Petko (4 May 1891, Sofia–14 June 1924, Sofia), Bulgarian politician and diplomat. Petkov was the son of Dimitur Petkov, a well-known national-liberal politician. In 1912 he graduated in law and political science from the Sorbonne, Paris. He subsequently volunteered to serve in the army and fought in the Balkan Wars (1912–13). Promoted to officer, he then fought in World War I. In 1920 he became secretary at the legation in Paris and was a member of the Bulgarian delegation to a conference in Genoa. In 1922 Petkov became head of the political department of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, and later he was appointed secretary general of this ministry. He owed his promotion to his career in the Bulgarian Agrarian National Union (Bulgarski Zemedelski Narodni Sayuz [BANU]), led by Aleksandur Stamboliyski. Petkov was the BANU's main authority on constitutional issues. After the coup of 9 June 1923 and the overthrow of Stamboliyski's government, Petkov was briefly detained. In the elections of November 1923 he was elected to the National Assembly. At that time he published extensively in Zashtita and Zemedelska Zashtita. Petkov was a member of the BANU left wing, which called for the establishment of a common front with the Communists. Petkov was shot by his political opponents on a street in Sofia. His funeral in Sofia became an occasion for a demonstration by the left wing. (AG)

PETKUS Viktoras (30 December 1929, Aleksandrai, near Raseiniai), Lithuanian activist of the democratic opposition. Petkus graduated from a technical high school. Arrested for the first time in 1947, he escaped from prison but was caught by the Soviet security forces in 1948 and sentenced to ten years of labor camp for taking part in a Catholic organization, Ateitis (Future), which opposed the incorporation of Lithuania into the USSR. Released in 1953, in 1954 Petkus started literary studies at the University of Vilnius. In 1957 he was expelled from the university and arrested again. In mid-July 1958 he was sentenced to eight years of labor camp for possessing illegal literature. He served in the Tayshet camps near Irkutsk, in Mordvinian camps, and in Vladimir Prison. Released in December 1965, Petkus restarted his studies in Lithuanian history and literature. Expelled from the university, he worked as a blue-collar laborer in a hospital. In December 1975 he was arrested in connection with the publication of the underground periodical, "Chronicle of the Catholic Church in Lithuania" and with protests against the trial of Sergey Kovalyov in Vilnius. After his release, in November 1976, along with Tomas Venclova, Reverend Karolis Garuckas, and Eitanas Finkelsteinas, Petkus organized the Lithuanian Helsinki Group. He was arrested again in August 1977 and sentenced to ten years in camp and five years in exile in July 1978. While in the camp, Petkus joined the Ukrainian Helsinki Group. In 1985 he was suggested as a candidate for the Nobel Peace Prize. After his release, in May 1988 Petkus returned to Lithuania, and, along with Nijole Sadūnaitė and Antanas Terleckas, he started the official activities of the League of Lithuanian Freedom (Lietuvos Laisves Lyga), an organization started secretly in the late 1970s. During the elections to the Lithuanian Supreme Council in February 1990, in which the Lithuanian Movement for Reconstruction (Sąjūdis) won, Petkus had doubts about the freedom of choice and about the Sąjūdis itself. He joined the Lithuanian Christian Democratic Party (Lietuvos Krikščionių Demokratų Partija [LKDP]). Happy with Latvia's regained freedom, Petkus was disappointed by the dominant role of the post-Communists and by the social problems during the transition. Petkus belonged to the LKDP Council and was an honorary chairman of the Lithuanian Association of Human Rights. (WR)

PETLURA Symon (10 May 1879, Poltava–25 May 1926, Paris), Ukrainian politician and commander-in-chief of the Ukrainian Army. Born into a lower-middle-class family with Cossack traditions, Petlura did not complete his education because of his political activities. In 1901 he was expelled from the Poltava Theological Seminary, where he was in his last year, and was forbidden to reenter the university. In 1900 he became active in the Revolutionary Ukrainian Party (RUP), and in 1905 he joined the Ukrainian Social Democratic Workers' Party (USDWP), the successor of the RUP. He represented the party group that sought the establishment of an autonomous Ukrainian state within the framework of the future Russian federation. In 1908 Petlura joined the Society of Ukrainian Progressives. During World War I he was active in the Union of Zemstvos, an aid organization to the wounded and civilians. After the outbreak of the February Revolution of 1917, as a delegate of the Ukrainian Military Committee of the Western Front, Petlura attended the First Ukrainian Military Congress in May 1917 in Kiev. He became head of the General Military Committee, which was established by the Congress. The General Military Committee endeavored to establish Ukrainian military units within the framework of the Russian Army. Later, Petlura directed sessions of the Second Congress (June 1917) at which a resolution claiming autonomy for the Ukraine was passed. Subsequently he was appointed to the first Ukrainian government, the General Secretariat, as secretary for military affairs. His efforts led to the establishment of the rudiments of a national army in the form of the First and Second Corps. After the seizure of power by the Bolsheviks, Petlura expressed support for the independence of the Ukraine, and he favored a pro-French orientation. As a result, he fell into conflict with members of the Ukrainian Central Rada (Council) who chose a pro-German option, and consequently he lost his post in December 1917.

Commanding his own units at the beginning of February 1918, Petlura greatly contributed to the seizure of the Kiev Arsenal from the Red Army. Under the rule of the Germans and Hetman Pavlo Skoropadskyi, Petlura organized opposition activities, for which he was arrested (July–November 1918). Despite protests by President Volodymyr Vynnychenko, in November 1918, as chief ataman (i.e., commander-in-chief of the army), Petlura joined the staff that was preparing an anti-hetman coup. After the overthrow of the hetman on 14 December 1918, Petlura faced the very difficult task of imposing discipline in various military units. A wave of anti-Semitic pogroms was perpetrated by soldiers of various formations (including Bolshevik troops and Denikin's) throughout the Ukraine, but the responsibility for these acts was attributed to Petlura. Measures counteracting the anarchy had limited effect. On 11 February 1919 Petlura replaced Vynnychenko, who was inclined to negotiate with the Bolsheviks, as president of the Directorate. This step was taken to gain the French as allies, but it failed because the Entente powers supported General Anton Denikin and did not trust the Ukrainian National Republic (UNR) because of its Socialist character and because of the pogroms. After the capture of Kiev by the Bolsheviks in February 1919, Petlura concentrated his units in Vynnytsa and sought contacts with the newly formed Polish state. Poland's recognition of the UNR and military aid were offered only in exchange for acceding to the Polish claims to Eastern Galicia and Western Volhynia. The negotiations with Poland strained Petlura's relations with the government of the Western Ukrainian National Republic (WUNR) in Eastern Galicia, right after the formal unification of the WUNR with the UNR on 22 January 1919. As a result, the union of the two republics disintegrated.

The successes of the Russian Whites and then of the Bolsheviks, who in the winter of 1920 seized the Ukraine, forced Petlura to even closer cooperation with Poland, especially when his army lost its fighting value after guerrilla activities in the rear of the Denikin army (the so-called first winter march, November–December 1919). The final Treaty of Alliance with Poland was signed on 21 April 1920. Consequently, combined Polish and Ukrainian forces launched a successful offensive on Kiev, which was seized on 8 May 1920. Petlura entered the capital ceremoniously, but as a result of the Soviet counteroffensive on 11 June it was already occupied by the Red Army. Petlura's forces remained faithful to Poland during the further war against Bolshevik Russia, but Poland gave up the defense of Ukrainian interests at the final peace negotiations with the Bolsheviks (October 1920–March 1921). Launching an attack by his units, Petlura undertook one more desperate attempt to instigate an anti-Bolshevik uprising in the Ukraine in November 1920. After the failure of the uprising, Poland reduced its contribution to granting political asylum and modest material help for the UNR authorities. Petlura tried to sustain the UNR's activities in Tarnów and Warsaw, but political conflicts in the emigrant community, as well as the pressure from Soviet authorities on Poland, resulted in the loss of the official standing of the UNR.

Finally, Petlura decided to move the UNR's state center to Paris, where he arrived in the spring of 1924. His sudden death at the hands of Samuel Schwartzbard, a Jewish émigré from the Ukraine, put an end to his efforts to integrate the Ukrainian diaspora. The assassin justified his deed as an act of revenge for the deaths of tens of thousands of Jews who had fallen victims to the pogroms carried out by Petlura's soldiers. In the atmosphere created by the French media the court acknowledged the moral rights of the killer and acquitted him. Many scholars in exile allege that there was a link between Schwartzbard and Soviet special services, but the allegations have not been proved thus far. Two volumes of Petlura's Statti, listi, dokumenti (Speeches, letters, and documents) were published in New York in 1956 and 1979 and Statti (Speeches) in Kiev in 1993. (TS)

PETRESCU Constantin (Titel) (17 July 1888, Craiova–September 1957, Sighet), Romanian lawyer and politician. Petrescu studied at the School of Law of Bucharest University from 1906 to 1910. In his youth he became an activist in the Social Democratic Party of Romania (Partidul Social-Democrat din România [PSDR]), which played an important role in Romanian political life. Petrescu's views were close to syndicalism. He was also active in the trade union movement. From 1927 to 1938 he served as secretary of the PSDR, which was disbanded in February 1938, like all political parties in Romania after King Charles II established a royal dictatorship. Later Petrescu participated in a plot against General Ion Antonescu. On 20 June 1944 he signed an agreement among the liberals, Peasant Party members, Social Democrats, and Communists, as a result of which the National Democratic Bloc was formed.

After the coup d'état of 23 August 1944, Petrescu became head of the PSDR. He reorganized this party and attempted to implement a political course that was independent of the Communists. From 23 August to 6 December 1944 he was minister without portfolio in the government of General Constantin Sănătescu. In February 1945 the PSDR supported the Communist-dominated government of Petru Groza. At the end of 1945 Petrescu still had a majority in the party leadership, but gradually the crypto-Communists and their supporters took over control of the PSDR. When on 10 March 1946, at a congress of Socialists, the majority of delegates supported the PSDR's participation in an electoral bloc with the Communists, Petrescu and a group of his supporters left the party and founded the Independent Social Democratic Party. In the rigged elections of November 1946 Petrescu's party did not obtain any seats in parliament. Petrescu opposed Communist domination, Soviet military occupation, and the terror perpetrated under Groza's rule. In May 1948, soon after the PSDR was forcibly merged with the Communist Party, Petrescu was arrested. In January 1952, after many years of investigation, he was sentenced to life imprisonment as a “traitor” and “enemy of the unity of the working class.” In December 1954 the minister of interior, Alexandru Drăghici, offered Petrescu freedom in exchange for his writing an open letter supporting the regime. Petrescu demanded that several other imprisoned Socialists also be released. As the authorities promised to meet this demand, Petrescu wrote the letter, which was published in the newspaper Scîntea on 18 December 1955, but the promised releases did not take place. Petrescu died in a prison for political prisoners in Sighet. He was the author of Socialismul în România 1835–6 septembrie 1940 (Socialism in Romania, 1835–6 September 1940; 1940). (FA/TD)

PETRESCU-COMNEN Nicolae (24 August 1881, Bucharest–17 October 1949, Rome), Romanian lawyer, journalist, and diplomat. Petrescu-Comnen studied law in Paris, earning a doctorate in 1905. From 1902 to 1916 he worked as an attorney and lecturer at the School of Law of the University of Bucharest. After the end of World War I, he entered the diplomatic service. In 1919 he was a member of the Romanian delegation to the Paris Peace Conference, where he dealt with the issue of Dobruđa. From 1922 to 1929 he represented Romania at successive conferences in Geneva, where he worked as a minister plenipotentiary at the League of Nations from 1923 to 1928. From 1928 to 1938 he also served in the same rank at embassies in Germany (1928–31, 1933–38) and the Holy See (1931–33). After the 1938 royal coup d’état, he served as minister of foreign affairs (March 1938–December 1938). During the Czechoslovak crisis Petrescu-Comnen took a neutral position, fearing that Soviet support for Czechoslovakia might lead to a war on Romanian territory. In October 1938, shortly after the Munich agreement, King Charles II and Petrescu-Comnen met with the Polish minister of foreign affairs, Józef Beck. Romania rejected Poland’s proposal that Romania take part in the occupation of the Czechoslovak part of Subcarpathian Ruthenia. From 1939 to 1940 Petrescu-Comnen again represented Romania at the Holy See. On 15 October 1940 he was dismissed from the diplomatic service for a statement criticizing the Iron Guard and General Ion

Antonescu. From 1940 until the end of his life Petrescu-Comnen lived in exile in Italy. Petrescu-Comnen was the author of numerous works in the field of contemporary international politics, including the following: La revendication de la nationalité roumaine (1918); The Roumanian Question in Transylvania and Hungary (1920); Anarchie, dictature ou organisation internationale (1946); Preludi del grande dramma (A prelude to the great drama; 1947); I Responsabili (The responsible; 1949); and “Campania românească din 1919 din Ungaria. Amintiri și documente inedite” (The Romanian campaign of 1919 in Hungary: Unpublished memoirs and documents, in Revista Istorică, nos. 5–6, 1992). (FA/TD)

PETRI György (22 December 1943, Budapest–16 July 2000, Budapest), Hungarian poet and journalist. After graduating from high school in 1962, Petri took various odd jobs, mainly in sanatoriums and psychotherapeutic centers. In 1966 he took up philosophical studies at the University of Budapest but failed to complete them. In 1971 he published his first volume of poetry, Magyarázatok M. számára (Explanations for M.), which reflected the slogans of the European “new left wing” of that time. The next collection, Körülírt zuhanás (Circumscribed Fall; 1974), included poems with a similar message, written from the perspective of somebody who was rejected and misunderstood by those around him. Because of his activities in the democratic opposition, from the mid-1970s on Petri could publish only in samizdat periodicals and abroad. His collection of politically committed poems, Örökhétfő (1981; Eternal Monday, 1999), was also published underground. Nihilistic and blasphemous poems were another characteristic strand in Petri’s writing of that period. From 1981 to 1989 Petri edited Beszélő, the most important periodical of the democratic opposition in Hungary at that time. In 1989 he became a member of the editorial council of the literary periodical Holmi. He was a founding member of the Alliance of Free Democrats. In the poetry written in the 1990s, Petri remained faithful to his manner of poetic articulation, which included commentaries on political events. (MS)

PETRONIJEVIĆ Branislav (25 March 1875, Sovljak kod Uba–4 March 1954, Belgrade), Serbian philosopher and paleontologist. After graduating from a gymnasium in Valjevo, Petronijević studied philosophy at the University of Leipzig, earning a doctorate in 1898. In the same year he became an associate professor at the Superior School (Velika Škola) in Belgrade, and in 1903 he became a professor there. When in 1905 the Velika Škola was transformed into the University of Belgrade, Petronijević became an associate professor and in 1919 a full professor. During World War I Petronijević was in London, where he conducted research in the natural sciences. In 1920 he became a full member of the Serbian Academy of Sciences. Petronijević's philosophy was a synthesis of classical English empiricism and German rationalism. In metaphysics he aimed at harmonizing the monism of Baruch Spinoza and the idealism of Gottfried Wilhelm Leibnitz. He presented the world as a set of points of being, quality, and will. He significantly contributed to the development of discontinuous geometry. Petronijević's main works are the following: Der ontologische Beweis für das Dasein des Absoluten (1897); Prinzipien der Erkenntnislehre (1900); Prinzipien der Metaphysik (2 vols.; 1904–11); Die typische Geometrien und das Unendliche (1907); and Istorija moderne filozofije (History of modern philosophy; 1922). In paleontology Petronijević became famous for his research on the archaeopteryx. (WR)

PETROVIĆ Rastko (16 May 1898, Belgrade–15 August 1949, Washington, D.C.), Serbian writer. Petrović's father was a clerk and his mother a painter. During World War I, as a seventeen-year-old high school student, Petrović took part in the heroic retreat of the Serbian Army over the Albanian mountains. He later completed law studies in France, where he established contacts with the artistic elite of that period, including Pablo Picasso, André Breton, and Paul Eluard. In 1923 Petrović began working in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs in Belgrade, from 1926 to 1928 he was at a diplomatic mission in Rome, and in 1935 he was sent to the United States, where he remained after the end of World War II. Petrović made his literary debut during World War I and became famous as the author of the novel Burleska gospodina Peruna boga groma (The burlesque of Lord Perun, the god of thunder; 1921) and the poetry volume Otkrovenja (Revelation; 1922). In these works Petrović expressed his joy with the richness of the world and life, and he sought inspiration from Slavic traditions. Petrović was influenced by the psychoanalytic school, Serbian native folklore, and exotic cultures. In 1928 he traveled to Africa, which inspired him to write the travel book Afrika (Africa; 1930). An enthusiastic traveler, he also visited other Balkan countries, Spain, Italy, Turkey, and Libya. His travels to Spain resulted in the story "Ljudi govore" (People talk; 1931). Petrović's poetic ecstasy over travel resulted from his interest in the world and a sense of the world's unity. His concept of a full life included, in his interpretation, both happiness and success, as well as suffering. In the 1930s Petrović began writing Dan šesti (The sixth day; 1961), a vast novel that came out after his death. In 1964 his Izabrana dela (Selected works) were published. (WR) PETRUSHEVYCH Yevhen (3 June 1863, Busko–20 August 1940, Berlin), Ukrainian lawyer and politician. Petrushevych was educated at a secondary school and the university in Lviv (Lwów). He was chairman of the Academic Fraternity. In 1896 he began working as a lawyer, first in Sokal and, in 1910, in Skole. From 1907 to 1918 he was a member of the Austrian parliament of the Sokal-Radechów-Brody constituency, and from 1910 to 1914 he was a member of the Galician Sejm (parliament). Petrushevych was deputy president of the Ukrainian Parliamentary Club in Lviv and, from 1910, deputy president of the Ukrainian Parliamentary Representation in Vienna. He represented the Ukrainian National Democratic Party and for many years was one of its leaders. An opponent of opportunism, he advocated that the Ukrainians should firmly claim their rights in a parliamentary way. As a result of his work, the Galician Sejm amended its statutes and passed a new electoral law that was more favorable to the Ukrainians (1914).

Named president of the Ukrainian Parliamentary Representation in Vienna in 1917, Petrushevych aimed at the establishment of a royal province with a Ukrainian administration. On 10 October 1918 he summoned the Ukrainian Constituent Assembly in Lviv; the objective was to decide the fate of the lands populated by the Ukrainians but belonging to Austria-Hungary. This assembly was transformed into the Ukrainian National Council (UNC), and Petrushevych became its head. The UNC proclaimed the establishment of a Western Ukrainian National Republic (WUNR). Petrushevych informed U.S. President Woodrow Wilson, about its creation on 26 October 1918. After the formal union of the WUNR and the Ukrainian National Republic (UNR) in January 1919, Petrushevych became a member of the UNR Directorate. On 9 June 1919 the Ukrainian Council named him dictator of the WUNR. Petrushevych was in favor of continuing the war against Poland and opposed seeking an agreement with Poland; because of his views he clashed with Symon Petlura.

After the final defeat of the Western Galician army in the war against Poland in November 1919, Petrushevych went to live in Vienna. There he formed a government-in-exile that attempted to influence international opinion and to secure favorable decisions for the Ukraine regarding Galicia. After the Council of Ambassadors decided to award sovereignty over Eastern Galicia to Poland, Petrushevych dissolved his government and went to Berlin, where he further endeavored to represent Ukrainian interests. When the Ukrainian parties that were active in Poland withdrew their support for Petrushevych's actions on the international scene, he continued his work in private. For some time he hoped for the support of the USSR against Poland, but he realized that this was in vain. Petrushevych spent the rest of his life in Berlin, where he died. (GM)

PEYER Károly (9 May 1881, Városlöd–25 October 1956, New York), Hungarian Social Democratic politician. Born into a peasant family, Peyer worked as a smith in a factory. In 1905 he was elected to the executive board of the trade union of metalworkers, and in 1911 he was promoted to secretary general of the council of the Hungarian trade unions. At the end of 1918 Peyer, as a commissar of the republican government, issued a decree on the eight-hour workday. Although during the revolution of 1919 Peyer spoke against the Red Terror, he took part in a delegation of the Hungarian Soviet Republic (HSR) that ineffectively attempted to reach an agreement with Romania at the end of July 1919. After the fall of the HSR Peyer became interim minister of the interior and then minister of labor and social welfare. However, when Admiral Miklós Horthy consolidated his power, Peyer had to resign and even leave for Vienna, as he feared anti-Socialist repressive measures. After his return to Hungary in 1921 Peyer signed an agreement with the government of István Bethlen. This agreement allowed the right wing of the Social Democrat party to continue its activities on condition that the party's left was excluded. Peyer became head of the Hungarian Social Democratic Party (Magyarországi Szociáldemokrata Párt [MSP]), and in 1922 he was elected to the parliament. He was an MP during the entire interwar period. He represented the MSP in the Socialist International and also worked in the International Labour Office in Geneva.

After the German invasion of Hungary in March 1944, Peyer was imprisoned and put in the Mauthausen camp. In his absence Árpád Szakasits linked the MSP to the Communists. Upon his return to Hungary in August 1945 Peyer was offered a diplomatic post abroad, but he preferred to stay in Hungary and fight for the identity of his party. He courageously acted against the Communist terror. Since the Communists knew that Peyer was popular among the working class, they prevented him from meeting with factory workers. In 1946 Peyer issued a memorandum demanding the reinstatement of the rule of law. During the 1947 elections the Communists tripped up Peyer's candidature on the Social Democratic lists; therefore he ran as an independent candidate and entered the parliament. In response, the Communists accused him of "plotting against the state" and "collaboration with American imperialism to overthrow democracy." Peyer was stripped of his parliamentary immunity, and a trap was set for him when he was offered a "no-strings-attached departure to the West" because it might have become a pretext for his arrest. Peyer escaped the security police and on 18 November 1947 crossed the border into Austria. He went to Switzerland and then to the United States, where in 1949 he joined the Hungarian National Council. Peyer died of a heart attack when he learned about the revolution in Hungary. (WR)

PFEIFFER Zoltán (15 August 1900, Budapest–16 August 1981, New York), Hungarian lawyer and politician. After graduating in law, Pfeiffer worked as an attorney. In 1931 he joined the Independent Smallholders' Party (ISP). From 1943 he represented this party in a coalition of opposition parties. After the Germans occupied Hungary in March 1944, Pfeiffer went underground and joined the anti-Nazi military resistance movement. When in November 1945 the ISP won the elections, he became secretary of state for political affairs at the Ministry of Justice. At that time Pfeiffer collected and published documentation on the mass murder of opposition activists in Gyömrő, committed probably by Communists who were assisted by Soviet troops, as well as documentation on pogroms initiated by Communists in Kunmadaras and Miskolc. Marshal Kliment Voroshilov, head of the Allied Control Commission, demanded that Pfeiffer be dismissed from his position. This took place in December 1946.

In March 1947 Pfeiffer left the ISP. In July 1947, after the ISP had become debilitated as a result of its leaders having been arrested or forced to go into exile, Pfeiffer founded the Hungarian Independence Party (Magyar Függetlenségi Párt). Despite the terror and manipulations of the Communists, his party won forty-nine seats (13.4 percent), becoming the second largest opposition party in the parliament elected in August 1947. During the election campaign Pfeiffer was badly beaten by a bunch of Communist thugs. In September 1947 he attacked the Communists for their use of terror and electoral fraud. The Communists responded by producing false accusations, as a result of which Pfeiffer's party was deprived of all seats won in the elections. The Communists also wanted to deprive him of his parliamentary immunity and charge him with criminal offenses. Pfeiffer succeeded in getting his wife and little daughter out of Hungary, and with the help of the U.S. mission he also left the country (4 November 1947). Less than three weeks later, he was stripped of his Hungarian citizenship. Pfeiffer settled in New York, where he was one of the founders of the Hungarian National Council (HNC). As a member of the HNC Executive Committee, he sat in the Assembly of Captive European Nations (ACEN). Pfeiffer worked with the Hungarian editorial staff of Radio Free Europe and was in charge of a section in the periodical Független Magyarország (1950–60). (WR)

PIASECKI Bolesław, pseudonym “Sablewski” (18 February 1915, Łódź–1 January 1979, Warsaw), Polish nationalist politician. Born into a family of clerks that traced its origins to the nobility, as a teenager Piasecki joined the youth organizations of the National Party (Stronnictwo Narodowe [SN]), and in 1931 he became an active member of the Great Poland Camp (Obóz Wielkiej Polski [OWP]). In 1934, while a law student at Warsaw University, Piasecki was one of the founders of the rightist National Radical Camp (Obóz Narodowo-Radykalny [ONR]), established in opposition to the SN leadership, which was seen as too moderate by the nationalist youth. In 1934 Piasecki was briefly held in the isolation camp at Bereza Kartuska. He completed his studies in 1935. When the ONR was declared illegal, he became a leader of an extremely rightist faction of the ONR, the National Radical Movement (also called the ONR–Falanga). From 1935 to 1938 Piasecki edited the monthly Ruch Młodych. In 1937 he established contacts with the pro-sanacja Camp of National Unity (Obóz Zjednoczenia Narodowego [OZN]), but after a short period of cooperation these contacts were severed. Piasecki initiated actions aimed at intimidating leftist activists and Jewish organizations. The totalitarian and anti-Semitic program of ONR–Falanga was inspired by Italian fascism rather than Nazism, and Piasecki himself delivered evidence to the Polish authorities that one of his supporters, Stanisław Brochwicz, had collaborated with the Third Reich.

Piasecki fought in the September 1939 campaign. Arrested in December 1939 (Brochwicz was instrumental in his arrest), he was released in April 1940 thanks to the intercession of Luciana Frassati-Gawrońska, the wife of a former Polish envoy to Vienna, with Benito Mussolini. After his release, Piasecki went into hiding because a special German court had sentenced him to death. He was active in underground resistance organizations, including the National Confederation (Konfederacja Narodu [KN]), of which he became the commander in 1941. From 1943 to 1944 he commanded a battalion of the Cadre Strike Battalions, which became subordinated to the Home Army (Armia Krajowa [AK]) in August 1943. Piasecki fought in the battles of Vilnius in 1944. On 12 November 1944 he was arrested by the NKVD near Warsaw. As he realized the hopelessness of Poland's situation, he entered into negotiations with Władysław Gomułka, head of the Polish Workers' Party (Polska Partia Robotnicza [PPR]), other representatives of the new authorities, and General Ivan Serov from the NKGB. During these negotiations Piasecki agreed to cooperate with the Polish Communists and with the Soviet Union; as a result, he was later accused of being involved in spying.

On 2 July 1945 Piasecki was released. In November of that year, with the permission of the Communists, he founded the weekly Dziś i Jutro. He brought together a group of national and Catholic activists (including Jan Dobraczyński and Konstanty Łubieński) who declared their willingness to cooperate closely with the Communists in building a Socialist state. The theory of a “dual outlook,” combining communism and Catholicism, was also promoted. In 1949 Piasecki established the PAX Publishing Institute, the only publishing house that published Catholic books in Stalinist times. When the PAX Association, an organization that attracted Catholics supporting the new government system, was established (10 April 1952), Piasecki became its head and held this position until the end of his life. The PAX Association had franchises to run various businesses; in them, with the permission of the authorities, Piasecki employed many people who were in danger of being arrested. Owing to the political context and the views that Piasecki promoted, the Church hierarchs watched his activities with anxiety. On 8 September 1949 in a pastoral letter Cardinal Stefan Wyszyński, the Primate of Poland, condemned the weekly Dziś i Jutro, which was seen by the Church hierarchs as a kind of fifth column among Catholics. In November 1950 Piasecki appointed a Commission of Intellectuals and Catholic Activists, which to some extent weakened the effects of the work of the “patriot priests” who collaborated with the Ministry of Public Security against the Church hierarchs. In 1953, though, Piasecki supported the “February decree” issued by the authorities, took over Tygodnik Powszechny, and accepted the arrest of Primate Wyszyński. In 1955 Piasecki’s book, Zagadnienia istotne, and the weekly Dziś i jutro were placed on the index of forbidden books of the Holy Office.

At the time of the dramatic political breakthrough in October 1956, Piasecki favored the neo-Stalinist Natolin faction (Natolińcy). On 16 October 1956 in the PAX periodical Słowo Powszechnie he published the article “Instynkt państwowy” (State instinct), in which he vaguely warned against party “liberals” and pointed to the possibility of using force in the defense of “raison d’état.” Despite this, Gomułka decided not to dissolve the PAX Association after October 1956. In later years, though, Piasecki supported the faction led by Mieczysław Moczar. In January 1957 Piasecki’s sixteen-year-old son, Bohdan, was kidnapped and murdered. The circumstances of this tragedy remain unclear. Although Piasecki’s aspirations to co-govern Poland ended in failure, in the 1960s and 1970s he was a member of the government elite. From May 1965 until the end of his life he was an MP, and from 22 June 1971 to 1 January 1979, a member of the Council of State. (PK)

PIEKAŁKIEWICZ Jan, pseudonyms “Juliański,” “Wernic,” and “Wrocławski” (19 September 1892, Kursk–19 or 21 June 1943, Warsaw), Polish politician and statistician. Piekałkiewicz completed studies in a gymnasium in Petersburg and graduated from the department of economics of the local polytechnic in 1914. From 1915 he conducted statistical research in Russia; for example, he directed the census in the Fergana Valley. After his return to Poland in 1918 Piekałkiewicz ran a family farm in Woskrzenice, near Biała. In 1920 he volunteered for the army to fight against the Bolsheviks. He later worked in the Central Statistical Office (Główny Urząd Statystyczny [GUS]). From 1923 he lectured in statistics at the university in Lwów (Lviv). In 1924 he obtained a Ph.D. in economics and political science and became chair of the Department of Statistics at the School of Political Sciences in Warsaw. From 1927 he was a member of the Statistical Committee of the League of Nations, and from 1933, a staff member of the International Statistical Institute. Piekałkiewicz belonged to the editorial staffs of the periodicals Statystyka Pracy and Kwartalnik Statystyczny and the Atlas Statystyczny Rzeczypospolitej Polskiej (Statistical atlas of the Republic of Poland; 1930). Piekałkiewicz belonged to the Polish Peasant Party–Piast (Polskie Stronnictwo Ludowe–Piast); therefore in 1929 he lost his job in the GUS. From 1931 he was in the leadership of the Peasant Party (Stronnictwo Ludowe [SL]). At the end of 1939 he became active in the underground program committee of the peasant movement called Roch. On 5 August 1941 he was appointed a deputy delegate, and on 5 August 1942 he became a delegate, of the Polish Government-in-Exile for the Homeland. With his approval, Żegota, the Council for Aid to Jews, was founded, and representatives of the Delegation of the Government in Exile (Delegatura) started talks with the Communist representatives in February 1943. However, the negotiations failed. Arrested by the SS on 19 February 1943, Piekałkiewicz was tortured with particular brutality by the SS hauptsturmführer, Walter Vossberg, at the Gestapo headquarters on Szucha Street. On 28 May 1943, in a state of extreme exhaustion, Piekałkiewicz was transported to Pawiak Prison, where he died in strict isolation, deprived of medical help. (WR) PIERACKI Bronisław (28 May 1895, Gorlice–15 June 1934, Warsaw), Polish officer and politician. From 1913 Pieracki belonged to the Riflemen’s Association. He graduated from a high school in Nowy Sącz, and in 1914 he registered in the Department of Philosophy of the Jagiellonian University in Kraków. After the outbreak of World War I he fought as commander of a company in the Polish Legions. As a result of the refusal of top Legion officers to swear loyalty to the Austrian emperor, in July 1917 Pieracki was inducted into the Austro-Hungarian Army. Relieved in the spring of 1918, he entered the Polish Military Organization and commanded its Nowy Sącz and Lwów (Lviv) districts. From November 1918 he served in the Polish Army and took part in the struggle for Lwów against the Ukrainians. In 1919–23 Pieracki worked at various posts in the Ministry of Military Affairs and at the Headquarters of the Commander-in-Chief. He also belonged to a secret military organization, Honor i Ojczyzna (Honor and Fatherland), organized by the followers of Józef Piłsudski. In 1924 Pieracki completed a course at the Higher Military Academy in Warsaw, was promoted to colonel, and worked in the staff of the Fourth Army Inspectorate (1924–28). He took part in the preparations for and execution of the May 1926 coup d'état and later belonged to the leaders of the Nonparty Bloc of Cooperation with the Government (Bezpartyjny Blok Współpracy z Rządem [BBWR]). On its behalf Pieracki was elected MP in March 1928 and became deputy head of the BBWR parliamentary club. In October 1928 he gave up his mandate and took over the post of second deputy chief of the General Staff. In April 1929 he became undersecretary for political affairs in the Ministry of Interior. From December 1930 to June 1931 he was minister without portfolio in the government of Walery Sławek, and then he became minister of interior. Pieracki favored firm actions against the political opposition but was thought to be an opponent of open violence and desired Polish-Ukrainian cooperation. On his initiative in March 1934 the government established a Committee for Nationality Problems. Pieracki was shot dead by a member of the Organization of Ukrainian Nationalists in Warsaw. He was posthumously appointed brigadier general. Three days after Pieracki's death the president decreed the creation of special isolation camps for members of extremist organizations. On these grounds the Bereza Kartuska camp was established. (JS)

PIIP Ants (28 February 1884, Tuhalaane–1 October 1941, labor camp near Perm), Estonian lawyer, politician, and writer. In 1912 Piip completed his studies in a gymnasium in Kuressaare, in 1916 he graduated in law from the University of St. Petersburg, and then he lectured there and worked in the department for national minorities of the Russian Ministry of Interior. In July 1917 he became a member of the Provisional National Council (Maapäev), which served as the first legislative body of Estonia. In April 1918 he went with Eduard Virgo and Kaarel Pusta on a diplomatic mission to the Entente states. As a result of Piip's meeting with Lord Balfour, Great Britain recognized him as an informal diplomatic representative of Estonia and acknowledged the Estonian National Assembly as the body that was entitled to act on behalf of the new state. To some extent, it was thanks to Piip's political efforts that Great Britain granted Estonia material assistance and sent its fleet to aid the Estonians, who were fighting for independence against the Germans and the Bolsheviks. At the same time Piip served as adviser to the foreign minister. He attended the Paris Peace Conference and then conducted negotiations with the Bolsheviks that led to the signing of a peace treaty with them on 2 February 1920 in Tartu. Between 26 October 1920 and 25 January 1921 Piip was head of the government, and then he repeatedly served as foreign minister (1921–22, 1925–26, 1932, 1933, and 1939–40); in these years he also conducted lectures on international public law at Tartu University. In 1923–25 Piip was ambassador to the United States, and in 1932 he was a guest lecturer in California. As minister, he promoted the idea of a broad Baltic league.

Aligned from his youth with the radical movement, in parliament Piip represented the centrist Labor Party. In May 1933 he became a member of Jaan Tõnisson's cabinet, the "last chance for democracy." After the fall of this cabinet and the introduction of the dictatorship of Konstantin Päts, Piip went into the opposition. In November 1936 he protested—along with, among others, Juhan Kukk and Jaan Teemant—the electoral abuses of the regime. In 1938 he protested the electoral procedure that allowed Päts's adherents to dominate the parliament. Piip sat on the Tartu City Council and was its head between 1935 and 1938. He opposed signing the treaty of "mutual assistance" with the USSR of 29 September 1939 (it allowed the Soviets to bring their troops into the territory of Estonia), and after replacing Karl Selter as foreign minister in October of that year, Piip tried to maintain the independence of his country by implementing a policy of strict neutrality. After the seizure of the country by the Red Army, along with other politicians in opposition to the Päts dictatorship, Piip tried to run in the "elections" to the People's Assembly on 14–15 July 1940. Arrested in August 1940, Piip was deported to the USSR and died in a labor camp in the Perm region. (AG)

PIJADE Moša (4 January 1890, Belgrade–15 March 1957, Paris), Yugoslav Communist activist. Pijade came from a Sephardic Jewish family who at the beginning of the nineteenth century lived in Serbia. In 1906–9 he studied fine arts in Munich and Paris, but his journalistic and political interests prompted him to found the first trade union journal in Yugoslavia, Slobodna Reč (1919). In January 1920 Pijade joined the Socialist Workers' Party of Yugoslavia (Communists) (Socijalistička Radnička Partija Jugoslavije [Komunistička])—which from June of that year was called the Communist Party of Yugoslavia (CPY)—and there he soon became one of the main party ideologists and organizers. After the delegalization of the party in 1921 and the arrest or emigration of its leaders, Pijade became interim head of the party. In June 1922 he spoke as “Milan Popovich” at the Fourth Conference of the Communist Balkan Federation in Sofia. From 1923 Pijade was a member of the Independent Workers' Party of Yugoslavia (Nezavisna Radnička Partija Jugoslavije), which was a new incarnation of the Communist Party. He supported a Yugoslav federation and cooperation with the Croatian irredentists. In 1925 Pijade was arrested and sentenced to fourteen years of prison, where his Communist convictions became stronger. At that time he met many future leaders of the party, in particular Josip Broz Tito. In Sremska Mitrovica Prison and Leopoglava Prison Pijade organized secret courses, and in 1930, along with Tito, he established the Prison Committee of the CPY. He also published the journal Za bolševizaciju.

After his release in April 1939 Pijade was active in the Communist underground in Serbia and Montenegro. After the German attack against Yugoslavia in April 1941, and especially after the German attack against the USSR in June 1941, along with Milovan Djilas, Pijade organized the Communist guerrillas in Montenegro, resorting to brutal methods of persuading peasants to join. From December 1941 Pijade worked in Tito's central headquarters. He was one of the founders of the Anti-Fascist Council for the National Liberation of Yugoslavia (Antifašističko Veće Narodnog Oslobođenja Jugoslavije [AVNOJ]), and at the congress of the council in Jajce in November 1943 Pijade became the council's vice-president. He also founded the New Yugoslavia Press Agency, also called Tanjug.

After the end of the war Pijade sat on the Politburo of the CC of the party and served as vice-president of the parliament. He was a member of the Yugoslav delegation to the peace conference in Paris in 1947. At the time of the crisis in relations between Yugoslavia and the USSR, Pijade supported Tito's stance, although the denouncement of Tito by the Information Bureau of the Communist and Workers' Parties (Cominform) in June 1948 was for Pijade, as an orthodox Stalinist, a great shock. After severing ties with Moscow, he was the leading theoretician of the “Yugoslav road to socialism” and the country's neutrality. In 1950 Pijade published “About the Legend that the Yugoslav Uprising Owed Its Existence to Soviet Assistance.” When a new model of Yugoslav communism began to form, Pijade held a fairly conservative position that increasingly differed from that of Djilas, who was leaning toward greater pluralism. After the expulsion of Djilas, on 28 January 1954 Pijade became president of the National Assembly, and he held the post until his sudden death from a heart attack during a diplomatic journey. Pijade's Izbrani spisy (Collected works; 1964) were published posthumously. (WR)

PÍKA Heliodor (3 July 1897, Štítina–21 June 1949, Plzen), Czech general. In 1915 Píka graduated from a high school in Troppau (Opava, Czech Republic). Inducted into the Austro-Hungarian Army, he briefly fought on the Russian front in 1916. In July 1916 he was taken prisoner by the Russians at Berestechko (in the Ukraine). In October 1916 he volunteered to serve in a Czechoslovak military unit that was being formed in the Russian Army. He soon became an officer of the Czechoslovak Legions in Russia. In October 1917 Píka made his way via Murmansk to France, where he fought in the Czechoslovak units. In January 1919 he returned to his country and fought in Teschen Silesia and Slovakia. After the end of the war Píka advanced step by step through the military ranks and completed many military courses. In 1926–27 he studied at the Military College in Paris. After returning to Czechoslovakia, he worked in the General Staff. From 1932 to 1937 he served as military attaché in Romania. Back in his country, he worked in the State Defense Council (Rada Obrany Státu), where he was responsible for contacts with the states of the Little Entente, and subsequently he took part in secret negotiations on cooperation with Romania and Yugoslavia. After the Munich agreement of September 1938, he concentrated his efforts on saving Czechoslovak weapons and troops.

After the Protectorate of Bohemia and Moravia was established and the Nazi occupation began, Píka worked with a military organization called the Defense of the Nation (Obrana Naroda) and was sent by its command to the West, where he entered into cooperation with Edvard Beneš. After the outbreak of World War II, Beneš sent him on a mission to the Balkans. In late 1940 and early 1941 in Istanbul, Píka conducted negotiations on intelligence cooperation with Soviet representatives. From 1941 to 1945 he was head of a Czechoslovak military mission to the Soviet Union, where he followed the political line of the government-in-exile. Píka worked for the release of over ten thousand Czechoslovak citizens from Soviet camps and prisons, with the aim of inducting them into the newly formed Czechoslovak Army. In 1943 he was promoted to brigadier general and in 1945 to major general. As a professional, Píka won the recognition of Soviet military cadres. Deputy chief of the Czechoslovak General Staff from 1945 to 1948, Píka attended the 1946 Paris Peace Conference. Expelled from the army at the end of February 1948 and arrested in May 1948, he was accused of sabotaging the operations of the Czechoslovak Army in the Soviet Union on the orders of the British and of acting to the detriment of the Soviet Union and the Czechoslovak Republic. On 28 January 1949, although all the charges were rebutted by his defense counsel, Píka was sentenced to death by the Tribunal of State, appointed to adjudicate political cases. Bedřich Reicin, the chief of military intelligence, confessed that Píka was executed because “he had known too much about the Soviet intelligence services.” The sentence was carried out in Plzen Prison. In 1968 Píka was fully rehabilitated, and in 1990 he was posthumously promoted to general of the army. (PU)

PILECKI Witold (13 May 1901, Olonets on Lake Ladoga–May 1948?, Warsaw), Polish pro-independence activist, victim of communism. In 1914 Pilecki became active in the pro-independence scouting movement. At the end of 1918 he volunteered to serve in the Polish Army, first in the Self-Defense of Lithuania and Belorussia, and in January 1919 he joined the Uhlan Regiment, led by the famous Polish major, Jerzy Dąmbrowski, “Łupaszka.” After a short break, during which he resumed his education, Pilecki again served in the regiment led by “Łupaszka” from July 1920 to January 1921. In 1921 he finished a non-commissioned officer training school run by the Union for National Security. From 1922 to 1924 Pilecki studied agriculture at Poznań University. He later administered his family estate of Sukurcze, near Lida (now in Belarus). During the September 1939 campaign Pilecki fought as a cavalry platoon commander. In November 1939, as a reserve second lieutenant, he helped to found the Polish Secret Army (Tajna Armia Polska). In September 1940 Pilecki became a voluntary prisoner of the Auschwitz concentration camp, with the aim of setting up an underground resistance network and reporting atrocities committed by the Germans. Under the false name of “Tadeusz Serafiński” (prisoner number 4859), he founded the Military Organization Union, which was part of the Union of Armed Struggle (Związek Walki Zbrojnej [ZWZ]) and in 1942 became part of the Home Army (Armia Krajowa [AK]). In April 1943 Pilecki escaped from Auschwitz in order to prepare a report about the situation in the camp for the intelligence department of the AK High Command. He later fought in the Warsaw Uprising as an AK soldier under the false name of Roman Jezierski. Taken prisoner after the collapse of the uprising, he was held in the oflag (officers’ POW camp) at Lamsdorf (now Łambinowice, Poland) and at Murnau, Germany, until the end of the war. After his liberation in April 1945, Pilecki volunteered to serve in the Second Corps, led by General Władysław Anders in Italy. At the end of 1945 Pilecki returned to Poland. On 5 May 1947 he was arrested by the Communist State Security Office on charges of collecting intelligence for General Anders. Prime Minister Józef Cyrankiewicz, who was familiar with Pilecki’s deeds, refused to intervene in his case. Sentenced to death on 15 March 1948, Pilecki was executed soon afterwards. His symbolic grave is in Ostrów Mazowiecki, and there is a tombstone by St. Stanislaus Church, Warsaw. Pilecki is cited as one of the most unusual fighters in the anti-Nazi resistance movements in Europe. (WR)

PILINSZKY János (25 November 1921, Budapest–25 May 1981, Budapest), Hungarian writer and poet. Pilinszky graduated from a prestigious Piarist gymnasium in Budapest, where he began writing poems. He then studied law, literature, and art history at Budapest University but failed to complete his studies. From 1941 to 1944 he contributed to the literary periodical Élet. Mobilized in the fall of 1944, he spent the last months of the war in Germany, where he saw the horrors of war and met concentration camp prisoners—an experience that he would carry with him for the rest of his life. In 1946 Pilinszky published his first collection of strongly existentialist poems, Trapéz és korlát (Trapeze and parallel bars). From 1946 to 1948 he edited the literary quarterly Újhold, but as a writer he was more closely tied with the Catholic monthly Vigilia. Banned from publishing his works in 1949, Pilinszky wrote verse fairytales that were published in the anthology Aranymadár (Golden bird) in 1957. In 1956 he worked for a short time as a reviewer of manuscripts submitted to the Magvető publishing house. In 1957 he began editing the Catholic weekly Új Ember, in which most of his poems, literary reviews, and articles were published. Pilinszky rose to literary fame with the poetry volume Harmadnapon (On the third day; 1959), which initially was to be titled Senkiföldjén (In no-man's land), but that title was rejected by the censors. It was a poetic portrayal of war and human weaknesses, full of apocalyptic visions. Pilinszky's catastrophism, sparing with means of artistic expression, and his very personal confessions, as well as references to God and Catholicism, are to be found in Requiem (1963), his next poetry volume, which also included the text of a film novella. Recognized by the 1960s and 1970s as the greatest Hungarian Catholic writer of the twentieth century, Pilinszky frequently traveled abroad, with longer stays in Germany, France, and the United States. At that time his works began to be widely translated and published in the West. After the death of his sister Erika in 1975, Pilinszky stopped writing poems. (MS)

PIŁSUDSKI Józef (5 December 1867, Zułów [Zalavas, Lithuania]–12 May 1935, Warsaw), Polish politician and statesman. Born the fourth of twelve children in an impoverished family of landed gentry in the region of Wilno (Vilnius), Piłsudski was initially educated at home and then at a gymnasium in Wilno, graduating in 1885. He subsequently began studying medicine at Kharkov (Kharkiv), where he met the Russian Narodniks, and later became interested in socialism. After one year, though, he discontinued his studies. As a result of his indirect involvement with members of the secret revolutionary organization Narodna Vola, who plotted to assassinate Tsar Alexander III (the group included Lenin's brother, Aleksandr Ulyanov), Piłsudski was arrested, together with his brother Bronisław, in March 1887. Sentenced to five years in exile, he was sent to St. Petersburg and subsequently to Tyumen; from there he went on foot to Irkutsk and finally to Kirensk on the Lena River. In 1889 he was allowed to move to the village of Tunka in the Sayan Mountains, Buryatia. In July 1892, after his release, Piłsudski returned to Wilno and established ties with the emerging Polish Socialist Party (Polska Partia Socjalistyczna [PPS]) and wrote for the London Przedświt. He supported the PPS pro-independence program and opposed the internationalists. In October 1893 he joined the PPS Workers' Committee (renamed the Central Workers' Committee in 1895), where he represented the Lithuanian section of this party. From 1894 to 1900 he edited the underground newspaper Robotnik. Piłsudski was not interested in ideology but in action, and he was the de facto leader of the pro-independence Socialist organization in the Polish territories. In July–August 1896 he secretly went to a PPS congress in London. After returning home, he continued editing Robotnik. Arrested in Łódź in February 1900, he was taken to the Warsaw Citadel. Helped by his friends, he managed to escape in May 1901, and he made his way to Galicia.

At that time Piłsudski began making plans to instigate an anti-Russian insurrection. In July 1904, during the Russo-Japanese War, he went to Tokyo and unsuccessfully sought assistance from the Japanese government. In Tokyo he met Roman Dmowski, who had come there with exactly the opposite goal. After the outbreak of the 1905 revolution, Piłsudski's plans for an insurrection were no longer acceptable to the so-called young Socialists, who sought an agreement with the Russian revolutionary parties. Piłsudski did not join the new Central Workers' Committee. He became head of the Conspiratorial Military Department, which was in charge of the PPS Military Organization. At the Ninth Congress of the PPS in November 1906, Piłsudski's program suffered a defeat, which led to a split within this party and the establishment of the PPS–Revolutionary Faction, whose main aim was an independent Poland. In 1909 Piłsudski entered the Central Workers' Committee of the PPS–Revolutionary Faction and strongly encouraged the formation of paramilitary organizations—the secret Union of Active Struggle (Związek Walki Czynnej [ZWC]) and the official Rifle-men's Association—which were to become the nuclei of a future Polish army. In 1912 Piłsudski brought about the establishment of the Provisional Commission of Confederated Pro-Independence Parties. This commission appointed him commander-in-chief of all Polish armed forces. On the eve of World War I Piłsudski considered Russia the main enemy of an independent Poland, and he was willing to seek a road to independence as an ally of the Central Powers.

In August 1914 Piłsudski disseminated false information that a national government had been established in Warsaw; by doing so, he wanted to justify the action of the so-called cadre company, which on 6 August crossed the border of the Kingdom of Poland into Russia to start an anti-Russian insurrection there. This action failed, though, because people in the Kingdom of Poland did not believe it was possible to overthrow the Russian rule. This failure made Piłsudski dependent on the Supreme National Committee (Naczelny Komitet Narodowy), which assumed command over the Polish Legions that fought alongside the Austro-Hungarian Army. Piłsudski became commander of the First Regiment of the Legions (from 1915 on the First Brigade) and achieved several victories on the Russian front. In August 1914 he also established the secret Polish Military Organization (Polska Organizacja Wojskowa [POW]), which was to run intelligence and sabotage operations in the rear of the Russian Army. Following the Manifesto of the Emperors of Germany and Austria-Hungary (5 November 1916), which opened the bidding for Polish support in the ongoing war but failed to present an attractive enough political offer, Piłsudski was no longer determined to associate the Polish cause with the Central Powers. In July 1917 he refused to swear allegiance to the two emperors; as a result, he was imprisoned in Magdeburg, Germany. Although some legionnaires did swear allegiance to the Central Powers, Piłsudski's authority as a politician now also increased among the supporters of the Entente. When in the late summer of 1918 the balance of the war tipped in favor of the Entente, Piłsudski's tactics proved right.

On 10 November 1918, the day before the Germans signed the armistice on the western front, Piłsudski was released and went to Warsaw. There he found a Regency Council established by the Germans and the Austrians and certain faits accomplis of various politicians (including his associates), such as the Lublin-based Socialist-peasant Provisional Government of the Republic of Poland, headed by Ignacy Daszyński; the Polish Liquidation Commission (Polska Komisja Likwidacyjna) in Galicia; the Poznań-based Supreme People's Council (Naczelna Rada Ludowa), dominated by members of the National Democratic Party (Narodowa Demokracja [ND]); and, finally, the revolutionary Councils of Workers' Deputies (Soviets), emerging in various parts of the country. On 14 November the abdicating Regency Council handed over command over the nascent Polish Army to Piłsudski. A former Socialist and supporter of the Central Powers, after the victory of the Entente Piłsudski faced a growing revolutionary wave that, if it joined with the Russian Bolsheviks, might pose a threat to the newly won independence. Therefore, on 17 November he appointed a new central government, headed by Jędrzej Moraczewski. On 22 November, together with Moraczewski, Piłsudski signed a decree on the establishment of the office of the provisional chief of state, and he himself assumed it. The National Democratic Party members recognized Piłsudski's authority, regarding him as a "savior" capable of leading Poland through the dangerous times of revolution; nevertheless, they sabotaged the government, which announced a radical program that included the nationalization of key industries and an agrarian reform but also called for parliamentary elections. After appeasing the leftist tendencies in the country, Piłsudski sought agreement with the right. He was rather lenient in dealing with the leaders of an unsuccessful rightist coup d'état in early January 1919, and in the middle of the month he entrusted Ignacy Paderewski with the mission of forming a new government representing more conservative groups and capable of winning international recognition for Poland.

After the parliamentary elections of late January 1919, Piłsudski put himself at the disposal of the Constituent Assembly, which on 26 February elected him chief of state and commander-in-chief in the ongoing war against the Bolsheviks and the Ukrainians in the eastern parts of the country. In his eastern policy Piłsudski envisioned a federation of states independent of Russia and aligned with Poland: Lithuania, Belorussia, and the Ukraine. However, he did not find political partners to pursue his concept. As a result of successful military operations on the eastern front, by the end of 1920 the Polish Army had defeated the Galician Ukrainian Army and repelled the Red Army from the majority of Belorussian territories; such operations did not facilitate an agreement among these nations. Efforts to win the cooperation of the Lithuanian leaders and attempts to provide military support for the pro-Polish politicians in Lithuania ended in failure. The government of the Ukrainian National Republic, headed by Symon Petlura, which had been forced by the Bolsheviks to retreat from Kiev, turned out to be the only government willing to be a partner to Poland. On 21 April 1920 Piłsudski signed a treaty on military cooperation with Petlura against the Bolsheviks. The terms of this treaty also determined (against the wishes of the Galician Ukrainians) the future border between Poland and the Ukraine along the Zbruch River. The capture of Kiev by Polish and Ukrainian forces at the beginning of May did not end the campaign because the Bolsheviks redeployed their forces and attacked in Belorussia, reaching the outskirts of Warsaw at the beginning of August. A Polish counteroffensive launched from the Wieprz River line and a victorious Battle of Warsaw (12–16 August) forced the Red Army to retreat eastwards. Piłsudski's military strategy in this war proved successful, but in political terms the war ended in fiasco for his federalist concepts because the terms of the Polish-Soviet Treaty of Riga (18 March 1921) were closer to the “incorporationist” approach of the National Democrats.

As a result of the efforts of Piłsudski’s opponents, the constitution of 17 March 1921 gave little power to the president; therefore, Piłsudski refused to stand in the presidential elections. On 14 December 1922 he handed over his powers to Gabriel Narutowicz, the newly elected president. After the assassination of Narutowicz and the election of Stanisław Wojciechowski as president, Piłsudski served as chief of the General Staff of the Polish Army for a few months. He resigned from this post in May 1923 and retired to his house at Sulejówek, near Warsaw. He observed the political strife and the unstable governments and ever more strongly criticized “party favoritism” in public life. He was still enormously popular among the public and had the support of the part of the officer corps that had past ties to the POW and the Legions. In the autumn of 1925, after a series of political and financial crises, Piłsudski began preparing for a coup d’état. An appropriate moment came after the establishment of the second government of the center-right parliamentary majority of the so-called Chjeno-Piast coalition, which was unpopular with the public. Another argument in favor of a coup was Poland’s deteriorating strategic position after the Locarno Treaty (October 1925) and the German-Soviet Treaty of Berlin (April 1926). On 12 May 1926 regiments faithful to Piłsudski marched on Warsaw, taking control of the capital after three days of fighting.

After the successful takeover, which had cost the lives of around three hundred people, Piłsudski did not dissolve the parliament, but with the support of the left wing and a small shift in the center of the parliamentary spectrum, he was elected president. He refused the presidency, though, and Ignacy Mościcki was elected instead; still, although formally in the shadow of Mościcki, it was Piłsudski who actually ruled the country. He held the post of prime minister on two occasions (from 2 October 1926 to 27 June 1928 and from 25 August to 4 December 1930), and he served as minister of military affairs and inspector general of the armed forces until the end of his life. Piłsudski’s political camp pursued a program of cleansing Polish politics of party factionalism and corruption; it was known as sanacja, a name later extended to his ruling camp. From 1926 to 1930 Piłsudski’s main goal was to reduce the powers of the legislative bodies, to diminish the influence of the parliamentary opposition, and to establish his own strong ruling party. He failed to realize his goals, though, because after the coup of May 1926 the PPS and the leftist peasant parties went over to the opposition. The elections of 1928 did not give his Nonparty Bloc of Cooperation with the Government (Bezpartyjny Blok Współpracy z Rządem [BBWR]) a majority of seats; therefore, in 1930 the parliament was dissolved and the opposition leaders were arrested on embezzlement charges. The new elections, held under pressure from the administration, also failed to return the BBWR a majority sufficient to amend the constitution. Owing to deteriorating health, Piłsudski slightly withdrew from influencing current decisions, leaving them to his associates. He was mainly engaged in foreign policies. As Poland was increasingly threatened from the neighboring Soviet Union and Germany, Piłsudski sought to establish relations with these countries based on the principle of the balance of power—that is, the avoidance of alliances with one of these countries against the other. This policy resulted in a Polish-German non-aggression declaration (26 January 1934) and a Polish-Soviet non-aggression treaty (5 May 1934), but it put off the threat to Poland only for five years. Through manipulations of parliamentary procedures, the ruling sanacja managed to adopt a constitution that greatly increased presidential powers and weakened parliamentary democracy. In late April 1935 Piłsudski endorsed the text of the constitution, and two weeks later he died. Despite the political framework he had created, his supporters failed to appoint a successor to him and became divided. The sanacja government collapsed with the defeat of Poland in 1939.

Piłsudski was an exceptional figure and was well aware of his greatness. Few other Polish politicians had such faithful followers and enjoyed such respect—even a cult status—among the public. An assessment of his deeds, though, has always divided the Poles. What is emphasized is both Piłsudski’s foresight (for example, his concept of a preventive war against Germany in 1933) and his mistrust of projects to modernize the army and his ignorance about economic affairs. Some stress his great role in the rebirth of an independent Poland and in the Polish-Soviet war, while others point to his anti-democratic rhetoric, the May 1926 coup, and his dictatorship that followed. However, nobody denies that he possessed great political foresight and strategic talent. (WR)

PIŃKOWSKI Józef (17 April 1929, Siedlce), Polish Communist activist. Born into a laborer's family, Pińkowski graduated from the Higher Economic School in Poznań and from the Main School of Planning and Statistics in Warsaw. From 1951 he belonged to the (Communist) Polish United Workers' Party (Polska Zjednoczona Partia Robotnicza [PUWP]), in 1952–56 he served in the army, and then he worked in the central administration. From October 1971 to February 1974 Pińkowski was deputy chairman of the Planning Commission, from December 1974 he was a member of the PUWP Central Committee (CC), and from February 1974 he was CC secretary. He was co-responsible for the disastrous investment policies of the Edward Gierek regime. On 24 August 1980 Pińkowski became a member of the CC Politburo and prime minister. He endorsed the August 1980 agreements with striking workers, but he failed to take control of the aggravating economic crisis and the worsening social mood. He did not even control the apparatus of coercion, whose operations frequently provoked Solidarity. During his visits to the Kremlin in late October and early December 1980, Pińkowski passively observed talks between Leonid Brezhnev and other Soviet leaders with the head of the PUWP, Stanisław Kania, and the minister of defense, General Wojciech Jaruzelski. On 11 February 1981 Pińkowski resigned from leading the government, and in April 1981 he left the CC Politburo. Until 1985 he was an MP, and then he disappeared from public sight. (WR)

PINTILIE Gheorghe [originally Pantelimon Bondarenko], nickname "Pantiușa" (1898, the Ukraine–13 July 1985, Bucharest), Romanian security officer of Ukrainian descent. From 1917 to 1921 Pintilie was a soldier and a propagandist of the Red Army in the Ukraine. After undergoing GPU training (1923–24), he was a Kremlin liaison officer in the Communist underground movement in Romania, although he spoke very little Romanian. From 1936 to 1944 Pintilie was incarcerated in various prisons for his Communist activities and for spying for the Soviet Union; for example, he was held in a prison in Doftana, and when this prison was destroyed in a November 1940 earthquake, he was transferred to Caransebeș. After the Red Army entered Romania in August 1944, Pintilie became head of the Political and Administrative Department of the Central Committee (CC) of the Romanian Communist Party (RCP). In 1945, by then under the name of Pintilie, he became head of the Directorate of the Security Police. He worked closely with Dmitri Fedichkin, the chief adviser of the Soviet political police, and with a group of agents led by Ivan Didenko (later Ioan Vădrășcu), Pyotr Goncharuk (Petre Gonțeariuc), Boris Grünberg (Alexandru Nicolșchi), and Misha Postansky (Vasile Posteuca). With their help, in a short time Pintilie filled key posts in the Directorate with Communists. Pintilie was a drunkard and a bully. In the summer of 1946, on the personal orders of Gheorghe Gheorghiu-Dej, Pintilie imprisoned and then bestially murdered Ștefan Foriș, the former head of the RCP. He subsequently ordered the killing of Foriș's mother. In December 1946 he became head of the Special Information Services (Servicul Special de Informații [SIS]). Pintilie's wife, Ana Toma, a close associate of Ana Pauker, was a so-called Amazon (the Romanian nickname for female NKVD agents) and served as a personal secretary to Gheorghiu-Dej.

In June 1948 Pintilie became a member of the CC of the Romanian Workers' Party (RWP). In August 1948 he became head of the newly established General Direction of National Security (Direcția Generală a Securității Poporului [DGSP]), known as Securitate, which was formally subordinated to the Ministry of the Interior but which actually had unlimited control of Romania. For example, the DGSP probably bugged all members of the party executive. The apparatus of the DGSP, which steadily expanded, maintained surveillance over the everyday life of Romanian citizens, as well as all mass events. Pintilie helped to prepare the case against Lucrețiu Pătrășcanu. He was one of the main founders of the Romanian concentration camp system; for instance, he initiated the establishment of the General Directorate for the Construction of the Danube–Black Sea Canal. In April 1950 he drafted a memo on the basis of which people were sent to prison camps without trial. After Stalin's death, Pintilie led the "purging" of the DGSP apparatus, as a result of which some of the worst criminals were imprisoned or even executed. After Romania was admitted to the United Nations in December 1955, the authorities in Bucharest had to release political prisoners. On the orders of Gheorghiu-Dej this action was led by Pintilie, who released not only the victims, but also many of their torturers. After Gheorghiu-Dej's death and the succession of Nicolae Ceaușescu (March 1965), the latter attempted to gain control over the security apparatus by removing the minister of interior, Alexandru Draghici, from power. The dismissal of Draghici was followed by the expulsion of Pintilie from the CC at the Ninth Congress of the RCP in July 1965. During the rehabilitation process of Pătrășcanu, Pintilie was in trouble. Although at a CC plenum in April 1968 he was attacked for (among other things) murdering Foriș, he was not brought to justice for his crimes, and in May 1971 Ceaușescu presented him and his wife with prestigious awards on the occasion of an anniversary marking the party's half-century. Pintilie was officially buried at the expense of the state. (FA/WR)

PINTILIE Ilie (3 November 1903, Ploiești–10 November 1940, Doftana), Romanian Communist activist. After finishing primary school, Pinriliw worked on the railways. In his youth he became involved in the Communist movement and joined a Socialist party in 1919. Fascinated by the Bolshevik revolution, he joined the newly established Romanian Communist Party (RCP) in 1921. In the 1930s he was one of the leaders of the Union of Communist Youth and served as secretary of the Railway Workers' Trade Union. At that time he most probably worked for the Soviet NKVD. In 1931 he organized a railway workers' strike. A member of the RCP Central Committee (CC) from 1933 onwards, Pintilie supported the Stalinist line of the party, which called for the separation of Bessarabia, Transylvania, and Dobruđja from Romania. In 1933 he co-organized a strike in the Grivița factory, as a result of which he was sentenced to several years' imprisonment in August of that year. Arrested again in September 1939, he was sentenced to ten years in prison. Pintilie was killed in an earthquake that destroyed the prison in Doftana. (FA/WR)

PIPA Arshi (28 February 1920, Shkodër–20 July 1997, Washington, D.C.), Albanian writer, cultural activist, and political prisoner. Pipa started writing at the age of sixteen. Pipa graduated from a Jesuit college in Shkodër and in literature and philosophy in Florence, Italy. In 1941 he returned to Albania and taught philosophy in a high school in Tirana. In 1942 he received a Ph.D. in philosophy in Florence. In 1942–43 he taught in a high school in Shkodër, and in 1944 he returned to Tirana. Unwilling to deal with politics, at the end of 1944 he tried to gather an artistic circle around the Tirana periodical Kritika. In 1945, along with Archbishop Vincenc Prennushi, Pipa established the League of Writers and Artists. At the beginning tolerated by the Communist authorities, the organization was later considered a cover for subversion and spying. After a series of lectures in which he criticized Communist cultural policies, Pipa was arrested. In 1945 he was sentenced to two years in prison for "hostile propaganda." Soon released, in 1947 he was arrested again and accused of links with the so-called group of deputies and of preparations for an anti-Communist uprising. All together Pipa spent ten years in prison in Burrell, Vlocisht, Durres, and Tirana.

Released in April 1956, Pipa went to Shkodër. He refused to work in a collective farm and unsuccessfully tried to find employment in a research institution in Tirana. Dressed as a peasant and furnished with false documents, Pipa left Albania in 1957. For a year he lived in Sarajevo, and then, thanks to the help of the Albanian diaspora, he left for Italy and the United States, where he lived until he died. He worked at Georgetown University, Columbia University, and the University of California at Berkeley, and from 1996 he lectured in Albanian literature at the University of Minnesota. In the 1980s Pipa frequently lectured on the Albanians in Kosovo. The peak of his activity came in the 1990s. Following the pattern established by Fan Noli, Pipa wanted to consolidate the Albanian diaspora in the United States and to establish a party that could also develop in Albania. The idea has not materialized owing to conflicts within the Albanian community in exile. In 1991–92 Pipa directed the Pan-Albanian Association VATRA in the United States and its organ Dielli. He moved the headquarters of the organization from Boston to New York. Pipa returned to Albania in 1992. His first collection of poetry, Lundertare (Sailors), was published in 1944. He published the memoirs Libri i burgut (A prison book; 1959); a poem, "Rusha" (1969); the important study Albanian Stalinism: Ideo-Political Aspects (1990); and a number of other works on Albanian literature and language. PIRINSKI Georgi (10 September 1948, New York), Bulgarian Communist and post-Communist activist. Pirinski is the son of Georgi Pirinski (originally Georgi Zaykov, 1901–92), a member of the Communist Party of the United States who was sentenced in 1951 to ten years in prison for spying for the Soviets but was later extradited and deported to Bulgaria. In 1972 Pirinski graduated from the Karl Marx Economic Institute in Sofia. During his studies, he joined the Bulgarian Communist Party (BCP). He was closely connected with Andrey Lukanov. Pirinski worked at the Ministry of Foreign Trade (1974–76) and the Ministry of Foreign Affairs (1980–88). Devoid of ideals and realizing that the fall of communism was imminent, in 1989 he joined the party reformers, and after the toppling of Todor Zhivkov, in November 1989 Pirinski became a member of the BCP Central Committee and deputy prime minister. From September 1990 he was deputy chairman of the (post-Communist) Bulgarian Socialist Party (Bulgarska Sotsialisticheska Partiya [BSP]). After the BSP lost the elections and after the Lukanov government failed, in December 1990 Pirinski was dismissed from the party leadership. A candidate for deputy prime minister for economic affairs in the government of Dimitur Popov, he was vetoed by the Union of Democratic Forces (UDF).

In 1990 Pirinski joined the Alliance for Social Democracy of Chavdar Kyuranov, remaining in opposition to both the UDF and the dogmatic wing of the BSP, which, under the leadership of Zhan Videnov, took control of the BSP. On the eve of the parliamentary elections of 1994, Pirinski reconciled with Videnov, and in January 1995 he became foreign minister in Videnov's cabinet. Pirinski made efforts to bring Bulgaria closer to the European Union but not to NATO. He advocated neutrality for Bulgaria, which made the opposition accuse him of treason. Seeing the fatal mistakes of the Videnov government, in 1996 Pirinski joined the faction of Georgi Purvanov and resigned as head of the Foreign Ministry. This move weakened Videnov's position and finally led to his resignation and later to his expulsion from the BSP leadership. Owing to a dramatic decline in the BSP's ratings and to inter-party struggles, in early 1997 Pirinski became a compromise BSP candidate in the presidential elections. However, the Constitutional Tribunal determined that it was impossible for him to run because he had been born abroad. Owing to his contacts among the post-Communists, Pirinski has remained one of the most influential BSP activists. In 2001 he became the party's deputy chairman. (AG)

PIROS László (10 May 1917, Újkígyós), Hungarian Communist activist. Born into a peasant family, after trade school Piros worked as a butcher. In 1939–41 he served in the Frontier Guard (FG) and later on the front. In 1943 he was taken prisoner of war at Voronezh. He was trained by the Soviets and fought with the Soviet guerrillas in eastern Poland. In January 1945 Piros returned to Hungary and joined the Hungarian Communist Party (HCP). In November 1945 he was elected to the parliament. From January 1946 to January 1950 he was a member of the Budapest Committee of the HCP, and from 1948, of the Hungarian Workers' Party (HWP). In 1948–49 Piros was a deputy member and then until October 1956 a member of the HWP Central Committee (CC). In 1949 he was deputy general secretary of the National Council of Trade Unions (NCTU), and in 1950–53 he was a deputy member of the CC Politburo. In 1950 Piros became commander of the FG with the rank of brigadier general and later general of division. The FG was a part of the Office of State Security (Államvédelmi Hatóság [AVH]). From January to June 1953 Piros was deputy head of the AVH and a member of the commission that conducted an investigation concerning its head, Gábor Péter, arrested for the "violation of law and order." Piros personally interrogated Péter. From July 1953 Piros was deputy minister and from July 1954 minister of interior. At a meeting of the HWP CC in April 1955, when Imre Nagy was expelled from the Politburo, Piros became a deputy member of the body again.

On 23 October 1956 Piros became a member of the CC Military Commission, but he left the Politburo. On 25 October he appealed to the insurgents to lay down their arms. The next day he was deposed as minister of interior, and on 28 October, along with Ernő Gerő and András Hegedüs, he left for the USSR. On 3 November Piros returned to Hungary and took part in a KGB operation in which a delegation of the Nagy government, headed by General Pál Maléter, was arrested in the Soviet headquarters in Tököl, near Budapest. Piros took part in commanding the second Soviet intervention. On János Kádár's request, on 10 November Piros left for the USSR again. In May 1957 the parliament deprived him of his mandate, but in August 1958 he returned to Hungary. He became managing engineer at the meat processing factory in Szeged; in 1969 he became its director, and in 1977 he retired. For many years Piros was also chairman of the NCTU Provincial Council in Csongrád, and later he was a member of the Town Committee of the Hungarian Socialist Workers' Party in Szeged. (JT)

PITHART Petr (2 January 1941, Kladno), Czech lawyer and politician. Pithart's father was a lawyer, and his mother was a teacher. After high school in Kladno, in 1957–62 Pithart studied law at Charles University in Prague. In 1960 he joined the Communist Party of Czechoslovakia (CPC). From 1962 to 1970 Pithart was a lecturer at Charles University and a visiting scholar at Oxford University. In early 1968 he edited the reform-oriented periodical Literární noviny, and he left the CPC. After the suppression of the Prague Spring and during the so-called normalization Pithart worked as a blue-collar laborer and later as a legal adviser. He was among the close aides of Václav Havel. He published in the uncensored press, and he organized unlicensed education. In January 1977 Pithart was one of the first signatories of Charter 77, for which he was harassed by the political police for years. Forced to work as a blue-collar laborer in the water supply system and as a gardener and watchman, he wrote for the uncensored and foreign press.

In December 1989 Pithart became head of the Coordination Center of the Civic Forum (Občanské Fórum). When the forum split in 1991, he became a member of the leadership of the Civic Movement (Občanské Hnutí). From 6 February 1990 to 23 June 1992 Pithart was prime minister of the Czech republic. He worked to maintain the Czechoslovak federal state. He was also a spokesman for Czech-German reconciliation and for cooperation within the Visegrad Group. He advocated close cooperation with Poland based on the normalization of the situation of the Polish minority in the Czech part of Teschen Silesia. After Pithart lost in the parliamentary elections of June 1992, he withdrew from politics and returned to scholarly work at the Central European University in Prague. After the split of Czechoslovakia, he returned to political activity in 1996, winning a seat in the Czech Senate on behalf of the Christian and Democratic Union–Czech People's Party (Křesťanská a Demokratická Unie–Česká Strana Lidová) and becoming the speaker of the Senate. In December 2002 Pithart was reelected to the Senate and continued as its speaker. In January 2003 he ran in the presidential elections. In the third round he failed to win the required majority. Pithart authored one of the best analyses of the Prague Spring: Osmádesátý (Sixty-eight; 1990); he also wrote Obrana politiky (The defense of politics; 1991), Dějiny a politika (History and politics; 1991), and Po devataosmdesátem. Kdo jsme? (After eighty-nine: Who are we? 1998). (AGr) admiral and politician. Pitka studied in schools of commerce in Käsmu, Kuressaare, and Paldiski, where in 1895 he passed his captain's exams and subsequently went on sea voyages as a captain. From 1904 to 1911 he was in exile in England. During World War I he joined the national revival movement. After the February 1917 revolution, along with Konstantin Päts, Pitka founded the Estonian Military Bureau. On 23 February 1918 he commanded the troops that forced the Bolsheviks out of Tallinn, thus enabling the proclamation of Estonian independence on the following day, before the Germans occupied Estonia. Pitka founded the Estonian Self-Defense Units (Omakaitse) and the Defense League (Kaitseliit). He co-founded the Estonian Navy, of which he became commander on 16 December 1918, when the Estonians took over their first ship, the Lembit, from the Germans. Although during the war of independence the Estonian Navy played a symbolic role, Pitka initiated the buildup of the country's naval forces and the organization of the defense of the Estonian waterfront against a possible Soviet landing. During the war he was in charge of the redeployment of small operations units to the rear of advancing Bolshevik troops. These units disorganized the Soviet operations. Promoted to vice-admiral but dismissed from the army on 28 November 1919, Pitka became involved in politics. Elected to the Constitutional Assembly (Asutav Kogu), he founded the Estonian Guardsmen's Union (EGU) in April 1920. The EGU sharply criticized the pathologies of political life and the policy of the Ministry of War, which they accused of a lack of interest in the fate of war veterans. Violations committed by EGU members led to the abolition of this organization. In 1923 Pitka founded the National Liberal Party (Rahvuslik-Vabameelne Partei [RVP]), but with no great success. As a result of conflicts with other RVP activists, he resigned and in 1924 emigrated to Canada.

In 1930 Pitka returned to Estonia and became the deputy chairman of the extreme rightist Estonian League of War of Independence Veterans (Eesti Vabadussõjalaste Liit [EVL]). He was also a radical ideologue of the EVL. In 1932 he protested a decision of the EVL Congress that granted membership to people who were not veterans of the war of independence. Pitka left the EVL and joined the National Centrist Party of Jaan Tõnisson. After the coup d'état of 1934 Pitka accepted the Päts dictatorship. He chaired the Estonian Consumers' Union and the Foundation for the Defense of the Homeland. After the Soviet invasion in June 1940, Pitka avoided arrest by the NKVD and made his way to Finland. He organized the Estonian forces, which fought alongside the Finnish forces against the Soviet Union in Karelia (1939–40 and 1941–44). In December 1941 Pitka submitted a proposal to Finland for a Finnish-Estonian union that involved a common economic, military, and foreign policy with common central authorities and one head of state. The Finns rejected this proposal, though, because they did not want to complicate their relations with the Germans. In the spring of 1944 Pitka returned to Estonia. In September 1944 he attempted to organize the defense of Tallinn against the Red Army and to take over power in Estonia from the German authorities-in-occupation. He also joined the National Committee of the Estonian Republic, but his attempts to seize control failed. Soon afterwards Pitka was killed while commanding a ship that probably sank fighting against the Red Army. (AG)

PIWOWARCZYK Jan (29 January 1889, Brzeźnica, near Wadowice–29 December 1959, Kraków), Polish Catholic priest, journalist, and social activist. The son of a peasant, in 1907 Piwowarczyk passed his high school final exams in Wadowice and later graduated from a seminary. In 1911 he took holy orders. From 1928 to 1933 he taught Catholic social teachings at the Department of Theology of the Jagiellonian University in Kraków. From 1922 to 1939 he was the editor of Głos Narodu. He was also an active member of the Polish Christian Democratic Party. From 1939 to 1944 Piwowarczyk was a lecturer and the rector of a seminary in Kraków. In 1941–42 he was imprisoned by the Germans. In March 1945 he assumed the editorship of the weekly Tygodnik Powszechny, founded on the initiative of Archbishop Adam Sapieha, the metropolitan of Kraków. Piwowarczyk was associated with this weekly until the end of his life, even after Jerzy Turowicz assumed its editorship in the fall of 1945. From 1945 to 1946 Piwowarczyk was a member of the Labor Party (Stronnictwo Pracy). From 1947 to 1957 he again lectured at the Department of Theology of the Jagiellonian University. In his articles and monographs Piwowarczyk analyzed and popularized the papal encyclicals and the principles of Catholic social life, and he also undertook polemics with Marxism. The two-volume Katolicka etyka społeczna (Catholic social ethics; 1963–65), published posthumously in London, is his most important work. His other publications include Idea chrześcijańsko-społeczna w historycznym rozwoju

PLANINC Milka [née Malada] (21 November 1924, Split), Yugoslav Communist activist of Croatian nationality. Planinc graduated from a high school in Split, where in the fall of 1941 she took part in a protest against the introduction of Italian as a language of instruction. In 1941 she also joined the Communist Union of Yugoslav Youth, and in 1943, after the capitulation of Italy, a Communist guerrilla unit. After the war Planinc became a member of the Communist Party, which became the League of Communists of Yugoslavia (LCY) in 1952. From 1959 she was a member of the Central Committee (CC) of the League of Communists of Croatia (LCC), and in 1963 she became secretary (minister) of education and science of the Croatian republic. In 1967–71 Planinc was speaker of the Federal Assembly. During the Croatian Spring of 1971 she stated that the LCC "had lost its political orientation" and that Croatia was in danger of "counterrevolution." At a meeting in Karadjordjevo on 30 November 1971 she supported Josip Broz Tito, and at the Twenty-third Plenum of the LCC CC on 12–13 December 1971 she was elected head of the Croatian party. Planinc held this position until May 1982. She was responsible for "clearing" the party of "nationalists." On 16 May 1982 she became prime minister of the federal government. She made efforts to stop the deterioration of the economic situation (high inflation, foreign debt, and unemployment). She wanted to continue earlier policies, but under pressure from the International Monetary Fund (IMF) she was forced to introduce a plan of stabilization (July 1983) that failed. In return for debt conversion, in March 1984 the IMF demanded a liberalization of prices, the reconstruction of currency reserves, and the introduction of a free rate of exchange for the dinar. Planinc's government did not implement these steps, and Yugoslavia's debt grew to U.S.$22 billion. On 16 May 1986 Planinc resigned. In June 1986 she was not reelected to the LCY Presidium, and she withdrew from political life. (JD)

PLAVŠIĆ Biljana (7 July 1930, Tuzla), Serb politician from Bosnia-Herzegovina. Plavšić graduated in biology, and for many years she lectured at the University of Sarajevo. As a Fulbright scholar, she also taught in the United States. She started her political career in the early 1990s as one of the closest aides of Radovan Karadžić, leader of the Serbian Democratic Party (Srpska Demokratska Stranska [SDS]). From November 1990 Plavšić was a member of the Presidium of Bosnia-Herzegovina. From January 1991 to April 1992 she chaired its Council for the Protection of Constitutional Order. On 12 May 1992 she was elected to the three-person Presidium of the Serb Republic in Bosnia-Herzegovina, chaired by Karadžić, and from November she belonged to the high command of the republic's armed forces. Plavšić strongly opposed the Cyrus Vance and David Owen peace plan of May 1993, and she criticized the Dayton agreement of 1995. In June 1996, under international pressure, Karadžić resigned from chairing the Serb Republic, and Plavšić took over. Unexpectedly, the "iron lady of the Balkans," known for her extreme nationalist views and her approval of ethnic cleansing, began to advocate peace and accepted the Dayton agreement. She criticized the SDS leaders, accusing them of corruption and profiteering from the war and from smuggling. She dismissed the commander of the Serb troops in Bosnia-Herzegovina, General Ratko Mladić, and she purged the police and the media. In July 1997 she dissolved the SDS-dominated parliament and formed a new party called the Serbian National Union. Plavšić's policies were supported by the Western countries, but in September 1998 she lost the presidential elections in the Serb Republic in Bosnia-Herzegovina and withdrew from political life. The International Tribunal for War Crimes in Former Yugoslavia in The Hague accused Plavšić of genocide and crimes against humanity. In January 2001 she gave herself up at the disposal of the tribunal. In October 2002 she pleaded guilty of crimes against humanity, and in February 2003 she was sentenced to eleven years in prison. PLĄŻYŃSKI Maciej (10 February 1958, Młynary), Polish politician. Płażyński graduated in law from the University of Gdańsk. From 1977 he was connected with the opposition Movement of Young Poland (Ruch Młodej Polski). In August 1980 he co-founded the Independent

Student Union (Niezależne Zrzeszenie Studentów). In the fall of 1981 he led the occupation strike at the University of Gdańsk. From 1983 to 1990 he managed the Cooperative of Skyscrapers Services–Gdańsk, supporting underground Solidarity activities in Pomerania and other regions. In 1987 Płażyński was elected chairman of the Lech Bądkowski Memorial Club of Political Thought, attracting both conservative and liberal opposition circles in Gdańsk. In 1989 he co-organized the economic association Liberal Congress. From 1990 he belonged to the Republican Coalition and in 1992–93 to the Conservative Party. He was active in charity organizations serving the disabled in the Gdańsk region. From August 1990 to July 1996 Płażyński was the provincial governor (wojewoda) of Gdańsk, and from 1996 he was deputy chairman of Solidarity Electoral Action (Akcja Wyborcza Solidarność [AWS]) in the Gdańsk region. In the parliamentary elections of September 1997 he had the best results in Poland, gaining 125,000 votes. In 1997–2001 he was speaker of the Lower House. Seeing a decline in the AWS ratings, on 19 January 2001, along with Andrzej Olechowski and Donald Tusk, Płażyński formed the Civic Platform (Platforma Obywatelska [PO]). From September 2001 he was an MP on behalf of the PO. He also chaired the PO parliamentary club and the party itself. In late May 2003 Płażyński left the PO, trying to form a separate Christian Democratic movement, but to no great avail. (IS)

PLECHAVIČIUS Povilas (1 February 1890, Bukončiai–10 December 1973, Chicago), Lithuanian general and politician. After graduating from a cavalry school in Moscow (1914), Plechavičius served in the Russian Army during World War I. He was wounded three times. After the February 1917 revolution, he continued serving in the White Russian units in southern Russia. In 1918 he returned to Lithuania and organized the defense of the regions of Telšiai (Telsze) and Mažeikiai (Możejki) against the Red Army. In the Lithuanian Army Plechavičius was promoted to battalion commander and then continued his education abroad. In 1926 he graduated from the General Staff School in Prague. Almost immediately after returning to Lithuania, he joined in clandestine activities against the leftist government of Mykolas Sleževičius. On 17 December 1926 he commanded the units that removed Sleževičius from power, opening the way for the nationalist dictatorship of Antanas Smetona. From 1927 to 1929 Plechavičius served as chief of staff of the army, and then he retired. From 1929 to 1940 he lived on his farm in the Samogitia region. After the Red Army seized Lithuania in June 1940, he went to Germany. In 1944, when the Red Army was again marching into Lithuania, he received permission from the Nazi authorities to organize voluntary Lithuanian units of the Home Formation (Vietinė Rinktinė), which were to defend the country. Plechavičius gathered around thirty thousand volunteers. His units fought against the (Polish) Home Army and pacified Polish villages. When the German authorities demanded that his units be subordinated to the German command, Plechavičius refused. Arrested along with his staff on 15 May 1944, he was placed in the concentration camp in Salaspils, Latvia. His units were disarmed. Taken to Germany toward the end of World War II, he was held under guard until the fall of the Third Reich. In 1949 Plechavičius left for the United States, where he presided over Ramove, the Lithuanian War Veterans' Association. (WR)

PLEČNIK Jože (Josef) (23 January 1872, Laibach [Ljubljana]–7 January 1957, Ljubljana), Slovene architect. Born into a joiner's family, Plečnik entered the School of Handicrafts in Graz in 1888. After the death of his father in 1892, he did not take over his father's workshop but left for Vienna. Because of his great talent, he was accepted by Otto Wagner into the Vienna Academy of Fine Arts, where he studied from 1895 to 1898. Plečnik continued to work with Wagner until 1901, and then he opened his own workshop. His most famous works include the monumental Art Nouveau house of the manufacturer Johann E. Zacherl, known as the Zacherl Palace (1903–5), in Vienna and the Church of the Holy Spirit (1910–13) in Vienna. In 1911 Plečnik went to Prague, where he taught at the School of Arts and Crafts. In 1921 he returned to Ljubljana and became a professor at the School of Technology of Ljubljana University. Plečnik had strong links to Prague, though, because President Tomáš Garrigue Masaryk commissioned him to renovate and rebuild the Hradčany Castle complex, which was being adapted to serve as the residence of the president of Czechoslovakia. From 1921 to 1930, following Plečnik's designs, many projects were completed there, including the renovation of courtyards and gardens and the revamping of Plečnik Hall (1927–30). The capital of Slovenia is sometimes referred to as "Plečnik's Ljubljana" because he greatly influenced the character of this city. From 1928 to 1929 he prepared the urban development plan for the city. Many buildings and facilities were constructed according to his designs, such as the Vzajemna Zavarovalnica

Insurance Company's headquarters (1928–30), the university library building (1936–41), and the cemetery in Žale (1938). In addition to architectural work, Plečnik also designed furniture, lamps, and liturgical objects (among other things). During World War II he continued his work but also taught students in his house. After the end of the war, he devoted himself to church art. In 1940 the Ljubljana authorities founded an award named after Plečnik, granted for outstanding achievement in the field of architecture. (AO)

PLOJHAR Josef (2 March 1902, České Budějovice–5 November 1981, Prague), Czechoslovak Communist activist of German descent, former Catholic priest. Plojhar finished a German gymnasium and later a theological seminary in České Budějovice. He was a member of Staffelstein, a union of young German Catholics. As early as the 1930s he helped to establish the Association of Friends of the Soviet Union. In March 1939 Plojhar was suspended from priestly duties for the first time. After the German forces occupied Czechoslovakia, he was arrested and sent to a Nazi camp: first to Buchenwald and later to Dachau. By the time of his liberation in 1945, Plojhar had become an avowed supporter of communism, although formally he belonged to the Czechoslovak People's Party (Československá Strana Lidová [ČSL]), led by Father Jan Šrámek. Along with Alois Petr, Plojhar led a crypto-Communist "leftist" faction within the ČSL, and he served as deputy chairman of the party. After the Communist coup d'état of February 1948, during which he effectively took over control of the ČSL, Plojhar became minister of health. Suspended from priestly duties again, he was elected to parliament in May 1948. In December 1951 he became the formal head of the ČSL, and he worked closely with the Communists. He was too discredited, though, to direct a "national" Catholic Church, which the Communists wanted to establish. In 1957 Plojhar became chairman of the Czechoslovak-Soviet Friendship Society, and in 1960, a member of the presidium of the National Front. From 1961 to 1963, as a representative of the Prague government, he served as vice-president of the World Health Organization (WHO). During the Prague Spring Plojhar retired in April 1968, but in December 1969 he again became head of a communist-sponsored peasant party. In 1970 Plojhar was made deputy chairman of the Czechoslovak group of the Interparliamentary Union. (WR)

PLYUSHCH Leonid (26 April 1939, Naryn, Kyrgyz SSR), Ukrainian mathematician, journalist, and human rights activist. Plyushch is the son of a laborer who was killed during World War II. Later his family moved to Odessa, where he graduated from high school in 1959. In 1962 he graduated from the Department of Physics and Mathematics of the University of Kiev. He worked at the Institute of Cybernetics of the Academy of Sciences of the Ukrainian SSR. Active in the “‘60s generation” (shestidesiatniki), Plyushch became a link between the Moscow and Kiev groups of human rights activists. Remaining a Marxist, he openly criticized the Soviet reality; he did so, for instance, in a letter to the CPSU Central Committee in 1964 and in publications in the uncensored press. Fired for taking part in protests against the imprisonment of Aleksandr Ginzburg, Plyushch published in the Khronika tekushchikh sobytyi and distributed the Ukraiinskyi visnyk. In 1969 he joined the Initiative Group of Human Rights Protection in the USSR. Arrested on 15 January 1972, in July 1973 Plyushch was sentenced to forced psychiatric treatment in Dnepropetrovsk. He was kept there until 1976. Among others, his release was demanded by the International Congress of Mathematics in Vancouver (1974) and Western Communist parties. In 1975 an uncensored book by T. Khodorovych, Istoriya khvoroby Leonida Plyushcha (History of Leonid Plyushch's disease), was published. In January 1976 Plyushch was forced to leave the USSR, and he settled in France, where he published Na karnavali istorii (Carnival of history; 1976). In 1977 he became foreign representative of the Ukrainian Helsinki Group and worked for the release of its members from Soviet prisons. Active in the study of culture and literature, Plyushch was accepted into the Taras Shevchenko Research Society and published a monograph, Ekzod Tarasa Shevchenka. Navkolo “Moskalevoyi krynytsi” (The exodus of Taras Shevchenko: On the “Moscow Spring”; 1986). Plyushch also authored articles on Taras Shevchenko, Mykola Khvylovyi, Pavlo Tychyna, Vasyl Stus, Mykola Rudenko, and other Ukrainian writers, as well as on the state of Ukrainian culture. PÖDDER Ernst (10 February 1879, Aleksandri, near Võrumaa–24 June 1932, Tallinn), Estonian commander and politician. In 1900 Põdder graduated from a military school in Vilnius. Promoted to company commander for his brilliant work during the Russo-Japanese War (1904–5), he left the tsarist army with the rank of colonel. Appointed one of the commanders of the new army by the Estonian Provisional Government in July 1917, he assumed command of the first and the third regiments. After the Bolshevik revolution, when the first Estonian division—an embryo of the future army—was established, Põdder became commander of the first regiment in Haapsalu. When German forces entered Estonia in 1918, he went underground, becoming deputy chief of the Defense League (Kaitseliit). During the Estonian war of independence Põdder initially commanded internal defense. On 4 April 1919 he became commander of the third division, which he commanded in the battle against the German Landswehr; fighting alongside Latvian forces, he achieved victory near Cēsis (Wenden). After the war, Põdder served as commander of a division, first in Pärnu, and from 1921 in Tartu. He helped to suppress a Communist coup d'état in December 1924. From 1926 onwards Põdder sat on the Supreme Council of War and was a member of the command of the Defense League. He then established ties with the (Fascist-like) Estonian League of War of Independence Veterans (Eesti Vabadussõjalaste Liit [EVL]). A popular leader and a charismatic orator, Põdder was one of the main EVL ideologues. From 1928 to 1931 he was head of the EVL organization in Tallinn and a member of the central EVL leadership. After a conflict between him and Admiral Johan Pitka, Põdder was instrumental in transforming the EVL from an organization that rallied veterans of the war of independence into a mass political party because he had initiated changes in the statutes of the EVL. The new statutes granted membership not only to veterans of the war of independence, but also to people who shared the EVL outlook. In 1931, after the Ministry of Defense issued a circular forbidding officers in active service to be members of political organizations, Põdder resigned all his positions in the EVL but kept his membership. The following year he died of gangrene. (AG)

POGÁNYI József (8 November 1886, Budapest–1938 or 1939, Soviet Union), Hungarian Communist activist.

A journalist and writer by profession, before World War I Pogányi belonged to the Social Democratic Party and edited its press organ, Népszava. In the fall of 1918, under the government of Mihály Károlyi, he became chairman of the Council of Soldiers' Deputies (soviet) in Budapest and was responsible for contacts with other soviets. In this capacity, Pogányi played a crucial role in radicalizing the army. In March 1919, under the Hungarian Soviet Republic (HSR), he was appointed commissar for defense. Forced to resign by a more radical group led by Tibor Szamuely, Pogányi became commissar for foreign affairs in April 1919 and commissar for education in August of that year. He also served as commander of the Second Division of the Hungarian Red Army. After the collapse of the HSR, Pogányi fled to Austria. In exile he was active in the Hungarian Communist Party. In 1922 he went to the Soviet Union. From 1922 to 1929, as a representative of the Communist International, he frequently traveled to the United States, where, under the name of "John Pepper," he organized and de facto led the Communist Party of the United States. In 1925 Pogányi became a member of the political commission of the Comintern Executive Committee and head of the Department for Agitation and Information of the Comintern Secretariat. In March 1926 he became a deputy member of the Comintern Secretariat. In 1928 he came under attack in the Secretariat for "erroneous views" on the evolution of the workers' movement in Western Europe and the United States. In 1929 Stalin also began criticizing him. Expelled from all his positions in the Comintern in November 1929, Pogányi began working on the State Planning Commission of the Soviet Union and became a member of its executive. Arrested by the NKVD in 1937, he was killed in the purges. Pogányi's work Kultúra, álkultúra (Culture, pseudo-culture) was published in Hungary in 1962. (WR)

POLAŃSKI Roman [originally Raymond Liebling] (18 July 1935, Paris), Polish film director of Jewish origin. As a child Polański survived the extermination of the Kraków ghetto by the Nazis. In 1959 he graduated from the Department of Film Direction at the State Higher School of Theater and Film in Łódź. Already in the early pieces that he directed during his studies—for instance, Dwaj ludzie z szafą (Two men and a wardrobe; 1957)—Polański showed a great talent, which was also to be seen in his first feature film, Nóż w wodzie (Knife in the water; 1962). He soon won world renown for works combining absurd, grotesque, and surrealist metaphors. Film awards at the Berlin Film Festival for Repulsion (1965) and Cul-de-sac (1966) opened him the way to Hollywood. In 1968 he directed an innovative psychological horror movie with Satanist overtones, Rosemary's Baby, starring Mia Farrow, for which he received an Oscar. In 1969 he made headlines because of a personal tragedy when the Charles Manson sect killed Polański's pregnant wife, Sharon Tate. Polański's subsequent films, such as Macbeth (1971); What? (1972); Chinatown (1974), starring Jack Nicholson and Faye Dunaway and for which he received ten Oscar nominations; and Tess (1977) consolidated his position as one of the leading film directors. Polański also staged theater plays, such as Amadeus, by Peter Shaffer (1981). After he was sentenced for having sex with a teenager in the United States, Polański settled in France. In the 1980s and 1990s he was less creative but still active, directing Pirates (1986), Frantic (1987), and Bitter Moon (1992). In 2002 he directed The Pianist, based on the memoirs of a Polish Jewish pianist, Władysław Szpilman, who survived the extermination of the Warsaw Ghetto, the Warsaw Uprising of 1944, and the winter of 1944–45 in the deserted ruins of Warsaw. For this movie Polański received the Golden Palm at Cannes in 2002 and the Oscar in 2003. Polański also published an autobiography, Roman (1989). (WR)

POLLUZHA Shaban (1871, Godanc near Drenicës–17 February 1945, Cikatovë), Albanian independence fighter from Kosovo. Polluzha came from a Muslim family with patriotic traditions, and his relatives fought in anti-Turkish uprisings. During World War I, along with the unit he had formed, Polluzha conducted operations in the territory between the Bulgarian and Austro-Hungarian occupation zones. In 1924 he was a member of a unit led by Azem Galica, and he covered its retreat to Albanian territory after Galica had been wounded. In April 1941, along with his family, Polluzha was imprisoned in Peje (Peč) because he opposed cooperation with the Italians. Released probably in 1943, he formed a self-defense unit that was to defend the Albanian people from the Serbian Chetniks. In 1944 Polluzha decided to join the struggle against the Germans. In December 1944 he became a commander of a brigade of Kosovo Albanians that had been formed in Drenicë to support the Seventh Albanian Brigade. After talks with Fadil Hoxha, this brigade was to follow the orders of the Yugoslav command and go north to liberate Vojvodina;

however, because of the pacification of Albanian villages these plans were abandoned. After the massacre of the Albanian people in the village of Skenderaj, Polluzha became the leader of an anti-Yugoslav uprising. The center of this uprising was in Drenicë. Polluzha gathered around two thousand separatists under his command, engaging at least three Yugoslav divisions. His units tried to avoid major clashes and limited their activities to actions carried out by small groups. Encircled by pacification units in February 1945, Polluzha was seriously wounded while trying to break out. He died of his wounds. (TC)

POLTAROKAS Kazimieras (3 January 1875, Gailionys, near Šiauliai–3 January 1958, Vilnius), Lithuanian Catholic bishop. Poltarokas graduated from a theological seminary in Kaunas and subsequently studied at the Theological Academy in St. Petersburg, graduating in 1902. Ordained in the same year, he began his pastoral work in Liepāja (Libau) and later in Surviliškis (now in Lithuania). In 1911 he became a professor and in 1917 the deputy rector of the Kaunas seminary. He taught introductory theology, philosophy, and sociology. In 1918 he became canon at the Samogitian cathedral, and in 1922, a professor of pastoral theology at the university in Kaunas. In May 1926 Poltarokas was consecrated bishop of Panevėžys and took charge of the newly established diocese. As a result of his efforts, a Cathedral church was erected in Panevėžys, and fifteen churches and fourteen chapels were built in the diocese during the subsequent thirty-two years. After the Red Army seized Lithuania in June 1940, Soviet soldiers were stationed in his residence. Poltarokas was interrogated many times but avoided deportation in the spring of 1941 because he went into hiding. During the German occupation (1941–44) he protested the extermination of Jews and the deportation of Lithuanians to forced labor in Germany. After Lithuania was again incorporated into the Soviet Union, Poltarokas was the only bishop who officially performed his duties in his country. He also administered the archdiocese of Vilnius. His efforts to save the Catholic Church in the worst Stalinist period brought some results. He succeeded in raising the morale of the faithful, prepared many candidates for the priesthood, and, in 1955, consecrated two new bishops, Petras Maželis and Julijonas Steponavičius. Poltarokas is buried in the cathedral in Panevėžys. He authored many theological and sociological articles, as well as studies on the history of the church in Panevėžys and a biography of Saint Casimir. (WR)

PONGRÁTZ Gergely (18 February 1932, Szamosújvár), leader in the 1956 Hungarian Revolution. Pongráz’s father was a lawyer and mayor of Szamosújvár in Transylvania. In 1945 his family moved to Hungary and ran a farm near Budapest. After graduating from an agricultural high school, Pongráz worked as an agronomist and stock breeder. In 1956 he worked on a state farm in Henyelpusztá. On hearing the news about a demonstration on 24 October 1956, he went to Budapest and joined the insurgent group in Corvina Passage, the largest group during the 1956 revolution. Along with his three brothers, Pongráz gained considerable authority in the group. In early November he took over command of the group from László Iván-Kovács. After 4 November he continued fighting against the prevailing Soviet forces for a couple of days, and at the end of November he escaped abroad. For more than thirty years the János Kádár regime labeled Pongráz the “leading counterrevolutionist” that the regime had failed to capture and punish. In February 1957 Pongráz went to the United States, where he worked in a New York railway car factory and then as a cleaner in Boston. In 1957–82 he was deputy chairman of the Hungarian Freedom Fighters Union in Chicago. In 1959–71 he lived in Madrid, Spain. Later he returned to the United States, where he worked as an insurance agent, and he managed a pig farm in Arizona. In 1991 Pongráz returned to Hungary, where he was active in organizations of veterans of the 1956 revolution. His memoirs, Corvina köz, 1956 (Corvina Passage, 1956), were first published in Chicago in 1982 and then in Hungary after 1989 in several editions. (JT)

PONIATOWSKI Juliusz (17 January 1886, St. Petersburg–17 November 1975, Warsaw), Polish economist and politician. Poniatowski came from a landed gentry family. He graduated from high school in Vilnius and from the School of Agriculture at the Jagiellonian University in Kraków (1906). In 1911–13 he studied at the School of Economic and Social Sciences of the Université Libre in Brussels and at the School of Agriculture of the Technical University in Prague. A member of the Riflemen's Association, in 1914 Poniatowski joined the Polish Legions, where he met Józef Piłsudski and his supporters. In 1915 he became a member of the Polish Military Organization (Polska Organizacja Wojskowa [POW]). In the summer of 1917 he joined the so-called Convention of Organization A (Konwent Organizacji A), a secret leadership of the pro-independence camp, in which he represented a radical peasant faction. One of the founders of the Polish Peasant Party–Liberation (Polskie Stronnictwo Ludowe–Wyzwolenie [PSL–Liberation]) in 1915, Poniatowski became its deputy chairman in January 1918. As minister of agriculture in the Provisional People's Government of the Republic of Poland (Tymczasowy Rząd Ludowy Republiki Polskiej), headed by Ignacy Daszyński, Poniatowski called for the expropriation of great landed estates without compensation to their owners. He subsequently served as commissioner of the Ministry of Interior in the Polish territory formerly under Austrian rule. In April 1919 he became a member of the Constituent Assembly after another PSL–Liberation MP had resigned his parliamentary seat. Poniatowski again served as minister of agriculture from July 1920 to February 1921 in the coalition Government of National Defense, headed by Wincenty Witos.

Elected again to the Assembly on the ticket of the PSL–Liberation in 1922, Poniatowski became deputy speaker of the Lower Chamber. He criticized the government project of agrarian reform, challenging it with a radical proposal put forward by the PSL–Liberation, but the proposal was rejected. After the coup of May 1926 the paths of the PSL–Liberation and Piłsudski parted. Poniatowski, who supported Piłsudski, retired from politics. He returned to political life in June 1934, becoming minister of agriculture. He held his post in successive cabinets until 30 September 1939, when he resigned along with the government of Felicjan Sławoj Składkowski. Poniatowski accelerated the implementation of the 1925 agrarian reform and promoted policies of land consolidation and drainage and the canceling of small farm debts that had come as the result of the reform. Such small farms came to be colloquially called poniatówki.

Poniatowski's agrarian policy met with sharp criticism from the right wing of the ruling sanacja camp and the larger landowners, to whom his policies were economically unjustified. In September 1939, along with the government, Poniatowski was interned in Romania, but he fled from the internment and made his way to Palestine, where the Polish Army was stationed. He later lived in Paris, struggling with poverty and earning a living from occasional lectures and publications. At that time he published Cele i założenia reformy rolnej w dwudziestoleciu niepodległości (Goals and principles of the agrarian reform during the twenty years of independence; 1951). In December 1957 Poniatowski returned to Poland and took up the chair of pedagogy at Warsaw Agricultural University. Shortly afterwards he retired. (WR)

PONIKOWSKI Antoni (29 May 1878, Siedlce–27 December 1949, Warsaw), Polish politician. After passing his high school finals examinations in Siedlce, Ponikowski studied at the Department of Mathematics and Physics of Warsaw University. In 1898 he began to study at the Department of Civil Engineering of the Technical Institute in Warsaw, graduating in 1903. While a student, Ponikowski joined the Polish Youth Union called Zet and became a member of the secret National League (Liga Narodowa). In 1903–5 he worked in hydrology and drainage offices in Warsaw and Kraków. In 1911 he severed his ties with the national political camp in protest against its pro-Russian sympathies. During World War I Ponikowski joined the political camp of activists who hoped for the victory of the Central Powers. In 1916 he became a professor at Warsaw Technical University. From December 1917 to early November 1918 Ponikowski served as minister of education in the government of the Regency Council, and from 17 February to 4 April 1918 he was its prime minister. From 1921 to 1924 he was rector of Warsaw Polytechnic. From 19 September 1921 to 6 June 1922 he was prime minister in two successive cabinets. At the same time he served as minister of religious affairs and public education. He also held the portfolio of culture and arts until February 1922, when this ministry was abolished. Ponikowski's government lacked a parliamentary majority but was tolerated by the left wing. The second of his cabinets collapsed as a result of the efforts of the head of state, Józef Piłsudski. From 1924 to 1927 Ponikowski served as chairman of the Main Board of the League of the Air Defense of the State. In November 1927 he became a member of the Chief Council of the Polish Christian Democratic Party. Elected an MP, he became head of the Christian Democratic parliamentary representation in 1930. In 1934 he left the Christian Democratic Party and drew close to the ruling sanacja. From 1939 to 1944, during the German occupation, Ponikowski was involved in underground engineering education. After the collapse of the Warsaw Uprising, he went to Kraków. In September 1945 Ponikowski returned to Warsaw and helped to reestablish the Warsaw Polytechnic. He then became head of the Land Surveying Department at this university and held this post until the end of his life. (WR)

PONOMARENKO Panteleymon (9 August 1902, Bełorechensk [Kuban]–18 January 1984, Moscow), Soviet Communist activist in Belorussia. Born into a peasant family, in 1918 Ponomarenko fought in the Red Army. In 1922 he began working in the Komsomol apparatus. In 1932 he graduated from an institute for railroad engineers in Moscow. From 1932 to 1936 he worked to obtain military qualifications and rose through the ranks of the Communist Party. In 1938 Stalin appointed him first secretary of the Central Committee (CC) of the Communist Party (Bolsheviks) of Belorussia. In the following year Ponomarenko also joined the CC of the All-Union Communist Party (Bolsheviks). After 17 September 1939 he supervised the establishment of the party apparatus and the operations of Soviet security services in the northern part of the Polish eastern territories, which had been occupied by the Red Army and incorporated into the Belorussian SSR. Among other things, Ponomarenko supervised the mass deportations of Polish citizens. In September 1942 he became head of the Central Staff of the Partisan Movement, whose operations were directed not only against the Germans, but also against Polish underground pro-independence fighters. From 1944 to 1948, as chairman of the Council of Ministers of the Belorussian SSR, Ponomarenko directed persecutions and the complete Sovietization of the republic. From 1953 to 1954 he was minister of culture of the Soviet Union, and from 1954 to 1955, the first secretary of the CC of the Communist Party of Kazakhstan. In 1955 Ponomarenko became the ambassador of the Soviet Union to Poland. During the Polish “thaw” he tried to control the course of events. He supported the hard-line Natolin faction, but in October 1956 he accepted Nikita Khrushchev’s orders that Władysław Gomułka be recognized as leader of the (Communist) Polish United Workers’ Party. After leaving Poland, Ponomarenko served as ambassador of the Soviet Union to India, Nepal, and the Netherlands. In 1965 he became a lecturer at the Institute of Social Sciences of the CPSU CC. He served as a member of the CPSU CC until 1961 and as deputy to the Supreme Soviet of the Soviet Union until 1958. He then retired from public life. Ponomarenko was the author of the propaganda works Par- tizanskoe dvizhenie v Velikoi Otechestvennoi Voine (The partisan movement during the Great Patriotic War; 1943) and Vsenarodnaia borba v tylu nemetsko-fashistskikh zakhvatchikov (The all-national struggle behind the lines of the German Fascist occupiers; 1986). (EM)

POP DE BĂSEȘTI Gheorghe (1 August 1835, Băsești, Maramures–7 February 1919, Cluj), Romanian economist and politician from Transylvania. Born into a peasant family, after graduating from high school in Baia Mare, Pop studied law in Arad (Oradea), receiving a diploma in 1855. He worked in the Austro-Hungarian administration and at the same time was active in pro-independence circles of Transylvanian Romanians. In 1880 he abandoned the idea of establishing a united Romanian party that could represent the Romanians to the authorities. When the Romanian National Party (Partidul Național Român [RNP]) was established at a conference in Sibiu in 1881, Pop became its vice-chairman. He belonged to the RNP radical wing, which demanded autonomy for the Transylvanian Romanians. He formulated such a program with Ioan Rațiu. Pop was a signatory to a memorandum from the Transylvanian Romanian activists to Emperor Francis Joseph in 1892; in it they called for autonomy for Transylvania. In 1895 Pop became chairman of the RNP. Repeatedly arrested for his activities, after his release Pop always resumed his work for the cause of autonomy for Transylvania, seeking support from Vienna rather than Budapest. From the beginning of the twentieth century onwards he increasingly called for a union of Transylvania and the Old Kingdom of Romania. This did not seem possible until the end of World War I, when the Habsburg empire collapsed and particular national groups reoriented their policies. On 1 December 1918, toward the end of his life, Pop became chairman of the National Assembly in Alba Iulia at which the union of Transylvania and the Old Kingdom of Romania was proclaimed. (FA/WR) fought with a partisan Communist group. He then studied in Vienna and Bucharest before completing his education at the University of Belgrade (1949). He took a job as an editor, and in 1953 he made his literary debut with the collection of poems Kora (Bark). Popa was noticed for a style that combined elements of modernism with Serbian folk tradition and differed from the Socialist realist canons that dominated East European literature at that time. Popa further developed his style in his later collections: Nepočin-polje (Field of no rest; 1956); Sposedno nebo (Secondary heaven; 1968); Uspravna zemlja (1972; Earth Erect, 1973); Vuča so (Wolf's salt; 1975); Od zlata jabuka (1958; The Golden Apple, 1980); and Rez (Cut; 1981). Popa's poetry, imbued with a grotesque sense of humor and numerous original metaphors, is a kind of serial treatise on the absurdity of being. He wrote in a succinct style, confronting the concrete with the abstract and frequently resorting to paradox. Popa's publications include an anthology of Serbian poetic humor, Urnebesnik (At the top of one's voice; 1960) and an anthology of Serbian poetic fantasy, Ponočno sunce (Sun at midnight; 1962). The English translations of his poetry include Collected Poems, 1943–1976 (1978) and Homage to the Lamé Wolf: Selected Poems, 1956–1975 (1979). (WR)

POPESCU Dumitru Radu (19 August 1935, Păpușa), Romanian writer and playwright. In 1953 Popescu graduated from high school in Oradea (Arad), where he made his literary debut in the daily Crișana, and in 1953–56 he studied medicine at the University of Cluj-Napoca. He did not graduate but continued philological studies there in 1956–61. From 1956 to 1969 Popescu worked for a literary journal, Steaua, where he published a number of short stories. His first novel was Fuga (Flight; 1958), and his first play was Mama (Mommy; 1960). Popescu's other works include Dor (Longing; 1966); Ploaia albă (White rain; 1971); Vânătoarea regală (Royal hunting; 1973); O bere pentru calul meu (A beer for my horse; 1974); Împăratul Norilor (The ruler of clouds; 1976); Leul albastru (Blue lion; 1981); and the trilogy Viața și opera lui Tiron B. (The life and works of Tiron B.; 1980–82). In 1969–82 Popescu was editor-in-chief of the literary journal Tribuna and secretary of the Writers' Union in Cluj. In 1969–79 he was a deputy member, and in 1979–90 a member, of the Central Committee of the Romanian Communist Party. A leading eulogist of the Nicolae Ceaușescu dictatorship, in 1980–90 Popescu headed the Association of Romanian Writers, and from 1982 he was editor-in-chief of the literary journal Contemporanul. In 1990 Popescu retired from public life, but in 1997 he became a member of the Romanian Academy of Sciences. (LW)

POPIEL Karol (28 October 1887, Rzochów, near Mielec–6 June 1977, Rome), Polish politician. The son of a carpenter, after finishing high school in Tarnów, Popiel studied law at the University of Lemberg (Lwów, Lviv) in 1908–12. While a student, he joined the Union of Polish Youth called Zet and the National League (Liga Narodowa). He helped to establish the Polish Riflemen's Association and the Polish Military Treasury, and as an emissary of these organizations, he traveled to Poznań and Warsaw. After the outbreak of World War I, Popiel made his way from Galicia to Warsaw, where he became a member of the Chief Committee of the United Independence Parties in August 1915 and a member of the Central National Committee in December of that year. Until the end of November 1916 Popiel worked with the pro-independence left wing and subsequently established ties with General Władysław Sikorski and the Military Department of the Chief National Committee. In 1917 he worked in the Executive Department of the Provisional Council of State. In January 1918 he became head of the Personnel Department in the Ministry of Interior.

In January 1920 Popiel assumed the editorship of Sprawa Robotnicza, a periodical linked with the National Workers' Union (Narodowy Związek Robotniczy [NZR]). He devoted himself to organizational work in Pomerania, supporting the newly established National Workers' Party (Narodowa Partia Robotnicza [NPR]). For example, he edited Głos Robotnika, a press organ of the NPR in Pomerania. In the elections of November 1922 Popiel obtained a seat on the NPR ticket, and from February to May 1923 he was chairman of the NPR Chief Executive Committee. In October 1924 he became chairman of the NPR parliamentary representation, but in 1927 he resigned his seat in order to be able to testify in the case against General Michał Żymierski, who was accused of corruption. In September 1929 Popiel became chairman of the NPR Chief Executive Committee. He edited Placówka, an opposition weekly. At a congress of the center-left opposition (Centrolew) on 29 June 1930 in Kraków, Popiel submitted a declaration against the sanacja regime on behalf of the NPR. Again attacked by the pro-government press, he was arrested and imprisoned in the Brześć fortress in September 1930. Popiel was beaten in prison, and the prison authorities staged his fictitious execution, but thanks to the intervention of the Primate of Poland, Cardinal August Hlond, Popiel was released in December 1930. Inspired by Wojciech Korfanty, with whom he had talked while in prison in Brześć, Popiel began working for the unification of the NPR and the Christian Democratic Party, but he was unsuccessful. In 1936 he became involved in the establishment of the opposition Morges Front. In March 1937 he entered into negotiations on the unification of the Christian Democratic movement, which led to the establishment of a united Labor Party (Stronnictwo Pracy [SP]) on 10 October 1937. He served as the acting chairman of the SP Main Board because Korfanty, the nominal chairman of the party, was in exile.

In September 1939 Popiel went to France, where he served as chairman of the SP. He also became a member of a commission set up to investigate the causes of the September defeat of Poland. In June 1940 he left for England. During negotiations on the Polish-Soviet Treaty of July 1941, Popiel supported the political line of Prime Minister Sikorski. In September 1941 Popiel became minister without portfolio in Sikorski's government-in-exile. In late 1941 and early 1942 he conducted negotiations with the leaders of the Czechoslovak government-in-exile about a future federation. After the death of Sikorski, Popiel continued to serve as minister without portfolio, and from August 1943 to November 1944 he served as minister for the reconstruction of public administration in the government of Stanisław Mikołajczyk. In 1944 Popiel opted for an agreement with the Soviet Union, even at the price of recognizing the Curzon Line. On 25 July 1944 he attended a meeting of the Committee for Home Affairs at which a decision was made to authorize the delegate of the Polish Government-in-Exile for the Homeland, the head of the National Unity Council, and the commander-in-chief of the Home Army to start an uprising in Warsaw at a time of their choosing. After Mikołajczyk's resignation, Popiel did not join the government headed by Tomasz Arciszewski. Having accepted the Yalta agreements, Popiel returned to Poland on 6 July 1945. In November 1945 there was an apparent union of former SP activists at home and in exile with the Party of National Upsurge (Stronnictwo Zrywu Narodowego [SZN]), led by Zygmunt Felczak and Feliks Widz-Wirski, but the latter party worked closely with the Communists and wanted to assume control of the SP. Popiel saw that there was no chance for a fair agreement with the SZN, so on 18 July 1946 the SP Main Board, led by Popiel, made a decision to suspend the party's activities. In March 1947 Popiel still tried to legalize the Christian Social Party, but after the Communist authorities thwarted all his efforts, Popiel legally left Poland on 26 October 1947.

In exile Popiel directed the SP groups operating abroad that had supported his attempts to continue his party's activities in Poland. In 1950 he became leader of the Polish National Democratic Committee, which consisted of the SP, the Democratic Party (Stronnictwo Demokratyczne [SD]), and the Polish Peasant Party (Polskie Stronnictwo Ludowe [PSL]), led by Mikołajczyk. Popiel helped to establish the Christian Democratic Union of Central Europe. In 1962 he settled in Rome. Popiel authored numerous significant memoirs, including Na mogiłach przyjaciół (On the graves of friends; 1966); Od Brześcia do Polonii (From Brześć to the Polish Diaspora; 1967); Generał Sikorski w mojej pamięci (General Sikorski in my memory; 1978); and Wspomnienia polityczne (Political memoirs; 1983). Toward the end of his life he intended to return to Poland, but an illness thwarted his plans. After his death, Popiel's body was returned to Poland and buried in the Powązki Cemetery, Warsaw. (WR) POPIEŁUSZKO Jerzy (23 September 1947, Okopy, near Białystok–19 October 1984, near Toruń), Polish Catholic priest, martyr of communism. Popiełuszko completed studies at a theological seminary in Warsaw in 1972. During his studies he was drafted by the army for two years. Ordained in 1972, he worked as a curate in parishes near Warsaw and in 1979–80 in the Academic Church of St. Ann in Warsaw. From the end of 1978 Popiełuszko ministered among medium-level medical personnel, and from October 1981 he was a diocesan priest employed in the health service; for example, he raised the issue of the defense of unborn children. In 1979 he organized medical services during the visit of Pope John Paul II to Poland. From May 1980 he was resident of the parish of St. Stanisław Kostka in the Żoliborz district of Warsaw. On 31 August 1980 Popiełuszko said the mass for striking workers in the Warsaw Steel Plant (Huta Warszawa). Then he became the chaplain of Solidarity in this plant and ministered among workers. He also developed an education program concerning the culture of secular life.

After 13 December 1981 Popiełuszko attended the trials of steelworkers and organized material assistance for the families of people dismissed from work. From April 1982 every last Sunday of the month Popiełuszko said the Mass for the Homeland. These masses drew crowds of thousands in Warsaw. In his elaborate homilies Popiełuszko compared Christian moral values to contemporary life in Poland; defended the right to a life in freedom and justice; and opposed violence, lawlessness, and abusive propaganda. He called on people to preserve spiritual freedom, live in truth, and fight for truth. He reminded them that Solidarity still existed, despite an official ban against it. He propagated the idea of “overcoming evil with goodness.” During his masses he recited fragments of poetry and prose, reminding listeners of the continuity of national history and the persistence of trust in the liberation of the country. In 1983 Popiełuszko organized a pilgrimage of workers to the Jasna Góra Monastery in Częstochowa. Popiełuszko maintained wide contacts with the underground Solidarity and the democratic opposition. In September 1983 an inquiry was instituted against him. Popiełuszko was accused of the abuse of the freedom of conscience and religion. In December of the same year he was detained for forty-eight hours, his flat was searched, and he was interrogated. However, Popiełuszko did not stop his pastoral activities. He was attacked in the press—for example, by government spokesman Jerzy Urban. In July 1984 an indictment against Popiełuszko was filed in court, but in August of the same year he was amnestied. There were attempts to send him abroad to study in Rome, but he did not agree to that.

On 19 October 1984 Popiełuszko was kidnapped and later murdered by three functionaries of the security service (Służba Bezpieczeństwa). Crowds gathered waiting for news of his fate in the Church of St. Stanisław Kostka, and masses were said for him throughout the country. On 30 October his body was found, and his funeral on 3 November 1984 turned into a huge occasion. His grave by the Church of St. Stanisław Kostka became a place of religious worship and the destination of pilgrimages by Solidarity activists, and it was also visited by foreign statesmen. In 1987 John Paul II prayed by his grave. A collection of Popiełuszko’s sermons was published posthumously; until 1990 it was only through the unofficial, underground press. His beatification process is under way. (AF)

POPOV Blagoy (22 November 1902, Dren–28 September 1968, Varna), Bulgarian Communist activist. In September 1923 Popov was sentenced to fifteen years in prison for his part in the preparations for a Communist coup. Released under amnesty in 1926, he went to the Soviet Union, where he received training at the Leninist School of the Comintern. After returning to Bulgaria, he led an illegal Communist youth wing and became a member of the Central Committee (CC) of the Bulgarian Communist Party (BCP). He then returned to Moscow and worked in the Balkan Secretariat of the Communist International. In 1931 Popov joined the BCP CC Politburo. In June 1932 a Bulgarian court sentenced him in absentia to twelve years’ imprisonment. At the end of 1932 Popov went to Berlin, where he worked with the West European Bureau of the Comintern, led by Georgi Dimitrov. Arrested on 9 March 1933, Popov was tried along with Dimitrov in the Leipzig Trial on charges of setting fire to the Reichstag. Released for lack of evidence, he returned to Moscow, where he was greeted by Stalin. At the Seventh Congress of the Comintern in 1935, Popov became a member of the Comintern Executive Committee. Popov’s marriage to Hertta, a daughter of the high-ranking Soviet official Otto Kuusinen, did not save him from falling out of favor. In 1936 he was forced to make a self-criticism and subsequently disappeared from the Comintern’s bureaus. Popov was arrested and deported into the depths of the Soviet Union but survived the war. In 1954, after the death of Stalin, Popov was allowed to return to Bulgaria, where he worked at the Ministry of Foreign Affairs until his retirement. (WR)

POPOV Dimitur (26 June 1927, Kula), Bulgarian lawyer and politician. Popov graduated in law in 1950, and later he worked as a lecturer and legal adviser. In 1970 he became judge in a regional court in Sofia, but as a nonparty man, he could not advance to the presidency of his court until 1983. The fact that Popov had a long-term legal practice and was not a member of the Bulgarian Communist Party made him a perfect candidate for top state positions after 1989. In June 1990 he was elected secretary of the Central Electoral Commission, which prepared and supervised the first free elections (10 and 17 June 1990). In view of the problems that the (post-Communist) Bulgarian Socialist Party (BSP) faced in resolving economic issues, after the resignation of Andrey Lukanov, on 20 December 1990 Popov became prime minister of a government based on experts connected with the BSP, its satellite Bulgarian

National Agrarian Union, and those few members of the Union of Democratic Forces (UDF) that became economic ministers and started reforms. These reforms, the Bulgarian version of “shock therapy,” soon led to a dramatic decline in the standard of living and to widespread protests by the post-Communists and trade unions connected with the former opposition. The Popov government managed to prepare a new constitution and get it passed through the parliament, and it began to replace personnel in the military and the police force. After the parliamentary elections, on 13 October 1991 Popov resigned. In 1992 he ran as a candidate for vice-president with Khristo Genchev, but they lost to Zhelyu Zhelev and Blaga Dimitrova. Later Popov withdrew from politics and returned to his legal practice. (AG)

POPOVIĆ Koča (14 March 1908, Belgrade–20 October 1992, Belgrade), Yugoslav Communist politician and diplomat. Popović came from a well-known Serbian family and was related to Milentije and Vladimir Popović, prominent intellectuals and politicians. He graduated from high school in Belgrade. He studied in Belgrade, Switzerland, and Paris, graduating in philosophy in 1932. In 1933 he joined the Communist Party, which was illegal at that time. In 1937–39 Popović fought in the Spanish Civil War as an officer in the International Brigades. After a short stay at a camp in France, he returned to Yugoslavia. He was arrested but was soon released with the help of his family. In the summer of 1941 he joined the Partisans led by Josip Broz Tito. Captured and imprisoned in the camp of Pecin in Albania, Popović escaped with the help of Albanian Communists. He was appointed commander of the First Proletarian Brigade, famous for its march through the Igman Mountains in severe frost during its retreat before the German offensive at the beginning of 1942. In 1943 Popović served as commander of the First Proletarian Division, and toward the end of the war he became commander of the Second Army. He was a member of the Anti-Fascist Council for the National Liberation of Yugoslavia (Antifašističko veće narodnog oslobođenja Jugoslavije [AVNOJ]).

After the end of World War II, from 1945 to 1953, Popović served as chief of the General Staff of the Yugoslav Army. From January 1953 to April 1965 he was minister of foreign affairs. He strictly adhered to Tito’s policies, which were aimed at bringing Yugoslavia out of isolation, reaching a new agreement with the Soviet Union in 1955, and involving Yugoslavia in the Movement of Non-Aligned Nations. Popović frequently accompanied Tito in foreign travels. He was a member of the Central Committee (CC) of the League of Communists of Serbia until 1959 and a member of the CC of the League of Communists of Yugoslavia (LCY; until 1952 called the Communist Party of Yugoslavia) from 1948 to 1972. In 1966 Popović became vice-president of the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, formally the second head of state. In the early 1970s he called for the liberalization of the system. When Tito refused to implement reforms and soften his authoritarian regime, Popović resigned (1972) and subsequently retired from politics. (AO)

POPOVICI Aurel C. (16 October 1863, Lugos, Hungary [now Lugoj, Romania]–9 February 1917, Geneva), Romanian journalist and philosopher. In 1885 Popovici began to study medicine and philosophy at the University of Vienna, but after three years he transferred to the University of Graz. In 1891 he became one of the leaders of the National Romanian Party (Partidul Național Român [RNP]) in Transylvania and an editor of Tribuna, one of the most influential newspapers. The theorist of law Rudolf von Ihering exerted a great influence on Popovici’s views. In 1892 Popovici co-authored the pamphlet Replica, in which he accused the Hungarian government in Budapest of forced Magyarization and justified the struggle of Transylvanian Romanians for their rights. This pamphlet, translated into five languages and published all over Europe, marked the beginning of Popovici’s explorations of the concept of a federalist and autonomous model of monarchy. As a result, he was sentenced to four years in prison. After his release, he was forced to go into exile in Austria and Italy. In 1894 he settled in Bucharest, where he taught German, wrote textbooks, and worked for several periodicals. In his political and philosophical works, Popovici emphasized the importance of the development of national consciousness and stressed the role of education in this process. He believed that the dualist Habsburg empire should be replaced by a federalist model; this would resolve ethnic issues and afford more effective protection against the expansion of Russia and Germany. Popovici expressed his views in the treatise Die Vereinigten Staaten von Groß-Österreich (1906), which greatly impressed Archduke Francis Joseph. From 1908 to 1909 Popovici edited Semã nã torul, and in the following year he wrote Nationalism sau demokrație (Nationalism or democracy). Popovici combined nationalism and conservatism, aiming to maintain a balance between the historical rights of the Habsburgs and the preservation of national interests. In 1912 he moved to Vienna. After Romania entered World War I, Popovici moved to Geneva. (PC)

POSKA Jaan (24 January 1866, Laiuse–7 March 1920, Tallinn), Estonian national activist, politician, lawyer, and diplomat. In 1890 Poska graduated in law from the University of Dorpat (Tartu) and then started a law practice. By the turn of the century he had accumulated a substantial fortune and had one of the most influential law practices in Tallinn. Poska was friends with many politicians—for example, Konstantin Päts. At Päts's instigation, in 1913 Poska became mayor of Tallinn; as a result, politicians from the Päts group gained considerable influence in the town and in the region. Owing to his personal contacts and his ability to mitigate conflicts, Poska proved to be an efficient administrator, and his regime also enjoyed the support of the local Germans and Russians. In consequence, after the outbreak of the February 1917 revolution the Provisional Government appointed him Estonian commissioner of the newly created province of Estonia. Poska held this post until the Bolshevik revolution. In the middle of November 1917 the Bolsheviks dismissed the Estonian Provisional National Council by force, and they seized the offices of the commissioner of the province.

After the proclamation of Estonia's independence on 24 February 1918 Poska became a member of the Provisional Government led by Päts and was foreign minister in this government until the Germans seized Estonia. In November 1918 the Provisional Government resumed power, and Poska became its head, substituting for Päts, who was absent. Poska's most important achievement was the negotiation of a peace treaty with the Weimar Republic in Riga (18 November 1918); in it the Germans relinquished all claims to Estonian lands. In December 1918 Poska headed the Estonian delegation to the Paris Peace Conference, where he unsuccessfully tried to obtain the de jure recognition of Estonia by the Allied powers. This failure was the reason Poska decided to modify Estonian foreign policy and negotiate a peace agreement with Soviet Russia and other neighboring countries. Until then, Estonian foreign policy had relied only on the Entente powers for the security of Estonia. Poska proposed to tighten ties with all Baltic states, which, in his concept, would form a common defense system. At the same time, Poska refused to grant assistance to White Russia until the de jure recognition of Estonia. Despite pressure from England and France, Poska, who headed the Estonian delegation, managed to bring about a peace treaty with the Bolsheviks on 2 February 1920. This treaty was his last achievement. However, after his death the idea of a Baltic league was repeatedly taken up by the Estonian diplomatic corps—for example, by Poska's friends Ants Piip and Kaarel Pusta—and it was one of the main guidelines of Estonian foreign policy between the wars. In 1921 Poska's report of the Paris Peace Conference was published as Eesti iseseisvuse võitluses kõige põnevamal. (AG)

POSTYSHEV Pavel, pseudonym "Ermak" (18 September 1887, Ivanovo-Voznesensk [now Ivanovo], Russia–26 February 1939, Kuibyshev [now Samara], Russia), Communist activist in the Ukraine. Born into a Russian working-class family, in 1904 Postyshev joined the Bolshevik party. During the 1905 revolution he joined a workers' council, and in the following year he became one of the leaders of the textile workers' trade union. Arrested in 1908, Postyshev was imprisoned in Siberia for four years. From 1914 to 1917 he was active in the Bolshevik party in Irkutsk. In March 1917 he became deputy chairman, and in August 1917 chairman, of the Irkutsk Soviet of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies. In December 1917 he became a member of a local revolutionary tribunal. During the civil war Postyshev commanded the Red Army units fighting against troops led by Baron Ungern-Sternberg on the Amur River; alongside Vasilii Blyukher, he defeated them in the battle of Volochayevka. In 1920 Postyshev became a member of the Far East Bureau of the Bolshevik party. In 1923 he was transferred to work in the party apparatus in the Ukraine. He was in charge of establishing the Communist Party (Bolshevik) of Ukraine (CP[B]U) in Kiev, and in 1926 he joined the CP(B)U CC Politburo. At that time Postyshev played a leading role in the annihilation of Trotskyites and Ukrainian nationalist Communists, as well as in campaigns for the industrialization and collectivization of agriculture in the region of Kharkov (Kharkiv).

In the summer of 1930 he was summoned to Moscow, where he became head of the Department for Agitation and Propaganda of the CC of the All-Union Communist Party (Bolsheviks).

Because of a decision by the CC of the All-Union Communist Party on 24 January 1933, Postyshev was again delegated to the Ukraine, where he became second secretary of the CP(B)U CC and head of a party organization in Kharkiv. Along with Stanisław Kosior, he played a key role in the purge of the intelligentsia and in the collectivization of Ukrainian agriculture. Postyshev was responsible for mass killings during the liquidation of the kulaks, expropriating and starving to death millions of Ukrainians. He launched a purge of the Ukrainian nationalist Communists. He personally pointed out “state and party enemies” in cultural circles, and they were later imprisoned and executed. He supervised the abolition of the Autocephalous Orthodox Church in Ukraine and the Russification of the apparatus of power in the Ukrainian SSR. As a result of his attacks, Mykola Skrypnyk committed suicide. Around one hundred thousand party members were executed during the purges of the CP(B)U apparatus from January 1933 to January 1934. Because of these actions, Postyshev became notorious as the “hangman of the Ukraine.” In 1934–37 he simultaneously served as secretary and deputy member of the Politburo of the CC of the All-Union Communist Party. Because he had become too influential during the purges and had even built a kind of personality cult around himself in the Ukraine, Postyshev fell into disfavor with Stalin. Expelled from his posts in March 1937, he became head of a party committee in Kuibyshev. Arrested in January 1938, he was executed over a year later. Postyshev was rehabilitated after the Twenty-second Congress of the CPSU in 1961. (WR)

POTOČNJAK Franko (2 August 1862, Novi Vinodol–18 January 1932, Zagreb), Croatian ideologue and politician. Potočnjak received a law degree from the University of Zagreb. He worked in the courts but was dismissed for his anti-government activities. He began working in a private law office (1887–96) and later devoted himself to politics and journalism. Potočnjak’s nationalist ideology was inspired by Tomáš Garrigue Masaryk. In Zagreb Potočnjak founded the newspaper Hrvatska domovina, a press organ of one of the wings of the Fatherland Party of Rights (Matica Stranka Prava). In the 1897 elections Potočnjak established a coalition with another Croatian nationalist group, the National Independent Party (Neodvisna Narodna Stranka). His coalition was successful, and Potočnjak was elected to the local parliament, but he was later expelled for social radicalism. He established ties with the Social Democrats and supporters of cooperation with Serbia. He was then one of the founders of the Croatian Party of Rights (Hrvatska Stranka Prava [HSP]). The HSP became part of the Croatian-Serbian Coalition (1905), which brought together all Croatian and Serbian opposition parties and which worked with Hungarian oppositionists. In 1908 conflicts arose in the Croatian-Serbian Coalition; as a result, Potočnjak withdrew from politics and resumed his work in a law office in Crikvenica. After the outbreak of World War I, he emigrated to Italy. He was active in the Yugoslav Committee (Jugoslavenski Odbor). In 1915 at a congress in Chicago, Potočnjak called for the uniting of the South Slavic nations of the Habsburg empire into a common state with the Serbian nation. In 1916 Potočnjak organized the Yugoslav Voluntary Legion in Odessa. He attended a conference in Corfu that led to the signing of the Corfu Declaration (20 July 1917), which announced the intention of founding a unified South Slavic state. Potočnjak supported the program outlined in this declaration. After the establishment of the Kingdom of Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes, King Alexander appointed Potočnjak vice-governor of Croatia. Disappointed with Serbian policies, Potočnjak retired from politics and devoted himself to writing his memoirs and on the recent history of Croatia. His publications include Iz mojih političkih zapisaka (From my political notes; 1914); Iz emigracije (From exile, 4 vols.; 1919–27); Malo istine iz naše nedavne prošlosti (Some truth about our recent past; 1921); Gdje smo to mi i na čemu smo? (Where are we and why? 1927); and Rapalski ugovor (The Treaty of Rapallo; 1922). POTOPEANU Gheorghe (15 April 1889, Târgoviște–1966, Bucharest), Romanian general and politician. From 1908 to 1910 Potopeanu studied at the Artillery, Engineering, and Naval Military School in Bucharest. He fought in World War I. In 1917 he was promoted to major. In 1918 he supervised the withdrawal of German troops from Romania. From 1919 to 1921 he studied at the Military College in Paris. From 1929 to 1933 he was chief of the operational section of the General Staff. In 1933 he was promoted to colonel. From 1935 to 1938 he served as military attaché in France and Belgium. After returning to Romania, he became commander of the Fifth Artillery Brigade. In 1939 he was promoted to brigadier general. In 1940 he was chief of staff of the Second Army and head of a mixed Romanian-German commission supervising a population exchange between Romania and Bulgaria in connection with the territorial concessions granted to Bulgaria. From January to May 1941, after General Ion Antonescu had suppressed a rebellion by the Iron Guard, Potopeanu served as minister of economy in Antonescu's government. In June 1941, after the Third Reich invaded the Soviet Union, Potopeanu became commander of the First Frontier Division, which entered southern Bessarabia. From 1943 to 1944 he was commander of the Second and Seventh Army Corps, and from February to March 1944 he was head of the Romanian administration in Transnistria. After handing over the administration of Transnistria to the withdrawing German troops, Potopeanu, organized (among other things) the repatriation of the local Jews and Romanians.

In the summer of 1944 Potopeanu belonged to a group of officers who established cooperation with the opposition and wanted Romania to sever its alliance with the Third Reich and enter the war on the Allied side. After the coup d'état of 23 August 1944 and the overthrow of Antonescu, Potopeanu served as minister of economy and finance until October 1944, when he was arrested for "war crimes" and placed in a military prison in Bucharest. Released at the end of 1944 owing to a lack of evidence and the intercession of Prime Minister General Constantin Sănătescu, Potopeanu was placed under house arrest. In 1945 he was arrested for the second time but was released after a few months. In 1948 he was arrested again, accused of war crimes, and condemned to five years in prison. Arrested for the fourth time in 1957, he was sentenced to fifteen years in a harsh prison for "spying for foreign powers." Potopeanu was held successively in prisons in Jilava, Pitești, Dej, and Gherla, from which he was released in 1963. (LW)

POZDERAC Hamdija (15 January 1924, Cazin–6 April 1988, Sarajevo), Muslim Communist activist from Bosnia.

Pozderac studied philosophy at the University of Belgrade and attended the Higher Party School in Moscow. In 1943 he became a member of the Communist Party of Yugoslavia (CPY), which was renamed the League of Communists of Yugoslavia (LCY) in 1952. After the end of World War II, Pozderac rose through the party ranks. He initially served as secretary of the local committee of the CPY in Bihać. He lectured in the Department of Political Science of the University of Sarajevo. He was a member of the Central Committee (CC) of the League of Communists of Bosnia and Herzegovina (LCBH) (1965–69, 1974–78, and from 1982 on), a member of the Executive Committee of the CC of the LCBH (1966–69), and a member of the Secretariat of the CC of the LCBH (1969–71). He belonged to the Presidium of the CC of the LCBH (1974–78) and served as president of the Assembly of the Socialist Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina (1971–78) and chairman of the CC of the LCBH (1982–84). He sat on the LCY CC and on the LCY CC Presidium (1979–86). In May 1986 Pozderac became a member of the presidency of the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (SFRY), and on 15 May 1987 he was appointed vice-president of the SFRY. Pozderac's career ended as a result of a great scandal linked to the embezzlement of funds by Agrokomerc, a company with which he had personal and family ties. In addition, the weekly Nin alleged that Pozderac's book, Od istorijsko ka konkretnoj inicijativi (From historical to concrete initiatives), was plagiarized. On 12 September 1987 Pozderac resigned. He was elected, though, to a commission that dealt with constitutional amendments. A few months later he died of a stroke. (AO)

POZSGAY Imre (26 November 1933, Kóny), Hungarian Communist activist and post-Communist politician. In 1957 Pozsgay graduated from the Department of History and Marxism-Leninism at the Lenin Institute in Budapest. In 1950–56 he was a member of the Hungarian Workers' Party, and from 1956 to 1989, the Hungarian Socialist Workers' Party (HSWP). From 1957 he worked in the HSWP committee in Bács-Kiskun County. From 1965 he was head of its agitation and propaganda department, and from 1968, its secretary. From 1969 Pozsgay was active in Budapest, where he became head of the Department of the Press of the HSWP Central Committee (CC), and in 1971, deputy editor-in-chief of the party monthly, Társadalmi Szemle. From 1975 Pozsgay was deputy minister of culture, in 1976–80 minister of culture, and from 1980 to 1982 minister of culture and education. From 1980 he was a member of the HSWP CC. Pozsgay entered into conflict with deputy prime minister György Aczél and left the government to become general secretary of the National Council of the Patriotic Popular Front (PPF; 1982–88). Under Pozsgay's leadership the PPF became a forum for numerous initiatives, while he became a leader of the reform wing in the party. He established contacts with the so-called people's national opposition, especially with the poet Sándor Csoóri. In September 1987 Pozsgay took part in a meeting of the followers of this movement in Lakitelek, where the Hungarian Democratic Forum (HDF), the first independent party, came into being. A few weeks later Pozsgay gave the PPF organ, Magyar Nemzet, an interview about the meeting and the HDF program. In May 1988 Pozsgay was elected to the CC Politburo, and from June 1989 he was a member of its four-man Presidium, along with Rezső Nyers, Miklós Németh, and Károly Grósz. From June 1988 to May 1990 Pozsgay was minister of state. In January 1989 he called the 1956 revolution a "people's uprising" instead of the traditional "counterrevolution," thus breaking an ideological taboo.

In the summer of 1989 Pozsgay presided over the HSWP delegation to Hungarian round table talks. He was a co-founder of the Hungarian Socialist Party (HSP), which emerged from the dissolved HSWP in October 1989. From May to November 1990 Pozsgay was the HSP deputy chairman. He personified the attempts at an evolutionary transition from communism to democracy. In the fall of 1989 Pozsgay was the HSP candidate for president, but most of the parties, excluding the HSP, demanded that presidential elections be held after the parliamentary elections. In a referendum of November 1989 this postulate was supported by 50.1 percent of the votes, thus making Pozsgay's candidacy invalid. In 1983–94 Pozsgay was an MP, and from April to November 1990 he was head of the HSP parliamentary club. In November 1990 he left the HSP and formed the National Democratic Union, which ceased to exist in 1996. From 1997 he worked for the HDF. In the elections of 1994 and 1998 Pozsgay lost, and in 2002 he did not even run. From 1991 Pozsgay was a professor of political science at the University of Debrecen, and in 1995–2000, rector of St. Laszlo University in Budapest. Pozsgay published the memoirs Politikuspályá a pártállamban és a rendszerváltásban (A political career in a party state and during the systemic transformation; 1993) and Koronatanú és tettestárs (Crown witness and participant; 1998). PRCHALA Lev (23 March 1892, Ostrava–11 June 1963, Feldbach, Austria), Czech general. After graduating from a German high school in Frýdek, Prchala briefly studied law at the University of Vienna. However, he did not finish his studies; instead he joined the Austro-Hungarian Army and graduated from a military school in Trieste. From 1914 to 1916 Prchala served as an officer on the eastern front. Taken prisoner by the Russians, he soon enlisted in the Czechoslovak Legion in Russia; in it he held various command positions until 1920. He also served as Czechoslovak delegate to the command of the White Russian forces led by Admiral Aleksandr Kolchak. In 1921–23 Prchala studied at the Military College in Paris. After returning to Czechoslovakia, he commanded a mountain brigade in Ružomberok for two years and then a division in Užhorod (Uzhhorod) from 1925 to 1931. In 1925 he was promoted to brigadier general, in 1928 to major general, and in 1936 to general of the army. From 1931 to 1933 Prchala served as deputy chief of the General Staff in Prague. Later he served as district military commander in eastern Slovakia and Transcarpathian Ruthenia until 1939. In March 1939 he served for nine days as minister of interior, finance, and transport in the government of autonomous Subcarpathian Ruthenia. After 15 March 1939 he attempted to defend Subcarpathian Ruthenia from invading Hungarian troops, but in vain.

In May 1939, after the capitulation of Czechoslovakia, Prchala made his way to Poland, where he became commander of the Czechoslovak Legion, which was formally established by a decree of 3 September 1939 issued by President Ignacy Mościcki. After the failure of Poland in the September 1939 campaign, Prchala made his way via Romania to France and then to Great Britain. In exile he cooperated politically with conservative groups, aspiring to a leadership position among the Czechoslovak émigrés. An opponent of Edvard Beneš and his supporters, Prchala worked with Štefan Osuský and Milan Hodža. After the end of World War II, he remained in exile in London, where he founded the Czech National Council and became its chairman. He worked with Polish and Slovak emigrant groups, as well as with the circle of Wenzel Jaksch, a German Social Democrat. Prchala promoted the project of a Central European federation. In 1945 the Czechoslovak government stripped him of his rank of general of the army. (PU)

PREISS Jaroslav (8 December 1870, Přeštice–29 April 1946, Prague), Czech lawyer and economist. Preiss graduated in law from the Czech University in Prague. He briefly practiced as an attorney in České Budějovice. In 1900 he became active in the Young Czech Party and edited the economic column of Národní listy, a press organ of this party. In 1902 he became secretary of the Society of Czech Textile Industrialists. In 1904 he began working in Živnostenská Banka, the leading Czech bank, first as the editor of its weekly, Finanční listy, and then as head of an industrial and mortgage department. From 1910 to 1907 Preiss was deputy director general for contacts with Russia and the Polish territories. He subsequently served as director general of the bank until 1938 and then as chairman of its supervisory board. He transformed this bank into a corporate giant with a very strong position in the Czechoslovak economy. From 1908 to 1913 Preiss sat on the Czech Land Diet on the ticket of the Young Czech Party. He advocated economic cooperation among the Slavic nations, and in 1908 he even proposed the establishment of a Slavic bank. He also served as chairman of the Russian-Czech Club. He saw Russia as the main market for Czech heavy industry. During the war, as a member of a secret Czech political organization called Mafia (Mafie), Preiss actively worked for independence from the Habsburg monarchy. Between June and July 1916 he was imprisoned on a charge of high treason.

In October 1918 Preiss took part in Geneva negotiations between the pro-independence movements at home and in exile. From 1918 to 1920 he sat on the Revolutionary National Assembly on the slate of Czechoslovak National Democracy, in which he had been active throughout the interwar period. Initially he was designated for the post of first minister of finance, but eventually his friend Alois Rašín was given this position. However, Preiss still had great influence on financial policy. He helped Rašín to draft reform plans, including one for a monetary reform carried out in 1919, and he also supported Rašín's deflation policy. In 1918–30 Preiss was deputy chairman, and in 1930–39 chairman, of the Central Union of Czech Industrialists. Preiss's position began to weaken in the mid-1930s, when he opposed the devaluation of the Czech crown and drifted politically toward the radical right wing.

During the German occupation Preiss attempted to protect the Czech economy from the expansion of German monopolies; as a result, in 1942 he was punished with a high fine by a German court. Arrested in 1945 and accused of collaboration with the occupier, Preiss died two days after his release. Preiss was the author of numerous works in economics, including Z tendencí hospodářského vývoje současná (From the tendencies of present economic development; 1905); Průmysl a banky (Industry and the banks; 1912); and O vývoji a úkolech československého průmyslu (On the development and tasks of Czechoslovak industry; 1928). Preiss directed many cultural institutions, including the National Museum, which he also supported financially. He was an enthusiastic bibliophile; his library included around forty thousand volumes and was the second largest collection in the country, after the private library of President Tomáš Garrigue Masaryk. PRELOG Vladimír (23 July 1906, Sarajevo–7 January 1998, Zurich, Switzerland), Swiss chemist of Croatian descent. In 1915 Prelog's family moved from Sarajevo to Zagreb, where he attended high school. From 1924 to 1929 he studied chemistry at the Czech Institute of Technology, Prague, and subsequently worked in a laboratory in Prague. In 1935 he returned to Zagreb, where he taught organic chemistry at the University of Zagreb. He also initiated research into the chemistry of quinine and related compounds. Working in Zagreb, Prelog succeeded in carrying out the first synthesis of adamantane, a hydrocarbon with a rare alicyclic structure. In 1942, along with his wife, Prelog went to Switzerland on the invitation of Leopold Ružička, the co-winner (with Adolf Butenandt) of the 1939 Nobel Prize in Chemistry. Prelog began working in the Organic Chemistry Laboratory at the Swiss Federal Institute of Technology (Eidgenössische Technische Hochschule) in Zurich. In 1952 he obtained a professorship. After Ružička retired, Prelog succeeded him as head of the Organic Chemistry Laboratory (1957–65). In 1959 he received Swiss citizenship. In 1961 he was elected a foreign associate of the U.S. National Academy of Sciences, and in 1962 he became a member of the Royal Academy of Britain. Prelog focused his research primarily on the stereochemistry of organic molecules and reactions. Along with Robert Cahn and Sir Christopher Ingold, he developed a method for specifying the chirality of molecules (the so-called CIP system, from the names of Cahn-Ingold-Prelog). Along with John Warcup Cornforth, Prelog was awarded the 1975 Nobel Prize for Chemistry for his work on the stereochemistry of organic molecules and reactions. In 1976 Prelog retired. In 1986 he became an honorary member of the Croatian Academy of Sciences and Arts. In 1991, along with 109 other Nobel Prize winners, he signed an appeal for peace in Croatia. In 1991 in the United States he published his memoirs, My 132 Semesters of Chemistry Studies. (AO)

PRENNUSHI Vinçenc (4 September 1885, Shkodër–19 March 1949, Durrës), Albanian Roman Catholic bishop, writer, poet, and translator. In his youth Prennushi fought in one of the anti-Turkish uprisings, and he was imprisoned for doing so. After his release he completed school in Shkodër and then studied philosophy and theology in Salzburg. In 1908 he joined the Franciscan order. At first Prennushi managed a monastic publishing house, and then he directed a school run by the order. From 1929 to 1935 he served as a Franciscan provincial. In 1936 he was elevated to the position of bishop of Sapa, and in 1940 he became archbishop of the diocese of Durrës-Tirana. After the death of the Primate of Albania, Gaspër Thaçi, in 1946 Prennushi took over his duties. He participated in talks with the Communist leadership on the status of the Catholic Church, refusing to sever ties with the Holy See or to agree to the total subordination of the Church to the authorities. Arrested in February 1947, Prennushi was sentenced to twenty years in prison by a military court in November 1947. The indictment was issued on the grounds that Prennushi had accepted material benefits from the Italians (a Fiat car, which he used in his pastoral work) and maintained contacts with British diplomats.

Prennushi served the sentence in Durrës, where he was tortured and forced to do hard manual labor. He died in a prison hospital. Prennushi wrote about twenty literary works; the most noted is a collection of lyrical poems, Gjeth e lule (Leaves and flowers; 1925). He translated (among other works) the classics of German Romanticism and the novel Quo vadis, by Henryk Sienkiewicz. Prennushi was also the author of many pastoral works, including a biography of St. Francis of Assisi and a ten-volume discussion of the principles of Catholic teaching. He was co-editor of the journals Hylli i Drites and Zani i Shen Ndout. He collected Albanian folk songs. He also published Visari Komtar (The national treasure; 1911) and Nder lamije te demokracise se vertete (About the advantages of true democracy; 1922). (TC)

PREZAN Constantin (27 January 1861, Butimanu–27 August 1943, Schinetea), Romanian marshal. After finishing high school in Bucharest, Prezan graduated from the Infantry and Cavalry Officers' School and the Artillery and Engineering School there. He subsequently went to France, where he continued his education at a school for artillery and engineering officers in Fontainebleau. After returning to Romania, Prezan was promoted to lieutenant in 1880. He was known as a brilliant military engineer. From 1886 to 1900 Prezan taught fortifications at the Artillery and Engineering School. Appointed colonel in 1895, he worked in the General Staff and served as aide-de-camp to King Ferdinand. In 1910 he became commander of an infantry division. In 1913 he fought in the Second Balkan War. In 1914 he became commander of the Third Corps, and in 1915, commander of the Fourth Army.

When Romania entered World War I in 1916, Prezan was appointed commander of the North Army, which fought in Transylvania. At the end of 1916 he assumed command of an army group that fought against the Germans, who were attacking Bucharest. Forced to retreat with the remnants of his army to Moldavia in the same year, Prezan was promoted to general and appointed chief of the General Staff. In April 1917, along with Premier Ion Brătianu, Prezan made a visit to St. Petersburg, where he was assured that Romania would receive assistance during a counteroffensive that was planned for the summer. Although the Romanians achieved several victories during the summer, their situation did not improve because of the fall of Russia. In December 1917, in the face of a German victory in the east and the necessity of working out a cease-fire, King Ferdinand appointed Prezan to the post of commander-in-chief of the army, which he held until 1920. In the autumn of 1918, upon the collapse of the Central Powers, Prezan agreed with Premier Brătianu that Romania should reenter the war. In 1919 the Romanian Army, led by Prezan, entered Transylvania, Banat, and then Budapest, where it overthrew the Communist government of Béla Kun. These successes won the Romanian delegation a very advantageous position at the Paris Peace Conference and greatly helped Romania to enlarge its territory. In 1920 Prezan retired. He reentered politics in 1930, when, as a result of a government crisis, King Charles II returned to Romania and assumed the throne. Appointed marshal, Prezan was entrusted with the mission of forming a nonparty government, but he was unsuccessful. In the same year he withdrew from public life for good. He settled in Italy. Shortly before his death Prezan returned to Romania and settled on his Moldavian estate, where he died. (LW)

PREŽIHOV Voranc [originally Lovro Kuhar] (10 August 1893, Kotlje, near Ravne na Koroškem–18 February 1950, Maribor), Slovene Communist writer and political activist. Born into a peasant family in Carinthia, from 1899 to 1907 Prežihov attended school and subsequently worked as a servant and a carpenter. In 1911 he left his village and tried to get to America to escape poverty, but after a few months he returned home from Trieste. From 1912 to 1913 he continued his education at a cooperative school in Ljubljana. His first publications appeared at that time. In 1916, during World War I, Prežihov, who served in the Austro-Hungarian Army, deserted from the Tirolean front to the Italian side. Because of this, he was sentenced to death in absentia. Initially the Italians put him in prison, but in September 1918 they admitted him to the Yugoslav Legion. After the war, Prežihov returned to his native region and joined the Communist movement. On his initiative, a branch of the Socialist Workers' Party of Yugoslavia (Socijalistička Radnička Partija Jugoslavije [SRPJ]) was established in Guštanj, Carinthia, on 1 May 1920. The SRPJ was renamed the Communist Party of Yugoslavia (CPY) in June 1920. After the CPY was declared illegal in 1921, Prežihov continued his activities underground. When King Alexander I established a dictatorship in 1929 and increased measures against the Communist movement, Prežihov was sentenced in absentia to six years' imprisonment. Prežihov had already gone to Vienna, where he served as secretary of the Yugoslav branch of the International Organization for Aid to Revolutionaries. In December 1932 he became an editor of Delo, a newspaper of the Slovene and Italian Communists. On the orders of the CPY Prežihov traveled to Moscow and Paris. In 1934 he became a member of the CPY Central Committee (CC). Arrested in March 1936 in Prague and handed over to the Austrian authorities, he spent thirteen months in prison. In August 1937 he went to Paris, where he was charged with various responsibilities, including the printing of CPY newspapers and sending Yugoslav volunteers to the civil war in Spain.

In 1939, against the will of Josip Broz Tito, Prežihov returned from Paris to Ljubljana. On the orders of Edvard Kardelj, he was isolated from the party. Arrested in January 1943, he was held by the Italians. Prežihov was imprisoned in Ljubljana, Begunje, Berlin, and the Sachsenhausen concentration camp; from there he was transferred to Mauthausen in February 1945. After the war, Prežihov returned to his native village of Prežih. In November 1945 he was elected to the Communist parliament of Yugoslavia. In November 1949 he settled in Maribor. After the war, he was the main representative of Socialist realism in Slovene literature. His most important works include the collection of stories Samorastniki (1940; The Self-Sown, 1983), addressing the issues of his native Carinthia; Povesti (Stories; 1925); Doberdob (1940); Borba na tujih tleh (Struggle on foreign land; 1946); Solzice (Lilies of the valley; 1949); Kanjuh iz Zagate (Kanjuh from Zagata; 1952); and Ljubez na odoru (Love on a precipice; 1954). PRIBIĆEVIĆ Adam (24 December 1880, Hrvatska Kostajnica–1957, Canada), Serbian politician. Pribićević was the brother of Svetozar Pribićević and Valerijan Pribićević. After graduating from a high school in Sremski Karlovci, he studied law in Zagreb. He began his political activities by joining the Independent Serbian Party (Srpska Samostalna Stranka [SSS]). He published articles in the periodicals Srbobrana and Srpsko kolo. A supporter of the social philosophy of Tomáš Garrigue Masaryk, Pribićević emphasized the role of peasants in the social development of Serbia. Along with a group of Serbian politicians from Croatia (including his brother Valerijan), Pribićević was arrested during a mounting conflict between the Croatian-Serbian Coalition and the Hungarian authorities. This conflict intensified with the annexation of Bosnia and Herzegovina by Austria-Hungary in 1908. Pribićević was sentenced to twelve years' imprisonment for allegedly maintaining secret contacts with the Serbian government, but in 1910 the sentence was quashed and he was released. He then worked on the editorial staff of Srpsko kolo. In 1913 in Belgrade Pribićević talked with the Serbian prime minister, Nikola Pašić, whom he forewarned about a compromise between the Croatian-Serbian Coalition and the Hungarian government. After the outbreak of World War I, Pribićević was inducted into the Austro-Hungarian Army and sent to the Galician front. After the war he lived in Belgrade and worked as an editor of the periodical Narod. In 1924 he settled in Kosovo, where he was active in the Independent Democratic Party (Samostalna Demokratska Stranka [SDS]), founded by his brother Svetozar. He also edited the periodical Reč. After the death of Svetozar, Pribićević was elected to parliament in 1936. In 1938 he became chairman of the SDS. After the fall of Yugoslavia in April 1941, he went into exile. (WR) PRIBIĆEVIĆ Svetozar (26 October 1875, Hrvatska Kostajnica–15 September 1936, Prague), Serbian politician born in Croatia, the brother of Adam Pribićević and Valerijan Pribićević. After graduating from a high school in Sremski Karlovci (1894), Pribićević studied mathematics and physics in Zagreb. While a student, he was active in the Serbian and Croatian Progressive Youth (Napredna Srpska i Hrvatska Omladina), which sought cooperation between Serbia and Croatia within the framework of the Habsburg empire. As chairman of the Serbian faction, Pribićević worked out the main program guidelines, which were published in the periodical Narodna misao in the article “Misao vodilja Srba i Hrvata” (Main thoughts of Serbs and Croats) in 1897. This article pointed to the ethnic unity of Serbs and Croats and consequently called for national integration as the main direction of political activities. After completing his studies, Pribićević worked as a teacher in a Serbian school in Pankrac and later in Karlovac. In 1902 he began editing the periodical Novi Srborban, a press organ of the Independent Serbian Party (Srpska Samostalna Stranka [SSS]). His work as head of this periodical played a role in the establishment of the Croatian-Serbian Coalition (12 December 1905), which consisted of the SSS and Croatian parties. Pribićević briefly succeeded Franjo Supilo after the latter resigned as president of this coalition in 1910. Although Pribićević’s policy toward Austria-Hungary was viewed as almost opportunistic by the radicals, after the outbreak of World War I he was interned, and it was not until 1917 that he was able to resume his political activities.

In October 1918, after returning to Zagreb, Pribićević was elected vice-president of the newly established National Council of Slovenes, Croats, and Serbs. On 29

October 1918 he announced the severance of state ties between Croatia and Austria-Hungary. On 24 November 1918 he brought about an agreement with the Kingdom of Serbia on the establishment of a state, but the details of its political system remained an open issue. This de facto determined the unitary character of the Kingdom of Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes (SHS), which caused strong protests by the supporters of Stjepan Radić. On 7 December 1918 Pribićević assumed the post of minister of interior in the first government of the SHS, and he held this post until February 1920. On 15 February 1919 the Democratic Union had been established at a meeting of political parties from the former Austria-Hungary. In 1920 the Democratic Union was transformed into the Serbian Democratic Party (Srpska Demokratska Stranka [SDS]). The SDS program called for the centralization of the state. Pribićević lost the elections for head of the SDS, mostly because of his limited knowledge of the Kingdom of Serbia and concern that he might be rejected by the people there, and Ljubomir Davidović became head of the party. Because of the centralism of its program and its goal of the integration of the state, the SDS opposed all decentralizing forces and resorted to strong repressive measures. In his capacity as minister of interior, Pribićević played a certain role in those measures, directing the main thrust of persecutions against the Croatian Republican Peasant Party led by Radić. Pribićević was also instrumental in the support the SDS gave to the National Radical Party in the struggle for a centralist model for the constitution of June 1921 (the so-called Vidovdan Constitution). With the passing of time the two parties increasingly drifted apart. While some of the SDS members, led by Davidović, were willing to mitigate the centralism of the state and seek cooperation with Radić, Pribićević insisted on an alliance with the National Radical Party, led by Nikola Pašić. As a result, on 26 March 1924 Pribićević left the SDS, and along with his supporters he joined the National Radical Party, establishing the National Bloc.

After 1918 Pribićević realized that his concept of Yugoslavism was different from the centralist system defined by the 1921 constitution. This system was dominated by the National Radical Party politicians, the supporters of Greater Serbian nationalism, and he felt that this was the main reason for the permanent crisis of the state. From May 1920 to December 1922, from March to July 1924, and from November 1924 to July 1925 Pribićević served as minister of education. In 1925 he severed his ties with the National Radical Party and established the Independent Democratic Party (Samostalna Demokratska Stranka). As a result of the increasing chaos in the state, Pribićević decided to reach a compromise, enter into cooperation with Radić, and establish the Peasant Democratic Coalition with the Croat Peasant Party on 11 November 1927. Pribičević insisted on the revision and then the repeal of the centralist constitution. After the assassination of Radić in 1928, Pribičević became leader of the opposition, and his views evolved from an uncritical support of the centralized and authoritarian state to the gradual recognition of the separate ethnic identity of the Croats and a greater support of federalism.

After King Alexander I proclaimed a dictatorship (6 January 1929) and outlawed all political opposition parties, Pribičević was arrested and sent to Brus in Serbia and then to a hospital in Belgrade, where he was interned. After the intervention of the president of Czechoslovakia, Tomáš Garrigue Masaryk, and also because Pribičević went on a hunger strike, in July 1931 he was allowed to go to Prague. Pribičević fully blamed King Alexander for the conflicts and social tensions in Yugoslavia, and he did not hesitate to paint the monarch's activities black—for instance, in La dictature du roi Alexandre (The dictatorship of King Alexander; 1933). Toward the end of his life Pribičević firmly supported a republican model for the future political system of Yugoslavia, based on a federation of its constituent nations. (AG)

PRIBIČEVIĆ Valerijan (21 March 1870, Hrvatska Dubica–July 1941, Split), Serbian politician. Pribičević was the brother of Adam Pribičević and Svetozar Pribičević. After graduating from a seminary in Sremski Karlovci, he entered the Theological Academy in Kiev and later studied philosophy in Leipzig and Vienna. After returning home, Pribičević, together with his brothers, was active in the Independent Serbian Party (Srpska Samostalna Stranka [SSS]) and in the Croatian-Serbian Coalition. Along with a group of Serbian politicians from Croatia (including his brother Adam), Pribičević was arrested during a mounting conflict between the Croatian-Serbian Coalition and the Hungarian authorities. This conflict intensified with the annexation of Bosnia and Herzegovina by Austria-Hungary in 1908. Pribičević was sentenced to twelve years' imprisonment for allegedly maintaining secret contacts with the Serbian government, but in 1910 the sentence was quashed and he was released. He became an archimandrite of the Jazak monastery. In 1914 he was elected to the Croatian National Assembly on the ticket of the Croatian-Serbian Coalition. At the beginning of World War I he was interned. In 1917 he left the party and supported the May Declaration, which advocated that the Slavic nations of the Austro-Hungarian Empire be united into a common state but under Habsburg rule. In January 1918 Pribičević began editing Glas Slovenaca, Hrvata i Srba, promoting a program of uniting the Slavic nations under Habsburg rule and the Serbian nation into a common state. In the Kingdom of Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes, Pribičević served as a member of parliament on the ticket of the Democratic Union, which was transformed into the Serbian Democratic Party (Srpska Demokratska Stranka) in 1920. In 1924 he became active in the Independent Democratic Party (Samostalna Demokratska Stranka), founded by his brother Svetozar. (AO)

PRÍDAVOK Peter (27 November 1902, Stankovany–15 February 1966, London), Slovak politician. Prídavok studied theology in Innsbruck and then classical and Slavic philology at Charles University in Prague from 1923 to 1925. In 1926–29 he was executive editor of the weekly Rodobrana, which promoted a radical program of Slovak autonomy. He also edited the daily Slovák, a press organ of Hlinka's Slovak People's Party (Hlinková Slovenská Ľudová Strana [HSL'S]), until 1931. In the HSL'S, Prídavok was a member of the group led by Karol Sidor. From 1938 to 1939 Prídavok was head of a Slovak press agency and head of the press department of the Slovak government. After Slovak independence was declared on 14 March 1939, he emigrated to Poland and protested the pro-German policy of the government. Following the German aggression against Poland in September 1939, he went to Yugoslavia and then to France. In Paris, along with Milan Hodža, Prídavok established the Slovak National Council, which was in opposition to the Czechoslovak National Committee headed by Edvard Beneš. After Germany attacked France in 1940, Prídavok went to Great Britain. Briefly interned, in 1943 he organized the Slovak National Council in London. He worked with Sidor, the Slovak ambassador to the Vatican, and maintained close contacts with the Polish émigré community. He published articles in The Catholic Herald and other periodicals, criticizing the pro-Soviet policy of Beneš and protesting against the program to reestablish a unitary Czechoslovakia. He called for the establishment of a Central European federation, with Slovakia as a rightful member. In 1943 Prídavok became chairman and later vice-chairman of the Central European Federal Club in London. After the war, along with Sidor, he established the Slovak National Council Abroad in 1948. In 1952 Prídavok became a journalist and later the head of the Slovak section of the BBC. (MG)

PRINCIP Gavrilo (25 July 1894, Gornji Obljaj, Bosnia–28 June 1918, Theresienstadt, Austria), Serbian revolutionary who assassinated Archduke Francis Ferdinand. The assassination of the archduke provided the pretext for Austria-Hungary to declare war on Serbia and thus precipitated World War I. Born into a Bosnian Serb peasant family, Princip attended a gymnasium in Belgrade but never graduated. In 1911, while a student, he joined a student group of the Serbo-Croat Progressive Organization, where he met Ivo Andrić, the future famous writer. Princip was also active in the Young Bosnia (Mlada Bosna) organization, which was a part of Omladina, a great revolutionary youth movement. Young Bosnia sought to destroy the Habsburg monarchy and to unite the South Slavic peoples into a federal nation under Serbian leadership. The organization resorted to acts of terror. In 1912 Princip joined a secret organization of Serbian nationalists, Union or Death (Ujedinjenje ili Smrt), known as the Black Hand (Crna Ruka), where he underwent terrorist training. When the government in Vienna declared a state of emergency in Bosnia and ordered army maneuvers announcing that the Archduke Francis Ferdinand would pay an official visit to Sarajevo, Young Bosnia, with the help of the Black Hand, began preparations for an assassination. On 28 June 1914 in Sarajevo, Nedeljko Čabrinović threw a bomb at the archduke's car, but his attempt failed. Soon Princip fired deadly shots at Francis Ferdinand and his wife Sophie, Duchess von Hohenberg (née Chotek). Princip was caught on the spot. On 28 October 1914 he was sentenced to twenty years' penal servitude, the maximum penalty allowed for a person under the age of twenty on the day of his crime. Princip died of tuberculosis in a prison hospital. In Yugoslavia he is regarded as a national hero. (AO)

PRISHTINA Hasan bey (1873, Vučitern–14 August 1933, Salonika), Albanian independence activist from Kosovo. Prishtina graduated from a French lycée in Salonika and subsequently studied law in Istanbul. After completing his studies, he became a clerk in Skopje, where he established contacts with national organizations. In 1908–12 he served as an MP from Prishtina to the Young Turk parliament. He protested in parliament against the atrocities committed by Turkish troops in Kosovo. On 21–25 May 1912 Prishtina co-organized a meeting of tribal leaders in the region of Junik; at this meeting a decision was made to start an anti-Turkish uprising, and he became its de facto political leader. Along with Bajram Curri, Isa Boletini, and other leaders, Prishtina was a co-author of a memorandum of August 1912 to the Turkish authorities that demanded broad autonomy for the Albanians who lived in the four European vilayets (provinces). Prishtina called for close cooperation with the Macedonians in order to establish an autonomous Albanian-Macedonian state. In November 1912 Prishtina represented the district of Prishtina at the sessions of the National Assembly in Vlorë and was also a signatory of the independence declaration. From 15 March to 20 May 1914 he served as minister of post and telegraphs in the government of Prince Wilhelm von Wied.

After World War I, Prishtina became aligned with the Committee for the Defense of Kosovo and was its delegate to the Paris Peace Conference. He helped to organize a congress in Lushnjë (January 1920) at which a decision was made about the structure of the government. In 1921, in the first elections in independent Albania, Prishtina won a seat as a deputy from Dibra. Supported by some tribal leaders from the north, he staged a coup d'état, after which he served as prime minister of Albania for five days (7–12 December 1921). Prishtina was removed from power by troops faithful to Ahmed Zogu. During the 1924 revolution Prishtina fought against the Serbs in the north of the country and established ties with Macedonian separatists. After the failure of the revolution, he made his way via Hungary to Italy, then to Bulgaria, and finally to Greece, where he spent most of his time. After Luigj Gurakuqi was killed in March 1925, Prishtina came to the conclusion that Zogu must be physically removed. In 1926 he attended a meeting of Albanian political leaders in emigration in Zadar, where plans to overthrow Zogu's rule were discussed. The plans for a coup failed, as the neighboring countries did not support a takeover of power by the émigrés. Prishtina was one of the candidates who would have taken over power from Zogu. In 1928, following an unsuccessful attempt to assassinate Zogu in the Vienna Opera House, the authorities in Tirana sentenced Prishtina to death. He was also hunted down by Yugoslav agents. Prishtina was shot and killed in Cafe Astoria, Salonika, by Ibrahim Xhelo, who worked for Zogu. The assassin was captured and explained during his trial that while talking to Prishtina, he had learned that Prishtina was planning to assassinate the king. In 1977 Prishtina's ashes were transferred from Salonika to Albania. (TC)

PRODANOVIĆ Jaša (23 April 1867, Čačak–1 May 1948, Belgrade), Serbian politician and writer. Prodanović attended high schools in Čačak and Belgrade. He subsequently studied at the School of Mathematics and Natural Sciences of the University of Belgrade until 1890. While a student, Prodanović established ties with the Socialist youth movement. He was one of the editors of the collected writings of Svetozar Marković, a pioneer of socialism in the Balkans. He also edited the youth periodicals Srpska misao and Narodna misao. In 1890 Prodanović became a high school teacher and went into journalism and literary criticism. In 1901 he joined the Independent Radical Party (Samostalna Radikalna Stranka [SRS]), a faction of the Radical Party. From 1902 to 1912 (on and off) he edited an SRS periodical, Odjek. In 1903 Prodanović became an MP in the Serbian parliament. From 1909 to 1911 he served as minister of the economy in the government of Stojan Novaković and was instrumental in the adoption of a 1911 law on workers' insurance.

In 1919 Prodanović left the SRS and was one of the founders of the Yugoslav Republican Democratic Party (Jugoslovenska Republikanska Demokratska Stranka [JRDS]), which called for the introduction of a republican federal system. In the elections of 28 November 1920 the JRDS obtained 0.8 percent of the vote and won three seats. Although his party had little electoral support, Prodanović was highly respected on the political scene. In the 1920s he sharply criticized the way the parliamentary system functioned. He opposed the authoritarian style of King Alexander I and criticized the constitution promulgated by the king on 3 September 1931. The JRDS supported the Zagreb Manifesto of November 1932, in which absolutism, centralism, and unitarism were condemned. In March 1945, toward the end of World War II, Prodanović became deputy prime minister of the federal government established by Josip Broz Tito on 1 February 1946, and he held this post until the end of his life, endorsing the shift to totalitarian rule in Yugoslavia. Prodanović's major works include Ustavni razvitak i ustavne borbe u Srbiji (Constitutional development and the struggle for a constitution in Serbia; 1936) and Istorija političkih stranaka i struja u Srbiji (The history of political parties in Serbia; 1947). Prodanović also edited anthologies of works by Jovan Ilić (1929), Svetislav Vulović (1932), and Jovan Jovanović Zmaj (1933–37), as well as the collection Antologija narodne poezije (Anthology of national poetry; 1938). PRODEV Stefan (15 September 1927, Sofia), Bulgarian Communist journalist and political activist. From 1943 Prodev belonged to the Communist Youth Union. After graduating from high school (1946), he worked on the newspaper Trud (1946–48), and he was editor of Literaturne Noviny (1962–64) and Bulgarska Muzyka (1965). From 1965 to 1979 Prodev was editor-in-chief of Paralele and later of the periodicals Sofia (1979–84) and Narodna Kultura (from 1984). He won a reputation as a reporter. Some of his articles were published in book form and were very popular because of his vivid style and his interest in authentic problems of the common folk. A member of the Bulgarian Communist Party (BCP), Prodev knew how to zigzag between the BCP Central Committee Department of Propaganda and popular expectations. This strengthened his reputation as an unorthodox Communist, while Narodna Kultura became known as an official but crypto-opposition periodical. In 1988 Prodev joined the Independent Discussion Club for the Support of Glasnost and Perestroika, but he left it under official pressure. He lost his position as head of Narodna Kultura, and this made him look like a victim of the regime. After the fall of Todor Zhivkov in November 1989, Prodev returned to his previous position, and in January 1990 he became chairman of the Association of Bulgarian Journalists. He also became editor-in-chief of Duma, the main organ of the (post-Communist) Bulgarian Socialist Party (BSP). Initially the paper published articles settling past accounts, but soon it began to combat the anti-Communist opposition. Prodev was a member of the BSP leadership in 1990–96 and was an MP on behalf of the party (1991–97).

In 1999 he sharply criticized NATO air raids on the new Yugoslavia and the opening of Bulgarian air space for these operations. In 1999 Duma went bankrupt. In 2001 Prodev published Nepisani razkazi (Unrecorded tales), in which he summed up the first ten years of systemic transformation from the post-Communist point of view. (AG)

PROHÁSZKA Ottokár (10 October 1858, Nyitra [Nitra, now in Slovakia]–2 April 1927, Budapest), Hungarian bishop. Prohászka's father was a Moravian officer, and his mother was a daughter of a German baker. It was only while a high school student that he learned to speak Hungarian. From 1875 to 1882 he studied at the Collegium Germanico-Hungaricum in Rome. In 1881 he took holy orders, and in 1884 he became a teacher of theology and superior of a theological seminary in Esztergom. In the last years of the nineteenth century, Prohászka was one of the initiators and leaders of the Christian social movement in Hungary. He promoted the notion of the social responsibility of Catholics and translated the papal encyclical Rerum novarum of Leo XIII into Hungarian. From the beginning of the twentieth century Prohászka was the main speaker at annual national Catholic meetings. In 1904 he became a professor of dogmatics at Budapest University. In 1909 he became a corresponding member, and in 1920 a full member, of the Hungarian Academy of Sciences.

On 11 December 1905 Prohászka was ordained bishop of Székesfehérvár. He considered his main tasks to be the conversion of agnostics; an internal reform of the Church; and a modernization in the presentation of Christian teaching. Prohászka initiated the establishment of several orphanages. In 1916 he proposed that war invalids receive farms as compensation. In November 1918 in a pastoral letter he welcomed the republican upheavals as a sign of the future independence of Hungary. Even in the Hungarian Soviet Republic (HSR) he tried to see some positive elements—for example, in the slogans about social equality. At the same time he condemned Communist terror, just as he had denounced the “White terror” against HSR activists after the fall of the HSR. In January 1920 Regent Miklós Horthy offered Prohászka the post of prime minister, but Prohászka rejected this offer. In the same year, however, he became a member of parliament (and served until 1922) and assumed the post of chairman of the ruling Christian National Union. He opposed socialism, liberalism, and great capital. In the fall of 1921 Prohászka resigned as chairman of the party, giving his pastoral duties as the reason, but actually it was his disappointment with the social policies of the new governments, including failures to implement agrarian reform. He described Horthy's system as a “Christian line without Christianity and without Christians.” Prohászka died of a cerebral stroke while preaching a sermon.

Prohászka's publications include the following: Isten és a világ (God and the world; 1890); A keresztény bűnbánat és bűnbocsánat (Christian repentance and absolution; 1894); A diadalmas világnézet (Triumphant outlook; 1903); and Modern katolicizmus (Modern Catholicism; 1907). In his theological works, such as Elmélkedések az evangéliumról (1908); Meditations on the Gospels, 1936) and Dominus Jesus (1903), Prohászka combined neo-Thomism with the philosophy of Henri Bergson, as a result of which he incurred criticism from the Church hierarchs. Prohászka's theological innovation and his pro-social attitude (for example, his appeal for giving away Church possessions) met with the resistance of the Hungarian Church's conservative dignitaries, who prevented his appointment as archbishop in 1910. In 1911 the Holy See placed three works by Prohászka, including Modern katolicizmus, on the list of forbidden books. In 1943 the Vatican refused to begin his beatification process. Nowadays Prohászka is considered a spiritual precursor of the Second Vatican Council. Prohászka's collected works were published in twenty-five volumes (1928–29). (JT)

PROTIĆ Stojan (28 January 1857, Kruševac, Serbia–28 October 1923, Belgrade), Serbian politician. Protić attended high schools in Kruševac, Kragujevac, and Belgrade and subsequently studied history and philology at the University of Belgrade. He then trained in an office in Šabac and was a clerk at a high school in Svilajnac. In 1881 he left the civil service and became involved in the activities of the National Radical Party (NRP), led by Nikola Pašić. In 1884 Protić became editor of Srbski odjek, which, after being banned by the authorities, was published under the titles Drugi odjek and Treći odjek. Elected to the Skupština (parliament) in 1887, Protić helped to draft the 1888 constitution. He took part in defining the position of the NRP in the negotiations and influenced the content of the constitution. In the same year he was appointed secretary in the Ministry of Interior and later in the Ministry of Finance. After Pašić resigned from the government in 1892, Protić left the ministry and worked in the municipality of Belgrade. After an attempt on the life of Milan Obrenović in 1899, Protić received a prison sentence for lèse-majesté, which he allegedly had committed in one of his articles. Reprieved after around one year, he worked successively in the National Library, as a director of the state monopoly, and a commissioner of the National Bank.

After King Alexander Obrenović was murdered in 1903, Protić became head of the Ministry of Interior in the government of Jovan Avakumović. He continued as head of this ministry in the cabinets of Sava Grujić (October–December 1904) and the government of Pašić (December 1904–May 1905 and June 1906–July 1907). In July 1907, after the police brutally crushed student demonstrations and worker strikes, Protić was forced to resign. After the outbreak of the Balkan crisis following the annexation of Bosnia and Herzegovina by Austria-Hungary, he returned to the government of Stojan Novaković, becoming minister of finance in February 1909. As a result of Protić's personal engagement, negotiations with France ended in success, and Serbia received a credit of 150 million dinars for the development of a railroad system and the purchase of modern weapons. Protić held the post of minister of finance for three subsequent years, first in the government of Pašić (beginning in October 1909) and then in the government of Milovan Milovanović (July 1911–May 1912). In September 1912 Protić became minister of interior in another Pašić government and held this post until December 1914.

Protić played an important political role during World War I. He drafted Serbia's reply to an ultimatum it was given by Austria-Hungary on 23 July 1914. This ultimatum was a prelude to a declaration of war. In 1917 Protić again joined the government of Pašić, becoming successively head of the Ministry of Finance, the Ministry of War, and the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. After the end of the war, he formed the first government of the newly established Kingdom of Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes and served as its prime minister from 7 December 1918 to 16 August 1919. He was also one of the architects of a coalition of parties that assumed power in the state in the spring of 1920. Protić served as minister of justice in the cabinet of Milenko Vesnić (May 1920–January 1921). Unlike most of the Radical Party members and their leader, Pašić, who favored a more centralist and unitary concept of the state, Protić argued for moderate decentralization and even prepared his own draft of a constitution; on that basis he broke with the NRP and established the Independent Radical Party (Nezavisna Radikalna Stranka). His party failed to obtain any votes in the 1923 and 1925 elections, though, and subsequently disappeared from the political scene.

Protić was also a distinguished journalist, particularly regarding ethnic issues of the South Slavic nations. His most famous works include the following: O Makedoniji i Makedoncima (About Macedonia and the Macedonians; 1888); Hrvatske prilike i jedinstvo Srba i Hrvata (Croatian relations and the unity of the Serbs and Croats; 1911); Odlomci iz Ustava i narodne borbe u Srbiji (An excerpt from the Constitution and the national struggle of the Serbs, 2 vols.; 1911–12); Albanski problemi i Srbija i Austro-Ugarska (The Albanian issue, Serbia and Austria-Hungary; 1913); and The Aspirations of Bulgaria (1915), translated into Serbian in the same year. PROTOGEROV Aleksandur (28 February 1867, Ohrid–7 July 1928, Sofia), Macedonian revolutionary activist. In 1887 Protogerov began serving in the Bulgarian Army, and in 1893 he also joined the Internal Macedonian Revolutionary Organization (Vnatrešna Makedonska Revolucionerna Organizacija [IMRO]). He was a representative of the party's right wing, which was sympathetic toward Bulgaria. In 1903 Protogerov fought in the Ilinden Uprising. After its collapse, he returned to Bulgaria, where he was promoted to general. In the Balkan Wars and in World War I he headed an IMRO faction that supported Bulgaria's claims to Macedonia. In the spring of 1919, on behalf of the Executive Committee of the Macedonian Societies in Bulgaria, Protogerov (together with Todor Aleksandrov) sent a letter to the participants in the Paris Peace Conference requesting that an "entire and indivisible Macedonia" be incorporated into the Bulgarian "motherland." However, under the terms of the Treaty of Neuilly (27 November 1919), most of the Macedonian territory was ceded to the Kingdom of Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes. Arrested in November 1919 by the authorities of the Bulgarian Agrarian National Union (BANU), headed by Aleksandur Stamboliyski, Protogerov was accused of contributing to Bulgaria's defeat in the war. After escaping from prison, he went underground, and from 1920 to 1923, he organized terrorist units of the IMRO on both sides of the border, particularly in the region of Petrich in Bulgarian Pirin Macedonia. These units were instrumental in the overthrow of Stamboliyski's regime and in his death in June 1923. Subsequently Protogerov supported the government of the Democratic Alliance, led by Aleksandur Tsankov. On behalf of his faction within the IMRO, on 6 May 1924 in Vienna, Protogerov (together with the IMRO left wing and the Communists) signed a manifesto that called for uniting Macedonia into one state and political unit within its natural and ethnic borders. As a result of factional strife, Protogerov soon withdrew from this declaration. After the assassination of Aleksandrov in August 1924, Protogerov became head of the right wing of the IMRO. As a result of bloody factional strife within the IMRO, he was assassinated on the orders of Ivan "Vančo" Mihailov. (WR)

PRUNSKIENE Kazimiera (26 February 1943, Vasiuliškė), Lithuanian Communist and post-Communist political activist. In 1965 Prunskiene graduated in economics from the University of Vilnius, where she later worked. In 1971 she received a Ph.D. in economics, and in 1986–88 she worked at the Ministry of Agriculture of the Lithuanian SSR. In 1988 she became director of the Institute of Economic Personnel Training. From 1980 to 1990 she belonged to the CPSU and was a member of the Central Committee (CC) of the Communist Party of Lithuania (CPL). Promoted to the CPL CC Politburo, Prunskiene was among the supporters of perestroika and (later) Lithuanian independence. In 1988–90 she was connected with the Lithuanian Movement for Perestroika, Sajūdis. In 1989 Prunskiene became deputy prime minister of the Lithuanian SSR. In February 1990 she was elected to the Supreme Council of the Lithuanian SSR. After Lithuania declared independence on 11 March 1990, she was in the Lithuanian delegation that held talks in the Kremlin. From 17 March 1990 Prunskiene was prime minister. In May 1990 she visited the United States and then Great Britain, France, and Germany, trying to gain international recognition for Lithuania. While the conflict with the Kremlin was aggravating, Prunskiene was accused by the radicals of submission to Russian pressure. At the same time, the Sajūdis leaders criticized her economic policies. Unreformed Communists openly accused her of “separatism” and looked forward to Russian intervention. As a result of a conflict with the chairman of the Supreme Council, Vytautas Landsbergis, on 10 January 1991 Prunskiene was dismissed.

In 1992 Prunskiene created the Lithuania-Europe Institute, aimed at strengthening links between Lithuania and the West. Later she chaired the East and Central European Forum of Innovations, established her own firm, co-founded the Association of Lithuanian Women (ALW), and was active in international women's associations. Prunskiene published the memoirs Leben für Litauen: Auf dem Weg in die Unabhängigkeit (A life for Lithuania: On the road to independence; 1992). In 1992 the Lithuanian Supreme Court found Prunskiene guilty of conscious cooperation with the KGB, but the parliament did not suspend her immunity and she did not withdraw from public life. For several years Prunskiene unsuccessfully tried to clear herself of these accusations. In January 1995 the ALW turned into a political party called the New Democracy–Women's Party (Naujoji Demokratija–Moterų Partija [NDMP]). In 1996 Prunskiene was elected to the parliament, where she belonged to a faction of independents, and in 2000 she was elected on behalf of the NDMP. In December 2002 she ran in the presidential elections but lost. From 1996 Prunskiene has been a professor at the Vilnius Polytechnic College. Prunskiene has authored a number of works on economics and on Lithuanian socioeconomic transformation. (JH)

PRYSTOR Aleksander (2 January 1874, Wilno [Vilnius]–October 1941, Moscow), Polish politician. Prystor graduated from high school in Wilno, and in 1894 he entered Moscow University, earning a first degree in 1900. He subsequently studied medicine but never graduated. At that time Prystor was introduced to the Socialist movement and met Józef Piłsudski personally. From 1903 to 1904 he served in the tsarist army and then went to Switzerland, where he took part in military courses conducted by a Japanese officer; this training was linked to the plans of the Polish Socialists, who wanted to use the Russo-Japanese War to work toward Polish independence. In March 1905 Prystor became head of the conspiratorial-military department of the Polish Socialist Party (Polska Partia Socjalistyczna [PPS]). He organized the PPS Military Organization in Warsaw and took part in the 1905 revolution. During a split within the PPS Prystor supported the PPS–Revolutionary Faction. After the failure of the revolution, he went to Galicia. In September 1908 Prystor took part in an expropriation action at Bezdany (Bezdonys), Lithuania and then assumed command of the Kraków district of the Riflemen’s Association. In February 1912 he went to Warsaw, where he was arrested soon afterwards. In January 1914, after almost two years of investigations, Prystor was sentenced to seven years. Imprisoned in Orel, he was released in March 1917, after the tsarist system was abolished. Prystor worked in the Polish Military Organization (Polska Organizacja Wojskowa [POW]), in the PPS Central Committee in Russia, and in the Liquidation Commission for the Affairs of the Kingdom of Poland (Komisja Likwidacyjna do Spraw Królestwa Polskiego). After the Bolshevik revolution, Prystor served as commander of the guard of the Polish Security Council in Petrograd and subsequently worked in the city board of Minsk. In May 1918 he went to Warsaw, where he began working in the administration of the Regency Council.

In November 1918 Prystor became a member of the POW High Command. On 10 November 1918 he welcomed Piłsudski, who had returned from Magdeburg Prison. Prystor became undersecretary of state in the Ministry of Labor and Social Welfare in the Provisional People’s Government of the Republic of Poland (Tymczasowy Rząd Ludowy Republiki Polskiej), headed by Ignacy Daszyński, and he held this post in successive governments until June 1921. In July 1920 he began serving in the Polish Army. During the Polish-Soviet war Prystor commanded a company, and as Piłsudski’s trusted liaison with General Lucjan Żeligowski, he played a key role in a “rebellion” of Żeligowski’s troops, which seized the Wilno (Vilnius) region on 9 October 1920. Prystor subsequently served as adjutant general to Żeligowski and head of the civil chancellery of Central Lithuania. After Central Lithuania was incorporated into Poland, Prystor worked in the General Staff and headed the personnel department of the Bureau of the Supreme Council of War. Relegated in May 1925 to the Wilno Draft Board, he had little part in the preparations for the coup d’état that was planned for 1926, but shortly after May 1926, he returned to Warsaw, assuming a post in the office of the Minister of Military Affairs. In November 1926 Prystor became head of the personnel department of the Inspectorate General of the Armed Forces. He was sent by Piłsudski on many delicate missions. Highly appreciated by Piłsudski, Prystor was a member of the so-called group of colonels that played a leading role within the ruling camp. In April 1929 Prystor became minister of labor and social welfare. While holding this post, he ran afoul of the Socialists because he sought to abolish the autonomy of the Health Care Funds. Although in March 1930 the government collapsed, Walery Sławek, who had established a new cabinet, did not dismiss Prystor, throwing down the gauntlet to the Assembly. In August 1930 Prystor was appointed minister of industry and trade, and in November 1930 he became an MP on the slate of the Nonparty Bloc of Cooperation with the Government (Bezpartyjny Blok Współpracy z Rządem [BBWR]).

On 27 May 1931 Prystor assumed the post of prime minister. In October 1932 his government put forward a program to combat the Great Depression, but there was a shortage of financial means for its realization because of the deflation policy. Because of personal rivalries among his closest associates, Prystor soon lost the trust of Piłsudski. On 9 May 1933 he resigned as prime minister, and thenceforth his political role diminished. After the constitution of April 1935 was proclaimed, Prystor was a member of a commission drafting an undemocratic electoral law. In the 1935 elections he won a senatorial seat. From 4 October 1935 to 13 September 1938 he was the Senate speaker. In the Senate elected in 1938, Prystor won a seat on the slate of the authoritarian Camp of National Unity (Obóz Zjednoczenia Narodowego [OZN]), a party established to prevent the disintegration of the ruling camp after the death of Piłsudski. He lost in the elections for Senate speaker, though, and thereafter he began to criticize government policies. After the Red Army entered the Wilno region in September 1939, Prystor illegally crossed the Lithuanian border and developed wide-ranging activities in Kaunas. After Lithuania was incorporated into the Soviet Union in July 1940, Prystor was arrested by the NKVD and imprisoned in Kaunas, whence he was moved to a Moscow prison, where he probably perished. PUČNIK Jože (9 March 1932, Črešnjevca, near Slovenska Bistrica), Slovene sociologist and politician. Pučnik graduated from high school in Maribor and enrolled in philosophy at the University of Ljubljana. During his studies he was twice arrested for “disloyal” publications in the periodical Revija 57. In 1958 he was sentenced to nine years in prison, of which he served five (1958–63). After his release he published in the periodical Perspektive. Arrested again and sentenced in 1964, he was allowed to emigrate to Germany in 1966. Pučnik worked as a blue-collar laborer, and he studied, receiving a Ph.D. at the University of Hamburg in 1971. Then he lectured there and became a professor. In 1989 Pučnik returned home and became active in the democratic opposition as a member of the Slovenian Democratic Union (Slovenske Demokratične Zveze). In 1989–93 he chaired the Social Democratic Party of Slovenia (Socialdemokratska Stranka Slovenije). In April 1990 Pučnik became the DEMOS coalition's candidate for president. He got to the second round, where he gained 41 percent of the vote, but he lost to Milan Kučan. In 1991 Pučnik was active in favor of Slovene independence, demanding a referendum on this issue. He authored Članki in spomini 1957–1985 (Articles and memoirs 1957–1985; 1986) and Kultura, družba in tehnologija (Culture, society, and technology; 1988). (WR)

PUGO Boriss (19 February 1937, Kalinin–21 August 1991, Moscow), Soviet activist of Latvian descent. Adopted by Arvids Pelše after he had been orphaned, Pugo graduated from the Riga Technical Institute in 1960. He became involved in politics while still a student. In 1960 he began working as an engineer and secretary of the Komsomol (Young Communist League) in the Electrical Equipment Works in Riga. From 1961 to 1963 he served as first secretary of a Komsomol committee in the Proletarskiy district in Riga. From 1963 to 1968 he worked in the Komsomol central apparatus in Moscow. From 1968 to 1970 he was head of the Department of Organizational Work of the Central Committee (CC) of the Communist Party of Latvia (CPL) and first secretary of the Komsomol of the Latvian SSR. From 1970 to 1977 Pugo was secretary of the CC of the Komsomol of the Soviet Union, inspector of the CC of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union (CPSU), and first secretary of a committee of the CPL in Riga. In 1976 he became a member of the CC of the CPL. Deputy head (1977–80) and subsequently head (1980–84) of the KGB of the Latvian SSR, Pugo was responsible for quashing the liberation aspirations of the Latvian people and for persecuting the opposition. In August 1984 he was appointed first secretary of the CC of the CPL, although like his predecessor, Augusts Voss, Pugo hardly spoke any Latvian. In 1986 he became a member of the CPSU CC. From 1988 to 1990 he served as chairman of the CPSU CC Party Control Committee. Initially Pugo was a supporter of Mikhail Gorbachev, but then he became aligned with the party hard-liners. In December 1990 he was appointed minister of interior of the Soviet Union. Pugo was responsible for a bloody intervention by Soviet special troops in Vilnius (January 1991) and later fiercely defended this intervention on television. He was one of the main organizers of a putsch whose aim was to uphold the Soviet Union and the Soviet system. On 19 August 1991 Pugo became a member of the State Committee for the State of Emergency, which failed to gain power. After the putsch was suppressed, Pugo committed suicide. (EJ)

PUJĀTS Jānis (14 November 1930, Nautrēni, Letgālija), Latvian Catholic cardinal. Pujāts graduated from high school in Rēzekne in 1948. Later he studied at the theological seminary in Riga until it was closed by the Soviets in 1951. He continued his education with his parish priest. In 1952 he was allowed to take his final seminary examinations. Ordained in March 1951, Pujāts worked as a minister in various parishes of Letgālija (Preiļi, Zosna, Dukstīgals, Rozentava, Bērži, Rudzāti, and Stirniene). In 1958–64 he was a vicar in Riga, from 1964 he was parish priest of Riga's St. Anthony Parish, and in 1966–79 he was vicar in Riga's St. Francis Parish. From 1966 Pujāts taught in the Riga seminary. Despite constant invigilation, in the 1970s he managed to organize an uncensored publication of the Catholic catechism. In 1979–84 Pujāts was general vicar and chancellor of curia, in 1981–84 he was also parish priest of St. James Parish in Riga, and from 1987 to 1991 he was a professor at the Riga theological seminary. On 8 May 1991 Pujāts was consecrated archbishop metropolitan of Riga, in February 1998 he was appointed cardinal in pectore, and from 21 February 2001 he was a member of the college of cardinals. PULJIĆ Vinko (8 September 1945, Prijecani, near Banja Luka), Croatian Roman Catholic bishop in Bosnia. After graduating from a theological seminary, Puljić was ordained in June 1970. Later he worked in Croatian parishes in Bosnia. On 19 November 1990 he was consecrated archbishop of Upper Bosnia (Vrhbosna). During the war of 1992–95, despite the Bosnian Serb siege, Puljić stayed in Sarajevo. Encouraged to leave for the Croatian-occupied part of Bosnia, he refused, and in August 1993 he took part in a celebration of the anniversary of the independence of Bosnia-Herzegovina. Puljić constantly appealed for a termination of the war; for respect for human life, the family, and ethnic identity; and for a peaceful resolution to the conflicts in the former Yugoslavia. Nevertheless, his appeals remained in vain. On 26 November 1994 Pope John Paul II appointed Puljić a member of the College of Cardinals—its youngest member. After the war Puljić remained an advocate of reconciliation in a multi-ethnic Bosnia-Herzegovina. In January 1996 he met with the Orthodox metropolitan, Nicholas. Puljić was the host for John Paul II's visit to Sarajevo in April 1997. (WR)

PURIĆ Božidar (19 February 1891, Belgrade–1977, Chicago), Serbian politician. After finishing secondary school in Belgrade, Purić graduated in law in Paris in 1912. He later fought in World War I. In 1918 in Paris he earned a Ph.D. for a dissertation on the rebus sic stantibus clause in international law. Purić subsequently served as secretary of the legation of the Kingdom of Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes in Washington, D.C. (1919), chargé d'affaires in Vladivostok (1919–20), consul in San Francisco (1920–22) and Chicago (1922–26), head of a political department of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs (1927–35), and envoy and minister plenipotentiary in Paris (1935–40). On 10 August 1943 Purić became prime minister and minister of foreign affairs of the Yugoslav government-in-exile, which was faithful to King Peter II Karadjordjević. In Purić's cabinet the post of minister of war was given to Dragoljub (Draža) Mihailović, leader of the Chetniks (guerrillas), who fought both the Nazis and the Communist-led Partisans of Josip Broz Tito in occupied Yugoslavia. In November 1943 the Anti-Fascist Council for the National Liberation of Yugoslavia (Antifašističko Veće Narodnog Oslobođenja Jugoslavije [AVNOJ]), established by Tito's supporters in 1942, proclaimed itself the highest authority, denying the government-in-exile the right to represent Yugoslavia. The British authorities insisted that Purić enter into an agreement with Tito, but Purić steadfastly refused. Finally, under pressure from Great Britain, King Peter agreed to appoint a new cabinet that was more willing to compromise. On 1 June 1944 Purić was dismissed, and Ivan Šubašić assumed the post of prime minister. After World War II, Purić remained in exile and lived in the United States. Purić authored several poetry collections: Pesme o nama (Poems about us; 1919) and Ljubavne svečanosti (Love festivities; 1920). In 1963 his Biografija Bože Rankovića: Doprinos istoriji srpskog iseljeničtva u Severnoj Americi (The biography of Boža Ranković: The history of Serbian emigration in Northern America) was published in Munich. PURVANOV Georgi (28 June 1957, Sirishtik), Communist activist and post-Communist politician, president of Bulgaria. In 1981 Purvanov graduated in history from the University of Sofia and started working at the Institute of History of the Bulgarian Communist Party (BCP). In 1981 he joined the party. In 1989 he received a Ph.D. in the nineteenth-century history of Bulgaria. In 1989 Purvanov supported the reform wing of the BCP. In 1990 he was elected to the Executive Bureau of the BCP Congress, which abandoned the term “Communist” and changed the name of the party into the Bulgarian Socialist Party (Bulgarska Sotsialisticheska Partiya [BSP]). From 1992 Purvanov headed the BSP Center for Historical and Political Studies, supporting the evolution of the party toward Social Democracy. After the electoral victory of the BSP in December 1994 Purvanov became head of the parliamentary commission for national minorities. A decline of the BSP's ratings, owing to its faulty economic policy, led to sharp conflicts in the party leadership. In 1996 Purvanov became chief of staff of the BSP presidential candidate, Ivan Marazov, and after his defeat Purvanov replaced Zhan Videnov as the BSP leader.

In this role Purvanov proved to be quite efficient. He apologized for BSP policies and made attempts to consolidate leftist groups around his party. After the early elections of April 1997, which the BSP lost, Purvanov initially turned his party into a constructive opposition to the government of Ivan Kostov, which introduced necessary reforms. Under populist pressure, Purvanov began to criticize this government for all actual and alleged mistakes. At the same time, he tried to change the attitude of the post-Communists toward foreign policy. Although in 1999 Purvanov criticized the NATO air raids on Yugoslavia and the opening of Bulgarian air space to these operations, he managed to convince the majority of the BSP leadership that it should pursue future NATO membership for Bulgaria. He also supported Bulgaria's entry into the European Union. Purvanov's tactics brought results since in the local elections of the fall of 1999 the BSP candidates won about 25 percent of the vote. This showed that the BSP was restoring its position. At the end of 2000 a further increase in the BSP's ratings was prevented by the emergence of the National Movement Simeon II, which won the parliamentary elections in June 2001. Purvanov ran as the BSP presidential candidate. In the second round, on 18 November 2001 Purvanov defeated the acting president, Petur Stoyanov, winning 54.1 percent of the vote. On 22 January 2002 Purvanov assumed office, continuing the pro-NATO and pro-European Union policies. (AG)

PUȘCARIU Sextil (4 January 1877, Brașov–5 May 1948, Bran), Romanian linguist and philologist. After graduating from high school in Brașov, Pușcariu studied linguistics in Leipzig, where he received a Ph.D. in 1899. From 1899 to 1901 he studied in Paris and Vienna, where in 1904 he received the postdoctoral degree. In 1905 he conducted a seminar in the Romanian language at the university in Vienna. In 1906 he returned to Romania and began working at the university in Tschernowitz (Cernăuți, Chernivtsi), where he was a professor of Romanian language and literature from 1908 to 1918. In 1913 Pușcariu published Dicționarul limbii române (Dictionary of the Romanian language), which earned him membership in the Romanian Academy of Sciences in 1914. In 1918 Pușcariu was an editor of the periodical Glăsurile Bucovinei. After World War I he worked in the diplomatic service, holding a variety of positions, including that of Romania's delegate to the League of Nations. In 1919 he moved to Cluj, where he was a co-founder and then the first rector of a university. In 1920 in Cluj Pușcariu founded the Museum of Romanian Language, later known as the Academic Linguistic Institute, which existed until 1951. In 1923 he also co-founded the Romanian Ethnographic Society in Cluj. In 1924 he edited the periodical Cultura. From 1940 to 1944 he directed the Romanian Institute in Germany, and from 1942 to 1944 he worked at the university in Berlin. Pușcariu was politically aligned with the radical nationalist right wing. He was a supporter of the theory of linguistic structuralism. Pușcariu authored about four hundred works in the fields of the history of language, dialectology, Romance studies, phonetics, lexicography, and literary history and criticism, including the following: Atlasul lingvistic român (Romanian linguistic atlas) in ten volumes, of which only three were published in his lifetime: Atlasul lingvistic al României (The linguistic atlas of Romanians; 1929), Hărțile graiului (The map of dialects; 1933), and Atlasul lingvistic român: Prospect (Romanian linguistic atlas: Prospect; 1936). Pușcariu was also the author of Istoria literaturii române: Epoca veche (The history of Romanian literature: Ancient times; 1921) and Limba română (The Romanian language; 1940). He founded the periodical Dacoromania, eleven volumes of which appeared in 1920–48. In postwar Romania some of Pușcariu's works were banned from publication. (LW)

PŰSKI Sándor (4 February 1911, Békés), Hungarian publisher. Püski graduated in law from the University of Budapest in 1935. In 1938 in Budapest he opened a bookstore that sold copies of lectures for students. In 1939 he established the Magyar Élet (Hungarian Life) press, which contributed substantially to the success of the so-called peasant writers. During World War II Püski was active against the extreme right. When the Communists nationalized the presses (1950), he worked as a blue-collar laborer. Imprisoned on false accusations in 1962–63, in 1970 Püski left for the United States, where he again took up book selling. In 1975 he started his own press—this time called Püski Könyvkiadó (Püski Bookstore)—and it became one of the foundations of Hungarian pro-independence activities abroad. Püski was also active in supporting the democratic opposition in Hungary in the 1980s. In 1989 he returned to Hungary and moved his press there. From 1995 he was a member of the leadership of the World Association of Hungarians. Püski received many Hungarian and foreign awards for his contribution to the struggle for the freedom of the word. PUSTA Kaarel Robert (29 February 1883, Narva–4 May 1964, Madrid), Estonian diplomat and politician. Pusta established ties with a radical movement in his youth. Arrested for taking part in anti-tsarist activities in 1903, he shared a prison cell with Mikhail Kalinin, who would become a famous Bolshevik leader. From 1904 on Pusta lived in England, France, and Switzerland. In 1904–6 he studied in Paris and Bern, where he maintained contacts with radical activists in Estonia and contributed to Uudiseed, a leftist periodical published by activists of the Estonian Social Democratic Workers' Party. After returning to his country in 1906, Pusta contributed to the daily Virulane (1906–8) and edited the newspaper Paevaleht (1910–14). Mobilized in 1915, Pusta worked in the civil administration of the tsarist army. In 1917, along with Jaan Tõnisson, Ants Piip, and Eduard Virgo, Pusta became a member of a diplomatic mission sent by the Estonian National Council (Maapäev) to the West to seek recognition for Estonia by Great Britain and France. Pusta was the first Estonian ambassador to France; he was simultaneously ambassador to Belgium. He stayed in that position from 1919 to 1933, except for an interval in late 1924 and early 1925, when he served as foreign minister. Pusta subsequently served as ambassador to Poland (1934–35) and Sweden, simultaneously accredited to Denmark and the Soviet Union (from 1935). Pusta's greatest successes included obtaining France's recognition of Estonia in 1922. After the authoritarian coup of Konstantin Päts in March 1934, the activists of the radically rightist Estonian League of War of Independence Veterans (Eesti Vabadussojalaste Liit [EVL]) mentioned Pusta as a potential candidate for a government they planned to create; consequently, in 1936 Pusta was recalled from his mission in Scandinavia and was arrested on his arrival in Estonia. Since he proved that he had not known about the EVL's plans of conspiracy, he was released, but the case had far-reaching political repercussions in Estonia and abroad. As compensation, Pusta was given the post of counselor at the embassy in Paris (1939). After the 1940 Soviet invasion, Pusta stayed abroad, where he strove to prove to the international community that the 1940 incorporation of Estonia by the Soviet Union was an illegal act.

One of the main architects of Estonia's foreign policy, Pusta (along with Piip and Jaan Poska) belonged to a group of firm supporters of the concept of a broad Baltic league, which would include Lithuania, Latvia, Estonia, the Scandinavian states, and Poland. Such a league, which was to protect Estonia from potential aggression from the Soviet Union, was not realized, but proposals for it were among the main guidelines for the Estonian diplomatic services until the end of the 1930s. Pusta's publications include Problèmes de la Baltique (Problems of the Baltic; 1934) and The Soviet Union and the Baltic States (1942). An ardent champion of European unity, Pusta devoted one of his main works to this idea: L'idée de l'union européenne devant les gouvernements et de la Société des Nations (The idea of a European union and the governments of the League of Nations; 1931). Pusta was an active member of the Pan-European movement. Shortly before his death he published his memoirs, Saadiku päevik (The diary of an ambassador), a major source for the study of twentieth-century Estonian history. (AG)

PUSTOVOYTENKO Valeryi (23 February 1947, Adamivka, Mykolayiv region), Ukrainian post-Communist politician. Initially Pustovoytenko worked as a carpenter in Odessa. In 1966–68 he served in the army. In 1975 he graduated from the Institute of Engineering and Construction in Dnepropetrovsk, and later he worked as the main engineer in a local machine building enterprise. In 1984–86 he was its director. In 1989 Pustovoytenko became chairman of the Dnepropetrovsk City Council, in 1991 mayor of the city, and in 1992 chairman of the Union of Ukrainian Towns. From 1991 he was a member of the Supreme Council of Ukraine. After he followed Leonid Kuchma to Kiev, from April to September 1993 Pustovoytenko was head of Kuchma's Office of the Prime Minister. Pustovoytenko received a Ph.D. in technical sciences and became deputy chairman of the union of Ukrainian builders and deputy chairman of the Board of Directors of the Expobank in Kiev. From 16 July 1997 to 22 December 1999 Pustovoytenko was prime minister. He remained a representative of the members of the Dnepropetrovsk clan that stayed loyal to President Kuchma. Given Kuchma's support, Pustovoytenko stayed in office after the parliamentary elections of March 1998, in which the president's People's Democratic Party of Ukraine won only twenty-eight mandates. During Pustovoytenko's term in office, reforms were halted. Elected for a second term in November 1999, Kuchma tried to accelerate reforms, so he dismissed Pustovoytenko and turned the office of prime minister over to Viktor Yushchenko. From June 2000 to May 2002 Pustovoytenko was minister of transportation. From December 2000 he was presidential adviser and secretary of Kuchma's Political Council. He was also chairman of the Ukrainian Soccer Federation. (TS)

PUTEK Józef (4 July 1892, Wadowice–10 May 1974, Choczniã, near Wadowice), Polish Peasant Party politician. While a law student at the Jagiellonian University in Kraków, Putek established an organization of students of peasant origins. In 1913 he co-founded the Polish Peasant Party–Left (Polskie Stronnictwo Ludowe–Lewica [PSL–Left]), and in 1914 he became a member of the PSL Chief Council. During World War I Putek was a delegate of the pro-Austrian Supreme National Committee (Naczelny Komitet Narodowy) to Wadowice County, and he subsequently served as political commissioner of the Military Committee of the Supreme National Committee. Elected to the Legislative Assembly in 1919, Putek served as secretary of its lower chamber and vice-chairman of the PSL–Left parliamentary representation; he was one of the speakers presenting the draft constitution. He advocated the implementation of an agrarian reform. In 1920 Putek received a Ph.D. in law and did a legal internship. In August 1922 he took the lead of the Peasant Left, which entered into an electoral alliance with the Polish Peasant Party–Liberation (Polskie Stronnictwo Ludowe–Wyzwolenie [PSL–Liberation]). From 1922 to 1930 Putek was an MP. After the PSL–Left merged with the PSL–Liberation, he became vice-chairman of its parliamentary representation. A member and vice-chairman of the Main Board of the PSL–Liberation from 1923 to 1930, Putek and his party supported the coup of May 1926, but as early as 1927 he went over to the opposition. Elected mayor of the municipality of Choczna, in April 1928 Putek was excommunicated by Archbishop Adam Sapieha for his militant anti-clericalism. Arrested in September 1930, he was imprisoned in the Brześć fortress, along with a group of opposition leaders. Released on bail, he attended the 1931 unification congress of the Peasant Party (Stronnictwo Ludowe [SL]), at which he was elected a member of the Chief Council and the Chief Executive Committee. In January 1932 Putek was sentenced in a trial in Brześć to three years in prison. While in prison, he wrote historical books. He was released after ten months. In 1935 Putek became vice-chairman of the SL. Expelled from the party after he had refused to support the peasant strike of 1937, he established the pro-government Union of Polish Peasant Activists, and he was elected MP in 1938.

Arrested by the Germans in October 1939 and deported to the concentration camp in Auschwitz in June 1940, Putek was transferred to the Mauthausen camp in July 1942. After liberation, he joined the International Administrative Committee and served as chairman of the Polish Prisoners' Committee. In May 1945 he became vice-chairman of the Chief Council of the Union of Former Political Prisoners of Nazi Prisons and Concentration Camps, and in September 1945, vice-chairman of the Chief Executive Committee of the SL, after this party had been reestablished under the aegis of the Communists. In January 1946 Putek became chairman of the SL Chief Council. In December 1945 he became a member of the National Home Council (Krajowa Rada Narodowa [KRN]). From March 1946 to January 1948 he served as minister of post and telegraphs. In January

1947 he became an MP in the Legislative Assembly. Dismissed as chairman of the SL Chief Council in September 1948, one month later Putek was expelled from the party for his interwar activities. Arrested and placed in a Kraków prison in October 1950, he was deprived of his parliamentary seat one year after his arrest. Released in January 1952, he was imprisoned again in July 1952 and then released in January 1953. Rehabilitated in January 1956, he retired from politics and resumed his work as an attorney. Putek's publications include the following: Konkordat czy rozdział Kościoła od państwa (Concordat or the separation of Church and state; 1925); Obywatelskie prawo zgromadzeń (Citizens' right of assembly; 1932); Mroki średniowiecza: Obyczaje, przesady, fanatyzm i okrucieństwa w dawnej Polsce (The darkness of the Middle Ages: Customs, superstitions, fanaticism, and excesses in ancient Poland; 1935); Z dziejów wsi polskiej (From the history of Polish peasants; 1946); Sejm w Ciemnogrodzie (The Assembly in a backwater; 1948); and Miłościwe pany i krnąbrne chłopcy włościancy (Merciful lords of the manor and defiant peasants; 1969). PUTNA Vitovt (24 April 1893, Matskantse, near Vilnius–11 July 1937, Moscow), Soviet commander of Lithuanian descent. The son of a peasant, Putna graduated from a school of commerce in Riga. He was active in the Bolshevik movement, as a result of which he was arrested in 1913. Inducted into the army in 1915, he served in the Semyonov Guard Regiment, and in 1917 he graduated from a cadet school. As a commander of a battalion, Putna was instrumental in the Bolshevization of the Twelfth Russian Army. In April 1918 he joined the Red Army, becoming head of the military commissariat of Vitebsk. He subsequently served as commissar of the Smolensk rifle division. In May 1919 Putna became commander of the Twenty-seventh Rifle Division during the war against Poland. In 1921 he was one of the commanders who led a force that crushed the Kronstadt rebels. In 1923 Putna finished a course for senior commanders and then commanded an infantry school in Moscow. From 1924 to 1927 he worked in the General Staff of the Red Army and subsequently served as Soviet military attaché in Japan, Finland, and Germany. In 1931–34 he commanded a corps, and then an army, in the Far East. From 1934 to 1936 Putna was the Soviet military attaché in London. One of the closest associates of Mikhail Tukhachevsky, at the beginning of 1937 Putna was recalled to Moscow, and, along with other top Red Army commanders, he was accused of taking part in a “Trotskyite conspiracy,” spying, and other fictitious crimes. Sentenced to death in the trial of Tukhachevsky and his associates, Putna was executed in prison. (WR) PUTNIK Radomir (12 January 1847, Kragujevac, Serbia–4 May 1917, Nice, France), Serbian field marshal. As an artillery officer, Putnik distinguished himself in the war against Turkey (1876–78). After completing his studies in Russia, he started working in the General Staff of the Serbian Army. In 1885 he fought in the Serbo-Bulgarian war. Promoted to colonel in 1889, he became deputy chief of the General Staff in 1890. In 1895 he was dismissed for his ties with the Radical Party, and he subsequently retired. In 1903, when Peter I Karadjordjević came to the throne, Putnik was promoted to general and chief of staff of the army. From 1904 to 1914 he served as minister of war three times and was responsible for the modernization of the Serbian Army. Putnik’s reforms played a role in the Serbian victory over the Turks in the battle of Kumanovo (23–24 October 1912) during the First Balkan War. After this victory Putnik was promoted to field marshal. In 1913 the Serbian Army under his command defeated the Bulgarians in the Second Balkan War.

When World War I began, Putnik was undergoing treatment at the spa of Bad Gleichenberg, Austria. He was interned there but was allowed to return to Serbia after the intervention of Emperor Francis Joseph. Putnik resumed the post of chief of staff, although Prince Regent Alexander (the future King Alexander I) was the commander-in-chief of Serbia’s armed forces. The first Austrian offensive met with strong resistance and ended in a Serbian victory at Cer Hills (August 1914). However, in September 1914 the Austrian forces managed to enter Belgrade. After receiving military equipment from the Entente, the Serbian Army launched a counteroffensive. Putnik defeated the enemy troops at the Kolubara River, the biggest battle fought by the Serbs during World War I. In December 1914 the Austrian forces were driven from Belgrade and soon afterwards from the entire Serbian territory. In October–November 1915, however, the Austro-Hungarian forces, supported by German and Bulgarian troops, launched a new attack and broke down Serbian resistance. Too ill to walk, on 15 November 1915 Putnik decided to evacuate the Serbian Army across Albania to the Adriatic coast. He had to be carried the entire distance in a sedan chair. Around two hundred thousand soldiers and civilians perished during this winter retreat over the mountains of Albania. On 7 December 1915 Putnik reached the Albanian port of Scutari. He spent the last years of his life in Nice. (AO)

PUTVINSKIS Vladas (24 September 1873, Riga–5 March 1929, Kaunas), Lithuanian national activist. Putvinskis came from a Polish noble family. His father, Rafał Putwiński, was a guerrilla leader during the January Insurrection in 1863, and his mother, Idalia (née Broel-Plater), supported the Polish insurgent struggle. Putvinskis studied agriculture at the University of Halle and then fisheries in Warsaw. In 1896 he began farming on the estates of his father in Šiauliai and Raseiniai Counties. Putvinskis inherited both estates in 1904. In 1897 he married Emilija Gruzdytė, a cousin of Bishop Motiejus Valančius. Putvinskis did not speak Lithuanian until the beginning of the twentieth century. Interested in philosophy and fascinated with Hegel since his youth, Putvinskis worked out his own version of mystical social and national radicalism. He developed his estates to a high economic level, and under the influence of his wife and Povilas Višinskis, he learned Lithuanian and transformed his estates into important centers of the Lithuanian national movement, introducing democratic practices. Putvinskis soon came into conflict with the neighboring nobility of Polish national identity, as well as with the Russian authorities. Persecuted by the police, he even more strongly supported Lithuanian nationalism and ever more often used the Lithuanized version of his surname, Pūtvis. Arrested on two occasions (in 1906 and 1914), during World War I Putvinskis was deported to Russia. He returned to Poland in 1918 and firmly supported the Lithuanians in their conflict with Poland, which was regaining its independence. In August 1919 Putvinskis founded a paramilitary youth organization, the National Guard (Šaulių Sąjunga), and became its chairman and commander. He also edited its press organ, Trimitas. The nationalist program of the National Guard, supervised by the Ministry of Defense, was directed mainly against Poland and the Poles. In 1922 Putvinskis resigned his leadership of the National Guard and became a lecturer in fishery management at the Agricultural Academy in Dotnuva. In 1928 he resumed his post of chairman of the National Guard, and he held it until the end of his life. Selected writings by Putvinskis were edited and published by Aleksandras Mantautas in 1933. PUŻAK Kazimierz (26 August 1883, Tarnopol [Ternopil]–30 April 1950, Rawicz), Polish Socialist politician. In 1899, while a student at a high school in Tarnopol, Pużak established a clandestine organization that, among other things, smuggled underground publications. He began to study at the School of Law and Political Skills of the University of Lemberg (Lwów, Lviv) but did not complete his studies. In 1904 he joined the Polish Socialist Party (Polska Partia Socjalistyczna [PPS]). During the 1905 revolution Pużak took part in military actions conducted by the PPS. After a split within the PPS, he became aligned with the PPS–Revolutionary Faction. Arrested in 1911 and sentenced to eight years of hard labor for his involvement in the PPS Military Organization, Pużak served his sentence in Warsaw, Petrograd, and Schlißelburg. Released during the February 1917 revolution, he joined the PPS Provisional Central Executive Committee and edited the periodical Głos Robotnika i Żołnierza in Russia. Pużak was active in the organizational work of the party and, among other things, helped the former soldiers of the Second Brigade of the Legions, led by General Józef Haller. In October 1918 Pużak returned to Poland. An MP from 1919 to 1935, he worked in parliamentary commissions and assiduously strove to strengthen the rights of tenants, improve the situation of prisoners, and obtain amnesties. From the PPS unification congress in April 1919 until September 1939 Pużak was a member of the Chief Council and the Central Executive Committee of the PPS, and from 1921 to 1939 he served as secretary general and treasurer of the party.

In September 1939 Pużak fought in the defense of Warsaw. After the defeat of Poland in the war against the Germans, he decided to stay in occupied Poland. In October 1939 he co-initiated the underground Polish Socialist Party under the slogan of “Freedom–Equality–Independence” (PPS–Wolność–Równość–Niezawisłość [PPS–WRN]) and became its secretary. Pużak helped to found the underground interparty Chief Political Council. In February 1940 he became a member of the Coordinating Political Committee (Polityczny Komitet Porozumiewawczy [PKP]) of the Union of Armed Struggle (Związek Walki Zbrojnej [ZWZ]). Elected chairman of the PKP, Pużak did not take part in its work from September 1941 to March 1943 because the PPS–WRN left the PKP, one of the reasons being the PPS–WRN’s critical position concerning the Polish–Soviet Agreement of 30 July 1941. In January 1944 Pużak was elected chairman of the National Unity Council (Rada Jedności Narodowej [RJN]), a clandestine quasi-parliament that brought together the main Polish underground political parties and groups, and he served as chairman of its executive organ, the Chief Commission of the RJN. In March 1945 Pużak was treacherously arrested by the NKVD, when, along with the leaders of the Polish Underground State, he went to negotiate with General Ivan Serov. Tried in Moscow in the so-called Trial of the Sixteen, Pużak was sentenced to one and a half years in prison on trumped-up charges (21 June 1945). Released in November 1945, he returned to Poland but did not take part in politics. Arrested again in May 1947, Pużak was tried for maintaining contacts with political émigrés. In November 1948, in a trial against leaders of the PPS–WRN, Pużak was sentenced to ten years in prison. His sentence was later commuted to five years. Particularly persecuted in prison, he died of heart failure. Pużak’s Wspomnienia 1939–1945 (Memoirs 1939–45) were published posthumously in 1989. (PK)

PYATAKOV Georgiy [originally Kievsky] (6 August 1890, Horodyshche, near Cherkasy–30 January 1937, Moscow), Communist activist in the Ukraine of Jewish descent. The son of a laborer, Pyatakov did studied at St. Petersburg University and in Western Europe. An anarchist and a member of the Bolshevik party from 1910, he was deported for his activities. In 1915–19 Pyatakov argued with Lenin over ethnic issues and took a position that was close to that of Rosa Luxemburg. After the February 1917 revolution, Pyatakov headed a Kiev-based Bolshevik committee, which he represented in the Ukrainian Central Rada (Council). Although an opponent of Ukrainian independence, he was a member of the so-called Small Rada of the Ukrainian Central Rada from August to November 1917. In September 1917 Pyatakov became chairman of the Kiev Soviet (council) of Workers’ Deputies. He was one of the founders of the first Bolshevik Ukrainian government, which was established in Kiev in February 1918. One month later, when German troops seized the capital, Pyatakov represented the so-called Kiev group among the Bolsheviks in the Ukraine. He came to the conclusion that a proclamation of a separate Ukrainian state for the interim would help in the struggle against the German occupation and the government of Hetman Pavlo Skoropadskyi. Pyatakov’s position was accepted by Lenin.

In April 1918 Pyatakov attended a party conference in Taganrog at which a decision was made on the establishment of the Communist Party (Bolsheviks) of Ukraine (CP[B]U), which, although a separate party, was linked with the All-Russian Communist Party (Bolsheviks). After the CP(B)U was founded at a congress in Moscow in July 1918, Pyatakov became head of its Organizational Bureau and secretary of its Central Committee (CC). In August 1918, along with Mykola Skrypnyk and Volodymyr Zatonyskyi, Pyatakov attempted to instigate a peasant uprising in the Ukraine. After the failure of this attempt, he lost his power in the party to the so-called Yekaterinoslav group, whose members called for an even stricter subordination to Moscow. After the end of German rule in the Ukraine, Pyatakov became head of the Soviet Provisional Workers' and Peasants' Government of Ukraine on 20 November 1918. In this role he endorsed the offensive of Soviet troops against the army of the Ukrainian National Republic (UNR) and suppressed other revolutionary factions in the Ukraine, particularly the Borotbist faction. On 29 January 1919 he resigned his position.

After the Bolshevik government was established in the Ukraine, Pyatakov worked as the director of a mine in the Urals (1920) and as the director of the administration of mines in the Donbas (1921–23). He drafted the First Five-Year Plan (1926–30), which put particular emphasis on industrializing the Ukraine. In his so-called testament, Lenin cited Pyatakov as one of the two most talented people in the party (in addition to Nikolay Bukharin). Pyatakov was a member of the CC of the All-Russian Communist Party (Bolsheviks) from 1923 to 1927 (in 1925 the party changed its name to the All-Union Communist Party [Bolsheviks]) and also from 1930 to 1937. In 1923 he became deputy chairman of the Supreme Council of the National Economy. Linked with Leon Trotsky, Pyatakov was dismissed from his position and expelled from the party in 1927. After making a self-criticism in 1929, he was reinstated to his former position and readmitted to the party. He was also appointed head of the State Bank in Moscow. As deputy head of the Soviet Union's heavy industry, Pyatakov was responsible for (among other things) the implementation of the Second Five-Year Plan (1933–37). Arrested in the fall of 1936, he was sentenced to death in the trial of the so-called Trotskyite opposition in January 1937. Pyatakov confessed to working to separate the Ukraine from the Soviet Union. The sentence was carried out immediately. Pyatakov was posthumously rehabilitated in 1988. (TS)

PYNZENYK Viktor (15 April 1954, Smolohovytsi, Transcarpathian Ruthenia), Ukrainian economist and politician. The son of teachers, in 1975 Pynzenyk graduated in economics from the University of Lviv (UL). In 1979 he received a Ph.D. there. In 1989 he received his second degree in Moscow. At UL University, he advanced from assistant professor to professor (1990). In 1990–92 Pynzenyk was director of the UL Institute of Management. In 1991 he was elected to the Supreme Council of Ukraine and became deputy chairman of its commission for the national economy. In October 1992 he became deputy prime minister for economic reform in the government of Leonid Kuchma. Until March 1993 he was also minister of the national economy. Taking advantage of a six-month period of special powers given by the Supreme Council to the government, Pynzenyk tried to curb hyperinflation (2000 percent in 1992) by introducing privatization, abolishing subsidies and price controls, supporting the development of financial markets, and attracting foreign capital. Only some of these reforms were realized since Kuchma entered into conflict with President Leonid Kravchuk and resigned in September 1993.

Pynzenyk returned to the position of deputy prime minister for economic reform in 1994, when Kuchma took over as president. He stayed in office in the governments of Vitaliy Masol (July 1994–March 1995), Yevhen Marchuk (March 1995–May 1996), and Pavlo Lazarenko (May 1996–July 1997). Thanks to Pynzenyk's restrictive monetary policy, inflation went down to 0.1 percent per month in 1996, so in September 1996 he introduced a new currency, the hryvna. Having stabilized the currency, in the fall of 1996 Pynzenyk presented further reforms, including an increase in private investments, a reduction of budget expenditures (especially in the field of social policies), the introduction of a common VAT, a reduction of the tax progression, and a liquidation of export taxes. The resistance of the Supreme Council, dominated by post-Communists, to the tax reform caused Pynzenyk to resign in April 1997. In the parliamentary elections of March 1998 Pynzenyk ran on behalf of his own Reform and Order Party. Its program, which combined pro-market and pro-Western declarations with references to national traditions and Christian values, proved not attractive enough since it gained only 3.1 percent of the vote. R

RAČAN Ivica (24 February 1944, Ebersbach, Germany), Croatian Communist activist and post-Communist politician. Račan graduated in law from the University of Zagreb in 1970, but from 1965 he worked at the Institute of Social Studies in Zagreb. From 1974 he was active in the apparatus of the League of Communists of Yugoslavia (LCY). In 1972–82 Račan was a member of the Presidium of the Central Committee (CC) of the League of Communists of Croatia (Savez Komunističke Hrvatske [LCC]), and from 1982 to 1986 he was director of the party school, the Tito Memorial Political School, in Kumrovec. From 1986 Račan belonged to the Presidium of the LCY CC, and in 1989 he was elected chairman of the LCC CC. In January 1990 he led the Croatian delegation to the Fourteenth LCY Congress, during which Croatian and Slovene Communists confronted the party majority, led by the Serb leader, Slobodan Milošević, on the extension of republican autonomy. The Croatian and Slovene delegations left the congress; the move presaged the dissolution of the LCY. As the leader of the Croatian Communists, Račan agreed to the first free elections, and after electoral defeat in April 1990 he gave up power to the victorious Croatian Democratic Union of Franjo Tuđman.

Račan was the key engineer of the transformation of the LCC into the LCC–Party of Democratic Change and then into the Social Democratic Party of Croatia (Socialdemokratska Partija Hrvatske), which he chaired. From 1990 Račan was a member of the Croatian parliament, and in 1992–2000 he succeeded in making his party one of the two leading opposition parties, the other being the Social Liberals of Dražen Budiša. In 1998 Račan entered into a coalition with the Budiša party. The coalition won 47 percent of the mandates in the elections of 3 January 2000, and on 27 January Račan became prime minister of a government composed of post-Communists, Social Liberals, and four minor center groups. Račan’s government radically reoriented economic and foreign policies. Račan agreed to the return of Serbian war refugees and to the handover of those suspected of war crimes to The Hague Tribunal for War Crimes in Former Yugoslavia. In October 2001 his government signed a treaty of association with the European Union. In the parliamentary elections of November 2003 Račan’s center-left coalition lost, and on 23 December 2003 Račan gave up his post as prime minister. (AW)

RACIN Kosta, “Koco” [originally Solev] (22 December 1909, Veles–13 June 1943, Planina Lopušnik), Macedonian poet and writer. The son of a potter, Racin never completing high school. He joined the clandestine Communist Party. He wrote poetry and other works, and in 1939 he published Beli Mugri (White dawns) in Zagreb. The book was his most influential work and secured him a place in the pantheon of important twentieth-century Macedonian writers. Drawing deeply on Macedonian life, the book was proscribed but nevertheless circulated in Macedonia. For a time after the fall of Yugoslavia in April 1941, Racin worked on the railroad in Bulgaria. He fled back to Macedonia when he was wanted by the police. Arrested by the Bulgarian occupation authorities, he was eventually released and joined the Partisan movement of Josip Broz Tito. Racin was killed in battle. Believed to be very important for the creation of the Macedonian literary language, Racin authored several other books of poetry and three novels. One of them, Afion (Poppy), was in large part destroyed by the interwar Yugoslav police. (DP)

RACOVÎȚĂ Mihail (7 March 1889, Bucharest–28 June 1954, Sighet), Romanian general. In 1906–7 Racoviță studied at the Military School of Artillery and Cavalry and from 1907 to 1909 in the Military Academy in Hannover (Germany). In 1918 he was responsible for the repatriation of Romanian prisoners of war from Germany. In 1928 he was promoted to colonel, in 1936 to brigadier general, and in 1940 to general of division. In 1941–42 Racoviță commanded a cavalry corps. In 1942 he was appointed general of the army corps and in 1943 commander of the Bucharest garrison; in 1943–44 he commanded armored troops. In 1944 he was commander of the Fourth Army. After the coup of 23 August 1944, which toppled Marshal Ion Antonescu, Racoviță became minister of defense in the government of General Constantin Sănătescu. He ordered the interrogations and, in October 1944, the arrests of Romanian generals. After he left his post in November 1944, Racoviță was general inspector of cavalry and chief inspector of the General Inspectorate of the Third Army. In 1946 he was appointed general of the army, and in 1946–47 he commanded the First Army. In September 1947 he retired. Arrested on 2 April 1950 for being the “general of a bourgeois army,” on 5 July 1950 Racoviță was moved to the Sighet prison. He was called an “element hostile to the present authorities and to the Soviet Union” and accused of supporting a “cavalry and caste spirit,” of “political reactionism,” of contacts with the anti-Communist opposition, and of war crimes because he defended officers taking part in the Iași pogrom. Racoviță’s trial continued until May 1952, when he was sentenced to hard labor for life. Racoviță was tried in absentia, and he was not recorded in any penal institution, while the court “did not know his whereabouts.” In fact he was kept in the Sighet prison until he died. (LW)

RACZKIEWICZ Władysław (28 January 1885, Kutaisi, Georgia–6 June 1947, Ruthin, Great Britain), Polish lawyer and politician, president-in-exile of the Polish Republic. Raczkiewicz was the son of a judge and the grandson of an insurgent who was subjected to property confiscation and deported to the Caucasus following the Polish January Uprising of 1863. Upon graduating from a classical high school in Tver, Raczkiewicz studied mathematics and law at the University of St. Petersburg. As a student, he joined the illegal Organization of Nationalist Youth and the Union of Polish Youth–Zet. Threatened with arrest, Raczkiewicz transferred to the Law School of the University of Dorpat (Tartu), where he graduated in May 1911. Following a year-long stint in the military, he was promoted to officer rank in 1912. Later he worked as a lawyer in Minsk in Belorussia. Raczkiewicz was mobilized in 1914. After the overthrow of the tsar in 1917, he began organizing Polish military units in Russia, becoming chairman of the board of the Union of Military Poles in Minsk. On 7 June 1917, during the First General Congress of Military Poles in Petrograd, he was elected chairman of the Supreme Polish Military Committee (Naczwpol). Despite opposing the Bolsheviks, Raczkiewicz was against involving the Polish military units on the side of the Whites, and he supported the subordination of the First Polish Corps (formed in August 1917) to the Regency Council, a Polish provisional authority in Warsaw dependent on the Central Powers. In February 1918 Raczkiewicz became chairman of the clandestine Supreme Council of the Polish Armed Forces in Kiev and plenipotentiary of the Regency Council for Polish military formations in Russia. From 1917 to 1918 he served as a city councilman in Minsk and organized the Polish School Matrix there, as well as taking care of refugees and founding self-defense units.

In December 1918 Raczkiewicz took the helm of the military department of the Committee to Defend the Eastern Borderlands in Warsaw. In April 1919 he was assigned to the General Staff of the Polish Army. On 16 May 1919 he was appointed deputy general commissioner of the Eastern Lands. Upon the capture of Minsk by the Poles, Raczkiewicz became the supervisor of the Civilian Board of the District of Minsk. In April 1920 he was promoted to the rank of major in the artillery. Between July and September 1920, he led volunteer eastern Polish units in their fight for Wilno (Vilnius). Between December 1920 and June 1921 he served as delegate to the Lithuanian government in Vilnius. From June through September 1921 he was minister of interior in the government of Wincenty Witos. Then Raczkiewicz assumed the functions of governor (wojewoda) of Nowogródek Province (October 1921–August 1924), government delegate in Wilno (until June 1925), and once again minister of interior (from 5 May 1926).

After the coup d’état of May 1926, Raczkiewicz—as a follower of Józef Piłsudski—was considered a candidate for the presidency of the Polish Republic. However, he became the governor of Wilno Province (1926–30). In November 1930 he was elected to the Senate from the lists of the Nonparty Bloc of Cooperation with the Government; however, he failed to join this parliamentary club. On 9 December 1930 Raczkiewicz was elected speaker of the Senate. He focused mainly on a reform of the public administration. In August 1935 he became governor of Kraków Province, and in July 1936, provincial governor of Pomerania. Meanwhile, between October 1935 and May 1936, Raczkiewicz served as minister of interior. He supported the policy of cracking down on the anti-Polish organizations of the German minority. He belonged to the so-called Castle group, which sided with Poland’s president, Ignacy Mościcki. Raczkiewicz held numerous public and pro-bono posts, including the chairmanship of the World Union of Poles Abroad.

Following the outbreak of World War II in September 1939, Raczkiewicz was charged by his government with organizing assistance among Polish Americans for occupied Poland. On 27 September 1939, he reached Paris, where he was tapped by President Mościcki to succeed him. In a radio address on 30 November 1939 Raczkiewicz declared that he would carry out the prerogatives of his office, as enshrined in the April 1935 constitution, jointly with his prime minister. In November 1939 Raczkiewicz nominated General Władysław Sikorski to the prime ministership, and in December 1939 he established the National Council, which was Poland's skeletal parliament-in-exile, led by Ignacy Paderewski. Raczkiewicz and Sikorski often clashed on various issues. On 18 July 1940, proclaiming the need to keep military and civilian functions separate, Raczkiewicz dismissed Sikorski and charged August Zaleski with the mission of assembling a new government, while allowing Sikorski to keep the post of commander-in-chief. Thanks to the mediation of General Kazimierz Sosnkowski, Sikorski retained the helm of the government. Another serious difference of opinion occurred when, on 30 July 1941, Sikorski signed, against Raczkiewicz's objections, a Polish-Soviet treaty. The altercation lasted several weeks and resulted in the resignation of three cabinet ministers. Ultimately, Raczkiewicz came to regard the treaty as a fait accompli. Following the death of Sikorski, on 14 July 1943, Raczkiewicz appointed Stanisław Mikołajczyk as his prime minister, and, in September 1943, General Sosnkowski as the commander-in-chief. In August 1944 he appointed the Socialist Tomasz Arciszewski, who had recently arrived from Poland, as his successor. Under pressure from the British, Raczkiewicz dismissed Sosnkowski, who opposed any compromise with the Soviets regarding Poland's Eastern Borderlands, and appointed General Tadeusz Bór-Komorowski as the commander-in-chief. After the failure of the Warsaw Uprising, General Komorowski was taken prisoner by the Germans, so some of the functions of the commander-in-chief were taken over by the president himself. On 29 November 1944 Raczkiewicz appointed Arciszewski to replace Mikołajczyk as prime minister. In July 1945 the Polish government-in-exile lost international recognition. In April 1947, despite earlier agreements, Raczkiewicz changed his mind about his successor, anointing Zaleski; this led to the implosion of the Polish political émigré community. Sick with leukemia, in March 1947 Raczkiewicz checked into a sanatorium in Ruthin in northern Wales, where he died. He was buried at the Cemetery of the Polish Airmen in Newark, England. (JS)

RACZYŃSKI Edward (19 December 1891, Zakopane–30 July 1993, London), Polish politician and diplomat.

Raczyński was born into an aristocratic family, the son of the owner of the estate of Rogalin in Wielkopolska. He studied at the university in Leipzig, the London School of Economics and Political Sciences, and the Jagiellonian University in Kraków, where he graduated with a doctorate in law. Following a short stint in the military, Raczyński was drafted into the diplomatic corps. He was the secretary of Poland's legations in Copenhagen (1920–22) and London (1922–24). Then he worked in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs in Warsaw as the supervisor of the Eastern Department and the Department of International Organizations. Between 1932 and 1934 he represented Poland at the League of Nations. He participated in the disarmament conference in Geneva. From November 1934 through July 1945 he served as ambassador to London. Raczyński was the co-author of the Polish-British mutual aid treaty of 25 August 1939. In September 1939 he energetically appealed for assistance to Poland, which was being overrun by the Nazis, but in vain. During the war he played an important role as a non-partisan diplomat who knew the British very well. As minister of state, Raczyński was the supervisor of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs in the government of General Władysław Sikorski (1941–43). He supported postwar Poland's federation with Czechoslovakia and negotiated the issue with President Edvard Beneš in London. After the outbreak of the uprising in Warsaw in August 1944, Raczyński endeavored to convince the British about the righteousness of the cause and the hostility of the USSR toward the Poles. He vainly urged the British government to increase arms drops for fighting in Warsaw and to dispatch a Polish paratrooper brigade to Poland's capital.

Following World War II Raczyński remained in Great Britain, participating actively in building the political institutions of the Polish émigré community and organizing assistance for refugees. He defended the Polish cause in numerous memoranda, letters, and press articles. He maintained permanent contacts with the British authorities who dealt with Polish matters. The (Communist) Provisional Government in Warsaw demanded that Raczyński be barred from diplomatic issues concerning Poland. After Great Britain recognized the Communist-controlled Provisional Government of National Unity in Warsaw in July 1945, London withdrew its recognition of Raczyński. He continued to be active in the European Movement and the Liberal International. Between 1954 and 1972 Raczyński was a member of the émigré Council of Three, fulfilling the duties of Poland's president-in-exile in opposition to August Zaleski. From 1979 to 1986, he was the president-in-exile of Poland. At that time, the dissident movement and Solidarity emerged in Poland;

they also suffered under martial law and witnessed a wave of political emigrations to the West. During his tenure, on 19 January 1986 Raczyński signed a joint declaration with the Council of Free Czechoslovakia concerning prospects for a future Central European federation. He also endeavored to maintain friendly relations with the Ukrainian émigré community (the Polish-Ukrainian declaration of 28 November 1978). He was a co-founder of the Fund to Assist the Homeland, which was intended to support the political opposition in Poland. Raczyński enjoyed a great deal of authority among Poles both at home and abroad. After resigning from office, although blind, he maintained an active interest in democratic transformation in Poland. Raczyński authored (among other works) Polska polityka zagraniczna w czasie II wojny światowej (Polish foreign policy during World War II; 1953); a diary, W sojusznicznym Londynie (In Allied London; 1960); and Od Narcyza Kulikowskiego do Winstona Churchilla (From Narcyz Kulikowski to Winston Churchill; 1976). RĂDĂCEANU Lothar (19 May 1899, Rădăuți, near Suceava–24 August 1955, Helsinki, Finland), Romanian Socialist and Communist activist. After finishing secondary school in Bucharest, Rădăceanu began to study in the Department of Literature and Philosophy of the University of Bucharest. In 1919 he joined the Social Democratic Party (Partidul Social-Democrat). After completing his studies, he earned a Ph.D. in philosophy from the University of Bucharest in 1925. In 1927 he became secretary of the newly established Romanian Social Democratic Party (Partidul Social-Democrat din România [PSDR]) and a member of its Executive Committee. After the PSDR was declared illegal in 1938, he directed its underground structures until 1944. From 1944 to 1948 Rădăceanu was secretary general of the PSDR, which co-formed several governments after the war. He represented the PSDR left wing, which brought about a split within the party in 1946 and a union with the Communists in February 1948. From November 1944 to February 1945 Rădăceanu occupied the post of minister of labor. In the successive governments of Petru Groza, he served as minister of labor (March 1945–October 1946) and minister of labor and social welfare (October 1946–August 1952). From January to April 1948 he simultaneously served as interim minister of national education. In February 1948 Rădăceanu became a member of the Politburo and secretary of the Central Committee of the Romanian Workers' Party (Partidul Muncitoresc Român). He held these two positions until 1952. Dismissed during the suppression of the group led by Ana Pauker, Vasile Luca, and Teohari Georgescu, Rădăceanu dealt with foreign policy in parliament, where he sat from 1946 on. In 1955, shortly before his death, he became a member of the Romanian Academy of Sciences. (LW)

RĂDESCU Nicolae (30 March 1874, Bucharest–16 May 1953, New York), general and prime minister of Romania. Rădescu was a commander on different fronts of World War I, and after the end of the war he served as a military attaché in London in the 1920s. In 1933 he resigned from the army to protest the dictatorial policies of King Charles II. Under the government of Ion Antonescu, Rădescu's patriotic attitude drew German attention, and he was interned at the Târgu-Jiu concentration camp, where he personally met some Communist activists. After the overthrow of Antonescu in August 1944 Rădescu was appointed chief of staff of the army, which was now on the side of the Allies. On 2 December 1944 King Michael V designated Rădescu prime minister and minister of interior of a coalition cabinet in which the Communists took part. Stalin, hoping that Rădescu would become a tool in his hands, accepted the composition of the government. However, Rădescu implemented his own policy and, counting upon the support of the Western Allies, tried to retain independence from the USSR. The Kremlin and the Romanian Communists controlled Moldavia and Transylvania, though, and they had at their disposal the powerful units of the Patriotic Guard of Emil Bodnaraș. When in January 1945 Rădescu attempted to dissolve them, he met effective resistance from them and counteraction from their Soviet protectors. On 24 February 1945 a demonstration in Bucharest was suppressed at which Rădescu openly accused the Communists of acting to the detriment of Romania and in the interests of the USSR. After that, on 3 March 1945 Rădescu was forced to resign by the special emissary of the Kremlin, Andrey Vyshinsky. Fearing arrest, in June 1946 Rădescu fled to Cyprus and then went to the United States, where he lived until his death. (WR)

RADEV Simeon (19 January 1879, Resen, Macedonia–15 February 1967, Sofia), Bulgarian writer, historian, diplomat, and journalist. Radev graduated from a French lycée in Istanbul. In 1895 he became a member of the Internal Macedonian Revolutionary Organization (IMRO). While a law student in Geneva (1898–1902), he continued his activities in the IMRO; among other things, he was an editor of Le Mouvement Macédonien (1902). In 1901 Radev began his association with the periodical Vecherna poshta, first as its editor (1905) and later as its editor-in-chief (1907–9). He was a co-founder of the periodical Hudozhnik (1906–9) and the editor of the newspaper Volya (1912–13). In over 250 articles from that period Radev expressed the national aspirations of Bulgarians from Macedonia and criticized the Bulgarian foreign policy on this issue. From 1910 to 1911 he wrote his most famous work, the political chronicle Stroitelite na sŭvremenna Bŭlgariia (The builders of contemporary Bulgaria), in which he depicted the social atmosphere, political clashes, and images of politicians of the first decade of the free Bulgarian state (1878–87). Radev fought in the Balkan Wars and then worked in the diplomatic services, holding the post of minister plenipotentiary to Bucharest (1913–16), The Hague (1920–21), Istanbul (1923–25), Washington, D.C. (1925–33), London (1933–38), and Brussels (1938–40). Radev was the author of La Macédonie et la renaissance bulgare au XIX siècle (1918) and the co-author of La question bulgare et les états balkaniques (1919). These works, which served as encyclopedias on the Bulgarian national issue, did not prevent the adoption of decisions unfavorable to Bulgaria in the 1919 Neuilly peace negotiations. After returning to Bulgaria in 1940, Radev worked in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. In 1944 he was dismissed by the new authorities. Under the Communist governments, he wrote a great number of historical works and memoirs, becoming a master of documentary prose. Most of Radev's literary output remains unpublished. (JW)

RADIĆ Antun (11 June 1868, Trebarjevo Desno–10 February 1919, Zagreb), Croatian politician. The son of a poor, illiterate peasant and the brother of Stjepan Radić, Radić graduated from high school in Zagreb and in Slavic studies in Zagreb and Vienna. He worked as a teacher and journalist. In December 1899, along with his brother, he founded the periodical Dom, which played a significant role in the national awakening of the Croatian countryside. In 1896–1902 Radić was the editor of the six-volume Zbornik na narodni život i običaje Južnih Slavena (Collection on the national life and customs of the South Slavs), and from 1901 to 1909 he was secretary of the Croatian Matrix (Matica Hrvatska) and editor of the periodical Glas. In December 1904 Radić and his brother established the Croatian People's Peasant Party (Hrvatska Pučka Seljačka Stranka [CPPP]). Its program, mostly written by Radić, included a demand for universal suffrage, the parceling out of the landed estates of more than 300 hectares (750 acres), and the transformation of the Habsburg monarchy into a federation of nations. The party's ideology was based on class, anticlerical, populist, and republican foundations; it identified the national interest of the Croats with the interests of the peasantry, and it referred to Pan-Slavic ideas. Apart from its critical attitude toward the clergy, the emergence of the CPPP made it difficult to create a more conservative Croatian Catholic party. Thus the party was not welcomed by the Catholic hierarchy. In 1910 and 1911 Radić was a deputy to the Croat Assembly (Sabor), and from 1912 to 1914 he was editor-in-chief of Dom, which resumed publication and became the organ of the CPPP. During World War I Radić was less active owing to poor health, and he died prematurely. His numerous articles and proposals were published in 1936–39 in a nineteen-volume work, Sabrana djela dra Antuna Radića (Collected works of Dr. Antun Radić). (WR)

RADIĆ Stjepan (11 July 1871, Trebarjevo Desno–8 August 1928, Belgrade), Croatian politician. The son of a poor, illiterate peasant and the brother of Antun Radić, Radić struggled financially to obtain a primary education in Martinska Ves and a secondary education in Zagreb and Karlstadt. He started legal studies in Zagreb but was dismissed for anti-Hungarian actions. He continued his studies in Prague and Budapest and from 1895 again in Zagreb. In October 1895 Radić was arrested for taking part in a Croatian demonstration during which the Hungarian flag was burned. After his release he left for Russia and then again for Prague, where he joined the United Croatian and Serbian Youth (Ujedinjena Hrvatska i Srpska Omladina), organized under the patronage of Tomáš Gar- rigue Masaryk. From 1899, along with his brother Antun, Radić edited the periodical Dom. He finally graduated in law in Paris. In 1902 he founded the periodical Hrvatska Misao in Zagreb, and on 5 December 1904, along with his brother, he initiated the Croatian People's Peasant Party (Hrvatska Pučka Seljačka Stranka [CPPP]). In view of a property requirement for voting rights, most Croatian peasants could not vote. Thus in the elections of 1908 and 1910 the party gained only a small percentage of the vote. Along with his brother, Radić developed a radical party ideology, based on class, anticlerical, populist, and republican foundations; it identified the national interest of the Croats with the interests of the peasantry, and it referred to Pan-Slavic ideas. Radić also published analyses of the international situation as seen from the Croatian point of view: Savremena Evropa: Karakteristika evropskih država i naroda (Contemporary Europe: Characteristics of European states and nations; 1905) and Živo hrvatsko pravo na Bosnu i Hercegovinu (Vital Croatian rights in Bosnia and Hercegovina; 1908).

During World War I Radić represented "Austro-Slavism," supporting the unification and autonomy of Habsburg Slavs, but in mid-1918 he turned toward an agreement with Serbia. On 5 October 1918 the CPPP took part in the founding congress of the National Council of Slovenes, Croats, and Serbs, and Radić was elected to its leadership. On 29 October 1918 the council broke away from the Kingdom of Hungary and the Austrian empire. After the formation of the Kingdom of Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes at the beginning of December 1918, the CPPP advocated a republican federation and opposed monarchy and Serb domination. In February 1919 Radić sent a memorandum to the Paris Peace Conference declaring the right of the Croats to self-determination; for this he was temporarily arrested. In the elections of 1920, his party ran as the Croatian Republican Peasant Party (Hrvatska Republikanska Seljačka Stranka [CRPP]), a title that was provocative to King Alexander, who was of Serb nationality. The CRPP won the majority of the Croatian votes but had no chance of gaining the majority in the all-national parliament in Belgrade. The passing of a centralist constitution on 28 June 1921 (Vidovdanski Ustav) was a new challenge for the Croats, so Radić and his party refused to take part in the parliamentary rule.

In the elections of March 1923 the CRPP ran again, winning the Croatian majority and becoming the second largest faction in the all-national parliament. Despite the creation of the Federalist Bloc in April 1923—which included the CRPP, the Slovene People's Party, and the Organization of Yugoslav Muslims—opponents of the centralist Serb governments lacked a majority to change them. In June 1924 Radić went to Moscow and entered into cooperation with the Communist Peasant International (Krestintern). In July 1924 the Krestintern admitted the CRPP, and the Communist International changed its previous stance and condemned Serbian centralism, now supporting the dissolution of the Kingdom of Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes. Radić also visited Paris and London, seeking support for a separate Croatian republic. After returning home, on 12 October 1924 he made a passionate speech accusing the Serbian elite of an abuse of power. On 5 January 1925 Radić was arrested, along with key aides, and accused of treason and cooperation with the international Communist movement. His arrest caused unrest in Croatia. In the elections of February 1925 the CRPP won its largest electoral success to date. In view of the losses suffered by the Serbian nationalists, King Alexander and the Serbian leaders changed their policy. With these conciliatory gestures, Radić declared his recognition of the 1921 constitution and changed the name of his party into the Croatian Peasant Party (Hrvatska Seljačka Stranka [CPP]). In return for a break with the Krestintern and withdrawal of his party's republican ideology, Radić was released from house arrest. In November 1925 he even became minister of education in the government of Nikola Pasić. The compromise caused serious criticism of Radić within his party and the departure of most consistent federalists and republicans from the CPP. Moreover, the Serbs failed to reciprocate with concessions. When in April 1926 Nikola Uzunović formed a new cabinet, Radić stayed in it. He increasingly insisted on constitutional reform, but in vain.

In January 1927 Radić refused to join another Uzunović government and remained in the opposition. In the elections of September 1927, the CPP lost many votes, mainly in towns. On 10 November 1927, along with the Serbian Democrat Svetozar Pribičević, Radić formed the Peasant Democratic Coalition. Given the lack of a clear parliamentary majority, in February 1928 King Alexander proposed that Radić form a government, but the latter did not want to rule on the basis of a parliamentary minority. Radić's demands that the constitution be changed and that all territories inhabited by Croats be united into one administrative unit—demands that were backed by the threat that the Croats would otherwise cease paying taxes—infuriated Serb nationalists. The climax of the crisis came on 20 June 1928, when Radić fell victim to a shooting in the parliament. His nephew Pavle was shot dead; Radić himself was badly wounded by a Montenegrin nationalist, Puniša Racić, and he soon died in a hospital. The shootings caused a serious constitutional crisis and led to the royal dictatorship of King Alexander and the renaming of the state into Yugoslavia in 1929. Since 1991 many works by Radić have been published in independent Croatia, including Hrvatski politički katehizam (Croatian political catechism; 1995), Izbrani politički govori (Selected political speeches; 1995), and Izbrani politički spisi (Selected political writings; 1995). RADKIEWICZ Stanisław (19 January 1903, Kosów Poleski–13 December 1987, Warsaw), Polish Communist activist. The son of a peasant, Radkiewicz completed high school and joined the Communist Party of Poland (Komunistyczna Partia Polski [KPP]) in 1925. Initially, he was a local activist. Later, he completed a Komintern course in Moscow and joined the KPP Central Committee (CC) apparatus. Radkiewicz was arrested and sentenced a few times for his Communist activities in Poland. From December 1937 to July 1938, during the purge of the Polish Communists in the USSR and the dissolution of their party by the Communist International, Radkiewicz was one of the five leaders heading the Provisional Leadership Board of the KPP in Poland. After September 1939 he found himself in eastern Poland under Soviet occupation. Like many other Polish Communists, he was relegated to a minor post. In June 1941 he was evacuated deep into the USSR. Radkiewicz co-organized the Kremlin-controlled Union of Polish Patriots. In April 1944 he was appointed to its Main Board and charged with maintaining contact with Poland. He was the secretary of the Central Bureau of Polish Communists, which was founded in Moscow in January 1944. He co-organized the Polish Committee of National Liberation (PKWN), and on 22 July 1944 he was appointed to head its Department of Public Security (and from 1 January 1945) the Ministry of Public Security. In August 1944 Radkiewicz was appointed to the CC and in December 1945 to the Politburo of the (Communist) Polish Workers' Party (as of December 1948, the Polish United Workers' Party [PUWP]). He was a member of the Home National Council (1944–47) and the parliament (1947–56).

Between 1944 and 1954 Radkiewicz belonged to the top Communist leadership of Poland. Because of his security post, he was personally responsible for the mass terror and criminal activities of the security apparatus. However, he seems to have been a zealous executor of the terror rather than the initiator of this particular policy line. Nonetheless, from its creation in February 1949, along with Bolesław Bierut and Jakub Berman, Radkiewicz supervised the Security Commission of the PUWP CC Secretariat. During the initial stage of the "thaw," in December 1954, a meeting of the central party activists forced the reorganization of the security apparatus, which the party leadership tried to scapegoat as solely responsible for the terror. Consequently, Radkiewicz was transferred to a lesser post and appointed minister for the state agricultural farms. Radkiewicz was purged from the Politburo in July 1955, from the government in April 1956, and ultimately from the party in May 1957. Unlike a few of his underlings, he was never tried for his Stalinist crimes. (AP)

RADNÓTI Miklós [originally Glatter] (5 May 1909, Budapest–6 or 10 November 1944, Abda, Hungary), Hungarian poet of Jewish descent. Radnóti's mother died in childbirth, and his father died when Radnóti was eleven, so he was brought up by his uncle, the owner of a textile factory in Reichenberg (now Liberec, Czech Republic), where Radnóti worked to learn the business. It was in Reichenberg that he learned about the Communist movement, which had a great influence on his views and early poems. Radnóti never became a member of the Communist Party, though, because its dogmatism antagonized him. In 1930 he began to study Hungarian and Romance languages and literatures at the University of Szeged, and in the same year he published his first volume of poetry, Pogány köszöntő (Pagan greeting). In 1931 Radnóti published the volume Újmódi pásztorok éneke (Song of modern shepherds), which brought him greater publicity, but because of it he was sentenced to eight days' arrest for "indecent and inciting religious hatred." In 1934, by then under the surname of Radnóti, he earned a doctorate in the humanities, and one year later he obtained teaching qualifications. Radnóti earned a living by giving private lessons and from author's royalties. Almost every year he published a new poetry volume, each rich and varied in formal construction, content, and mood. His poetry collections include Válogatott versek (Selected poems; 1940) and Tajtékos ég (1946; Foamy Sky: The Major Poems of Miklós Radnóti, 1992). His only prose piece, Ikrek hava (1940; Under Gemini, 1985), was his lyrical and intimate confession about the experiences of his childhood and youth. From 1940 to 1944, when he had problems getting his own writings published, Radnóti often did translations, mainly from French literature. Radnóti served in forced labor battalions three times. This experience was reflected in a series of eight eclogues and in razglednice (postcards)—poetic notes written during a death march to Germany from the evacuated forced labor camp in Bor, Serbia. These notes, full of faith in humanism, were found after the war, when Radnóti's body was exhumed. (MS)

RADOSLAVOV Vasil (15 July 1854, Lovech–21 October 1929, Berlin), Bulgarian politician. After finishing high school in Prague, Radoslavov studied law in Heidelberg, Germany, and subsequently returned to Bulgaria, where he took a job as a journalist and became involved in politics. He became aligned with the Liberal Party. In 1884 Radoslavov became minister of justice. From August 1886 to July 1887 he was in charge of the government and held the post of minister of interior. From January 1899 to the beginning of 1901 he served as minister of interior again. Radoslavov gained notoriety for corruption and the bloody suppression of peasant revolts. He was a supporter of Bulgaria's cooperation with the Central Powers. In July 1913, during the Second Balkan War, Radoslavov called upon Tsar Ferdinand to cease cooperating with Russia because he believed that good relations with Austria-Hungary and Turkey were more important for Bulgaria. Radoslavov's strategy struck a chord with Ferdinand, who appointed him prime minister (18 July 1913). In the elections of December 1913 the ruling coalition did not win a majority of seats, but the support of the tsar saved Radoslavov's government. In the elections of March 1914 Radoslavov's government gained the support of a parliamentary majority but only because Muslims from the territories seized during the Balkan Wars were allowed to vote. Although Bulgarian finances had until then been supported chiefly by France, Radoslavov convinced the National Assembly to accept a loan from Germany and Austria-Hungary (July 1917).

When World War I began, Radoslavov's government was ever more inclined to support the Central Powers, which, he hoped, might reward Bulgaria at the expense of Serbia—an ally of Russia and the Entente—by, for instance, sending supplies for Turkey via Bulgaria. Formally, though, he maintained neutrality, encouraging both sides to bid for Bulgarian support. When Berlin and Vienna directly proposed that Bulgaria should take over Macedonia, Tsar Ferdinand and Radoslavov decided to sign a treaty (September 1915) by which the Central Powers accepted the establishment of a Greater Bulgaria. In October 1915 the Bulgarian Army attacked Serbia and occupied Macedonia. The opposition recognized this success, but when in early 1916 Radoslavov sent Bulgarian troops against Romania, in the hope of gaining Dobrudja, signs of discontent began to increase, in both the parliamentary opposition and the general public. The increasing costs of war in 1916 and 1917 and the lack of new successes further undermined the position of the government. Radoslavov was openly criticized as a "hireling of Berlin." The peace treaty concluded between Romania and the Central Powers in May 1918 prevented Bulgaria from gaining Dobrudja. In June 1918 the tsar dismissed Radoslavov and entrusted the task of forming a new government to Aleksandur Malinov, who was known for his pro-Western sympathies. Radoslavov still insisted that Bulgaria continue taking part in the war on the side of the Central Powers. After the Salonika Offensive of September 1918 ended in the success of the Allied forces and led to Bulgaria's capitulation, Radoslavov fled to Berlin. Under the rule of Aleksandur Stamboliyski Radoslavov was sentenced in absentia to life imprisonment for leading Bulgaria into the war. After Stamboliyski's fall in 1923, though, many politicians who had worked for the tsar were granted amnesty. In June 1929 Radoslavov was also pardoned but was severely ill and did not live to return to his country. In 1923 his memoirs, Bulgarien und die Weltkriese (Bulgaria and the world crisis), were published in Germany. (WR)

RADOVIĆ Andrija (28 January 1872, Martinići–1947 Belgrade), Montenegrin politician. Radović graduated from high school in Cetije and then completed engineering studies in Italy. He worked in the government administration; his positions included that of the head of a department in the Ministry of Interior. A close associate of Prince Nicholas, Radović served as prime minister from 1 February to 17 April 1907. In this role, he launched an investigation into embezzlement perpetrated by the state financial administration; this indirectly damaged the reputation of the prince. Dismissed by Nicholas, Radović emigrated for a short time. During World War I he reconciled with Nicholas, and in December 1915 he became minister of finance and minister of foreign affairs. In April 1916 he resigned as minister of foreign affairs. After Montenegro's defeat in the war in 1916, together with Nicholas, Radović fled the country. From 12 May 1916 to 17 January 1917 he again served as prime minister, this time heading the government-in-exile in Paris. Radović changed his political orientation, though, and sought a union of Montenegro with Serbia. In March 1917 he became head of the Montenegro Committee. He edited the Geneva-based periodical Ujedinjenje (1917–18), in which he promoted a program of uniting the South Slavic nations. After the establishment of the Kingdom of Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes (SHS), Radović served as an MP on the ticket of the Serbian Democratic Party (Srpska Demokratska Stranka) and held the post of chairman of the National Bank in Belgrade. Radović's publications include (under the pen name of Montinegrinus) Ujedinjenje Crne Gore sa Srbijom (The unification of Montenegro with Serbia; 1917). (WR)

RADULESCU Gheorghe (5 September 1914, Bucharest), Romanian Communist activist. As a student in a trade school in Bucharest, Radulescu joined the Union of Communist Youth, and in 1933 he became a member of the Communist Party of Romania. According to some sources, as a lieutenant in the Romanian Army during World War II, Radulescu deserted with his unit and went over to the Soviet side. Upon his return to Romania in March 1944, he started working at the Ministry of the Economy. Soon he was noticed by Gheorghe Gheorghiu-Dej, and in September 1949 he was appointed deputy minister of foreign affairs. After the dismissal of Ana Pauker in June 1952, Radulescu was also dismissed and even briefly arrested. In November 1956 he returned as minister of domestic trade. In March 1957, when the ministries of domestic and foreign trade were merged, Radulescu became deputy minister and, in August 1959, minister of trade. When the two ministries were separated again in 1962, Radulescu became minister of foreign trade. In October 1963 he was appointed deputy prime minister. From 1957 he was director of the Institute of Economic Research; from April 1959 to April 1962 he was deputy chairman and then, until 1963, chairman of the Economic Committee of the UN Social and Economic Council. From 1960 he was a member of the Communist Party Central Committee, and from 1961 he was a member of parliament. In July 1965, during the Ninth Congress of the Romanian Communist Party, Radulescu became a member of the newly established Political Executive Committee (PEC). From 1963 to March 1975 he chaired the government Commission for Economic and Technical Cooperation. From August 1969 to January 1977 and then from 1986 he was a member of the PEC Standing Committee. From April 1979 he was deputy chairman of the Council of State. After the fall of the Nicolae Ceaușescu regime in December 1989 Radulescu retired from political life. (PC)

RADULOVIĆ Marko (15 December 1866, Pazici, Danilovgrad–?), Montenegrin politician. Radulović finished a primary school run by a monastery in Zdrebanik and subsequently attended secondary school, initially in Belgrade and then in the town of Zaječar, Serbia. In 1892 he completed law studies in Belgrade and assumed the post of assistant minister of justice of Montenegro. In 1893 he became responsible for affairs related to the administration of the judiciary. In 1896 he was appointed president of the district court in Danilovgrad. From 1903 to 1905 he served as president of the regional court in Podgorica. In 1905 Prince Nicholas granted a constitution to Montenegro and convened the parliament. In the same year Radulović became an MP. On 11 November 1906 he was appointed prime minister and minister of foreign affairs. He carried out a reform of the state budget and introduced parliamentary elections by secret ballot. However, he failed to win recognition from Nicholas, who dismissed him on 19 January 1907, dissolved parliament, and resumed an autocratic style of government. In 1910 Radulović opened a law practice in Cetinje. In 1913 he became a member of the Supreme Court. From December 1915 to April 1916 he served as minister of justice and vice-minister of education. During World War I the Montenegrin Army was defeated by Austro-Hungarian troops (January 1916), and Radulović was interned in Hungary and in Lower Austria from 1916 to 1918. After the establishment of the Kingdom of Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes, Radulović became a member of the Radical Party in 1919 and worked as a private lawyer. In 1924 he was appointed president of the court in Podgorica. Radulović was elected senator in 1932 and 1935. (AO)

RADZIŅŠ Pēteris Voldemārs (2 May 1880, Lugažu, Livonia–8 October 1930, Riga), Latvian general. Radziņš finished a Realschule in Valk and in 1901 a Junkers' school in Vilnius (Wilno). He subsequently served as an officer in the infantry of the Russian Army. He took part in the Russo-Japanese War, where he commanded a company. In 1910 he graduated from the General Staff Academy. During World War I he held staff positions. In February 1916 he became chief of staff of a division, and in 1917 he became a colonel. Dismissed from service in March 1918, he joined the Ukrainian Army, led by Hetman Pavlo Skoropadskiy, and served as head of a department in the General Staff. On 27 December 1918 Radziņš became assistant to the chief of staff of the army of the Ukrainian National Republic (UNR). In October 1919 he made his way via Poland to Latvia. On 27 October 1919 he was appointed chief of staff of the commander-in-chief of the Latvian Army. He prepared a battle plan against the German-supported forces of Pavel Bermond-Avalov and then against the Red Army. In December 1919, along with General Janis Balodis, the commander-in-chief, Radziņš signed an agreement on Polish-Latvian military cooperation for liberating the eastern part of Latvia (Latgale). Radziņš was in favor of close cooperation with the Polish Army. In February 1920 he was promoted to general. In October 1920 he retired from the army. In 1928 he became director of academic courses for officers. Radziņš was buried in a military cemetery in Riga. He was the holder of many awards and distinctions, including the Polish Order of Virtuti Militari. (EJ)

RADZIWIŁŁ Janusz (3 September 1880, Berlin–4 October 1967, Warsaw), prince–heir in tail of Ołyka, Polish conservative politician, and economic activist. Radziwiłł was descended from the Berlin line of the Radziwiłł house. Politically, he was closest to the traditions of the conservative Kraków Stańcyzy. He studied law at Berlin University and at the Forestry College in Eberswalde, near Berlin. In 1914 he organized a relief effort for refugees from the Congress Kingdom of Poland; it was carried out by the gentry from the Eastern Borderland (Kresy). After the outbreak of the February 1917 revolution Radziwiłł became, for a short time, a member of the Workers' and Soldiers' Council in Równe. Despite this, during the revolution he was forced to flee to Kiev and then to St. Petersburg, Finland, and Sweden. At the beginning of 1918 Radziwiłł reached Warsaw via Berlin; there, according to Stanisław Mackiewicz, the Germans offered him the Lithuanian crown. In the government of the Regency Council, between April and October 1918, Radziwiłł headed the Department of Political Affairs and then the Department of State, which was the germ of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. He had a reputation as an advocate of activist option, seeking support both in Germany and in Austria-Hungary. Radziwiłł tried to take advantage of the contradictions between these two states. He also aimed at establishing contacts with neutral countries. Radziwiłł was one of the politicians who prepared the proclamation of 7 October 1918, which announced the creation of an independent Poland, with access to the sea. After unsuccessful talks with Józef Piłsudski and with leftist parties on broadening the political platform of the government, in November 1918 Radziwiłł withdrew from the political scene.

In 1922, during a disarmament conference in Moscow, Radziwiłł represented the interests of Poland and also Romania, which did not have diplomatic relations with Soviet Russia. After the coup of May 1926 he returned to active politics. He was a candidate for minister of foreign affairs in the first government of Kazimierz Bartel. From 1928 to 1935 Radziwiłł was an Assembly deputy from the Piłsudski lists and presided over the parliamentary committee for foreign affairs. In 1935–39 he was a senator. In the 1930s he successfully expanded his family fortune and supported the conservative newspapers Dzień Polski and Czas. After Piłsudski's death, Radziwiłł's political importance diminished. He opposed the electoral law changes that were being introduced by the ruling sanacja, and he defended Wincenty Witos. In 1931–37 he was president of the National Right Party (Stronnictwo Prawicy Narodowej) and a member of the leadership of the Central Union of Polish Industry—that is, the so-called Lewiatan.

After the outbreak of World War II Radziwiłł was initially imprisoned by the Soviets in Ołyka, and between September and December 1939 he was interrogated in Moscow—even personally by Lavrenty Beria, who unsuccessfully tried to talk him into some form of cooperation. Like other members of the Radziwiłł family, he was released as a result of the intervention of the Italian ruling family. With the consent of the main political forces in Poland and abroad, Radziwiłł went to Berlin with a mission to personally present the situation on the Polish territories to Hermann Goering. However, this mission failed and was in part the reason that Hans Frank blocked Radziwiłł's bid for the presidency of the Main Welfare Council. During the Nazi occupation Radziwiłł and his son Edmund, farming in Nieborów, maintained contacts with the Polish Home Army. After the collapse of the Warsaw Uprising, Radziwiłł, along with his wife, was taken to Berlin for interrogations. In the fall of 1944 he returned to Nieborów, where he took in many refugees from Warsaw. In January 1945, along with his wife, his son Edmund, and a group of other Polish aristocrats, Radziwiłł was arrested by the NKVD and imprisoned in a camp in Krasnogorsk. His wife Anna (née Lubomirska) died there. Radziwiłł returned to Poland in 1947. He lived in Warsaw in a two-room flat, which was given to him in return for his confiscated goods, and he did not participate in public life. In 1959 he lived for some time in the West, where he held several public meetings. (PK)

RAHAMÄGI Hugo Bernhard (2 June 1886, Kurtna–1 September 1941, Kirov, USSR), Estonian clergyman, politician, and social activist. In 1906–13 Rahamägi studied theology in Yuryev (now Tartu, Estonia). He was a member of the Estonian Student Union (Eesti Üliõpilaste Seltsi) and served as chairman of the Tartu Association of Male Evangelical Youth (Tartu Evangeelsete Noorte Meeste Seltsi). From 1914 to 1920 he worked in the parish of Kaarma (Saaremaa Island), serving as head of the local Estonian Evangelical Lutheran Church (EELC) for one year. In 1920 he became an associate professor at Tartu University, and from 1926 to 1934 he was professor and dean of the School of Theology at this university. From 1923 to 1931 Rahamägi worked as an assessor at the EELC consistory and a teacher. A well-regarded author of theological works and religious poems, he was awarded an honorary doctorate by Uppsala University in 1932. In the 1930s Rahamägi served as vice-chairman of the Estonian Writers' Union and a member of many social organizations. Chairman of the Temperance Brotherhood and founder of the Union of Nordic and Baltic Lutheran Churches, he was one of the leading activists of the Estonian Christian Democratic movement. He became a member of the first parliament. This parliament was dominated by the left wing, but owing to Rahamägi's efforts, the Evangelicals achieved success when proposals to remove religion from public schools were rejected in a 1923 referendum. The campaign over religious education led to great success for the Christian Democratic Party in the 1923 parliamentary elections, and Rahamägi rose to become one of the party leaders. Minister of education in the government of Friedrich Akel, he maintained this position in the nonparty government of Jüri Jaakson (March 1924–December 1925), at a time of sharp political struggle against the left wing. At that period, as the assessor in the consistory, Rahamägi was one of the highest Church dignitaries.

On 19 June 1934 Rahamägi was elected bishop of the EELC. His election coincided with a coup d'état staged by Konstantin Päts and marked a new stage in the relations between the Church and the state. The EELC was generally opposed to democracy, while Päts, who fought against the radical right wing, needed support from the Church. Under these circumstances, both sides decided to reach a compromise. The EELC was officially recognized as a state institution, and clergymen were granted many privileges; in exchange, the Ministry of Internal Affairs was given the right to assign pastoral positions. Meanwhile, Rahamägi had an extramarital affair that led to a conflict in which theological elements were mixed with political ones. Owing to the scandal and a rift within the EELC, the government reacted sharply: Rahamägi was suspended as bishop. The consistory and the Council of the EELC were also suspended. The Ministry of Internal Affairs imposed a new administrator, who was in charge until the election of new authorities. Finally dismissed in 1939, Rahamägi was succeeded by Johan Köpp. After the Red Army occupied Estonia, Rahamägi was arrested. Sentenced to death on 25 July 1941, he was subsequently murdered in prison. (AG)

RAINIS Jānis [originally Jānis Pliekšāns] (11 September 1865, Dunavas, Courland–12 September 1929, Majori), Latvian poet. In 1879 Rainis graduated from a German school in Grīva, and in 1883 from a German high school in Riga. In 1888 he graduated from the School of Law of the University of St. Petersburg. He began writing poems as a high school student. In 1884 he translated Boris Godunov, the tragedy by Aleksandr Pushkin, into Latvian. From 1889 to 1891 Rainis worked in the Vilnius District Court. From 1891 to 1895 he edited the Riga newspaper Dienas Lapa, which was the center of a leftist poetic movement known as the New Current. Rainis wrote numerous articles on popular education and on the democratic development of society. His views were greatly influenced by the German Socialists. In 1895 Rainis began working as a notary public in Mitava (Jelgava), and in March 1897 he became an attorney in Panevėžys. That same year he married Elza Rozenberga (Aspāzija). Arrested in May 1897 for his involvement with New Current, he was imprisoned in Panevėžys, Liepāja, and Riga. While in prison, Rainis translated Faust, by Johann Wolfgang Goethe, into Latvian. In 1899, Rainis was banished to Slobodka, near Vyatka, where he continued writing; he also translated works by Henrik Ibsen, Gotthold E. Lessing, Heinrich Heine, and Pushkin. His own poems of that period expressed a premonition of a great social upheaval. For example, in his first volume of poetry, Tālas noskaņas zilā vakarā (Far-off reflections on a blue evening), natural phenomena allegorically reflected social problems.

In 1903 Rainis returned to Latvia. He took part in the 1905 revolution, which, he believed, was the beginning of the liberation of the Latvian nation from Russian rule. At that time he wrote poems and stage plays in which he used allegory to depict the national struggle against evil; one example was the drama Uguns un nakts (1946; Fire and Night, 1981). In December 1905, along with his wife Aspazija, Rainis, using an assumed name, went to Switzerland. He settled on Lake Lugano, where he wrote stage plays, poetry, and articles. At that time he called for close cooperation among Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania within the framework of a federation. Elected chairman of the Latvian Committee in Switzerland in 1917, Rainis supported the cause of Latvian independence. In April 1920 he returned via Warsaw to Latvia and was enthusiastically welcomed by thousands of people. Elected deputy to the Constitutional Assembly, in 1922 he entered the Saeima (Parliament) on the ticket of the Social Democratic Workers' Party of Latvia. From 1920 to 1921 Rainis also served as director of Riga's Dailes Theater. From 1926 to 1928 he held the post of minister of education. He also wrote poems for children. Rainis was buried in Riga. His works were published in thirty volumes and his translations in four volumes. Rainis's works had a great influence on the national consciousness of the Latvian people. Under Soviet rule his works were initially banned from publication, but after 1956 they were more and more often republished. Rainis's monument in the center of Riga has been preserved. (EJ)

RAJK László (8 March 1909, Székelyudvarhely [now in Romania]–15 October 1949, Budapest), Hungarian Communist activist. Rajk's father was a Szekler shoemaker. Rajk attended secondary school in his home town and then in Budapest. From 1927 he studied Hungarian and French philology at Péter Pázmány University in Budapest. In 1928 he went to France. After his return in 1930 he joined the illegal Communist movement. From 1931 he was a member of the Communist Union of Young Workers and of the Hungarian Communist Party (HCP). He was repeatedly arrested, and as a result he could not continue his studies. From 1933 Rajk worked as a construction worker. He was one of the main organizers and initiators of a construction workers' strike in 1935, for which he was expelled from Hungary. In 1936, on the recommendation of the party, Rajk went to Prague and from there to Spain, where he took part in the civil war. He served as a political commissar of the Hungarian battalion in the International Brigade, and he was severely wounded in the fighting. In Spain Rajk was accused of Trotskyism, and only in 1941 did the Communist International clear him of the charges. After the fall of the Spanish Republic, Rajk was interned in France. In 1941 he returned to Hungary, where he was imprisoned. After his release in September 1944, he obtained false documents and became secretary of the CC of the HCP. He was also one of the leaders of the Hungarian National Independence Front, thus one of the main organizers of the resistance movement. In December 1944 Rajk was arrested by members of the Arrow Cross Party, who did not, however, find out his true role. Thus his brother Endre, a minister without portfolio in the government of the Arrow Cross Party, managed to save him from execution. Rajk was taken to a prison in Sopronkőhida and then to Germany; from there he returned to Hungary in May 1945.

In Hungary Rajk joined the executive organs of the HCP and the Provisional National Assembly. Between May and November 1945 he was secretary of the party's CC; until March 1946 he was deputy secretary general; in 1945–46 and 1948–49 he was a member of the Politburo, and until August 1948 he was minister of the interior. Rajk played a major role in the Communist takeover and in breaking up the structures of the civil society. Under the guise of prosecuting Fascist and reactionary groups, he dissolved or banned many religious, national, or other democratic institutions and organizations. He co-organized the first show trials. In 1947 he covered up electoral fraud in the form of the so-called blue cards. Thanks to these cards, the functionaries of the HCP cast several thousand—and according to some estimates, almost two hundred thousand—additional votes. Rajk ruthlessly eliminated real or alleged anti-Stalinist forces. He was one of the most consistent executors of “salami tactics.” At the same time a competition for power intensified among Rajk, Gábor Péter, and Mihály Farkas. Mátyás Rákosi also feared Rajk because of the popularity that he had gained among party members. Therefore in August 1948 Rajk was dismissed as minister of interior and was appointed to the less important post of minister of foreign affairs.

At the end of May 1949 Rajk was arrested on the basis of fabricated evidence. His trial in September of that year was given great publicity. For example, live reports of the trial proceedings were broadcast on the radio. In this and in other similar concurrent trials, a total of nearly one hundred sentences were passed, including more than twenty death sentences. One of the main aims of the so-called trial for Rajk was to launch a propaganda campaign against Josip Broz Tito. Rajk’s group was charged with, for example, trying to provoke riots in the country and to liquidate Communist leaders. During interrogations the accused were repeatedly tortured and mentally terrorized. For example, Rajk’s friend, János Kádár, tried to make Rajk take on the role of a Titoist traitor for the sake of the proletarian authorities. On 24 September 1949 the people’s court, accusing Rajk of crimes against humanity and treason (spying), sentenced him to death. The trial became a model for similar trials in other countries of the Soviet bloc. Rajk was executed; his body was flooded with lime and buried by a suburban road. His wife was sentenced to many years in prison, and his infant son, was sent to a state educational institution. In March 1956 Rajk was rehabilitated. His ceremonial funeral, organized on 6 October 1956, changed into a demonstration against the Rákosi regime and became a prelude to the Hungarian Revolution. (JT)

RAK-MIKHAILOUSKI Shyman (14 April 1885, Maksimauka, near Molodechno–1937), Belorussian social activist and politician. In 1904 Rak-Mikhailouski graduated from a teacher training college in Molodechno. He took an active part in the revolutionary events of 1905–7 in Belorussia. From 1908 to 1912 he studied at the Pedagogical Institute in Feodosiya in the Crimea. Until 1914 he worked as a teacher in the Belorussian territories. Mobilized in 1914, he fought on the Romanian front. In 1917 Rak-Mikhailouski worked for the establishment of Belorussian national organizations among soldiers, and he became head of the Belorussian Central Military Council, which tried to organize separate Belorussian military units. After returning from the front lines in 1917, Rak-Mikhailouski served as one of the leaders of the Belorussian Socialist Hromada. He helped to organize and then took part in the proceedings of the First All-Belorussian Congress in December 1917, and he became a member of the Council of the Belorussian National Republic (BNR). He served as head of the military department of the BNR Executive Committee. In 1918, as a representative of the BNR government, Rak-Mikhailouski organized the Belorussian educational system in the region of Minsk. In 1920, along with his family, he settled in Wilno (Vilnius), where he became a member of the Belorussian National Committee. From 1920 to 1922 he worked as a mathematics teacher at a Belorussian high school. At that time he prepared a math textbook in Belorussian for secondary schools. He also edited Belaruskae slova. In 1922 Rak-Mikhailouski became a member of the Polish parliament. Along with Branislau Tarashkevich, the chairman of the Belorussian parliamentary representation, he initially sought an agreement with Polish politicians on cultural autonomy for the Belorussians who were citizens of the Second Republic of Poland. In 1923, together with two other MPs, Rak-Mikhailouski established a parliamentary representation of the Belorussian Independent Socialists.

In the mid-1920s, when hopes for cultural autonomy failed, Rak-Mikhailouski declared himself a supporter of the integration of the Belorussian territories within the framework of the Belorussian SSR. In 1926 he joined the Communist Party of Western Belorussia and was one of the founders of the pro-Soviet Belorussian Peasants’ and Workers’ Hromada. Arrested in January 1927 and sentenced to twelve years’ imprisonment by the Wilno District Court, Rak-Mikhailouski was handed over to the Soviet authorities as part of an exchange of political prisoners in 1931. He was freed in the USSR and became director of the Belorussian State Museum in Minsk. He was arrested in the USSR by the NKVD in 1933 and sentenced to ten years in labor camps on charges of Belorussian nationalism. Tried again in 1937, he was sentenced to death on the charge of spying for Poland, and then he was executed. According to another version, Rak-Mikhailouski died in a labor camp on the Solovets Islands. (EM)

RÁKOSI Mátyás (9 March 1892, Ada [now in Yugoslavia]–5 February 1971, Gorky, USSR), Hungarian Communist leader. Born into the family of a small shopkeeper of Jewish origin, Rákosi graduated from high school, and from 1910 he studied at the Academy of Eastern Commerce in Budapest, joining the Hungarian Social Democratic Party. In 1912 he obtained his diploma. Rákosi mastered six languages—an indication of his intellectual abilities. From 1912 to 1914 Rákosi trained in trading firms in Hamburg and London. At the beginning of 1915 he was sent to the eastern front. He was taken into Russian captivity, where he met the Bolsheviks. At the beginning of 1918 he escaped and returned to Hungary. He became a training officer in an infantry regiment that was stationed in Szabadka (now Subotica) in Voivodina. In December 1918 Rákosi was one of the founders of the Hungarian Communist Party (HCP). In March 1919, after the proclamation of the Hungarian Soviet Republic (HSR), he was appointed deputy people's commissar for commerce, and he also became a member of the Revolutionary Government Council. From April Rákosi was people's commissar and a member of the governing body of the People's Committee for Socialist Production and of the Supreme Council of the People's Economy. At the end of April he was appointed political commissar of the southern front, in June a member of the Central Revision Committee of the Government Council, and in July 1919 commander of the Hungarian Red Guards.

After the fall of the HSR in August 1919, Rákosi went to Vienna, where he was interned along with other Communist émigrés. In 1920 he was released; after a speech he gave on 1 May, he was expelled from Austria and prohibited to return. Rákosi left for Soviet Russia and joined the Executive Committee of the Communist International. In 1921 he became secretary of the Comintern. In December 1924 he was dispatched to Hungary. Following Comintern instructions, he formed the Hungarian Socialist Labor Party, which was a legal appendage of the delegalized HCP. At an HCP Congress in 1925 Rákosi was elected a member of the CC and was entrusted with managing the national secretariat. In September 1925 he was arrested in Hungary, along with the entire leadership, and was accused of instigating riots. In 1926 Rákosi was sentenced to eight and a half years in prison. Upon the expiration of his term, he was again brought to trial for his activities at the time of the HSR and was sentenced to life. In 1940, in exchange Moscow's returning the Honvéd banners of the 1848 revolution, Rákosi was allowed to go to the USSR. His two trials made Rákosi one of the most noted personages of the international Communist movement. Nonetheless, after his arrival in Moscow, disciplinary proceedings were conducted against him. These proceedings had already been initiated earlier because of his behavior during the investigation of his 1925 arrest. In 1942 Rákosi became the leading politician of the Hungarian Communist émigrés. At first he was the HCP representative in the Comintern and, after its official dissolution in 1943, a member and head of the Foreign Committee of the informal continuation of the Comintern. He was also one of the editors of Kossuth Radio in Moscow.

At the end of January 1945 the Soviet leadership dispatched Rákosi to Debrecen to reorganize the HCP. He assumed the post of general secretary of the party's CC. After the elections of November 1945 Rákosi was minister without portfolio; from February 1946 he was deputy prime minister; and after the elections of August 1947 he was again minister without portfolio. On 12 June 1948, at the founding congress of the Hungarian Workers' Party (HWP), Rákosi was elected the party's general secretary. On 14 August 1952 he became president of the Council of Ministers, combining, on the Soviet model, the highest party and state posts. From his return to Hungary, Rákosi was number one among the Communists. As early as 1945 his political rank and influence were greater than his formal positions would suggest. In May 1947, while serving as head of the government in the absence of Prime Minister Ferenc Nagy, Rákosi accused Nagy of a plot against the state and forced him to resign, blackmailing him that he would not allow his wife and son to leave the country. In the cabinet of Lajos Dinnyés, who was obedient to the Communists, Rákosi continued to hold the post of deputy prime minister. He succeeded in breaking up the opposition, and he was instrumental in the "victory" of the Communist bloc in the elections of 1947 and 1949.

As the HWP leader, after the Communist takeover Rákosi was the all-powerful head of the country, as well as the embodiment not only of the personality cult, but also of a Stalinist dictatorship in its Hungarian version. He was responsible for the collectivization of agriculture, the suppression of the Catholic Church and other religions, and purges in the party—under such guises as the fight against Titoism. From the very beginning Rákosi personally supervised the Office of State Security (Államvédelmi Hatóság [ÁVH]). Developing the Communist dictatorship, he tried to follow Stalin and the USSR pattern in every aspect, including the fact that in an almost Byzantine way he demanded to be worshipped as the best Hungarian pupil of Stalin.

After Stalin's death, when "collective leadership" prevailed in the Kremlin and Rákosi's protector, Vyacheslav Molotov, was struggling against his rivals, Rákosi lost full control over Hungary. At a meeting of the CC of the HWP in June 1953, according to Soviet directives, Rákosi was dismissed as prime minister. He resigned on 4 July 1953. During the tenure of his successor, Imre Nagy, Rákosi tried by all means to sabotage Nagy's attempts at correcting the system. From May 1954 Rákosi headed the committee dealing with the rehabilitation of show trial victims, but he worked to postpone resolutions on the rehabilitation of party members who had been illegally sentenced—for example, Laszlo Rajk and his associates, whose trials and executions Rákosi had supervised in 1949.

With the fall of Georgy Malenkov in the Kremlin, Rákosi's position strengthened again. In the spring of 1955, after persistent intrigues and with Soviet support, he caused the departure of Imre Nagy, but he could no longer control the growing ferment. After the Twentieth Congress of the CPSU even some of his former comrades in the Hungarian leadership turned against him. Rákosi tried unsuccessfully to shift the responsibility for political trials onto Gábor Péter and Mihály Farkas. At the same time he tried to save his position by attacking the party opposition. At a CC plenum on 12 July 1956 Rákosi accused Nagy and his associates of a "plot" and demanded their arrest. This provoked a reaction from Moscow. Six days later, at a meeting of the CC, under pressure from Anastas Mikoyan, who arrived from the USSR, Rákosi was dismissed as first secretary in favor of Ernő Gerő and dropped from the Politburo. After this meeting, alleging illness, Rákosi went to the USSR for treatment. During the Hungarian Revolution he was in Moscow. On 5 November 1956 the Presidium of the CC of the CPSU made a decision to ultimately remove Rákosi from power, although he repeatedly wrote to the CC of the CPSU and to Khrushchev asking for their consent to his quick return to Hungary. The CPSU decision was a guarantee to János Kádár that he did not have to fear the return of Rákosi.

Until the end of his life Rákosi was under the illusion that the Hungarian nation was waiting for his return, whereas he was the most detested person in Hungary. In February 1957 the leadership of the Hungarian Socialist Workers' Party (HSWP) decided that Rákosi would not be allowed to return to Hungary for five years. The resolution of the HSWP was approved by the CC of the CPSU in April 1957. In June of that year Rákosi was removed from Moscow; along with his wife he was transferred to Krasnodar, then to the town of Tokmak in Kyrgyz SSR, and finally to the town of Gorky. At the beginning of November 1960 the Politburo of the HSWP suspended Rákosi's party membership, and in August 1962 it expelled him from the party as the main person responsible for the personality cult and for lawlessness. In April 1970 the CC of the HSWP considered allowing Rákosi to return to the country if he agreed in writing not to return to politics, but Rákosi did not accept such a condition. Soon after his death, Rákosi's ashes were secretly brought to Hungary and buried at Farkasréti Cemetery in Budapest. In 1997 his memoirs, titled Visszaemlékezések, 1940–1956 (Memoirs, 1940–1956) were published. (JT)

RAKOVSKY Khristian, pseudonym "H. Insarov" (1 August 1873, Gradec, near Kotel, Dobrudja—11 September 1941), Bulgarian Communist activist in the Ukraine. The son of a rich landowner and merchant from Dobrudja, Rakovsky was a nephew of Georgi Sava Rakovski, a poet and revolutionary. Rakovsky attended a gymnasium in Kotel but was expelled for organizing a student strike. He later studied at Geneva University (1890–93). In 1897 in Montpellier, France, he earned a medical degree. In his thesis Rakovsky argued that all social pathologies were generated by capitalism. For a short time he also studied law at the University of Paris (1903–4). In 1897–1900 Rakovsky worked as a doctor in the Romanian Army. In his youth, Rakovsky was aligned with revolutionary organizations, supporting them with his family wealth. While in Geneva, he became involved in the Socialist movement. He joined the Russian Social Democratic Party and edited the periodical Sotsialdemokrat. Arrested and deported in 1893, Rakovsky established ties with revolutionary groups in Berlin. After he had been arrested and deported for the second time, he went to France. He joined the Bulgarian Social Democratic Workers' Party, which he represented at a congress of the Second International. Rakovsky was also active in Romanian, German, Swiss, Russian, and Ukrainian revolutionary organizations. He worked with Vladimir Lenin and Leon Trotsky, and he contributed to Russian revolutionary newspapers in exile, Iskra and Pravda.

From 1900 to 1903 Rakovsky was in Russia, where he was kept under surveillance by the tsarist police. He subsequently opened a medical practice in Paris. In 1904 he inherited his father's fortune and then settled in Constanța, where he worked as a doctor and lawyer. In March 1905 he revived the Socialist periodical România Muncitoare. He supported and initiated strikes and revolutionary riots in Romania. He conducted agitation among crew members of the Russian battleship Potemkin who had revolted and then sought refuge in Constanța. Despite his advice, the Russian sailors refused to send their battleship to Russia to support the revolution. In 1907 the Romanian authorities banned Rakovsky from returning to Romania because of riots that had turned into a peasant revolution. He went to live in Germany and France. Rakovsky returned to Romania in 1910 but was arrested and expelled. He moved to Bulgaria, where he edited the periodical Napred. Amnestied in 1912, he undertook lawful activities in Romania. In 1914 Rakovsky protested against World War I. In September 1915 he attended the Zimmerwald Conference and subsequently continued revolutionary activities in Romania. Arrested by the Romanian authorities in August 1916, Rakovsky was released after the capitulation of Romania in May 1917. During the German counteroffensive he moved to Russia, where he worked with the Bolsheviks in Odessa and St. Petersburg. From August to December 1917, fearing arrest by the government of Aleksandr Kerensky, Rakovsky was in hiding in Sweden, and he did not take part in the Bolshevik coup.

In January 1918 Rakovsky officially joined the Bolshevik party and was coopted into its Central Committee (CC). Appointed head of the Cheka in the Ukraine, he also served as a member of the Executive Committee of the Communist International. From January 1919 to July 1923 Rakovsky held the post of chairman of the Council of People's Commissars (the government) of the Ukraine. An advocate of autonomy for the republics within the framework of the Soviet Union, Rakovsky clashed on this issue with Stalin. He was a member of the Soviet delegation to a conference in Genoa (1922). Subsequently, as the Soviet deputy commissar for foreign affairs, he held diplomatic posts in Great Britain (1923–25) and France (1925–27). In January 1928, as one of the leaders of the Trotskyite opposition, Rakovsky was removed from all his positions and banished to Central Asia. He was held in Astrakhan, then in Saratov, and later in Barnaul, increasingly harsh conditions. In 1934 Rakovsky publicly dissociated himself from Trotsky and his earlier views. He was allowed to return to Moscow and was reinstated in the party and given a post in the scientific institute of the Commissariat of Health. Arrested in the fall of 1937, Rakovsky was forced to admit to being a British and Japanese agent. In March 1938 he was sentenced to twenty years of hard labor. He was executed in prison after the Third Reich invaded the Soviet Union. Rakovsky was the author of numerous articles and brochures, including "Rossiya na istok" (Russian policy in the East;

1898), "France contemporaine" (1901), "La Roumanie des Boyars" (1909), and "Roumania and Bessarabia" (1925). (MC)

RAKOWSKI Mieczysław (4 December 1926, Kowalewko), Polish Communist activist. Born into a peasant family, during World War II Rakowski worked as a blue-collar laborer in Poznań. In 1945–49 he served in the army. From 1946 he belonged to the (Communist) Polish Workers' Party, and from December 1948, to the Polish United Workers' Party (Polska Zjednoczona Partia Robotnicza [PUWP]). From 1949 Rakowski worked in the PUWP Central Committee (CC) apparatus, and in 1955–57, in the Department of Propaganda of the PUWP CC. In 1955 Rakowski graduated from the Institute of Social Sciences of the PUWP CC, and two years later he received a Ph.D. in history there. From 1957 to 1958 he was deputy editor-in-chief, and then (until 1982) editor-in-chief, of the weekly Polityka. Under his leadership it won great popularity and was recognized as a relatively open and modern periodical. In 1958–61 Rakowski chaired the Main Board of the Union of Polish Journalists. In 1968 he and his staff were attacked by the National Communists, but Rakowski managed to maintain his line. Making use of his position, he established numerous international contacts, particularly among German and Austrian Social Democrats. At the same time he advanced in the party ranks. In 1964 Rakowski became a deputy member, and in 1975 a member, of the PUWP CC. In 1972–89 he was a member of parliament. He enjoyed a reputation as a party "liberal," ready to participate in discussions and consider reforms.

In February 1981 General Wojciech Jaruzelski appointed Rakowski deputy prime minister. Rakowski served in this capacity until November 1985. After the introduction of martial law on 13 December 1981, Rakowski was among the closest aides of Jaruzelski, dealing with (among other things) the politically delicate issue of trade unions. In August 1983 Rakowski visited the Gdańsk Shipyard, where during a televised meeting he clashed with Lech Wałęsa. This was Wałęsa's first public appearance after the introduction of martial law. Rakowski's aggressive attitude was badly received by the workers. As deputy prime minister, Rakowski chaired the government Sociopolitical Committee and the Youth Committee. In 1985–88 he was deputy speaker of the parliament and chaired its Socioeconomic Commission. From 1987 he chaired the Society for the Support of Economic Initiatives. In December 1987 he became a member of the PUWP CC Politburo.

After a wave of summer strikes, on 27 September 1988 Rakowski became prime minister. Despite his efforts, he failed to attract to the government any representatives of the opposition, with whom he wanted to share responsibility for the economic crash. Rakowski slowed down preparations for the Round Table Talks with the opposition. His controversial decision to close down the Gdańsk Shipyard, the cradle of Solidarity—allegedly for economic reasons—was treated as a challenge by the opposition. Rakowski's government started to liberalize the economic system (the commercialization of state enterprises, freedom of economic activity, the liberalization of foreign exchange); this helped the party nomenklatura to appropriate state assets. During the Tenth Plenum of the PUWP CC in December 1988 and January 1989 Rakowski finally supported the idea of the Round Table Talks, held from February to April 1989. In the elections of 4 June 1989 Rakowski ran on the so-called national ballot, but he lost. In July 1989, when Jaruzelski was elected president, Rakowski became the PUWP CC first secretary and served in this capacity until the party was dissolved on 27 January 1990. He then joined the Social Democracy of the Polish Republic, which had emerged on the ruins of the PUWP. From 1990 Rakowski was editor-in-chief of the post-Communist monthly Dziś. Among other works, Rakowski published his memoirs, Jak to się stało? (How did this happen? 1991), and four volumes of diaries from 1967 to 1978 (1999–2002). (PK)

RALEA Mihail (1 May 1896, Huși–17 August 1964, Berlin), Romanian psychologist, literary critic, and leftist activist. In 1919 Ralea graduated from the School of Law and the Department of Literature of the University of Iași. From 1919 to 1923 he studied at the École Normale Supérieure in Paris, earning doctorates in philosophy and law. Both of his doctoral dissertations dealt with Communist ideals, with which Ralea associated himself. After returning to Romania, Ralea worked at the University of Iași, initially as a lecturer in social pedagogy and then as a professor of psychology and esthetics. He published articles in the periodical Viața românească, which came out in Iași (until 1930) and subsequently in Budapest. From 1933 to 1940 Ralea was the editor-in-chief of Viața românească. This periodical condemned the cosmopolitanism of the elites and regarded the peasantry as the class that preserved the spirit of Romania. In 1938 Ralea became professor of esthetics at Bucharest University and later director of the Institute of Psychology in Bucharest. After King Charles II disbanded political parties, Ralea served as minister of labor (March 1938–July 1940). When General Ion Antonescu came to power and established a dictatorship, Ralea joined the underground resistance movement and worked with the Communists. In 1943 he founded the Socialist Peasant Party, which in the same year entered the Patriotic Anti-Nazi Front (Frontul Patriotic Antihitlerist), formed by the Communists and leftist parties. After Antonescu's government had been overthrown, the Socialist Peasant Party merged with the Communist Party. Ralea became minister of arts (March 1945–August 1946) and editor-in-chief (1944–46) of the revived Viața românească. In 1946 he was a member of the Romanian delegation to the Paris Peace Conference, and then he was appointed ambassador to the United States. In 1948 he became a member of the Romanian Academy of Sciences. He represented Romania in international organizations. Ralea's publications include Problema inconștientului (The problem of unconsciousness; 1925); Psihologie și viață (Psychology and life; 1938); Introducere în sociologie (Introduction to sociology; 1944); and Istoria psihologiei (The history of psychology; 1955), as well as essays and memoirs. RAMANAUSKAS Adolfas, pseudonym "Vanagas" (Hawk) (1918, United States–1957, Kaunas, Lithuania), leader of the Lithuanian anti-Soviet partisan movement. Ramanauskas was born into a family of Lithuanian émigrés in the United States who returned to Lithuania when he was three years old. He graduated from the Kaunas Military School, and in 1939 he also finished a pedagogical institute. During the first Soviet occupation (1940–41) Ramanauskas avoided deportation. From 1941 to 1944

he taught at a teacher training college in Alytus and was active in an anti-German pro-independence underground movement. When the Red Army again seized Lithuania in the summer of 1944, Ramanauskas became engaged in the partisan struggle. In 1945 he commanded a partisan group in Merkinė, and in 1948 he became commander of units in the region of Dainava, southern Lithuania. In 1949 he was appointed adjutant to the command of the partisan Movement of Lithuania's Struggle for Freedom (Lietuvos Laisvės Kovu Sąjūdis), and in December 1951 he became its chairman and commander-in-chief, consolidating the central command center. However, the partisan struggle was ending, undermined by the collectivization of agriculture and the deportation of thousands of peasants. Seeing that the situation of the underground resistance was becoming hopeless, in 1952 Ramanauskas ordered that the partisans end the military struggle, return to civilian life, and take up passive resistance. Ramanauskas himself continued the underground struggle until 1956. Captured by Soviet special services, he was executed without trial. (WR)

RAMANAUSKAS Pranciskus (6 October 1893, Betygala, near Raseiniai, Samogitia–15 October 1959, Telšiai), Lithuanian bishop. After graduating from a seminary in Kaunas, Ramanauskas was ordained a priest in 1917. He served in the parishes of Raseiniai and Telšiai and later studied in Rome, earning a doctorate in theology in 1932. In the same year Ramanauskas became a professor of dogmatic theology and religious pedagogy at the theological seminary in Telšiai. He was also in charge of a diocesan synodal court and was responsible for church censorship. In 1934 Ramanauskas published Tikybos pamokos praktikoje (Religious teaching in practice). In 1940 he became rector of the Telšiai seminary. Ramanauskas avoided deportation during the first Soviet occupation (1940–41), and in 1944 he was consecrated auxiliary bishop of Telšiai. When the Red Army again occupied Lithuanian in the summer of 1944, Ramanauskas found it increasingly difficult to continue his pastoral duties. In 1946 he was arrested and exiled to Siberia. In 1956 he was allowed to return to Lithuania but was banned from exercising his pastoral ministry. He died soon after his return. (WR)

RANCĀNS Jāzeps (25 October 1886, Nautrēni, Latgālia–2 December 1969, Grand Rapids, Michigan), Latvian

Catholic bishop. After finishing high school in Kronstadt (1905) and a seminary in St. Petersburg (1908), Rancāns studied at the St. Petersburg Theological Academy, from which he graduated in 1912. Ordained a priest in 1911, he worked as a parish priest, school chaplain, and teacher of Latvian at a seminary in St. Petersburg. He was a member of the Board of the Latvian Mutual Aid Society. In 1914, after the outbreak of war, Rancāns served as a military chaplain. From 1916 to 1918 he worked as a professor at the St. Petersburg Theological Academy and as deputy parish priest and deputy dean of St. Catherine parish in St. Petersburg. Rancāns was active in Latvian refugee organizations. In 1917 he attended a congress of Latvians in Rēzeknē, supporting the unification of all Latvian lands. From February 1918 to August 1920 he was a counselor to the diocese of Riga and a member of the Latvian National Council. In October 1919 the government appointed Rancāns as Latvia's special envoy to the Holy See, and he held this post until 1925. In August 1920 he also became the chancellor of the diocese of Riga and a professor and rector of a seminary in Riga. From 1922 to 1934 Rancāns was a member of parliament, briefly serving as its deputy speaker. In 1923 he was appointed suffragan bishop of Riga and papal prelate. In 1938 he became dean and professor of the School of Catholic Theology of the University of Latvia. Rancāns wrote many theological works. After the Red Army occupied Latvia in June 1940, Rancāns was dismissed from the university, as the School of Theology was abolished, but he avoided deportation. During the German occupation he worked as dean of the Theological School of Riga University from 1943 to 1944. In 1943 he joined the underground Central Council of Latvia, which strove for Latvian independence. Before the Red Army again occupied Latvia, Rancāns left for Germany (September 1944), where in 1945 he became chairman of the Central Council of Latvia. In 1951 he emigrated to the United States, where he supported efforts to maintain international recognition of the Latvian state and was engaged in extensive pastoral and charity work. (EJ)

RANGHEȚ Iosif (1904, Transylvania–1 September 1952, Bucharest), Romanian Communist activist. Rangheț had only an elementary school education. In 1930 he joined the Communist Party of Romania (CPR), which had been active in the underground from 1924 on. In 1933–34 Rangheț served as secretary of a CPR organization in Cluj.

He subsequently headed CPR organizations in Banat and in the Jiu coal basin. He was one of the few Romanian Communists who avoided imprisonment in the second half of the 1930s, but he was in constant touch with the group led by Gheorghe Gheorgiu-Dej in the Caransebeş prison and in the Tîrgu-Jiu detention camp. In April 1944, along with Emil Bodnaraş and Constantin Pârvulescu, who had come from Moscow, Rangheţ called for the takeover of power by the RCP and the elimination of the group led by Stefan Foriş. Until the coup of 23 August 1944, Rangheţ (together with Bodnaraş and Pârvulescu) served as a member of a triumvirate that ruled the party, which was preparing to take over power with the help of the Red Army. In 1945 Rangheţ formally became a member of the Central Committee (CC) of the Romanian Communist Party (RCP), serving simultaneously as head of the RCP CC Staff Training Department. At that time the RCP increased its membership from several thousand to several hundred thousand by recruiting (among others) former Iron Guard members, who now showed repentance for their past activities. From February 1948 until the end of his life Rangheţ was a member of the Politburo of the CC of the Romanian Workers' Party, formed by incorporating the Romanian Social Democratic Party into the Communist Party. In August 1948 Rangheţ was a member of a party commission that interrogated Lucreţiu Pătrăşcanu after the latter's arrest. (LW)

RANKOVIĆ Aleksandar (28 November 1909, Šumadija–19 August 1983, Dubrovnik), Yugoslav Communist activist. Born into a Serb peasant family, Ranković in his youth joined the Communist movement, which was illegal in the Kingdom of Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes. In 1928 he became secretary of the League of Young Communists of Serbia. Sentenced to six years of prison, after serving the sentence, Ranković resumed his conspiratorial activities, first against the Yugoslav government and, after June 1941, against the German occupiers. Under the alias “Marko,” he served as aide-de-camp to Josip Broz Tito. Arrested and tortured by the Gestapo, Ranković did not give away any information and was not recognized. After being rescued from prison, he worked as the chief of Tito's intelligence, gathering information about collaborators. He was also a member of the General Staff of the National Liberation Army.

After the power takeover by the Communists, Ranković became head of the security forces, leading a massacre of the Ustashe in retaliation for the cruelties that they had committed during the war. He advocated the suppression of wide circles of Croatian Catholics under the pretext of hunting down war criminals. Ranković organized intelligence, counterintelligence, and the secret political police, developing forces that became the foundation of his special position in the Titoist system. In 1946 Ranković was appointed minister of interior and vice-president of the republic. After June 1948, when the Comintern denounced Tito, Ranković led the elimination of the supporters of the pro-Moscow line in the Yugoslav party. They were arrested and sent to a camp on the island of Beli Otok. In 1952 Ranković left the ministry but was promoted in the hierarchy of the party, which at that point took on the name of the League of Communists of Yugoslavia (LCY). Ranković criticized Soviet interference in the domestic affairs of Communist states. After a congress of the LCY in 1958 Ranković became head of the political-organizational secretariat of the Central Committee (CC) of the party. The secretariat strengthened the role of the party bureaucracy in the system. Ranković was an ardent but conservative follower of Tito's line, opposing the reform wing of Edvard Kardelj. At a plenum of the CC in July 1962 Tito backed Ranković, who therefore in 1963 became the secretary of the CC of the LCY. Meanwhile, reformers were beginning to dominate in the party apparatus.

In the spring of 1966 a conflict within the party intensified for ethnic reasons (among other things). Ranković was blamed for favoring the Serbs, especially in the political police, the UDB (Uprava Državne Bezbednosti), and for aiming at the centralization of the state at the expense of the Croats, Slovenes, and other nations. On 16 June 1966 the Executive Committee of the party voted to remove Ranković. At a plenum of the CC that was held in July 1966 on the island of Brioni, Ranković, Svetoslav Stefanović (the minister of interior), and other co-workers were accused of impeding reforms for direct democracy and of holding personal power that threatened the interests of the state. It was revealed that Ranković had tapped Tito's telephone and was collecting a private dossier on leading party and state functionaries. Ranković carried out a moderate self-criticism and in return was dismissed from all his posts but was spared a trial. After retiring, he did not hold any posts. (WR)

RAPACKI Adam (24 December 1909, Lwów [Lviv]–10 October 1970, Warsaw), Polish Communist activist and diplomat. Rapacki came from an intellectual family. In 1932 he graduated from the Warsaw School of Economics. From 1930 to 1934 he was active in the Union of Independent Socialist Youth, and in 1932–37, in the Socialist Workers' University Society. Rapacki took part in the September 1939 campaign, and then he spent the war years in German captivity. After his return to Poland, he joined the Polish Socialist Party (Polska Partia Socjalistyczna [PPS]), which was licensed by the Communists. Between 1946 and 1948 Rapacki was a member of the Chief Council and the Central Executive Committee (Centralny Komitet Wykonawczy [CKW]) of the PPS. Along with Józef Cyrankiewicz, he aimed at the unification of the PPS with the Communist Polish Workers' Party (Polska Partia Robotnicza [PPR]). In December 1948 Rapacki joined the Polish United Workers' Party (Polska Zjednoczona Partia Robotnicza [PUWP]). In 1948–68 Rapacki sat on the Central Committee (CC); between December 1948 and March 1954 he sat on the Politburo; from July 1956 he was a deputy member of the Politburo, and then he was again a full member. From 1947 Rapacki was an MP; in 1947–50 he was minister of navigation; from 1950 to 1956 he was minister for higher education; in 1956–68 he was minister of foreign affairs. On 2 October 1957, at the Twelfth Session of the UN General Assembly, Rapacki presented a plan to establish a denuclearized zone in Central Europe. This proposal became known as the Rapacki Plan. The plan was then developed further in a government memorandum in 1958. The nuclear-free zone was to include Poland, the German Federal Republic, the German Democratic Republic, and Czechoslovakia. Giving up nuclear weapons on these territories would involve the withdrawal of nuclear weapons and a ban on the production, storage, or installation of the equipment and devices used for their maintenance, as well as a ban on the use of nuclear or hydrogen weapons against any state in the zone. As all disarmament proposals by the Socialist states, this one was also inspired and closely coordinated with the USSR. Rapacki opposed the Communist anti-Semitic campaign in March 1968, and when it reached the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, he withdrew from diplomatic work and from political life in general. (JS)

RĂȘCANU Ioan (1874, Moldavia–25 February 1952, Sighet), Romanian general and politician. In 1891–96 Rășcanu studied at an officer training school. In 1903 he graduated from an officers' school of artillery and engineering. From 1907 to 1911 he served as military attaché to the embassy in Berlin. In 1916, after Romania entered World War I on the side of the Entente, Rășcanu was appointed colonel. In 1917 he took part in heavy battles against German troops at Mărășești. The Romanian troops, supported by Russian forces, succeeded in stopping the German offensive at the Seret River. In the same year Rășcanu was promoted to general. In December 1917 he took part in the signing of the Truce of Focșani between Romania and the Central Powers. From September 1919 to December 1921, as a representative of the National Liberal Party (Partidul Național Liberal), Rășcanu served as minister of war. From January to June 1927 and from June 1931 to May 1932 he was minister for the affairs of Bessarabia and Bukovina, which had been incorporated into Romania in 1918. Rășcanu vigorously strove for the unification of the Romanian state, particularly for the integration of Bessarabia and Bukovina. At the end of the 1930s he retired. After World War II, when the Communists consolidated their power in Romania, Rășcanu was arrested, like many other Romanian generals, who were usually accused of treason and spying for Western countries. He died in prison. (LW)

RAŠTIKIS Stasys (3 September 1896, Kuršenai, near Šiauliai–2 May 1985, Los Angeles, California), Lithuanian general. During World War I Raštikis fought on the Lithuanian, Galician, and Romanian fronts. In 1917 he graduated from the Military Academy in Tiflis (now Tbilisi, Georgia). After the October Revolution, he returned to Lithuania and fought against the Bolsheviks. Wounded and taken prisoner in 1919, he was held in a camp near Tula and later in Moscow, but he returned to Lithuania in 1921 as part of an exchange of prisoners of war. Raštikis returned to the army and served in the infantry and later in the General Staff. In 1929 he completed law studies at the University of Kaunas, and in 1932 he graduated from the General Staff Academy in Berlin. From 1933 to 1934 Raštikis served as commander of a regiment, chief of staff of a division, and chief of Lithuania's General Staff. Promoted to general in 1935, he became minister of defense in 1938. In 1935–40 he served as commander-in-chief of the army. As part of a program to improve relations with Poland, Raštikis made a visit to Warsaw in May 1939. In October 1939 he took part in negotiations in Moscow, during which the Kremlin coerced Lithuania into agreeing to (among other things) the establishment of Soviet military bases in Lithuania. Raštikis was instrumental in the modernization of the Lithuanian army, trying to prevent its excessive politicization by the dictatorship of Antanas Smetona. The democratic forces hoped that Raštikis would stage a coup against Smetona, but he remained politically neutral. However, Smetona did not trust him, and in January 1940 Raštikis was dismissed.

In the face of increasing Soviet pressure, Smetona decided to reinstate Raštikis to power and on 14 June 1940 appointed him prime minister. However, the Kremlin did not recognize this decision and invaded Lithuania. Raštikis was able to avoid arrest and fled to Germany. After the Third Reich attacked the Soviet Union in June 1941, politicians who had survived the Soviet occupation proclaimed a provisional government in Vilnius, and Raštikis was appointed minister of defense. On 5 August 1941 this provisional government ceased to exist. Raštikis was offered the post of general adviser in the civil administration, but he rejected this offer and began working in the War Museum in Kaunas. Fearing the return of the Red Army, in 1944 Raštikis went to Germany and then to the United States in 1949. He taught Russian at Syracuse University (1951–52) and at the Institute of Foreign Languages in Monterey, California. He was the author of numerous articles in the field of military science and politics. In 1956–73 Raštikis published a three-volume memoir, Kovose del Lietuvos (Fighting for Lithuania). (WR)

RATAJ Maciej (19 February 1884, Chłopy, East Galicia–21 June 1940, Palmiry, near Warsaw), Polish politician and Peasant Party activist. Rataj came from a poor peasant family, but he graduated in classical philology from the University of Lwów (Lviv) in 1908. After graduation he taught Latin, Greek, and introductory philosophy. Involved in the peasant movement from his student days, after the split in the Polish Peasant Party (PSL) in 1913, Rataj favored the Polish Peasant Party–Piast (Polskie Stronnictwo Ludowe–Piast), on whose behalf he took part in the All-Polish Congress of Peasant Intellectuals in June 1918. In January 1919 Rataj was elected to the Constituent Assembly and moved to Warsaw. He was vice-president and then president of the Constitutional Commission. He was also active in the commissions for foreign affairs and education. He served as vice-president of the parliamentary club of the PSL–Piast, and until 1920 he sat on the State Defense Council, which was established during the Polish-Soviet war. Rataj became known as a diligent parliamentarian and a gifted speaker. He was leaning toward the concept of a federal, not an ethnic, state, and he considered Bolshevism the worst threat. He regarded Soviet Russia as simply a successor of tsarist Russia, and he wanted to form a federation with Lithuania, Belorussia, and the Ukraine against Soviet Russia. He thought that Warmia (Ermland) and Mazuria should be incorporated into Poland and that a plebiscite should be avoided.

From July 1920 to September 1921 Rataj served as minister of religious affairs and of public education. In this role, he carried out reforms that were to consolidate and spread education over the whole country and in particular to facilitate access to education in the countryside. Rataj also contributed to the development of higher education; for example, he granted a new charter to Poznań University and established the Academy of Technical Sciences. His work in the Ministry of Education won him general support, as well as the recognition of the political elite for his organizational skills. After the fall of the first cabinet of Wincenty Witos, Rataj resumed parliamentary work, and after the elections of 1922 he was elected as speaker of the Assembly (1 December 1922).

As speaker of the Assembly, Rataj performed the duties of Poland's president on two occasions: after the murder of Gabriel Narutowicz (16–22 December 1922) and immediately after the coup of May 1926 (15 May–1 June 1926). Following the murder of Narutowicz, Rataj immediately appointed General Władysław Sikorski as prime minister, and he declared a state of emergency in Warsaw. On 20 December 1922 Stanisław Wojciechowski became new president of Poland, and Rataj handed over his duties to him. After resuming his parliamentary duties, Rataj helped pass many important laws; his main success was the adoption of an agrarian reform by the Assembly in 1925. In May 1926 Rataj unsuccessfully tried to persuade Witos not to accept the post of prime minister, as he feared an open conflict with Józef Piłsudski. When Wojciechowski resigned as a result of Piłsudski's coup d'état, Rataj again served as interim head of state until the National Assembly sanctioned the coup, electing Piłsudski (who refused to assume the office), and then a few days later Ignacy Mościcki, as president. In the elections of March 1928 the PSL–Piast suffered a defeat, and Rataj was elected to the Assembly only from the national lists. The paths of Rataj, who was leaning toward the left, and Witos, who was growing increasingly rightist, were gradually diverging. Despite that, Rataj inspired the unification of the peasant parties and assumed the leadership of the Peasant Party (Stronictwo Ludowe [SL]), which was formed from the merger of the peasant parties in 1931. In 1930 Rataj did not enter the Assembly, but for a short time he took Witos's place in it from 1934 to 1935.

On 1 September 1939, along with Kazimierz Bagiński and some Socialists, Rataj suggested the creation of a government of national consent, but the proposal was rejected by the sanacja regime. Rataj was a co-initiator and the SL member of the Chief Political Council (Główna Rada Polityczna), which was the political base of the Service for the Victory of Poland (Służba Zwycięstwu Polsce). On 20 November 1939 Rataj was arrested by the Gestapo. Released on 14 February 1940, he resumed his underground work and established the Central Leadership of the Peasant Movement—that is, the underground leadership of the SL. Re-arrested by the Gestapo on 24 March 1940, Rataj was executed in a mass execution in the Kampinos Forest near Warsaw. After the war his body was exhumed and buried at the cemetery in Palmiry. In 1965 Rataj's Pamiętniki 1918–1927 (Diary 1918–1927) was published. (PU)

RATAJSKI Cyryl, pseudonyms: “Górski,” “Wartski,” and “Wrzos” (3 March 1875, Zalesie Wielkie, near Gostyń–19 October 1942, Warsaw), Polish politician. Upon graduating from a high school in Poznań, Ratajski studied law at the University of Berlin. Afterwards he worked as a court clerk in Torgau, Germany. In 1905 he passed an exam for judges and opened his own law firm in Raciborz. During the Poznań Uprising, in January 1919, Ratajski became an envoy of the Supreme Popular Council to the Polish National Committee in Paris. Between 1919 and 1922 Ratajski worked as the head supervisor of a chemical factory owned by his father-in-law, Roman May. In April 1922 he was elected mayor of Poznań, a post he held with a short interruption until April 1934. Meanwhile, between November 1924 and June 1925 he served as minister of internal affairs. In 1929 he co-organized the General Domestic Exhibition in Poznań. In recognition for his contributions to the development of the city, Ratajski was awarded honorary citizenship of Poznań in 1934. Politically, Ratajski was close to the Christian Democrats. In October 1937, he joined the newly founded Labor Party (Stronictwo Pracy [SP]) and the Front Morges, which opposed the ruling sanacja. In May 1938 Ratajski was elected provincial chairman of the SP for Poznań. In March 1939 he headed a delegation of scholars and democratic activists who pleaded fruitlessly with President Ignacy Mościcki for an amnesty for political prisoners and for a government of national unity.

During the September campaign of 1939, after the Polish authorities had abandoned Poznań, Ratajski again became mayor on 5 September. A week later he was forced to surrender the city to the Germans. When the Nazis demanded that he assemble a list of hostages, Ratajski submitted only one name: his own. Soon he joined the underground. Ratajski was arrested and imprisoned at Fort VII and later deported to Nazi-occupied central Poland, the so-called General Government. From the fall of 1940 Ratajski lived in Warsaw under the assumed name of “Celestyn Radwański.” As a compromise candidate accepted by both the Polish right and the Socialists, Ratajski was nominated by the London-based prime minister, General Władysław Sikorski, to be the government delegate for the homeland on 3 December 1940. Ratajski enlarged both the central and provincial administrations of the Polish Underground State. In April 1942 he nominated Stefan Korboński to be his plenipotentiary for civilian struggle. In the spring 1942 Ratajski fell seriously ill. During the summer, unable to continue his work, he delegated his duties to Jan Piekalkiewicz and soon tendered his resignation to General Sikorski; the latter accepted it on 5 August 1942. He died undetected by the Germans. Ratajski was the author of Mowy 1922–1928 (Speeches, 1922–1928; 1929); Mowy 1929–1933 (Speeches, 1929–1933; 1934), and “Moje wspomnienia” (My recollections, Polonia, 20 August 1939). (WR)

RAȚIU Ion (6 June 1917, Turda–16 January 2000, London), Romanian politician. Rațiu attended high school in Turda and Cluj. Then he studied law at the University of Cluj, graduating in 1938. As a student, he became involved with the National Peasant Party (Partidul Național Țărănesc) of Iuliu Maniu. From 1938 to 1940 Rațiu worked in a law firm, and in 1940 he secured a job at the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, leaving for the Romanian Embassy in London. Following Romania's alliance with Hitler and the abdication of King Charles II in 1940, Rațiu resigned in protest and asked for political asylum in Great Britain. He began contributing to the British press on Romanian affairs and working for the BBC. In 1940 he enrolled at Cambridge University to study economics, earning a doctorate in 1943. While at Cambridge, Rațiu founded the Union of Romanian Students in Great Britain. He was also deputy chairman of the International Student Council and a member of the Executive Committee of the World Council of Youth and the Executive Committee of the Movement of Free Rumanians, which opposed the Nazi German–Romanian alliance and supported democracy and a pro-Western orientation for Romania.

After the war, as instructed by Maniu, Rațiu remained in Great Britain to lobby for democracy in Romania. From 1946 to 1947 he attended the peace conference in Paris as a correspondent of the American press agency International News Service. Until 1957 he was a press and radio journalist focusing on Romanian and East European affairs at the BBC, the Voice of America, and Radio Free Europe. From 1951 to 1957 Rațiu also worked for a maritime transport company and later founded a similar company, which brought him substantial wealth. In 1955 Rațiu launched a weekly, Free Romanian Press, which was the best Western source for information about Romania. He became one of the most prominent émigré opponents of the Communist system in Romania. From 1957 to 1984 Rațiu led the International Federation of Free Journalists. He published Policy for the West (1957) and Contemporary Romania (1975). Meanwhile, in 1960 he co-founded Amnesty International. Objecting to the visit of Nicolae Ceaușescu to Great Britain in 1978, Rațiu chained himself to the fence of the Ritz Hotel. In 1984 he co-founded and chaired the Union of Free Romanians (Uniunea Românilor Liberi), which advocated an independent and democratic Romania. In 1958 he launched the daily Românul Liber (Free Romanian). In 1989 agents of the Securitate attempted to assassinate Rațiu, but he was forewarned by Scotland Yard and survived.

At the beginning of 1990, a month after the overthrow of Ceaușescu, Rațiu returned to Romania and became deputy chairman of the restored Christian Democratic National Peasant Party (Partidul Național Țărănesc-Creștin Democrat [CDNPP]). He and his party opposed the government dominated by the Communists of the National Salvation Front. Between 1990 and 1992, as well as from 1992 to 1996, Rațiu served as a senator. In 1990 he entered the presidential elections, gaining 4.3 percent of the vote. At that time he founded a right-wing daily, Cotidianul. Opposed by the post-Communists, Rațiu nonetheless continued as deputy chairman of the CDNPP after 1996, and he remained until his death a member of the International PEN Club. (LW)

RAUCH Pavle (20 February 1865, Zagreb–29 November 1933, Martijanec, near Varaždin), Croatian politician. Rauch completed law studies. As a supporter of a union with Hungary, he became a member of the Croatian Sabor (National Assembly). When the Hungarians increased their oppression of the Croats, causing protests from the Croatian-Serbian Coalition, Rauch was appointed ban (governor) of Croatia by the authorities in Budapest (January 1908). In spite of Rauch's policy of intimidating the opposition, in the 1908 elections to the Sabor the Croatian-Serbian Coalition won a decisive victory, gaining fifty-seven out eighty-eight seats. Rauch postponed calling the Sabor and introduced absolutist rule. Politicians of the Croatian-Serbian Coalition were accused of contacts with the Serbian government. Adam and Valerijan Pribičević, the leaders of the Independent Serbian Party (Srpska Samostalna Stranka [SSS]), were arrested. In January 1909 there were fifty-eight Serbian leaders in prisons, awaiting trial. In an effort to discredit the Croatian-Serbian Coalition, Austro-Hungarian authorities provided the Austrian historian Heinrich Friedjung with documents alleging that the politicians of this coalition were secretly cooperating with the government of Serbia. In March 1909 Friedjung published these documents, and the politicians who had been accused sued him. At trial it was proved that the documents were forgeries, and Friedjung was discredited as a historian. In 1910, under the pressure of European public opinion, the Hungarian authorities dismissed Rauch as ban. Thereafter, Rauch did not play any political role. (AO)

RAVASZ László (29 September 1882, Bánffyhunyd [now Huedin, Romania]–6 August 1975, Budapest), Hungarian Evangelical bishop. In September 1900 Ravasz began to study at the Theological Academy of the Evangelical Reformed Church in Kolozsvár (Cluj) and at the Humanities Department there. From 1903 to 1905 he was a pastor's assistant in Kolozsvár and a bishop's secretary. For one year

he studied at the university in Berlin. In 1906 he worked as a pastor's assistant in Bánffyhunyd. Ravasz earned a Ph.D. from the University of Kolozsvár and lectured at the Theological Academy there. From 1907 to 1921 he worked as a pastor in Budapest. He also edited the periodical Protestáns Szemle in 1914–18 and the periodical Út in 1915–18. Ravasz founded the periodicals Református élet and Magyar Kálvinizmus. In 1920 he became bishop of the Evangelical Reformed Church for the region of Dunamelék. Ravasz was a member (1925–49) and vice-chairman (1937–40) of the Hungarian Academy of Sciences. From 1927 to 1944 he was a member of the upper chamber of parliament. Under Communist pressure Ravasz resigned as bishop in 1948 and retired in 1953. His daughter Boriska married István Bibó, an outstanding sociologist, in 1940. During the 1956 revolution Ravasz returned to public life. On 31 October he became head of the Hungarian Evangelical Reformed Church. On 1 November, after an appeal by Cardinal József Mindszenty, the Primate of Hungary, Ravasz also made a speech on the radio. He also took part in the so-called Evangelical Revival Movement. From early November 1956 to April 1957 he was an assistant preacher in the Calvinist church on Kalvin Square in Budapest. Later Ravasz was again forced to withdraw from public life. In 1960 he published his memoirs, Emlékezéseim (My memoirs). In 1989 Ravasz was posthumously reinstated as a member of the Hungarian Academy of Sciences. His numerous theological works were published in twelve volumes in 1993. (JT)

RAŽNJATOVIĆ Željko, known as Arkan (17 April 1952, Brežice, Slovenia–15 January 2000, Belgrade), head of a Serbian paramilitary force, indicted for war crimes during the war in the former Yugoslavia. While still a teenager, Ražnjatović became involved in criminal activities (bank robberies, thefts) in West European countries. He managed to escape from jail several times. In 1986 he returned to Belgrade, where he opened a bakery. He established ties with the Crvena Zvezda (Red Star) football team. In October 1990 he created a nationalist paramilitary organization known as Arkan's Tigers. This force became infamous around the world for atrocities committed in the area of Vukovar in eastern Croatia. Around two thousand Croats were killed there in November 1991, following three months of siege. In 1992 Ražnjatović became active in Bosnia, particularly in the towns of Bijeljina and Zvornik. Arkan's Tigers are accused of "ethnic cleansing," rape, and the murder of Croats and Muslims. In 1992 Ražnjatović briefly served as an independent MP for Kosovo in the Serbian parliament. He became leader of the Serbian Unity Party, which was against independence for Bosnia-Herzegovina and called for its union with Serbia. In 1993 Ražnjatović was put on the list of war crime suspects wanted by the International Criminal Tribunal for Former Yugoslavia in The Hague. In March 1999 he was officially indicted for crimes against humanity and war crimes. Ražnjatović was regarded as one of the closest associates of Slobodan Milošević. During the 1999 NATO intervention in Kosovo, he was frequently in the media at home and abroad, and he condemned the NATO air raids. He often appeared in public with his wife, the popular Serbian singer Svetlana "Ceca" Veličković. Ražnjatović was gunned down in the lobby of the Intercontinental Hotel in Belgrade. Speculation then arose as to whether his death was a political or a gangland killing. (AO)

RÁZUS Martin (18 October 1888, Vrbica–8 August 1937, Brezno), Slovak writer and politician, Lutheran pastor. Rázus attended schools in his native Vrbica and in Liptovský Sv. Mikuláš, Banská Bystrica, and Kežmark. He subsequently studied Protestant theology at the University of Bratislava (1907–11) and Edinburgh University (1911–12). His stay in Scotland increased his religiousness and national consciousness. After returning home, Rázus became a Lutheran pastor and then parish priest in Pribylina (1913–20), Moravské Lieskové (1921–30), and Brezno (1930–37). Active in politics since his student days, his views evolved from supporting a union of Czechs and Slovaks to supporting the struggle for Slovak autonomy. During World War I Rázus was an opponent of the Austro-Hungarian monarchy and maintained contacts with Czech politicians. After the war, he supported the Czechoslovak state, but he soon lost trust in his Czech partners as "Prague-centrism," Czechoslovakism, and a lack of autonomy for Slovakia became facts. In 1922 Rázus became a member and the main ideologue of the Slovak National Party (SNP). In 1925 he led an unsuccessful electoral campaign for his party, and the SNP failed to enter parliament.

In 1929 Rázus became chairman of the SNP and entered into an electoral alliance with the National Democratic Party in Slovakia. He became an MP on a joint ticket for these parties but soon left their parliamentary group. Rázus served as an MP until the end of his life, frequently defending the social and cultural interests of Slovakia. He also called on all Slovak MPs to establish a common front, but to no effect. In 1932 Rázus entered into cooperation with Hlinka's Slovak People's Party (Hlinková Slovenská Ľudová Strana [HSL'S]). As a result he became more radical in his views. In the 1935 elections the HSL'S and SNP candidates ran on a joint ticket. However, after the elections the coalition broke up because the HSL'S failed to keep its promise of a fair share of seats, and the SNP received only one. Also, conflicts on religious grounds increased between Catholics from the HSL'S and Protestants from the SNP. Criticized within his party, Rázus suffered greatly because of this failure. He then became seriously ill and died two years after the elections.

Rázus was also one of the greatest Slovak poets. In his works he included war motifs—these can be found, for instance, in the collections Z tichých a búrných chvíľ (From quiet and stormy moments; 1917) and To je vojna! (That's war! 1919)—as well as social and national themes, as in the volumes Kameň na medzi (Milestone; 1925), Šípy duše (Arrows of the soul; 1929), and Cestou (Journey; 1935). In Stretnutie (Encounter; 1937)—an important poetry volume written shortly before his death—Rázus was critical of his political activities. He also wrote a number of novels and the autobiographical pieces Maroško (1932) and Maroško študuje (1933). (PU)

REBET Lev, pseudonyms “Klishch” and “Star” (3 March 1912, Stryi–12 October 1957, Munich), Ukrainian lawyer and nationalist politician. Because of his underground activities, Rebet was imprisoned by the Polish authorities. In 1934–38 he served as head (providnyk) of the Organization of Ukrainian Nationalists (OUN) in Poland, reconstructing the network of the organization destroyed by the arrests in 1933–34. After the split of the OUN into two factions, Rebet, as a supporter of Stepan Bandera, became a member of the leadership of the OUN-B. He became deputy prime minister in the Yaroslav Stetsko government, which was created by the supporters of Bandera in 1941. Arrested by the Gestapo on 15 September 1941, Rebet was a prisoner in the concentration camp in Auschwitz until the fall of 1944. From 1945 he was in exile in Munich.

In March 1945 at the so-called Vienna congress, where the Foreign Units (Zakordonní Chastyny [ZCh]) of the OUN (the name of the OUN-B in exile) were created, Rebet proposed Bandera as leader of the organization. Soon, however, he backed pro-democratic changes in the OUN, according to the resolutions of the Third Congress of 1943. As a result and since Bandera questioned the authority of the Ukrainian Supreme Liberation Council (USLC) to represent the national movement, Rebet parted with Bandera. In December 1946 Bandera dismissed him as chief justice of the ZCh of the OUN. Along with Zinovy Matla, Rebet created a new faction of the OUN, the so-called agents, joined by, for example, Mykola Lebed, Myroslav Prokop, Ivan Hryniokh, and Rebet's wife, Daria, who was an emissary of the commander of the UPA, Roman Shukhevych. In 1950 Rebet became a member of the foreign representation of the USLC. He was a respected publicist and theoretician of the movement and also a scholar. Rebet became an assistant professor (1952) and professor (1954) of law at the Ukrainian Free University in Munich. He co-edited the journals Ukraiins'ka Trybuna and Chas i suchasna Ukraïina. He edited the weekly Ukraiinskyi Samoistiinyk. He published Svitla i tiny OUN (The splendors and miseries of the OUN; 1954), Formovanie natsii (Formation of the nation; 1951), and Teoriia natsii (Theory of the nation; 1956). Rebet was murdered by a KGB agent, Bohdan Stashevs'kyi, who also killed Bandera two years later. (GM)

REI August (22 March 1886, Kabala, near Pilistvere–29 March 1963, Stockholm), lawyer, leader of Estonian Social Democracy. Rei took part in the revolution of 1905. After graduating in law from Petersburg University in 1911, he became aligned with the Social Democratic Party. In November 1918 he became minister of labor in the government of Konstantin Päts. He supported radical social reforms that would prevent a Bolshevik revolution in Estonia. Rei became a member of the Constituent Assembly as a representative of Social Democracy; he was elected president of the parliament and directed its work in the most difficult period of the war for independence. Next he was an MP from the first to the fifth terms of the parliament and president of Social Democracy. Between 4 December 1928 and 9 July 1929 Rei served as the prime minister and president (riigivanen) of Estonia, and in 1932–33 he served as minister of foreign affairs. After the implementation of an authoritarian constitution, which was ratified in a general referendum, in February 1934 Rei decided to become a candidate in the presidential elections. During a fierce campaign before the elections the leader of the agrarian forces, Prime Minister Päts, put down coup attempts by the extreme right and assumed dictatorial powers. Joining the ruling coalition, Rei actually gave his support to Päts. For some time he was a deputy minister for foreign affairs, and from February 1938 to June 1940 he was ambassador to the USSR. On 16 June 1940 Rei received an ultimatum from the Kremlin, which demanded that Estonia form a government “friendly” to the USSR. Before Rei was able to take any steps, the Red Army invaded Estonia and put an end to its independence. When on 19 June 1940 Andriei Zhdanov came to Tallinn, Päts wanted to appoint a new government with Rei as its head, but Zhdanov did not agree. Rei survived the Soviet and German occupations, and when they were over, he took part in the work of the Estonian National Committee (Eesti Vabariigi Rahvuskomiteega), which was preparing to take over power.

On 18 September 1944, shortly before the return of the Red Army, Rei became minister of foreign affairs in the provisional government of Otto Tief. When Estonia was again occupied by the Soviets, Rei managed to get to Sweden, where he remained until his death. From 1945 he headed the Estonian National Committee, which was active in Stockholm. Rei published several works propagating the idea of the independence of the Baltic states—for example, Have the Baltic Nations Voluntarily Renounced Their Freedom? (1944), Have the Small Nations a Right to Freedom and Independence? (1946), Nazi-Soviet Conspiracy and the Baltic States (1948), and The Drama of the Baltic Peoples (published posthumously in 1970). REICH Leon (11 July 1879, Drohobycz [Drohobich]–1 December 1929, Lwów [Lemberg, Lviv]), Zionist lawyer and politician in Poland. Reich came from a wealthy merchant family of Orthodox Jews. After graduating from a high school in Sambor, he entered the law school at the University of Lemberg (Lviv), where he received his doctorate. Then he studied at the School of Political Sciences in Paris. As a student, Reich became active in the Zionist movement and was coopted to the Central Committee of the Zionist Organization. In 1905 he participated in a Zionist congress in Basel, and afterwards he took part in all subsequent congresses. Reich published in the Zionist weekly Wschód. He visited Palestine in 1918. In 1913 he became a member of the Executive Committee of the World Zionist Organization. During World War I Reich served in the military courts of the Austro-Hungarian Army. In November 1918 he was temporarily interned by the Polish authorities at Baranów for suspicion of collaboration with the Ukrainians. He was released after the intervention of the Zionist Organization, backed by the British government. During the Paris Peace Conference Reich served as deputy chairman of the Committee of the Jewish Delegations (Comité des Délégations Juives). At its behest he edited Les droits nationaux des Juifs en Europe Orientale (The national rights of the Jews in Eastern Europe; 1919). In 1922 Reich published, in Polish, his recollections about the conference: Żydowska delegacja pokojowa w Paryżu (The Jewish peace delegation in Paris). In 1920 Reich became chairman of the Zionist Organization of Eastern Galicia, and in 1922 he was elected to the Polish parliament from the lists of the United National Jewish Parties. As chairman of the Jewish Club, Reich negotiated a Polish-Jewish agreement in 1925 that granted the Polish government the support of Jewish deputies in exchange for certain rights for the Jewish minority. When the agreement collapsed, Reich quit his post. Following the coup d'état of May 1926, Reich advocated accommodation with the sanacja government. In 1927 he published the Zionist Dziennik Warszawski. In 1928 he was once again elected to the Parliament to represent the National Jewish Union. He also practiced law in Lwów. In 1934, Reich's ashes were taken to Tel Aviv. (WR) REICIN Bedřich (29 September 1911, Pilsen [now Plzeň, Czech Republic]–3 December 1952, Prague), Czech officer and Communist activist. In the 1930s Reicin was an activist in a Communist youth organization and a sports editor for Rudé Právo. Imprisoned by the Gestapo in March 1939, he was released after a few months. In 1940 he went to the Soviet Union, where he worked in the Czechoslovak section of Moscow Radio and worked with the leadership of the Communist Party of Czechoslovakia abroad. In 1942 Reicin served in the Czechoslovak military units in the Soviet Union. From 1944 to 1945 he was chief of counterintelligence of the First Czechoslovak Army.

As head of military intelligence (1945–48), Reicin was in charge of the Communist infiltration of the army. After a coup in February 1948, he initiated and then conducted purges in the army. He was also responsible for many court sanctioned crimes (such as government approved executions), and he developed a reputation of widespread ill fame. The most widely known case was that of General Heliodor Piła, a war hero who was sentenced in 1948 and executed in 1949 because, according to Reicin, “Piła knew too much about the Soviet intelligence services.” From 1948 to 1951 Reicin served as deputy defense minister for personnel affairs. In 1948 he became brigadier general and in 1950 major general. Arrested in February 1951 as a result of a political struggle with Alexej Čepička, Reicin was sentenced to death in the trial of Rudolf Slanský and his associates in November 1952. Reicin was hanged in Pankrac Prison, Prague. (PU)

REIFF Ryszard, pseudonym “Jacek” (4 July 1923, Warsaw), Polish politician. Born into a white-collar family, Reiff graduated from Warsaw University. During the Nazi occupation, from 1941 he was active in the extreme rightist Confederation of the Nation (Konfederacja Narodu) and its armed units, the Cadre Shock Battalions (Uderzeniowe Bataliony Kadrowe), which were subordinated to the Home Army in 1944. At the end of 1944 Reiff was captured by the NKVD and imprisoned in the Diagilev camp, but he fled and returned to Poland in 1946. He worked as a journalist for the Dziś i Jutro group, and then, as a close associate of Bolesław Piasecki, he became editor-in-chief of the daily Słowo Powszechne and leading organizational activist of the association PAX. From May 1965 to May 1969 Reiff was a member of parliament, supporting the policies of Władysław Gomułka. In 1976–79 he was deputy chairman of the PAX Main Board, and after the death of Piasecki, from 14 January 1979 he was chairman. Reiff supported the policies of Edward Gierek. In March 1980 he was reelected to the parliament and chaired its PAX club. During the sixteen months of the Solidarity self-containing revolution, Reiff attempted to transform the PAX into a Christian Democratic party and called for an agreement between the Communists and Solidarity. On 12 February 1981 Reiff became a member of the Council of State. On the night of 12–13 December 1981 he was the only member of the council who protested against martial law and declined to sign a relevant resolution. During martial law, Reiff’s opponents within the PAX, led by Zenon Komender and supporting the party line, managed to oust Reiff in January 1982. In May 1982 he was also dropped from the Council of State. From February to April 1989 Reiff took part in the Round Table Talks, and on 4 June 1989 he was elected to the senate on behalf of the Civic Committee of the Chairman of Solidarity, Lech Wałęsa. Reiff chaired the senate Commission for Emigration and Poles Abroad. From 1989 he chaired the Union of Former Siberian Exiles (Związek Sybiraków). Among other works, Reiff published Czas Solidarności (The time of solidarity, 1988; uncensored edition) and Wybór jutra, czyli reforma socjalizmu czy reforma w socjalizmie (The choice for tomorrow: Reform of socialism or reform within socialism; 1988). REINYS Mečislovas (5 February 1884, Daugailiai–8 November 1953, Vladimir), archbishop of Vilnius (Wilno), victim of communism. After graduating from a seminary in Vilnius in 1905, Reinys studied at the St. Petersburg Theological Academy from 1905 to 1909. Ordained in July 1907, he continued his studies at the University of Louvain, Belgium, earning a doctorate in philosophy in 1912. He subsequently studied biology at the same university and apologetics at the University of Strasbourg. Afterwards, Reinys returned to Lithuania, where in 1916 he became a professor at a seminary in Vilnius. Throughout this time he worked for the cause of Lithuanian independence. After the Bolsheviks seized Vilnius at the beginning of 1919, Reinys was briefly detained. When Polish forces recaptured the Vilnius region in October 1920, he continued to defend Lithuania’s right to the city. Arrested by the Polish authorities of Central Lithuania and forced to go to the territories of the Lithuanian Republic, Reinys settled in Kaunas. He taught theology and philosophy at the newly established university and held the chair of psychology there. In 1925–26, as a representative of the Christian Democratic Party, Reinys served as minister of foreign affairs. In this role he helped to regulate Lithuania’s relations with the Holy See and to establish a Lithuanian province of the Catholic Church, with its capital in Kaunas. On 5 April 1926 Reinys was consecrated bishop-coadjutor of Vilkaiviškis. He was also a co-founder of the Lithuanian Academy of Arts and Sciences and strove for the establishment of a Catholic university, which the government of Antanas Smetona would not permit.

During the Soviet occupation Reinys avoided arrest, and on 9 July 1940 he was appointed titular and auxiliary archbishop of the archdiocese of Vilnius. After the Germans arrested Archbishop Romuald Jałbrzykowski, Rejnys was assigned as administrator of the archdiocese of Vilnius, with the right of succession. In 1945, when the Soviet authorities prevented Archbishop Jałbrzykowski from returning to Vilnius—which was part of the Lithuanian Soviet Socialist Republic at that time—Rejnys continued his pastoral duties, but under increasingly difficult conditions. In 1947 he was arrested and accused of supporting the Lithuanian pro-independence underground. Sentenced to ten years' imprisonment, Rejnys served his sentence in the Vladimir prison, where he died. Rejnys was the author of numerous articles in the field of theology and psychology. "Rasizmo problema" (Problems of racism; 1939) is his most significant work. (WR) RETINGER Józef (17 April 1888, Kraków–12 June 1960, London), Polish politician. Retinger came from a family of Galician intelligentsia with aristocratic connections. He graduated from a high school in Kraków, studied at the Academia Nobili Ecclesiastici in Rome, and received a Ph.D. in literature from the Sorbonne in Paris in 1908. He specialized in French Romanticism and published two monographs on the topic. The sponsorship of Count Władysław Zamoyski facilitated Retinger's contacts in France's intellectual world and in postgraduate studies at the Ecole des Science Politiques (1908–9), as well as in Munich, Florence, and at the London School of Economics and Political Science (1909–11). Following his return to Kraków, Retinger joined the local avant garde and published the journal Miesięcznik Literacki i Artystyczny. Soon, however, he returned to England and began dabbling in politics. Initially, Retinger supported an anti-German orientation, exposing the Prussian persecution of the Poles. He worked at the time with Ignacy Paderewski and Joseph Conrad.

The outbreak of World War I caught Retinger in Galicia. He left immediately for Switzerland and France. He used informal contacts with the French Foreign Ministry to influence Polish affairs. He wrote profusely, arguing for the need to restore Poland's independence. Retinger maintained contact with all Polish political orientations at home and abroad, although he eschewed joining any. He was considered to be an expert on Polish affairs, and some suspected him of being a Freemason and an agent of British intelligence. In May 1918 Retinger was expelled from France to Spain. Thanks to the financial assistance of Conrad, he left for Latin America. He participated in the Mexican revolution, advising President Plutarco Elias Calles. Retinger described his adventures and reflections in The Social Movements in Mexico (1925). In the mid-1920s Retinger returned to Great Britain. He worked closely with the Labour Party and maintained links to Polish Socialists. He worked to improve Polish-Soviet and Polish-British relations. At the same time, he represented a number of British companies in Poland. In 1931 Retinger participated in negotiations with Berber rebels in Morocco. He kept in touch with some in the Polish-American diaspora. After the coup d'état of May 1926 of Józef Piłsudski, Retinger supported the center-left opposition. He also renewed his friendships among the artistic and literary figures in Poland, in particular in the milieu of the liberal Wiadomości Literackie, becoming its London correspondent. On the eve of war he worked closely with the anti-Piłsudskite Front Morges.

Following the outbreak of World War II, Retinger became a permanent adviser to Prime Minister General Władysław Sikorski. On the initiative of the British (specifically Ambassador Stafford Cripps and Foreign Secretary Anthony Eden) and in accord with his own beliefs, Retinger worked to improve Poland's relations with the USSR. He supported Sikorski's plans for a federation in East Central Europe. Retinger accompanied the prime minister on foreign trips and negotiations with Allied leaders. Between 30 July and 4 September 1941 he was the main Polish diplomat accredited with the Kremlin, conducting a policy of appeasement toward Stalin. After the death of General Sikorski in July 1943, Retinger formally quit his posts with the Polish government. However, on 4 April 1944 he was parachuted as a political courier over Nazi-occupied Poland. He held talks with the leaders of the Polish underground, including the government delegate, Jan Stanisław Jankowski. The leadership of the Polish military underground objected to Retinger's presence. Subsequently, he left Poland, along with the Socialist Tomasz Arciszewski, on 26 July 1944. A supporter of granting recognition to the Communist-dominated Provisional Government of National Unity, Retinger visited Poland thrice with the British charitable relief (1945–46). Later, he distanced himself from Polish affairs and concentrated on the issue of European unity. During a congress at The Hague (7–11 May 1948), Retinger co-initiated the foundation of the European Parliament. He also co-founded the so-called Bildenberg Group (1952) and participated in its work. Retinger authored many works, including Polacy w cywilizacjach świata do końca wieku XIX (Poles in world civilizations through the nineteenth century; 1937) and Memoirs of an Eminence Grise (1972). (MC)

REVAI József (12 October 1898, Budapest–4 August 1959, Budapest), Hungarian Communist activist. Revai was born into a Jewish middle-class family. During World War I he worked at a bank and belonged to the Social Democratic Party. In 1917 Revai created his own anarchist-socialist group, and in 1919 he was one of the co-founders of the Hungarian Communist Party (HCP). At the time of the Hungarian Soviet Republic (HSR) Revai worked for the journal Vörös Újság and was among the intellectual leaders of the extreme left. After the fall of the HSR in August 1919, Revai fled to Austria. Later he also lived in Germany, France, Czechoslovakia, and the USSR. At a meeting of the CC of the HCP in June 1926 Revai became a member of that body. He was linked to the faction of Jenő Landler and was known in the Communist underground as “Kemény.” During secret visits to Hungary Revai maintained contacts with the Communist circles. In an atmosphere of growing distrust and personal squabbles, which were the result of Stalin’s machinations, at the Sixth Comintern Congress in 1929, Revai attacked Béla Kun. When the latter ordered the GPU to arrest the supporters of Landler’s faction on charges of Trotskyism, Revai counterattacked effectively. After his arrival in Hungary in December 1930, Revai was arrested. Released, he went to the USSR, where in 1934 he started work in the Comintern. At the beginning of 1936, when the purge of the Hungarian Communists in the USSR began, Revai became responsible for the affairs of the HCP in the Comintern, which probably was related to his role in the purge.

During World War II Revai directed the Kosuth Moscow Radio and took part in a special program for Communist indoctrination of Hungarian POWs in the USSR. In 1944 he became a member of an interim parliament organized by the Communists and of a provisional Presidential Council. In 1945 Revai became minister of culture in the coalition government of Zoltán Tildy. He played a major role in the overthrow of democracy in Hungary. Between 1945 and 1950 Revai was the editor-in-chief of Szabad Nép, the organ of the CC of the HCP. He was a member of the party’s Politburo and represented it at the founding congress of the Cominform in Szklarska Poręba in September 1947. In 1949–53 Revai was minister of culture and the dictator of Hungarian intellectual life. He supervised, for example, an introductory program to Socialist realism. After Stalin’s death in 1953 Revai lost his post in the government and in the Politburo; his dismissal was the result of a clash with Mátyás Rákosi. After the fall of Rákosi in July 1956, Revai returned to the party leadership. At the end of October 1956, during the Budapest uprising, he went to the USSR. He returned at the beginning of 1957 and joined in the political pacification led by János Kádár, although during a party conference in June 1957 he criticized Kádár from a super-Stalinist position—for example, for the dissolution of the Hungarian Workers’ Party. As a result, Revai was expelled from the party. (MS/WR) REYMONT Władysław Stanisław [originally Rejment] (7 May 1867, Kobile Wielkie, near Radomsko–5 December 1925, Warsaw), Polish writer. The son of a village organist, from 1880 Reymont lived in Warsaw, where from 1880 to 1884 he was a tailor’s apprentice and then a journeyman. He probably completed only three grades of a school of trade school. In 1884–87 he acted, under the pseudonym “Urbański,” with traveling troupes of actors. In 1888 he started working at the Warsaw-Vienna Railway; at that time he also changed his name. Around 1890 Reymont established contacts with spiritualist circles in Częstochowa, which had some influence on his creative activity. He was also a lay brother in the Pauline order at Jasna Góra in Częstochowa. In 1891 Reymont became associated with the Dramatic Society in Piotrków and also performed at an amateur theater in Skierniewice. In 1892 he made his debut as a journalist in the Warsaw Głos. In 1893 he moved to Warsaw, where he became involved in journalism and other literary activities, paying much attention to the problems of social injustice. In 1895–97 he traveled a lot throughout Europe (for example, Berlin, Brussels, Paris, Rome, and London).

In 1896 Reymont lived in Łódź, where he collected material for his novel Ziemia obiecana (The promised land; 1899), which depicted the birth of capitalism on the Polish territories. In 1902 he began to work on his novel Chłopi (The peasants; 1904–9), which was recognized as an epic masterpiece that presented a picture of peasant life in accordance with the rhythms of nature. The novel, completed in 1909, was enhanced with modernistic descriptions of nature. During World War I Reymont took part in the work of patriotic social and civic committees. In 1917 he received the award of the Polish Academy of Arts and Sciences for Chłopi. He also became president of the Committee of the Warsaw Fund of Prudence and Assistance for Writers and Journalists (the predecessor of the Writers' and Journalists' Association, of which he also was president later). In 1919 and 1920 Reymont visited the Polish community in the United States.

In 1920 Reymont settled in Kołaczkowo, near Września. He was interested in film; he co-founded one of the first cinematographic cooperatives in Poland. In 1924 Reymont received the Nobel Prize in literature. This consolidated his fame and made Chłopi, translated into other languages as well, almost a symbol of Polish peasant culture. Reymont was a member of the Polish Peasant Party–Piast (Polskie Stronnictwo Ludowe–Piast). He was buried in Powązki Cemetery in Warsaw, and his heart was laid in the pillar of Holy Cross Church in Warsaw. Reymont is considered one of the main representatives of the realistic trend in the prose of Young Poland. In his works, we find a combination of expressive realism with naturalistic descriptions of nature and elements of impressionism, as well as symbolism and the romantic atmosphere typical of modernism. His other most important works include the novels Komediantka (The comedienne; 1896); Fermenty (Ferments; 1897); and Rok 1794 (The year 1794; 1913–18), a historical trilogy composed of three novels: Ostatni Sejm Rzeczypospolitej (The last Assembly of the Republic of Poland), Nil desperadum, and Insurrekcja (The insurrection). RIBAR Ivan (21 January 1881, Vukmanić [Kordun]–2 February 1968, Belgrade), Yugoslav politician. After graduating from a high school in Karlovac, Ribar studied law at the universities in Vienna, Prague, and Zagreb, earning a Ph.D. in 1904. He subsequently ran a law practice. He began his political career by taking part in opposition protests against the regime of Ban Károlyi Khuen-Héderváry (who was in office until 1903). Ribar's views were influenced by contacts with the leading opposition politicians in Austria-Hungary: Tomáš Garrigue Masaryk, Franó Supilo, Josip Juraj Strossmayer, and Jovan Skerlić, as well as members of the organizations Omladina and Sokol. In 1904 Ribar was one of the founders of the Croatian Progressive Party (Hrvatska Napredna Stranka), which later merged with two smaller parties and assumed the name of the Croatian United Independent Party (Hrvatska Ujedinjena Samostalna Stranka). In 1905 this party joined the Croatian-Serbian Coalition. In 1913, supported by the left wing of the party, Ribar was elected to the Provincial Parliament in Zagreb. At that time he also served as an MP in the Croatian-Hungarian parliament in Budapest.

When World War I broke out, Ribar was inducted into the Austro-Hungarian Army. In 1917 he returned home and became chairman of the local people's council in Djakovo. In October 1918 he was elected to the Executive Committee of the National Council of Slovenes, Croats, and Serbs in Zagreb. With the growing disintegration of Austria-Hungary, he called for tightening Austria-Hungary's cooperation with the Kingdom of Serbia. In March 1919 Ribar became vice-chairman of the Provisional National Assembly of the newly established Kingdom of Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes (SHS). A supporter of the idea of Yugoslavism, he was one of the founders of the Serbian Democratic Party (Srpska Demokratska Stranka [SDS]) and then served as a deputy to its leader, Ljubomir Davidović. From December 1920 to October 1922 Ribar presided over the sessions of the Constitutional Assembly. However, his ideas were rejected by Serbian politicians of the older generation who wanted the former Kingdom of Serbia to play a dominant role in the newly established state. Thus Ribar joined those who called for a coalition between the SDS and the Croatian Peasant Party, led by Stjepan Radić. In 1927 Ribar also supported the SDS's joining an opposition bloc formed around the Croatian Peasant Party and the Independent Democratic Party. As a result of the dictatorship of King Alexander I (1929–34), Ribar became disenchanted with centralism and began to support a federal model of the state. In the 1930s, as leader of the SDS left wing, Ribar drifted toward communism and established contacts with leaders of the Communist Party of Yugoslavia (CPY). He ever more often defended CPY leaders in court trials. Ribar's involvement with Communists led to a sharp conflict between him and activists of non-Communist parties. His name was taken off the SDS electoral register, and in the elections of December 1938 he failed to win a parliamentary seat.

After the German invasion in April 1941, Ribar returned to Belgrade and entered into secret negotiations with Josip Broz Tito on the establishment of a liberation movement. He simultaneously maintained contacts with opposition politicians that he had established earlier. In the summer of 1942 Ribar went to the territories liberated by Tito's Partisans and joined the CPY. Along with Moša Pijade, Ivan Milutinović, Veselin Masleša, and Ribar's son Ivan-Lola Ribar, Ribar conducted negotiations on the establishment of the Anti-Fascist Council for the National Liberation of Yugoslavia (Antifašističko Veće Narodnog Oslobođenja Jugoslavije [AVNOJ]). At the first session of AVNOJ, Ribar was elected chairman of the AVNOJ Executive Committee. In 1944 on the island of Vis, Ribar was Tito's adviser in negotiations conducted with Ivan Šubašić, the prime minister of the Yugoslav government-in-exile. In October 1944 Ribar became chairman of the Provisional People's Assembly, and in November 1945, chairman of the Constitutional Assembly of Yugoslavia. After a new state constitution was adopted on 30 January 1946, Ribar served as chairman of the parliament until 1953 and as deputy until 1963. A participant in and a close observer of key events in the twentieth-century history of Yugoslavia, he left volumes of memoirs, including Hrvatsko-srpski odnosi u prošlosti (Croatian-Serbian relations in the past; 1939); Politički zapisi (Political notes, 4 vols.; 1948–52); Uspomene iz NOB-e (Memoirs from the people's liberation struggle; 1961); and Stara Jugoslavija i komunizam (Old Yugoslavia and communism; 1968). RIBIČIĆ Ciril (30 June 1947, Ljubljana), Slovene Communist activist and lawyer. The son of a Communist activist, Mitja Ribičič, in 1970 Ribičič graduated in law, and in 1978 he received a Ph.D. in law at the University of Ljubljana, where he then taught constitutional law and where he became a professor in 1988. In 1982–84 Ribičič chaired the Sociopolitical Assembly of the Slovene republican parliament. In December 1989 he took the lead of the League of Communists of Slovenia (LCS), whose delegation left the Fourteenth Extraordinary Congress of the League of Communists of Yugoslavia in early 1990 in protest against the centralist policies of the Serb Communists. Soon the LCS was transformed into the Party of Democratic Reform (Stranka Demokratskih Reform [SDR]), which lost the elections of April 1990 and joined the opposition. Before the next elections the POD entered a coalition called the United List of Social Democrats (Združena Lista Socjalnih Demokrativ [ULSD]), which co-ruled from May 1992 to January 1993. Ribičič chaired the POD until 1993, when it entered the ULSD. He sat in the parliament on behalf of the ULSD until 2000. In December 2000 he was supported by President Milan Kučan and elected a member of the Constitutional Tribunal. Ribičič authored a number of works, including Ustavno pravo SFR Jugoslavije (The constitutional law of the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia; 1978 [co-author Miha Ribarić]), Ustavnopравни vidiki osamosvajanja Slovenije (Constitutional aspects of Slovene independence; 1992), and Rad sem jih imel (I liked them; 1993). In early 2000 Ribičič appeared before The Hague International Tribunal for War Crimes in Former Yugoslavia as an expert on the constitutional system of the Croatian Herzeg-Bosnia Republic in Bosnia-Herzegovina, which he described in Geneza jedne zablude (The origins of an error; 2000). In 2000 he published Podoba parlamentarnega desetletja (The image of a parliamentary decade). (AO)

RIBIČIĆ Mitja (19 May 1919, Trieste), Slovene Communist activist. In 1938 Ribičič enrolled in legal studies at the University of Ljubljana. During World War II he fought with the Communist guerrillas and was active in the Communist Party of Slovenia. He graduated from a military academy in Moscow. Upon his return home, he worked in the department of defense of the Slovene republic (1945–46) and then in the republic's department of interior (1947–51). Ribičič was responsible for the repression of opponents of communism and, after June 1948, of followers of the Cominform. In 1952 he became a public prosecutor of the Slovene republic. In 1953–58 he was deputy secretary and then secretary (minister) of interior of the Slovene Socialist Republic. Ribičič was a member of the executive council of the republican assembly (1959–63), and from 1974 he sat in the parliament of the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (SFRY). From 1964 he was secretary of the regional committee of the League of Communists of Slovenia (LCS) in Ljubljana, and in 1965 he joined the Executive Committee of the LCS Central Committee. In 1968–69 he was a member of the Executive Committee of the CC of the League of Communists of Yugoslavia (LCY). As chairman of the Federal Executive Council (government), Ribičič headed the federal government in Belgrade from June 1969 to August 1971. Later he was a member of the SFRY Presidium (June 1971–May 1974) and its deputy chairman (August 1973–May 1974). Ribičič was chairman of the Socialist Union of the Working People of Slovenia, its councils for publication, and its relations with religious communities (1974–82). He was a member of the LCY CC (June 1982–April 1986) and of its Presidium (June 1982–April 1986), and from June 1982 to June 1983 he headed the LCY CC. Ribičić authored Glasna premišljanja (Reflections aloud; 1983), Iskanja (Inquiries; 1995), and other works. His son, Ciril Ribičić, is also a Communist and post-Communist activist. (AO)

RIES István (14 November 1885, Küngös–15 September 1950, Vác), Hungarian Communist activist. Ries was the son of an agrarian leaseholder. After the premature death of his father, his mother moved with her children to Budapest. Ries graduated from the School of Law and Political Science of the Hungarian Royal Academy. In 1912, after passing his exams, he opened a law practice. During World War Ries he fought on the front lines and was taken prisoner by the Russians. He returned to Hungary in the summer of 1918. Under the Hungarian Soviet Republic (HSR) in 1919 Ries worked as a clerk in the propaganda department of the People's Commissariat of Education. He also joined the Hungarian Red Army. Following the fall of the HSR, Ries fled to Vienna for a few months. After returning to Hungary, he continued to run his law practice. He was a defense counsel in the trials of HSR people's commissars. In 1924 Ries joined the Hungarian Social Democratic Party (HSDP). He wrote articles for the HSDP press organs, Népszava and Szocializmus. He was a member of the executive of the Socialist Association of Lawyers and the HSDP National Bureau for the Defense of Workers' Rights. In the 1930s Ries served as chairman of the HSDP organization in the eighth district of Budapest. From 1933 to 1935 and then from 1939 onwards he was a member of the HSDP national executive. In 1943 he also took part in the work of the five-member Presidium of the HSDP. When the Germans occupied Hungary in March 1944, he had to go into hiding.

In August 1945 Ries was elected to the HSDP Politburo. In April 1945 he became an MP, and in late July 1945, minister of justice. After the elections of August 1947, Ries resigned his position in protest against Communist electoral fraud. Other HSDP government officials also resigned. Along with these officials, Ries returned to the government after a "ministers' strike." In 1948 he also held the post of chairman of the Association of Hungarian Lawyers and of the Hungarian Football Association. Before the "unification" of workers' parties in June 1948, Ries served as deputy secretary general of the HSDP. He subsequently became a member of the Central Committee of the Hungarian Workers' Party (HWP). During his term as minister, a Soviet-style constitution was drafted and came into force in 1949. On 8 July 1950, along with thousands of former Social Democrats, Ries was arrested on false charges but was not dismissed as minister until nine days later. The Communists planned to convict Ries in the trial of Árpád Szakasits, but Ries died of injuries sustained during vicious interrogations in a prison in Vác. His wife, also arrested in 1950, was released after four years. In June 1956 Ries was rehabilitated. (JT)

RIPKA Hubert (26 July 1895, Koberžice, Moravia–7 January 1958, London), Czech historian and politician. After graduating in history and receiving a Ph.D. at Prague University, Ripka lectured on international relations at this university, and he was a political journalist, editing Lidové Noviny. He was a member of the Czechoslovak Nationalist Socialist Party of Tomáš Garrigue Masaryk. After Hitler came to power, Ripka repeatedly warned against Hitler's aggressive plans regarding Czechoslovakia. After German forces entered Prague on 15 March 1939, Ripka left for Paris, then for London, where he joined the Czechoslovak National Committee, and in July 1940 he became deputy foreign minister of the government-in-exile. Ripka enjoyed the special trust of President Edvard Beneš, who saw him as his successor. Ripka supported Beneš's policy toward the USSR, but gradually he became increasingly disillusioned with its effects. He returned to Czechoslovakia as foreign trade minister of the Košice government, which was established by Beneš on 4 April 1945. Ripka wanted to maintain close economic relations with the West, and he supported the adoption of the Marshall Plan by Czechoslovakia, but at the beginning of July 1947, along with the minister of foreign affairs, Jan Masaryk, Ripka was called to Moscow and was forced by Vyacheslav Molotov to reject the plan.

At the beginning of 1948 Ripka was aware that the Communists wanted to use the trade unions and security forces, which they controlled, to change the political system. Since protests had no effect, on 20 February Ripka and other non-Communist ministers of Klement Gottwald's cabinet agreed to resign in a body, to enable President Beneš to change the government. However, Gottwald, who was supported by the Kremlin's special envoy, Valeriy Zorin, resorted to mass demonstrations, which were inspired by the Communists, and on 25 February he forced the president to reconstruct the cabinet through a replacement of the ministers who had resigned. Threatened with arrest, Ripka was forced to escape from the country and went to France, while the Communist “security police” arrested two of his co-workers. From France he went to London, where he lived after the war as one of the leaders of the political émigrés. Ripka was an advocate of a broader federation of the states of Central and Eastern Europe as a counterbalance to the USSR and Germany. Among other works, Ripka published Munich: Before and After (1939); S Východem i Západem (With the East and the West; 1944); Československo ve světovém hospodářství (Czechoslovakia in the world economy; 1945); ČSR v nové Evropě (Czechoslovakia in the new Europe; 1945); Czechoslovakia Enslaved (1950); and Federation of East Central Europe (1955). RODE Gunārs (8 September 1934, Riga), Latvian dissident. In 1945–46 Rode took part in an underground anti-Communist school movement, the Green Partisans (Zaļie Partizāņi), near Vecpiebalga in the Cēsis county of Semigalia. In 1953–56 he studied at the State University of Latvia and from 1956 at the Polytechnic Institute in Riga. In 1958 he was expelled from this school for pro-independence activities; he then worked as a trolley driver in Riga. In May 1962 Rode was arrested for disseminating “anti-Soviet” literature and for “agitation.” In December 1962 he was sentenced, along with a group of other Latvian dissidents, to fifteen years in a labor camp. Rode was sent to Mordvinian camps, where he took part in many protests by prisoners. In 1966–68, 1970–73, and 1975–77 Rode was held in Vladimir Prison. Released in 1977, he worked as a blue-collar laborer in Riga. He married a Swede with Latvian roots, Ieva Strauberga, so in May 1978 he was allowed to emigrate to Sweden. For some time Rode worked in the Stockholm office of the Union of Free Latvians of the World (Pasaules Brīvo Latviešu Apvienība). He wrote articles for the Latvian émigré press and lectured in Latvian centers in the United States and Canada. As a leading Latvian dissident, Rode was received by the Baltic Department of the U.S. Department of State. After Latvia regained its independence, Rode published in nationalist periodicals in Latvia. (EJ)

and of Poland. Rokossovsky’s origins and childhood are unclear. According to one version, he was the son of a Polish railway clerk in Russia; another version notes that he was brought up in Warsaw; still another presents him as an orphan of Polish origins. Perhaps all these versions contain some elements of truth. In 1914 Rokossovsky volunteered for the Russian Army, and in 1917 he joined the Red Guards. In 1919 he joined the Bolshevik party. In 1920 he fought in the Red Army against Poland. In 1926 he graduated from the Cavalry School, and in 1929 he completed courses for commanders at the Frunze Military Academy. Rokossovsky subsequently commanded a brigade, then a division, and later a cavalry corps. Imprisoned during the Great Purge of the army in 1937, he was sent to a forced labor camp in the Far East. In 1940 he was released and resumed command of a cavalry corps. At the end of 1941 he fought in the battle of Moscow. Later he commanded armies in Bryansk, on the Don River, and in the battles at Stalingrad and Kursk.

In mid-1943 Rokossovsky assumed command of the first Belorussian front, and in 1944 he commanded the second Belorussian front, which occupied Poland. In June 1944 he was promoted to the rank of marshal. As commander of the second Belorussian front, Rokossovsky followed Stalin’s orders to stop the offensive on Warsaw when the uprising broke out there on 1 August 1944. Rokossovsky’s deputy, General Yakov Yedunov, who was in charge of the counterespionage Smiersh; Lavrenty Tsanava, a special plenipotentiary for security to the command of the second division; and General Ivan Serov were instrumental in dismantling the Polish independence underground and subsequently in the arrests of its activists. Rokossovsky reached Berlin as the commander of the front, and he led the victory parade on Red Square in Moscow in May 1945.

One of the outstanding Soviet military commanders, after the end of the war in Europe, Rokossovsky assumed command of the Group of Soviet Troops, with headquarters in Legnica; these troops occupied Poland. In fact, Rokossovsky became the military governor of Poland. On 5 November 1949 Bolesław Bierut named Rokossovsky marshal of Poland and defense minister. Although this violated Communist Party statutes, the party made him a member of the Central Committee (CC), and in May 1950, a member of the Politburo of the CC of the Polish United Workers’ Party (Polska Zjednoczona Partia Robotnicza [PUWP]). Soon after Rokossovsky’s appointment, other officers of the Soviet Army took over top command posts in the Polish Army. From November 1952 to November 1956 Rokossovsky was deputy prime minister. In 1951 he was decorated with the Order of Builders of the People’s Poland. Because of his position, Rokossovsky bore special responsibility for the crimes perpetrated by the Chief Board of the Polish Army Information Service, which reported directly to him.

At the Eighth Plenum of the PUWP CC in October 1956 Rokossovsky formally lost an election to the Politburo. On 24 October the new Politburo decided to ask the Soviet authorities to recall him, and after consent was granted, on 10 November he was dismissed as minister. Rokossovsky received official acknowledgments and an annuity in the amount of the salary he had been paid to date. Rokossovsky left for the USSR with a few dozen Soviet commanders. In the Soviet Union he was nominated deputy defense minister. Between 1957 and 1959 he headed the Transcaucasian Military District, and from 1961 until his death he was a deputy member of the Soviet party's Central Committee and a deputy to the USSR Supreme Soviet. Rokossovsky was decorated with seven Orders of Lenin. His publications include Vilikaia pobeda na Volge (The great victory on the Volga; 1965) and his memoirs, Soldatskii dolg (The soldier's debt; 1968). Rokossovsky was buried under the Kremlin Wall. (WR)

ROMAN Petre (22 July 1946, Bucharest), Romanian post-Communist politician. The son of Valter Roman (Ernst Neulander), a colonel in the Soviet NKVD and one of the founders of the Romanian political police (Securitate), in 1959–63 Roman studied at the Higher School of Information; from 1963 to 1968 he studied at the Department of Power Engineering of the Polytechnic Institute in Bucharest, where he then worked as a teacher. In 1971 he left for France, where he obtained an M.A. degree. Until 1974 Roman pursued doctoral studies at the University of Toulouse, France, working for Mihai Caraman, head of the Romanian spy ring in France. Upon returning to Romania, he taught at the Bucharest Polytechnic Institute. In 1985 he held the chair of hydraulics, and in 1990 he became a full professor. Roman started his political career at the end of December 1989, when, after the toppling and execution of Nicolae Ceaușescu, he joined Ion Iliescu and the founders of the National Salvation Front (Frontul Salvării Naționale [NSF]). Roman became a member of the Provisional Council of National Unity (Consiliul Provizoriu de Uniune Națională), and on 26 December 1989, prime minister of a provisional government. In the parliamentary elections of May 1990 Roman won a mandate and remained in office until 1 October 1991, when he was forced to step down by striking miners from the Jiu mining region. Leaders of the Jiu strike were suspected of connections with President Iliescu, who had entered into conflict with Roman over leadership and over the rate at which economic liberalization was unfolding (Roman favored an acceleration).

After a split in the NSF, in 1992–93 Roman remained its chairman. In 1993 the NSF merged with the small Democratic Party (Partidul Democrat [DP]) and adopted its name. Roman remained its chairman until May 2001. In 1993–96 he was accredited at the NATO Assembly. In 1995 the DP merged with the Romanian Social Democratic Party into the Social Democratic Union (Uniunea Social Democrată [SDU]). After the parliamentary elections of November 1996, Roman became a senator and speaker of the senate. Before the presidential elections of November 1996 he withdrew his candidature and called for support of the rightist candidate, Emil Constantinescu. After leaving the SDU, in 1997–99 Roman remained a senator on behalf of the DP. From 1997 to 1998 he chaired the Parliamentary Assembly of Economic Cooperation of the Black Sea Countries. From December 1999 to December 2000 he was foreign minister. Elected again to the senate in November 2000, in the presidential elections held at the same time, Roman won 3 percent of the vote. He authored several books and articles in hydrology and power engineering. (LW)

ROMAN Štefan (17 April 1921, Veľký Ruskov–23 March 1988, Toronto), Slovak entrepreneur and émigré activist. Born into a Uniate peasant family, Roman emigrated to Canada in 1937. During World War II he served in the Canadian Army and subsequently worked as a blue-collar laborer. In 1945 he started his own mining company. In the early 1950s Roman bought land in the Elliot Lake area, Ontario, and founded Denison Mines, which soon became the owner of the world's largest uranium mines. Roman successfully developed his industrial and financial empire, which included Roman Corporation, Lake Ontario Cement, and the Crown Life Insurance Company. Richard Nixon, the future president of the United States, was his financial adviser. Roman's business success allowed him to sponsor many cultural initiatives of the Slovak émigré community. These included the establishment of the Slovak Institute (Slovenský Ústav) in Rome and the Slovak Uniate diocese in Canada. In 1963 Roman presided over a committee for celebrations in honor of Ss. Cyril and Methodius in Rome. In 1964 he became a lay observer at the second Vatican Council. He was instrumental in uniting Slovak émigré organizations. In 1970, on his initiative, the Slovak World Congress (Svetový Kongres Slovákov [SKS]) was founded in New York. The SKS called for independence for Slovakia. Roman served as president of the SKS until the end of his life. (MG)

ROMANCHUK Yuliyán (24 February 1842, Krylos, near Halych, Galicia—22 April 1932, Lwów [Lemberg, Lviv]), Ukrainian politician and social activist. The son of a teacher, Romanchuk completed philological studies at the University of Lemberg. He subsequently taught at a German high school (1863–68) and at the Ukrainian Academic Gymnasium (1868–1900) in Lemberg. Devoted to the development of Ukrainian education, Romanchuk served as an MP in the Galician Assembly (1883–95), becoming chairman of the Ukrainian parliamentary group in 1889. In this role, in November 1890 he reached a Ukrainian-Polish political agreement with Kazimierz Badeni, the governor of Galicia. However, in 1894 Romanchuk joined forces with the opposition, accusing the Poles of having violated the terms of this agreement. Romanchuk served as an MP (1891–97 and 1901–18) in the parliament of the Austro-Hungarian monarchy, chairman of the Ukrainian parliamentary representation (1901–10 and 1916–17), and deputy speaker of the Austrian parliament (from 1910 on).

On 26 December 1899 Romanchuk brought about the establishment of the moderately rightist Ukrainian National Democratic Party and then served as its leader until 1907. He was engaged in the struggle for the Ukrainization of the University of Lemberg. He condemned the assassination of Governor Andrzej Potocki in 1908. During World War I Romanchuk chaired the Ukrainian Assistance Committee and the Ukrainian Cultural Council in Vienna. As a member of the National Council of the Western Ukrainian National Republic (Zakhidno-Ukrainiiska Narodna Republika [ZUNR]) and the oldest Ukrainian politician, Romanchuk administered the oath to members of the ZUNR government on 10 November 1918. After the Council of Ambassadors recognized Poland's right to Eastern Galicia in March 1923, Romanchuk administered the Ukrainians' oath of allegiance to their national state on St. George Square in Lwów. Romanchuk co-founded and was the chairman (1896–1906) of the Prosvita Society. He was also a founding member and a full member of the Shevchenko Scientific Society (NTSh); the founder of the Ridna Shkola Society; and the founder, honorary member, and chairman (1912–15) of Uchytels'ka Hromada (Teachers' Society). Romanchuk founded and edited the periodical Bat'kivshchyna (1879–87) and contributed to the Lemberg daily Dilo, to the Vienna-based monthly Ruthenische Revue (1903–5), and to Ukrainische Rundschau (1905–14). He was the publisher, editor, and interpreter of works by Taras Shevchenko. He initiated and then edited Ruska pismennist, a series of classics of Ukrainian literature. He also edited one of the first Ukrainian textbooks for schools in Galicia. Like Mykhailo Drahomanov, Ivan Franko, and Mykhailo Hrushevskiy, Romanchuk was one of the first Ukrainian politicians to maintain contacts with representatives of the Ukrainian movement in both parts of the Ukraine long before 1914. ROMASZEWSKI Zbigniew (2 January 1940, Warsaw), Polish dissident and politician. Romaszewski graduated in physics from Warsaw University in 1964, and until 1983 he worked at the Institute of Physics of the Polish Academy of Sciences, where he received a Ph.D. in 1980. In 1975–76 he took part in protests against the amendment of the constitution, and from September 1976 he worked with the Committee for the Defense of Workers. Along with his wife, Zofia, Romaszewski led the assistance for those who had been repressed during the Radom riots. From September 1977 he belonged to the KOR Self-Defense Committee, gathering information about violations of the law by the Communist police and courts and assisting those persecuted. In 1979 Romaszewski co-organized the Helsinki Commission, which put together "Raport madrycki" (The Madrid report; 1980) on the respect for human rights in Poland. From September 1980 Romaszewski headed the Intervention and Legal Commission of the Mazowsze Region of Solidarity. In 1981 he was a member of the Regional Board Presidium and a delegate to the First Solidarity Congress in Gdańsk, where he was elected to the union's National Commission.

After the introduction of martial law on 13 December

1981, Romaszewski was active in the Solidarity underground as a member of its Mazowsze Regional Executive Committee and Inter-Factory Workers' Committee (Międzyzakładowy Komitet Robotniczy Solidarności). He also organized the underground Solidarity radio broadcasts. In 1982 Romaszewski was arrested and sentenced to four and a half years in prison. Amnestied in 1984, in 1986–89 he headed the Solidarity Intervention and Legal Commission. From 1987 he belonged to the National Executive Commission, and in 1988 he co-organized an unofficial international human rights conference in Kraków. From late 1988 Romaszewski belonged to the Civic Committee of the Chairman of Solidarity. A participant in the Round Table Talks, in June 1989 Romaszewski was elected to the senate and chaired its Commission of Human Rights and Legality. During the so-called war at the top, Romaszewski sided with Lech Wałęsa, and in 1991 he joined the Presidium of the Civic Committee. In 1991 Romaszewski was reelected to the senate on behalf of Solidarity. From May to June 1992 he chaired the Committee for Radio and Television. From 1996 he was a member of the Movement for the Reconstruction of Poland (Ruch Odbudowy Polski [ROP]). From 1997 to 2001 Romaszewski sat on the senate on behalf of the ROP, and from 2001, on behalf of the Bloc Senate 2001. (AF)

ROMER Tadeusz (6 December 1894, Antonosz, near Kaunas–23 March 1978, Montreal, Canada), Polish diplomat. Born into a landed noble family, after graduating from a Kraków high school in 1913, Romer studied in Lausanne, Switzerland, where he completed a law degree in 1917. From his early youth he was involved with the nationalist movement. During World War I he was the editorial secretary of the Grande Encyclopédie Polonaise and secretary of the Committee to Aid War Victims in Poland. In 1917, Romer became the personal assistant of Roman Dmowski and the Polish National Committee. In 1919 he became the first secretary of the Polish legation in Paris. From 1921 to 1927, he held various posts at the Ministry of Foreign Affairs in Warsaw, including that of director of the political department and deputy chief of the political cabinet. In 1928 Romer joined the staff of the Polish Embassy in Italy. Between 1935 and 1937 he served as envoy to Portugal. Despite his links to the National Democrats and because of his personal and professional attributes, Romer was appointed envoy (in 1937) and then ambassador (in 1938) to Japan. After the German invasion of Poland in 1939, Romer organized assistance for the Poles and conducted an information campaign concerning Nazi atrocities in Poland. His efforts resulted in the friendly neutrality of Japan, despite its status as an ally of the Third Reich. The Polish Embassy in Tokyo was closed only when Japan joined the war in December 1941.

At that time, Romer was evacuated to South Africa, where he was tapped by the Polish government-in-exile to become ambassador to the USSR. He traveled through Cairo and Tehran to reach Kuibyshev in October 1942. After two months he reported personally to the Polish government in London about the steady deterioration of Polish-Soviet relations because of the Kremlin's intransigence. After returning to his post in February 1943, Romer conducted negotiations with Stalin and Molotov. However, the breaking off of diplomatic relations by the USSR in April 1943 forced him to close the embassy. After leaving the USSR, Romer was stationed in Cairo as the commissar for Polish Affairs in the Middle East. Following the death of General Władysław Sikorski, Romer joined the government of Stanisław Mikołajczyk as the minister of foreign affairs. He strove to restore diplomatic relations with the USSR. In July 1944, along with Stanisław Grabski and Mikołajczyk, Romer traveled to Moscow. However, talks with Stalin failed. After his next visit to the USSR in October 1944 and yet another failure of negotiations, Romer tendered his resignation, as did the entire government. The great stress of his work resulted in a heart attack. In 1945 Romer was active in Polish émigré organizations in Great Britain, and in 1948 he moved to Canada, where he became a lecturer in Latin studies at McGill University. (AG)

ROMZHA Fedor (14 April 1911, Velikiy Bychkiv, Transcarpathian Ruthenia–1 November 1947, Mukachevo). Greek Catholic bishop. Romzha studied philosophy (1930–33) and theology (1933–37) in Rome, obtaining a bachelor's degree. After taking holy orders, in 1938 he began working as a parish priest in Berezovo in Transcarpathian Ruthenia. At the beginning of 1939 he became a professor of philosophy at a theological seminary in Uzhhorod. He performed his duties without any major obstacles under the Hungarian government (1939–44). Shortly before the arrival of the Red Army, on 24 September 1944 Romzha was ordained bishop of Mukachevo. After the invasion of the Red Army and the incorporation of Transcarpathia into the Ukrainian SSR, Romzha defended religious freedom for the nation and its right to self-determination. As a result, he incurred the wrath of the Soviet authorities. After the official abolishment of the Greek Catholic Church and its incorporation into the Orthodox Church in March 1946, in May of that year Romzha received a special emissary of the Orthodox Church; despite threats and accusations of collaboration with the Hungarians, he refused to submit to the decisions on incorporation. The current head of the party in the Ukraine, Nikita Khrushchev, informed Stalin that Romzha posed a “threat” to the Soviet authorities. In May 1947 Romzha sent an emissary to Moscow with a letter protesting the arrests of priests and the takeover of the Uniate Churches by the Orthodox Church. In answer, the Soviet authorities approved the plan of incorporating the Greek Catholic Church of Transcarpathian Ruthenia into the Orthodox Church; they had supported a similar plan in Eastern Galicia. On 27 October 1947 Romzha was severely injured in a car accident caused by a special group from the Soviet Ministry of State Security (MGB). The assailants took him to a hospital, where he was poisoned by Soviet special services; this was done with Khrushchev’s approval. On 27 June 2001 Pope John Paul II beatified Romzha at a solemn Holy Mass in Lviv. (WR)

RÓNAI Sándor (6 October 1892, Miskolc–28 September 1965, Budapest), Hungarian Social Democratic and Communist activist. The son of an agrarian worker, after finishing primary school, Rónai worked as a mason’s apprentice. In 1910 he joined the Hungarian Social Democratic Party (HSDP). In 1918 he served as head of a local organization of his trade union. In 1919, under the Hungarian Soviet Republic (HSR), he was a member of a workers’ council in Miskolc. In 1922 he was elected secretary of a trade union and party organization in Miskolc. In 1936 he became an HSDP secretary in Northern Hungary. In April 1941 Rónai was sent to a penal colony for his political activities. In the spring of 1944 he was interned in Nagykanizsa; he returned from there to Miskolc at the end of 1944. In January 1945 he was again elected secretary of an HSDP regional organization. Shortly afterwards he became the editor-in-chief of Felvidéki Népszava, an HSDP press organ in Northern Hungary. From July to November 1945 Rónai was minister for supplies. After the parliamentary elections of November 1945, he became minister of trade and cooperatives and held this post until June 1949. He subsequently served as minister of foreign trade until May 1950. One of the top leaders of the HSDP from 1947 onwards, Rónai supported the “unification” of workers’ parties under Communist leadership in June 1948. In that year he became a member of the Central Committee (CC) of the Hungarian Workers’ Party (HWP). From June 1948 to June 1953 he was a member of the HWP Politburo. Chairman of the Presiding Council (May 1950–August 1952) and subsequently the parliament speaker (until 1963), Rónai was the only leading Social Democratic activist who not only avoided arrest in the first half of the 1950s, but also held a prominent party and government post. In July 1956 he became a deputy member of the HWP Politburo and a member of the Presiding Council. He held the latter post until the end of his life. From 4 November 1956 to February 1957 Rónai was minister of trade in the government of János Kádár, and in November 1956 he became a member of the government’s Economic Commission. From November 1956 until the end of his life he served as a member of the CC and the Politburo of the Hungarian Socialist Workers’ Party. In 1963 he retired. In 1960–65 Rónai served as chairman of the Hungarian-Soviet Friendship Society. (JT)

RONIKIER Adam (1 November 1881, Warsaw–4 September 1952, Orchard Lake, Michigan), Polish conservative activist. In 1905 Ronikier graduated from the Department of Architecture at Riga Polytechnic University, where he was a member of the Arconia student fraternity. In October 1915 in Warsaw he took the lead of the (conservative) National Party (not to be confused with the National Democratic outfit of the same name), which cooperated with the Germans. Simultaneously, Ronikier pursued charity work in the Main Welfare Council (Rada Główna Opiekuńcza [RGO]), becoming its chairman in October 1916. He supported Poland’s eastward expansion in exchange for ceding most of its western territories. After the nation regained its independence, Ronikier was ostracized for his Germanophilism. Seriously crippled in an accident, he was unable to fight in the Polish-Soviet war. Between 1922 and 1939 he unsuccessfully attempted to return to politics several times in the ranks of conservative and center-right outfits. After the fall of Warsaw in September 1939, Ronikier devoted himself once again to charity work, informally reassembling the RGO on 22 February 1940. On 22 May 1940 the Nazi authorities of the General Government legalized the RGO and confirmed Ronikier as its deputy chairman. Ronikier worked closely with the Catholic Church, assisting the civilian population. He intervened numerous times with the Germans in the defense of Poles. He also worked with Jewish Social Self-Aid (JSSA) and officially objected to the Germans for their persecution of the Jews. Ronikier sheltered the chairman of the JSSA, Michał Weichert, and worked with the Polish underground Council to Aid Jews (Żegota). On 25 October 1943 Ronikier was fired from the RGO by the Germans for insubordination, and on 26 January 1944 he was arrested by the Gestapo. Released in March 1944, he was nonetheless accused by the underground of appeasing the occupiers, and he was ostracized. During the Warsaw Uprising Ronikier devoted himself to assisting the civilian population. In October 1944, terrified of the imminent Soviet occupation, he decided to commence open collaboration with the Germans. He founded the Bureau of Political Studies and called on the Poles to desist fighting against the Third Reich. In January 1945, under the blows of the Red Army offensive, Ronikier escaped to the West with the retreating Germans. After the war he reached Italy, where he found shelter with General Władysław Anders. Ostracized by the Polish government-in-exile in London, in 1948 Ronikier emigrated to the United States, where he died shortly after. His Pamiętniki (Memoirs) were published in 2000. (MC)

ROP Anton (27 December 1960, Ljubljana), Slovene politician. Rop graduated in economics from the University of Ljubljana, and in 1984–93 he worked at the Slovene Institute of Macroeconomic Analysis and Development. As deputy director of this institute and government adviser, in 1992 Rop dealt with privatization and new economic legislation. From 1993 he was undersecretary of state in the Ministry of Economic Relations and Development, where he was responsible for privatization and regional development. In 1996–2000 he was minister of labor, family, and social affairs, dealing with pension reforms and tightening pension requirements in view of demographic changes and budget shortages. Rop co-authored a law on social security in 1999 that entered into force in 2000. He became deputy chairman of Liberal Democracy of Slovenia (Liberalna Demokracija Slovenije [LDS]) and won a mandate on its behalf in the parliamentary elections of October 2000. In December 2000 Rop became minister of finance in the government of Janez Drnovšek. When on 1 December 2002 the latter won the presidency and resigned from heading the government, the outgoing president, Milan Kučan, appointed Rop prime minister. Rop was confirmed by the parliament on 19 December 2000. His government was based on a coalition of the LDS, the United List of Social Democrats, the Slovenian National Party, and the Democratic Party of Pensioners. As prime minister, Rop finalized talks on Slovenia's entry into NATO and the European Union. (AO)

ROPP Edward (2 December 1851, Liksin, near Dünaburg [Daugavpils]–25 July 1939, Poznań), Roman Catholic bishop. Ropp came from a Polonized German family of Courland. In 1874 he graduated in law from the University of St. Petersburg. Next, he worked at the Russian Ministry of Justice. In 1879 he quit his job and moved to the family estate of Nishcha, near Vitebsk. In 1884 Ropp enrolled at a Catholic seminary, and in 1886 he was ordained. He completed theological studies in Innsbruck, and in 1889 he became a parson in Libau (Liepāja). On 16 November 1902 Ropp was consecrated bishop, and on 9 November 1903 he was appointed ordinary bishop of Vilnius. Ropp reformed the administration of his diocese. Although he supported the Polish community in the area, he ordered that religious instruction be provided in the native tongues of the inhabitants. In 1906 he took over the publishing of Kurier Litewski, and he co-founded the Constitutional Catholic Party of Lithuania and White Ruthenia, which was based upon social Catholic rules. Ropp was elected to the First State Duma and joined the Club of the Autonomists. Because of an anti-Jewish pogrom in Białystok in June 1906, Ropp issued an appeal calling for calm, denouncing violence, and pointing out that the events had been triggered by provocation. Ropp's social and political activities caused the Russian authorities to demand that the Holy See transfer him to a different diocese. Because he refused a transfer, Ropp was recalled to St. Petersburg and banned from returning to Vilnius. Between 1907 and 1917 he remained at Nishcha.

Following the February 1917 revolution, Ropp returned to Vilnius and carried on with his pastoral duties. After the Bolshevik revolution, at the beginning of November 1917, he joined the Polish Security Council in Petrograd, becoming its chairman. On 25 July 1917 Ropp was appointed metropolitan of the Mogilev archdiocese, which was the world's largest in terms of territory, for it encompassed the entire area of Russia. On 19 November 1917 Ropp was enthroned in Petrograd. In December 1917, reacting to peasant attacks on manor houses and the murder of landed nobles, Ropp called for peace and constraint. On 29 April 1919 he was placed under house arrest by the Bolsheviks. However, because of the intervention of the Polish authorities and papal diplomats, he was soon released on condition that he leave for Poland. Initially, Ropp settled in Warsaw. His attempts to return to Mogilev came to naught. Nonetheless, he refused to believe in the permanence of the Bolshevik regime and remained ready to continue with his duties. Between 1921 and 1922 Ropp headed the Committee to Aid Victims of Hunger in Russia. He also founded the Missionary Society (1922) and the Marian Institute (1924). In 1927 he was honored with the title of assistant to the papal throne. In the interwar period in Poland Ropp was a symbol of the Bolshevik repression against the Catholic Church. In 1932 he was in a car accident, which put an end to his public activities. He spent his last years in Poznań. In 1993 Ropp's remains were reburied at the Białystok cathedral. (WR)

RÕUK Theodor (14 December 1891, Viljandi–21 June 1940, Tallinn), Estonian politician, officer, and lawyer. In 1911 Rõuk finished a seminary in Riga. After graduating in law from Warsaw University in 1915, he studied at the Vladimir Military College in Petrograd and served in the Russian Army. After the February 1917 revolution, he served in an Estonian regiment. In 1918 he was assigned to organize civil defense, serving as the commander for Tallinn. Rõuk was a public prosecutor (1920–22) and chairman (1923–24) of the People's Assembly of Tallinn–Haapsalu. In March 1924 he became minister of interior. In this role he was instrumental in suppressing an attempted Communist coup d'état on 1 December 1924. In January 1925, as minister of interior, Rõuk was given broad powers under a law enacted to protect the government. He replaced several existing services with a uniformed police force that was subordinated to the Ministry of Interior, and he brought about the establishment of a police school. Following the Communist coup in December 1924, Rõuk re-established the Estonian Defense League (Eesti Kaitseliit), a voluntary civilian auxiliary unit under the leadership of the head of the Ministry of Interior. After the resignation of the government in November 1925, Rõuk worked as a sworn attorney-at-law in Tallinn.

A long-time friend of Konstantin Päts and an acquaintance of Artur Sirk, who had begun his law career in Rõuk's office, Rõuk decided to reenter politics at the end of the 1920s. He was one of the main founders of the Estonian League of War of Independence Veterans (Eesti Vabadussõjalaste Liit [EVL]). Along with Sirk, Rõuk developed a Fascist ideology for the EVL movement, along the lines of the Italian and German models. At the second EVL congress in March 1931 Rõuk demanded that the constitution be amended in this spirit. In the autumn of 1933, on Sirk's orders, Rõuk conducted secret negotiations with the aim of winning Päts over to the EVL side and subsequently of putting forward Päts's candidacy as a representative of the radical right wing and the Farmers' Union. However, these negotiations ended in failure. In March 1934, after the coup d'état staged by Päts, Rõuk was briefly detained. He avoided imprisonment but was forced to withdraw from politics. In 1938–40 he served as chairman of the Association for Border Defense. After the Red Army occupied Estonia, Rõuk committed suicide. (AG)

ROWECKI Stefan Paweł, pseudonyms “Grot,” “Grabica,” “Rakoń,” and “Kalina” (25 December 1895, Piotrków Trybunalski–August 1944, Sachsenhausen), Polish general and military theoretician. While still in school, in 1911 Rowecki joined a secret scouting organization. In 1913 he became a member of the Polish Riflemen's Association. Between 1914 and 1917 he was in the Polish Legions, where he served as an officer and platoon commander in the First and then the Fifth Infantry Regiment of the First Brigade. As a result of the oath crisis (Józef Piłsudski and his followers refused to swear loyalty to the Austro-Hungarian and German emperors. Piłsudski was interned in Magdeburg and his followers in various other places) Rowecki was interned in Beniaminów. In 1918 he served in the Polish Military Force, where he was (among other things) an instructor at the Officers' Infantry School in Ostrów Mazowiecka. Then he served in the Polish Army. Rowecki participated in the Polish-Soviet war (1919–20 as (among other things) head of counterintelligence of the southeastern front and head of the Shock Group of General Edward Rydz-Śmigły. In 1921–26 Rowecki was an officer of the Bureau of the Strict Council of War and deputy head of the Military-Scientific Publishing Institute (1923–26). From 1926 to 1930 he worked as an officer of the inspectorate of the army of General Józef Rybak. Rowecki was the founder and until 1933 the editor of Przegląd Wojskowy. From 1930 to 1935 he commanded the Fifty-fifth Infantry Regiment in Leszno, in 1935–38 he was a brigade commander of the Podole Border Guard Corps in Czortków, and in 1938–39 he commanded the Second Infantry Division of the Legions in Kielce. In June 1939 Rowecki was charged with organizing the Warsaw Armored Motorized Brigade. He commanded this brigade in September 1939. He fought his last battle on 18–20 September near Tomaszów Lubelski.

Immediately after the end of the fighting Rowecki became involved in underground work. In October 1939 he was appointed deputy commander-in-chief and chief of staff of the Service for the Victory of Poland (Służba Zwycięstwu Polski [SZP]). From January 1940 he was commander of the Warsaw District of the Union of Armed Struggle (Związek Walki Zbrojnej [ZWZ]), and then he was commander of the entire Polish territory under German occupation. On 30 June 1940 Rowecki was appointed commander-in-chief of the ZWZ and commander of the armed forces in the Homeland. He helped to establish the post of Delegate of the Polish Government-in-Exile for the Homeland (Delegat Rządu RP na Kraj). He put forward this proposal to General Władysław Sikorski in 1940. At the end of 1941 Rowecki created an underground intelligence organization called Wachlarz. His efforts led to the consolidation of the majority of underground military organizations into a uniform underground army that in 1942 assumed the name Home Army (Armia Krajowa [AK]). Rowecki expanded the AK, restructured it, and improved its command system. He monitored the preparations for a general uprising that was to begin in the final stages of the war. He opposed cooperation with the Communist Polish Workers' Party (Polska Partia Robotnicza [PPR]). In July 1942 Rowecki obtained permission to conduct a limited armed struggle. On 30 June 1943 he was arrested by the Germans in Warsaw, taken to the Gestapo headquarters in Berlin, and then interned in the camp of Sachsenhausen, where he was executed after the outbreak of the Warsaw Uprising. Rowecki's most important publications include a pioneering manual of the urban guerrillas, Walki uliczne (Street fighting; 1928); Propaganda jako środek walki (Propaganda as a means of struggle; 1932); and Wspomnienia i notatki autobiograficzne (Memoirs and autobiographical notes; 1988). RÓŻAŃSKI Józef (13 July 1907, Warsaw–21 August 1981, Warsaw), functionary of the Communist security apparatus in Poland. Różański was the son of Abram Goldberg, who wrote for Hajnt, and the half-brother of Jerzy Borejsza. After completing high school in 1925, he studied law at the University of Warsaw, where he graduated in 1929. The following year, when working as a court clerk, Różański joined the Communist Party of Poland. In 1936 he became a member of the Warsaw bar. Following the outbreak of World War II, he fled to Soviet-occupied eastern Poland, where in 1940 he joined the Political Department of the NKVD. After the Nazi attack on the Soviet Union, Różański left for Samarkand, and in February 1944 he volunteered to serve in the Third Romuald Traugutt Pomeranian Infantry Division; where in Samarkand he graduated from a school for political officers. In September 1944, Różański commenced work with the security department of the (Communist) Polish Committee of National Liberation (PKWN). In January 1945 he joined the Polish Workers' Party (Polska Partia Robotnicza [PPR]). Simultaneously, he served as a department head at the Ministry of Public Security (Ministerstwo Bezpieczeństwa Publicznego [MBP]). On 1 July 1947 Różański was promoted to the directorship of the MBP Investigative Department and became infamous for his interrogation techniques, which included physical and psychological torture. Released from his security job in March 1954 and having reached the rank of colonel, Różański was decorated with the Chevalier's Cross of the Rebirth of Poland. He then began to work at the State Publishing Institute. During the apparent purge of the security apparatus during the so-called thaw, Różański was arrested on 8 November 1954, and on 23 December 1955 he was sentenced to five years in jail for torturing prisoners, although the torture had, in fact, been unofficially condoned by the Communist authorities. In July 1956 the Supreme Court ordered the General Prosecutor's Office to expand its investigation, which then also came to include Różański's superiors: Colonel Anatol Fejgin and General Roman Romkowski. On 11 November 1957 the Provincial Court in Warsaw sentenced Różański to fifteen years in prison. In October 1958 the Supreme Court overturned the sentence, lowering the penalty to fourteen years. In October 1964 the Council of State applied a clemency clause to his case, releasing Róžański from jail. Afterward, Róžański worked at the State Mint, isolating himself from the outside world. (WR)

ROŽMAN Gregorij (9 March 1883, Dolinčiče [now Dolintschach], Austria–16 November 1959, Cleveland, Ohio), Slovene Roman Catholic bishop. Born into a peasant family in Carinthia, after finishing secondary school, Rožman studied theology in Klagenfurt, graduating in 1907. In 1912 in Vienna he earned a doctorate. After taking holy orders, he worked in various parishes in Slovenia and lectured at the Theological School of Ljubljana University. In 1929 he became coadjutor to Bishop Anton Jeglič. After Jeglič retired in 1930, Rožman was consecrated bishop of Ljubljana. In the 1930s he organized many important celebrations, including a ceremony to commemorate the 1900th anniversary of the death of Christ (1933), the Second Eucharistic Congress of Yugoslavia (1935), and the Sixth International Congress of Christ the King. Rožman supported the conservative clerical faction of the Slovene People's Party (Slovenska Ljudska Stranka [SLS]) and Catholic Action, and he advocated the political involvement of Catholics. After the fall of Yugoslavia in April 1941, Rožman tried to maintain good relations with the Italian authorities-in-occupation. He was strongly opposed to the Communist Partisans and supported the Home Guard (domobranci). Fearing arrest by the Communists, toward the end of the war Rožman went to Austria and then to the United States, where he became active among the Slovene émigré community in Ohio. In 1946 a Yugoslav Communist court sentenced Rožman in absentia to eighteen years' imprisonment. (WR)

ROZWADOWSKI Tadeusz (20 May 1866, Babino, near Kałusz [Kalush]–18 October 1928, Warsaw), Polish general. In 1880 Rozwadowski enrolled in a military high school run by the Habsburg army. In 1883 he commenced studies at the Military Technical Academy in Vienna. Upon graduation, he received an officer's commission. Then he attended the School of the General Staff in Vienna, which he completed in 1891 with the rank of lieutenant. Rozwadowski was a staff aide-de-camp in a cavalry brigade in Marburg and Budapest. In 1895 he was dispatched as a military attaché to Bucharest. In 1908 he was promoted to colonel, and in 1913, to general. Meanwhile, in 1912 he took over command of the Twelfth Artillery Brigade in Kraków. During World War I, from August 1914, Rozwadowski commanded a brigade, fighting with it in the Battle of Gorlice, and then he led a division on the Russian front. He worked with the Polish pro-independence movement. In March 1916 Rozwadowski was dismissed from active duty for political reasons. He was offered a number of prominent posts in the Austro-Hungarian power structure (governor of Galicia, commander of the Polish Legions, governor of the Austro-Hungarian zone of occupation in Lublin), but he turned them down as contrary to his political beliefs.

On 28 October 1918 the Regency Council appointed Rozwadowski chief of the General Staff of the Polish Army in the making. On 10 November 1918 Rozwadowski declared himself subordinate to Józef Piłsudski, who had just returned from prison in Magdeburg. On 20 November Rozwadowski was appointed chief-in-command of the East Army and of the Polish-Ukrainian front in Eastern Galicia. In March 1919 he became chief of the Polish Military Mission in France with the Supreme Allied Command. He participated in the Paris Peace Conference, and then he traveled on diplomatic missions to Bucharest, London, and Rome. In June 1919 Rozwadowski was promoted to three-star general. Between 22 July 1920 and 1 April 1921 he served as chief of the General Staff of the Polish Army. He was a member of the Council for the Defense of the State and a commander in the defense of Warsaw against the Bolsheviks. He co-authored and co-executed a counterattack from the Wieprz River in August 1920. He also supervised operations in the south of Poland, eastern Little Poland, and Volhynia. In April 1921 Rozwadowski was promoted to four-star general. Between April 1921 and November 1922 he served as inspector of the Second Army, based in Warsaw, and he was a member of the Main Military Council. He became a permanent member of the Highest Military Advisory Commission of the Supreme Commander in April 1921 and inspector general of cavalry in November 1921. During the coup d'état of May 1926, Rozwadowski led the pro-government military forces and supervised the defense of Warsaw as its military governor. After the fighting ended, Rozwadowski was arrested and imprisoned at Antokol Prison in Wilno. In April 1927 he was dismissed from active duty. He moved to Lwów (Lviv), where he wrote studies about the defense of Poland and memoirs about World War I. Rozwadowski was buried at the Cemetery of the Defenders of Lwów in Łyczaków. (JS)

RUBIK Ernő (13 July 1944, Budapest), Hungarian inventor. Rubik's father was an inventor and the holder of several patents. In 1967 Rubik graduated from the Budapest Polytechnic, and in 1971, from the Department of Interior Design at the Higher School of Artistic Design, where he also taught and became a professor in 1987. In 1968–75 Rubik worked as a designer in state design offices. In 1975 he invented the so-called Rubik's Cube, which made him famous all over the world. In 1980–81 Rubik's Cube was recognized as the toy of the year in many countries. Even world championships in this game were organized. Rubik's other toys were also successful—for example, the magic serpent (1977) and the magic squares (1985)—but none became as popular as the cube. While Hungary was still under Communist rule, in 1982 Rubik established two foundations for innovation and scholarship, and in 1983 he established his own firm, the Rubik Studio. In 1988 he founded the International Rubik Foundation. In 1990–96 Rubik chaired the Hungarian Engineering Academy, and from 1996 he was its honorary chairman. In 1996 he also received an honorary doctorate from the Budapest Polytechnic. Rubik was awarded several Hungarian orders and authored many works, including A bűvös kocka (The magic cube; 1981), Bűvös négyzetek (The magic squares), and Rubik's Cubic Compendium (1987). RUBIKS Alfreds (24 September 1935, Daugavpils), Latvian Communist activist of Polish descent. In 1957–61 Rubiks worked as a blue-collar laborer in an electrical appliance factory in Riga. From 1959 he belonged to the Communist Party of Latvia (CPL). In 1961 he graduated from Riga Polytechnic Institute. From 1962 to 1968 he was secretary of the Riga committee of the Komsomol, and in 1968–69 he was secretary of the Latvian republican Komsomol Central Committee (CC). From 1969 the deputy head of a department of the CPL CC and from 1976 to 1982 the first secretary of a party committee in a Riga district, in 1980 Rubiks graduated from the Higher Party School in Leningrad. From 1980 Rubiks was a deputy to the Supreme Council of the Latvian SSR; from 1981 he was a member of the CPL CC; in 1982–84 he was minister of industry of the Latvian SSR; and from 1985 he was chairman of the Council of People's Deputies of Riga. During perestroika Rubiks was one of the leaders of the conservatives, defending the Soviet system. At the Fifteenth CPL Congress, on 7 April 1990, when the party split into "nationalist" Communists (who founded the Independent CPL) and orthodox supporters of the Soviet system, Rubiks became first secretary of the latter's CPL CC. In August 1991 he actively supported the Moscow putsch, leading activities of the State Committee for Emergencies in Latvia. When the putsch was suppressed, on 21 August 1991, Rubiks was arrested and tried for anti-state activities, but he proved that he was defending Soviet statehood. After the emergence of independent Latvia, it was proved that Rubiks had acted against the existing power, and he was sentenced to eight years in prison in July 1995. Released in 1998, Rubiks took the lead of the Latvian Socialist Party (Latvijas Sociālistiskā Partija), which mostly included the Russian-speaking inhabitants of Latvia. Since owing to his sentence Rubiks could not run for the parliament, he kept on attempting to draw Latvia closer to Russia and advocating that Latvian citizenship be granted to all the Russian inhabitants of the country. RUBINSTEIN Arthur (28 January 1886, Łódź–20 December 1982, Geneva, Switzerland), Polish pianist of Jewish descent. Rubinstein came from a poor family. Thanks to the financial sponsorship of Emil Młynarski, who appreciated the phenomenal talent of the boy, Rubinstein studied piano with Heinrich Bartsch and music theory with Max Bruch in Berlin from 1897 to 1899. For a spell, he was also a student of Ignacy Paderewski. Rubinstein's debut took place in Potsdam in 1898 with Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart's Concerto No. 23 in A Major. An incredible memory and natural technique constantly refined by practice made Rubinstein, for almost eighty years, one of the world's leading interpreters of many composers, from Johann Sebastian Bach through the Romantics (including Ludwig van Beethoven, Johannes Brahms, and Robert Schumann) through the composers of contemporary music, of which Rubinstein was an enthusiast. He played Maurice Ravel, Igor Stravinsky, and Sergei Prokofiev. He also performed the works of Polish composers, including Karol Szymanowski. Rubinstein's performances of Frédéric Chopin, truly historical in scope, were all recorded. Despite his constant travels and changes of domicile, Rubinstein often stressed his ties to Poland. During the founding conference of the United Nations in San Francisco in April 1945, he played the Polish national anthem, "Mazurek Dąbrowskiego," to mark Poland's membership in the organization, notwithstanding the absence of the Polish government, which was no longer recognized by the Allies. Rubinstein gave many concerts in Poland after the war, even after an anti-Semitic campaign by the Communist authorities in 1967 and 1968. He published his memoirs as My Young Years (1973) and My Many Years (1980). Rubinstein was decorated with the order of Polonia Restituta. (WR)

RUDENKO Mykola (19 December 1920, Yurivka, near Lugansk—1 April 2004, Kiev), Ukrainian writer and dissident. Initially Rudenko was a regular Soviet author and cultural activist. In 1947–50 he worked as editor of the periodical of the Union of Ukrainian Writers (UW), Dnipro, and was secretary of the UW party organization. Rudenko published ten collections of poems and other Socialist realist works. From the early 1970s he began to support dissident activities, for which he was expelled from the party in 1974 and from the UW in 1975. In November 1976 he took the lead of the Ukrainian Helsinki Group. In February 1977 he was arrested for "anti-Soviet agitation," and in July 1977 he was sentenced to seven years of labor camp and five years of forced settlement. Rudenko served his term in a camp near Perm and in the Mordvinian Autonomous SSR. Later he was forced to settle in the Altai Krai (Siberia). Ten of Rudenko's works were smuggled from the camp and exile to the West, including the play Khrest (The cross; 1977); the Pantheist reflections Ekonomichny monolohy (Economic monologues; 1978); the collection of poems Za hratamy (Beyond bars; 1980); the play Na dni morskomu (At the bottom of the sea; 1981); and the novel Orlova balka (Eagle's gorge; 1982). In 1987 Rudenko was allowed to leave for the West with his wife. They lived in the United States until 1990, when they returned to the Ukraine. (WR) Rudnytska's was a well-known Ukrainian Galician family; she was the sister of Ivan Rudnytsky and the mother of Ivan Lysiak-Rudnytskyi, a leading Ukrainian émigré historian. After graduating from a classical gymnasium in Lemberg (Lwów, Lviv) in 1910, Rudnytska studied at the University of Lemberg and at the University of Vienna from 1910 to 1917, earning a Ph.D. for a dissertation on the mathematical foundations of Renaissance esthetics. In the 1920s she lectured at a gymnasium and at a teacher training college in Lwów. A member of the Ukrainian National Democratic Alliance (Ukrainiinske Natsionalno-Demokratychnye Obyednannya [UNDO]), Rudnytska served as an UNDO MP in the Polish Assembly from 1928 to 1935. In 1928–34, as a delegate of the Ukrainian Parliamentary Representation to the League of Nations in Geneva, she defended the rights of the Ukrainian people, particularly during the 1930 pacification of Western Ukraine and during the Great Famine of 1932–33 in the Soviet Ukraine. From 1936 to 1939 Rudnytska belonged to the Presidium of the Ukrainian Coordination Committee (Ukrainiyskyi Koordynatsyinyi Komitet) in Lwów. From 1919 she was active in the Ukrainian women's movement. From 1928 to 1939 she was president of the Union of Ukrainian Women (Soyuz Ukrainok) in Lwów. In 1934 she became president of the World Union of Ukrainian Women. She also headed a women's political organization called Druzhyna Kniahyni Olhy (Duchess Olga's Army). In 1935–39 she edited the women's semi-monthly Zhinka.

After the Red Army occupied Galicia in September 1939, Rudnytska secretly made her way to the German-occupied part of Poland, known as the General Government, and settled in Kraków; from there she moved to Berlin and then to Prague. After World War II, she co-founded and was director of the Ukrainian Relief Committee (Ukrainiyskyi Dopomohovyi Komitet) until April 1950. In 1948–50 Rudnytska served as a representative of the Ukrainian National Council (Ukrainiinska Natsionalna Rada)—a kind of Ukrainian parliament in exile in Switzerland. In 1951 she went to the United States but soon returned to Europe and settled in Munich. Rudnytska's publications include Ukrainiinska diisnist i zavdannia zhinky (The Ukrainian reality and the tasks of women; 1934); Don Bosko: Liudyna, pedahoh, sviatyi (Don Bosco: Man, pedagogue, saint; 1963); a biography of Yosyf Slipyi, Nevydymy styhmaty (The invisible stigmata; 1970); and the collection Zakhidnia Ukraina pid bolshevykamy (Western Ukraine under Bolshevik rule; 1944). RUDNYTSKYI Ivan, pseudonym “Kedryn” (22 April 1896, Chodorów [Khodoriv]–4 March 1995, New Jersey), Ukrainian journalist and political activist. Rudnytskyi came from a well-known Ukrainian Galician family; he was the brother of Milena Rudnytska and the uncle of Ivan Lysiak-Rudnytskyi, a leading Ukrainian émigré historian. Rudnytskyi attended gymnasiums in Brzeżany (Berezhany) and Lemberg (Lwów, Lviv). In 1915 he joined the Austrian Army, and in 1916 he was taken prisoner by the Russians. During the February 1917 revolution Rudnytskyi went to Kiev, where he worked for Ukrainian state institutions. As a soldier of the army of the Ukrainian National Republic (Ukrainska Narodna Republika [UNR]), he fought for Ukrainian independence. In 1920 Rudnytskyi went into exile. In 1920–21 he edited the periodical Vola. After graduating in history from the University of Vienna (1922), he returned to Lwów, where he became engaged in journalistic work. In the same year, thanks to the recommendation of Yevhen Konovalets, he joined the editorial staff of Dilo, a leading Ukrainian newspaper published in Poland. From 1925 to 1931 Rudnytskyi was the Polish Assembly correspondent for Dilo, and he also served as press secretary of the Ukrainian Parliamentary Representation (Ukrainska Parlamentska Rezydentura). Rudnytskyi was a long-time secretary of the Writers’ and Journalists’ Association in Lwów. In the 1920s and 1930s he was an activist of the Ukrainian National Democratic Alliance (Ukrainske Natsionalno-Demokratyche Obyednannya [UNDO]). As a UNDO representative, he maintained contacts with the UNR government-in-exile, with the Ukrainian Military Organization (Ukrainska Vyskova Orhanizatsiya [UVO]), and with the Organization of Ukrainian Nationalists (Orhanizatsiya Ukrainykykh Natsionalistiv [OUN]).

Shortly before the Red Army occupied Lwów in 1939, Rudnytskyi went to Kraków, where he worked in the General Government press agency. In 1944 he moved to Austria, and in 1949 he emigrated to the United States. From 1953 to 1973 he worked on the editorial staff of Svoboda, the largest Ukrainian-language newspaper in America. He took an active part in the Ukrainian émigré community, holding a variety of positions, including that of president of the Presidium of the Ukrainian National Council (Ukrainska Natsionalna Rada), which served as a Ukrainian parliament in exile; as a member of the UNDO Central Committee in exile; as president of the Ukrainian Journalists’ Union of America; as vice-president of the Shevchenko Scientific Society (NTSh) in America; and as co-editor (from 1961 on) of Visti Kombatanta, a press organ of the Union of Former Ukrainian Soldiers in America. Rudnytskyi authored Beresteiskyi myr: Spomyny ta materialy (The Beresteczko peace: Memoirs and materials; 1928); Prychyny upadku Polshi (Causes of Poland’s fall; 1940); Paraleli z istorii Ukrainy (Parallels from the history of Ukraine; 1971); and the memoirs Zhyttia—podii—liudy (Life—events—people; 1976). RUDNYTSKYI Stepan (15 December 1877, Tarnopol [now Ternopil, Ukraine]–3 November 1937, Solovets Islands), Ukrainian geographer. Rudnytskyi studied at Lemberg (Lwów, Lviv) and Vienna, graduating in 1901, and subsequently he taught at a gymnasium in Tarnopol and lectured at the University of Lemberg. In 1901 he became a member of the Shevchenko Scientific Society (NTSh). During World War I Rudnytskyi lived in Vienna and was active in the Union for the Liberation of Ukraine. At that time he wrote his first, pioneering work, Ukraina: Land und Volk (Ukraine: Land and people; 1916). After the war, Rudnytskyi served as a consultant to the government of the Western Ukrainian National Republic (Zakhidno-Ukrainska Narodna Republika [ZUNR]) and later as a consultant to the ZUNR government-in-exile. Rudnytskyi was one of the main founders of, and then a lecturer in, the Ukrainian Free University in Vienna and Prague. His publications from that period include Osnovy zemleznavstva Ukrainy (Foundations of Ukrainian pedology, 2 vols.; 1924–26). Rudnytskyi was a leading authority in Ukrainian geography and a pioneer of research into the geomorphology and geology of the Ukraine. He authored Osnovy morfolohii i heologii Pidkarpatskoi Rusy (Foundations of geomorphology and geology of Transcarpathian Ruthenia, 2 vols.; 1925–27) and several dozen articles on the methodology and history of geography. In 1926 Rudnytskyi accepted an invitation from the authorities of the Ukrainian SSR to lecture at the Institute for People’s Education in Kharkiv. He also became head of the Geography Department of the Ukrainian Academy of Sciences. Arrested in 1933 and dismissed from work for promoting “Fascist geography,” he was deported to a labor camp on the White Sea coast, where he was executed. (WR) RUGOVA Ibrahim (2 December 1944, Cerrcë–21 January 2006, Prishtina) Albanian writer and politician from Kosovo. Rugova was the son of a peasant shopkeeper. When he was a few months old, his father and grandfather were shot by the Communist guerrillas of Josip Broz Tito. Rugova graduated from high school in Peja (Peć) and (in 1971) in philosophy from the University of Prishtina. He continued his studies at the Ecole Pratique des Hautes Études in Paris (1976–77), and in 1984 he received a Ph.D. at the University of Prishtina. He belonged to the League of Communists of Yugoslavia. For about twenty years Rugova worked at the Institute of Albanian Studies in Prishtina, dealing with literature. Among other works, he published the following: Prekje lirike (Lyrical touch; 1971); Bibliografia e kritikës letrare shqipe (Bibliography of Albanian literary critics; 1976); Kah teoria (Evolution of theory; 1978); Kritika letrare (Literary critics; 1979 [with Sabri Hamiti]); Strategjia e kuptimit (Strategies of understanding; 1980); Kahe dhe premisa të kritikës shqiptare 1504–1983 (Lines and conditions of Albanian critics 1504–1983; 1985); Refuzimi estetik (Aesthetic negation; 1987); Pavarësia dhe demokracia (Independence and democracy; 1991); and La question du Kosovo (The Kosovo Question; 1994). From 1996 Rugova was a corresponding member of the Kosovo Academy of Arts and Sciences; in 1996 he received an honorary doctorate from the University of Paris, and in 1998 he received the Sakharov Prize of the European Parliament.

In 1988 Rugova was elected chairman of the Union of Kosovo Writers, remaining in opposition to the policies of Slobodan Milošević. When Kosovo was deprived of autonomy in 1989, Rugova favored peaceful methods in the struggle for Albanian rights, taking the lead of the Democratic League of Kosovo (Lidhja Demokratike e Kosovës [DLK]), founded in December 1989. In the elections of 1992 and 1998 Rugova was elected president of the Republic of Kosovo. Its independence was proclaimed in 1991, but it was recognized only by Albania. Rugova contributed substantially to the formation of unofficial state structures in Kosovo and a network of Albanian schools there. His opposition to violence made him a lot of critics, who created the Kosovo Liberation Army to undertake an armed struggle. Their activities were intensified when the 1995 Dayton Agreement ignored the Kosovo question. On 18 March 1999 Rugova signed the Paris Peace Plan for Kosovo. When the Serbs rejected this plan, NATO intervention started against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (March–June 1999). In April 1999 Rugova met with Milošević and Serbian president Milan Milutinović and appealed for an end to the NATO military operation, which was contrary to the usual Kosovo demands for Western intervention. In May 1999 Rugova recanted this appeal. Contrary to the expectations that this spelled the end of his political career, Rugova remained very popular. In the elections of 18 November 2001 his DLK won 47 out of 120 mandates. Although the deputies rejected his candidature for president in three rounds of voting, on 4 March 2002 the major factions came to an agreement, and Rugova was elected president of Kosovo. While in office he died of lung cancer. (AO)

RULEWSKI Jan (18 April 1944, Bydgoszcz), Polish trade union activist and politician. Rulewski studied at the Military Technical Academy in Warsaw. In 1965 he refused to take part in the “elections” to the national council and parliament; for this he was placed in a psychiatric ward and expelled from the school. He tried to flee Communist Poland, for which he was sentenced to five years in prison. Released after four years, Rulewski studied extramurally at the Higher Engineering School in Bydgoszcz, and in 1980 he graduated in mechanics there. In 1970–80 he worked as a designer in the Romet bicycle factory in Bydgoszcz. Elected chairman of the official trade unions, in August 1980 Rulewski organized a strike in Romet. Temporarily arrested, from 7 September 1980 he chaired the Inter-Factory Strike Committee, and from 17 September, the Inter-Factory Founding Committee of Solidarity in Bydgoszcz. From February 1981 Rulewski belonged to the Provisional Presidium of the Solidarity National Coordination Commission. Thought the leader of the radical faction of the union, on 19 March 1981 Rulewski was badly beaten by the police during a session of the Provincial National Council in Bydgoszcz, where he was invited to represent Solidarity. This still unexplained incident led to a serious crisis, eased by the government-Solidarity agreement of 31 March. During the First Solidarity Congress in September 1981 Rulewski ran for the union’s chairmanship but lost to Lech Wałęsa.

When martial law was introduced on 13 December 1981, Rulewski was interned and later arrested on account of alleged attempts to topple the political system. Held in Strzebielinek, Białołęka, and the Rakowiecka Street Prison in Warsaw, he refused release on the conditions offered by the authorities (abandonment of Solidarity activities or emigration). Amnestied in July 1984, Rulewski returned to his job at Romet. In 1985 he was fired, and in 1985–90 he worked as a cab driver. Active in the Solidarity underground, Rulewski was critical of Wałęsa’s policies. In 1987–89 Rulewski belonged to the Working Group of the Solidarity National Commission (along with, for example, Andrzej Słowik and Andrzej Gwiazda), calling for a convention of the National Commission elected in 1981. In November 1988 he founded the Provisional Board of Solidarity's Bydgoszcz Region. Rulewski criticized the new union structures created by Wałęsa and the Round Table Talks. From 1989 he chaired the Solidarity Regional Executive Committee, appealing for the reunification of the union; from 1990 to 1993 he belonged to its National Commission, and in 1991–93 he was deputy chairman of Solidarity. In 1991–2001 Rulewski was a member of parliament, and from 1991 to 1993, deputy head of the Solidarity Parliamentary Caucus. When the Solidarity MPs recalled the Hanna Suchocka government in June 1993, Rulewski left the union and joined the Democratic Union. From 1993 to 1997 Rulewski was an MP on behalf of the Union of Freedom and later as an independent. (PK)

RUML Jan (5 March 1953, Prague), Czech politician. After graduating from high school in 1972, Ruml could not find a white-collar job because of the opposition activities of his father, so until the late 1980s he worked as a stoker and lumberjack. In 1977 he signed Charter 77, and from 1979 he belonged to the Committee for the Defense of the Unjustly Prosecuted (Výbor na Obranu Nespravedlivě Stíhaných [VONS]). In 1981–82 Ruml was imprisoned without a trial. In the 1980s he edited several periodicals in the uncensored press and co-founded Lidove noviny; from November 1989 he headed the Independent Press Center; from February to April 1990 he was editor-in-chief of the weekly Respekt; and in 1990 he was a spokesman for Charter 77. After the “Velvet Revolution,” from April 1990 Ruml was deputy minister of interior, and from May to June 1990 he was head of the Office for Protection of the Constitution and Democracy. In the spring of 1992 he joined the Civic Democratic Party (Občanská Demokratická Strana [ODS]) of Václav Klaus, and on its behalf he won a seat in the Chamber of the People of the Federal Assembly (June–December 1992). From July 1992 to November 1997 Ruml was minister of interior of the Czech Republic. In 1996–98 he was a member of parliament. When it turned out that the ODS had received illegal financing, Ruml criticized Prime Minister Klaus and demanded his resignation. In December 1997 Ruml became the leader of an ODS faction demanding a departure from the previous political style. When he failed to take over the party leadership, Ruml and his followers left the ODS and founded the Union of Freedom (Unie Svobody [US]), and Ruml became its chairman on 22 February 1998. In the early elections of June 1998 the US won 8.6 percent of the vote and stayed in the opposition. In November 1998 Ruml won a seat in the senate, and in December 2000 he became its deputy speaker. In February 1999 he was reelected the US chairman, but he was the only key politician who responded to the appeals of “Thank You, But Leave,” addressed publicly to the new Czech leadership. In November 1999 Ruml resigned his position. (PU)

RUPEL Dimitrij (7 April 1946, Ljubljana), Slovene politician. In 1970 Rupel graduated in sociology from the University of Ljubljana. In 1976 he received a Ph.D. in sociology from Brandeis University in Waltham, Massachusetts. Rupel lectured at Queen's University in Canada (1977–78), the New School for Social Research in New York (1985), and Cleveland State University (1989). In the 1980s Rupel co-founded the periodical Nova revija, in which in 1987 he published the “Slovene National Program.” In January 1989 he took the lead of the Slovenian Democratic Alliance (Slovenska Demokratična Zveza [SDZ]), the first opposition party that joined the Democratic Opposition of Slovenia (DEMOS). Rupel became the DEMOS deputy chairman. Along with some of his party members, he finally joined Liberal Democracy of Slovenia (Liberalna Demokracija Slovenije [LDS]). From April 1990 to February 1992 Rupel was minister of foreign affairs. During his term Slovenia gained independence (June 1991) and international recognition, and it also joined the Central European Initiative. Afterwards Rupel taught at the University of Ljubljana. In the elections of December 1992 he won a seat in the parliament. In December 1994 he became mayor of Ljubljana, and from 1997 he was ambassador to the United States. In February 2000 he became foreign minister again, but owing to the resignation of Prime Minister Janez Drnovšek in June 2000, Rupel lost this position. In October 2000 Rupel won a parliamentary seat again, and in December 2000 he regained the portfolio of foreign affairs in another cabinet of Drnovšek, continuing his efforts to gain entry for Slovenia into NATO and the European Union in the government of Anton Rop. Soon after Rupel managed to achieve this goal in May 2004, in July 2004 he was replaced as foreign minister. Rupel authored several publications, including Svobodne besede (Free word; 1976);

Maks (1983); Povabljeni pozabljeni (The invited forgotten; 1985); Slovenski intelektualci (Slovenian intellectuals; 1989); and the memoirs Skrivnost države (State secrets; 1992) and Odčarana Slovenija (Disenchanted Slovenia; 1993). (AO)

RUPNIK Leon (11 August 1880, Lokve, Nova Gorica–4 September 1946, Ljubljana), Slovene general and politician. Rupnik began his military career in the Austro-Hungarian Army. In 1907 he completed military studies in Vienna. Assigned to the General Staff in 1911, he was promoted to captain in 1913. During World War I he initially fought in Mostar, eastern Bosnia, on the Italian front, and in 1916 he was sent to the Russian front. In 1918 he became commander of the staff in the town of Boka Kotorska. In 1919 he began serving in the army of the Kingdom of Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes. In 1937 he was promoted to major general. He was responsible for the construction of the defense line (the so-called Rupnik Line) near the border with Italy. After the Yugoslav forces were defeated in the war against the Third Reich in April 1941, Rupnik went to Ljubljana. An avowed anti-Communist, he collaborated with the Italian occupier in the struggle against the Communist Liberation Front. In September 1941 Liberation Front members organized an unsuccessful attempt on his life. On 2 June 1942 the Italian authorities appointed Rupnik governor of Ljubljana. In 1943, after the German troops seized Ljubljana, Rupnik became head of the local government of the Province of Ljubljana. He was a co-founder of the Home Guard (domobranca), also known as the White Guard, a Slovene nationalist and anti-Communist military organization. Rupnik initially served as head of this organization, but the Germans forbade him to maintain any formal links with it. It was not until September 1944 that the German authorities conferred on him the title of general inspector of the Home Guard, but his powers were very limited. On 3 May 1945 Rupnik proclaimed a separate Slovene state, which existed only two days. With the defeat of the Axis powers in the war, Rupnik, along with his family, went to Carinthia, Austria. Until January 1946 he lived in an Italian refugee camp, but the American-English forces handed him over to the Yugoslav authorities. On 30 August 1946 the military court sentenced him to death by firing squad. The sentence was carried out. (AO)

RUSEV Rusi (27 November 1887, Khabrovo–2 February 1945, Sofia), Bulgarian general. In 1909 Rusev graduated from a military school in Sofia. He later fought in the Balkan Wars (1912–13) and in World War I as an artillery officer. Despite his skills, he was promoted slowly. For a long time Rusev stayed away from politics. After the coup d'état of 19 May 1934 and the takeover of power by Boris III, Rusev was appointed army inspector for weaponry, and he held this post from 1936 to 1942. In 1940 he was promoted to lieutenant general. Rusev entered politics during the regimes of Dobri Bozhilov and Ivan Bagrianov, when he served as head of the Ministry of Defense from September 1943 to September 1944. Although during the war the Bulgarian government made attempts to reach an agreement with the Allies, it also implemented harsh domestic policies and used the army to suppress the Communist partisans. Because of his position, Rusev was an official who was particularly hated by the Communists. Arrested after the coup of 9 September 1944 and brought before the court, Rusev was sentenced to death, and, along with other members of the prewar Bulgarian elite, he was executed by firing squad. RUSTEMI Avni (26 September 1895, Libokhove–20 April 1924, Tirana), Albanian politician. Rustemi was a teacher by profession. In 1918 he organized the youth against the Italian invaders in Vlorë, and then he went to France, where he studied at the Sorbonne. On 13 June 1920 Rustemi carried out the successful assassination of Essad Pasa Toptani, who, based in Paris, had led the secessionists from Dürres. From June to November 1920 Rustemi was kept prisoner by the French authorities. Released, he returned to Albania and was active in the people's radical movement. Between 1922 and 1924 Rustemi was one of the leaders of Bashkimi (Union), which had a radical-democratic program. In December 1923 he was elected to a parliament that was dominated by conservative forces. In an atmosphere of chaos and fratricidal in-fighting following an injury to Prime Minister Ahmed Zogu and the murder of two American tourists, Rustemi, as one of the main opponents of the prime minister, was murdered by factions connected with Zogu. Rustemi's funeral on 1 May 1924 turned into a demonstration by radical Albanian youth against such a political outrage. This demonstration induced a group of parliamentary democratic oppositionists to appeal to the people to disregard the new conservative parliament of Shefqet Vërlaci and, as a result, it contributed to the uprising of May 1924. RUSU Alexandru (22 November 1884, Şăulia–9 May 1963, Gherla), Romanian Greek Catholic bishop. Rusu graduated from high school in Blaj. Between 1903 and 1910 he studied theology at the University of Budapest and then in Bucharest. He received a Ph.D. in theology in 1910 and entered the priesthood. Soon Rusu was appointed a professor of the Department of Dogmatic Theology at the Theological Academy in Blaj. On 30 January 1931 he was consecrated bishop by the metropolitan, Vasiliu Suciū. Rusu took over the bishoprics of Maramureş and moved to Baia-Mare. In 1946 the Metropolitan Synod elected him metropolitan of the Blaj diocese. However, the Communists refused to recognize the election, as the persecution of the Uniate Church was well under way at the time. Rusu openly opposed the liquidation of the Uniate Church and its absorption into the Romanian Orthodox Church. As a result, he was arrested on 28 October 1948. Rusu and five remaining Romanian Greek Catholic bishops were isolated at the Dragoslavele Monastery (the summer residence of the Orthodox patriarchs of Romania that was turned into a prison by the Communists). At the beginning of 1949 they were transferred to another prison monastery at Căldăruşani and then, in 1950, to the prison at Sighet Marmăţiei. Rusu spent five years there without a trial; he was brutally beaten. In 1955, he was released with two other Uniate bishops who had remained alive: Iuliu Hossu and Ioan Bălan. However, they were immediately placed under house arrest at the Curtea de Argeş Monastery, which soon became a famous place of pilgrimage and a resilient religious center. In 1956, Rusu co-authored a memorandum to the Communist government demanding the restoration of the Uniate Church. The appeal was signed by a great many people, causing apprehension among the authorities. As a result, the bishops were transferred to the monastery at Ciorogârla, and then they were separated. Rusu was placed in the monastery of Cocoş. He was subsequently accused before a military tribunal in Cluj for allegedly receiving an envoy from the Vatican. In 1957, despite his advanced age, Rusu was sentenced to twenty-five years of hard labor for “provocation and treason.” Imprisoned at Gherla, he was kept for six years under inhuman conditions in an unheated cell. Until the very end, Rusu offered his priestly services to fellow prisoners. Rusu was buried at the prison cemetery. His beatification process is currently under way. (LW)

RÜÜTEL Arnold (10 May 1928, Saaremaa), Estonian Communist activist and post-Communist politician. Rützel graduated from a higher agricultural school, and then he worked as head of the agricultural department of the regional administration in Saaremaa. In 1957 he became director of an experimental center of the Estonian Institute of Animal Breeding and Veterinary Medicine, and in 1963–69 he headed a model kolkhoz in Tartu. In 1964 he received a Ph.D. from the Department of Agriculture of the Estonian Agricultural Academy, and in 1969 he became the academy's rector. From 1964 Rützel belonged to the Communist Party of Estonia (CPE), and in 1971 he joined its Central Committee (CC). His career coincided with the dogmatic rule of Karl Vaino and the Russification policy of the latter. In 1977–79 Rützel was CPE CC secretary for agriculture and deputy prime minister of the Estonian SSR, and from 1983 he was chairman of the Supreme Council of the Estonian SSR; he lacked any inclinations toward reform.

From 1985 Rützel zigzagged between the dogmatic faction of Vaino and the pragmatic faction of Edgar Savisaar. He gradually evolved toward becoming a supporter of perestroika. On 16 November 1988 he took part in the preparation and adoption of the declaration of Estonia's sovereignty within the reformed USSR. Since the Soviet Supreme Council found the declaration invalid, Rützel gained a reputation as a supporter of Estonia's independence. Under his leadership the Estonian Supreme Council adopted a law forcing the republican administration to learn Estonian. The traditional national holiday of 24 February and the prewar flag were restored. Modest economic reforms were also started. The Kremlin showed little resistance, expecting that a reformed Estonia would be more determined to stay within the USSR. However, the idea of independence gained momentum, and Rützel's activities as chairman of the Estonian Supreme Council became increasingly more popular. In the elections to the Supreme Council held in 1990 Rüütel ran on behalf of Free Estonia (Vaba Eesti), representing the so-called national Communists. Although they failed (12 out of 105 mandates), their coalition with the Popular Front, in opposition to the more radical spokesmen of independence and Communist hard-liners, made it possible for Rüütel to remain chairman of the Estonian Supreme Council. Under the pressure of events, the council leaned toward the idea of the restitution of independence. Rüütel took part in preparing the declaration of the state status of Estonia, in which the incorporation of the country by the USSR was found to be illegal. At the same time Rüütel left the CPE.

On 19 April 1990 Rüütel and Savisaar met with Mikhail Gorbachev in Moscow, and the two sides could not agree about signing a new union agreement. In May 1990, at a meeting of the heads of the supreme councils of Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania, Rüütel initiated the Council of Baltic States. During a failed hard-liner putsch in Estonia, Rüütel was a member of the three-man Extraordinary Council of Defense. In January 1991 he went to Moscow, where Gorbachev assured him that military measures would not be used in Estonia. Rüütel became a member of the Constitutional Assembly, and after the Moscow putsch he supported the restitution of Estonian independence on 20 August 1991. As a result of his support for independence, in the first presidential elections of October 1992 he won 43 percent of the vote, but in the end his Communist past prevented him from winning the presidency.

Rüütel became a member of the Tallinn City Council and set out to develop a political base in the shape of the Estonian Rural People's Party (Eesti Maarahva Erakond [ERPP]), founded in 1994. Because of the social costs of transformation, as well as corruption scandals among the new power elite, the center-left parties won the elections of March 1995. Heading the ERPP, Rüütel entered into a coalition with the Coalition Party, won a record number of votes, and became deputy speaker of the parliament. Nevertheless, in September 1996 he lost the presidential election again, this time to Lennart Meri. The defeat of the ERPP in the elections of March 1999 looked like the end of Rüütel's career, and he was moved to the position of honorary leader of his party. However, conflicts among the rightist candidates and renewed social support for the left made Rüütel's presidential campaign a success, and he won the presidency on 21 September 2001. His election was a surprise, and many observers feared he would change the priorities of Estonian foreign policy, but he continued with the pro-Western line. Far from the enthusiasm of his predecessors, Rüütel supported Estonia's entry into NATO and the European Union in May 2004. (AG)

RUŽIČKA Leopold (Lavoslav) (13 September 1887, Vukovar–26 September 1976, Mammern, Zurich, Switzerland), Swiss chemist of Croatian descent. The son of a cooper, Ružička finished a primary school and then high school in Osijek. In 1906 he began to study chemistry at the Technical University of Karlsruhe, Germany. After completing his studies, he became an assistant to Professor Hermann Staudinger. With Staudinger, in 1912 Ružička left for Switzerland, where he began working at the Federal Institute of Technology (Eidgenössische Technische Hochschule [ETH]) in Zurich. In 1917 he acquired Swiss citizenship. In 1918 he received a post-doctoral degree and became a lecturer at the ETH. In 1921 he began to lecture at the University of Zurich. In 1923 he became a professor. Ružička did research on civetone and muscone, the odoriferous components of civet and musk. He discovered that the molecules of muscone and civetone contain rings of fifteen and seventeen carbon atoms respectively. Before this discovery, the existence of such rings had been considered impossible. In 1925–26 Ružička worked in Geneva. In October 1926 he became a professor of organic chemistry at the University of Utrecht in the Netherlands. Three years later he returned to Switzerland to work at the ETH, where he had better conditions for research. Ružička was the first to succeed in synthesizing the male sex hormones androsterone and testosterone (1934–35). In 1939, along with the German biochemist Adolf Butenandt, Ružička was awarded the Nobel Prize in Chemistry for his work on polymethylenes and higher terpenes. Because of the outbreak of World War II, Ružička received the prize in Zurich, instead of Stockholm, on 16 January 1940. In 1941 he invited Vladimir Prelog from Zagreb to work with him. Ružička was the founder of the Swiss-Yugoslav Society. He then turned to biochemistry and published “Biogenetic isoprene rule.” At the age of seventy, Ružička retired and was succeeded as head of the Organic Chemistry Laboratory by Prelog, a future Nobel Prize winner. In Switzerland the Ružička Award was established for outstanding chemists. In 1977 a museum in Ružička's honor was opened in Vukovar, but it was seriously damaged during the war in 1991. (AO)

RYBARSKI Roman (3 July 1887, Zator–March 1942, Auschwitz), Polish economist and politician. Rybarski came from a burgher family. After graduating from a high school in Rzeszów in 1898, he studied law, economics, and economic history at the Jagiellonian University (UJ) in Kraków. While at the university, Rybarski served as a personal assistant to Julian Dunajewski and was active in nationalist youth organizations. In 1910 Rybarski joined the National League and passed his doctoral exams in law at the UJ. Between 1911 and 1912 he studied in London and Oxford, and he traveled around the United States and Italy. Upon his return to Kraków, he worked as assistant professor at the School of Political Sciences. After he completed his postgraduate degree, based on his work Badania podmiotu ekonomii społecznej (The study of the subject of social economy; 1912), Rybarski became an assistant professor at the UJ in March 1913. In 1914 he published Wartość wymienna jako miara bogactwa (The Exchange Value as a Measure of Wealth), where he combined the theories of the Vienna school of psychology with the German historical school. During World War I he published the periodical Rok Polski, where he opposed linking the Polish cause with the Central Powers.

In March 1919 Rybarski was an economic expert of the Polish delegation to the Paris Peace Conference and represented Poland on its Commission of Reparations and Finances. In October 1919 he was appointed undersecretary of state in the Ministry of the Former Prussian Partition. Between February 1920 and August 1921 he served as undersecretary of state at the Ministry of Treasury. In 1922 he published Marka polska i złoty polski (The Polish mark and the Polish zloty) and Wartość, kapitał i dochód (Value, capital, and income). From 1924 Rybarski was a full professor at the Warsaw Polytechnic, and in 1924 he was hired by the University of Warsaw (UW), where he headed the Department of Treasury until 1939. Rybarski's most important theoretical works include the three-volume System ekonomii politycznej (The system of political economy), comprised of Rozwój życia gospodarczego i idei gospodarczych (The development of economic life and ideas; 1924), Teoria gospodarstwa społecznego (A theory of social economy; 1930), and Psychologia społeczno-gospodarcza (Socioeconomic psychology; 1939). According to Rybarski, the development of capitalism brought about a gradual increase in prosperity, despite its cyclical crises, which were caused by the disproportion between the growth of capital and consumption. Among the motives spurring economic activity, he noticed not only rational factors, but also emotional ones, including national traditions and religion. Rybarski supported the development of small and medium-size enterprises and economic entities as the basis for Poland's economy. The primacy of the nation over the freedom of the individual constituted the main thesis of his Naród, jednostka, i klasa (Nation, individual, and class; 1926). However, in economic policy he attempted to reconcile economic freedom with limited state interventionism. He grappled with that in Przyszłość gospodarcza Polski (The economic future of Poland; 1933) and Podstawy narodowego programu gospodarczego (The foundations of the national economic program; 1934). He also wrote on the economic history of Poland. From 1926 Rybarski was a member of the leadership of the Camp of Great Poland, and in 1928 he joined the Main Board of the National Party (Stronnictwo Narodowe [SN]). From 1928 to 1930 and from 1930 to 1935 he was an MP on behalf of the SN. Contrary to the young activists in the party, Rybarski spoke in favor of parliamentary democracy and the rule of law. From 1937 he was the dean of the UW Law School. He was also a member of the Polish Academy of Arts and Sciences and the Warsaw Scientific Society. During the Nazi occupation Rybarski initiated the underground UW Law School. He continued his research and also remained active in the clandestine SN. Rybarski was arrested by the Nazis in May 1941 and shipped off to Auschwitz, where he died. (WR)

RYBICKI Józef (18 December 1901, Kołomyja [Kolo-myja]–9 May 1986, Warsaw), Polish pro-independence activist. Rybicki came from an intelligentsia family. He studied at high schools in Brzeżany, Lwów (Lviv), Wadowice, and again Lwów. In July 1920, along with his entire high school class, Rybicki volunteered for the Polish Army to defend Poland from the Soviet invasion. He suffered a serious wound on his shoulder, which left him crippled for life. In May 1924 he was therefore released from the military. After graduating from high school in 1921, Rybicki enrolled at a university but had to interrupt his studies to convalesce in Switzerland and Italy. In 1927 he graduated from the Department of Humanities of Stefan Batory University in Wilno (Vilnius), becoming a lecturer there. In 1930 he successfully defended his Ph.D. in classical philology. In 1931 he commenced teaching at a high school in Wilno. Between 1934 and 1937 he served as the headmaster of a high school in Nowogródek (Novahrudak) and between 1938 and 1939 in Tomaszów Lubelski.

In September 1939 Rybicki attempted to volunteer for the Polish Army, but instead he was forced to hide from the Soviets, who had just invaded Poland. In the fall of 1939 he joined the Secret Military Organization (Tajna Organizacja Wojskowa [TOW]) in the Lublin and Kielce areas. In 1940, he arrived in Warsaw. In 1941 he became TOW deputy commander, and after its absorption into the Home Army (Armia Krajowa [AK]), he was appointed deputy commander of the Directorate of Diversion (Kedyw) of the Warsaw District of the AK. In November 1943 Rybicki took over the command of the Warsaw Kedyw. He distinguished himself during the Warsaw Uprising of 1944. After the collapse of the insurrection, Rybicki found himself in the Nazi filtration camp in Pruszków. Then he fled from a prison transport to Germany. Afterwards, for a time he commanded the remnants of the Kedyw of the AK High Command.

After the formation of the clandestine anti-Communist Office of the Delegate of the Armed Forces (Delegatura Sił Zbrojnych [DSZ]) in April 1945, Rybicki was appointed to head its Warsaw district. In August 1945 he became commander of the DSZ Central Area. Before the DSZ was dissolved, Rybicki issued an order, on 6 August 1945, to stop fratricidal fighting, thus forbidding revenge actions against the Communists. At the beginning of September 1945, Rybicki was one of the five founders of the secret Union for Freedom and Independence (Wolność i Niezawisłość [WiN]), and he became the chairman of its Central Area. Following the arrest of the WiN leadership by the Communist secret police, Rybicki served briefly as acting chairman of the Main Board of the organization in November 1945. He was arrested on 22 December 1945 and sentenced to ten years in jail in February 1947. He was released in 1954. Rybicki settled in Milanówek, near Warsaw, and worked as an editor of encyclopedias and dictionaries. At the same time, he was actively involved in the sobriety movement. From May 1963 he served as a member of the Main Board of the Social Anti-Alcohol Committee. In January 1967 he became deputy to the organization's secretary general. Rybicki published a great many articles and booklets on anti-alcohol activism. He was a member of the Committee of Poland's Episcopate for Sobriety and of the Team of Experts of the Council of Ministers to Struggle against Alcoholism. Following the worker riots in Radom and Ursus in June 1976, Rybicki joined the endeavor to assist the victims, and in September he became a founding member of the Committee for the Defense of Workers (Komitet Obrony Robotników [KOR]). Later, he participated in the Committee of Social Self-Defense—KOR until its self-dissolution in September 1981. Rybicki remained a moral authority for the dissident milieu. (WR) RYCHETSKÝ Pavel (17 August 1943, Prague), Czech lawyer and politician. In 1966 Rychetský graduated in law from Charles University in Prague, where he later worked in a municipal court and at the Department of Civic Law of Charles University. From 1966 he belonged to the Communist Party of Czechoslovakia, but owing to the Warsaw Pact invasion of August 1968 and the "normalization" policies that followed, in 1969 he left the party. In 1970 Rychetský was forced to leave the university and worked in an advertising agency. From 1974 to 1989 he was a lawyer at a housing cooperative. In the 1970s and 1980s he took part in opposition activities. From 1975 to 1989 he published in such émigré periodicals as Svědectví (of Pavel Tigríd) and Listy (of Jiří Pelikan). In 1977 Rychetský was one of the initiators and first signatories of Charter 77, and from 1987 he also wrote for the uncensored Lidové noviny. In November 1989 he co-founded the Civic Forum (Občanské Fórum [OF]) and took part in negotiations with the authorities. A leading author of the draft constitution of Czechoslovakia, presented by the OF in December 1989, from January to July 1990 Rychetský was prosecutor general of the Czech republic, and after the first free elections of June 1990 he became deputy prime minister of the federal government and chairman of the government legislative council. He remained in these positions until the elections of June 1992. After the OF split in the spring of 1991, Rychetský became deputy chairman of the center-left Civic Movement (Občanské Hnutí). From 1993 he was a member of the Presidium of Free Democrats (Svobodní Demokrati), and in 1995 he joined the Czech Social Democratic Party (Česká Strana Socialně Demokratická [ČSSD]). In November 1996 Rychetský was elected senator and became chairman of the senate legal and constitutional commission. From July 1998 he was deputy prime minister and head of the government legislative council in the government of Miloš Zeman. RYDZ-ŚMIGŁY Edward [originally Rydz] (11 March 1886, Brzeżany–2 December 1941, Warsaw), Polish military leader, marshal of Poland. Rydz-Śmigły lost his parents as a child, and he grew up under tough conditions. In 1905 he graduated from a high school in Brzeżany. He enrolled at the Academy of Fine Arts in Kraków, which he finished, after briefly dropping out, in 1913. Between 1905 and 1907 he studied art history and philosophy at the Jagiellonian University in Kraków, and in 1907 he studied painting in Munich, Nuremberg, and Vienna. He was a member of the Socialist organization Promień (Ray) and the independent Odrodzenie (Rebirth). In fall 1908 Rydz-Śmigły was elected deputy chief organizer of the secret Union of Active Struggle in Brzeżany. He assumed a pseudonym: “Śmigły” (the Swift One). Between 1910 and 1911 he served in the Austro-Hungarian Army. In 1912 he graduated first in his class from the officers’ school of the Riflemen’s Association (Związek Strzelecki [ZS]). He was appointed commander of the introductory and intermediate levels of the school and ZS deputy chairman in Kraków. In 1913 he became commander of the Lwów (Lvov) district of the ZS. From March to August 1914 he was editor of the monthly Strzelec, which was published there. At that time he became one of the closest associates of Józef Piłsudski.

At the beginning of World War I Rydz-Śmigły was released from service in the Austro-Hungarian Army. In August 1914 he joined a riflemen’s unit in Chełm. As the commander of the third cadre battalion, he participated in operations conducted by Piłsudski along the Vistula. In October he was promoted to major, and in December he took over the command of the First Infantry Regiment of the Polish Legions in Nowy Sącz. He fought with his regiment near the Nida River. In June 1915 he was promoted to lieutenant colonel, and in September he became the second in command of the First Brigade of the Legions in Volhynia. In February 1914 he was coopted to the Council of Colonels, which demanded the removal of Austrian officers from the Legions and proclaiming them a Polish army. In May 1916 he was promoted to full colonel. Following the so-called oath crisis in July 1917, Rydz-Śmigły was suspended from regimental command and dismissed from the Legions. Before his internment, Piłsudski ordered him to take over the Supreme Command of the Polish Military Organization (Polska Organizacja Wojskowa [POW]), a secret body fighting for Poland’s independence. Rydz-Śmigły also founded a clandestine entity in Kraków: the Convent. He rejected the war ministry portfolio that was offered to him by the Regency Council, and on 1 November 1918 he issued a call for the mobilization of the POW to eliminate the Austrian occupation.

In the government of Ignacy Daszyński, which was formed in Lublin on the night of 6 November 1918, Rydz-Śmigły accepted, in place of Piłsudski, the war ministry portfolio, and he was duly appointed brigadier general and supreme commander of all Polish forces. On 10 November he officially ordered the POW to commence disarming the troops of the Central Powers, an operation that had already been unofficially under way for some time. At Piłsudski’s request, the government that Rydz-Śmigły was serving dissolved itself. However, Piłsudski confirmed the promotion of Rydz-Śmigły to brigadier general on 21 November 1918. Meanwhile, on 16 November he took over the command of the General District in Lublin, and on 7 December, of the General District in Warsaw. During the Polish-Ukrainian war Rydz-Śmigły was ordered to lead the tactical group Kowel in February 1919. He also commanded the First Legion Infantry Division during the Wilno (Vilnius) operation. In May he commanded the operational group Wilno-Święciany, which took Minsk. From 11 November 1919 he led the army group fighting on the Lithuanian-Belorussian front, and on 30 December he headed the operational group Zima (Winter), consisting of Polish and Lithuanian troops, which captured Dünaburg (Daugavpils) from the Bolsheviks. In April 1920 Rydz-Śmigły was promoted to three-star general. On 5 May he was put in command of the Third Army, which two days later captured Kiev. During the Polish retreat, he commanded the southeastern front and then the central front. On 18 August he took over the Second Army, which he led to capture Grodno.

After the conclusion of hostilities, in May 1921 Rydz-Śmigły was appointed army inspector in Wilno. Between 1922 and 1926 he organized and trained troops. With permission from Piłsudski, from fall 1921 to summer 1923, he belonged to a secret military organization, Honor and Fatherland, founded by General Władysław Sikorski. In November and December 1925 Rydz-Śmigły sojourned in France to learn about the organization of its armed forces. He backed Piłsudski in May 1926, sending a part of the Wilno army garrison to Warsaw. In October 1926 he became army inspector with the General Inspectorate of the Armed Forces. From April 1926 he served as Piłsudski’s deputy for operations in the east. Between 1929 and 1931 he sponsored the secret organization White Eagle, of which Piłsudski disapproved. Following Piłsudski’s death, he was appointed general inspector of the armed forces on 13 May 1935.

From mid-1935, Rydz-Śmigły became actively involved in politics. In a memorandum issued by Prime Minister Felicjan Sławoj Składkowski on 13 July 1936—at the urging of President Ignacy Mościcki—Rydz-Śmigły was proclaimed to be the second most important official of the Polish state. On 10 November 1936 he became a four-star general and, almost immediately after, a marshal of Poland. Supporting authoritarian rule, Rydz-Śmigły quarreled with Mościcki and his Castle group of supporters. The marshal's political machine emerged in 1937 as the quasi-totalitarian Front of National Unification. As far as foreign policy was concerned, Rydz-Śmigły considered an alliance with France to be crucial. He undertook a six-year plan to modernize the armed forces, and he embarked on designing a new defense doctrine. He strove to curtail the involvement of generals in the state administration and politics. Aware of the danger of Nazi German aggression, in March 1939 he ordered the secret mobilization of two military districts and an acceleration of defense preparations for Poland. He refused publicly to back down before Nazi threats and Soviet demands, which Stalin advanced in the course of his negotiations with Great Britain and France, so as to allow the Red Army to cross Polish territory.

When Germany attacked Poland on 1 September 1939, Rydz-Śmigły became the commander-in-chief and was nominated by the president as his successor. He ordered parts of the army to break through to Romania and Hungary. Faced with the Soviet invasion on 17 September 1939, he decided to undertake defensive measures against the Red Army as the last resort. On the night of 17 September Rydz-Śmigły crossed the border into Romania. He was criticized for abandoning the units that were still fighting. He was interned in the village of Dragoslavele. On 7 November he finally resigned as the commander-in-chief. During his sojourn in Romania, Rydz-Śmigły wrote an account of the September campaign; it was first published in 1941 in Hungary and then in Poland. In the fall of 1940 Rydz-Śmigły decided to return home. On 10 December 1940 he illegally crossed the Romanian-Hungarian border. In the summer of 1941 in Hungary he wrote a report, "Could Poland Have Avoided the War?" Then he co-founded the secret organization Camp of Fighting Poland. At the end of October 1941 he reached Nazi-occupied Warsaw. He was, however, refused membership in Poland's mainstream underground. Rydz-Śmigły died of a heart attack and was buried secretly at the Powązki Cemetery in Warsaw as "Adam Zawisza." (JS)

RYLSKYI Maksym (19 March 1895, Kiev–24 July 1964, Kiev), Ukrainian poet, translator, and community activist. Rylskyi's father Tadey, a well-known Ukrainian ethnographer and community activist, was of Polish descent. In 1915 Rylskyi began to study at Kiev University, initially at the School of Medicine, transferring to the School of History and Philology in 1918, but he never graduated. From 1919 until the autumn of 1923 he worked as the headmaster of a school in the village of Romanivka. From 1923 to 1929 he taught Ukrainian language and literature at schools in Kiev, and subsequently he devoted himself to writing only. In 1943–46 Rylskyi served as president of the Ukrainian Writers' Union (Spilka Pysmennykiv Ukrainy). From 1944 until the end of his life he was director of the Institute of Art Studies, Folklore, and Ethnography of the Academy of Sciences of the Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic (SSR); the institute is now named after him. In 1943 Rylskyi became a member of the Academy of Sciences of the Ukrainian SSR, and in 1958, a member of the Academy of Sciences of the Soviet Union. From 1957 until the end of his life he worked as editor-in-chief of the periodical Narodna tvorchist ta etnografia, and he was an informal patron of the so-called generation of the sixties (shestidesiatniki).

Rylskyi made his literary debut in 1907, and in 1910 he published his first poetry collection, Na bilykh ostrovakh (On the white islands). His later collections of poems include Pid osinnimy zoriami (Beneath the autumn stars; 1918) and Synia dalechin (The blue distance; 1922) and the poems "Tsarivna" (Tsarevna; 1917) and "Na uzlissi" (On the edge of a forest; 1917). In the 1920s Rylskyi was drawn to the literary group of neoclassicists. At that time he wrote new poetry collections, including Kriz burii i snih (Through storm and snow; 1925); De skhodiasia dorohy (Where the roads meet; 1929); and Homin i vidhomin (The resonance and the echo; 1929). Accused of being a member of an underground terrorist organization and arrested in March 1931, Rylskyi was released after six months. Owing to his stay in prison and a mounting campaign against "Ukrainian bourgeois nationalism," he began to affirm the Soviet reality. In the 1930s he published new poetry collections, including Kiiv (Kiev; 1935); Ukraina (Ukraine; 1938); and Zbir vynohradu (The harvest of grapes; 1940). After the outbreak of the German-Soviet war, patriotic elements began to increasingly appear in his poetry. In November 1941 Rylskyi wrote the famous collection Slovo pro ridnu matir (A song about my mother), expressing his faith in the indomitability of the nation and his belief that victory was certain. Some of Rylskiy's postwar poetry collections—including Virmist (Fidelity; 1946); Chasha družby (The cup of friendship; 1946); and Ranok nashoy Vitchyzny (The morning of our homeland; 1953)—were banned from publication because they allegedly included “bourgeois nationalist distortions.” Rylskiy authored over thirty collections of poems. His greatest translation achievements include Pan Tadeusz, by Adam Mickiewicz; Evgeniy Onegin, by Aleksandr Pushkin; Cyrano de Bergerac, by Edmond Rostand; and King Lear, by William Shakespeare. RZEPECKI Jan, pseudonyms “Prezes” and “Ożóg” (29 September 1899, Warsaw–28 April 1983, Warsaw), Polish officer, historian, and social activist. While in high school, Rzepecki joined a secret scouting troop in 1912. From May 1914 he belonged to the Riflemen's Association. From August 1914 to July 1917 he served in the infantry of the Polish Legions. After the oath crisis in July 1917, Rzepecki was admitted to the German-mandated Polish Armed Forces, and in November 1918 he began to serve in the Polish Army. He fought in the Polish-Bolshevik war. In April 1921 he completed a course for company and battalion commanders at the Center for Infantry Training in Rembertów, and in August 1921 he completed a similar course in France. From 1921 to 1922 Rzepecki studied law at the University of Warsaw. Between 1923 and 1924 he was enrolled at the School of Political Sciences in Warsaw, and from 1922 through 1924, at the Higher Military School in Warsaw. From October 1924 he lectured in tactics and war history at the Infantry Officers' School in Warsaw. Along with the military students, Rzepecki fought on the government's side during the coup d'état of 1926. His duties including protecting Poland's president, Stanisław Wojciechowski. After the coup, Rzepecki was expelled from the school and transferred to the staff of the command of the Second Corps District in Lublin. In November 1926 he was appointed chief of staff of the brigade of the Border Defense Corps in Czortków. From May 1928 he lectured on tactics at the Center for Infantry Training in Rembertów, and from October 1934, at the Higher Military School in Warsaw. In March 1939 he became a staff officer of the Kraków Army.

Rzepecki participated in the September campaign of 1939. Upon reaching Warsaw on 1 October 1939, he joined the underground. He was appointed chief of staff of the City of Warsaw District Command of the Service for the Victory of Poland and, later, the Union of Armed Struggle (Związek Walki Zbrojnej [ZWZ]). In July 1940 he was promoted to full colonel. From October 1940 to October 1944 Rzepecki served as chief of the Bureau of Information and Propaganda of the ZWZ High Command and then of the Home Army (Armia Krajowa [AK]). From 1941 to 1942 he edited the monthly Insurekcja. He was a member of the Directorate of the Underground Struggle and the Nationalities Council with the Office of the Government Delegate. However, he refused to participate in the Social Anti-Communist Committee. Of leftist sympathies, Rzepecki volunteered to join the underground Polish Socialist party Freedom, Equality, Independence in the summer of 1940. During the Warsaw Uprising of 1944, he was active in the staff of the commander of the AK Warsaw District and the AK High Command. After the failure of the uprising, Rzepecki was interned in the Łambinowice and Dobięgniewo POW camps. Upon his release, in March 1945 he was appointed deputy chief and chief of staff of the last AK commander in chief, General Leopold Okulicki. Following the arrest of General Okulicki by the NKVD in March 1945, Rzepecki commanded the underground Nie (No) organization. On 30 April 1945 he was appointed to serve as the chief of the Office of the Delegate of the Armed Forces for the Homeland. On 6 August 1945 he ordered it dissolved.

Between September and November 1945, Rzepecki was chairman of the Main Executive Committee of the Freedom and Independence Union. He was arrested on 5 November 1945. Believing the false guarantees of the Communists, he decided to reveal the names and whereabouts of his underlings, which expedited their capture by the secret police. In February 1947 he was sentenced to eight years in jail, but Communist president Bolesław Bierut granted him clemency on his first day in office. Rzepecki was employed as deputy director of the Military-Scientific Publishing Institute and later as chief of the Department of Studies of the Academy of the General Staff of the Communist-led army. In January 1949 he was arrested once again and imprisoned for five years. Freed in December 1954, he remained unemployed for almost a year. From 1955 to 1969, Rzepecki worked at the Institute of History of the Polish Academy of Sciences in Warsaw. In 1964 he received a Ph.D. in history. After 1956 he became active in public life; among other things, he published an open letter “To my colleagues from the Home Army,” which called for participation in elections and a political renewal of the nation. Rzepecki belonged to the leadership of the (Communist-led) Union of the Fighters for Freedom and Democracy but also to the dissident Crooked Circle Club. Rzepecki authored a great many publications concerning the history of the Polish Underground State and military history, including the following: Taktyka (Tactics; 1932); Wspomnienia i przyczynki historyczne (Recollections and historical anecdotes; 1956); Rodowód wojska Drugiej Rzeczypospolitej (The origins of the army in the Second Republic; 1959); Sprawa Legionu Wschodniego 1914 roku (The case of the Eastern Legion in 1914; 1966); and Rok 1945. Wspomnienia i dokumenty (1945: Recollections and documents; 1983). (JS)

SADOVEANU Mihail (5 November 1880, Pașcani–19 October 1961, Bucharest), Romanian writer. In 1892–97 Sadoveanu studied at a high school in Fălticeni and later in Iași. In 1897 he made his literary debut in a satirical periodical, Dracu. From 1898 he contributed to Bucharest periodicals such as Convorbiri literare, Pagini literare, and Viața nouă. In 1900 Sadoveanu started legal studies at Bucharest University but failed to complete them. In 1902 he served in the army. In 1903 he moved to Bucharest again, and until 1906 he worked for a conservative peasant literary weekly, Sămănătorul. In 1904 Sadoveanu published the short stories “Povestiri” (Tales), “Șoimii” (Falcons), and “Dureri înăbușite” (Muffled pains), and in 1905, “Crîșma lui Moș Precu” (Grandpa Precu’s inn); in these he presented the life of the Moldavian countryside and small towns, as well as Romanian culture and history. In 1906–16 Sadoveanu worked with the periodical Viața românească, promoting peasantry as the sole bearer of the Romanian national spirit and stigmatizing the cosmopolitanism of the Romanian elites. Further collections of short stories—including Floare ofilită (Fading flower; 1906) and Însemnările lui Neculai Manea (Notes by Neculai Manea; 1908)—strengthened his literary reputation. In 1907 he received a literary award from the Romanian Academy of Arts and Sciences.

In 1907–8 Sadoveanu was an inspector of countryside community centers in Moldavia. This experience served as a source for his novel Oameni și locuri (People and places; 1908). From 1908 he chaired the Association of Romanian Writers (ARW), and in 1910–19 he was the director of the National Theater in Iași. In 1915 he published his first historical novel, Neamul Șoimăreștilor (The falcon tribe). Mobilized during World War I, in 1916–18 Sadoveanu founded and edited a military daily, România. He presented his wartime experience in two volumes of memoirs, published as Strada Lăpușneanu (Lăpușneanu Street; 1921). In 1919 in Iași, Sadoveanu founded the weekly Însemnări literare, referring to Viața românească. When the latter was resumed in 1920, Sadoveanu entered into a working arrangement with the periodical. At that time he published (among other works) Frunze înfurtună (Leaves in the storm; 1920) and Cocostârcul albastru (Blue cock; 1921). In 1923 he became a member of the Romanian Academy of Arts and Sciences. He described peasant protests against exploitation in the novels Venea o moară pe Șiret (There was a mill on the Șiret River; 1923), Hanu-Ancuței (Hanu’s inn; 1928) and Baltagul (The perished; 1930). He expressed his fascination with Romanian nature in Noaptea de Sînzene (St. John’s nights; 1934) and presented a legendary Romanian past in the trilogy Frații Jderi (The Jderi brothers; 1935–42). From 1936 Sadoveanu lived in Bucharest, editing the dailies Adevărul and Dimineața. He opposed the Iron Guard, which burned his books at the end of the 1930s. In 1938 he received an honorary doctorate from Iași University. After World War II Sadoveanu wrote in the spirit of Socialist realism—for instance, the novels Mitrea Cocor (1949) and Nada florilor (Island of flowers; 1950)—supporting the Communists and becoming their leading writer. From 1949 to 1961 he chaired the ARW. In the 1950s Sadoveanu was vice-president of the Great National Assembly and president of the National Committee of Peace Defenders. He authored about one hundred books. (LW)

SADOWSKI Zdzisław (10 February 1925, Warsaw), Polish economist and politician. Sadowski studied at the Main School of Commerce and worked there as an assistant to Professor Edward Lipiński. In 1951 he graduated in economics from Warsaw University (Uniwersytet Warszawski [UW]), and from 1953 he worked there, receiving doctorate and postdoctoral degrees. In 1965–70 Sadowski lectured at the University of Accra (Ghana), and in 1970–72 he was deputy director of the Center for Planning, Development, Forecasting, and Economic Policy of the UN Secretariat in New York. From 1973 to 1981 he worked at the Institute of Planning in Warsaw; in 1980–81 he was its deputy director. In 1980 Sadowski became a professor at the UW. He did not belong to the Communist Party, yet in October 1981 he became undersecretary of state in the Office of the Council of Ministers and deputy plenipotentiary of the government for economic reform. Sadowski continued in the government during the period of martial law. From 1985 he was deputy chairman and from 1987 chairman of the Consultative Economic Council. In 1986–87 he belonged to the Socioeconomic Council of the parliament, and from 1986 to 1989, to the Consultative Council of the Chairman of the Council of State. From April 1987 to October 1988 Sadowski was deputy prime minister responsible for economic policy and chairman of the government Planning Commission. He introduced the concept of the “second stage of economic reform,” which proved to be a mere propaganda action. In the fall of 1987 a referendum was held in order to gain social acceptance for austerity measures, but the referendum failed. In February 1988 serious price increases were the final blow to the fiction of the “second stage of reform.” Sadowski took part in the Round Table Talks on behalf of the government (February–April 1989). From 1985 he was chairman of the Polish Economic Association. (PK)

SADŪNAITĖ Nijolė (21 July 1938, Kaunas), Lithuanian nun and dissident. The daughter of a teacher, in 1955 Sadūnaitė graduated from a high school in Anykščiai. Because of anti-religious discrimination, she could not study medicine, so she became a professional nurse. In 1958 she joined the Order of the Immaculate Holy Virgin Mary. She took care of the sick, including a long-term Gulag prisoner, Reverend Petras Rauda. In 1970 Sadūnaitė organized legal aid for Reverend Antanas Šeškevičius, who was accused of teaching the catechism to children. From 1972 she worked with the underground Chronicle of the Catholic Church in Lithuania. On 27 August 1974 Sadūnaitė was arrested while working on the next issue of the Chronicle. In June 1975 she was tried in deep secrecy, the only witness being her brother Jonas. Sadūnaitė turned her plea into an accusation that the Communist system violated the conscience. She was sentenced to three years in prison and three years of forced exile. She served her term in Dubravlag in Mordvinia. In September 1977 Sadūnaitė was exiled to Boguchani in the Krasnoyarsk region of Siberia. As a result of camp conditions she suffered a heart attack. As the news of her trial and imprisonment leaked out to the West and as her own account was published there as No Greater Love: The Trial of a Christian in Soviet Occupied Lithuania (1975), she received parcels with food and medicine, which she passed on to other political prisoners in the camps of Yakutia and Magadan.

Released in July 1980, Sadūnaitė returned to Lithuania and continued her work with the Chronicle. In 1982–87 she lived in hiding. In June 1983 she organized the signing of protests against the imprisonment of Fathers Alfonas Svarinskas and Sigitas Tamkevičius. In this connection the KGB repressed Sadūnaitė’s sister-in-law, and her brother was placed in a psychiatric ward. In 1986 her Pamiėtnik (Diary) was published in Polish in Paris. In April 1987 Sadūnaitė was temporarily arrested and threatened with death. Despite this, in August 1987 she co-organized a demonstration commemorating the anniversary of the Moltov–Ribbentrop pact of 1939. She joined the League for a Free Lithuania (Lietuvos Laisvės Lyga), which started official activities. KGB agents deported Sadūnaitė to Belorussia, where they threatened her with execution for thirty hours. In May 1988 she met with President Ronald Reagan, who visited Moscow. In June 1988 she was left out of the Initiative Group of the Lithuanian Movement for Perestroika (Sajūdis) and remained in the shadows of Lithuanian politics. In August 1988 Sadūnaitė took part in a hunger strike on Gediminas Square in Vilnius, organized to demand the release of the last political prisoners from the Baltic republics. After Lithuania regained its independence in 1991, Sadūnaitė began to work with the Vilnius branch of Caritas, a Catholic charity organization reactivated in Lithuania for the first time in fifty years. In 1992 her Radiance from the Gulag was published in the United States. In August 1998 Sadūnaitė was awarded the Order of the White Knight. (WR)

SAKUZOV Yanko (24 September 1860, Shumen–2 February 1941, Sofia), Bulgarian politician. In 1878 Sakuzov moved to Russia. He initially attended a high school in Nikolayev, and then, along with Dimitur Blagoev, he studied at a theological seminary in Odessa. In 1880 he left the seminary and went to Germany. He studied the natural sciences, philosophy, and history at the universities in Jena, Leipzig, and Thuringia (1881–83) and then biology in London (1883–84) and literature and literary criticism in Paris (1884). After returning to Bulgaria, Sakuzov taught biology, history, and literature at a school in Shumen. In 1885 he fought as a volunteer in the Serbo-Bulgarian war. In 1886 he opposed the coup and the dethronement of Prince Alexander Battenberg. In 1887–90 Sakuzov was deputy prosecutor in Shumen. He edited Den, one of the first Bulgarian Socialist periodicals, initially in Shumen (1891–92) and then in Sofia (until 1896). Sakuzov was one of the founders of the Bulgarian Social Democratic Party (BSDP). After a split in the movement in 1892, he joined the Bulgarian Social Democratic Union, which merged with the BSDP to form the Bulgarian Social Democratic Workers’ Party (BSDWP) two years later. From 1894 Sakuzov was one of the top-ranking party leaders. After a split in the BSDWP at the Tenth Congress in 1903, he became the leader of a BSDWP faction known as the Broad Socialists. He edited the BSDWP periodical Obshto delo (1900–5) and organized a trade union movement. In 1917 he attended an international Socialist conference in Stockholm.

From 1906 to 1908 Sakuzov was active in the opposition Patriotic Bloc. He supported the proclamation of full independence for Bulgaria in 1908 but protested the strengthening of royal power. He opposed Bulgaria's entering World War I on the side of the Central Powers. It was only toward the end of the war that he agreed to assume the portfolio of minister of trade, industry, and labor in the governments of Aleksandur Malinov and Teodor Teodorov (October 1918–October 1919). Sakuzov was a member of the Bulgarian delegation to the Paris Peace Conference in 1919, a deputy to the National Assembly (1893–96, 1902–3, 1911–23, and 1923–34), and a deputy to the Grand National Assembly in 1911. He edited the newspapers Drugar (1893–94), Rabotnicheska borba (1903–8), and Narod (1911–34), as well as the periodicals Obshtestvena misul (1909), Suvremenna misul (1910–14, 1919–20), and Sotsialdemokrat (1920–28). After the coup of May 1934 Sakuzov retired from active politics. As his last political act, he signed a letter of protest against the parliament's enacting a law on the protection of the nation in 1940. Sakuzov's publications include Cesarizum ili demokratsia (Caesarism or democracy; 1905); Intelligent-siata i neinata rola v obshtestvoto (The intelligentsia and its role in society; 1906); Bulgarite v svoiata istorii (The Bulgarians in history; 1922, 3d ed.); and Protiv monarkhiata: V zashtita na republikata (Against Monarchy: In defense of the republic; 1946). ŠALKKAUSKIS Stasys (4 May 1886, Ariogala–4 December 1941, Šiauliai), Lithuanian philosopher. Šalkauskis graduated in philosophy and law from Moscow University in 1911. During World War I he continued his studies in Fribourg, Switzerland, where he received a Ph.D. for a dissertation on Vladimir Soloviev. In 1922 Šalkauskis started teaching in the Department of Theology and Philosophy of Vytautas Magnus University in Kaunas, and in 1939 he became the university's rector. Removed after the Soviet invasion and after the incorporation of Lithuania into the USSR in 1940, he died soon after Lithuania was occupied by Nazi Germany. Šalkauskis was the most prominent representative of Lithuanian Christian philosophy. Connected with the Roman Catholic movement Ateitis (Future), he opposed the nationalist regime of Antanas Smetona. He thought that Lithuanian culture was a unique combination of the traditions of Eastern and Western Europe. His thinking stemmed from the works of St. Thomas Aquinas but was also closely connected with contemporary Catholic thought. Šalkauskis defended democracy and moral values as the foundations of national life. He played a serious role in the shaping of the Lithuanian intelligentsia. Among other works Šalkauskis authored the following: Bendrosios mokslinio darbo metodikos pradai (Foundations of the general methodology of science; 1926); Kultūros filosofijos metmenys (Outline of the philosophy of culture; 1926); Tautybė, patriotizmas ir lietuvių tautos pašaukimas (Nationality, patriotism, and the destiny of the Lithuanian nation; 1928); Visuomeninis auklėjimas (Social education; 1932); Lietuvių tauta ir jos ugdymas (The Lithuanian nation and its development; 1933); and Tiesos kelias (The path of truth; 1938). Šalkauskis's works, banned under Soviet rule, became very popular after Lithuania regained its independence in 1991. (WR)

ŠÁMAL Přemysl (4 October 1867, Prague–9 March 1941, Berlin), Czech lawyer and politician. Šámal received a law degree from the Czech University in Prague, and he subsequently worked as an attorney (1898–1919). He was vice-chairman of the Central School Organization (Ústřední Matica Školská) from 1902 to 1922 and a member of the Prague City Council from 1908 to 1911. Before World War I he was active in the Czech Progressive Party (the so-called realists) and was a close associate of Tomáš Garrigue Masaryk. During the war Šámal was one of the leaders of the Czech pro-independence movement. In March 1917 he helped to establish a secret Czech political organization called Mafia. From September 1915 onwards he was one of the Mafia leaders, serving as head of its information network. Šámal coordinated the activities of all unofficial organizations in the Czech territories and was responsible for contacts with the émigré community and with all major Czech politicians. Toward the end of the war he sought to unify all political forces around the idea of Czechoslovak independence. In July 1918 Šámal became a member of the Czechoslovak National Committee (Národní Výbor). In October of that year, as a representative of the Mafia, he took part in Geneva negotiations between representatives of the pro-independence movement at home and abroad.

In 1918–20 Šámal sat on the Revolutionary National Assembly, and from November 1918 to June 1919 he served as mayor of Prague, elected with the support of all major political forces. From 1919 to 1938 he held various positions, including that of head of President Masaryk's chancellery. Šámal was one of Masaryk's closest associates. He played a major role in shaping the president's policies and organized the work of the chancellery. When Masaryk resigned as president, Edvard Beneš asked Šámal to remain in his post, so as to symbolize the continuity of the chancellery's work. Šámal resigned as head of the chancellery when Emil Hácha became president of Czechoslovakia (30 November 1938), after the Pact of Munich (September 1938). At the beginning of World War II Šámal was in charge of the Political Center (Politické Ústředí), an underground pro-independence organization. He also organized help for the families of prisoners. Arrested by the Gestapo in January 1940, Šámal was sent to a prison in Berlin, where he died. (PU)

SĂNĂTESCU Constantin (14 January 1885, Craiova–8 November 1947, Bucharest), Romanian general and politician. Sănătescu completed his military studies at the Military Academy in Bucharest in 1907 and at the War College in 1919–20. With the rank of major, he fought in World War I. He was promoted to general in 1935. Sănătescu was commander of the Fourth Army Corps in 1941–43 and of the Royal Guard between March 1943 and August 1944. During World War II he commanded the Romanian forces against the USSR in Bessarabia (June–July 1941), at Odessa (August–October 1941), and on the Don River (1942). He was decorated with the orders of the Star of Romania (1941) and Michael the Brave (1944) and with the German Iron Cross (1942).

Sănătescu did not participate in the political life of Romania until the coup of 23 August 1944, of which he was one of the main organizers. In June 1944 he took part in a meeting of opposition representatives, including Communists, the army, and the royal court. The participants at the meeting decided that Marshal Ion Antonescu should be dismissed. During the coup Sănătescu contributed to the arrest of Antonescu, and from 23 August 1944 he was prime minister. His cabinet, called the “government of national unity,” included (among others) Iuliu Maniu and Constantin Brătianu. Under pressure from the Soviet president of the Allied Control Commission, on 4 November 1944 King Michael appointed a reformed Sănătescu cabinet, in which Sănătescu also became minister of war. The second government of Sănătescu was also of a coalition nature, and most departments were still in the hands of democratic politicians. As a representative of Romania, Sănătescu participated in talks with a Soviet delegation headed by Minister of Foreign Affairs Andrey Vyshinsky, and he tried to prevent the vassalization of the country. After the establishment of the government of General Nicolae Radescu, between December 1944 and June 1945 Sănătescu served as chief of the general staff. He worked with King Michael and with the democratic parties, mainly the National Peasant Party and the National Liberal Party. Sănătescu was dismissed from his posts after the creation of the government of Petru Groza in June 1945. In 1995 his Jurnal (1944–1947) (Diary [1944–1947]) was published in Romania. (FA/TD)

SANDANSKI Yane (18 May 1872, Vlahi, near Melnik–22 April 1915, Pirin Planina), Macedonian revolutionary. With a primary school education, Sandanski entered the military; following his discharge, he held various jobs. He became an insurgent in Macedonia and was wounded in 1897. Becoming a leader of the Internal Macedonian Revolutionary Organization (Vnatrešna Makedonska Revolucionerna Organizacija [IMRO]), he masterminded the well-publicized abduction of the American missionary Ellen Stone and her Albanian companion, Katerina Tsilka, in eastern Macedonia in 1901. Sandanski and his compatriots captured the women to extort ransom from the United States for their release. The IMRO eventually received a sizable amount, which was used to purchase weapons. Sandanski was a strong proponent of the liberation of Macedonia from the Ottomans and of non-cooperation with the Supreme Macedonian Committee (Vyrchoven Makedonski Komitet), based in Sofia. He led his guerrilla band in an ill-fated uprising in Ilinden in 1903, following which he took over the leadership of the anti-supremist, left-wing faction of the organization. Sandanski was behind the murder of two opponents, Boris

Sarafov and Ivan Garvanov, in 1907. He embraced the 1908 Young Turk Revolution, with the hope that it would bring equality for all peoples within the Ottoman Empire and political autonomy for Macedonia. He was soon disappointed. Sandanski took up arms on the side of Bulgaria during the Balkan Wars (1912–13). He was assassinated in 1915 by agents of his archenemy Todor Aleksandrov, who favored the annexation of Macedonia to Bulgaria. As the leader of the IMRO Federalists, Sandanski stood for the autonomy of Macedonia. (DP)

SANGHELI Andrei (20 June 1944, Grinautsy), post-Communist Moldavian politician. Sangheli graduated from the Agricultural Institute in Kishinev. From 1967 he belonged to the CPSU. He started his professional career as the director of a sovkhos and secretary of the party committee in Kamenka. In 1979–80 he was deputy chairman of the Sovkhos Council of the Moldavian SSR, and until 1986 he was chairman of the regional executive committee and first secretary of the party committee in Dondyushany. Later he worked as head of the Industrial and Agricultural Committee of the Council of Ministers of the Moldavian SSR. In 1989 Sangheli became deputy prime minister of the republic and minister of agriculture in the government of Valeriu Muravschi, which, after the failure of the Moscow putsch in August 1991 and given the approval of President Mircea Snegur, proclaimed Moldavian independence. In November 1991 Sangheli and Snegur were among the founders of the Agrarian Democratic Party of Moldova (Partidul Democrat Agrar din Moldova [ADPM]), whose base was the economic nomenklatura, mostly former sovkhos directors. In view of growing ethnic tensions in Transnistria and the Gagauz lands and owing to fears of the national minorities that the new country would merge with Romania, Snegur decided to form a multi-ethnic cabinet of “national accord,” and he placed Sangheli at the head of it on 1 July 1992. Sangheli assured the Moldovans that Moldova would not unite with Romania. In the elections of February 1994 the ADPM won 56 out of 104 mandates, and Sangheli remained prime minister. In a referendum of March 1994 about 95 percent of those who voted were in favor of independence and against unification with Romania. In the new constitution, passed in July 1994, permanent neutrality was adopted, along with special autonomous status for Transnistria and the Gagauz lands. The official language was called Moldavian and not Romanian. Before the presidential elections of November 1996 Snegur distanced himself from the Sangheli government, which had lost popularity because of economic decline. On 2 December 1996, the day after Snegur’s defeat, Sangheli resigned but stayed in office until the end of January 1997, when a new cabinet was formed by Ion Ciubuc. Later Sangheli worked in agro-business. (WR)

SAPIEHA Adam Stefan (14 May 1867, Krasieczyn–23 July 1951, Kraków), prince, Polish cardinal, archbishop of Kraków. Born into an aristocratic family with staunch patriotic traditions, Sapieha attended the Fourth High School in Lvov and later studied law at the University of Vienna and the Jagiellonian University in Kraków, as well as theology in Innsbruck (1890–94). He was ordained on 1 October 1893. After a brief sojourn as a vicar in Buchacz, he left for Rome to continue his studies. In 1896 Sapieha received his doctorate in law at the Papal Ecclesiastical Academy (Lateranum). He also studied diplomacy at the Ecclesiastical Academy for the Nobility. In 1897–1901 Sapieha served as the deputy president of the Catholic Seminary in Lvov. He traveled extensively, including trips to the Balkans and the United States. Between 1906 and 1911 Sapieha served at the Vatican as a papal chamberlain. An expert on Russia and Polish Catholic Church affairs, he solidified his position at the Roman Curia, including the Secretariat of the State, influencing the Vatican’s personnel policy. He coordinated the move by the Polish bishops in Galicia to oppose the official policy of Russification in the Khmelnytski district. He also co-founded the Polish press bureau in Rome.

In November 1911, Sapieha was consecrated and appointed bishop of Kraków, and his ingress took place on 3 March 1912. He was also a deputy to the Parliament of the Land (Sejm Krajowy) in Galicia. Appreciating the necessity to elevate the intellectual level of the clergy, Sapieha co-founded the Scientific Catholic Institute in Kraków. Before the outbreak of the World War I, he was involved with the Central National Committee (Centralny Komitet Narodowy) in Galicia. During the war he devoted himself to charity and humanitarian work. He headed the Princes’ and Bishops’ Committee for Aid to War Victims (Książęco-Biskupi Komitet Pomocy dla Dotkniętych Kłeską Wojny). Following the war, Sapieha devoted himself to the Polish cause in Upper Silesia. This caused conflict with the papal nuncio, Achille Ratti, the future Pope Pius XI. From 1922 to 1923 Sapieha was a senator of the center-right Christian Union for National Unity.

On 28 October 1925, the Pope bestowed metropolitan status upon Kraków, and on 14 December 1925 he nominated Sapieha as the first archbishop metropolitan. Sapieha's ingress took place on 17 January 1926. Initially an opponent of a concordat between Poland and the Vatican, Sapieha then changed his mind and worked strenuously to hammer it out. He was further involved in political conflicts of the time. In 1930 he sided with the politicians of the so-called Center-Left (Centrolew) who were imprisoned by the sanacja government. In 1937 he ordered that the remains of Józef Piłsudski be moved from St. Leonard's Crypt to the Tower of Silver Bells of Wawel Castle in Kraków, a move that triggered a crisis in Church-state affairs. Also in 1937 Sapieha backed Front Morges, a centrist political initiative against the sanacja. Although an opponent of the Socialist leadership, he defended striking workers. In 1939, he vainly appealed to the Pope twice to relieve him of his post because of poor health. In May 1939 he withdrew his appeal because of the specter of war looming large on the horizon. During the German occupation Sapieha remained in Kraków and demanded the same of his ecclesiastical underlings. Following the departure from Poland of Cardinal August Hlond, Sapieha fulfilled the duties of the head of the Catholic Church in Poland. He was greatly respected. His attitude toward the occupiers was intrepid and dignified. He personally intervened numerous times concerning various matters before the Nazi governor general of occupied central Poland, Hans Frank. The archbishop initiated and supported underground theological studies. He assisted Polish slave laborers shipped off to the Reich. He actively participated in rescue operations of Jews. He stayed in touch with the Holy See, informing the Pope about the situation in Poland. He also maintained contact with the Polish underground and headed the Civic Committee of Assistance (Obywatelski Komitet Pomocy), and he reactivated the Main Welfare Council (Rada Główna Opiekuńcza).

After the war, Sapieha directed the Episcopate of Poland until the return of Primate Hlond in July 1945 and then again following Hlond's death (October 1948) until the ascent of Archbishop Stefan Wyszyński. On 18 February 1946, during the first secret consistory following the war, Sapieha received a cardinal's hat. He was involved in revitalizing and reorganizing the Catholic Church in Poland, including many of its subsidiary organizations. On 25 August 1945, he established the Home Center of Charity, Caritas. He supported the beatification processes of Queen Jadwiga, Albert Chmielowski, and Rafał Kalinowski. In March 1945 the cardinal founded Tygodnik Powszechny, and he intervened numerous times with the Communist regime regarding its violation of civic rights and Church rights. (PK)

SARAFOV Boris (12 July 1872, Libiahovo, Nevrokop region–28 November 1907, Sofia), Macedonian revolutionary. Sarafov was the son of Petro Sarafov and brother of Kristo Sarafov, Macedonian freedom fighters. He completed military training at the Sofia Military Academy, a classmate of Georgi Delchev. He was commissioned a lieutenant in the Bulgarian Army and led an ill-fated foray against Ottoman forces in the Melnik region of Macedonia in 1895. A flamboyant personality, Sarafov was, by most accounts, an opportunist and adventurer who in 1896 proposed that the Internal Macedonian Revolutionary Organization (IMRO) “abduct” him while he was traveling on a Russian passport. IMRO activists could hold him for ransom and generate revenue for their cause. Sarafov also suggested kidnapping the Serbian king to raise money and allegedly offered to raise a contingent of men to fight as mercenaries in the Spanish-American War on the side of the United States. In 1899, with the support of IMRO leaders who hoped he would be friendly to their cause, Sarafov was elected president of the Supreme Macedonia Committee. Quixotic and non-consultative, he nevertheless aided IMRO by providing arms and raising money for its efforts. Sarafov was jailed on murder charges involving the death of a Macedonian-born vlach. He was acquitted but not before the leadership of the Supreme Macedonia Committee had passed on to Colonel Ivan Tsonchev. At the Smilevo Congress in 1903, Sarafov was selected to be a member of the three-man IMRO general staff for a forthcoming uprising at Ilinden. The revolt failed, and Sarafov returned to Bulgaria, where he remained active in Macedonian affairs until his assassination by a protégé of Yane Sandanski. (DP)

SÄRE Karl (2 July 1903, Yuryev [now Tartu, Estonia]–1943?), Estonian Communist activist. In 1921 Säre went to the Soviet Union, where he studied briefly at Leningrad University. He became affiliated with the Communist Party of Estonia (CPE) in 1927. From 1933 to 1934 he studied at a school of the Communist International in Moscow, and from 1925 to 1927 he worked in the Soviet Embassy in China. After the CPE, which was illegal in Estonia, was dissolved by a decision of the Comintern, the Estonian party units were to contact only the leadership of the party in Copenhagen. The authorities in Moscow assigned Säre as head of the purged and reorganized party. In 1933, on the initiative of Johannes Meerits, the de facto leader of the CPE, Säre took up the post in Denmark. In 1935 one of the experienced agents, Johannes Eltermann, was arrested by the Estonian police. After Eltermann's release, Säre and Meerits ordered him to Copenhagen, where they murdered him. During the Great Purge Säre lived in the United States, where he conducted unsuccessful activities among the Estonian émigré community. After the Estonian government declared an amnesty in 1938, he returned to Tallinn.

After the Soviet invasion of Estonia in June 1940, Säre became first secretary of the CPE Central Committee and the main associate of Andrey Zhdanov. He expelled alleged and genuine opponents from the party. It is believed that it was Säre who recommended to Zhdanov that Johannes Vares become prime minister of the pro-Soviet government and proposed that the request for the incorporation of Estonia into the Soviet Union should come from the government without any overt participation of the Communists. During the Soviet occupation of 1940–41 Säre was responsible for the confiscation of private property, the persecution of political opponents, enforced atheization and collectivization, and the deportation of around ten thousand Estonians. He headed the state “troika”—the main organ that laid down directives for lower-level “troikas,” which made concrete decisions on who was to be declared dangerous to the regime and consequently deported to Siberia.

After Germany occupied Estonia, Säre was arrested (3 September 1941) and sent to Sachsenhausen. There are suspicions that he agreed to collaborate with the Gestapo and that his testimony was instrumental in the arrests of many Communists in hiding, left behind by Moscow to organize sabotage behind the front lines. The wave of arrests of Communist activists contributed to the breakup of the Communist structures, and in 1944 there were virtually no pro-Soviet forces left in Estonia. In early 1941 and late 1942, hoping that he would be allowed to leave for Denmark, Säre admitted to having killed Eltermann. During a trial in Copenhagen Säre pleaded guilty. He was handed over to the Gestapo, who probably killed him. His trial, which was given wide publicity by Nazi propaganda, revealed the terrorist character of the Comintern and to some extent diminished Soviet influence in Denmark. As a result, Säre's name disappeared from all Soviet history textbooks, and it was only after 1991 that he became the subject of more thorough research. (AG)

ŠARINIĆ Hrvoje (17 February 1935, Sušak), Croatian politician. After graduating in engineering studies in Zagreb, Šarinić left for France. For many years he worked there constructing nuclear power plants. On behalf of French companies he also dealt with such projects in South Africa. In 1980–84 Šarinić represented the French nuclear industry in Zagreb, and in 1990 he became head of the chancellery of President Franjo Tuđman. On 8 September 1992 Šarinić became prime minister, succeeding Franjo Gregurić. At that time Croatia was struggling with the consequences of the dissolution of Yugoslavia. The budget was imbalanced due to military spending, and inflation was growing. Šarinić headed the government until 29 March 1993. He belonged to the Croatian Democratic Union (Hrvatska Demokratska Zajednica [HDZ]) from its beginnings, and he remained an adviser to Tuđman and head of the Office of National Security (Ured za Nacionalnu Sigurnost). Rated among the closest aides of Tuđman, Šarinić went on several delicate missions—for instance, he went to talks with Slobodan Milošević. Šarinić played an important role in negotiating peace in the former Yugoslavia. The process ended with the Dayton Agreement of 1995. In 1996 Šarinić regained the position of head of the president's chancellery. His relationship with Tuđman worsened in the fall of 1998, when Šarinić publicly accused the president's adviser, Ivica Pašalić, of an abuse of the secret services and media for political games and when he demanded an explanation of the “Dubrovačka Banka affair.” In October 1998 Šarinić resigned from all his positions and left the HDZ. In 1999 he published his memoirs, Svi moji tajni pregovori sa Slobodanem Miloševićem (All my secret talks with Slobodan Milošević). After the HDZ lost the elections, in April 2000 Šarinić joined the Croatian Democratic Center (Hrvatski Demokratski Centar). (AO)

SARKOTIČ VON LOVČEN Stefan (4 October 1858, Sinac, Croatia–16 October 1939, Vienna), general, commander of the Austro-Hungarian Army in the Balkans. Sarkotič was born into the family of a Catholic officer of Croatian descent. Like his father, he chose a military career. In 1879 he graduated from the Maria Theresa Military Academy. In 1882–84 he studied at another military academy. He published a monograph on Russian military science, Das russische Kriegstheater: Strategische und geographische Studie (The Russian war theater: Strategic and geographic studies; 1894). He briefly served in a provincial garrison and helped to suppress a rebellion in southern Dalmatia (1882). He then served in the General Staff and was promoted to major (1896), colonel (1901), and general (1907). Because of his friendship with Archduke Eugen, Sarkotič had connections with officials in the emperor's court. In 1912 he was appointed commander of the Fourth Military District, with its headquarters in Agram (Zagreb). At the beginning of World War I Sarkotič assumed command of the Forty-second Croatian Division but then developed dysentery and was taken to a hospital in September 1914. He handed over command to General Oskar Potiorek; it saved Sarkotič from being held responsible for an ignominious defeat of the army during the first stage of the war against Serbia. Although he had not recovered completely, on 22 December 1914 Sarkotič was appointed commander-in-chief of the Habsburg forces in Dalmatia and Bosnia-Herzegovina. Within a year he restored discipline in the army after the defeat, and then he launched an offensive. In January 1916 his troops occupied Montenegro. He personally took part in the assault on fortified positions at Lovčen. For his success in this operation, Sarkotič was granted the title of baron by the new emperor, Charles. In July 1916 he was offered the post of commander of the eastern front, but he refused owing to ill health. In December 1917 in the Imperial Council in Vienna Sarkotič sharply protested plans to divide the army into an Austrian and a Hungarian part, according to ethnic and geographic criteria. He was also against plans to unite the Southern Slav parts of the empire into a separate kingdom. He believed that such a union should be a part of the Kingdom of Hungary within the empire. After the collapse of the Austro-Hungarian monarchy, Sarkotič was interned in Wagram but was soon released. He returned to Vienna, where he lived until the end of his life. Sarkotič authored Der Banjaluka Prozess (The Banjaluka trial), a two-volume monograph that was published in 1933. (MC)

SAUL Bruno (8 January 1932, Narva), Estonian Communist activist. In 1956 Saul graduated in electronics from the Polytechnic Institute in Leningrad (now St. Petersburg), and in 1973 he graduated from the Higher Party School of the Central Committee (CC) of the CPSU. In 1977 he received a Ph.D. in economics. His marriage to a Russian and his good contacts in Moscow facilitated his career. A member of the Communist Party of Estonia (CPE) from 1960, in 1961–63 Saul was chief engineer of the Estonian Radio Committee; from 1963 to 1964 he chaired this committee; in 1964–66 he was chief engineer of the Estonian Ministry of Communications; and from 1969 to 1975 he was Estonian minister of communications. From 1975 Saul was deputy prime minister of the Estonian SSR, and in 1984 he became chairman of the Estonian Council of Ministers and joined the Supreme Soviet of the USSR. He took over these posts at a time when Russification policies in the Estonian republic were becoming less oppressive, but Saul generally failed to meet the expectations for reform. In 1987, when a crisis occurred connected with plans to construct a phosphate mine that could devastate one-third of the Estonian territory, Saul stopped the project in order to appease social discontent, but otherwise his policies were inconsistent. On 2 February 1988 riot police were ordered to brutally suppress a demonstration in Tartu, but on 24 February 1988 another demonstration met with no violent reaction from the authorities. On the other hand, a day after Karl Vaino was dismissed as first secretary of the CPE CC, in June 1988 Saul ordered housing cooperatives to offer preferential treatment to people coming from Russia. When the party press released information about this decision (Edasi, 26 August 1988), a scandal broke out. Saul supported the new CPE first secretary, Vaino Väljas, but he still cooperated with the dogmatic faction in the Kremlin. On 16 November 1988, when the Estonian Supreme Council adopted an independence declaration, Saul resigned. In 1990 he left the CPE and started a his own business venture, the Union of Small Investors (Väikeinvestorite Ühendus). (AG)

SAVISAAR Edgar (31 May 1950, Harjumaal Harkus), Estonian Communist activist and post-Communist politician. In 1973 Savisaar graduated in history from the University of Tartu. During his studies he was active in the Comsomol. In 1976–79 he continued with doctoral studies at the Academy of Sciences of the Estonian SSR, and in 1981 he defended a Ph.D. dissertation on “global issues in Socialist philosophy.” From 1982 Savisaar belonged to the Communist Party of Estonia (CPE). He started his political career as head of the planning commission in the City Council of Tallinn (1980–85), and in 1985–88 he headed a department in the Planning Commission of the Estonian SSR. In 1987, along with other Comsomol leaders, including Siim Kallas, Savisaar worked out and published in the party organ, Edasi, a program for the “economic sovereignty” of the Estonian republic based on market reform and the Estonian budget and currency. The article—whose authors demanded the introduction of real perestroika into the republic, which was ruled by old-style dogmatists—brought Savisaar significant popularity and became a prelude to the substitution of those dogmatists by Comsomol pragmatists. It also began the appropriation of state assets by the party nomenklatura. Savisaar was one of the pioneers of this action, establishing the consulting firm Mainor. Along with Marju Lauristin, Savisaar founded the Popular Front of Estonia (Eesti Rahvarinne [ER]).

The creation of the ER was welcomed by a part of the CPE leadership. Initially the movement’s goal was to support perestroika and to strengthen Estonia’s sovereignty within a renewed Soviet Union. Savisaar developed a campaign for constitutional change; it succeeded on 16 November 1988, when the Supreme Soviet of the Estonian SSR adopted a declaration of Estonian sovereignty within the USSR. As head of the Planning Commission, Savisaar supported economic reform, but under the pressure of civic committees demanding the restitution of prewar independence, Savisaar developed the idea of the “Third Republic,” to be ruled by the reformed Communist elite. In January 1990 he left the CPE, and in February 1990 he was elected to the Estonian Congress, organized by the non-Communist opposition. This is why in the elections to the Estonian Supreme Soviet of March 1990 Savisaar received the support of the congress, while his alliance with national Communists brought him the portfolio of prime minister of the Estonia SSR on 3 April 1990. From May 1990 the country was called the Republic of Estonia.

Savisaar’s government began economic reforms. The restitution of landed property was started, a three-year tax exemption was passed, and an oil terminal was begun to make Estonia independent from Russian supplies. On 19 April 1990 Savisaar and the chairman of the Estonian Supreme Council, Arnold Rüütel, met with Mikhail Gorbachev in Moscow, and despite Soviet pressures, they declined to sign a new union agreement. The idea of a Third Republic proved to be unacceptable for both Gorbachev and the Estonian society. Nevertheless, Savisaar remained very popular as long as a Soviet intervention seemed likely. His authoritarian style and attempts to limit the freedom of speech damaged his ratings. Although he supported the restitution of Estonian independence on 20 August 1991, he was increasingly perceived as a check to further steps toward liberalization. Fearing for the country’s economic safety, Savisaar defended trade links with Russia. He signed a September 1991 law allowing the KGB to withdraw archives to Russia and allowing KGB agents to stay in Estonia. The economic collapse in Estonia in 1991 additionally eroded his popularity. At the end of his rule Savisaar was mostly supported by Supreme Council deputies from the Soviet Army, perceived as the occupying force. Since Savisaar opposed an annulment of their mandates, he was increasingly criticized and resigned on 30 January 1992.

After his resignation, Savisaar took the lead of the ER-based (Populist) Estonian Center Party (Eesti Keskerond [EK]). He criticized liberal reforms and center-right governments of 1992–94 and 1999–2002. From 1991 Savisaar was an MP, and in 1992–95 he was speaker of the parliament. As a result of the March 1995 elections Savisaar entered into a coalition with the Estonian Coalition Party, and he entered the Tiit Vähi government as minister of interior and deputy prime minister. This coalition lasted until October 1995, when it turned out that Savisaar, as minister of interior, had eavesdropped on President Lennart Meri and other key politicians. The government stepped down, and the EK went into the opposition. From 1996 to 1999 Savisaar chaired the City Council of Tallinn, defending the privileges of social groups most affected by market reforms. His anti-government rhetoric and his plans to abolish the flat tax in favor of a progressive tax made Savisaar popular again. In the elections of March 1999 the EK emerged as the strongest parliamentary faction. A center-right coalition made it impossible for the EK to form a government. In January 2002 the EK entered the Kallas government, but Savisaar stayed out of it. (AG)

SAVOV Dimitur (5 September 1897, Vratsa–18 August 1951, Belene), Bulgarian financier and politician. In 1919–44 Savov was a member of many supervisory boards of banks and corporations. He served as vice-chairman (1927–43) and then chairman of the Sofia Chamber of Commerce and Industry. He also held the post of chairman of the Bulgarian committee at the International Chamber of Commerce in Paris and sat on the board of this chamber. Savov was a deputy (1938–39) to the National Assembly and chairman (1940–41) of the Bulgarian-Yugoslav Chamber of Commerce. From early June to early September 1944 he served as minister of finance in the government of Ivan Bagrianov and attempted to loosen economic ties with the Third Reich. Shortly after the Communist coup of 9 September 1944, Savov was arrested. In January 1945 the leaders of the Bulgarian Communist Party ordered that he be sentenced to life imprisonment. Although he had suffered two heart attacks, in 1951 he was taken to a concentration camp, where he died. (WR)

SAVOV Stefan (8 January 1924, Sofia–8 January 2000, Sofia), Bulgarian politician. For many years after World War II Savov was persecuted by the Communist authorities, deported to prison camps, and displaced. For example, he was a political prisoner in a labor camp in Belene, along with his father, Dimitur. For fifteen years Savov was forced to work as a bricklayer in the construction industry. Despite the persecutions, he graduated in law from Sofia University and worked as a recognized translator, mainly of Spanish literature. Savov was president of the Association of Hispanists and a member of the Presidium of the Union of Translators in Bulgaria. After the fall of the Communist system, he actively joined the political life. From 1990 he was a member of the National Executive Council of the Union of Democratic Forces (UDF), and from 15 December 1990 he served as president of the Democratic Party. In 1990–91 Savov was an MP and co-president of the UDF Parliamentary Group. On 14 May 1991, along with thirty-eight other deputies of the UDF, he left the parliament to protest plans for a new constitution, which was being prepared by the parliament, dominated by the Bulgarian Socialist Party (former Communists). Two days before the passing of the constitution in July 1991, Savov intensified his protest by going on a hunger strike. Between October 1991 and December 1994 Savov was an MP again and president of the Parliamentary Group of the Democratic Party. Between 4 November 1991 and 24 September 1992 he was the speaker of the parliament. His resignation of this post was a result of a clash within the coalition of the UDF and the Turkish Movement for Rights and Freedoms of Ahmed Dogan. In 1993 Savov served as president of the UDF Parliamentary Group. In 1995–97 he was an MP on behalf of the People's Union (a coalition of the Bulgarian Agrarian National Union and the Democratic Party), co-president of the Parliamentary Group of the People's Union, and a member of the parliamentary Committee on Foreign Policy. Savov also held these parliamentary posts in the next term of the parliament. (JJ)

SCHAFF Adam (10 March 1913, Lwów [Lviv]), Polish Marxist philosopher and Communist activist. In 1935 Schaff graduated from Lwów University and in 1936 from the Ecole des Sciences Politiques et Economiques in Paris. In 1932–36 he belonged to the Communist Union of Polish Youth and from 1936 to 1938 to the Communist Party of Poland (Komunistyczna Partia Polski). During World War II Schaff lived in the USSR and worked at the Institute of Philosophy of the Soviet Academy of Sciences in Moscow. In 1941 he received a Ph.D. and in 1945 a second degree in Marxist philosophy. In 1944 Schaff joined the Polish Workers' Party (Polska Partia Robotnicza [PPR]). Upon his return to Poland in 1946, he published Wstęp do teorii marksizmu (Introduction to Marxist theory), and in 1945–47 he lectured in political doctrines at the university in Łódź. At the same time, he worked at the party school of the PPR Central Committee (CC). A member of the Polish United Workers' Party (Polska Zjednoczona Partia Robotnicza [PUWP]) and a professor at Warsaw University from 1948, in 1950–57 Schaff headed the Institute of Social Sciences (later the Institute of Formation of Scientific Personnel) of the PUWP CC. At that time he promoted the Stalinist version of Marxism, sharply attacking non-Marxist philosophers.

In 1954 Schaff was appointed full professor. In 1956–68 he was director of the Institute of Philosophy and Sociology of the Polish Academy of Sciences, and in 1959 he became a member of the PUWP CC. In the early 1960s Schaff silently protected the Crooked Circle Club, which united opposition intellectuals, but his role in the dissolution of the club in February 1962 remains unclear. In 1965 his book Marxizm a jednostka ludzka (Marxism and the Human Individual, 1970) raised controversy among Marxists and Communist leaders. After the student protests of March 1968, Schaff was sharply criticized (by, among others, the followers of Mieczysław Moczar) for alleged revisionism, and he was finally dismissed from the PUWP CC and Warsaw University. Schaff later dealt with Marxist semantics, ethics, nationalism, and capitalism. In 1969–72 he lectured in philosophy at the University of Vienna, and until 1988 he was an honorary professor there. In his book Die kommunistische Bewegung am Scheideweg (1982; Ruch komunistyczny na rozdrożu, 1983) Schaff prophesied a fundamental crash of capitalism within twenty years. During martial law in Poland Schaff tried to help the General Wojciech Jaruzelski regime out of international isolation. Schaff published about three hundred articles and about twenty books, including Język i poznanie (1964; Language and Cognition, 1973); Entfremdung als soziales Phänomenon (Callousness as a social phenomenon; 1977); and Perspektywy współczesnego socjalizmu (Prospects of contemporary socialism; 1988). He received honorary doctorates from many universities (including the University of Michigan and the Sorbonne in Paris). In 1993 Schaff published his memoirs, Pora na spowiedź (Time for a confession). (PK)

SCHELINGOVÁ Zdenka Cecilia (24 December 1916, Krivá, Orava–31 July 1955, Trnava), Czech nun and political prisoner. Born the tenth child of a large peasant family and brought up in a religious atmosphere, after graduating from a medical school and completing her novitiate, in January 1943 Schelingová took her final vows in the Congregation of the Sisters of Charity of the Holy Cross and was given the religious name of Zdenka. She worked as a laboratory technician at a state-owned hospital in Bratislava. When in 1950 the persecution of the Church in Slovakia intensified, Schelingová helped the persecuted clergymen. In February 1952 she helped one of the arrested priests to escape from a closed hospital ward. She also helped in the preparations for the escape of six priests imprisoned in Bratislava. However, this turned out to be a provocation organized by the Communist security services. Arrested on 29 February 1952, Schelingová was interrogated and tortured for a long time, but she did not give anyone away. Sentenced to twelve years' imprisonment for "high treason" on 17 June 1952, she served her sentence in the harshest prisons in Rimavská Sobota, Pardubice, Brno, and Prague. She endured this persecution with great dignity, bringing help to other inmates and demonstrating her faithfulness to the Gospel in the most difficult circumstances. Schelingová fell ill at the beginning of her imprisonment, and then her health quickly deteriorated. On 16 April 1955, when she was dying, the authorities decided to release her from prison conditionally. Terminally ill, she died soon afterwards in Trnava. Initially buried in Trnava, she was later reburied at the Podunajské Biskupice Cemetery. On 14 September 2003 in Bratislava Schelingová was beatified by Pope John Paul II. (AGr)

SCHILLER Leon (14 March 1887, Kraków–25 March 1954, Warsaw), Polish theater director and theoretician. Schiller's debut as a stage director took place at the Popular Theater while he was still in high school. His singing debut occurred at the Little Green Baloon (Zielony Balonik) cabaret in 1905. In 1906 Schiller started to study philosophy at the Jagiellonian University in Kraków, but he dropped out to travel between 1908 and 1911. Following his return to Kraków, he enrolled at the Trade Academy, and after graduating in 1912, he entered the family business. Later, in 1916 and 1917, Schiller studied composition and music theory in Vienna. Afterward he moved to Warsaw, where he directed his first play (1917) and wrote his first script (1919). Between 1917 and 1939, Schiller worked with Warsaw, Łódź, and Lwów (Lviv) theaters. He was active in the Union of Artists of Polish Scenes (Związek Artystów Scen Polskich). During the Polish-Bolshevik war, Schiller worked for the Main Propaganda Committee, but later he moved to the extreme left. Schiller's staging of avant garde plays stirred controversy. Die Dreigroschenopera, by Bertoldt Brecht, ignited a political scandal in 1929, as did Cjankali (Cyanide), by Friedrich Wolf, in 1930. However, his staging of Dziady (Forefather's Eve), by Adam Mickiewicz, was considered a theatrical masterpiece. From 1928 Schiller worked with Polish Radio. In 1933 he founded the Department of Directing at the State Institute of Theatrical Arts, where he taught.

During the Nazi occupation, from October 1939, Schiller conducted underground classes at the institute. He joined a boycott of German-controlled theaters, and he supported himself by performing in Warsaw cafes and participating in the Conspiratorial Theater Council. Schiller was arrested in March 1941 and sent to the Auschwitz concentration camp. He participated in underground work there, staging clandestine music concerts. He was released in May 1941. During the Warsaw Uprising in 1944 Schiller led the theater brigade of the Home Army. Following the capitulation of the uprising, he was interned at the Oflag in Murnau. Freed in April 1945 and appointed head of the traveling theater of the Free Polish First Armored Division, in December 1945 Schiller returned to Warsaw. Supported by the new regime, he joined the (Communist) Polish Workers' Party (Polska Partia Robotnicza). Schiller was a parliamentary deputy (1947–52) and a delegate to the December 1948 Congress at which the Communists merged with the Socialists; he was also a delegate to the Second Congress of the Polish United Workers' Party in 1954. From 1946 to 1949, Schiller worked as director and supervisor of the Polish Army Theater in Łódź, as well as president of the local State Higher Theatrical School. In 1949–50, he headed the Polish Theater in Warsaw. From 1947 he was a member of the Executive Committee of the International Theatrical Institute of the UNESCO. In 1950 he became president of the Association of Polish Theater and Film Artists (Stowarzyszenia Polskich Artystów Teatru i Filmu). In 1951 became head of the Theatrical Section of the State Institute of Arts of the Polish Academy of Sciences. Between 1947 and 1949 he served as editor-in-chief of the monthly Teatr, and in 1952 he founded and commenced editing Pamiętnik Teatralny.

Schiller's artistic output is evident in three strands of theater: the monumental theater (among others, the Nie-Boska komedia [Un-divine comedy], by Zygmunt Krasiński; Kordian, by Juliusz Słowacki; and The Tempest, by William Shakespeare); the politically involved leftist modern theater; and musical theater (among others, various plays scripted by Schiller; Pastoralka [A shepard's song; 1931]; and Kram z piosenkami [A market stall with songs; 1945]). Schiller also directed ballets (among others, Harnasie [Montagnard outlaws], by Karol Szymanowski), composed film music, and co-staged and art directed the movie Halka (1937); he also authored a multitude of articles, essays, and recollections published in collections such as Teatr ogromny (Humongous theater; 1961), Na progu nowego teatru, 1908–1924 (At the threshold of a new theater, 1908–1924; 1978), Droga przez teatr, 1924–1939 (The road through theater, 1924–1939; 1983), Theatrum militans (1987), and Rozmowy z Leonem Schillerem: Wywiady i autowywiady (Conversations with Leon Schiller: Interviews and self-interviews; 1995). SCHMÖGNEROVÁ Brigita (17 November 1947, Bratislava), Slovak economist and political activist. In 1971 Schmönerová graduated from the Higher Economic School in Bratislava, and later she worked there in the Department of Mathematical Economics. In 1976 she also graduated in mathematical statistics from Bratislava University. She worked as a fellow at the Center of Economic Planning in Athens, Greece (1976), and at Georgetown University in Washington, D.C. (1979). In the 1980s she worked at the Institute of Economics of the Slovak Academy of Sciences as head of its Department of Macroeconomics. Schmönerová started her political career after the Velvet Revolution of 1989. In 1990–92 she was an expert in the Ministry of Industry of the Slovak Republic, and after Slovakia became an independent state in 1993, she was economic adviser to the president. After the fall of the Vladimír Mečiar government, from March to November 1994 Schmönerová was deputy prime minister for the economy in the cabinet of Jozef Moravčík. In the early parliamentary elections of September–October 1994 Schmönerová won a seat on behalf of the Party of the Democratic Left (Strana Demokratickej L'avice [PDL]) and joined the commission of finance, budget, and currency. In 1995 she was elected PLD chairman. Schmönerová belonged to the right wing of the PLD, close to Peter Weiss. In the late 1990s her group gradually lost to the party left. In 1998 Schmönerová ran in the presidential elections, but to no avail. After the parliamentary elections of September 1998 she became minister of finance in the government of Mikulaš Dzurinda. She undertook necessary reforms in the banking sector and in the tax system, stabilizing the economic situation. In 2000 she received the Finance Minister of the Year award from Euromoney Institutional Investor PLC. Schmönerová resigned in January 2002 owing to growing discrepancies within the PLD, and along with Weiss and Erika Kvapilova she left the party. On 28 February 2002 Schmönerová was appointed executive secretary of the UN Economic Commission for Europe. (PU)

SCHULZ Bruno (12 July 1892, Drohobycz–19 November 1942, Drohobycz), Polish writer. Schulz came from an urban, middle-class, Polish-speaking Jewish family of

Judaic faith. After graduating from high school in 1910, he studied architecture in Lwów (Lviv) and painting at the Viennese Academy of Fine Arts. From 1924 to 1941 he worked as an art teacher at various schools in Drohobycz. In the mid-1920s he began writing short stories. His first known piece, “Noc lipcowa” (A July night), dates 1928. In 1933 Schulz published a collection of short stories, Sklepy Cynamonowe (Cinnamon shops), written as addenda to letters to his friend, the poetess Deborah Vogel. The collection made a splash in Lwów and Warsaw literary circles. Subsequently, Zofia Nałkowska introduced Schulz to the literary group Suburb (Przedmieście). In 1937 Schulz published his second volume of short stories, Sanatorium pod klepsydrą (Sanatorium under the Sign of the Hourglass, 1979), which included some of his earlier work. During the Nazi occupation, Schulz was forced into the Drohobycz ghetto, where he was shot on the street by a Gestapo officer. Schulz wrote poetic prose relegating the developing story to a secondary position, thus contributing to an original and fantastic transformation of reality. of a small Galician town into more general and symbolic images. He also left behind numerous drawings. Some of his pictures and stories were lost. His works of literary criticism, reviews, and about a hundred letters of high artistic value were saved. In the 1990s frescoes were discovered at his house in Drohobycz. They were illegally removed to Israel, which caused a media scandal. Schulz’s creativity sprang from an expressionism that drew on an indefinable subconscious. His stories stress the importance of the symbolism of dreams, often with erotic subtexts. Already highly esteemed before World War II, Schulz was also discovered in the West because of the translation of his works into English, German, French, and other languages. His Collected Works were published in London in 1998. (WR)

SCHUSTER Rudolf (4 January 1934, Košice), Slovak post-Communist politician. Schuster graduated in construction engineering from the Bratislava Polytechnic in 1959, and in 1960–62 he worked as an assistant at the Institute of Water Engineering and Hydraulics of the Slovak Academy of Sciences. Later he worked in the Košice iron mill, reaching the position of assistant technical director. In 1964–90 Schuster belonged to the Communist Party of Czechoslovakia. From 1974 he was deputy chairman of the City National Committee in Košice; from 1983 to 1986 he was mayor of Košice; and in 1986–89 he was chairman of the East Slovak Provincial National Committee. After the Velvet Revolution, on 30 November 1989 Schuster was appointed chairman of the Slovak National Council, and he held this position until 30 June 1990. From 1990 to 1992 he was ambassador to Canada. Upon returning home, Schuster briefly worked in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs in Prague; after the formation of independent Slovakia, from 1994 he was mayor of Košice again.

In 1998 Schuster co-founded and became chairman of the Party of Civic Understanding (Strana Občianskeho Porozumenia [SOP]), a leftist, pro-Western group opposing the rule of Vladimír Mečiar. In the elections of September 1998 his party won 8 percent of the vote and thirteen mandates, including one for himself. In December 1998 Schuster was reelected mayor of Košice, where he enjoyed high ratings. After the establishment of an anti-Mečiar coalition, Schuster stayed out of the government, demanding that the coalition put forward his candidacy for president. The new coalition—which included the SOP, the Slovak Democratic Coalition (Slovenská Demokratická Koalicie [SDK]), the Party of Hungarian Coalition (Magyar Koalíció Pártja, Strana Maďarskej Koalície [SMK]), and the Party of the Democratic Left (Strana Demokratickej L’avice [PDL’])—amended the constitution to allow for direct presidential elections. Despite his Communist past, Schuster became a candidate of the whole coalition and defeated Mečiar in the second round, winning 57 percent of the vote. Schuster was sworn into office on 15 June 1999. Using the consolidation of the nation as a pretext, Schuster undertook several controversial steps that showed his links to a Communist past and his leftist leanings. He quickly entered into conflict with rightist groups, especially when, during a serious illness in the summer of 2000, he accused the government of wanting to take over his position. After his term ended in June 2004, it was disclosed that Schuster had been a secret collaborator with Communist services. (PU)

SEIFERT Jaroslav (23 September 1901, Prague–10 January 1986, Prague), Czech poet. Born into a working-class family, Seifert attended high school but failed to finish and began to work as a journalist. In the 1920s

he joined the Communist Party of Czechoslovakia (CPC) and contributed to the Communist press and to avant-garde periodicals. In 1929, along with other leftist writers, Seifert signed a protest against the appointment of Klement Gottwald as head of the CPC; as a result, he was expelled from the party. In the 1930s he joined the Social Democratic Party and became an editor of Právo lidu. (During the Nazi occupation it was called Národní práce.) From 1945 to 1949 Seifert contributed to the daily Práce, and from 1946 to 1948 he edited the periodical Kytice. In 1946 he was elected a full member of the Czech Academy of Sciences and Arts. In the 1950s he came under attack from the supporters of Socialist realism, because of both his poetry and his views. Nevertheless, he received the Klement Gottwald State Prize (1955 and 1968) and was awarded the title of National Artist of Czechoslovakia (1966). During the Prague Spring Seifert became involved in public work, becoming chairman of the Union of Czech Writers in 1969. He held this post until 1970, when the union was dissolved by the authorities. He later retired from public life but maintained contacts with the cultural and political opposition and was one of the first signatories of Charter 77. In 1984 Seifert became the first Czech to win the Nobel Prize for Literature.

In 1921 Seifert published his first book of poetry, Město v slzách (City in tears). He was initially faithful to the principles of an avant-garde group called Devětsil, which promoted proletarian literature and social revolution. However, in his second volume of poetry, Samá láska (Nothing but love; 1923), he embraced pure poetry, and his third volume, Na vlnách TSF (On wireless waves; 1925), was the culmination of that tendency. His later collections—Slavík zpívá špatně (The nightingale sings poorly; 1926), Jablko z klína (An apple from the lap; 1933), and Ruce Venušiny (The hands of Venus; 1936)—were imbued with reflections and meditations on the passing of the world, commendations of the small gifts of life, and reminiscences of his childhood, and they also expressed national feelings. The poetic form also changed: numerous metaphors disappeared, while classical stanzaic forms and melodiousness became dominant. Seifert was faithful to this style in his subsequent volumes—Zhasněte světla (Turn off the lights; 1938), Vějíř Boženy Němcové (Božena Němcová's fan; 1940), and Kamenný most (The stone bridge; 1944). In the 1950s Seifert published two volumes of memoir lyrics. He was subsequently silenced for many years. Stalinist critics brutally attacked his poetry, stating that his works were pessimistic and did not conform to the tenets of Socialist realism. The final, most mature period of Seifert's writing lasted from the late 1960s to the beginning of the 1980s. At that time he published Koncert na ostrově (Concert on the island; 1965); Halleyova kometa (Halley's Comet; 1967); Odlévání zvonů (1967; The Casting of Bells, 1983); Morový sloup (1981; The Plague Column, 1979); Býti básníkem (To be a poet; 1983), and other volumes. Seifert's works increasingly contained confessions, memories, and motifs of death. He ever more often depicted contradictions of life and relativism. Seifert also wrote the collection of memoirs Všechny krásy světa (All the beauties of the world; Cologne, 1981; full Czech edition, 1993). (PU)

SELTER Karl (24 June 1898, Kapu–31 January 1958, Geneva), Estonian politician, diplomat, and business activist. Selter studied at Tartu University, initially medicine (1919–21) and then law, graduating in 1925. Until 1933 he worked in the national defense and justice departments and also ran a law practice. From October 1933 to May 1938 he served as minister of the economy. At that time the situation of Estonia improved for several reasons: an upturn in the economy, the successful policies implemented by Selter's predecessors, and the policy of state intervention pursued by Selter. The economic development was stimulated by the tax policy; by the state's support of production (at the end of the 1930s nearly 25 percent of Estonia's output was produced by state companies); and by Estonia's gaining of new markets (for example, in Germany) for its agricultural products.

In 1937 Selter became a deputy to the National Assembly, and in May 1938 he was appointed minister of foreign affairs. The problems he encountered were definitely impossible to solve in a way that would allow Estonia to survive as an independent state. Selter rejected Soviet proposed guarantees of independence for Estonia, put forward on the eve of the outbreak of the war in 1939, but then the defeat of Poland in September 1939 caused a dramatic change in Estonia's international situation. In May 1939 Selter attempted to base Estonia's security on the Third Reich and signed an Estonian-German non-aggression pact; however, these efforts proved unsuccessful because Hitler did not intend to get involved in defending the independence of Estonia. On 28 September 1939 Selter signed a treaty of mutual assistance with the Soviet government. This treaty—imposed on Estonia by the Kremlin—in fact meant the subordination of Estonia to the USSR, and it led to the collapse of the government of Kaarel Eenpalu and to Selter's resignation (12 October of that year). Selter was sent to Geneva, where he was appointed Estonia's ambassador to the League of Nations. This appointment saved his life because other members of the last prewar government of Estonia were murdered by the NKVD. During the occupation of Estonia by the Soviet Union and later by Nazi Germany, Selter maintained loose contacts with other Estonian diplomats. In 1946 he left Geneva, when he learned that the Western powers did not recognize his diplomatic status. After the war, Selter served as an informal representative of Estonia to the government of West Germany. (AG)

SEMERDZHIEV Atanas (21 May 1924, Lydzhen [now a quarter of Virshets]), Bulgarian Communist activist. In 1939 Semerdzhiev joined the Workers' Youth Union and in 1943 the Bulgarian Workers' Party, a legal cover for the Bulgarian Communist Party (BCP). From April 1942 he was a guerrilla fighter; from November 1943 he commanded a guerrilla detachment, Brat'a Krystnitsi (Godbrothers); and from July 1944 he commanded a detachment (and later brigade), Chepinets. After the coup of 9 September 1944 Semerdzhiev fought against the Germans. He graduated from high school in Pazardzhik in 1945 and returned to the army. He graduated from a military course in Sofia (1946), from the Mikhail Frunze Military Academy in Moscow (1950), and from the Kliment Voroshilov Academy of the Soviet General Staff (1960). From 1962 Semerdzhiev was chief of the General Staff of the Bulgarian People's Army, and in 1966–89 he was deputy minister of national defense. In 1962–66 he was a deputy member and then, until 1990, a member of the Central Committee of the BCP. From December 1989 to August 1990 he was minister of interior in the governments of Georgi Atanasov and Andrey Lukanov, and then he was vice-president (1 August 1990–22 January 1992). In July 1991 Semerdzhiev retired with the rank of general-colonel. After the BCP was transformed into the Bulgarian Socialist Party, he became a member of its Supreme Board (February–September 1990). A deputy to the National Assembly (1966–90) and to the Great National Assembly (June–August 1990), Semerdzhiev authored (among other works) I wsichki tse biakha obrekli: Spomeni (And everyone took an oath: Memoirs; 1985),

Lato '90: Pozharyt (Summer of 1990: The fire; 1996), and Prezhiviano to ne podlezhi na obzhalvane (What we survived cannot be a matter of an appeal; 1999). (JJ)

SENDOV Blagovest (8 February 1932, Asenovgrad), Bulgarian politician and mathematician. The son of a rich businessman, Sendov had great difficulties enrolling in higher education, but he graduated in mathematics from Sofia University (SU) in 1956. Later he chose a scholarly career. In 1964 he received a Ph.D. and three years later the second degree in mathematics at the Steklov Institute of Mathematics in Moscow. From 1974 he was a corresponding member and from 1981 a full member of the Bulgarian Academy of Sciences (BAS). In 1960–61 Sendov completed a specialization in numerical methods at Moscow University; in 1968 he did so in computer science in London. In 1956–58 he lectured in mathematics at SU; he was an assistant professor from 1958 to 1963, an associate professor from 1968, and a full professor from 1968. In 1967–70 he was chair of numerical methods and deputy director of the Institute of Mathematics at the BAS Computing Center. From 1970 to 1973 he was dean of the SU Department of Mathematics, and in 1973–79 he was the rector of SU. From 1980 he was deputy chairman and in 1988–91 he was chairman of the BAS. From 1991 to 1993 he headed the BAS Center of Informatics and Computer Technology, and later he worked there. In 1976–89 Sendov chaired the Committee for Science of the Council of Ministers and was the only MP not belonging to the Communist Party. In 1990 he refused to run, but from 1991 he sat in parliament again. In 1995–97 he was its speaker. In 1992 he ran for the presidency but lost. Sendov authored more than thirty textbooks and about two hundred scholarly works. (JJ)

ŠEPER Franjo (2 October 1905, Djakovo–30 December 1981, Rome), Croatian cardinal. The son of a tailor, Šeper finished high school in Zagreb and then studied in Rome, graduating from the Pontifical Gregorian University. In October 1930 he was ordained, and then he returned to Yugoslavia. In 1934 he became secretary to the coadjutor archbishop, and in 1937, secretary to Alojzije Stepinac, the diocesan bishop of Zagreb. After the fall and dismemberment of Yugoslavia in April 1941, Šeper helped Stjepinac to implement a complicated policy toward the Ustasha regime—among other things through the ostensible conversions of Serbs and Jews, who were persecuted by this regime, to Catholicism. When the Communists gained full power after World War II, the Catholic Church in Croatia was severely persecuted. In September 1946, following the arrest and trial of Archbishop Stjepinac, Šeper was sent to a parish in the provinces, and it was not until 1954 that he was allowed to return to Zagreb. On 21 September 1954 he was consecrated. In that very year he was also appointed coadjutor archbishop of Zagreb. After the death of Stjepinac in February 1960, Pope John XXIII appointed Šeper as a diocesan bishop. Taking advantage of the fact that the state had softened its atheistic stance and by using his negotiating talents, Šeper gradually rebuilt the Catholic organizations and the religious press. He also helped to reestablish diplomatic relations between the government of Josip Broz Tito and the Holy See. Šeper attended the Second Vatican Council. On 22 February 1965 Pope Paul VI elevated him to cardinal and in 1968 appointed him prefect of the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith. In this latter role, Šeper proved to be a defender of the traditional position of the Church on doctrinal issues. In 1978 he lifted the ban on the cult of the Divine Mercy, based on the visions of Sister Faustyna Kowalska. Šeper retired a few months before his death. (WR)

SERÉDI Jusztinián [originally György Szapucsek] (23 April 1884, Deáki [now in Slovakia]–29 March 1945, Esztergom), primate of Hungary. Serédi was born the tenth of eleven children into the family of a Slovak industrialist. In 1901, after completing six grades of a Catholic gymnasium in Pozsony (now Bratislava, Slovakia), he entered the Benedictine order in Pannonhalma, where he received the monastic name of Jusztinián. He graduated in theology from the University of St. Anselm, Rome. After earning a doctorate, he returned to Pannonhalma, where in July 1908 he was ordained a presbyter. In the fall of that year, though, he returned to Rome and became an associate of a canon law codification committee and a lecturer in canon law at the University of St. Anselm. In 1918 he became a military chaplain in Esztergom. After World War I, he again went to Rome. Serédi served as a procurator general of the Hungarian Benedictine order, a canon law counselor to the Hungarian legation in the Vatican, and a representative of the Hungarian dioceses at the Holy See. The nine-volume Codicis Juris Canonici Fontes (Sources of the new code of canon law) was the work of his life. In recognition of his achievements in the field of canon law, Oxford University awarded him an honorary doctorate in 1936.

On 30 November 1927 Pope Pius XI appointed Serédi archbishop of Esztergom, despite the fact that the Hungarian government had proposed Lajos Szmrecsányi, archbishop of Eger, as a candidate for that post. In December 1927 the Pope elevated Serédi to cardinal; thus he became head of the Hungarian Catholic Church. In 1928 he was elected director of the Hungarian Academy of Sciences, and in 1934 he became an honorary member of this academy. As a member of the upper house of parliament, in 1935 Serédi presented a bill on the abolition of obligatory civil marriages—in other words, on the recognition by the state of marriages celebrated by the Church. Serédi followed the position of Pope Pius XII on all issues concerning the extreme right wing. He defended constitutional law and protested against racism. When the Germans occupied Hungary in March 1944, he stood up in defense of the Jewish people, particularly Catholics of Jewish descent. After the Arrow Cross Party (led by Ferenc Szálasi) came to power in October 1944, Serédi, regarding Szálasi's government as illegal, refused to attend the swearing-in ceremony. (JT)

ŠEŠELJ Vojislav (10 November 1954, Sarajevo), nationalist Serb politician. Šešelj went to primary and secondary school in Sarajevo. At the age of seventeen he joined the League of Communists of Yugoslavia (LCY). Within two and a half years he graduated in law from Sarajevo University. At twenty-five he received a Ph.D. in political science, becoming the youngest Ph.D. recipient in Yugoslavia. In 1981 he was expelled from the LCY for his criticism of the Yugoslav system. In 1984 he was arrested and then sentenced to eight years in prison. He served in the Sarajevo and Zenica prisons, but only for twenty-two months. After his release he lived in Belgrade, where he became friends with Vuk Drašković. Šešelj was active in the St. Sava Society, which was transformed into an extreme nationalist party called the Renewal of the Serbian Nation. On 14 March 1990 Šešelj and Drašković founded the Serbian Renewal Movement (Srpski Pokret Obnove [SPO]), chaired by Drašković, but just two weeks after it was founded, Šešelj left it to form the Serbian Radical Party (Srpska Radikalna Stranka [SRS]). In 1991 he was elected to the Serbian parliament from Rakovica. At the end of 1992 the SRS became one of the leading political powers in Serbia. Šešelj advocated a Greater Serbia, attracting attention by his shocking and offensive statements (for example, he encouraged “killing Croats with rusty spoons” and threatened to blow up a Slovene nuclear power plant). In December 1994 he was sentenced to thirty years of house arrest for his conduct in the Serbian parliament. In 1993 he criticized Slobodan Milošević for supporting the Vance and Owen peace plan for Bosnia-Herzegovina and for closing the border between the new Yugoslavia and the self-proclaimed Bosnian Serbian Republic. In 1994 Šešelj had to dissolve the paramilitary Chetnik Movement, formed in 1991 and accused of war crimes in Croatia and Bosnia-Herzegovina. When Milošević accepted the Dayton Agreement, Šešelj called him a traitor. In March 1998 the SRS entered into a coalition with Milošević’s Socialist Party of Serbia. As a result, on 24 March 1998 Šešelj became deputy prime minister of Serbia. He supported Milošević during the NATO air raids on Yugoslavia.

Šešelj ran for president of Serbia several times. In September 1997 he defeated Zoran Lilić, but because of a low turnout, the election was not recognized as valid. In December 1997 Šešelj lost to Milan Milutinović. Supported by Milošević (then already in prison in The Hague), in September 2002 Šešelj came in third, but the results were again found invalid. In February 2003 he went to The Hague, where he voluntarily appeared before the International Tribunal for War Crimes in Former Yugoslavia, pleading not guilty to “extermination, murder, torture, and forced ethnic cleansing.” Šešelj authored several works, including Disidentski spomenar (A dissident’s diary; 1991) and Sumrak iluzija (The end of illusions; 1991). SEYDA Marian (7 July 1879, Poznań–17 May 1967, Buenos Aires, Argentina), Polish politician. Seyda was the brother of Władysław Seyda (1863–1939), who was also a National Democratic politician. In 1900, Seyda joined the National League (Liga Narodowa). He was one of its leaders in the Prussian partition, representing that territory in the Central Committee of the league. In 1906 he became the founding editor of Kurier Poznański. He advocated firm Polish resistance to German rule. During World War I Seyda became active abroad. In 1915–17 he served as secretary general and political director of the Central Press Agency in Lausanne, Switzerland; the agency was tied to the Polish National Committee (Komitet Narodowy Polski [KNP]) in Paris. From 1917 through 1918 he served on the KNP. In 1919, after Poland regained its independence, he served as an expert with the Polish delegation to the Paris Peace Conference. From 1919 to 1927, Seyda was an MP representing the Popular National Union (Związek Ludowo-Narodowy). He was also appointed foreign minister in the government of Wincenty Witos (May–October 1923). In 1928 and 1930, he was elected to the Senate from the National Democratic lists. By the end of the 1930s his influence in the National Party (Stronnictwo Narodowe [SN]) had waned because of the radicalization of the younger generation of nationalist activists, while Seyda was considered a part of the liberal part of the movement, the so-called “old group.”

During World War II, Seyda was active in exile in France and England. He represented the SN in the National Council, which was a multiparty advisory body for the president and government of the Polish Republic in exile. From October 1939 to June 1940, he served as minister without portfolio; from January 1942, as minister of justice; and from November 1944, as minister for peace congress affairs in the governments of General Władysław Sikorski and (after July 1943) Stanisław Mikołajczyk. During the crisis triggered by the signing of a Polish-Soviet treaty by General Sikorski in July 1941, Seyda initially resigned from his post. However, in October 1941, at the general’s insistence, he returned to the government. Since his party objected to his return, he was duly expelled from the SN. As a cabinet member, Seyda opposed further concessions to Stalin. In particular, he objected to Soviet claims against Poland’s Eastern Borderlands. He argued that Stalin’s aim was to enslave Poland completely and not to compromise. After the war, Seyda emigrated to Argentina. He was active in émigré circles and published in the nationalist press. In the early 1950s, along with Tytus Komarnicki, he attempted to coordinate the activities of the émigré nationalists in the United States. Seyda authored (among other works) Territoires polonaises sous la domination prussienne (Polish territories under Prussian occupation; 1918) and two volumes of memoirs, Polska na przełomie dziejów (Poland at the breaking point of history; 1927–31). SHANDRUK Pavlo (28 February 1889, Borsuky, Kremenets County–15 February 1979, Trenton, New Jersey), Ukrainian general. A graduate of the Prince A. Bezborodko Institute (1911) and the Alexander Military School in Moscow (1913), Shandruk fought in the Russian Army and was promoted to staff captain. In 1917 he joined the army of the Ukrainian National Republic, becoming commander of a brigade with the rank of lieutenant general in April 1920. After the Bolsheviks occupied Kiev, Shandruk settled in Poland at the end of 1920. He edited the historical periodical Tabor and worked with the Military Historical Bureau and the Military-Scientific Publishing Institute. He co-authored Polska Encyklopedia Wojskowa (Polish military encyclopedia; 1934). A contract officer in the Polish Army, Shandruk served in the Twenty-sixth Infantry Division with the rank of major from 1936 onwards. He fought in the Polish September campaign of 1939 against Germany. He distinguished himself in the battles of the Twenty-ninth Infantry Brigade. He was wounded and taken prisoner but was released thanks to the intervention of Andriy Livytskyi. Arrested by the Gestapo, Shandruk was released after he promised to collaborate with the Roland Battalion, which fought alongside the Wehrmacht against the Red Army in the summer of 1941. After one month, Shandruk retired and took a job in a cinema house in Skierniewice, Poland. In November 1944 Livytskyi brought Shandruk to Berlin, where he was to co-organize the Ukrainian Army. In 1945 Shandruk became chairman of the Ukrainian National Committee and commander-in-chief of the Ukrainian National Army. He saved many former soldiers of the SS Halychyna Division from arrest by the Soviet authorities. In 1949 he emigrated to the United States. Shandruk published his memoirs, Arms in Valor (1959). SHANTYR Fabiyan (4 February 1887, Kapył, near Slutsk–spring of 1920), Belorussian writer, journalist, and politician. Born into the family of a bricklayer, Shantyr entered politics during the 1905 revolution, when he took part in demonstrations, as a result of which he spent two years in prison in Slutsk. He began writing in 1909, publishing articles in the periodical Nasha Niva. He authored the sentimental-romantic stories "Zakhar, Noch" (Night),

"Smerts ubohaha" (Death of a poor man), "Pad shum lesu, Sviaty Bozha" (O Holy God), "U vialiki dzen" (On a great day), "Da dumak" (For reflection), "Sanet" (Sonnet), and "U chas baratsby" (In the time of struggle). In his journalism Shantyr paid particular attention to the role of education in the development of the nation and the shaping of Belorussian national identity. Mobilized into the Russian Army in 1914, Shantyr fought in the defense of a hospital in Bobruysk. He was active in the Belorussian Committee for Aid to War Victims and in a society called Belorussian Cottage. In March 1917 he attended the First Congress of Belorussian Parties and Organizations, becoming a member of the Belorussian National Committee, which served as the executive organ of this congress. He was the leader of the leftist faction of the Belorussian Socialist Hromada and attended the First All-Belorussian Congress in December 1917. In 1918 Shantyr chose the pro-Soviet orientation. In January 1919 he became commissar in the Bolshevik-established Provisional Revolutionary Workers' and Peasants' Government of the Belorussian SSR. After the fall of this government, he joined the Editorial Commission of the Central Committee of the Communist Party (Bolshevik) of Belorussia and worked as editor of the newspaper Savetskaya Belarus. As commissar for nationality affairs of the Belorussian SSR, Shantyr protested the exploitation of national feelings by the Bolsheviks. In February 1920 Shantyr was mobilized into the Red Army. A few months later he was accused of nationalism and counterrevolutionary activities, sentenced to death, and executed. His wife, Ludwika Siwicka (pseudonym "Zośka Wieras"), was a well-known writer. SHAPOVAL Mykyta (8 June 1882, Sriblianka, Yekaterinoslav Province–25 February 1932, Řevnice, near Prague, Czechoslovakia), Ukrainian political scientist, sociologist, and poet. Shapoval was born into a peasant family. His brother Mykola was a general in the army of the Ukrainian National Republic (UNR) and then a leader of the Ukrainian émigré community in France. Shapoval graduated from a forestry school in Novyi Glukhov, near Kharkov (Kharkiv), in 1900. In 1901 he joined the Ukrainian Revolutionary Party. From 1903 to 1906 he attended an infantry officer training school in Chuguyev, Russia. Expelled from the army for his revolutionary activities in 1906, he was held in the Warsaw Citadel for eight months. From 1908 to 1909 Shapoval studied at the university in Kharkov but never graduated. In 1909–14 in Kiev he co-edited Ukrayinska khata, a periodical that served as a tribune for the upcoming revolution. He also published the poetry collections Sny viry (Dreams of faith; 1908) and Samotnist (Loneliness; 1910). In 1917, along with Mykhailo Hrushevskyyi, Shapoval co-established the Ukrainian Party of Socialist Revolutionaries (UPSR). He represented this party in the Ukrainian Central Council (Rada) and in the so-called Small Rada, the executive organ of the Central Rada. After the Third Universal Declaration of the Ukrainian Central Rada was issued in November 1917, Shapoval became a member of the General Secretariat (Ukrainian government), in which he was responsible for the departments of post and telegraphs. In January 1918 he co-edited the Ukrainian Central Rada's Fourth Universal, which declared the UNR independent from Russia. In late 1918 and early 1919 Shapoval also served as a member of the All-Russian Assembly and the Ukrainian Constituent Assembly. He was in opposition to the government of Hetman Pavlo Skoropadskyyi. In November and December 1918 he was involved with the Ukrainian National Union, which led an anti-hetman uprising.

From December 1918 to February 1919, as minister of agriculture in the government of Volodymir Chekhivskyyi Shapoval drafted decrees on agricultural reform. These decrees, issued on 7–8 January 1919, were a Socialist Revolutionary (SR) alternative to the Bolshevik program. However, Shapoval's program was not implemented because of Bolshevik attacks and also because the government sought support from the Entente states; therefore, Shapoval left Ukraine. Shapoval believed that there was a need for a world revolution led by the Socialist Revolutionaries, and in the spring of 1919 he agitated in favor of such a revolution in Eastern Galicia. Expelled from there, he went to the Hungarian Soviet Republic (HSR). In October 1919, after the collapse of the HSR, he arrived in Prague, where he spent the rest of his life. In the autumn of 1920 Shapoval established the so-called foreign committee of the UPSR, and until the end of his life he was an indisputable leader of the SR circles in the émigré community, especially after his rival Hrushevskyyi returned to Ukraine in 1924. In 1922–28 Shapoval edited Nova Ukrayina, a party monthly in which he attempted to theoretically justify the need for an SR revolution. He foresaw revolutionary cooperation among the different nationalities of Russia against Bolshevik rule. In 1927, along with Russian, Belorussian, and Armenian Socialists, Shapoval co-established the Socialist League of the New East. In the 1920s he worked closely with Czechoslovak authorities, which helped Ukrainian émigrés. From 1921 to 1925 Shapoval presided over the Ukrainian Civic Committee. He was in fierce conflict with representatives of the pro-Petlura part of the émigré community, which had a dominant position in the Ukrainian Free University. Shapoval devoted his polemic work Lakhomania (1929) to the pro-Polish attitude of this group. In 1924 Shapoval founded the Ukrainian Sociological Institute, a center for sociological studies that was an alternative to the Ukrainian Free University. Shapoval's publications include the following: Revoliutsiynyi sotsializm na Ukraini (Revolutionary socialism in Ukraine; 1921); Svitova revoliutsiia: Rosiia i Ukraina (World revolution: Russia and Ukraine; 1921); Problema demokratii u T. G. Masaryka (T. G. Masaryk and the problem of democracy; 1925); Stara i nova Ukraina (The old and the new Ukraine; 1925); Natsionalna sprava na Skhodi Ievropy (National issues in Eastern Europe; 1928); Zahalna sotsiologiia (General sociology; 1929); Systema suspilnykh nauk i sotsiografiia (Social sciences and sociography; 1931); Sotsiografiia Ukrainy (Sociography of Ukraine; 1933); and Sotsiologiia ukraiinskoho vidrodzhennia (Sociology of the Ukrainian renaissance; 1936). SHARAYEVSKYI Nestor (1865, near Chyhyryn–29 October 1929, Kiev), archbishop of the Ukrainian Autocephalous Orthodox Church. Sharayevskyyi graduated from the Kiev Theological Academy in 1890 and was ordained into the priesthood in 1891. He subsequently taught law at a gymnasium in Vinnytsia. In 1917 he was appointed a delegate of the clergy to the Ukrainian Central Council (Rada). At that time, along with Archbishop Vasyl Lypkivskyyi, Sharayevskyyi organized the All-Ukrainian Orthodox Church Council and began to lay the foundations of the Ukrainian Autocephalous Orthodox Church. After the Bolsheviks captured Kiev, Sharayevskyyi was appointed archbishop and deputy to the metropolitan of Kiev in 1921. He also served as a member of the Presidium of the All-Ukrainian Orthodox Church Council and chairman of its commission for the translation of liturgical texts into Ukrainian. Although he was persecuted in various ways by the Bolshevik authorities in the 1920s, Sharayevskyyi was the only hierarch of the autocephalous Orthodox Church in the Ukraine to die a natural death. SHARETSKY Syamyon (23 September 1936, Lavrush-evo, near Nowogródek [now Navahrudak]), Belorussian politician. After graduating from the Belorussian Agricultural Academy in 1959, Sharetsky became chairman of a collective farm (kolkhoz). In 1970 he graduated from the Higher Party School of the Central Committee of the Communist Party of Belorussia, and subsequently he became head of the school's Department of Economics and Organization of Agricultural Production. In 1984 he received a Ph.D. in economics, and in 1989 he became a professor. From 1984 to 1993 Sharetsky was chairman of a collective farm in the region of Valozhyn. In 1993 he was appointed adviser to Vyacheslav Kebich, prime minister of the Republic of Belarus, and in 1994 he became chairman of the Agrarian Party, which was to support Kebich in the presidential elections. In 1995 Sharetsky was elected deputy to the Supreme Soviet, and on 10 January 1996 he became speaker of the parliament. President Alyaksandr Lukashenka's attempt to subordinate the Supreme Soviet led to a sharp dispute over the delimitation of authority between the legislative and executive branches. In April and May 1996 the crisis came to a head, but despite street demonstrations, Lukashenka managed to control the situation. When in the summer of 1996 Lukashenka proposed a referendum on constitutional changes, the opposition organized new demonstrations, and Sharetsky issued a statement declaring Lukashenka's step as the beginning of dictatorship. The Supreme Soviet approved a plan to abolish the office of president, but Lukashenka rallied the support of the police and military, as well as manipulating the crowds. Thanks to the mediation of the Russian prime minister, Viktor Chernomyrdin, a meeting between Sharetsky and Lukashenka on 21 November 1996 brought an apparent compromise, whereby an agreement was reached for a referendum and a decision was made to convene a Constitutional Assembly composed in equal parts of representatives of the Supreme Soviet and presidential appointees. This compromise was in fact a victory for Lukashenka. The referendum, held at the end of November, allowed Lukashenka to introduce a new constitution, as a result of which Sharetsky was de facto sidelined. Although Sharetsky still held the post of speaker of the Supreme Soviet, this body was not recognized by Lukashenka, who, under the terms of the new constitution, was able to establish his own parliament. On 21 July 1999 the deputies to the Soviet, who remained faithful to the 1994 constitution, proclaimed Sharetsky acting president of Belarus. Fearing for his safety, Sharetsky fled to Lithuania and thence to the United States in 2000. (EM)

SHCHERBYTSKYI Volodymyr (17 February 1918, Verkhnodniprovsk, Yekaterinoslav [now Dnipropetrovsk] region—16 February 1990, Kiev), Soviet Communist activist of Ukrainian descent. In 1941 Shcherbytskyi graduated from the Mechanical Department of the Dnipropetrovsk Chemical Technology Institute. During World War II he studied at the Chemical Troops Academy and served in the army near Moscow and in the Caucasus. Demobilized, he worked in a coking and chemical plant, becoming secretary of the Communist Party committee in 1946. Rising steadily through the party ranks, Shcherbytskyi became first secretary (1955–57) of the Dnipropetrovsk District Committee of the Communist Party of Ukraine (Komunistychna Partiya Ukrayiny [CPU]). In 1955 he became deputy to the Supreme Soviet of the Ukrainian SSR; in 1958, deputy to the Supreme Soviet of the Soviet Union; and in 1972, a member of the presidia of these Soviets. In 1957 Shcherbytskyi became a member of the Presidium of the Central Committee (CC) of the CPU and secretary of the CPU CC. From 1961 to 1963 he served as prime minister of the Ukrainian SSR and deputy member of the Presidium of the CC of the CPSU. Shcherbytskyi was dismissed from these positions by Nikita Khrushchev after he had opposed Khrushchev's idea to divide party committees into industrial and rural ones. From 1963 to 1965 Shcherbytskyi served as first secretary of the Dnipropetrovsk District Party Committee.

After Khrushchev was removed from power, Shcherbytskyi—owing to his good relations with Leonid Brezhnev—again became prime minister of the Ukrainian SSR (1965), and then he was named a member of the CPU CC Politburo (1966) and a member of the CPSU CC Politburo (1971). A member of the so-called Dnepropetrovsk clan, which played a decisive role in the Soviet Union during Brezhnev's rule, Shcherbytskyi was instrumental in the removal of Petro Shelest as first secretary of the CPU CC, and in May 1972 he replaced Shelest in that position. Shcherbytskyi is blamed for purging the party and government apparatus of people who supported a policy line relatively autonomous from Moscow. He endorsed the brutal repression of dissidents and intensified the Russification of Ukraine. On his initiative, Russian was used at official conferences and meetings. After the death of Yuri Andropov in February 1984, Shcherbytskyi supported Konstantin Chernenko's candidacy for head of the CPSU. After the nuclear power station accident at Chernobyl on 26 April 1986, Shcherbytskyi concealed from the Ukrainian people the true extent of the catastrophe; as a result, he exposed millions of people to unnecessary radiation. During perestroika he attempted to halt democratization processes in Ukraine. Shcherbytskyi retired in September 1989, shortly after a meeting of the People's Movement of Ukraine for Reconstruction, the first legal mass opposition organization. (BB)

SHEHU Mehmet (10 January 1913, Çorrush, Mallakastër–17 December 1981, Tirana), Albanian Communist politician. The son of a Muslim clergyman, Shehu graduated from the American Vocational School in Tirana in 1932. He also attended a military school in Naples but was expelled for anti-Fascist activities. He returned to Albania and enrolled in the officer training school in Tirana, from which he graduated with the rank of lieutenant. In 1936 he went to Spain, where he took part in the civil war, fighting in the Garibaldi International Brigade. After several weeks he became a commander of its Fourth Battalion. In 1937 Shehu joined the Communist Party of Spain. After the war he was interned in France (1939–42). In August 1942 he was transported to Tirana, where he was confined in a local detention house for a short time. After his release Shehu joined the Communist partisans and became a member of the party leadership in the region of Vlorë. In 1943 he was appointed commander of the First Partisan Brigade, and in November 1944 he became a major general. From September 1945 to August 1946 Shehu was in Moscow, where he graduated from the Kliment Voroshilov Military Academy. After his return to Albania, he was appointed chief of the General Staff of the Albanian Army. In February 1948, as a supporter of Enver Hoxha, Shehu was temporarily removed from the post of chief of staff and from the CC of the Albanian Labor Party (ALP). Between February and June 1948 he remained under the close surveillance of security authorities. After the conflict between Stalin and Josip Broz Tito and following the dismissal of Koci Xoxe (a supporter of integration of Albania with Yugoslavia), Shehu was appointed minister of interior. Soon afterwards, he also became deputy prime minister, a member of the ALP CC Politburo, and secretary of the ALP CC. From 20 July 1954 until his death Shehu was prime minister, and from 1974 to 1980 he also served as minister of national defense.

The closest co-worker of Hoxha, Shehu co-founded and co-implemented the most extreme line of the party, both on the international level and at home. He took an active part in all repressive actions and purges, which regularly swept the Albanian party. He became famous for saying that he had only one answer for people who did not support the leadership of the party: “A fist in the face and a bullet to the head.” Shehu applied this rule in practice. In 1950, for example, he shot dead an activist who had criticized the Kremlin at a meeting of the CC. After Albania's split with Beijing, Shehu wanted to slightly normalize relations with Western Europe. Perhaps this was the reason for a conflict that ensued between him and Hoxha. On 18 December 1981 the Albanian news agency announced that Shehu had “committed suicide.” In fact, the previous day he had been shot dead at a meeting of the top leadership of the party. Shehu's name was soon removed from official publications, and his family was persecuted. (WR)

SHELEST Petro (14 February 1908, Andriyivka, Kharkov [Kharkiv] Province–22 January 1996, Moscow), Soviet Communist activist of Ukrainian descent. In 1923 Shelest took a job as a workman on the railways. In 1927 he went to a party school and became head of a Komsomol regional committee. In 1928 he joined the Communist Party (Bolshevik) of Ukraine (Komunistychna Partiya (Bilshovykiv) Ukrainy [CP(B)U]). Shelest was sent to study at Artem Communist University in Kharkov and then the Engineering and Economics Institute in Kharkov. From 1932 to 1936 he worked for a metallurgical conglomerate in Mariupol. After doing his military service (1935–37), he worked in Kharkov's Hammer and Sickle factory. In 1940 Shelest became secretary of the Kharkov municipal party committee for defense industries. During the German-Soviet war he worked as head of the defense industry department of the Chelyabinsk district party committee. He later held a variety of positions, including those of instructor at the Central Committee (CC) of the All-Union Communist Party (Bolsheviks), head of party organizations in the factories of Saratov, and deputy secretary of the Saratov district party committee for defense production. From 1948 to 1954 Shelest worked as a plant director in Leningrad and Kiev. In 1954 he became second secretary of the Kiev municipal party committee and a member of the CC of the Communist Party of Ukraine (Komunistychna Partiya Ukrainy [CPU]); in February 1957 he became first secretary of the Kiev district party committee; in August 1962, secretary of the CC; and in December 1962, head of the CPU CC Bureau for Industry and Construction.

A protégé of Nikita Khrushchev and Nikolay Podgorny, Shelest rose to the position of first secretary of the CPU CC in July 1963, and then he was elected a member of the Presidium of the Ukrainian Supreme Soviet. In October 1964, along with Podgorny, Shelest played an important role in removing Khrushchev from power. In 1966 he became a member of the CPSU CC Politburo, and then he was elected to the Presidium of the Supreme Soviet of the Soviet Union and to the CPU CC Politburo. In the mid-1960s Shelest started the persecution of Ukrainian dissidents. Fearing that the influence of the Prague Spring might filter into Ukraine, he supported the Soviet intervention in Czechoslovakia in 1968. At the same time, considering mainly the interests of the Ukrainian party elites, he pressed for greater autonomy (mainly economic) for Ukraine as a union republic. In the field of culture, Shelest pursued policies that supported a limited Ukrainization. In his book Ukraino Nasha Radianska (Our Soviet Ukraine; 1970), he referred to Cossack war traditions; as a result, he was attacked by his opponents for displaying “Ukrainian bourgeois nationalism.” This book was sent to a paper mill, and Shelest was sharply criticized in Moscow. On 10 May 1972 Shelest was removed as first secretary of the CPU CC “owing to his transfer to another position,” that of deputy prime minister of the Soviet Union. He was also expelled from the Presidium of the Supreme Soviet of the USSR and from the Presidium of the Supreme Soviet of the Ukrainian SSR. In April 1973 Shelest was expelled from the CPSU CC Politburo for “health reasons” and forced to retire. He also lost his post in the Soviet government. From 1974 to 1985 Shelest worked as a director of a research and production design bureau at an aviation works near Moscow. In 1995, after a dozen or so years of silence, he published his memoirs, Da ne sudimy budete: Dnevnikovyie zapisi, vospominaniia chlena Politbiuro TsK KPSS (You will not be judged: Daily notes and memoirs of a member of the CPSU CC Politburo). In 1996 the urn with Shelest’s ashes was brought to Ukraine and buried in one of Kiev’s cemeteries. (BB)

SHEPTYTSKYI Andriy [original name Roman] (29 July 1865, Przyłbice [Prylbychi], near Jaworów [Yavoriv]–1 November 1944, Lviv), Ukrainian clergyman and national activist, metropolitan of the Ukrainian Greek Catholic Church. Born into a Ruthenian aristocratic family that had become Polonized in the eighteenth century, Sheptytskyi was the grandson of the dramatist Aleksander Fredro and the brother of Stanisław Szeptycki, a general in the Polish Army. After graduating from St. Anna Gymnasium in Kraków in 1883, Sheptytskyi served in the army for some time but was discharged for health reasons. He subsequently studied law at the universities in Kraków and Breslau (now Wrocław, Poland). In 1887 he traveled to Russia and Ukraine. In 1888 he earned a doctorate in law, and then he entered the monastery of the Order of Saint Basil in Dobromil (Dobromyl) and took the monastic name of Andriy. Sheptytskyi took holy orders in 1892 in Przemyśl. From 1892 to 1896 he was master of novices in Dobromil, and in 1896 he became hegumen (superior) of St. Onuphrius Monastery in Lemberg (Lviv, Lwów). In 1899 Pope Leo XIII named Sheptytskyi bishop of Stanisławów (now Ivano-Frankivsk, Ukraine) and in 1900 elevated him to the position of metropolitan of the Ukrainian Greek Catholic Church. He was ceremoniously installed in office on 17 January 1901.

From the beginning of his time in office Sheptytskyi was devoted to Ukrainian national life. In 1901 he supported the secession of Ukrainian students from the University of Lemberg; in 1902 he called for the establishment of a Ukrainian gymnasium in Stanisławów; and in 1903 he founded the People’s Infirmary, which became transformed into a modern hospital in 1930–38. In 1905 Sheptytskyi founded a church museum. Thanks to his financial support, a building was bought for the art school of Oleksyi Novakivskyi, one of the greatest Ukrainian painters in the first half of the twentieth century. He sponsored scholarships for Ukrainian artists, enabling them to study at the best European universities. Sheptytskyi served as an MP in the Galician Provincial Diet (1901–14) and was a member of the Austrian House of Lords (1903–14). In 1906 he headed a delegation that presented demands to Emperor Francis Joseph that the Ukrainian people be given rights equal to those of other nations in the empire. In 1910 at a session of the House of Lords of the parliament in Vienna Sheptytskyi called for the establishment of a Ukrainian university in Lemberg. In the same year he initiated the establishment of the Land Bank (Zemelnyi Bank) in Lemberg. Thanks to his financial support, a seminary was built in Lemberg and the library of the Stanisławów chapter was founded. In 1901 Sheptytskyi established the St. Theodore the Studite monastic order, and in 1913 he invited the Redemptorist order to Galicia. Sheptytskyi was also greatly involved in ecumenical work. In 1907 and 1912 he made two visits to Russia. He founded the Russian Catholic Church of the Eastern Rite and created the vicariate apostolic for Eastern Rite Catholics in Bosnia. As a result of his efforts, the Pope appointed a bishop for the Uniates in the United States (1907) and Canada (1912). In 1907 and 1909 Sheptytskyi presided over the First and Second Ecumenical Congresses in Velehrad. In 1910 he attended the Eucharistic Congress in Montreal. He established a new eastern branch of the Benedictine order in Belgium.

After the Russian Army seized Galicia, Sheptytskyi was arrested on 18 September 1914 and then deported, first to Kiev and then into the depths of Russia. He was released after the February 1917 revolution. In March in Petrograd he convoked a synod of the Russian Catholic Church of the Eastern Rite and appointed Reverend Leonid Fyodorov exarch for the Catholics of the Byzantine rite in Russia. During his stay in Kiev Sheptytskyi appointed Reverend Mykhailo Tsehelskyi exarch for the Catholics of the Byzantine rite in Ukraine. In September 1917 Sheptytskyi returned to Lemberg, where he became a member of the Ukrainian National Council of the Western Ukrainian National Republic (Ukraińska Natsionalna Rada Zakhidno-Ukraińskoy Narodnoy Respubliki [ZUNR]) in October 1918. During the Polish-Ukrainian war (1918–19) Sheptytskyi was interned by the Polish authorities. In December 1920 he went to Rome and thence to visit the Ukrainian communities in North and South America. After returning to Poland in 1923, he was interned in Poznań. Thanks to the intervention of Pope Pius XI and after Sheptytskyi had declared loyalty to the Polish state, he was released. He returned to Lwów. On his initiative the Lwów Greek Catholic Academy (Lvivska Hreko-Katolytska Akademiia) was founded in 1928, the Theological Scholarly Society (Bohoslovske Naukove Tovarystvo) in 1929, and the Ukrainian Catholic Institute for Church Unification (Ukraińskyy Katolytskyi Instytut Tserkovnoho Zyednannya) in 1939. In 1930 Sheptytskyi condemned Polish reprisals in connection with a pacification campaign against Ukrainian villages in Eastern Galicia. In 1933, along with other bishops, he issued an address condemning the Soviet government for orchestrating an artificial famine in the Ukrainian SSR. In 1938 he issued a letter protesting the persecution of the Orthodox population in Volhynia and the Chełm region and condemning the destruction of Orthodox churches. He supported the work of the Ukrainian National Democratic Alliance and abandoned the idea of establishing an independent Ukrainian state.

After the Red Army seized Galicia in September 1939, Sheptytskyi secretly consecrated Josyf Slipyi, the rector of a seminary, as his successor. In October 1939 he appointed exarchs for the Catholics of the Byzantine rite in Volhynia and the Pripet Marshes and also in Russia and Siberia. After the outbreak of the German-Soviet war in 1941, Sheptytskyi issued a proclamation greeting the German units. However, he soon realized his error, and in a letter to Pope Pius XII he described the German rule as “evil, almost devilish.” Sheptytskyi supported the establishment of a government and the restoration of Ukrainian statehood by the Bandera faction of the Organization of Ukrainian Nationalists (OUN), but he dissociated himself from organizations that collaborated with the Germans. In 1941 he became head of the Ukrainian National Council (Ukraińska Natsionalna Rada), and in 1944, head of the All-Ukrainian National Council (Vseukraińska Natsionalna Rada). In 1943 Sheptytskyi appointed chaplains for pastoral ministry in the SS Galizien Division. In a letter to Heinrich Himmler, Sheptytskyi protested the extermination of the Jewish population. He himself provided shelter to Jewish people and exhorted Greek Catholic monasteries to do the same. In November 1942 Sheptytskyi issued the pastoral letter “Ne Ubyi” (Thou shalt not kill), in which he threatened excommunication to those who organized or committed the crime of killing. Sheptytskyi was one of the initiators of Polish-Ukrainian talks (1943–44), but they were unsuccessful. Sheptytskyi died in the archbishop’s palace and was buried in the crypt of St. George’s Cathedral in Lviv. (BB)

SHEPTYTSKYI Kliment [original name Kazimierz] (17 November 1869, Przyłbice [Prylbychi], near Jaworów [Yavoriv]–1 May 1951, Vladimir, Russia), archimandrite of the Ukrainian Greek Catholic Church, martyr for the faith. Born into a well-known aristocratic family, Sheptytskyi was the younger brother of Archbishop Andriy Sheptytskyi and General Stanisław Szeptycki. He gave up a promising secular career and in 1911 entered the monastery of St. Theodore the Studite. He completed his theological studies in Innsbruck. In August 1915 he was ordained a Catholic priest of the Eastern rite. During the interwar period Sheptytskyi served as hegumen (superior) of the Studite monastery. On 9 October 1939 his brother Andriy named him a Uniate exarch for Ruthenia and Siberia. When the Soviet authorities were withdrawing from Lviv in June 1941, Sheptytskyi barely escaped execution by the NKVD. In 1944 he was elevated to archimandrite (head of a monastery). During the Nazi occupation he provided shelter to the Jewish people, including the son of the chief rabbi of Lviv. In December 1944, after the death of his brother Andriy, Sheptytskyi headed a delegation of the Ukrainian Greek Catholic Church sent by Archbishop Josyf Slipyi to Moscow, where the delegation presented a letter to Stalin and the Soviet authorities. In this letter, the archbishop expressed gratitude for the liberation of Ukraine from German occupation and conveyed hopes for good relations between the Uniate Church and the Soviet state. After the arrest of nearly all Ukrainian Greek Catholic bishops in April 1945, Sheptytskyi and some sixty other priests signed a protest letter to the Soviet government. In March 1946 the Kremlin abolished the Ukrainian Greek Catholic Church and allowed the Orthodox Church to take over its churches. More and more of Sheptytskyi's co-workers were arrested. Sheptytskyi became the de facto leader of all the priests and monks who had not yet been arrested. In January 1946 he was forcibly deported to the monastery in Univ. Arrested by the NKVD on 5 June 1947, he was sentenced to eight years in a forced labor camp. He died in the Vladimir prison. The year 1958 is also given as the date of his death. On 27 June 2001 Pope John Paul II beatified Sheptytskyi at a solemn Holy Mass in Lviv. (WR)

SHISHMANOV Dimitur (19 November 1889, Sofia–2 February 1945, Sofia), Bulgarian politician, diplomat, playwright, and journalist. Shishmanov was the son of Ivan Shishmanov; his mother, Lidia, was the daughter of the Ukrainian historian Mykhailo Drahomanov. In 1913 Shishmanov completed law studies in Geneva. From 1914 to 1919 he served in the intelligence service. In 1919 he entered the diplomatic service. He initially represented Bulgaria in international organizations, as a result of which he had an opportunity to travel extensively and tour Europe. This experience is reflected in his literary works, including the novel Buntovnik (Rebel; 1912) and the drama Koshmar (Nightmare; 1927). Shishmanov was a department head in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs (1932–35), Bulgaria's envoy to Athens (1935–40), and chief secretary of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs (March 1940–October 1943). From October 1943 to June 1944 he served as minister of foreign affairs. His time in office coincided with the death of Tsar Boris III. Despite an imminent breakthrough in war operations, the Ministry of Foreign Affairs under his leadership worked sluggishly, and some of its key decisions were made without his knowledge. Bulgaria was seen by Western countries as an ally of the Axis powers. Negotiations led by Bulgarian representatives in Turkey in late 1943 and early 1944 made it clear to England and the United States that Bulgaria was not going to unilaterally withdraw from the war without the Allies' guarantees of military assistance. The position of the government in Sofia on giving up territories gained by Bulgaria with Germany's consent after 1941 was also ambiguous. After the coup of 9 September 1944 and the occupation of Bulgaria by the Red Army, Shishmanov was arrested. He was initially sent to the Soviet Union, but in December 1944 he was handed over to Bulgaria, brought before the court, and, along with other members of the prewar Bulgarian elite, executed by firing squad. Shishmanov's Pisma do men samiya (Letters to myself) were published in 1995. (AG)

SHISHMANOV Ivan (22 June 1862, Svishtov–23 June 1928, Oslo, Norway), Bulgarian ethnographer, philologist, and diplomat. After graduating from a pedagogical school in Vienna, Shishmanov studied philosophy and philology in Jena, Geneva, and Leipzig (1888). He fought as a volunteer in the war against Serbia in 1885. After returning to Bulgaria, he co-founded the Bulgarian Higher School (the future Sofia University), where he taught general history. From 1889 to 1894 Shishmanov worked in the Ministry of National Education. As minister of education (May 1903–March 1907), he greatly contributed to the establishment of the National Theater, state music and art schools, and the Museum of Ethnography. Head of the Department of History and Comparative Literature at Sofia University and dean of the History Department, Shishmanov served as minister plenipotentiary to Ukraine (1918–19) and president of the Bulgarian PEN Club (from 1926). Shishmanov's publications include Znachenie i zadachi na nashata etnografia (The role and tasks of our ethnography; 1888) and the famous conversations with Ivan Vazov, published in the volume Ivan Vazov: Spomeni i dokumenty (Ivan Vazov: Recollections and documents; 1930). Three volumes of Shishmanov's literary output were published in 1965–71. (JW)

SHLLAKU Bernardin (23 June 1875, Shkodër–9 November 1956, Tirana), Albanian Catholic bishop. In 1890 Shllaku joined the Franciscan order. He graduated in theology in Graz. In 1898 he was ordained a priest. Shllaku initially worked in Shkodër and then became a parish priest in Kastrati (1899). From 1906 onwards he gave classes at the Franciscan College in Shkodër. In 1909 he took charge of the parish of Vuksan-Lekaj. One year later he was consecrated bishop and appointed auxiliary bishop of the diocese of Pulati. From 1921 on he headed this diocese. After the death of Archbishop Gasper Thaçi and the arrest of Archbishop Vinçenc Prennushi in February 1947, Shllaku became the ordinary of the archdiocese of Shkodër. He also became the head of the Catholic Church in Albania. In 1949 Shllaku headed an Episcopate delegation in negotiations with the Communist authorities on the legal status of the Church in the state. Mehmet Shehu, who represented the government, accused Shllaku of hindering the negotiations through his tenacity in opposing the creation of a national church and the severing of ties with the Holy See. On 30 July 1951 the negotiations ended in a compromise, under which contacts with the papacy were to be reduced to a minimum. In practice, the Communist authorities did not respect this negotiated compromise and made it public despite the previous agreements. The crisis in the Albanian Church, stemming from the reluctance to reach a compromise, worked against Shllaku, who was blamed for excessive concessions. At the same time, under mounting pressure from the authorities, he was forced to undertake activities showing the Church's support for the new political situation. For example, in January 1954 he signed an appeal urging the faithful to take part in the elections and vote for the Democratic Front candidates. Despite these concessions, the Church and the faithful continued to be a target of attacks by the Communists. (TC)

SHUKHEVYCH Roman, pseudonyms "Dzvin," "Shchuka," "Tur," "R. Lozovskyi," and "Taras Chuprynka" (17

July 1907, Krakowiec [Krakovets]–5 March 1950, Bilohorshcha, near Lviv), leader of Ukrainian nationalists. The son of a judge, Shukhevych attended high school in Lwów (Lviv), and in 1926 he began to study at the technical universities of the free city of Gdańsk (Danzig) and Lwów. In 1923 he joined the clandestine Ukrainian Military Organization (Ukrainiska Viyskova Orhanizatsiya [UVO]), which sought to establish an independent Ukrainian state in Eastern Galicia. In 1926 he took part in the assassination of the Polish superintendent of schools in Lwów. From 1928 to 1929 Shukhevych did his military service in the Polish Army. In 1934 he completed architectural studies at Lwów. By then, he was already one of the leaders of the UVO and the Organization of Ukrainian Nationalists (OUN), founded in 1929. He led many attacks on the Polish administration in Eastern Galicia and was responsible for the assassination of the Soviet consul in Lwów—a retaliatory measure for the famine in the Ukrainian SSR caused by the Soviet authorities. Imprisoned at Bereza Kartuska for his part in the preparations for the assassination of Minister Bronisław Pieracki, Shukhevych was sentenced to four years in prison in June 1934 but was released under an amnesty at the beginning of 1937. In 1938 Shukhevych went abroad and met Yevhen Konovalets, head of the OUN, who was assassinated shortly afterwards by a Soviet agent. In Subcarpathian Ruthenia from 1938 to 1939, Shukhevych was one of the main founders of the Carpathian Sich.

After the defeat of Poland in September 1939, Shukhevych served as an OUN liaison officer in Kraków and cooperated with the Ukrainian military underground movement in the Soviet-occupied territories of Eastern Galicia. Counting on Nazi support to gain independence for Ukraine, Shukhevych joined the Ukrainian Nachtigall Battalion in April 1941. After the outbreak of the German-Soviet war in June 1941, he became commander of the OUN units in Eastern Galicia, which had been incorporated into the General Government. Shukhevych helped to draft the declaration of Ukrainian independence of 30 June 1941. When in October 1941 the Nachtigall and Roland battalions were merged into the Schutzmannschaftbattalion, Shukhevych became deputy commander of the latter, with the rank of captain. However, this battalion was disbanded and its officers were arrested. Shukhevych managed to escape. Since Stepan Bandera and Yaroslav Stetsko were imprisoned in a Nazi concentration camp, Shukhevych became head of the OUN–Bandera faction (OUN–B) on 25 August 1943, and in November of that year he was appointed supreme commander of the Ukrainian Insurgent Army (UPA), which served as the military force of the OUN. When the Ukrainian Supreme Liberation Council (Ukraińska Holovna Vyzvolna Rada) was established on the OUN–B's initiative, Shukhevych became chairman of its General Secretariat on 15 July 1944. He was responsible for the killings of the Polish civilian population committed by Ukrainian units in Eastern Galicia and Volhynia. The UPA's activities were directed against the Polish Home Army and the Nazi German administration, but they also involved ethnic cleansing aimed at removing the Polish population from Eastern Galicia.

When the Red Army started entering Eastern Galicia in the spring of 1944, Shukhevych's insurgent forces took up the struggle against the Soviet troops. At that time Shukhevych used the pseudonym of "General Taras Chuprynka." The UPA's guerrilla struggle against Red Army units and political police in the territories incorporated into the Ukrainian SSR—as well as against the Czechoslovak Army, the new Polish Army, and the Communist State Security Office in Poland—continued for several years after the end of World War II and caused heavy losses among the civilian population of Eastern Galicia, Transcarpathia, and southeastern Poland. Encircled with his staff by forces of the Soviet Ministry of Internal Affairs near Lviv, Shukhevych was killed during combat. In August 1948 the MVD arrested and deported his widow and fifteen-year-old son to Siberia, only because they were his family. His son, Yuriy, was incarcerated in prisons and Soviet forced labor camps for over thirty years. Polish people mainly associate Shukhevych with the killings of the Polish civilian population, while in the memory of many Ukrainians he is a hero who fought for Ukraine's independence. Shukhevych was the patron of the Anti-Bolshevik Bloc of Nations (ABN), which he founded in November 1943 near Zhytomyr and which was active in the United States for many years after the war. (WR)

SHULHYN Oleksandr (30 July 1889, Sokhvyne, Poltava Province—4 March 1960, Paris), Ukrainian social activist, politician, historian, and journalist. The son of a historian and politician, from 1908 Shulhyn studied the natural sciences at St. Petersburg University but transferred to its Department of History and Philology in 1910. After graduating in 1915, he took up research work at this university. He also taught at pedagogical schools and high schools in St. Petersburg. An active member of Ukrainian associations in St. Petersburg, he initiated the establishment of the Union of Ukrainian Student Associations. After the February 1917 revolution, Shulhyn went to Kiev, where he joined the Ukrainian Democratic Radical Party (Ukraińska Radykalno-Demokratychna Partiya). In April 1917 he became a member of the Union of Ukrainian Autonomist Federalists (Soyuz Ukrainykykh Avtonomistiv-Federalistiv), and in September 1917 he became a member of the Central Committee (CC) of the Ukrainian Party of Socialist Federalists (Ukraińska Partiya Sotsialistiv-Federalistiv). He was also a member of the Society of Ukrainian Progressives. A delegate to the Ukrainian Central Rada (Council), he was elected to its executive organ, the so-called Little Rada, in July 1917. From July 1917 to January 1918 Shulhyn was secretary general for the national minorities (later for international affairs). Through his efforts, the Ukrainian National Republic (UNR) was officially recognized by France and Great Britain. In September 1917 in Kiev he organized the Congress of Captive Nations of Russia. In January and February 1918 he took part in negotiations with the Central Powers at Brest-Litovsk. Under the rule of Hetman Pavlo Skoropadskyi, Shulhyn was head of a political commission of the Ukrainian delegation to the peace negotiations with Soviet Russia. In July 1918 he became Ukrainian ambassador to Bulgaria. In 1919 he was in the Ukrainian delegation to the Paris Peace Conference. In 1920 he headed the UNR delegation to the First Assembly of the League of Nations in Geneva. In 1921 he headed the UNR extraordinary diplomatic mission in Paris.

From 1923 to 1927 Shulhyn was a professor at the Ukrainian Free University and at the Ukrainian Pedagogical Institute in Prague. He served as minister of foreign affairs (1926–36, 1939–40, 1945–46) of the UNR government-in-exile. From 1929 to 1939 he served as head of the Ukrainian Supreme Council in Exile (Holovna Ukraińska Emihratsiyana Rada), and from 1939 to 1940 he was head of the UNR government-in-exile. Shulhyn co-founded and headed the Ukrainian Academic Society in Paris (1946–60). In 1952 he co-initiated the International Free Academy of Sciences in Paris and served as its vice-president until 1960. From 1952 onwards Shulhyn was vice-president of the Taras Shevchenko Scientific Society (Naukove Tovarystvo im. Tarasa Shevchenka [NTSh]) in Europe. In his scholarly work Shulhyn dealt with modern history. His publications include the following: Uvahy do rozvytku ranishnoho kapitalizmu (Remarks on the development of early capitalism; 1930); Les origines de l'esprit national moderne et J.-J. Rousseau (1938); and Istoriia ta zhyttia (History and life; 1957). He also wrote works on the history of the Ukrainian national liberation movement: Polityka (Politics; 1918); L'Ukraine et le cauchemar rouge: Les massacres en Ukraine (1927); Derzhavnist chy Haidamachchyna? (Statehood of Haidamaka Uprisings? 1931); Bez terytorii: Ideolohiia ta chyn uriadu UNR na chuzhyni (Without a territory: Ideology and activities of the UNR Government-in-Exile; 1934); and L'Ukraine contre Moscou 1917 (1935). SHUMSKYI Oleksandr (2 December 1890, Borova Rudnya, near Kiev—18 September 1946, on the way from Saratov to Kiev), Ukrainian Communist activist. Shumskyi joined the Ukrainian Social Democratic Union in 1908 and the Ukrainian Party of Socialist Revolutionaries (Ukrainiiska Partiya Sotsialistiv-Revolutsioneriv [UPSR]) in the autumn of 1917. He was a member of the Central Council (Rada). In January 1918 Shumskyi conspired with the Bolsheviks to stage a coup, with the aim of establishing a Soviet system in Ukraine. A member of the pro-Bolshevik leftist faction of the UPSR, he was among those who effected a split in the party in May 1918; the split led to the establishment of the UPSR–Borotbists (the name was derived from the title of the periodical Borotba [Struggle]). In the spring of 1919 the UPSR–Borotbists supported Georgy Pyatakov's Soviet government of Ukraine. The Borotbists accused the Bolsheviks of ignoring the national cause and called for the establishment of parliamentary democracy. The Borotbists expressed their views in a memorandum submitted by Shumskyi to the authorities of the Communist International (Comintern) in August 1919; in it they criticized the policy of the Communist Party (Bolshevik) of Ukraine (CP[B]U). Although the Comintern did not accept their views, it needed the Borotbists, who had a strong following among the peasants. When in 1920 the Borotbists were invited to voluntarily join the CP(B)U, the majority accepted the offer. Among them was Shumskyi, who soon became a member of the Central Committee (CC) of the party. Shumskyi belonged to a CP(B)U faction that insisted on the party's independence from the Russian Communists and advocated that the CP(B)U maintain contact with the Russians through the Comintern. In 1919 Shumskyi was appointed people's commissar of education in the Soviet government of Ukraine. In 1920 he was made people's commissar of internal affairs. In 1921 he became the ambassador of the Ukrainian SSR to Poland.

After returning to Ukraine, Shumskyi edited the monthly Chervonyi shliakh from 1923 to 1926 and directed the CP(B)U CC Department of Agitation and Propaganda from 1923 to 1925. In September 1924 he again became people's commissar of education and actively implemented Ukrainization policies. In October 1925, in a conversation with Stalin, Shumskyi demanded that Lazar Kaganovich be dismissed as the CP(B)U CC general secretary. He urged that, in line with the Ukrainization policy, Kaganovich be replaced by a Ukrainian, Vlas Chubar. As a result of Shumskyi's conflict with Kaganovich, in a 1926 letter to the CP(B)U CC Politburo, Stalin accused Shumskyi of inciting anti-Russian sentiments in Ukraine. Shumskyi's policy was labeled a "deviation." In June 1926, after a smear campaign had been launched against him at a plenum of the CP(B)U CC, Shumskyi made a self-criticism. Dismissed as commissar of education and relieved of all his party posts (February 1927), he was transferred to Moscow, where he became president of the All-Soviet Board of the Trade Union of the Educational Sector. Accusations of "Shumskyism" caused serious consequences not only for the CP(B)U; even greater persecutions were launched against the Communist Party of Western Ukraine (Komunistychna Partiya Zakhidnoyi Ukrainy [KPZU]), operating in Poland; a majority of its leaders had supported Shumskyi, and as a result they soon became the victims of purges.

In 1933 Shumskyi was arrested on a fabricated charge of being a member of the Ukrainian Military Organization (Ukrainiiska Viyskova Orhanizatsiya [UVO]), which, according to the OGPU (political police), was allegedly preparing an anti-Soviet uprising. Sentenced to ten years of labor camp, Shumskyi was incarcerated on the Solovets Islands from 1933 to 1935. He repeatedly wrote to the party leaders and to Stalin himself, asking for a review of his case. In December 1935 a decision was made to commute his sentence from labor camp to forced settlement in Krasnoyarsk. After this decision, Shumskyi went on a hunger strike, demanding a complete rehabilitation. Seriously ill, in 1937 he was arrested again, this time in connection with the case of the Borotbists. In 1939 the case was discontinued owing to his illness. After the end of his term (1943), Shumskyi remained in Krasnoyarsk because of his serious condition. In 1946 he made an unsuccessful suicide attempt. In the same year, while on the way from Saratov to Kiev, he was murdered on the personal orders of Stalin and Kaganovich. However, there are also other accounts of Shumskyi's death. Shumskyi's publications include Stara i nova Ukraina (The old and the new Ukraine; 1923); Politychna sytuatsiia v skhidnoyi Halychyni (Political situation in Eastern Galicia; 1924); and Ideolohichna borotba v ukraiinskomu kulturnomu protsesi (Ideological struggle in the Ukrainian cultural process; 1927). (BB/TS)

SHUSHKEVICH Stanislav (15 December 1934, Minsk), Belorussian politician and nuclear physicist. Shushkevich is the son of Stanislav Shushkevich, a Belorussian writer, poet, and journalist who spent twenty years in Soviet forced labor camps and in exile. His mother, Alena, was also persecuted by the authorities. Shushkevich graduated from the Belorussian State University (BSU) in 1956 and completed postgraduate studies in 1959. In 1959 he began working at the Institute of Physics of the Belorussian Academy of Sciences (BAS). In 1967 he joined the CPSU. In 1969 he became head of a department for the civilian use of nuclear energy at the BSU. In 1973 he became a professor and in 1988 the deputy rector of the BSU. After the nuclear power station accident at Chernobyl in April 1986, Shushkevich criticized the authorities for withholding information on the consequences of the catastrophe. He became a member of a commission to investigate the effects of the disaster. This commission was established by a decision of the BAS and the Central Committee of the Communist Party of Belorussia. The task of the commission was to calm the public, but Shushkevich disseminated information about the true extent of the contamination of the Belorussian territory; for that reason he was removed from the commission. In the summer of 1986, along with his colleagues from the department of nuclear physics, Shushkevich set up a station where people could measure the contamination of foodstuffs. This station enjoyed great popularity, but the first secretary of the party committee in Minsk described it as "anti-state."

In the 1989 elections Shushkevich was elected to the Supreme Soviet of the Soviet Union. He became a member of the Interregional Group and worked with, among others, Andrei Sakharov, Boris Yeltsin, and Galina Starovoytova. Shushkevich called for an inquiry into the suppression of demonstrations in Tbilisi in April 1989. On 4 March 1990 he was elected a deputy to the Communist-dominated Belorussian Supreme Soviet. On 24 March 1990 at a conference of the Democratic Platform, consisting of twenty-three deputies of the Belorussian SSR and twenty-one councillors of the Minsk Council, Shushkevich called for cooperation with pragmatic Communist deputies. In June 1990 Shushkevich left the CPSU. On 27 July 1990 he was one of the initiators of the declaration of independence of Belarus. From 1990 to 1991 he was first deputy speaker of the Supreme Soviet of the Republic of Belarus, and on 17 September 1991 he became speaker.

On 8 December 1991, along with Boris Yeltsin, the president of Russia, and Leonid Kravchuk, the president of Ukraine, Shushkevich signed an agreement on the establishment of the Commonwealth of Independent States (CIS). The agreement provided for the dissolution of the Soviet Union. In May 1992 in Tashkent, a Belarusian delegation headed by Shushkevich refused to sign three treaties within the framework of the CIS: on collective security, chemical weapons, and common border protection. In March 1993 Shushkevich protested against the CIS Treaty on Collective Security, which had been ratified by the Belarusian parliament. After he had put forward a proposal that a referendum be held to decide on Belarus's membership in a new military alliance with Russia, Shushkevich was more and more often attacked by the Communists. His proposal did not gain the support of a parliamentary majority. On 1 July 1993, in a vote of no confidence in Shushkevich, only eight more votes were needed to dismiss him as speaker of the parliament. In July 1993 Shushkevich went to the United States, where he met with President Bill Clinton. In January 1994 Clinton paid a return visit to Belarus, the first CIS country he visited. In November 1993 Alyaksandr Lukashenka groundlessly accused Shushkevich of embezzlement. On 26 January 1994 Shushkevich was dismissed by a majority of votes.

In June 1994 Shushkevich ran in the presidential elections in Belarus but received only 10 percent of the vote, mainly in the big cities. In 1994 he became director of the Center for Political and Economic Studies at the European Humanities University in Minsk. In May 1995 he was elected to the parliament. Shushkevich was one of the initiators of a procedure to dismiss Lukashenka as president of Belarus (November 1996). Shushkevich refused to recognize the results of Lukashenka's referendum of 24 November 1996 and did not become a member of his pseudo-parliament. In February 1998, at the founding congress of the Belarusian Social Democratic Party–Hramada, Shushkevich was elected its chairman. In May 1999, in reaction to a violation of the constitution by Lukashenka, Shushkevich (along with members of his party) helped to organize opposition presidential elections. Shushkevich also took part in the proceedings of international organizations, including the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe, which dealt with international security and human rights. Shushkevich published several research works on the foundations of radioelectronics. (AS/SA)

SICHYNSKYI Myroslav (11 October 1887, Czernichowce, near Zbaraż [now Chernykhivtsi]–16 February 1979, Westland, Michigan), Ukrainian nationalist activist. Sichynskyi's father was a Uniate parish priest and an MP in the Provincial Diet. Sichynskyi attended high school in Kołomyja (Kolomyja) in 1897–1900 and in Przemyśl in 1900–1904. Involved in the activities of secret youth groups, he was punished with a fine and expelled from school for taking part in a demonstration. He passed his high school final examinations as an extramural student. In 1905 Sichynskyi began to study in Vienna, and one year later he transferred to the University of Lemberg (Lwów, Lviv). He became a member of the Academic Hromada (Akademichna Hromada), a student organization in Lemberg, and a member of the Ukrainian Social Democratic Workers' Party. He joined a student campaign aimed at gaining permission for the Ukrainization of the university. In January 1907, as part of a protest against the decision of the university authorities to ban the use of Ukrainian for the academic year 1906–7, Sichynskyi, along with a group of Ukrainian students, destroyed lecture halls and assaulted a Polish lecturer. Arrested by the police, the participants of the protest went on a hunger strike in prison; the strike received a lot of publicity across Europe and influenced the court's decision to release the students. In retaliation for the police brutality toward peasants during the election campaign for the Provincial Diet in 1907–8, particularly after the death of one of the peasants, Sichynskyi made a decision to radicalize the methods of struggle. He blamed Count Andrzej Potocki, the governor of Galicia, for the situation of the Ukrainian people. Potocki opposed the Ukrainization of the university and sought to consolidate old-Ruthenian political parties, which were competitive with the Ukrainian parties.

On 12 April 1908 in Lemberg, Sichynskyi assassinated

Count Potocki and subsequently offered no resistance when arrested. He was sentenced to death, and the sentence was upheld on appeal. At the suggestion of the new governor, Michał Bobrzyński, and, according to some sources, Count Potocki's widow, Krystyna Potocka, the emperor, reprieved Sichynskyi and commuted his death sentence to twenty years in prison. The assassination led to a sharp deterioration in Polish-Ukrainian relations in Galicia. Most Ukrainian politicians justified Sichynskyi's deed, and Sichynskyi himself became a symbol of heroism for the Ukrainian youth. On 10 November 1911, with the help of funds raised in Galicia and abroad, Sichynskyi succeeded in escaping from prison in Stanisławów (now Ivano-Frankivsk) and went to Berlin and then to Sweden. After the outbreak of World War I, Sichynskyi worked for the Ukrainian cause in the United States, where he led the Social Democratic movement among the émigré community. Despite protests by Polish politicians, he was granted an audience with U.S. President Woodrow Wilson, and then he submitted a letter to Wilson protesting the possible award of Eastern Galicia to Poland. During the interwar period Sichynskyi kept the American press informed about the situation of Ukraine and attempted to cause a reaction in the U.S. State Department on the issue of the pacification of Galicia in 1930. In 1940 Sichynskyi became one of the leaders of the Ukrainian Congress Committee of America, an organization that brought together Ukrainian pro-Allied émigré groups. After World War II, at the invitation of the Soviet government, Sichynskyi visited Ukraine, including Lviv, on several occasions. Until the end of his life Sichynskyi believed in the rightness of his act of 1908. (TS)

SIDOR Karol (16 July 1901, Ružomberok–20 October 1953, Montreal), Slovak politician and writer. A close relative of Father Andrej Hlinka, after Hlinka's imprisonment in 1919, Sidor organized a protest strike at a Piarist gymnasium in Ružomberok, as a result of which he was expelled from school. In 1920 he began to study law, initially in Prague, later transferring to Bratislava, but he never graduated. Sidor was a co-founder and then editor of the Catholic literary monthly Vatra (1919–25). While a student, he became active in the Slovak autonomist movement, which increasingly sharply protested the centralist policies of the Prague government and the official doctrine, which stated that there was one Czechoslovak nation. From 1920 Sidor was editor and then editor-in-chief (1931–38) of the daily Slovák, a press organ of the Slovak People's Party, renamed Hlinka's Slovak People's Party (Hlinkova Slovenská Ľudová Strana [HSL'S]) in 1925. Sidor gradually became one of the closest associates of Hlinka. Sidor's articles were frequently censored, and in November 1932 he was sentenced to seven weeks in prison for publishing a critical letter from Hlinka in Slovák. As a result, Sidor, who was already seen as the leader of the young, progressive faction within the HSL'S, became even more popular.

From 1935 to 1939 Sidor sat in the parliament in Prague, where he strove for the implementation of the ethnic and religious demands of the HSL'S. He described his efforts in support of Slovak autonomy in the work Slovenská politika na pôde pražského snemu 1918–1938 (Slovak policy in the parliament in Prague; 1943). He also participated in a parliamentary committee for foreign affairs. In the National Assembly, Sidor frequently attacked the policies of President Edvard Beneš. He maintained that instead of hoping for an alliance with remote France, Czechoslovakia should turn to Poland, which might protect the Slovaks from Czech centralism. He thought that a Polish-Czech-Slovak alliance would guarantee the security of the region. He expressed his Polonophilia in numerous press articles, as well as in the monograph Cestou po Poľsku (Traveling over Poland; 1927). On 28 September 1938, during the Munich crisis, Sidor and Father Jozef Tiso submitted a declaration to the Polish ambassador in Prague in which they proposed that Slovakia form a union with Poland in the case that Czechoslovak statehood was abolished.

After the death of Hlinka (August 1938), Sidor lost the race for the position of the HSL'S leader to Tiso, who became head of the Slovak government that was established after Slovakia gained autonomy in October 1938. On 1 December 1938 Sidor became a member of the central government headed by Rudolf Beran. As deputy prime minister, Sidor represented Slovak interests in this government. On 18 December 1938 he became an MP in the parliament in Bratislava and chief of the paramilitary Hlinka Guard (Hlinkova Garda [HG]). However, Sidor's political position and that of his supporters deteriorated after Poland occupied some territory in the north of Slovakia, including Javořina (Jaworzyna), in November 1938. Politicians with a pro-German orientation became increasingly influential in the HSL'S. On the night of 9–10 March 1939 the Czechoslovak authorities ordered the army onto the streets in Slovakia and dismissed the government of Tiso, whom they accused of separatism. Sidor became head of a new Slovak government. He refused to proclaim Slovak independence, which the German emissaries demanded from him on 12 March 1939. After Hitler gave an ultimatum to Father Tiso, Sidor resigned his position. As a result, on 14 March 1939 the Slovak parliament proclaimed independence. Sidor briefly held the portfolio of minister of interior in the new government, but the Germans did not accept his political stance. Dismissed under pressure from Berlin, he assumed the post of Slovakia's ambassador to the Holy See in June 1939 and held this post until the end of World War II. Sidor described his diplomatic work in the memoirs Šesť rokov vo Vatikáne (Six years in the Vatican; 1947).

In 1945 Sidor remained in exile. Granted political asylum, he organized assistance for Slovak refugees in Rome. In 1947 a Czechoslovak court sentenced him in absentia to twenty years' imprisonment. In October 1948 Sidor became president of the Slovak National Council Abroad (Slovenská Národná Rada v Zahraničí [SNRvZ]), whose program promoted the establishment of an independent Slovakia within the framework of a Central European bloc of nations. In 1950 Sidor moved to Canada. He was the leader of the Slovak émigré community in North America until the end of his life. His memoirs from March 1939 were published posthumously as Moje poznámky k historickým dňom (My comments on historical days; 1971) and Takto vznikol slovenský štát (How the Slovak state was established; 1991). SIDZIKAUSKAS Vaclovas (10 April 1893, Siaudine–2 December 1973, New York), Lithuanian Peasant Party politician, diplomat, and leader in exile. Sidzikauskas studied law in Moscow, Bern, and Kaunas. During World War I he was one of the organizers of the populist National Democratic Freedom League called Santara. In 1925 the league transformed itself into the Lithuanian Peasant Party. Between the wars Sidzikauskas was Lithuanian envoy to Switzerland, Germany, Austria, and Great Britain. While in London, he signed on behalf of Lithuania the "London convention" (5 July 1933), which defined the notion of aggression. Fearing arrest by the Soviets, in June 1940 Sidzikauskas left for Germany but was captured there by the Gestapo. Imprisoned in the camps in Soldau and Auschwitz, he was released in 1944 and was held under house arrest in Berlin. At the end of the war Sidzikauskas co-organized the Supreme Committee for the Liberation of Lithuania in Germany. In April 1947 he was elected president of this committee, which in 1950 moved to New York. He held the post until his death. In 1959 Sidzikauskas served as vice-president, and in 1960 as president, of the Assembly of Captive European Nations in New York. He repeatedly protested the incorporation of the Baltic states by the USSR, deportations, and the economic exploitation of these states by the Kremlin. (WR) SIENKIEWICZ Henryk, pen name “Litwos” (5 May 1846, Wola Okrzejska, Podlasie–15 November 1916, Vevey, Switzerland), Polish novelist. Sienkiewicz came from an impoverished noble landowning family that settled in Warsaw. From 1866 to 1871, he studied at the Main School and at the Russian university in Warsaw, but he failed to graduate. From 1872 he contributed to the press. He contributed to the bi-monthly Niwa, which he co-owned, and to Słowo (1882–87). From 1876 to 1878 Sienkiewicz traveled in the United States, and from 1879, because of his wife’s illness, took extended annual trips to Western Europe. Sienkiewicz’s first works conformed with positivistic realism—for example, Szkice węglem (1880; Charcoal Sketches, 1990) and Janko Muzykant (1880; Yanko the Musician, 1893)—and put him in the spotlight with critics and readers. However, he became truly famous because of his trilogy: Ogniem i mieczem (1883–84; With Fire and Sword, 1890), Potop (1885; The Deluge, 1891), and Pan Wołodyjowski (1888; Pan Michael, 1905). The trilogy depicts the crisis of the Polish Noble Commonwealth of the seventeenth century and the attempts to overcome it. Sienkiewicz’s literary heroes became extremely popular, and some of their utterances became colloquialisms in Polish. Following the death of his wife, Sienkiewicz traveled to Istanbul, Athens, Naples, Rome, Spain, and East Africa. The expeditions inspired him to write Listy z podróży do Ameryki (Letters from travels to America; 1876–78) and Listy z Afryki (Letters from Africa; 1891–92). Sienkiewicz frequently visited the resort town of Zakopane in southern Poland. He was a devout Catholic, and a novel depicting the life of the first Christians, Quo Vadis (1896), brought him international fame and the Nobel Prize in literature in 1905. Sienkiewicz’s psychological novel Bez dogmatu (1889–90; Without Dogma, 1893) aroused great interest, particularly abroad, and Rodzina Połanieckich (The Połaniecki family; 1895) did the same among Polish readers.

In 1900 Sienkiewicz published his next historical bestseller, Krzyżacy (The Knights of the Cross, 1900), and in 1911 he published a popular novel for children, W pustyni i w puszczy (In Desert and Wilderness, 1912). In his works, he managed to combine a lively and flexible style of expression, largely realistic psychological portraits, and a patriotic message. His traditionalism caused a torrent of criticism from the adherents of modernism, who advocated social progress. Most notably, Stanisław Brzozowski accused Sienkiewicz of conservatism and of fostering indifference to the suffering of the lower classes. Despite the fact that most of his literary output came at the end of the nineteenth century, Sienkiewicz exerted an enormous amount of influence on many subsequent generations of Poles, who often yearned for patriotic prose “to fortify the heart,” as Sienkiewicz himself put it. Aside from writing, Sienkiewicz supported the development of Polish culture. Among other things, he co-organized the Mianowski Fund for scholars and artists (Kasa im. Mianowskiego) and the self-help Fund of Prudence for Writers and Journalists. In 1900 Sienkiewicz celebrated a jubilee of his literary works, where he was recognized as the most popular Polish writer. To commemorate his achievement, the jubilee committee awarded him a small landed estate, Oblęgorek, near Kielce, where Sienkiewicz often spent his summers. During the revolution of 1905–7, Sienkiewicz demanded autonomy for the Polish Kingdom and appealed to the Poles to unite to achieve independence. However, he criticized the radicalism of the leaders of the revolution—for example, in his political novel Winy (The guilts; 1910). Sienkiewicz was in Oblęgorek when World War I broke out, but he quickly left his estate and traveled through Kraków and Vienna to Switzerland. At Vevey, along with Antoni Osuchowski and Ignacy Paderewski, Sienkiewicz organized the General Committee to Aid War Victims in Poland, sending money, medicine, and food to his war-devastated country. SIERPIŃSKI Waclaw (14 March 1882, Warsaw–21 October 1969, Warsaw), Polish mathematician. After high school Sierpiński studied at the Physical-Mathematical Department of Warsaw University (1900–4). He graduated with a gold medal for a thesis on numerical theory. In 1906 he received a Ph.D. at the Jagiellonian University in Kraków; in 1908 he became an associate professor (docent) and in 1910 a full professor at the university in Lwów (Lviv). Interned during World War I by the Russian authorities, Sierpiński spent three years in Vyatka and Moscow, where he taught in Polish high schools. After his return to Poland, he resumed lecturing at Lwów University, and in 1919 he was appointed professor at Warsaw University. In 1920 Sierpiński co-founded the periodical Fundamenta Mathematica, which won international renown. He was also a co-founder of the Warsaw school of mathematics. He mostly dealt with the theory of great numbers, topology, and the theory of real functions. Sierpiński published (among other works) Hypothèse du continu (1934), Introduction to General Typology (1934), and Elementary Theory of Numbers (1964). In 1958–69 he was editor-in-chief of the only periodical in the world dealing with numerical theory, Acta Arithmetica. From 1917 he was a member of the Polish Academy of Arts and Sciences; from 1952 he was a member of the Polish Academy of Sciences (Polska Akademia Nauk [PAN]); and in 1931–51 he chaired the Warsaw Scientific Society. From 1952 to 1957 he was deputy chairman of the PAN. Sierpiński held honorary doctorates from universities in Amsterdam, Bordeaux, Lwów, Moscow, Paris, Prague, Sofia, and Tartu. (WR)

ŠIK Ota (11 September 1919, Plzeň–22 August 2004, St. Gallen, Switzerland), Czech economist and Communist activist. One of the main founders of Czech Marxist economics, Šik dealt with issues concerning a planned economy and Socialist commodity relations. He joined the Communist Party of Czechoslovakia (CPC) in 1940. Between 1941 and 1945 he was imprisoned in a concentration camp. From 1953 he was a professor at the Higher School of Economics in Prague; in the 1960s he worked at the Czechoslovak Academy of Sciences in Prague. In 1958 he became a candidate member of the Central Committee of the CPC, and in 1962, a full member. From 1964 Šik directed work on the reform of the principles governing national economic policy and was the author of the basic premises of the reform. He attempted to combine the primary objectives of a centrally planned economy with elements of a market economy. From 1968 to 1969 Šik belonged to the Government Economic Council, and from 8 April 1968 to 3 September 1968 he was the deputy prime minister in the cabinet of Oldřich Černík, responsible for economic reform. As a supporter of the reformist movement after the Prague Spring, Šik was among those who were forced to withdraw from political life. In 1969 he emigrated to Switzerland. Between 1970 and 1989 he was a professor at the universities of St. Gallen and Zurich. In 1983 he was granted Swiss citizenship. After the Velvet Revolution in 1989, Šik returned for a short time to Czechoslovakia, where he became a member of the Council of Consultants of President Václav Havel. However, having no real influence upon economic decisions, Šik returned to Switzerland; from there he critically observed the transformations in the country. Šik authored (among other works) the following: Plán a trh za socialismu (Planning and market in socialism; 1967); Třetí cesta (The third way; 1972); For a Human Economic Democracy (1985); and Wirtschaftssysteme (Economic systems; 1987), as well as the memoirs Prager Frühlingserwachen (The Prague Spring awakening; 1988). SIKORSKI Władysław Eugeniusz, pseudonyms “Władek” and “Orliński” (20 May 1881, Tuszów Narodowy, near Mielec—4 July 1943, Gibraltar), Polish general and politician. While still in high school, Sikorski joined secret self-education organizations and the Society of People’s Schools (Towarzystwo Szkoły Ludowej). In 1902 he enrolled in the Department of Roads and Bridges of the Lemberg (Lwów, Lviv) Polytechnic. He joined the Union of Polish Youth (Związek Młodzieży Polskiej), which was tied to the National League and later to the Union for the Rebirth of the Polish Nation (Związek Odrodzenia Narodu Polskiego), which worked with the Polish Socialist Party. In 1904 Sikorski was drafted into the Austrian Army for a year and dismissed with the rank of second lieutenant of reserves. He lectured on military tactics in secret Polish organizations that sought independence. In 1908, he co-organized the Union for Active Struggle (Związek Walki Czynnej), and he joined its Main Council. After earning a diploma in hydraulic engineering, Sikorski worked in the Department of Water Works in Lwów. In 1910 he founded a chapter of the Riflemen’s Association (Związek Strzelecki) there. In 1912 he advocated the creation of the Polish Rifle Federation. Sikorski was active in the Polish Progressive Party (Polskie Stronnictwo Postępowe), which demanded voting rights for women and the secularization of the schools. In November 1912, he co-founded the Provisional Commission of Confederated Independentist Parties (Komisai Tymczasowa Skonfederowanych Stronnictw Niepodległościowych), which supported Austria-Hungary. Working with Józef Piłsudski, Sikorski became the commission’s clerk for military affairs and then controller of its Military Department in Lesser Poland and the Kingdom of Poland.

Following the outbreak of World War I, Piłsudski appointed Sikorski as the commissar plenipotentiary of the National Government for Galicia, then a member of the Chief National Committee (Naczelny Komitet Narodowy), and later chief of its Military Department. Gradually, however, Sikorski became critical of Piłsudski's endeavor to form the Polish Legions and his policy of searching for allies. In contrast to Piłsudski's pro-German orientation, Sikorski preferred an Austro-Hungarian alliance. In October 1914, Sikorski organized the School for Officer Cadets in Kraków, which he commanded. In December 1914 he carried out recruitment for the Legions in the Kingdom of Poland. In August 1916, following the transformation of the Polish Legions into the Polish Auxiliary Corps (Polski Korpus Posiłkowy), he commanded the Third Infantry Regiment. Following the act of 5 November 1916, by which the German and Austro-Hungarian emperors promised to create the Kingdom of Poland, Sikorski participated in the creation of the Polish Armed Forces (Polska Siła Zbrojna). During the oath crisis of July 1917, Sikorski stayed in service and took over the command of the Staff Headquarters of the Reserve of the Polish Auxiliary Corps in Bolechów. For cooperating with General Józef Haller (in the breakthrough of the Second Polish Brigade at Rarańcza and its escape to the Russian side) and for refusing to acknowledge the validity of the Treaty of Brest (9 March 1918), Sikorski was interned at a POW camp in Hungary (February–May 1918). Upon his return to Lwów, he clandestinely organized Polish military cadres.

At the beginning of November 1918, Sikorski was appointed by the Regency Council to be the chief of staff of the Command for Eastern Galicia and Silesia. He then joined the newly formed Polish Army (Wojsko Polskie). He participated in organizing the defense of Przemyśl and later became chief quartermaster in the newly formed Command-East. In January 1919 Sikorski led an operational group and in March 1919 an infantry division in the defense of Lwów. In August 1919, he took command of the Polesie Group and the Ninth Infantry Division, organizing the Polish lines of defense among the Styr and Słucz Rivers. In April 1920, Sikorski was promoted to brigadier general. During the Kiev offensive he reached the Dnieper River. In August 1920 he was put in command of the Fifth Army, fighting near the Wkra River, and he contributed significantly to the Polish victory in the Battle of Warsaw. Then he became commander of the Third Army (fighting in Volhynia and Polesia) and later of the new Third Army, which fought in the Vilnius area. In February 1921, he was promoted to major general.

In April 1921, Sikorski became chief of the General Staff of the Polish Army. He devoted much attention to the defense of the state from outside aggression; he thus advocated the parity of treatment of Germany and Russia and the need to preserve the European status quo as the foundation of Poland's foreign policy. He supported close links with France. Although he was accused of vanity, his superior leadership and organizational skills were appreciated. On Sikorski's initiative, Honor and Fatherland (Honor and Ojczyzna) was established at the end of 1921 or the beginning of 1922. It was a secret organization of military officers who opposed Piłsudski. Following the assassination of President Gabriel Narutowicz, Sikorski became prime minister and minister of interior on 16 December 1922. He managed to calm the nation, and in March 1923, at the Conference of Ambassadors, he achieved recognition for Poland's eastern borders. After the fall of his government (26 May 1923), Sikorski traveled in France for a few months. Upon his return, from November 1923 to February 1924, he served as chief inspector of the infantry. On 17 February 1924, he became minister for military affairs in the government of Władysław Grab-ski*. Sikorski initiated changes in military law, prepared the initial plans for operations and mobilization, organized first maneuvers, and fostered an increase in the defensive potential of the nation. He also initiated the formation of the Borderlands Defense Corps (Korpus Ochrony Pogranicza) to protect Poland's eastern border. Sikorski published prodigiously and maintained numerous political contacts. He distanced himself even further from Piłsudski, who considered Sikorski his rival. In December 1925, Sikorski became the commander of the Lwów Army Corps. During the coup d'état of May 1926, he remained neutral.

In March 1928, Sikorski was dismissed and transferred to the direct jurisdiction of the minister of military affairs. He then devoted himself to studying defense matters and international affairs. He spent a lot of time in France. He correctly foresaw the future of warfare in Europe, stressing the primacy of tanks. From 1928 Sikorski strengthened his links with French politicians and with Wincenty Witos and Ignacy Paderewski. In 1936, he co-organized a concord of liberal-democratic forces in the so-called Front Morges. In 1937, he participated in the foundation of the (Christian Democratic) Labor Party (Stronniectwo Pracy). In March 1939, he returned to Poland. On 24 August 1939, he reported to Marshal Edward Rydz-Śmigły to secure an active commission in the army, but he was turned down.

On 18 September 1939 Sikorski crossed over to Romania and then left for France. On 28 September in Paris he was appointed the chief-in-command of Polish military units in France; on 30 September he became prime minister and minister for military affairs of the Polish government-in-exile, and on 7 November he was proclaimed the commander-in-chief and the chief inspector of the Polish Armed Forces. His position was strengthened following an announcement by President Władysław Raczkiewicz, who declared that he would carry out his duties only in strict cooperation with the prime minister. On 13 November 1939, to continue the struggle at home, Sikorski substituted the secret Service for the Victory of Poland (Służba Zwycięstwu Polski) with the Union for Armed Struggle (Związek Walki Zbrojnej), which in February 1942 was redesignated the Home Army (Armia Krajowa). He also created the office of the Home Government Delegate (Delegat Rządu na Kraj).

After the fall of France in June 1940, Sikorski carried out the evacuation of the government and military to Great Britain. He backed the idea of a close political union with Czechoslovakia. He endeavored to secure the support of the United States for the idea of a central European federation. In December 1940, Sikorski was promoted to general of the army. On 30 July 1941, he concluded a pact in Moscow normalizing Soviet-Polish relations. Its result was “an amnesty” for Polish citizens deported and imprisoned in the USSR, as well as the creation of a Polish army there. Until June 1942, in an effort to maintain proper relations with Stalin, Sikorski opposed the total evacuation of the Polish army from the Soviet Union. The opposition accused Sikorski of betraying the national interest. Sikorski strove to secure just and equal relations with the USSR, while insisting on the reconstruction of an independent Poland with its eastern borders in tact. Sikorski’s government found itself in a precariously difficult situation following the discovery of mass graves of Polish officers at Katyn in April 1943. When the Polish government asked the International Red Cross to investigate the matter, the Kremlin broke diplomatic relations with the Poles. On his way back to London following the inspection of Polish military units in the Middle East, Sikorski perished tragically in an air crash. The circumstances of his death still remain murky. The most plausible speculation is that the general was assassinated by the Soviet secret services. Sikorski was buried at the cemetery for airmen at Newark, Great Britain. On 17 September 1993, his ashes were buried at the cathedral on Wawel Hill in Kraków. In London, the Polish Institute and a museum bearing his name were created. Sikorski was the author of many works, including the following: O polską politykę państwową (For a Polish state policy; 1923); Nad Wisłą i

Wkrą. Studium z polsko-rosyjskiej wojny 1920 roku (By the Vistula and Wkra: A study of the Polish-Russian war of 1920; 1928); Polska i Francja w przeszłości i w dobie obecnej (Poland and France in the past and in contemporary times; 1931); and Przyszła wojna, jej możliwości i charakter oraz związane z nią zagadnienia obrony kraju (1934; Modern Warfare, 1943). SILAJDŽIĆ Haris (1 September 1945, Breza, near Sarajevo), Muslim politician from Bosnia. In 1971 Silajdžić graduated in Arab and Islamic studies from Benghazi University in Libya. For more than a year he continued with doctoral studies in the United States, studying the U.S.-Albanian relationship. In 1980 he received a Ph.D. Upon his return home he lectured at the University of Priština. For several years he also worked in Libya. A member of the Muslim Supreme Board in Sarajevo, in 1990 Silajdžić joined the electoral campaign of Alija Izetbegović, who ran for the presidency of the Presidium of the (Yugoslav) Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina. After Izetbegović won, Silajdžić became minister of foreign affairs (December 1990–October 1993) and then prime minister (25 October 1993–30 January 1996) of the country, which proclaimed independence in 1992. During the war in Bosnia-Herzegovina, Silajdžić appealed to the international community for intervention that would prevent the ethnic cleansing of Bosnian Muslims and demanded a lifting of the international ban on arms supplies to Bosnia-Herzegovina. He took part in negotiating the Dayton Agreement of 1995, which terminated the war. From 31 May 1994 to 31 January 1996 Silajdžić was prime minister of the Muslim-Croat Federation within Bosnia-Herzegovina. He resigned from his position and from chairing the Party of Democratic Action to establish his own Party for Bosnia and Herzegovina (Stranka za Bosnu i Hercegovinu). In September 1996 he ran for president of Bosnia-Herzegovina, but he lost to Izetbegović. From 3 January 1997 to 6 April 2000 Silajdžić co-ran the government of Bosnia-Herzegovina, rotating every week with Boro Borić (until 3 February 1999) and later with Svetozar Mihajlović. Among other works, Silajdžić authored Za Bosnu i Hercegovinu: Izbor iz dokumentacije Harisa Silajdžića (For Bosnia-Herzegovina: Selections from Haris Silajdžić's Documentation; 1998) and Na putu ka modernoj državi (On the road to a modern statehood; 2000). (AO)

SIŁA-NOWICKI Władysław (22 June 1913, Warsaw–25 February 1994, Warsaw), Polish lawyer and political activist. In 1935 Siła-Nowicki graduated in law from Warsaw University. A participant in the September 1939 campaign, from 1941 he was active in the Union of Armed Struggle and the Home Army as a member of an underground Catholic organization, Unia. In 1943 he joined the underground Labor Party (Stronnictwo Pracy [SP]). He took part in the Warsaw Uprising and was decorated with the Cross of Valor. From 1945 to 1946 Siła-Nowicki served as vice-president of the SP Provincial Board in Lublin. He was also in the underground organization Freedom and Independence (Wolność i Niezawisłość [WiN]), initially as head of propaganda and, in 1946, as commander of the Lublin Town District. He was also deputy inspector and, from November 1946 inspector, of the Lublin WiN. After the amnesty of 22 February 1947 Siła-Nowicki entered into talks with the Communist security services to allow forest detachments to come out of hiding. Arrested on 16 September 1947 and sentenced to death, he had his sentence commuted to life imprisonment after the intervention of his aunt, who was the sister of Feliks Dzerzhinsky. On 1 December 1956 he was released and acquitted.

From 1959 Siła-Nowicki worked as a lawyer. He pleaded the cases of former Home Army soldiers, priests, and Jehovah's Witnesses, as well as the case of a conspiracy called Ruch (1971). In 1968 and 1969 his right to practice law was suspended. Siła-Nowicki was legal adviser to the Polish Episcopate. In 1961 he became a member of the Club of Catholic Intellectuals (Klub Inteligencji Katolickiej [KIK]) in Warsaw. In 1968 he stated that members of the parliamentary group Znak should resign in protest against the invasion of Czechoslovakia. From 1975 to 1976 Siła-Nowicki participated in a protest action against amendments to the constitution, and he was a signatory of the "Letter of 59." After the events of June 1976 he was an attorney in the trials of the participants in these events, and he was a close co-worker of the Committee for the Defense of Workers (Komitet Obrony Robotników [KOR]). In 1980 he co-authored the statute of the Independent Self-Governing Trade Union Solidarity (NSZZ Solidarność). He subsequently was an expert on Solidarity's National Coordination Commission (Krajowa Komisja Porozumiewawcza) and one of the advisers to Lech Wałęsa. During talks with the government Siła-Nowicki supported a moderate line. During martial law he was a lawyer in political trials, but in 1983 he was superannuated. In 1986 he became a member of the Consultative Council to the President of the State Council, General Wojciech Jaruzelski. Siła-Nowicki took part as an adviser in the strikes of 1988, and he tried to initiate talks between the strikers and General Czesław Kiszczak.

Siła-Nowicki was at odds with Solidarity leaders over their tactics and took part in the Round Table Talks in 1989 as an independent politician invited by the government. Critical about the adopted agreement, he worked with the so-called Solidarity Working Group (Grupa Robocza Solidarności), which was in opposition to the leadership of the union. In the elections of June 1989 Siła-Nowicki ran against Jacek Kuroń but lost. In 1989–92 he served as president of the board of the Christian Democratic Labor Party and later as its honorary president. In 1992 Siła-Nowicki was elected a judge of the Tribunal of State. (AF)

SIMA Horia (3 June 1906, Mândra, Transylvania–25 May 1993, Augsburg, Germany), Romanian Fascist politician. In 1926 Sima began to study at the School of Literature and Philosophy at Bucharest University. In 1927 he joined the mystical nationalist Legion of the Archangel Michael (Legiunea Arhangelul Mihail), also called the Legion or Legionary Movement. It later became known as the Iron Guard (Gărdia de Fier). Sima was a student of Nae Ionescu, one of the main ideologues of the Legion. After graduating in 1932, Sima became a teacher of Romanian in Caransebeș, Banat. In 1935 Corneliu Codreanu-Zelea, the leader of the Iron Guard, appointed Sima head of the Ninth District of the Legion in Banat. After King Charles II established a dictatorship and then ordered the arrest of Codreanu, as well as hundreds of other Legionnaires, in the spring of 1938, Sima became leader of the Iron Guard. He quickly restructured the organization, which went underground and began to assassinate its political opponents. In December 1938, after Codreanu and a dozen or so Legion leaders were killed on the orders of the king, Sima fled to Germany, which supported and financed his movement. From August to October 1939 Sima secretly lived in Romania, where he tried to consolidate his leadership, and then returned to Berlin. In May 1940 he again crossed the Romanian border but was arrested. Because Sima and the Iron Guard enjoyed the support of Germany and King Charles' position was weak, in June 1940, in an attempt to gain the support of the Iron Guard, Charles invited the Legionnaires to join the new government. Sima assumed the portfolio of minister of education, but a few days later, in July 1940, he resigned this post owing to the opposition of the majority of the Legionnaires.

In early September 1940, following an unsuccessful attempt by the Iron Guard to take over power, Charles II appointed General Ion Antonescu, who held moderate pro-German views, as prime minister. On Hitler's request, Antonescu formed a government in alliance with the Iron Guard. Romania was proclaimed a "National Legionary State." Sima was appointed deputy prime minister. His Legionnaires pursued a campaign of political assassinations and conducted pogroms of Jews. In January 1941 the Legionnaires instigated fighting in Bucharest, and Sima resigned as deputy prime minister. He demanded that Antonescu be dismissed, claiming the post of prime minister for himself. The Romanian Army, which was faithful to Antonescu, suppressed the Iron Guard and, by 23 January of that year, was in control of the situation. Hitler lent his support to Antonescu because he needed the Romanian Army for a planned attack against the Soviet Union. Sima and his closest associates took refuge in the Third Reich. They served as an alternative for Hitler in the case of Antonescu's disobedience. Sima was interned in Sachsenhausen and other camps. After the coup d'état of 23 August 1944 and the overthrow of Antonescu, Sima was taken to Vienna, where he became head of a puppet Romanian government. In February 1945, in the face of the collapse of Germany, his government was moved to Alt-Aussee, as it had no chance of operating in Romanian territory. After the end of World War II, Sima made his way, via France and Italy, to Argentina and thence to Spain, where he lived safely until the end of his life. In 1946 in Communist Romania he was sentenced to death in absentia. In 1949 he apologized to the Romanian political émigrés for his anti-royalist attitude in 1944. Sima lectured at a university in Barcelona. He also published papers on Fascist and Iron Guard doctrines, as well as on Romanian history and the history of the Legionary Movement. (LW)

ŠIMEČKA Milan (7 April 1930, Nový Bohumín–24 September 1990, Prague), Czech political scientist, essayist, and literary critic active in Slovakia. From 1949 to 1953 Šimečka studied Czech and Russian literature at Masaryk University in Brno and then worked as a teacher of Czech in Kroměříž for one year. In 1954 he went to Bratislava and became an assistant at the department of Marxism-Leninism at the university there. In 1957 he transferred to the School of Musical Arts, where he did research on the history of social utopias. At that time he published two books devoted to this issue: Sociálne utópie a utopisti (Social utopias and utopians; 1963) and Kríza utopizmu (The crisis of utopianism; 1968). The latter was also his dissertation for the postdoctoral degree. In 1967–68, as a scholarship holder, Šimečka lectured at the Institute of European History. During the Prague Spring he repeatedly expressed critical assessments of the situation in the country. During the so-called normalization period he was expelled from the Communist Party of Czechoslovakia and was subsequently banned from publishing his works. Dismissed from the university, he worked as a blue-collar laborer.

In Bratislava Šimečka was one of the few active opponents of the "normalization" policy. Along with Miroslav Kusý, he organized samizdat publishing operations, and in 1977 he signed Charter 77. His book Obnovení pořádku: Příspěvek k typologii reálného socialismu (The restoration of order: The normalization of Czechoslovakia, 1969–1976; Cologne, 1979; with a preface by Zdeněk Mlynar, 1984) was an émigré publication and is an account of the Communist regime's "normalization" policy and its negative influence on the society. Arrested in 1981, Šimečka was kept in prison for over one year, although he had not been convicted. After his release, he earned his living as a writer. In 1984 he wrote the essay "Náš soudruh Winston Smith" (Our comrade Winston Smith), influenced by George Orwell's 1984. The year 1985 saw the publication of Kruhová obrana (The full resistance), a collection of columns by Šimečka that were a defense against the repressive atmosphere of "normalization." Owing to his prison experience, Šimečka became convinced that socialism was impossible to reform and that a leadership change would not be sufficient since a change of the system was necessary. He expounded his views most fully in his last book, Koniec nehybnosti (The end of idleness; 1989). After the Velvet Revolution, Šimečka consistently refused to accept any academic or political positions, and it was only after a personal request by Václav Havel in 1990 that he agreed to become chairman of a council of presidential advisers. (PU)

SIMEON II Saxe-Coburg-Gotha [or Saksoburggotski] (16 June 1937, Sofia), tsar (1943–46) and prime minister of Bulgaria. The son of Tsar Boris III and Tsarina Joanna (formerly Princess Giovanna, the daughter of Italian king Victor Emmanuel III), Simeon was only six years old when his father died; therefore, a three-man Regency Council was established to rule Bulgaria on behalf of the minor heir to the throne; it consisted of Bogdan Filov, General Nikola Mihov, and Simeon’s uncle, Kiril. After the Communists seized power, their rigged referendum of 8 October 1946 abolished the monarchy, and Simeon and his mother and sister went into exile in Egypt, where his grandfather, the dethroned king of Italy, also lived. Simeon attended Victoria College in Alexandria. In 1951 the royal family was granted asylum in Spain, and Simeon entered the Lycée Français in Madrid. In 1959 he graduated from the Valley Forge Military Academy in the United States, where he was known as “Cadet Rylski.” In 1962 he married the Spanish aristocrat Margarita Gomez-Acebo y Cejuela, with whom he had four sons and one daughter. For many years Simeon pursued a successful business career. He never formally abdicated.

Shortly after the collapse of the Communist regime in Bulgaria (November 1989), some politicians, including Stefan Savov, Konstantin Trenchev, and Filip Dimitrov, called for the restoration of the monarchy and for the reinstatement of Simeon to the throne, but at that time the idea did not gain the support of the majority of Bulgarians. In January 1990 Simeon announced that he was ready to return to Bulgaria, not as tsar but as a person who might be useful to his country owing to his experience and contacts. It is believed that he was greatly influenced in this decision by King Juan Carlos, who had been instrumental in Spain’s transition from Francoism to democracy. For a long time, a referendum on the restoration of the monarchy was considered, but after a republican constitution was adopted in June 1991, such a restoration was no longer on the agenda. In 1993 the issue was raised again in a public debate, but no conclusion was reached. In May 1996 Simeon and his wife visited Bulgaria, where he was very warmly welcomed.

In 1998 the Constitutional Court ordered restitution to the royal family of its property in Bulgaria.

After less than four years in power, the popularity of the Union of Democratic Forces (UDF) and Prime Minister Ivan Kostov dropped drastically as a result of only a slow improvement in the economic situation. Simeon returned to Bulgaria (6 April 2001) and founded the National Movement Simeon II (Natsionalno Dvizhenie Simeon Vtori). He promised an improvement in the economic situation of the poorest and a restoration of law and order, as well as a general continuation of privatization and the pro-Western foreign policy. In his election campaign, he won the support of people disappointed by the rule of the UDF and the post-Communists. In the elections of 17 June 2001 the National Movement Simeon II scored unexpected success, receiving 42.7 percent of the vote and 120 out of 240 seats. One week later, Simeon became head of a government formed in coalition with the Turkish Movement for Rights and Freedoms. Simeon is the first former European monarch of the twentieth century to have returned to power in his former country. Because progress in the implementation of the election promises was rather slow, the popularity of his government soon diminished, but Simeon succeeded in maintaining relative domestic stability, and he intensified efforts to secure Bulgaria’s admission into NATO and the European Union. SIMONE André [originally Otto Katz] (27 May 1895 or 1900, Prague–3 September 1952, Prague), Communist activist mainly associated with Czechoslovakia. The son of a Jewish textile industrialist, in his youth Simone was friends with Franz Kafka. Thanks to his family’s financial support, he published several of Kafka’s plays, but they were unsuccessful. In 1922 Simone joined the Communist Party of Germany (CPG) and took charge of a radical leftist publishing house. In 1928 he began to work with Soviet intelligence. In 1932–33 he lived in the Soviet Union and then went to France, where he took the pseudonym of André Simone and became the right-hand man of Willy Münzenberg, head of propaganda and disinformation of the Communist International and a former leader of the CPG. Simone co-founded the International Committee for Aid to Victims of Nazi Fascism, which organized the “Leipzig counter-trial” in London.

After the Molotov-Ribbentrop Pact was signed in August 1939, Münzenberg criticized Stalin, and in October 1940 Simone allegedly took part in the execution of Münzenberg. Subsequently, as a German political refugee, he made his way via Portugal to the United States, where he organized the Soviet intelligence network. He then had to escape from the FBI to Mexico and subsequently returned to the Soviet Union. When the Red Army marched into Czechoslovakia in 1945, Simone became head of NKVD headquarters in Prague. In 1946 he joined the Communist Party of Czechoslovakia (CPC). After the coup of February 1948, he became chief of Czechoslovak intelligence, although officially he was the press director in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. There are suspicions that Simone was instrumental in the alleged suicide of Jan Masaryk. In 1951 Simone became entangled in the case of Noel Field, which had been prepared by the services of the Soviet Union and other Communist bloc countries. As part of the purge of the apparatus of power in Czechoslovakia, Simone was accused of being involved in an “anti-state conspiracy center” and in a “Zionist plot.” On 27 November 1952, after a one-week trial, he was sentenced to death and then executed, along with Rudolf Slánský and nine other defendants. In 1963 Simone was posthumously reinstated to membership in the CPC. (WR)

SIMOVIĆ Dušan (9 November 1882, Kagujevac–26 August 1962, Belgrade), Serbian general and politician. In 1900 Simović graduated from a military academy. He took part in the Balkan Wars (1912–13) and subsequently fought in World War I as the chief of staff of a division. Between world wars Simović held several military positions, including that of commander of the second divisional district. Until the fall of 1940 he served as chief of staff of the army, and then he became commander-in-chief of the Yugoslav air force. Simović authored the textbooks—for example, Taktika vazduhoplovstva (Air force tactics; 1928) and Savremene ratne doktrine (Modern military doctrines; 1939). After the outbreak of World War II, from 1939 onwards Simović helped in the intensive development of the military forces. He had a critical attitude toward Yugoslavia’s rapprochement with the Axis countries. The British and American diplomats supported his stance, particularly as Simović promised them that Yugoslavia would fight against Italy and Germany. Simović hoped for British aid to Yugoslavia and believed that Great Britain, supported by the United States, would defeat Germany.

After Prince Regent Paul and Prime Minister Dragiša Cvetković signed the protocol on Yugoslavia’s accession to the Tripartite Pact in Vienna (25 March 1941), a military coup d’état was staged in Belgrade on the night of 26–27 March 1941. As a result of this coup, Prince Peter ascended to the throne and Simović became head of the government. In order to alleviate the tensions between the Serbs and Croats, Simović invited Vladko Maček, leader of the Croatian Peasant Party, to join his government. In Belgrade, people demonstrated their support for the coup. Initially Simović tried to proceed with caution and declared that there would be no major changes in Yugoslavia’s policy, but the German reaction to the coup was definitely hostile. Seeking foreign support, Simović and Minister of Foreign Affairs Momčilo Ninčić entered into negotiations with John Dill, the British chief of staff. On the night of 5–6 April Simović also signed a treaty of friendship and non-aggression with the Soviet Union. However, his efforts did not prevent the invasion of Yugoslavia by the Third Reich, which took place on 6 April. Simović became chief of the general staff of the Yugoslav army, which was soon defeated. On 14 April 1941 Simović resigned his command, and, along with the government, he went into exile in Great Britain. He sought to obtain British aid for the underground army led by General Dragoljub (Draža) Mihailović in occupied Yugoslavia, but the British help was relatively small. The Kremlin, which supported the Communist Partisans led by Josip Broz Tito, had an even more negative attitude toward Simović’s government. On 12 January 1942 Simović resigned as prime minister of the government-in-exile. In February 1944, when the Communists were in control of a substantial part of Yugoslavia, Simović saw that it was necessary to reach a compromise with Tito, and in May 1945 he returned to Yugoslavia. However, he did not play any political role. (WR)

SINGER Isaac (Icchok) Bashevis, pseudonyms “Icchok Warszawski” and “D. Segal” (14 July 1907, Leoncin, near Radzymin–24 July 1991, Miami, Florida), Jewish writer from Poland. Singer was the son of an unofficial rabbi of the poor. Raised in Warsaw (1908–17) and Biłgoraj (1917–22), he worked as an editor for Literarisze Bleter and a translator into Yiddish of the works of Erich Maria Remarque, Thomas Mann, and Stefan Zweig. The award-winning short story “Ojfe der elter” (Old age) was his literary debut in 1925. From the early 1930s Singer worked with the Warsaw monthly Globus. In 1933, he published the novel Szatan w Goraju (Satan in Goraj), considered one of his most important works.

In 1935 Singer emigrated to the United States. He worked for the New York daily Forverts, writing literary criticisms, editorials, short stories, and serialized novels, including Der zindiker Moshiekh (Moses the Sinner; 1935–36); Familie Mushkat (The Mushkat family; 1945); Gimpl tan (Gimpal the idiot; 1950); Oseh ha-nifla’ot mi-Lublin (The magician from Lublin; 1960); Der knecht (The slave; 1962); Der Hojfe (The court; 1967); Der man fun chalojmes (A dreamer; 1970–71); Sonim (Enemies; 1972); Der baal tszuve (Penitent; 1974); and Shosha (1978). Some of Singer’s short story collections were translated simultaneously into English—for example, Short Friday (1965) and Death of Methuselah and Other Stories (1988). Singer focused on the philosophical and religious problems of the Orthodox and assimilated Jews. His works contain autobiographical elements and reveal his links to Poland. In some of his novels—Der kenig fun di felder (The king of fields; 1988), for example—he drew a broad historical background of Jewish life in Poland. The author of several hundred stories and novels gradually translated into English, Singer was recognized by critics for the art of narration in his novellas. In 1978 he was awarded the Nobel Prize for literature. In postwar Poland Singer was completely glossed over in silence until 1978, when he became a best-selling author recalling the joint Polish-Jewish heritage. (WR)

SINISHTA Gjon (1929, Montenegro–1995, San Francisco), Albanian politician and cultural activist. Sinishta studied at the Jesuit Collegium Xaverianum in Shkodër. In 1946 he was briefly arrested with a group of students, and a year later he entered the novitiate in Shkodër. In view of an anti-church campaign by the Communists he discontinued the novitiate and left Albania. He moved to Yugoslavia, where he worked as a journalist for the Albanian-language press. After military service, Sinishta worked for Radio Prishtina and the Albanian periodical Rilindja. In September 1956 he was arrested and sentenced to five years in prison for allegedly spying for the United States and for anti-Communist propaganda. After leaving prison in 1961, Sinishta worked as a bookkeeper in Zagreb and Ljubljana. Harassed by the police and frequently arrested, in 1964 he illegally left for Austria and then for Italy. For more than a year he worked at the Jesuit Center for Social Studies in Milan. In 1965 he went to the United States, where he worked in a Detroit factory. He graduated from Saint Coral University, and in 1967 he created an Albanian Catholic Information Center. Owing to Sinishta’s initiative, the Albanian Catholic Bulletin was founded in Santa Clara, California, in 1980, and it moved to San Francisco in 1994. The bulletin recorded the persecutions of Albanian Catholics. Sinishta also co-founded the Daniel Dajani Institute in San Francisco, which dealt with studies in Albanian Catholicism. Sinishta was a devoted collector of testimonies of anti-religious persecution. In 1992 he returned to Albania. After his death Sinishta was buried in Rrmajt Cemetery in Shkodër. His book, Sacrifice for Albania; The Fulfilled Promise: A Documentary Account of Religious Persecution in Albania (1976), was the first monograph on the martyrdom of the Albanian clergy. (TC)

SIRK Artur (25 September 1900, Järvamaal–2 August 1937, Echternach, Luxembourg), leader of Estonian Fascists. Sirk was born into a peasant family. He fought as a volunteer in the war of 1918–19. He subsequently completed law studies. From 1920 to 1926 he served in the army and worked for some time as a military court secretary. In 1926 he began practicing as an attorney. Brilliant and energetic, he had great political ambitions. He initially became a member of the New Settlers’ Party and later joined the League of Veterans of the Struggle for Freedom (Vabadussõjalaste Keskkliit), which was transformed into the Estonian League of War of Independence Veterans (Eesti Vabadussõjalaste Liit [EVL]) in 1924. In October 1926, at the First Congress of this organization, Sirk became its deputy chairman. Along with Theodor Rõuk, he developed the EVL’s Fascist ideology, along the lines of the Italian and German models. In March 1931, at the Second Congress of the EVL, Sirk announced the rebuilding of the country according to the principles of the EVL movement. He became head of the EVL, which he transformed into a right-wing political party. EVL propaganda gained popularity because it built on the veteran origins of the EVL movement and took advantage of the impoverishment of society during the Great Depression. The EVL movement became a paramilitary organization founded on a leadership model, with frequent parades and a fondness for uniforms and ranks.

As early as 1931 Sirk called for a constitutional reform that would bring about the end of the system of parliamentary democracy. The EVL movement no longer resorted to rhetoric against the German minority because it cooperated with and was supported by the Nazis. The Deutsch-Baltische Partei, led by Victor zur Muehlen-Eigstfer, openly supported the EVL. After winning 33 percent support in a referendum of June 1933, the EVL proposed its own draft for a constitution and demanded a referendum on its adoption. On 11 August 1933 the government of Jaan Tõnisson declared a state of emergency and banned the EVL's activities. In a referendum of 14–16 October 1933 the draft constitution promoted by the EVL received 419,000 votes (56.4 percent). Sirk organized large demonstrations under Fascist slogans. In the January 1934 elections the EVL won the majority in all major cities, including Tallinn, Tartu, Pärnu, and Viljandi. In response Konstantin Päts staged a coup d'état, declaring a state of emergency on 12 March 1934 and assuming dictatorial powers with the help of part of the army. Sirk and other EVL leaders were arrested. On 11 November 1934 Sirk managed to escape from prison. He went to Finland; from there he directed a national conspiracy that plotted a coup. However, in 1935 the plot was discovered by the police; therefore, Sirk remained in exile. He went to live in Luxembourg. He died two days after falling out of a window on the first floor of a hotel. Sirk's death was generally believed to be a suicide, but there was also speculation that it was a political murder. (WR)

ŠIROKÝ Viliam (31 May 1902, Bratislava–6 October 1971, Prague), Czechoslovak Communist activist. The son of a Slovak laborer of Hungarian descent, after finishing elementary school, Široký worked on the railways and joined the Social Democratic Party. In 1921 he was one of the founders of the Communist Party of Czechoslovakia (CPC). He subsequently worked in the party apparatus in Prague and Bratislava. As secretary of an organization of the Slovak Communists, Široký attended the Sixth Congress of the Communist International in Moscow (1928). In 1929 he became a member of the Central Committee (CC), in 1931 a member of the Politburo, and in 1935 a member of the Secretariat of the CC of the CPC. In 1935 Široký spoke at the Seventh Congress of the Comintern and became a deputy member of the Comintern Executive Committee. In 1935 he also became an MP in the Prague parliament. After the Pact of Munich of September 1938, Široký left for Paris, from where he went to Moscow in March 1940. Like other Slovak Communist leaders, until the end of 1943 he believed that after the war Slovakia should become a Soviet republic. In 1941 Široký returned to Slovakia to organize the Communist underground resistance, but he was arrested and sentenced to fourteen years' imprisonment. In February 1945 he escaped and, with the help of Communist partisans, made his way to Moscow. Široký took part in negotiations that resulted in the establishment of a Czechoslovak government in Košice (April 1945). He assumed the post of deputy prime minister and held this post until 1950. From August 1945 onwards he also served as first secretary of the CP of Slovakia, and he was among the leaders of the Presidium of the CPC CC that led the coup d'état in February 1948. In June 1948, along with Rudolf Slánský, Široký represented the CPC at a conference of the Information Bureau of the Communist and Workers' Parties (Cominform) at which Josip Broz Tito and the Yugoslav party were denounced. In September 1948 at a meeting of the CC of the CP of Slovakia, Široký delivered a speech in which he gave a signal to attack "bourgeois nationalism" within the party. Later he led the purges and persecutions of Slovak activists accused of "Titoism." Co-responsible for the decision to persecute participants of the Slovak National Uprising, he supervised these persecutions.

In March 1950 Široký was appointed prime minister, and in January 1951 he became a member of the CC "political secretariat," which was in charge of the security apparatus. In December 1952 Široký exercised political supervision over the trial of Slánský and his associates, which ended in eleven death sentences. After the death of Stalin and Klement Gottwald in 1953, Široký, as the right-hand man of Antonín Novotný, was largely responsible for the continuation of the persecutions and the slowing down of de-Stalinization in Czechoslovakia. In the late 1950s and early 1960s, when Slovak Communist activists were being released from prison, Široký had to assume an increasingly defensive position. Although Rudolf Barák, who had been co-responsible for the political trials but now supported the rehabilitation of wrongly accused politicians, was removed from power in 1962, Široký was unable to save his position. In June 1963 a special commission of the CC of the CP of Slovakia recommended changes in the leadership of the party. A bad economic situation was another argument in favor of these changes. In September of that year Široký lost both of his posts. In May 1968, during the Prague Spring, he was suspended as a party member for co-organizing the political trials and purges, but in May 1971 he was reinstated to full membership of the CPC. Široký was never brought to justice for his complicity in the crimes of the Stalinist period. (WR)

SIWICKI Florian (10 January 1925, Łuck [Lutsk]), Polish Communist general. The son of a non-commissioned officer of the Polish Army, after the Red Army occupied the Eastern Borderlands of interwar Poland, in 1940 Siwicki was deported with his family deep into the USSR. In early 1943 he was drafted into the Red Army. On his request he was transferred to the Polish Army, created under the command of General Zygmunt Berling, and he was sent to an officer training course at the Ryazan School of Infantry. Siwicki graduated from this school in December 1943. Later he commanded a detachment of cadets of the Tadeusz Kościuszko Infantry Officers' School. At the end of World War II and soon thereafter Siwicki took part in combating the Polish pro-independence underground in Poland. From December 1948 he belonged to the (Communist) Polish United Workers' Party (Polska Zjednoczona Partia Robotnicza [PUWP]). In the early 1950s he left for the USSR, where he graduated from the Academy of the Soviet General Staff in 1956. In 1961–63 Siwicki was military attaché in China. In 1962 he was promoted to brigadier general. From April 1968 he commanded the Silesian Military District, and in this capacity he commanded Polish troops during the Warsaw Pact invasion of Czechoslovakia in August 1968. In October 1968 Siwicki was promoted to general of division, and in 1974, to general of arms. From May 1971 he was deputy chief and from January 1973 chief of the General Staff and deputy minister of national defense. Siwicki owed his rapid career rise to General Wojciech Jaruzelski. In December 1975 Siwicki became a member of the PUWP Central Committee (CC), and in October 1981, a deputy member of the PUWP CC Politburo. He belonged to a close circle of those who engineered the period of martial law, leading a team that planned it from October 1980; later he belonged to the non-constitutional

Military Council of National Salvation (Wojskowa Rada Ocalenia Narodowego), which functioned as the governing body during martial law. In November 1983 Siwicki was appointed minister of national defense, and in July 1986 he joined the PUWP CC Politburo as a full member. After the formation of the Tadeusz Mazowiecki government in September 1989, Siwicki remained in office, not really understanding the nature and depth of the change. As late as 1990 he pointed to the alleged NATO danger to Poland and to the necessity of Soviet guarantees. Dismissed in July 1990, Siwicki retired. (WR)

ŠĶĒLE Andris (16 January 1958, Aluksne), Latvian politician and businessman. In 1981 Šķēle graduated from the Latvian Agricultural Academy, specializing in engineering. In 1981–90 he worked in managerial positions at the Latvian Research Institute, dealing with the mechanization and electrification of agriculture. From 1990 to 1993 he was first deputy minister of agriculture of the Latvian SSR and (from 1991) of independent Latvia. In August 1993 he became minister of agriculture. In 1994–95 Šķēle was a successful businessman, chairing several food processing companies (for example, AveLat) and serving as a consultant to the Latvian Privatization Agency. After parliamentary elections, on 21 December 1995, still a nonparty person, Šķēle became prime minister of a center-right coalition government. He continued with market reforms, overcoming several political problems. In May 1996 he dismissed Deputy Prime Minister Alberis Kauls. In July 1996, as a result of the presidential election won by Guntis Ulmanis, the ruling coalition faced new problems. When in October 1996 Šķēle dismissed another deputy prime minister, Ziedonis Čevērs, he was accused of dictatorial aspirations. Since Ulmanis questioned his choice for minister of finance, on 20 January 1997 Šķēle resigned. The conflict ended in victory for Šķēle, when on 27 February 1997 he formed another government; however, in connection with accusations of his having taken part in financial scandals, on 28 July 1997 Šķēle resigned. In 1998 he co-founded and chaired the center-right People's Party (Tautas Partija [PL]), which won 24 percent of the mandates in the elections of October 1998. As a result of another coalition agreement among the PL, the (Liberal) Latvian Way, and the National Conservatives, on 16 July 1999 Šķēle formed another center-right government. Involved in the struggle for privatization of the largest state enterprises, on 12 April 2000 Šķēle was forced to resign. Šķēle's governments played an important role in preparing Latvia for integration into NATO and the European Union. As a result Šķēle has also become one of the richest Latvians. (JH)

SKERLIĆ Jovan (8 August 1877, Belgrade–15 May 1914, Belgrade), Serbian critic and literary historian. Skerlić studied in Belgrade and Lausanne, where he earned a doctorate. He subsequently taught at a high school and worked as an associate professor and full professor at the Superior School (Velika Škola), which became the University of Belgrade in 1905. A politician from the Radical Party, which ruled in Serbia from 1903 onwards, Skerlić briefly leaned toward socialism. In 1905–7 he edited Srpski književni glasnik, the leading Serbian literary periodical. He founded the Association of Serbian Writers (Udruženje Književnika Srbije) and the Serbian Literary Association (Srpska Književna Zadruga). He was the author of the monographs Jakov Ignjatović (1904); Omladina i njena književnost (Omladina and its literature; 1906); Srpska književnost u XVIII veku (Serbian literature in the eighteenth century; 1909); and Svetozar Marković: Njegov život, rad i ideje (Svetozar Marković: His life, work, and ideas; 1910). Skerlić's most important work, Istorija nove srpske književnosti (The history of modern Serbian literature; 1914), presented the development of contemporary Serbian literature as a process similar to the trends prevailing in Europe. Six volumes of his critical articles were published during his lifetime. Skerlić worked for the establishment of Yugoslavia and was the spiritual leader of the so-called revolutionary youth. Gavrilo Princip, a member of Young Bosnia (an organization within Omladina, a great revolutionary youth movement that spread across all the South Slavic countries at the beginning of the twentieth century), carried a wreath at Skerlić's funeral. SKIRMUNT Konstanty (30 July 1866, Mołodów, Polesia–24 July 1949, Warsaw), Polish diplomat. Skirmunt came from the landed nobility. After graduating from a law school in St. Petersburg, he worked as an attorney and a manager of his family estate. He belonged to the "realist" group, which sought to achieve the moderate political aim of modernizing the autocratic system in Russia. In 1907, Skirmunt, along with other politicians connected with the periodical Kurier Litewski (Lithuanian courier), co-founded the Home Party of Lithuania and Ruthenia (Stronnictwo Krajowe Litwy i Rusi). The party invoked the historical legacy of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania. Royalist loyalism and fear of social radicalism prompted Skirmunt to seek ties with the Party of Real Politics (Stronnictwo Polityki Realnej). Between 1907 and 1917 he was a deputy to the Russian State Duma. In 1916 he left for the West, where he joined an effort to convince the Entente powers to embrace the cause of Poland's independence. In the summer of 1917 he participated in the foundation of the Polish National Committee (Komitet Narodowy Polski) and represented it in Italy, including the Vatican.

In independent Poland, between 1919 and 1921, Skirmunt was envoy to Italy, and from June 1921 to June 1922 he served as minister of foreign affairs in the governments of Wincenty Witos and Antoni Ponikowski. He endeavored to improve the image of Poland in the West, to achieve the recognition of its borders by the Entente powers, and to improve its relations with neighboring states. In November 1921, Skirmunt signed a Polish-Czechoslovak agreement for cooperation. However, the German-Soviet Rapallo Pact of April 1922 jeopardized his mission. Between 1923 and 1924 Skirmunt represented Poland in the League of Nations. From 1922 to 1929 he served as its envoy to Great Britain and then as the Polish ambassador to London until 1934. Later, Skirmunt withdrew from active political life, objecting to the policies of Józef Beck. In September 1939 some of his family was murdered when the Red Army invaded Polesia in eastern Poland. Skirmunt settled in Warsaw, where he died destitute after the war. His unpublished memoirs are deposited in the manuscript collection of the library of the Catholic University of Lublin. (WR)

ŠKIRPA Kazys (18 February 1895, Nemajūnai, near Biržai–18 August 1979, Washington, D.C.), Lithuanian officer and politician. Born into a peasant family, in 1916 Škirpa was inducted into the Russian Army. After graduating from the Military Academy in Peterhof, he was sent to Siberia. In the autumn of 1917 he returned to Petrograd (St. Petersburg), where he formed Lithuanian units that supported Lithuanian independence. In 1918 he joined the newly formed Lithuanian Army and took part in its front-line operations, serving as commander of a regiment. In 1920 Škirpa was elected to the Legislative Assembly on the Populist ticket. After graduating from the Military School in Kaunas, he went to study at the Belgian Military Academy in Brussels, graduating in 1925. After returning to his country, Škirpa became head of the Second Department (Intelligence) of the General Staff, but he had to resign this position after the nationalist coup d'état of December 1926. He then began working in the diplomatic service, initially as a clerk in the consular section at the legation in Berlin (1927–30) and then as a military attaché in Germany. In 1937 Škirpa became Lithuania's representative to the League of Nations. After Lithuania was presented with the Polish ultimatum of March 1938, he was sent as a special envoy to Warsaw and established diplomatic relations between Poland and Lithuania. He subsequently became minister to Poland and then to Berlin.

Škirpa supported a pro-German orientation. After Lithuania was occupied by the Red Army and in 1940 incorporated into the Soviet Union, he helped to establish the Front of Lithuanian Activists. Following the German invasion of the Soviet Union, Lithuanian pro-independence forces began to form a provisional government, and on 23 June 1941 Škirpa was to assume the post of prime minister of this government. However, knowing his pro-independence ambitions, the Third Reich authorities did not allow him to go to Lithuania. He was placed under house arrest in southern Germany. When in 1944 he renewed his demands for the establishment of an independent government in Lithuania, he was taken to a concentration camp in Bad Godesberg. After the end of World War II, he went to France. In 1946 he moved to Ireland, where he taught Russian at the University of Dublin. In 1949 he emigrated to the United States and worked at the Library of Congress, Washington, D.C. In 1965 he retired. In 1975 Škirpa published his memoirs, depicting his activities in Germany, Sukilimas Lietuvos suverenumui atstatyti (The uprising for Lithuanian independence). (WR)

SKŁADKOWSKI Felicjan Sławoj (9 June 1885, Gażyn, near Gostynin–31 August 1962, London), Polish general, politician, and physician. After graduating from high school in Kielce in 1904, Składkowski enrolled at the Medical School of the University of Warsaw. Simultaneously, he became active in the struggle for independence through the Polish Socialist Party (in its Revolutionary Faction from 1906). In November 1904, he was imprisoned at the Pawiak jail for participating in a demonstration in Warsaw. Expelled from the medical school, he was deported to Kielce and put under police supervision. To avoid a trial, he left for Kraków, where he completed his medical studies in 1911, specializing in surgery. Składkowski interned at the Surgical Clinic of the Jagiellonian University and later supervised a surgical clinic in Sosnowiec. In August 1914 he joined the Polish Legions, which had been created as an auxiliary force for the Austro-Hungarian Army. He served as a physician until their dissolution. Following the oath crisis, he was interned in Beniaminów. Released in August 1918, he worked as a doctor at a coal mine.

In November 1918, Składkowski participated in disarming German soldiers and Communist Red Guards in the Zagłębie Dąbrowskie area. He briefly served as the military commander of the Army Command in Dąbrowa Górnicza and, from February 1919, as its staff and political officer. In 1919 and 1920, he participated in the Polish-Soviet war as the chief military surgeon of various units. From 1921 to 1923 he was appointed inspector of the medical units of the Polish Army. In 1924 he graduated from the Ecole Supérieure de Guerre. Appointed head of the Medical Department of the Ministry of Military Affairs, Składkowski was promoted to brigadier general. During the coup d'état of May 1926, he sided actively with Józef Piłsudski. Following the latter's victory, Składkowski was assigned the post of government commissioner of the City of Warsaw. In August 1926, he was shifted to the reserves, and between October 1926 and December 1929 he served as minister of interior, as well as extraordinary commissioner for the struggle against contagious diseases. Składkowski concentrated on the reform of the administrative apparatus and improving the nation's level of hygiene. At that time, Poland's wits jokingly began referring to public toilets as "sławojki." Składkowski loyally carried out all of Piłsudski's directives. He personally participated in forcibly ejecting protesting Communist deputies on the first day of the inaugurations for the newly elected parliament in March 1928. In January 1930, Składkowski became a deputy to the first vice-minister of military affairs and the chief of the army administration. In June 1930, he was once again appointed minister of interior. He personally signed orders to arrest many MPs following the dissolution of parliament in September 1930. From 1930 to 1939, he held a seat in the parliament, and in 1931 he was reappointed deputy minister of military affairs and chief of the army administration. In March 1936, he was promoted to major general.

On 15 May 1936, Składkowski became prime minister and minister of interior. However, his power was secondary to that of the ruling triumvirate of Ignacy Mościcki, Edward Rydz-Śmigły, and Józef Beck. Therefore he concentrated on matters of administration and hygiene. Składkowski became the longest-sitting prime minister of interwar Poland. In September 1939, along with his government, he left Warsaw for Romania, where he was interned. On 30 September 1939, he resigned. Eventually, through Bulgaria and Turkey, he reached the Polish Army units in Palestine in January 1941. His attempt to join the medical corps was rejected. Składkowski testified several times before a commission investigating the causes of the fall of Poland in 1939. He arrived in Great Britain in 1947, and after being processed in the camps of the Polish Retraining and Resettlement Corps, he settled in London. Składkowski published Moja służba w brygadzie: Pamiętnik polowy (My service in the brigade: A field memoir; 1932–33); Strzępy meldunków (The shreds of reports; 1936); and Nie ostatnie słowo oskarżonego: Wspomnienia i artykuły (Not the last word of the accused: Memoirs and articles; 1964). In 1990 Składkowski's ashes were reinterred in Powązki Cemetery in Warsaw. (JS)

SKŁODOWSKA-CURIE Maria (7 November 1867, Warsaw–4 July 1934, Sancellemoz, France), Polish and French scientist, Nobel Prize winner. Skłodowska-Curie came from a family of impoverished landed nobility. Her parents worked as teachers. She had seven siblings. Because of an imperial ban on admitting women to the University of Warsaw, she was unable to study in Russian Poland. Since she lacked the means to study abroad, she became a teacher, while also taking classes at the underground “Flying University.” However, in 1891, Skłodowska-Curie enrolled at the Sorbonne. She passed her physics and math exams in 1894 with the highest scores, and a year later she married the French physicist Pierre Curie. His respect for her scientific abilities allowed her to continue her research. Consequently, in 1898, Skłodowska-Curie discovered the chemical element called polon (to commemorate Poland), and, in the following year, radium. Working under hazardous conditions, including exposure to radioactivity (whose lethal qualities were quite unknown at the time) caused the deterioration of the Curie couple's health. However, the derivation of radium in 1903 brought them international fame, especially since medical experiments showed that radioactivity was a useful tool to fight cancer. Refusing to deny radium to the sick, who turned to the Curies to obtain the element for medical reasons, the couple continued to produce radium for free. They failed to patent their discovery because they believed that their discovery should serve humanity. However, the hazardous nature of the production of radium had already become apparent to the couple.

In 1903, Skłodowska-Curie successfully defended her doctoral dissertation at the Sorbonne, the first woman to do so there. In the very same year, along with her husband and the French physicist Antoine Henri Becquerel, she was awarded the Nobel Prize in physics. Their success led the French government to endow a chair of general physics at the Sorbonne. While Pierre held the chair, Skłodowska-Curie was his deputy. Following her husband's death in a traffic accident in 1906, she took over the chair, becoming the first female lecturer at the Sorbonne. Her further scientific success notwithstanding, Skłodowska-Curie was not elected to the French Academy of Sciences—solely because she was a woman. In 1911 she was awarded a Nobel Prize in chemistry, which solidified her position as the world's leading scientist. Meanwhile, the tabloids accused her of a love affair with the young physicist Paul Langevin and of plagiarizing his work. She denied the allegations, but the scandal press whipped up a nationalist frenzy, with demands to strip her of the chair and even to expel her from France. Skłodowska-Curie left Paris briefly but did not move to Poland, despite the encouragement of such people as Henryk Sienkiewicz. In 1912, she was appointed head of the Radium Institute in Paris. In time, at the institute, she supervised the work of her daughter and her husband, Frédéric Joliot, who eventually won the Nobel Prize as well. During World War I Skłodowska-Curie organized radiological services for military hospitals, trained their personnel, and rescued thousands of wounded servicemen. Hospital emergency vehicles based upon her specifications and widely used in France were dubbed les petites Curie (Little Curies). In the 1920s, Skłodowska-Curie often visited Poland and contributed to the establishment of the Radium Institute in Warsaw (1932). She successfully raised funds in the United States for scientific work. She died of leukemia. She was buried at her husband's family cemetery in Sceaux. After World War II Skłodowska-Curie's ashes were transferred to the Panthéon in Paris. (AG)

SKOROPADSKYI Pavlo (15 May 1873, Wiesbaden, Germany–26 April 1945, Metten, Germany), hetman of Ukraine. Skoropadskyi was descended from an old Cossack family and inherited the Trostyanets estate in the Poltava region in Ukraine. After finishing high school in Starodub, he graduated from the Page Corps in 1893. He subsequently served in the tsar's Horse Guards. During the 1904–5 Russo-Japanese War, Skoropadskyi was aide-de-camp to Tsar Nicholas II. In 1906 he was promoted to colonel, and in 1912 he became general and commander of a cavalry regiment in the tsar's Horse Guards. During World War I Skoropadskyi commanded the First Division of the Horse Guards, the Thirty-fourth Army Corps, and from August to December 1917—after the February 1917 revolution—he commanded the First Ukrainian Corps. Along with Symon Petlura, Skoropadskyi organized the army of the Ukrainian Central Rada (Council). In October 1917, at the All-Ukrainian Congress of the Free Cossacks in Chyhyryn, Skoropadskyi was elected commander-in-chief of this army. In November 1917 the units he commanded, about sixty thousand strong, seized control of the Zhmerynka-Shepetovka railway line and then disarmed pro-Bolshevik military forces advancing into the Ukraine from the Romanian front.

Skoropadskyi disagreed with the radical program of the Rada, particularly on the issue of agricultural reform; therefore, he established a conservative opposition known as the Ukrainian National Hromada. His plans to overthrow the Rada were also supported by the Union of Landowners. When Austrian and German troops seized Ukraine at the beginning of 1918, Skoropadskyi, helped by conservative officers, removed the Rada government, and, on 29 April 1918 in Kiev he was named hetman of Ukraine. The Rada, along with its land committees, was dissolved; the administration was changed; and all laws passed by the Rada were abrogated. "Ukrainian State" was adopted as the name of the nation, and its system was a combination of dictatorship and republic. Skoropadskyi received support from the Russian Constitutional Democratic Party and even from monarchists. He was also supported by Ukrainian landowners, rich peasants, entrepreneurs, and merchants. Still, he was a tool in the hands of the occupation authorities, the Central Powers. For some time Skoropadskyi managed to control the social situation and end peasant riots wherein peasants had plundered manor houses and murdered the owners. He created a semblance of independence of Ukraine, and as a result of his efforts, Ukraine's independence was recognized by Germany, Austria-Hungary, Turkey, Bulgaria, and Romania. However, the Central Powers restricted the development of the Ukrainian Army, thus undermining Skoropadskyi's position. Moreover, Skoropadskyi attempted to restore the pre-revolutionary social order and surrounded himself with Russian officials. In May 1918 the leftist opposition to the hetman's government united into the Ukrainian National Union. In the summer of that year peasant rebellions and riots began to increase, and assassination attempts on prominent Austrians and Germans became more frequent.

When Austria-Hungary collapsed in the fall of 1918, Skoropadskyi made attempts to reach an agreement with the opposition, but his November 1918 address announcing his intention to enter into a federation with a future non-Bolshevik Russia only worsened the situation. When on 11 November 1918 the armistice was signed on the Western front, radical peasant riots increased. Abandoned by the best military units, including the Sich Riflemen, Skoropadskyi followed the German Army, which withdrew from Kiev on 14 December 1918. Kiev was later invaded by the troops of the Directory (a government established by the Rada) under the leadership of Petlura. Skoropadskyi went to live in Wannsee, near Berlin. He became one of the most prominent figures of the Ukrainian émigré community. He rallied national conservative groups around himself, including groups led by Vyacheslav Lypynskyi. Skoropadskyi led the Ukrainian Agrarian National Union, as well as the Ukrainian "hetmanite" organizations in the United States and Canada. In 1923 he gave his support to Adolf Hitler. Aligned with conservative Junker groups, Skoropadskyi brought about the establishment of the Ukrainian Scientific Institute and the Ukrainian Hromada in 1926. After Hitler came to power, Skoropadskyi maintained contacts with Nazi authorities. These contacts ended after the Third Reich and the Soviet Union signed the Molotov-Ribbentrop Pact on 23 August 1939; therefore, when Germany occupied Ukraine in June 1941, Skoropadskyi did not play any role in the occupation government. Skoropadskyi died as the result of an Allied bombing raid. (WR) SKRYPNYK Mykola (25 January 1872, Yasnovatoie, near Donetsk–7 July 1933, Kiev), Ukrainian Communist activist. Skrypnyk was born into the family of a railroad worker. In 1897 he joined the Russian Social Democratic Workers' Party (RSDWP). He was one of the main party agitators in the early stages of the party's development. He traveled a lot throughout Russia, the Ukraine, and Siberia, establishing party units. He was arrested fifteen times and deported seven times. In 1900 Skrypnyk enrolled at the St. Petersburg Technological Institute. After a split in the party in 1903, Skrypnyk supported the Bolsheviks. In 1905 he was a delegate to the Third Congress of the RSDWP(B) in London. During the revolution of 1905 he was secretary of the St. Petersburg committee of the party. After the suppression of the revolution, Skrypnyk very often traveled abroad, getting in touch with the party leadership in exile (for example, with Lenin). He also secretly organized party units in, for example, Yaroslavl, Moscow, and the Urals. In 1908 Skrypnyk was sentenced to five years of exile in the Yakutsk guberniya (province). In 1913 he returned to St. Petersburg and edited Pravda. In July 1914 he was imprisoned again and was held in the Tambov guberniya. After the February 1917 revolution Skrypnyk was released. He went back to the capital, where he organized Bolshevik factory committees. He represented them at the First, and Second All-Russian Congresses of Soviets of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies. In 1917 he became a deputy member of the CC of the Bolshevik party.

During the Russian Revolution in October 1917 Skrypnyk was a member of the Military Revolutionary Committee, which headed the coup. At the end of 1917 Lenin dispatched him to the Ukraine, where he was to consolidate the Bolshevik organization and to safeguard links between the Ukraine and Russia in the new system of government. In December 1917, as commissar of labor, Skrypnyk joined the government of the Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic in Kharkiv, and in March 1918 he became head of the government and commissar of foreign affairs of the republic. On his motion, the Second All-Ukrainian Congress of Soviets formally declared Ukraine independent; the aim of this decision was to make the Bolsheviks credible in their struggle against the Ukrainian national authorities supported by the Germans and Austrians. In April 1918 Skrypnyk's efforts led to the creation of a seemingly separate party, the Communist Party (Bolshevik) of Ukraine (CP[B]U). However, after the Germans removed the Bolsheviks from the Ukraine, the founding congress of the party had to be held in Moscow. In March 1919 Skrypnyk represented the Ukraine at the founding congress of the Communist International.

After the Bolshevik authorities were set up in Kiev and the Riga peace treaty was concluded with Poland in 1921, Skrypnyk served as commissar of interior of the Ukrainian SSR, and in 1922–27 he was commissar of justice and public prosecutor general. From 1927 to 1933 he was commissar of education. At the Twelfth Congress in 1923 he became a member of the CC of the All-Russian Bolshevik party. At that time he expressed criticism of "Great Russian chauvinism" and of the policy of Russification of the Ukraine, particularly in the Red Army. On his motion, the autonomous CP(B)U was preserved within the framework of the All-Russian Communist Party (Bolsheviks). At that time Skrypnyk maintained particularly close contacts with the Communist Party of Poland and the Communist Party of Western Ukraine (which was an autonomous part of the former), attempting to convert the Ukrainians on the Polish side of the border to communism. In 1927 he joined the Politburo of the CC of the All-Union Communist Party (Bolsheviks), and in 1928 he became a member of the Executive Committee of the Comintern. Skrypnyk was an advocate of Ukrainization of the government apparatus in the Ukrainian SSR, but he also supported Stalin in his struggle for power. He was a peculiar combination of Ukrainian patriot and Communist doctrinaire. In 1929 Skrypnyk himself brought Communists into the Ukrainian Academy of Sciences, and they soon launched an attack against Ukrainian culture. With the implementation of collectivization, initiated in 1930, Skrypnyk's role ended; during the purge of Ukrainian functionaries, Stalinist attacks against Skrypnyk intensified. His defense before the Politburo of the CC of the CP(B)U was rejected; therefore, anticipating arrest, he committed suicide. In 1974 Skrypnyk's Statti i promovy z natsionalnoho pitanniia (Writings and speeches on the national question) were published in Munich. (WR)

SKRZYŃSKI Aleksander (19 March 1882, Zagórzany, near Gorlice–25 September 1931, Ostrów Wielkopolska), Polish politician, diplomat, and lawyer. Born into a landowner's family, Skrzyński studied law in Vienna (1900–1904) and Kraków (1904–5), and in 1906 he received a Ph.D. in law. In 1908 he started working in the Lwów (Lemberg) administration, and in 1909 he was sent as an attaché to the Austro-Hungarian Embassy in the Vatican. Appointed chamberlain to the court of Emperor Francis Joseph in 1912, Skrzyński went to the embassy in The Hague and then to those in Berlin, Paris, Washington, D.C., and Stuttgart. After the outbreak of World War I he joined the army. As a political conservative, at the end of the war Skrzyński joined the Party of the National Right. After its dissolution in November 1918, he was one of the vice-presidents of the Party for the Construction of a United Poland and later a member of the Supreme Board of the Party of Constitutional Work.

After the restoration of Polish statehood, Skrzyński started working in the Foreign Ministry. In 1919–22 he was Polish ambassador to Bucharest, where in March 1921 he managed to finalize the signing of a Polish–Romanian treaty of mutual aid. From December 1922 to May 1923 he was minister of foreign affairs in the government of General Władysław Sikorski. He contributed to the recognition of Poland's eastern border by the Council of Ambassadors (15 March 1923). Skrzyński's project to establish a Ukrainian university in Poland was opposed by the National Democracy. From April 1924 to December 1925 Skrzyński was Poland's permanent delegate to the League of Nations and one of its vice-presidents. In December 1924 he was again appointed minister of foreign affairs, this time in the government of Władysław Grabski. Skrzyński improved relations with Czechoslovakia by signing an arbitration treaty, a trade agreement, and an agreement on the treatment of national minorities in both countries in April 1925. He also improved Polish relations with the Baltic nations. In February 1925 he signed a concordat with the Holy See. Skrzyński failed to achieve better terms for Poland in the Locarno treaties of 16 October 1925. As a result, the eastern borders of Germany gained weaker guarantees than the western German borders, which worsened Poland's security.

Under growing inflation, on 20 November 1925 Skrzyński became prime minister of a wide parliamentary coalition, ranging from the Socialists to the National Democrats. He also continued as foreign minister. His attempts to stabilize the economy failed, as the Socialists refused to support proposals for a balanced budget that involved tax increases and a reduction of employment in the state sector. After the Socialists left the government coalition, on 20 April 1926 Skrzyński submitted his resignation, but President Stanisław Wojciechowski, who wanted him to complete his work on the budget, did not accept the resignation. Nevertheless, because of strikes and demonstrations, on 5 May 1926 Skrzyński resigned and withdrew from political life. He gave lectures and wrote articles, defending his foreign policy and promoting the League of Nations. Skrzyński was killed in a motor car crash. Among other works he authored the following: Poland and Peace (1923; Polish edition: Polska a pokój, 1924); Polska a protokół w sprawie pokojowego rozwiązywania sporów międzynarodowych (Poland and the protocol on the peaceful resolution of international conflicts; 1924); and Liga Narodów jako punkt centralny polityki zagranicznej (The League of Nations as a center of foreign policy; 1929). SKUBISZEWSKI Krzysztof (8 October 1926 Poznań), Polish lawyer and diplomat. Skubiszewski graduated from Poznań University in 1949, from the University of Nancy in 1957, and from Harvard University in 1958. In 1948–73 he worked at the university in Poznań; from 1973 he was a professor at the Institute of Legal Studies of the Polish Academy of Sciences, specializing in international law. A member of many international scientific associations, from 1989 Skubiszewski was a member of the Polish Academy of Sciences. From 1980 he belonged to Solidarity; between 1981 and 1984 he belonged to the Social Council of the Primate of Poland; and between 1984 and 1989 he was a member of the Coordination Committee of the Poland–Federal Republic of Germany Forum. In 1986–89 Skubiszewski belonged to the Consultative Council of the Chairman of the Council of State. In 1989 he co-founded a political club called Law and Freedom (Ład i Wolność).

From September 1989 to October 1993 Skubiszewski was the minister of foreign affairs in the governments of Tadeusz Mazowiecki, Jan Krzysztof Bielecki, Jan Olszewski, and Hanna Suchocka. He carried out a gradual replacement of the diplomatic personnel. In 1990 he succeeded in securing a place for Poland at a conference with united Germany at which the inviolability of the border on the Oder and Neisse line was confirmed (the Two Plus Four Agreement Treaty). In 1990 Skubiszewski signed a treaty on the recognition of the existing border, and in 1991 he signed a good neighbor treaty with united Germany. From 1990 Skubiszewski sought rapprochement among Poland, Czechoslovakia, and Hungary, and this led to the formation of the Visegrad Group. He initiated the integration of Poland into the West European structures. Skubiszewski's achievements included the following: an economic cooperation agreement with the EEC and unofficial talks on Poland's association with the European Communities (1989); an official motion to start negotiations on the association agreement (1990); admittance of Poland to the Council of Europe (26 November 1991); ratification of the Treaty on European Union by the Polish parliament and ratification of the Association Agreement between Poland and the European Communities by the European Parliament (1992). From 1989 to 1991 Skubiszewski led a transformation of the relations between Poland and the USSR, from Poland's position of dependency to a position of sovereignty, at the same time retaining good-neighbor relations. He took part in negotiations on the withdrawal of Soviet troops (and then of Russian troops) from Poland. The cost to Poland of recognizing that Polish-Russian relations had priority in its foreign policy was a policy of caution toward the aspirations for independence of Lithuania, Ukraine, Latvia, and Estonia. During and after the disintegration of the USSR in 1991 Skubiszewski pursued a policy of positive relations with Russia (a treaty of 22 May 1992); Ukraine (recognition of its independence in 1991, a treaty in 1992); Belorussia (a treaty in 1992); and Lithuania (a declaration of cooperation in 1992, a negotiated treaty signed in 1994). In 1993 Skubiszewski prepared and signed a concordat with the Holy See. Skubiszewski authored many scholarly publications on international law, and many of his works appeared in foreign languages. In Polish he published (among other works) Zachodnia granica Polski (The western border of Poland) and Zachodnia granica w świetle traktatów (The western border in light of the treaties). (AF)

SKUČAS Kazys (3 March 1894, Mauručiai, near Marijampolė–June 1941, Moscow), Lithuanian general. Skučas was born into a peasant family. After graduating from a teacher training school in Veiveriai (1912), he worked as a teacher. He later enrolled as a student at the Pedagogical Institute in St. Petersburg. Inducted into the Russian Army in 1915, he graduated from a military school and was subsequently sent to the Romanian front. After returning to Lithuania in 1918, Skučas volunteered to serve in the newly formed Lithuanian Army, and he was then promoted to commander of a division. He later worked as director for personnel development at the Military School in Kaunas. From 1934 to 1938 Skučas served as a military attaché in the Soviet Union. After returning to his country, he became head of the Military School in Kaunas. At the beginning of 1939 he was promoted to general, and in March of that year he became minister of interior in the government of General Jonas Černius. Skučas continued in this post in the cabinet of Antanas Merkys, at a time of growing pressure from the Kremlin and increasing Soviet provocations. Skučas tried to counteract such pressures; therefore, in an ultimatum of 14 June 1940 the Kremlin demanded, among other things, that he be dismissed as minister of interior. After the Red Army occupied Lithuania, Skučas was almost immediately arrested and taken to Moscow, where he was executed. (WR)

SKUJENIEKS Margers (23 June 1886, Riga–12 July 1941, Moscow), Latvian statistician and Social Democratic politician. From 1903 Skujenieks belonged to the Social Democratic Party and worked with the Menshevik faction. In 1904 he was held under arrest for seven months for taking part in a demonstration. He was active in the revolution of 1905 and then emigrated to London as he was threatened with Russian prison. In 1907 Skujenieks returned to Russia and graduated from the Moscow Institute of Trade. Between 1912 and 1915 he edited a newspaper in Libava (Liepāja) and later served as secretary of the Russian Labor Office in Moscow. In 1916 Skujenieks returned to Riga, where he headed a statistical office for Baltic refugees. In November 1918 he was elected vice-president of the Latvian National Council. From March 1919 he represented Latvia at the Paris Peace Conference. From the fall of 1919 he was director of the State Statistical Office. He was an MP to the Constituent Assembly and to the parliament of the republic. He presided over a parliamentary committee on the preparation of a Latvian constitution, which was passed on 15 February 1922. Skujenieks belonged to the right wing of Social Democracy. In June 1921 he became head of the faction of the so-called minimalists within the party. Skujenieks was the author of statistical studies and of a monograph, Latvija 1918–1928 gados (Latvia in the years 1918–1928), which was published for the tenth anniversary of Latvian independence. At the beginning of 1931 Skujenieks left Social Democracy, forming the Union of Progressives. From 19 March 1926 to 23 January 1928 and from 6 December 1931 to 23 March 1933 he was prime minister. During his first term, on 9 March 1927 he signed the Latvian-Soviet Treaty of Non-Aggression, which he renewed on 5 February 1932. Skujenieks became increasingly disillusioned with parliamentary democracy, and after the coup of Kārlis Ulmanis he declared his support for the nonparty government that was formed by Ulmanis. In May 1934 Skujenieks became deputy prime minister in this government. He held the post until 1936. After the invasion of Latvia by the Red Army in 1940, Skujenieks was arrested and deported to Russia. He was held in prison in (among other places) Moscow, where he was shot dead. (WR/EJ)

SKULBASZEWSKI Antoni (29 January 1915, Peregonomka, Kiev region), Soviet security officer in Poland. The son of a carpenter of Polish descent, from 1935 Skulbaszewski served in the Red Army, and in 1936–37 he took part in NKVD officer training in Kiev. At this time he joined the Bolshevik party. In 1939–40 he took part in the Soviet-Finnish war, and from 1941 he fought against Germany on the southern front and in Moscow. In 1943 Skulbaszewski graduated from the Department of Engineering of the Institute of Drainage and Agricultural Mechanization in Tashkent. In May 1943 he was sent to the Polish Army, formed in the USSR under Soviet control. Skulbaszewski became investigating officer in the field prosecutor's office of the First Infantry Division, military prosecutor of the Second Infantry Division (April–September 1944), deputy prosecutor of the First Army (until April 1945), prosecutor of the Second Army (until June 1945), and (from August 1945) deputy supreme military prosecutor. He held this last position until October 1948, when he became supreme military prosecutor. In May 1946 Skulbaszewski was promoted to colonel. From 1 August 1950 he was deputy chief of the ill-famed Main Information Administration (Główny Zarząd Informacji) of the Ministry of National Defense, which was headed by Colonel Dmitry Voznesensky. Working in close cooperation with the Soviet organs and with the Polish Communist Party leadership, Skulbaszewski was responsible for the system of cruel reprisals. He personally supervised the interrogation of many Polish officers falsely accused of espionage; almost two dozen of these officers were executed. In 1954 Skulbaszewski was dismissed and left for the USSR. He lived in Kiev and worked in the Soviet security apparatus. (WR)

SKULSKI Leopold (15 November 1877, Zamość—after 1939, USSR), Polish politician. Skulski studied pharmacy at Warsaw University and chemistry in Karlsruhe, where he graduated as an engineer. Later he was the owner of a drugstore in Łódź. In 1906 he chaired a committee for aid to the children of striking workers in Łódź. Probably in 1916 he entered the National League (Liga Narodowa). In 1916–19 Skulski was mayor of Łódź. In January 1919 he was elected to the Constituent Assembly from the lists of National Democracy, but he left its club to establish a Christian Social party, the National People's Union (Narodowe Zjednoczenie Ludowe [NZL]). After the fall of the Ignacy Paderewski government, on 13 December 1919 Skulski became prime minister. Apart from social problems such as unemployment and shortages of primary goods, Skulski struggled with the problems of preparing a budget, with growing inflation, and with a prolonged military conflict in the east. Contrary to the stance of National Democracy, he accepted the federation plans of Józef Piłsudski and his Ukrainian campaign of April 1920. Along with the economic problems, this became the reason for Skulski's resignation on 9 June 1920. From July 1920 to June 1921 he was minister of interior in the coalition Government of National Defense of Wincenty Witos. In June 1922 he refused to try to create a new government. In the parliamentary elections of November 1922 Skulski's party did not enter a nationalist coalition. After an election defeat, Skulski merged the NZL with the Polish Peasant Party–Piast. Elected vice-president of Piast, he refused to take over this position. In 1925 Skulski became a member of the Tribunal of State. In the 1930s he approached the Piłsudski sanacja bloc, and in 1937 he joined the pro-government Camp of National Unity. After the Red Army invaded Poland in September 1939, Skulski was arrested by the NKVD and sent deep into the Soviet interior, where he perished under unknown circumstances. (WR)

ŠKULTÉTY Jozef (25 November 1853, Potok—19 January 1948, Martin), Slovak linguist and social activist. Škultéty graduated from a teacher training college in Budapest. In 1881 he began working as an editor of the newspaper Národné noviny, which became a platform for the Slovak national movement. In 1890–1916 he edited the literary monthly Slovenské pohľady. Škultéty was a member of the conservative leadership of the Slovak National Party in Turčiansky Svätý Martin (now Martin).

He represented the view that the Slovak nation had a separate national identity, and he criticized representatives of the young intelligentsia, such as Vavro Šrobár and Milan Hodža, who called for close cooperation with the Czechs. Until 1917 Škultéty represented a Russophile orientation. He was repeatedly arrested by the Hungarian authorities for his journalism. His post-Romantic literary output was largely unsuccessful. From 1882 on Škultéty was active as an editor and pioneered Slovak academic editing. He edited works by Slovak poets and compiled the first anthology of Slovak poetry, Veniec slovenských národných piesní (Garland of Slovak national poems; 1897), which was repeatedly reissued. An advocate of realism, Škultéty believed that art was a weapon in the struggle for preserving Slovak national consciousness. He greatly contributed to the field of linguistics. At the beginning of 1919, Škultéty was an expert for Slovak affairs at the Paris Peace Conference. During the interwar period he opposed the idea of “Czechoslovakism.” In the work Stodvadsať päť rokov zo slovenského života (One hundred and twenty-five years of Slovak national life; 1920) he expounded his ideas on national history and argued against Hodža’s views. When the Slovak cultural organization Slovenská Matica was revived in 1919, Škultéty was appointed its administrator. In 1921 he became a professor of Slovak language and literature at Comenius University, Bratislava. He was awarded an honorary doctorate by Charles University in Prague. In 1920 Škultéty became a member of the Czech Academy of Science and Art and in 1929 a corresponding member of the Polish Academy of Arts and Sciences. (MG)

SKVIRECKAS Juozapas (18 September 1873, Rimkūnai, Panevėžys County–3 December 1959, Zams, Austria), first archbishop and metropolitan of Kaunas. Skvireckas studied theology at the Kaunas Seminary (1892–96) and then at the Theological Academy in St. Petersburg, graduating in 1900. Ordained a priest on 24 June 1899 in Kaunas, he began to teach exegesis, catechism, and Latin at the Kaunas Seminary in 1901. In 1911 he became canon and in 1914 prelate of the Samogitian diocese. During World War I the Russians forced him to leave Kaunas. Skvireckas went to Smolensk and Tula, where he helped organize aid for Latvian refugees who were wounded or ill. After the end of the war, he returned to Lithuania, where in 1919 he became vicar general of the Samogitian diocese, with the title of auxiliary bishop. In 1926, when a separate church province was established in Lithuania, he was elected archbishop and metropolitan of Kaunas. In 1931 Pope Pius XI honored him with the title of assistant to the papal throne. Skvireckas served as the highest dignitary in the Lithuanian Church at a time of conflict with the political authorities. He had many opponents, particularly after the nationalists took over power in 1926 and Lithuania severed ties with the Vatican. However, his obstinacy and patience led to the stabilization of relations between the state and the Church. In the 1930s, despite frictions with the Holy See, the Church played a very important role in Lithuanian social life. In 1922 Skvireckas became a professor of biblical studies at the School of Theology and Philosophy of the University of Kaunas and professor of theology at the Kaunas Seminary. He co-founded the Lithuanian Catholic Academy of Sciences. As a result of his efforts, a new headquarters of the archdiocese was built, and the cathedral in Kaunas was renovated.

From 1940 to 1944, during the Soviet and then the German occupations, Skvireckas defended the persecuted and tried to bring relief to the suffering; for instance, he issued an appeal to the bishops in the United States, requesting help for people who were deported to Siberia. When the Red Army reoccupied Lithuania in the summer of 1944, Skvireckas left Lithuania. From 1945 he lived in the convent of the Congregation of the Sisters of St. Vincent á Paulo in Zams, Tyrol, Austria. Skvireckas left a great literary output. The translation of the Bible into Lithuanian—with his own commentary—is his greatest achievement. Skvireckas began this translation in 1900 and finished it in 1935; in the meantime (in 1922 and 1936) two editions of the New Testament were published for use by the faithful. The entire Old Testament, translated into Lithuanian by Skvireckas, was published in 1955–58. Skvireckas also authored a biography of St. Pius X (1904), St. Paul (1907), and Bishop Merkeliš Giedraitis (1908). (AG)

ŠKVORECKÝ Josef (27 September 1924, Náchod), Czech writer, translator, and publisher. After graduating from high school in Náchod (1943), Škvorecký worked as a blue-collar laborer. In 1945–49 he studied medicine and then English and philosophy at Charles University in Prague. After graduation he worked as a teacher and served in the army. In 1953–55 and 1959–63 he was an editor for the State Literary Press, where he translated English prose and wrote articles in this field. In 1956–58

he edited the periodical Světová literatura. From 1963 Škvorecký mainly began to write. After the suppression of the Prague Spring, in 1969 he emigrated to Canada, where he taught at the University of Toronto. In 1975 he became a professor there. In 1971, along with his wife, he founded the 68 Publishers Press, which published Czech and Slovak works banned by Communist censorship at home. In 1978 the Communist authorities deprived Škvorecký of his Czechoslovak citizenship. After the Velvet Revolution, in 1990 he returned to Czechoslovakia.

Škvorecký made his literary debut with the novel Zbabělci (1958; Cowards, 1980), in which he presented the fall of the Czech middle class and the advance of the Red Army with its barbarian culture. Its main hero, Danny Smiřický, the author's alter ego, also appeared in other works by Škvorecký. Zbabělci could only appear in Czechoslovakia because of a political struggle between Stalinists and reformers in the Communist Party. When the book was out, it was strongly attacked and the authorities decided to requisition its circulation, but in vain, since it was sold out. Nevertheless, Škvorecký had to leave the Světová literatura editorial board. He touched on a similar topic in the book Konec nylonového věku (The end of the nylon century; 1967), in which he said farewell to the burgher world and prophesied the advance of a Communist world ruled by opportunists. In 1964 he published a volume on the Holocaust in the Protectorate of Bohemia and Moravia: Sedmíramenný svícen (The menorah). Škvorecký continued to present the Communist reality when he went abroad—for instance, in the novels Tankový prapor (Battalion of tanks; 1971) and Mirákl (Miracle; 1972), in which he presented the prosecution of the Catholic Church under Stalinism; Příběh inženýra lidských duší (The case of the engineer of human souls; 1977); and the play Ze života české společnosti (From the life of Czech society; 1980). In a grotesque way Škvorecký described the functioning of the Communist state, stressing the links between Czech culture and the West and the alien nature of the eastern despotism. He also wrote popular stories and biographies (for example, the biographies of Antonín Dvořák: Scherzo capriccioso [1984] and Dvorak in Love [1988]); essays; an autobiography, Příběh neúspěšného tenorsaxofonisty (The case of an unfortunate tenor sax player; 1994); and a book on the 68 Publishers, Samožerbuch (An album for myself; 1977). SLACHTA Margit (18 September 1884, Kassa [now Košice, Slovakia]–6 January 1974, Buffalo, New York), Hungarian nun and social worker. Slachta's Polish ancestors were landowners in Slovakia. She was the second of six daughters. When her father and some members of the family emigrated to the United States, Slachta remained in Hungary, and in 1906 she was certified as a German and French teacher. While a student, she was greatly influenced by a lecture on the protection of female workers and on patronage. In November 1908 she joined the Social Mission Society, an organization founded by Edith Farkas, and became a leading representative of the Christian social movement in defense of women. Slachta traveled throughout the country giving lectures; she conducted community research, collected donations, and opened a school. Unlike Church authorities, she wanted to solve social problems through practical work, not only through charity. In October 1918 Slachta founded the Union of Catholic Women, whose program combined Christian, national, and social principles. She initiated nursing education in Budapest. In 1920 she was the first woman to be elected to the Hungarian parliament.

In May 1923 Slachta founded the Sisters of Social Service. During World War II, counteracting Nazi propaganda, she organized presentations and lectures designed to propagate Christian values. She criticized anti-Jewish laws and protested against them to the authorities. In November 1940, on behalf of the Union of Catholic Women, Slachta acted in defense of the Jewish people, who were being used as slave laborers, and in the winter of 1941 she protested their deportation. When in February 1943 Slovakia announced that it was going to get rid of all Jews, Slachta met with Pope Pius XII and appealed for his intercession. From the spring of 1944 on, she provided shelter to persecuted people in the convent of her society. In 1945 Slachta was reelected to the parliament, where she dealt with law and order. She believed law and order could be guaranteed by maintaining the monarchy; therefore, she rejected the republican system. She sought to reestablish diplomatic relations with the Vatican. She was devoted to protecting the rights of Hungarian people living abroad. She was also engaged in defending the rights of other small nations and in protecting family life and national morality.

After the Sovietization of Hungary, Slachta's work became increasingly difficult. A speech she gave on 28 October 1947 was labeled detrimental to the interests of the state, and she was excluded from parliamentary sessions for sixty days. Her last speech in parliament, delivered on 16 June 1948, was rudely interrupted by Communist MPs. In this speech she protested a bill to nationalize church-owned schools. After this bill was passed, Communist MPs sang the national anthem. Slachta continued to sit while they sang; as a result, the disciplinary commission deprived her of her parliamentary immunity. Fearing arrest, in January 1949 Slachta went into hiding in the convent of the Dominican Sisters. In June 1949, along with her sister, she went to Austria and then to the United States. While in exile, she submitted a memorandum to U.S. President Harry Truman and to American bishops, trying to draw their attention to the situation of citizens of Communist countries. She collected signatures in protest against the imprisonment of Cardinal József Mindszenty, the Primate of Hungary. She also helped refugees after the 1956 revolution. Slachta died in the convent of the Sisters of Social Service. In 1985 Israel honored her with the title “Righteous among Nations,” and a tree was planted in her memory at the Yad Vashem garden. In May 1995 Slachta was posthumously awarded the Order for Courage of the Hungarian Republic. (JT)

SLADKEVIČIUS Vincentas (20 August 1920, Guronys, near Kaišiadorys—28 May 2000, Kaunas), Primate of Lithuania. Born the fifth child of a poor peasant family, after graduating from high school in Kaunas, Sladkevičius studied at the Kaunas Seminary. Ordained in 1944, he worked in the parishes of Kietaviškės and Kuktiškės, taught religion at a high school in Merkinė, and became parish priest at Inturké in 1948. From 1952 to 1958 Sladkevičius taught dogmatic theology and biblical exegesis and worked as rector of the Kaunas Seminary, the only theological seminary in Soviet Lithuania. In this role, he was under constant pressure from the Soviet political police, who wanted to recruit informers among the clergy. In 1958, without permission from the Soviet authorities, Teofilis Matulionis, the bishop of Kaišiadorys, appointed Sladkevičius auxiliary bishop of the diocese of Kaišiadorys. The Holy See granted Sladkevičius the authority of an apostolic administrator with episcopal powers. The KGB responded with repressive measures. Sladkevičius was forced to leave the diocese of Kaišiadorys and was dismissed from the Kaunas Seminary. He was forced to settle in the village of Nemunello Radviliškis. From 1963 to 1982 he was de facto under house arrest. Despite these difficulties, he courageously continued his pastoral work. It was only in 1982 that the Soviet authorities allowed him to return to Kaišiadorys and to assume the position of apostolic administrator of the diocese of Kaišiadorys.

After the start of perestroika, the Lithuanian people could more firmly demand their rights. As the Soviet Union’s policies became more flexible, on 29 May 1988 Pope John Paul II elevated Sladkevičius to the College of Cardinals and named him president of the Lithuanian Episcopal Conference. Sladkevičius was the second Lithuanian to become a cardinal. He vigorously set about rebuilding Church structures. At that time 686 priests were working in Lithuania. On 23 October 1988 Sladkevičius celebrated the first mass in Vilnius Cathedral in forty years. He was subsequently named archbishop of Kaunas by the Pope. On 16 February 1989, on the anniversary of the prewar Lithuanian independence day, Sladkevičius celebrated a solemn mass in his cathedral. The majority of the members of the Lithuanian Seimas (parliament) attended this mass. Sladkevičius spoke on the square in front of the Military Museum, where, in the presence of one hundred thousand people, the restored prewar Freedom Monument was rededicated. Sladkevičius tried to avoid direct entanglements in political strife, but he explicitly supported Lithuanian aspirations for independence. At the end of November 1990 he met with a delegation of the Central Committee of the Communist Party of Lithuania to negotiate the role of the Church in the ongoing transformations. As a result of these transformations, Lithuania finally regained its independence in 1991. In 1996 Sladkevičius retired. Until the end of his life he enjoyed great respect among the Lithuanian people, regardless of their religious beliefs. (WR)

SLÁNSKÝ Rudolf [originally Salzman] (31 July 1901, Nezvěstice, near Plzeň—3 December 1952, Prague), Czechoslovak Communist activist. Born into a lower-middle-class Jewish family, after graduating from high school, Slánský briefly served as a member of the Czechoslovak Social Democratic Party, but in 1921 he joined the newly established Communist Party of Czechoslovakia (CPC). He worked in the party apparatus in Prague and edited the party press organ, Rudé Právo. He subsequently served as regional party secretary in Moravská Ostrava (1926–28) and Prague (1929–30). In 1928 Slánský attended the Sixth Congress of the Communist International. In the following year, thanks to the support of Klement Gottwald, he became a member of the Central Committee (CC) and the Politburo of the CPC. In 1930 he was also made secretary of the CC. In 1935 he spoke at the Seventh Congress of the Comintern in Moscow. In December 1938, after the Pact of Munich, Slánský fled to the Soviet Union, where he worked in the central apparatus of the Comintern and edited the Czech broadcasts of Moscow Radio. In 1944 he went to the headquarters of Soviet Partisans near Kiev, where he prepared himself for a return to his country. As a result of an agreement with the government-in-exile, Gottwald aspired to assume governmental positions, so Slánský took the post of secretary general of the party CC (early 1945). In September 1947 he was head of the Czechoslovak delegation to the founding congress of the Communist Information Bureau (Cominform) at Szklarska Poręba, Poland, and in June 1948 he headed the Czechoslovak delegation to a Cominform conference at which Josip Broz Tito was denounced. After the Communist coup of February 1948, Slánský, together with Gottwald, was in charge of the accelerated Sovietization of Czechoslovakia, and he supervised the brutal persecutions of non-Communist politicians and the Catholic Church. He also called for a purge of the army.

At the end of the 1940s Slánský was the second most powerful person in the regime, and his name day was celebrated with Stalinist pomp. In 1949 he co-initiated a purge of the party, justifying it as a struggle against “Titoism.” He pressed the security apparatus for greater effectiveness in hunting down and eliminating hidden “enemies,” and in November 1949, along with Gottwald, Slánský requested that the Soviet leadership send a greater number of functionaries to help. In 1950 Slánský instigated the expulsion from the party leadership and then the imprisonment of Vladimir Clementis, Gustav Husák, and hundreds of other activists. In the spring of 1951 he suggested that the situation necessitated finding a Czech counterpart to László Rajk—that is, an “enemy” among top-ranking Communist Party officials.

Meanwhile, testimonies extorted through the torture of those arrested indicated that it was Slánský himself who headed a network of “spies” linked to the case of Noel Field. A case against Field was being prepared by the services of the Soviet Union and other Soviet bloc countries. In June 1951 the leadership of the Czech secret police and Soviet advisers reinforced the suspicions regarding Slánský by introducing a campaign of combating “Jewish bourgeois nationalism.” In July the Czechoslovak minister of defense, Alexej Čepička, was sent by Gottwald to the Kremlin, where he attended sessions of the Politburo of the CC of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union at which it was decided that the accusations against Slánský were insufficiently proven, but it was stated that Slánský had made too many political errors and therefore could not continue as secretary general of the party. At the end of July 1951 Slánský received the country’s most prestigious award, the Order of Klement Gottwald. However, at a CC plenum in September he became the target of sharp attacks, and although he had made a self-criticism, he was removed from his position and became a vice-premier. On 11 November Anastas Mikoyan brought a special letter from Stalin to Gottwald, demanding the arrest of Slánský. On 26 November 1951 Slánský was expelled from all his positions and then imprisoned. The CC of the CPC accepted this decision without protest. Slánský was accused not only of espionage and “treason,” but also of “Zionism.” Under torture he confessed to all the absurd charges that had been prepared against him. Along with ten other activists (including Clementis), Slánský was sentenced to death in a show trial (20–27 November 1952) and executed soon afterwards. In 1963, during the belated and limited de-Stalinization in Czechoslovakia, Slánský was posthumously exonerated of the criminal charges of treason and espionage for which he had been condemned, but he was not cleared of “political errors.” (WR)

SLAVEYKOV Pencho (27 April 1866, Tryavna, Bulgaria–28 May 1912, Como Brunate, Italy), Bulgarian poet. Slaveykov’s father, Petko Slaveykov (1827–95), was also a poet. From 1892 to 1898 Slaveykov studied philosophy in Leipzig, where he became interested in the works of Friedrich Nietzsche and other German philosophers. After returning to Bulgaria, he contributed to Krustyo Krustev’s periodical, Misul. He also worked as a teacher, theater director, and librarian. Slaveykov was an ideologue of the so-called young modernists with neo-Romantic leanings. He also advocated the “Europeanization” of Bulgarian culture and was influenced by Western symbolism and expressionism. Slaveykov won acclaim as the author of lyrical and contemplative-philosophical poems in the collections Sun za shtastie (The dream of happiness; 1907) and Na Ostrova na Blazhenite (Isle of the Blessed; 1910). He is also famous for his unfinished epic poem, Kurvava Pesen (Song of blood; written 1911–12; published 1913), which describes the Bulgarian uprising of April 1876 and reflects on the role of national myths. Because of this poem Slaveykov was nominated for the Nobel Prize in literature. Because he satirized the authorities in his poems, Slaveykov lost his job in 1911, and in the following year he went to Italy, where he died. (WR)

SLAVICI Ioan [originally Sârbu] (18 January 1848, Şiria, near Arad–17 August 1925, Panciu), Romanian writer and political activist. After graduating from high school in his native Transylvania, Slavici studied in Budapest and Vienna, where in 1869 he met the poet Mihai Eminescu, who exerted a great influence on his writing. In the same year Slavici began to write for the daily Comvorbiri Literare. After receiving a teaching position in Bucharest, he began to work with Eminescu, becoming a member of the editorial staff of Timpul, a newspaper of the Conservative Party. In 1881 Slavici made his literary debut with the collection Nuvele din popor (Folk stories), which included one of his most famous works, “Moara cu noroc” (The mill of luck and plenty, 1994). In 1884 Slavici went to Sibiu, Transylvania, where he became an editor of Tribuna, a Romanian national radical daily, and joined the Central Committee of the Romanian National Party (Partidul Național Român [RNP]), the leading political party of the Transylvanian Romanians. He was subsequently arrested and spent one year in an Austro-Hungarian prison for instigating a rebellion against the authorities. In 1890 Slavici returned to Bucharest. In 1894 the literary daily Vatra, for which he worked from 1894 to 1896, began the publication of Mara, one of his most famous novels, which was published in book form in 1906. As was typical of nineteenth-century East European writers, Slavici sought inspiration in folklore and the everyday life of Transylvanians. In 1904 he joined the editorial staff of Ziua, a pro-German newspaper in Bucharest. During World War I he favored the Central Powers. After the Germans occupied Bucharest, he became an editor of the daily Bucharest Gazette. In 1919, after the end of World War I, he was sentenced to five years’ imprisonment for acting to the detriment of the country during the war. Although after one year he was released, this sentence destroyed his reputation. Slavici died in poverty and disfavor. (PC)

into the family of a Lutheran pastor, Slávik studied law in Budapest, Berlin, and Paris. From 1912 to 1913 and from 1921 to 1923 he edited Prúdy, a literary periodical that served as a platform for the young Slovak intelligentsia who called for close cooperation with the Czechs. At the end of 1918 Slávik became secretary of the Slovak National Council in Bratislava and helped to organize the Czechoslovak administration. After the invasion by the Hungarian Red Army in 1919, he was appointed government commissar for the affairs of eastern Slovakia. In 1920 he became government delegate to the international plebiscite commission in Spiš and Orava. From 1918 to 1920 and from 1929 to 1935 Slávik sat in the parliament in Prague. He was a member of the leadership of the Agrarian Party in Slovakia and held various executive positions in many community organizations; for example, he was vice-president of the Sokol Organization, president of the Czechoslovak Officers’ Union, and president of the Aero Club of Czechoslovakia. In 1926 Slávik became minister of agriculture and head of the department of unification. From December 1929 to October 1932 he was minister of interior. In 1936 he became ambassador to Warsaw and held this post until the dismemberment of Czechoslovakia in March 1939. In exile Slávik worked closely with Edvard Beneš and helped to establish the Czechoslovak National Committee in Paris. In the fall of 1939 he represented the Czechoslovak National Committee before the Polish government in Angers. From 1940 to 1945 Slávik served as minister of interior in the London-based Czechoslovak government-in-exile, and he took part in Polish-Czechoslovak negotiations on the establishment of a federation. In 1946 he became ambassador to the United States. After the Communist coup of February 1948, Slávik resigned from this position and became active in various émigré organizations. In 1949 he was one of the founders of the Council of Free Czechoslovakia (Rada Svobodného Československa). Slávik’s publications include Zapredané Slovensko (Betrayed Slovakia; 1939); Peace Treaties and Central Europe (1941); Masaryk a Slovensko (Masaryk and Slovakia; 1960); and the memoirs Moja pamät’: živá kniha (My memory: A living book; 1955). SLAVOV Atanas (25 July 1930, Sliven), Bulgarian poet and writer. Slavov graduated in English studies from Sofia University, and then he worked there as a lecturer in the history of Bulgarian literature and art. His early poems were sharply criticized by Todor Zhivkov himself. In 1975 Slavov was allowed to go on a Bulgarian Academy of Sciences scholarship to the United States, where he stayed to do research and publish poetry and memoirs. In 1978–79 he wrote and in 1986 he published his memoirs, With the Precision of Bats; they are one of the best records of the political and intellectual atmosphere in Bulgaria in the 1960s and 1970s. Slavov's other best-known work is The "Thaw" in Bulgarian Literature (1981), a combination of memoirs, history of literature, and literary criticism illustrating cultural life under communism. Slavov has also published Stikhotvoreniya: Pornografiska poema (Poetry: A pornographic poem; 1980), as well as science fiction and additional memoirs, either in Bulgarian or in English. He also authored Traditional Bulgarian Cookbook (1998). (WR)

SŁAWEK Walery, pseudonym "Gustaw" (2 November 1879, Strutynka, Podolia–3 April 1939, Warsaw), Polish politician. Sławek came from an impoverished noble family and graduated from a gymnasium in Niemirów; then he was a student at the Kronenberg College of Commerce in Warsaw until 1899, and thereafter he worked in banking. From 1900 he belonged to the Polish Socialist Party (Polska Partia Socjalistyczna [PPS]), and he was involved in its underground activities in Łódź and Warsaw. In June 1902 Sławek joined the Central Workers' Committee of the PPS. At that time he became acquainted with Józef Piłsudski; this had a decisive influence on his career. In March 1903 Sławek was arrested, but nine months later he escaped from prison at Sieradz, avoiding deportation. In 1904 he started working on creating the Fighting Squads of the PPS (Organizacja Bojowa PPS), and the following year, along with Aleksander Prystor, he became head of the Fighting Squads' Underground Military Department. In September 1905 Sławek was rearrested, but in November he was released for lack of evidence. From 1906 he was in the PPS–Revolutionary Faction. On 9 June 1906 Sławek was severely injured in the explosion of a bomb that he was planting under a mail train in Milanówek. After this attempt he was arrested but again was not convicted as he maintained that the explosion came from an accidentally found parcel. The bomb failure, the serious injuries, and the death of his great love, Wanda (the stepdaughter of Piłsudski) caused a severe depression and a drop in Sławek's activities. He did not participate in any undertakings until a successful action at Bezdany in September 1908. Sławek was active in the Union of Active Struggle (Związek Walki Czynnej), and from 1912 he was secretary of the Polish Military Treasury and became a member of the Provisional Committee of Confederated Pro-Independence Parties.

After the outbreak of World War I Sławek joined the staff of the First Brigade of the Polish Legions. On 1 August 1914 he became head of the Intelligence Bureau of the High Command of the Riflemen's Association, and in 1915 he took over the post of head of the Intelligence Bureau of the First Brigade. Sławek became the most trusted confidant of Piłsudski, who entrusted him with various responsible missions. In 1915 he became a member of the Chief Command of the Polish Military Organization (Polska Organizacja Wojskowa) and the Central National Committee (Centralny Komitet Narodowy), the representation of pro-independence parties that aimed at the reconstruction of the state with the assistance of the central states. Sławek's extensive conspiratorial activities led to his arrest by the Germans on 14 July 1917.

Released from the Modlin fortress on 12 November 1918, from 1 January 1919 Sławek headed the political section of the Second Department of the General Staff (Intelligence) and took part in a complicated Polish-Lithuanian game that ended in an unsuccessful pro-Polish coup d'état in Kaunas (Kovno). The coup led to a further increase in tensions between the two countries. During the Polish-Soviet war Sławek was dispatched to the High Command of Symon Petlura. He served there as a liaison officer between the Ukrainian leader and Piłsudski. After the end of the war Sławek completed a one-year course at the Military College, and then he went into the reserves. In 1924 he started a consolidation of Piłsudski adherents. He became (among other things) president of the Main Board of the Association of Polish Legionnaires, and he founded the Confederation of Working People. In the coup of May 1926 Sławek played a political rather than a military role. From then on he was one of the leaders of the sanacja regime and a member of the "group of colonels." In 1927 Sławek formed a political representation for the Piłsudski camp, the Nonparty Bloc of Cooperation with the Government (Bezpartyjny Blok Współpracy z Rządem [BBWR]), and after the elections in 1928 he became head of the party. Sławek firmly struggled against both the opposition and the liberals of the sanacja regime. He was an advocate of a considerable consolidation of the presidential powers, a reduction of "party favoritism," and the introduction of an elitist government system. From 1928 Sławek worked on changing the constitution. Between 29 March and 23 August 1930 Sławek held the post of prime minister for the first time. He was followed by Piłsudski himself, who suppressed the opposition by imprisoning its activists in the fortress of Brześć. Sławek took part in this, and he became much tougher toward the opponents of the sanacja regime, reducing the number of liberals on the BBWR electoral lists in the early elections of 1930. On 4 December 1930 he again became prime minister and held the post until 26 May 1931, when he resigned, largely owing to an economic crisis. Sławek had considerable influence on the new constitution, passed on 23 April 1930, as he drew up its first ten articles, which were referred to as the “constitutional Decalog.” Between 28 March and 12 October 1935 he served as prime minister for the third time.

Piłsudski was planning for Sławek to take over the post of president but did not leave an explicit order on the issue. Thus, after Piłsudski’s death in May 1935, Sławek recognized the authority of Ignacy Mościcki, counting on succeeding him after the forthcoming elections. Gradually removed from power, Sławek made several political errors; for example, he dissolved the BBWR on 30 October 1935. In place of the BBWR, he planned to establish a General Organization of Society, a kind of a mono-party. However, he failed to win the support of sanacja hard-liners, who were oriented toward General Edward Rydz-Śmigły, and he was even less successful among the liberals of the sanacja regime. On 24 May 1936 Sławek was dismissed as president of the Association of Polish Legionnaires, and soon he also lost his post as president of the Józef Piłsudski Institute of Modern History. In 1928–38 Sławek was an MP, and between June and September 1938 he was the speaker of the Assembly. However, after the dissolution of the parliament, as a result of a particularly aggressive negative campaign, Sławek lost in the subsequent parliamentary election of 1938. Suffering from depression and feeling political defeat, Sławek committed suicide. (PU)

ŠLECHTA Emanuel (19 December 1895, Kuttenberg [now Kutná Hora, the Czech Republic]–17 March 1960, Prague), Czech engineer, economist, and political activist. A mechanical engineer by profession, Šlechta was involved in the organization of the production and transportation industries. From 1923 to 1926 he was in the United States. In 1935 he became an associate professor and in 1945 a full professor at the Technical University of Prague. Šlechta’s publications include the following: Hospodárná velikost sériové výroby (The economic scale of mass production; 1927); Americký industrialismus (American industrialism; 1928); Organisace průmyslových podniků (The organization of industrial enterprises; 1935); and Plynulá a přerušovaná výroba (Steady and intermittent production; 1938). Between world wars Šlechta was active in the National Socialist Party, and, from 1938 to 1939, in the National Unity Party (Strana Národní Jednoty). In 1939–45 Šlechta was imprisoned in the Buchenwald concentration camp. After the war, from 1948 onwards, he served as chairman of the board of Živnobanka and was a member of the leadership of the National Socialist Party. Šlechta worked closely with the Communists. In February 1948 he supported the Communist coup and joined a special committee of the National Front whose aim it was to “purge the public arena of reactionaries and enemies of the people’s democratic system.” Šlechta helped to establish the Communist-controlled Czechoslovak Socialist Party (Československá Strana Socialistická) and became its chairman. From 1948 he sat on the National Assembly and held the post of minister of technology. In 1950 he became minister of construction, and in 1956, minister and chairman of the National Construction Committee. In March 1960 Šlechta and his wife committed suicide for political reasons. SLEŽEVIČIUS Adolfo (2 February 1948, near Šiauliai), Lithuanian post-Communist politician. Sleževičius graduated in economics, and owing to his membership in the Communist Party, he quickly advanced professionally. In 1977–81 he was deputy minister of the meat and dairy industry of the Lithuanian SSR. From 1983 to 1989 he worked in the Central Committee (CC) of the Communist Party of Lithuania. In 1990–91 he was deputy minister of agriculture. In 1991 he became head of a Lithuanian-Norwegian joint venture company and then chairman of the Association of Lithuanian Dairy Producers. After the (post-Communist) Lithuanian Democratic Labor Party (Lietuvos Demokratinė Darbo Partija [LDLP]) won the October 1992 elections, Sleževičius became an MP on its behalf. When the LDLP leader, Algirdas Brazauskas, became president, Sleževičius took the lead of the party, and on 10 March 1993 he became prime minister. In the fall of 1995 he became involved in a financial scandal, since a few days before some banks were closed, he withdrew his deposits from them. Accused of corruption, he refused to step down, as President Brazauskas demanded. He did not resign until he was voted out of power by the parliament on 8 February 1996. Sleževičius is one of the richest people in Lithuania, with extensive business connections in Russia and the Caucasus. (WR)

SLEŽEVIČIUS Mykolas (21 February 1882, Drembliai, near Raseiniai–11 December 1939, Kaunas), Lithuanian politician. From 1902 to 1907 Sleževičius studied law at the university in Odessa. He subsequently returned to Lithuania and joined the Lithuanian Democratic Party. He also edited the periodicals of this party, Lietuvos Žinios and Lietuvos Ūkininkas. During World War I he was active in the Lithuanian Central Relief Committee in Petrograd. After the February 1917 revolution, he joined a group of Socialists-Populists. At a stormy conference of Lithuanian delegates in Petrograd (late May and early June 1917), Sleževičius put forward a resolution demanding Lithuanian independence. As the supporter of a more moderate approach to social issues, he was expelled from the Lithuanian Socialist People’s Party. Along with his supporters, Sleževičius founded the Lithuanian Socialist People’s Democratic Party (Lietuvos Socialistų Liaudininkų Demokratų Partija [LSLDP]) in Voronezh in November 1917. In 1918 he was briefly detained by the Bolsheviks in Voronezh. After his release, he helped Lithuanian refugees to return home.

After returning to Lithuania, Sleževičius became head of the second government of the republic on 26 December 1918. Because of the Bolshevik offensive, this government had to move from Vilnius (Wilno) to Kaunas. In mid-February Sleževičius’s government imposed martial law. After a short interval in March 1919, Sleževičius again served as head of the government and head of the ministry of foreign affairs from 12 April to 6 October 1919. He engaged the Lithuanians in the defense of their country against the Bolsheviks and against the forces of Pavel Bermond-Avalov. He also suppressed a coup attempt in Kaunas. This attempt had been organized by the Polish Military Organization in August 1919. In the elections of April 1920 Sleževičius won a seat on the LSLDP slate. As a result of his efforts, the LSLDP and the Peasant Populist Party, led by Kazys Grinius, merged to form the Lithuanian Peasant Populist Party (Lietuvos Valstiečių Liaudininkų Sąjunga [LVLS]) at the end of 1922. From 1920 to 1926 Sleževičius headed a parliamentary commission for foreign affairs, but he was in the opposition after the elections of May 1923. On 15 June 1926, after the LVLS and the Social Democratic Party won the elections, he again became head of a center-left government, serving simultaneously as minister of foreign affairs and minister of justice. The new government lifted martial law, declared an amnesty, developed social legislation, improved the situation of the national minorities, and (on 28 September) concluded a non-aggression pact with the Soviet Union. The opposition did not approve of these policies and accused the leftist government of the “Polonization” and “Bolshevization” of Lithuania. On 17 December 1926, along with President Kazys Grinius, Sleževičius was removed from power in a nationalist coup d’état led by Antanas Smetona. During the period of the nationalist dictatorship, Sleževičius was a member of the municipal government of Kaunas and an activist in the Lithuanian Law Association, and he practiced law. He was also the leader of the LVLS, but he did not have a chance to play any active political role. (WR)

SLEZYUK Ivan (14 January 1896, Żywaczów, near Stanisławów, Austria-Hungary [now Zhyvachiv, near Ivano-Frankivsk, Ukraine]–2 December 1973, Ivano-Frankivsk), Uniate bishop. After graduating from a seminary in 1923, Slezyuk was ordained a priest. He then worked in various parishes in Eastern Galicia. Anticipating his own arrest by the Communists, Bishop Hryhory Khomyshyn appointed Slezyuk coadjutor with the right of succession in April 1945. However, soon after Khomyshyn and the majority of Ukrainian Uniate bishops were arrested, Slezyuk was also imprisoned on 2 June 1945. Sentenced to ten years of forced labor, he served his sentence in forced labor camps in Vorkuta. In 1950 he was transferred to a forced labor camp in the Mordvinian ASSR. Released on 15 November 1954, he returned to Ivano-Frankivsk and continued his underground pastoral work. On 27 November 1957, shortly before his death, Bishop Ivan Latyshevskyi ordained Slezyuk a bishop. In 1962 Slezyuk was arrested again and sentenced to five years in a particularly harsh forced labor camp. Released on 30 November 1968, he had to report regularly to the KGB. On 27 June 2001 Pope John Paul II beatified him at a solemn Holy Mass in Lviv. (WR)

SLIPYI Josyf [originally Kobernytskyi-Dychkovskyi] (17 February 1892, Zazdrist, near Trembowla [now Terebovlya]–7 September 1984, Rome), Patriarch of the Ukrainian Greek Catholic Church, cardinal. After graduating from a seminary in Lemberg (Lwów, Lviv), Slipyi studied theology at Innsbruck, Austria, from 1912 to 1914, earning a doctorate in 1918 and the postdoctoral degree in 1920. He was ordained by Archbishop Andriy Sheptytskyi in 1917. From 1920 to 1922 Slipyi continued his studies at the Pontifical Gregorian University in Rome, where he received another postdoctoral degree. In 1922 he became a professor of dogmatic theology at a seminary in Lwów, and in 1925 he was appointed rector of this seminary. It was then that Slipyi for the first time came into conflict with Reverend Havryl Kostelnyk, a lecturer at this seminary, and with those who wanted the Uniate Church to break its ties with Rome. Slipyi was a co-founder and then an editor of the quarterly Bohoslovyia. In 1928 he became the rector of the Greek Catholic Theological Academy. In 1935 he became the canon of St. George's Cathedral in Lwów and archdean of the archeparchy of Lwów. After the Red Army occupied Lwów, Pope Pius XII appointed Slipyi bishop-coadjutor, with the right of succession in Lviv (25 November 1939), and exarch of the Ukrainian territory to the east of the Zbruch River (9 October). On 22 December 1939 Slipyi was secretly consecrated archbishop and coadjutor to Metropolitan Sheptytskyi.

On 1 November 1944, after the reoccupation of Eastern Galicia by the Red Army and the death of Sheptytskyi, Slipyi became metropolitan of Halych and archbishop of Lviv. Right from the start he realized the intentions of the Soviet authorities, as pressure was put on him by Serhiy Danylenko, a colonel of the NKGB (the People's Commissariat for State Security) who served as a "representative of the Soviet Ukrainian government for religious affairs." On 23 November 1944 Slipyi sent a pastoral letter expressing gratitude to the Red Army for liberating the Ukraine and conveying the hope of a "better future" for the Ukrainian people. In this letter he assumed a neutral attitude to the ongoing battles between the Ukrainian Insurgent Army (UPA) and the Soviet troops, and he only expressed the hope that the bloodshed would end soon. In December 1944, in an attempt to establish relations between the Ukrainian Uniate Church and the authorities of the Soviet Union, Slipyi sent a delegation headed by Reverend Kliment Sheptytskyi to Moscow, where the members of the delegation presented a letter to Stalin and the Soviet authorities. In this letter, Slipyi expressed gratitude for the liberation of the Ukraine from German occupation and conveyed the hope that "minor problems" encountered by the Church in the new reality would be overcome in the spirit of respect for the autonomy of the Church and the state. The members of the delegation were received by the state authorities and by Patriarch Alexey and were also invited to the headquarters of the General Staff of the Red Army, where they were informed that the attitude of the Soviet authorities to the Uniate Church would depend on the attitude of this church to the UPA.

Slipyi appealed to the UPA and the Soviet authorities for a cease-fire. In a pastoral letter of 28 March 1945 he called for an end to the hostilities and for resolving the conflict through peaceful negotiations. Because the UPA continued its resistance to the Red Army and the Soviet authorities wanted to abolish the Ukrainian Greek Catholic Church anyway, on 11 April 1945 Slipyi was arrested, along with a group of other hierarchs of this church. St. George's Cathedral was searched by the NKGB. On 3 June 1946 the Soviets sentenced Slipyi to eight years in a forced labor camp for "treason," although he had never been a Soviet citizen. Slipyi was initially imprisoned in Novosibirsk, and then he was held in forced labor camps in Mariinsk and Boymy, the Kemerovo region. He later served his sentence in Inta, in the Pechora River basin, and in Dubrovlag. In the meantime, the Uniate Church was incorporated into the Orthodox Church in March 1946 by decision of a spurious "council" (Sobor) under the leadership of Father Kostelnyk in Lviv. After the end of Slipyi's term, the Soviet authorities demanded that he recognize the decision of that "council" and the supremacy of the Orthodox patriarch of Moscow. Since Slipyi refused to comply with this demand, he was additionally sentenced to indefinite exile in the Krasnoyarsk region in 1953, and in 1957 he was condemned to a further eight years in a forced labor camp. He was held in a camp in Mordvinia. Despite an official campaign of hatred against Slipyi and the Uniate Church and the persecution he suffered personally, Slipyi courageously stood for the independence of his church from the Orthodox Church and defended its union with Rome.

After a long effort by the Holy See, with the personal involvement by Pope John XXIII, Slipyi was released on 9 February 1963 and was allowed to go to Rome. He attended the Second Vatican Council, at which he urged that the Ukrainian Greek Catholic Church be raised to the status of a patriarchate. However, the eastern policy of Pope John XXIII was based on avoiding friction with the Kremlin, so the implementation of Slipyi's proposal was delayed. In December 1963 Slipyi was recognized as head of the Ukrainian Greek Catholic Church and a member of the Congregation for Eastern Churches. On 22 February 1965 he was solemnly proclaimed cardinal, and in 1975 Pope Paul VI finally consented to recognize Slipyi as patriarch of the Ukrainian Greek Catholic Church. In 1976 Slipyi made a missionary visit to Canada and the United States, where he was enthusiastically greeted by the Ukrainian émigré community. He was received by U.S. President

Gerald Ford in the White House. Slipyi was awarded many honorary doctorates, including those from the University of Ottawa, the University of Chicago, and the Catholic University of America in Washington, D.C. Slipyi strove for a spiritual and intellectual revival of the Ukrainian Greek Catholic Church. He founded a Uniate parish in Rome and reestablished the Studite monastic community, for which he gained the monastery of Castel Gandolfo. In 1963–84 he was in charge of efforts to found a Ukrainian Catholic university in Rome, and he revived the Ukrainian Academic Theological Society and its periodical, Bohoslovyia. He also published many scholarly works. Slipyi specialized in the theology of the Holy Trinity. His manuscripts on the sacraments were smuggled from the Soviet Union and were published in three volumes in Canada in 1953–60. Slipyi also wrote on the Union of Brest-Litovsk and on the influence of St. Thomas Aquinas in the Ukraine. All together, thirteen volumes of his works were published from 1968 to 1984. His Spomyyny (Memoirs), written in 1963–64, are kept in the Vatican's Archivum Patriarchalis S. Sophiae. Slipyi was an honorary member of the Shevchenko Scientific Society (NTSh) and a member of the Papal Academy of St. Thomas. Toward the end of Slipyi's life, the Ukrainian Greek Catholic Church received strong support through the work of Pope John Paul II, who convened a synod of this church in Rome in March 1980. This synod, the first in fifty-one years, was also attended by fifteen bishops from all over the world. Pope John Paul II also established the Ukrainian Catholic University in Rome. According to Slipyi's last wishes, his remains were reburied in the crypt of St. George's Cathedral in Lviv; this took place during a solemn ceremony on 28 August 1992. Slipyi's beatification process is under way. (WR)

ŠLIUPAS Jonas (23 February 1861, Rakandžiai, near Šiauliai–6 November 1944, Berlin), Lithuanian doctor and politician. From 1880 to 1883 Šliupas studied at the Universities of Moscow and St. Petersburg and then in Geneva for a short time. He worked with the Polish Social Revolutionary Party Proletariat in 1882–83. In 1883 in Geneva he wrote the brochure Išganymas vargdienio

(The salvation of a pauper; 1886), in which he expressed a belief that in the future Lithuania would be an independent national state. From 1883 to 1884 Šliupas edited the monthly Aušra, in which he presented liberal-positivist and anti-religious views. He maintained that the Catholic Church was an instrument of the Polonization of Lithuania and that Christianity immensely harmed the Lithuanian nation. Because of his views, he came into conflict with the Church hierarchs and the Lithuanian clergy. In 1884 Šliupas submitted a memorandum to Josif Hurko, the governor-general of Warsaw, in which he called for the lifting of a ban on printing in Lithuanian using the Latin alphabet. In exchange, Šliupas offered cooperation against the Poles, who allegedly Polonized and "corrupted" the Lithuanian people. However, his efforts were unsuccessful, and Šliupas left for the United States. He received a medical degree from the University of Maryland Medical School in 1891, and then he began practicing as a doctor in Scranton, Shenandoah, and other mining districts of Pennsylvania. He also edited the periodicals Unija (1884–85), Apšvieta (1892–93), and Laisvoji Mintis (1910–15). Despite his radical materialist views, Šliupas worked with Catholic priests who were devoted to the Lithuanian national cause. During World War I he actively promoted the cause of Lithuania's independence in various circles in America.

After Lithuania regained its independence, Šliupas returned to his country in 1921. He taught the history of medicine at the University of Kaunas and worked for the secularization of Lithuanian society. He openly criticized the dictatorship of Antanas Smetona, as a result of which he came into conflict with the political authorities and with the Church hierarchs. In 1933 he was elected mayor of the seaside resort of Palanga. He survived the Soviet occupation (1940–41), and toward the end of World War II he went to Germany, where he died. Šliupas authored Lietuvių tauta senovėje ir šiandien (The Lithuanian nation in the past and present, 2 vols.; 1904–5) and Essays on the Past, Present and Future of Lithuania (1918). He also wrote atheist and anti-church satires, including Tikyba ar mokslas (Religion or science; 1895). (WR)

ŠLIWIŃSKI Artur (17 August 1877, Ruszki, near Kutno–16 January 1953, Warsaw), Polish politician.

Śliwiński graduated from a high school in Warsaw and studied at a trade academy in Leipzig. In 1902 he joined the Polish Socialist Party (Polska Partia Socjalistyczna [PPS]), and in 1906 in Kraków he became editor-in-chief of Trybuna, which was the local organ of the PPS–Revolutionary Faction. In August 1914, following the orders of Józef Piłsudski, Śliwiński unsuccessfully attempted to create a national government. Then he founded the Polish National Organization (Polska Organizacja Narodowa), which joined the Main National Committee (Naczelny Komitet Narodowy). In December 1915, Śliwiński became the chairman of the Central National Committee (Centralny Komitet Narodowy), which was the political superstructure of the clandestine Polish Military Organization (Polska Organizacja Wojskowa [POW]). In March 1917 he became the leader of the Party of National Independence (Stronnictwo Niezawisłości Narodowej), which was tied to the PPR–Revolutionary Faction, and in July he became secretary of the Provisional Council of State, a Polish political body created in Warsaw with German acquiescence. Between 1917 and 1918, Śliwiński served as deputy chairman of the City Council in Warsaw and from 1919 through 1922 as deputy mayor of the Polish capital. On 28 June 1922 Piłsudski entrusted him with creating a government, but Śliwiński failed to rally the necessary parliamentary support and quit his mission on July 7. Later Śliwiński worked as general director of Urban Theaters, chairman of the Polish Radio Company, and (between 1932 and 1939) director of the Polish Communal Bank. From 1935 through 1938, he sat in the Senate. During the German occupation, between 1939 and 1941, he served as chairman of the Warsaw Committee for Social Self-Assistance. Śliwiński penned several works on military history and Poland’s struggle for independence. (WR)

SŁONIMSKI Antoni (15 October 1895, Warsaw–4 July 1976, Warsaw), Polish poet. Słonimski came from an assimilated Jewish family with an old intellectual pedigree. He was the son of the prominent physician Stanisław Słonimski, grandson of the mathematician Zelig Słonimski, and great-grandson of Abraham Stern, who was a member of the Warsaw Scientific Society. Słonimski studied at the Academy of Fine Arts in Warsaw and then in Munich. The year 1913 witnessed his poetic debut. Between 1917 and 1919 Słonimski worked with the periodical Pro arte et studio, and in 1920 he co-founded the Skamander poetry group. Słonimski’s most important interwar collections of poetry include Sonety (Sonnets; 1918); Harmonia (Harmony; 1919); Godzina poezji (The hour of poetry; 1923); Z dalekiej podróży (From a distant journey; 1926); and Okno bez krat (A window with no bars; 1935). His poetry combined elements of expressionism and Romanticism with secular and liberal ideology. Between 1924 and 1939 Słonimski collaborated with the weekly Wiadomości Literackie. He edited its theatrical reviews section and regularly wrote its “Kronika tygodniowa” (Weekly chronicle), lashing out at stupidity and prejudice. Along with Julian Tuwim, Słonimski was a representative of the interwar surrealist humor school, represented in (for example) the collection W oparach absurdu (In the fumes of the absurd; 1958). During World War II Słonimski was in Paris (1939–40) and then in London, where, between 1942 and 1946, he edited the journal Nowa Polska, which accepted the Yalta accords. In 1945 he published Wiek klęski (The age of defeat). Between 1946 and 1948, he headed the Literature Section of the UNESCO, and in 1948 he participated in the Congress of Intellectuals in the Defense of Peace in Wrocław; this was a propaganda spectacle organized by the Communists. Later Słonimski headed the Institute of Polish Culture in London, and in 1951 he returned permanently to Poland. In 1955, he was awarded the First Class State Award for his poetic output. During the “thaw” he supported the liberalization of the Communist system. Between 1956 and 1959 he served as chairman of the Main Board of the Association of Polish Writers. He became increasingly disillusioned with the anti-intellectual attitude of the regime of Władysław Gomułka. In 1964, Słonimski co-signed the “Letter of 34” dissenting intellectuals. He attracted a circle of young Marxist revisionist intellectuals and became a leader among the leftist and liberal opposition. Adam Michnik was his personal assistant. A rationalist and a skeptic, Słonimski spoke for the secular intelligentsia and was a master of scathing humor. From 1971 he collaborated with the Catholic weekly Tygodnik Powszechny. In 1975, Słonimski published Alfabet wspomnień (The alphabet of memoirs). (WR)

SMAL-STOTSKYI Roman (8 January 1893, Czernowitz [now Chernivtsi, Ukraine]–27 April 1969, Washington, D.C.), Ukrainian scholar and politician. Smal-Stotskyi’s father, Stepan Smal-Stotskyi (1859–1938), was a noted philologist and educational activist. Smal-Stotskyi studied in Vienna, Leipzig, and Munich, earning a Ph.D. in philology in 1914. During World War I he was a representative in Munich of the Union for the Liberation of Ukraine. In 1918 he became a representative in Berlin of the Western Ukrainian National Republic, and from 1919 to 1923 he served as an adviser and minister plenipotentiary of the Ukrainian National Republic (Ukrainiska Narodna Republika [UNR]) to Berlin. Smal-Stotskyi taught comparative Slavic linguistics at the Ukrainian Free University in Prague (1923–26), and, from 1924 to 1925, he worked as a professor at Cambridge and served as an informal UNR representative to Great Britain. From 1926 to 1939 he was a professor at Warsaw University, and he also served as deputy minister and then minister of foreign affairs, minister of culture, and deputy prime minister of the UNR government-in-exile. In 1929–39 Smal-Stotskyi held the post of secretary of the Ukrainian Scientific Institute in Warsaw, and in 1934 he became a member of the Shevchenko Scientific Society (NTSh). He edited the periodical Pratsy and the series Studii do ukraiïnskoy hramatyki (Studies on Ukrainian grammar, 7 vols.; 1926–29). He was also engaged in the Promethean movement, which sought to liberate various nations from Soviet occupation and which was discreetly supported by the Polish authorities.

During World War II, Smal-Stotskyi was held under house arrest in Prague by the Germans. Toward the end of the war, with the help of the Polish National Armed Forces (Narodowe Siły Zbrojne [NSZ]), he avoided arrest by the NKVD and went to Germany and subsequently to the United States in 1947. Smal-Stotskyi taught the history of Central and Eastern Europe at Marquette University in Milwaukee, Wisconsin. In 1951 he became president of the American branch of the NTSh, and in 1955, a member of the Ukrainian Congress Committee of America (UCCA). Smal-Stotskyi authored many works that are vital to Ukrainian linguistics and literary studies and to Ukrainian history, including Narys slovo tvoruv prykmetnykiv ukraiïnskoy movy (An outline of Ukrainian adjectival word formation; 1925); Ukraiïnska mova v sovetskiy Ukraïni (The Ukrainian language in the Soviet Ukraine; 1936); The Nationality Problem of the Soviet Union and Russian Communist Imperialism (1952); and The Captive Nations: Nationalism of the Non-Russian Nations in the Soviet Union (1960). ŠMERAL Bohumír (25 October 1880, Třebíč–8 May 1941, Moscow), Czech Social Democratic and Communist politician. Born into a family of teachers, after graduating from high school in Třebíč, Šmeral studied law at the universities in Prague, Berlin, and London, graduating in 1904. In his student years, he joined Slávia, a nationally oriented and pro-Slavic student movement. He founded its Marxist group. From 1899 to 1900 he edited Studentský sborník. While a student, he also began contributing to Právo lidu, a Social Democratic newspaper. He became an editor of this newspaper in 1904, and from 1907 to 1917 he was its editor-in-chief. An active member of the Czech Social Democratic Party, Šmeral joined the ČSSD Executive Committee in 1909. In 1911 he became an MP in the parliament in Vienna. He soon became the leading Social Democratic politician in Bohemia. In 1916–17 he was head of the party and vice-president of the Czech representation in the Austro-Hungarian parliament. An adherent of the internationalist line in the workers' movement and of the view that the world war was imperialist in character, Šmeral did not support the Entente or the Central Powers. He also did not establish contacts with the Czech politicians in exile or with the members of a Czech secret political organization called Mafia. Under pressure from members of the opposition within the party who represented the national wing of the party (including Gustáv Habrman), Šmeral resigned his positions in August 1917.

After Czechoslovakia was created, Šmeral refused to accept a ministerial position and rejected membership in the Revolutionary National Assembly. He went to Switzerland, where he worked as a correspondent for Právo lidu. After a visit to Russia and a meeting with Lenin, he returned to Czechoslovakia as a supporter of the Social Democratic Party's accession to the Communist International. A split occurred within the party and within the trade unions over strategic goals and current tactics. As a result of Šmeral's activities, two factions emerged within the Social Democratic Party. Šmeral took the lead of the faction that sought to establish a Communist party. After the Communist Party of Czechoslovakia (CPC) was founded, he became its first chairman. He headed the CPC from 1920 to 1925. He served as a Communist member of parliament (1920–29) and senator (1935–38). He was also active in the Comintern, serving as a member of the Presidium of the Comintern Executive Committee (in 1924 and from 1927 to 1931). In the early 1930s Šmeral founded the Union of Friends of the Soviet Union and became the editor-in-chief of its press organ, Svět sovětů. In 1934 he again became active in the Comintern, traveling around Europe as its envoy. In November 1938 Šmeral went to

Moscow, where he entered into cooperation with Klement Gottwald. (PU)

SMETONA Antanas (10 August 1874, Užulėnis, near Vilkomir [now Ukmergė, Lithuania]–9 January 1944, Cleveland, Ohio), Lithuanian lawyer and politician. Smetona was the son of a poor peasant. After finishing primary school in Taujenai, he studied at a high school in Palanga. Along with Jonas Jablonskis, Vincas Kudirka, and others, he was a member of pro-independence student groups. In the autumn of 1896 Smetona organized a student demonstration against the obligation to attend the Orthodox Church; as a result, he was expelled from school. He passed his secondary school examinations in St. Petersburg, and then he began to study law at the university there. He served as chairman of the Lithuanian Student Organization and became involved in distributing Lithuanian publications banned by the Russian authorities. Arrested in 1899, he was released after two weeks. He resumed his studies, graduating in 1902, and then he began working at the Land Bank in Vilnius (Wilno). Smetona joined the Lithuanian Democratic Party (LDP) and rose quickly through the party ranks. After the ban was lifted on printing in Lithuanian using the Latin alphabet, he became editor of the daily Vilniaus Žinios in 1904. In 1905–6 he also edited the weekly Lietuvos Ūkininkas. In December 1905, during sessions of the Lithuanian Diet, he was elected to its five-member presidium. In 1907 Smetona left the LDP, and, along with Reverend Juozas Tumas-Vaižgantas, he founded the triweekly Viltis, in which he propagated Lithuanian national ideas. Although Smetona was a firm opponent of Marxism, his outlook on the world was too liberal for the spiritual directors of this triweekly. In 1913 Smetona left Viltis and rallied his supporters around the periodical Vairas, which he published in 1914–15. In this periodical he called for the national unity of the Lithuanian people.

After the outbreak of World War I, Smetona became deputy chairman of the Lithuanian Central Relief Committee in Vilnius (November 1914). After the Germans occupied Vilnius in 1915, he did not leave the city. He was in charge of political activities in Vilnius and continued his work in the Lithuanian Learned Society. In the summer of 1916 Smetona appealed to the German authorities for permission to establish an independent Lithuanian state. In September 1917 he began publishing the periodical Lietuvos Aides, in which he outlined plans for such a state. When on 18 September 1917 the Germans agreed to the establishment of the Lithuanian Council (Lietuvos Taryba), Smetona was elected its president. The German occupation authorities were inclined to recognize the independence of Lithuania on condition that Lithuania remained allied with Germany. Smetona wanted to agree to this compromise, but the majority of the members of the Lithuanian Council were against it; therefore, he resigned. However, he soon again became president of this council, which proclaimed Lithuania's unconditional independence on 16 February 1918. It remained a paper proclamation only, until the Germans had to accept their defeat in war. On 11 November 1918 the State Council (as the Lithuanian Council was renamed) established the first government of Lithuania under Augustinas Voldemaras.

In late 1918 and early 1919 Smetona was in Berlin, where he worked for the smooth withdrawal of German troops from Lithuania. He also visited the Scandinavian countries, where he solicited economic and political aid. After returning home, he was elected the first president of Lithuania under the provisional constitution of the state (4 April 1919). Within a year the foundations of the administration and the army were created, and elections to the Constitutional Assembly were called. After these elections, Smetona resigned as president of the state on 19 June 1920 because of the poor electoral showing of the nationalists. He handed over his office to Aleksandras Stulginskis, the parliament speaker. In the parliamentary elections in 1922 and 1923 Smetona and his National Progress Party (Tautos Pažanga [NPP]) failed to obtain a seat; this failure resulted from the NPP's moderate views on agricultural reform. In 1923 Smetona became the government commissioner for Klaipėda (German: Memel), but because of his disagreements with Prime Minister Ernestas Galvanauskas, he resigned this post and resumed his scholarly and editorial work. He briefly taught philosophy, ethics, and rhetoric at Vytautas Magnus University in Kaunas. He also translated the classics of Greek philosophy, including Plato. In the periodicals Lietuvos balsas and Vairas, he sharply criticized the parliamentary system of government; as a result, he constantly came into conflict with the authorities. In the elections of May 1926 Smetona was elected to the parliament, along with two other members of his party, which had been renamed the Union of Lithuanian Nationalists (Tautininkų Sąjunga [ULN]) in 1924.

On 17 December 1926 Smetona's supporters, backed by the Christian Democrats and a part of the army led by Major Povilas Plechavičius, removed the center-left government of Mykolas Sleževičius from power. As a result of a boycott by the parties that had until then been in power, only forty out of eighty-five MPs took part in the presidential election, and Smetona became president again. After another clash with the parliament, Smetona dissolved the chamber on 12 April 1927. When new elections were not held within the deadline defined by the constitution, the Christian Democrats and their allies from the Lithuanian Farmers' Union left the ruling coalition. On 15 May 1928 the ULN pushed through constitutional amendments that gave sweeping powers to Smetona as president. Smetona consolidated his position in the ruling camp by dismissing Prime Minister Voldemaras, who tried to compete with him for power, on 19 September 1929. Smetona then appointed his brother-in-law, Juozas Tūbelis, to this post. Opposition parties admittedly existed in the system of government established by Smetona, but they had no influence on the way the country was governed. Power was in the hands of the activists of the ULN, the army, and the state bureaucracy. A paramilitary organization called Iron Wolf was established in order to suppress the opposition. Smetona was worshipped as the Leader of the Nation (Tautos Vadas). He was reelected president in 1931 and 1938. A new constitution was adopted that extended the powers of the president and his administration and introduced an authoritarian system. However, in the face of threats to Lithuania in 1939, Smetona succeeded in bringing some of the opposition members into the government. In foreign policy he favored the Western and Scandinavian countries and represented an intransigent attitude toward Poland, which was accused of the unlawful annexation of the Vilnius (Wilno) region. Smetona and his government refused to enter into relations with Poland until March 1938, when bilateral relations between the two countries were reestablished as a result of a Polish ultimatum.

In September 1939 Smetona decided to remain neutral in the face of the German and Soviet invasions of Poland, but in October 1939 he accepted the Soviet offer of the Vilnius region, which had been seized by the Soviets. In return he accepted a Kremlin ultimatum, and on 10 October 1939 he agreed to the presence of Soviet troops in Lithuania. However, that did not prevent another ultimatum by the Soviet Union and the invasion of Lithuania by the Red Army on 15 June 1940. Smetona's suggestion that the country offer armed resistance against the Soviet troops was not accepted by the majority of the government; therefore, on the same day Smetona handed over his office to Prime Minister Antanas Merkys and then crossed over the German border. Subsequently, along with his family, Smetona made his way, via Switzerland, to the United States, where he arrived at the beginning of 1941. In the United States he campaigned for the restoration of Lithuanian independence and disseminated information about the unlawful political steps and genocidal policies of the Soviet Union. Smetona perished in a fire at his son's house.

Smetona left a vast written legacy. Four volumes of his articles and speeches from 1907–18, edited by him, were published in 1930–31: Vienybės gairėmis (Toward unity); Šviesos takais (Following the paths of light); Atgimstant (In a time of revival); and Lietuvių santykiai su lenkais (Polish-Lithuanian relations). A collection of his speeches from 1927–34, when he served as president, was published under the title Pasakyta Parašyta (Speeches and statements; 1935). A second volume, covering the period 1935–40, was compiled and edited under the same title and was published in the United States in 1974. Smetona's style was regarded as a model of linguistic clarity and accuracy. (WR)

ŠMIDKE Karol (21 January 1897, Ostrava–15 December 1952, Bratislava), Slovak Communist activist of Czech origin. A mining carpenter by trade, Šmidke joined the Communist Party of Czechoslovakia (CPC) in 1921. From 1930 he belonged to the Slovak party leadership, and in 1930–31 he was organization secretary of the Central Committee (CC) of the Communist Party of Slovakia (CPS). From 1935 to 1938 Šmidke was an MP, and in 1939 he left for the Soviet Union, where he worked in the Moscow office of the CPC. He returned to Slovakia in 1943 to establish an underground CPS leadership along with Gustav Husák and Laco Novomeský. Šmidke was co-author of the “Christmas accord” between the Communists and non-Communist resistance fighters. He also took part in the creation of the Slovak National Council (SNC) and in preparations for the Slovak National Uprising. Šmidke commanded the general staff of the guerrilla movement, and during the uprising he, along with Vavro Šrobár, co-chaired the SNC. In 1944–45 Šmidke was president and then (from 1945 to 1950) vice-president of the CPS. In 1945 he was briefly a member of the Presidium of the CC of the CPC and was vice-president of the party. From 1949 to 1951 he was a member of the

CC of the CPC; from 1946 to 1948 he was vice-president and then (until 1950) president of the SNC. From 1945 Šmidke was an MP. As a “one of Husák’s men,” in 1950 he was accused of “Slovak bourgeois nationalism.” After an extensive self-criticism Šmidke left the political scene but avoided arrest. He worked as the director of the Tesla Factory in Bratislava. In 1963 Šmidke was posthumously rehabilitated. (PU)

SMIRNOV Igor (1941, Petropavlovsk Kamchatski), Russian separatist politician in Moldavia. In 1959 Smirnov moved from Kamchatka to Zaporozhye in the Ukrainian SSR to study in the Institute of Machine Construction. In 1959–87 he worked as an engineer, shopkeeper, and director of a machine factory in Zaporozhye. From 1963 he belonged to the Communist Party. In 1987 he went to the Moldavian SSR and joined the Union of Directors, an organization of Russian nomenclatura established to preserve the USSR. In 1988 Smirnov was co-founder of another conservative organization, Unitatea (Unity). In 1989–91 he headed the trade union United Council of Labor Collectives (UCLC), the leading force in the pro-Russian Interfront, created in 1989. As the result of strikes, the UCLC took over control of the administration in Transnistria, a part of Moldova dominated by Russians and Russian-speaking Ukrainians. After a referendum in 1990 this region proclaimed sovereignty, and Smirnov was elected chairman of its Supreme Council.

After the dissolution of the Soviet Union in December 1991, Transnistria proclaimed independence. Facing hostility from Moldova, Smirnov considered a merger of the region with the Ukraine. The Moldovan secret service kidnapped Smirnov in Kiev but soon released him. Smirnov proclaimed himself president of the Transnistrian Republic of Moldova, which was not recognized by any country. As a result military operations began between Moldova and the new republic, whose separate status was defended by the Fourteenth Russian Army, stationed in Transnistria. In 1992 the Moldovan parliament deprived Smirnov of a mandate that he had held since 1990. In 1992–96 Smirnov rejected proposals for Transnistrian autonomy within Moldova, negotiated with the help of Russia, and in 1995 he demanded the federalization of Moldova and the recognition of his republic. In 1996 Smirnov was reelected president of Transnistria and continued to oppose the withdrawal of Russian troops from his region. In 2001 he was reelected again; there was widespread election fraud. In November 2003 a Russian-sponsored peace plan for the region was rejected by Moldova after Moldovan demonstrations against it; the deal would have permitted Russian troops to remain until 2020. (LW)

SMODLAKA Josip (9 November 1869, Imotski–31 May 1956, Split), Croatian politician from Dalmatia. Smodlaka graduated in law in Zagreb and Graz, and then he worked as a lawyer in Imotski and Split. From 1897 he belonged to the Party of Law (Stranka Prava), and in 1901 he was elected to the regional parliament of Dalmatia. Along with Ante Trumbić and Franjo Supilo, Smodlaka instigated the political movement for autonomy in the Croatian province (banovina), and in 1903 he announced a “new political course,” consisting of sharpening the struggle against the Habsburg authorities. In 1905 Smodlaka established the periodical Sloboda and the Croatian Democratic Party (Hrvatska Demokratska Stranka), whose program combined national and social goals. He defended the rights of the peasants and acted against colonate-church estates (which was an ancient form of land lease that gave tenants very limited rights) and usury in the countryside. After the passing of the Rijeka Resolution in October 1905 Smodlaka acted in favor of a Serbo-Croat rapprochement. In 1910 he was elected to the parliament in Vienna on behalf of the Split constituency.

At the end of World War I Smodlaka supported the unification of Habsburg Slavs and belonged to the Dalmatian delegation that joined in the proclamation of the Kingdom of Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes (SHS) on 1 December 1918. In the provisional parliament Smodlaka sat as an independent deputy. He was a member of the SHS delegation to the Paris Peace Conference. During a constitutional debate in which spokesmen for Serbian centralism clashed with federalists, Smodlaka followed a middle-of-the road course. After the passing of the centralist constitution in June 1921, he tried to mitigate its pro-Serbian interpretation and organized a congress of public activists in Zagreb in September 1922. Later Smodlaka worked in the diplomatic service as an envoy to the Holy See, Berlin, and Madrid. Nevertheless, the Serbianization of the royal administration under the dictatorship of King Alexander Karadjordjević was contrary to Smodlaka’s federalist inclinations. From 1936 he again advocated a reform of the Yugoslav state into a federation of four parts: Serbia, Croatia, Slovenia, and a “dinar” region. After the Serbo-Croat agreement of August 1939, at the end of 1939 Smodlaka was appointed senator. The collapse of Yugoslavia in April 1941 undermined his trust in the established institutions of this state. During the Ustasha regime Smodlaka went underground and started to work with the guerrillas of Josip Broz Tito. He joined the Anti-Fascist Council for the National Liberation of Yugoslavia, and in March 1945 he became minister without portfolio in the Tito government. He also represented the new Yugoslav authorities with the allied command in Rome. Later, owing to ailing health, Smodlaka withdrew from politics. (WR)

SMOLICH Arkadž (29 November 1891, Batsevichi–17 June 1938?), Belorussian economist, cartographer, and politician. The son of a countryside Orthodox priest, in 1916 Smolich graduated from the Novoalexandriyskiy Institute of Agriculture and Forestry. From 1910 he belonged to the Belorussian Socialist Hromada, and in 1917 he joined the closed circle of the party leadership. He also edited the party periodical, Hramada. In March 1917 Smolich co-organized the First Congress of Belorussian Parties and Organizations in Minsk and was elected to the Belorussian National Committee. After the Bolshevik revolution, in December 1917 Smolich took part in the First All-Belorussian Congress and joined the Secretariat of the Belorussian People’s Republic (BPR). He participated in the creation of its state apparatus. From 1919 Smolich was vice-president of the BPR Council and secretary of education in the first BPR government. In 1919–22 he lived in Wilno (Vilnius) and was co-founder of the Association of Belorussian Schools. In 1922 he left for Minsk, where he became president of the Central Belorussian Bureau. From 1925 he was deputy director of the Institute of Belorussian Culture, and from 1929 he was a member of the Presidium of the Academy of Sciences of the Belorussian SSR. At the same time he lectured at the Belorussian State University. In 1927 Smolich was appointed professor. He taught economics and geography and authored a textbook on Belorussian geography. In 1930 Smolich was arrested and sentenced to long-term imprisonment for his activities in a nonexistent organization, the Union of Liberation of Belorussia. In 1939 Smolich was tried again, sentenced to death, and executed by firing squad. (EM)

SMORAWIŃSKI Mieczysław (25 December 1893, Kalisz–April 1940, Katyn), Polish general. After completing chemistry studies in Lemberg (Lwów, Lviv), Smorawiński joined independence activities in Galicia. During World War I he served in the Polish Legions, and in 1917 he joined the Polish Auxiliary Corps (Polski Korpus Posiłkowy). At the end of 1918 he entered the Polish Army with the rank of major. In February 1919 Smorawiński took command of the Eighth Infantry Regiment, and during the Polish-Soviet war he was in command of the Fourth Infantry Brigade. In March 1927 he assumed command of the Sixth Infantry Division, and in January 1928 he was promoted to general. In October 1932 Smorawiński became deputy commander of the Corps Area in Grodno (Corps Area HQ III) and in October 1934 of the Corps Area in Lublin (Corps Area HQ II). In September 1939 he led the defense of the Lublin region. When the Red Army entered this territory, Smorawiński ordered his subordinates to offer no resistance but to disperse and try to get to the West, where, he hoped, the Polish Army would be rebuilt. Taken captive by the Red Army, Smorawiński was put in a transition camp in Talitsa. Later, he was transported to the prison camp in Kozelsk. In April 1940 he was deported to the Katyn Forest, and, along with others, he was executed without trial by order of the Politburo of the CC of the All-Russian Communist Party (Bolsheviks). The execution was carried out by a special unit of the NKVD. In April 1943 Smorawiński’s body was found among the victims murdered in Katyn. (WR)

SMRKOVSÝ Josef (26 February 1911, Velenka, Nymburk district–15 January 1974, Prague), Czech Communist activist. A baker by trade, Smrkovský was active in the Communist trade unions and youth organizations in the 1930s. In 1933 he joined the Communist Party of Czechoslovakia (CPC). After finishing a party school in the Soviet Union (1937), Smrkovský became CPC secretary in Brno. During World War II he was active in the Communist underground. From 29 April to 11 May 1945 he held the post of deputy chairman (in fact served as chairman) of the Czech National Council, and he was one of the leaders of the Prague Uprising, for which he was criticized by the Soviets, as well as by the CPC leadership. Smrkovský subsequently briefly served as chairman of the Provincial National Committee (Zemský Národní Výbor) in Bohemia but was dismissed under Soviet pressure. From 1945 to 1948 he was chairman of the National Land Fund and then served as deputy minister of agriculture and general director of state-owned farms for two years. Smrkovský played an important role during the Communist coup of February 1948, serving as one of the organizers and then as deputy chief of the General Staff of the People's Militias. From 1945 to 1951 Smrkovský was a member of the Presidium of the CPC Central Committee (CC). From 1946 to 1951 he was a deputy to the National Assembly. Arrested in 1951, Smrkovský was dismissed from his positions and sentenced to life imprisonment for taking part in an alleged "plot" led by Rudolf Slanský. Released in 1955, he served as chairman of the Pavlovice agricultural cooperative until 1963. Rehabilitated in 1963, he served as deputy minister of people's control for two years. From 1965 to 1967 he was minister-chairman of the Central Board of Water Management, and from 1967 to 1968 he was minister of forest and water management.

In the second half of the 1960s Smrkovský was one of the main representatives of the pro-reform faction within the CPC. He was instrumental in the overthrow of Antonín Novotný, and his January 1968 address was an important impulse for the Prague Spring. From 1966 to 1969 Smrkovský was a member of the CPC CC, and from March 1968 to April 1969 he was a member of the CC Presidium. He was a deputy to the National Assembly (1964–69) and a deputy to the Federal Assembly (until December 1969). He served as chairman of the National Assembly (April 1968–January 1969) and chairman of the People's Chamber of the Federal Assembly (until October 1969). A very popular speaker during the Prague Spring, Smrkovský strongly protested the invasion of Czechoslovakia by Warsaw Pact troops. On 23 August 1968, along with a group of party and government leaders (including Alexander Dubček, Oldřich Černík, and František Kriegel), Smrkovský was taken to Moscow, where he took part in negotiations with Soviet leaders on the situation in Czechoslovakia. He was one of the signatories of the "Moscow Protocol," which sanctioned the invasion and announced the so-called normalization. As a result of this "normalization" policy, Smrkovský was dismissed from his all positions in late 1969 and expelled from the party in 1970. (PU)

SNEGUR Mircea (17 January 1940, Trifănești, near Soroki), Moldavian post-Communist politician. In 1961 Snegur graduated from the Agronomic Institute in Kishinev (Chișinău), and later he worked in the administration of a state farm. In 1964 he joined the Communist Party of Moldavia (Partidul Comunist din Moldova [CPM]), a part of the CPSU, and remained a member until 1990. In 1967–71 Snegur was the director of a state farm, and from 1971 to 1978 he was chief of administration in the Ministry of Agriculture of the Moldavian SSR. From 1978 to 1981 he was general director of the Seleksya Research and Production Society in Kishinev, and in 1981–85 he was first secretary of the regional CPM committee in Edineț. In 1985 he was promoted to secretary of the CPM Central Committee (CC) and soon became second CC secretary, responsible for ideology. In 1989–90 Snegur chaired the Supreme Council of the Moldavian SSR. At this time he spoke in favor of Moldavian sovereignty but also supported a new union agreement to change the system of the USSR along the lines of the perestroika policy of Mikhail Gorbachev.

On 23 June 1990 the Supreme Council of the Moldavian SSR proclaimed the state sovereignty of the republic. Soon the republican parliament introduced the presidential system and elected Snegur as president of the republic on 3 September 1990. Snegur opposed the idea of a merger with Romania, favored by the government of Valeriu Muravschi. In view of pro-Russian separatism in Transnistria and the Gagauz territory in 1991, Snegur delayed the formation of a Moldavian army and asked for help from Soviet Ministry of Interior troops, which, nevertheless, supported the separatists. As a result of the failure of the Moscow putsch in August 1991, Snegur supported the full independence of Moldova, which was proclaimed by the parliament on 27 August 1991. At the same time he introduced Moldova to the Commonwealth of Independent States (CIS). On 8 December 1991 Snegur was elected president of Moldova and held this office until 15 January 1997. From 1994 Snegur distanced himself from the CIS, but he also opposed unification with Romania. In 1995 he entered into conflict with the pro-Russian and Populist parliamentary majority of the Agrarian Democratic Party of Moldova (Partidul Democrat Agrar din Moldova), and he turned to the right. He simultaneously drew his supporters to the Moldovan Party of Renewal and Accord (Partidul Renașterii și Coșilierii din Moldova [MPRA]). Despite these efforts, on 1 December 1996 Snegur lost the presidential election to Petru Lucinschi. In 1998–2001 Snegur was an MP on behalf of the Democratic Convention of Moldova (Convenția Democrată din Moldova), a coalition co-founded with the pro-Romanian Christian

Democrats. In the parliamentary elections of 25 February 2001 the MPRA failed to cross the threshold and stayed out of the parliament. (LW)

SNIEČKUS Antanas (7 January 1903, Bubleliai, near Šakiai–22 January 1974, Druskininkai), prominent Lithuanian Communist activist. Sniečkus came from a wealthy peasant family. During World War I, he was in Russia, where he attended a secondary school in Voronezh. After the February 1917 revolution he joined the Bolshevik party and took part in propaganda activities. After returning to Lithuania, he worked as a telephone clerk in southern Lithuania from 1919 to 1921. He repeatedly went to Minsk and Moscow illegally, bringing back instructions and propaganda literature for Lithuanian Communists. Arrested during a demonstration in Alytus in 1921 and released on parole before trial, Sniečkus fled to Russia, where he underwent organizational training. In 1926 he returned to Lithuania and became secretary of the Central Committee of the Lithuanian Communist Party. In 1931 he was sentenced to fifteen years in prison, and in 1933 he was exchanged, along with other Lithuanian Communists, for Bishop Teofilis Matulionis and priests released from Soviet labor camps. Almost immediately Sniečkus returned to Lithuania and, under an alias, worked in the Communist underground. In 1938 he became leader of the Communist Party of Lithuania as the first secretary of its Central Committee. In 1940 he was temporarily arrested, but after the entry of the Red Army in June he was named head of the special “security department.” On 7 July 1940 Sniečkus ordered the abolishment of non-Communist parties, and he subsequently supervised the arrests and deportation of the Lithuanian political and intellectual elite. In the spring of 1941 he prepared and organized another deportation of around thirty thousand Lithuanians to Siberia. Among the deported was his sister and other members of the family.

After the German invasion in June 1941 Sniečkus fled far into the Russian interior, but in 1942 he returned to Lithuania as chief of the Soviet guerrillas who fought against the Germans and the Polish Home Army. When the Red Army returned to Lithuania in the summer of 1944, Sniečkus resumed the leadership of the party. He supervised two great waves of deportations of Lithuanians into the Soviet interior, in 1944 and 1949, and the ruthless suppression of the anti-Communist guerrillas.

Sniečkus’s mother, brothers, and sisters, fearing for their lives, fled to the West. When in 1947 he invited his mother to return, she refused, cursing the day she gave birth to the “traitor destroying his own nation.” After the collectivization of agriculture in 1949 and the deportations had ended, Sniečkus implemented a policy of Sovietization of the national culture, and he suppressed the Catholic Church. After Stalin’s death, he accepted a short respite of terror, though in a strictly limited framework. Sniečkus denounced Lavrenty Beria but delayed the popularization of Nikita Khrushchev’s policy of the Twentieth CPSU Congress, and in 1957 he opposed “decentralization tendencies” and began a campaign against the more independent creators of culture, fearing that the Lithuanization of the party apparatus might endanger his position. After Khrushchev’s fall in 1964, Sniečkus continued his policies, but at the end of the 1960s he slowed their course since he noticed that under Leonid Brezhnev the Kremlin favored a stabilization of the party apparatus. Sniečkus’s faithful service to the Kremlin, from Stalin to Brezhnev, and his close ties with Mikhail Suslov, the éminence grise of the Kremlin, allowed him to remain in his post the longest of any of the leaders of the republican parties. The party and government machinery in Lithuania was an efficient mechanism of his personal power. (WR)

SOKOL Ján (9 October 1933, Jacovce, Topoľčany district, Slovakia), Slovak archbishop. After graduating from high school in Topoľčany, Sokol entered the Higher Theological Seminary in Bratislava. In June 1957 he was ordained to the priesthood by Bishop Ambróz Lazík. Sokol served as a priest in the parishes of Šurany (1957–58), Levice (1958–60), and Bratislava (1960–68). From 1968 to 1970 he served as prefect of a seminary in Bratislava. After the suppression of the Prague Spring, when repressive measures against the Catholic Church were reintroduced as part of the so-called normalization, Sokol was dismissed from his position. In the 1970s he held a variety of positions, including that of dean in the town of Sered’, and he was a member of Pacem in terris, a movement of the Catholic clergy established on the initiative of the authorities. When in 1982 the Holy See forbade priests to be members of political organizations, Sokol left this movement. In the 1980s he was not active in the underground church but was regarded as a priest faithful to the Holy See. As a result, before his death, Archbishop Juliuš Gábriš, the metropolitan of Trnava, appointed Sokol as his successor.

On 14 November 1987, in spite of pressure from the authorities, which suggested another candidate, six archdiocesan consultors elected Sokol administrator of the archdiocese, and this election was soon approved by Pope John Paul II. However, the religious affairs authorities in Trnava notified Sokol that they did not recognize his election. After long negotiations between the Czechoslovak government and the Vatican concerning succession in the archdiocese of Trnava, in April 1988 the authorities agreed to accept Sokol's appointment to the position of apostolic administrator of Trnava. Sokol was consecrated bishop on 12 June 1988 in the cathedral in Trnava. On 26 July 1989 he was named archbishop and metropolitan of Trnava and primate of the Slovak province of the Church. He received the pallium, a symbol of the archbishop's authority, from John Paul II on 22 April 1990, at a ceremony in Bratislava, during the Pope's visit to Czechoslovakia. After 1990 Sokol was among those who called for the establishment of an independent Slovak state. On 31 March 1995 John Paul II reorganized Church structures in Slovakia. The Trnava archdiocese was renamed the Bratislava-Trnava archdiocese, with the archbishop's seat in Trnava, and Sokol was named metropolitan of Bratislava-Trnava. The vice-chairman of the Slovak Bishops' Conference from August 2000 on, Sokol took part in negotiations to prepare an agreement between Slovakia and the Holy See. (AGr)

SOLARZ Ignacy, pseudonym "Chrzestny" (28 December 1891, Ołpiny, near Jasło–8? January 1940, Jarosław), Polish Populist leader, pedagogue, and pundit. Solarz came from a peasant family. In 1912 he graduated from high school in Jasło, and he was drafted into the Austro-Hungarian Army the following year. During World War I he fought in the Carpathian Mountains. Wounded in 1916, he was discharged. Between 1916 and 1921 Solarz studied agriculture at the Jagiellonian University in Kraków. He joined the Polish Peasant Party–Piast and became involved in its educational activities. In 1920 he volunteered to fight in the Polish-Soviet war. A year later, Solarz worked as an instructor for the Lesser Polish Agricultural Society and as a lecturer at the Agricultural School in Szaśiadowice. In 1922 he was awarded an agricultural internship in Denmark. Solarz was the founder and director and a lecturer in the Rural Popular University in Szyce, near Kraków (1924–31). In 1924 Solarz became a member of the Central Union of Rural Youth (Centralny Związek Młodzieży Wiejskiej), joining its board in 1925 and serving as its deputy chairman between 1926 and 1928. Also in 1928, Solarz co-founded the Union of Rural Youth of the Polish Republic–Beacon's Fire (Związku Młodzieży Wiejskiej Rzeczypospolitej Polskiej–Wici). In 1939, he was elected to its Main Board. Between 1932 and 1939, Solarz served as the director of and lecturer in the Władysław Orkan Memorial Rural University, which he founded in Gać Przeworska. In addition, he was a village cooperative activist. Among other things, Solarz founded Poland's first health cooperative in Markowa, near Łańcut. An advocate of agrarianism, Solarz published prolifically, mostly in the periodicals Siew, Wici, Młoda Myśl Ludowa, and Zielony Sztandar. In January 1940 Solarz was arrested by the Gestapo and murdered soon after. His place of burial is unknown, but a symbolic grave was built in the forest of Palmiry, near Warsaw. (JS)

SÓLYOM László [originally Schick] (17 December 1908, Muraszombat [now in Slovenia]–19 August 1950, Budapest), Hungarian officer, victim of communism. Sólyom's father was a government official but died early, and Sólyom's mother brought up two sons on her own. Sólyom initially finished a military secondary school, and in 1931 he graduated from the Ludovika Military Academy, Budapest, and served in the army. While a student, he Magyarized his surname to Sólyom. In 1934 he did a one-year training course in France. In 1938 he graduated from the Military Academy of the General Staff in Budapest. After Hungary increased its cooperation with the Third Reich and declared war on the Soviet Union in June 1941, Sólyom left the army because of his Jewish origins. Along with his friend György Pálffy, he worked in a factory. In 1942, together with Pálffy, he became a member of the illegal Hungarian Communist Party (HCP), and in 1943, on the orders of the HCP, he also joined the Independent Smallholders' Party (ISP). After Germany occupied Hungary in March 1944, Sólyom went underground. As a member of the HCP Military Committee and the Hungarian National Insurrection and Liberation Committee, he organized military resistance groups. In November 1944 he was arrested by the leaders of the Arrow Cross Party, but he managed to escape.

At the beginning of 1945 Sólyom was appointed commander of the militia of liberated Budapest. Formally, he was to restore public order and attempt to bring war criminals to justice. In fact, though, the objective was also to take control of the ISP and to strengthen the power of the HCP. As a result of conflicts in connection with the displacement of the German population, Sólyom asked for a transfer to the army. In May 1946 he was promoted to brigadier general and assigned to the Ministry of National Defense. He was later promoted to major general, and in December 1948 he became chief of the General Staff of the Hungarian People's Army. In 1947–50 Sólyom also taught military history at an officers' military academy. Arrested in May 1950, Sólyom was sentenced to death in a rigged trial and executed shortly afterwards. In 1956 he was partially rehabilitated. On 13 October 1956, one week after the solemn reburial of László Rajk and his associates, a ceremonial reburial of Sólyom and four other generals executed along with him took place. (JT)

SOOTS Jaan (12 March 1880, Helme–6 February 1942, Solikamsk, Molotov [now Perm], Russia), Estonian general and politician. In 1900 Soots volunteered to serve in the tsarist army. In 1904 he graduated from a military school in Vilnius, and then he fought in the Russo-Japanese War (1904–5). From 1910 to 1913 he studied at the Nikolayev Military Academy in St. Petersburg. During World War I he served in the Russian general staff and was promoted to lieutenant colonel. In 1917 Soots returned to Estonia, where he organized the staff of the newly established First Estonian Division, becoming its chief in December 1918. During the Estonian war of independence (1918–20) Soots served as chief of the General Staff of the Estonian Army. He also attended the Tartu peace conference that ended the war against the Bolsheviks. After the war, Soots became aligned with the Farmers' Union (FU), led by Konstantin Päts. Elected to parliament on the FU ticket, he served as a member of parliament for its first four terms. From 1921 to 1927, except for a brief interval in 1924, Soots held the post of minister of war. He protected the interests of the army, paying particular attention to land allocations for military men and war veterans. Under his ministry, the first academic military school in the Baltic states was established in 1921. Soots was one of the supporters of a military convention with Poland. He believed that close relations between Poland and Estonia would safeguard the independence of Estonia against Soviet aggression. However, Soots's personnel policy aroused controversy. As a prewar tsarist officer, he appreciated people with a professional military background; therefore, he mostly hired graduates of military schools, as well as former tsarist officers who came to Estonia only after 1920 and who had not fought in the Estonian war of independence. Some of the officers he employed had served in the White armies or even in the Red Army in 1917–20. Soots's policies sparked protests among war veterans who had fought for independence but were not commissioned officers. As a result, the popularity of the Estonian League of War of Independence Veterans (Eesti Vabadussojalaste Liit [EVL]) greatly increased in the first half of the 1920s.

In 1933 Soots was appointed to a parliamentary constitutional commission as an FU representative. After the coup d'état staged by Päts (12 March 1934), Soots was proposed as a candidate for the position of speaker of the new parliament, but his candidacy was rejected. Although he was a supporter of Päts and Johan Laidoner, after the coup Soots's political position weakened. From 1934 to 1939 he was a member of the Tartu City Council, serving as its chairman from 1938 to 1939. He was also a member of the Estonian Union of Entrepreneurs, a member of the Union for the Defense of the Republic (Riigikaitse Nõukogu), and the chairman of the Historical Committee of the Estonian War of Independence. After the Red Army occupied Estonia, Soots was arrested on 20 September 1940 and deported to a forced labor camp in Molotov Province, where he perished. (AG)

SOROS George (György) (12 August 1930, Budapest, Hungary), American financier, Hungarian of Jewish descent. Soros is the son of Tivadar Soros (Theodor Schwarz), a well-known attorney and Esperantist. After Nazi troops occupied Hungary (March 1944), Soros, along with his family, went into hiding in Budapest until Soviet troops entered Hungary in February 1945. He realized that the Sovietization of Hungary was inevitable and emigrated to Great Britain in 1947. In 1952 he graduated from the London School of Economics. In 1956 he moved to the United States. He initially worked as a broker and analyst at a stock exchange firm, and in 1969 he founded the Quantum Fund N.V., considered for years to be one of the most effective investment funds in the world. It became part of the Quantum Group of Funds, managed by Soros Fund Management, owned by Soros. In 1994 Soros also established Global Power Investments. Using mathematical analyses, he speculated on the stock market and earned billions of dollars. In 1983 he founded the Soros Foundation, which started operating in Hungary one year later. Its activities (such as the awarding of scholarships to young and gifted Hungarians to study at the best West European and American universities and the financing of publications) contributed to the peaceful transformation of the political system in Hungary after 1989.

After 1983 Soros's foundations were established in many other countries. At the end of the twentieth century they operated in more than twenty-five countries (in Central and Eastern Europe, South Africa, and Haiti). Dedicated to the modernization of education, culture, and the economy, they supported the building of infrastructures and institutions of an "open society." In establishing them, Soros was motivated by his experiences during the Holocaust and the Communist regime. By 2010 Soros intends to withdraw his foundations from the Central European countries which by then will have become members of the European Union, as he believes that the mission of these foundations will then be over. In 1990 Soros also founded the Central European University, based in Budapest and Warsaw, offering studies in the fields of history, economics, political science, art history, and the social sciences. Soros's publications include Alchemy of Finance (1987), Opening the Soviet System (1990), Underwriting Democracy (1991), The Crisis of Global Capitalism (1998), George Soros on Globalization (2002), and The Age of Fallibility (2006). Soros has been awarded honorary doctorates from the New School for Social Research in New York (1980), and in 1991 from Oxford University, Yale University, and the School of Economics in Budapest. He has also received many other honors, including the Laurea Honoris Causa from the University of Bologna (1995) and the Hannah Arendt Prize (1999). (JT)

SOSABOWSKI Stanisław (8 May 1892, Stanisławów [Ivano-Frankivsk]–25 September 1967, London), Polish general. Sosabowski studied at the Trade Academy in Kraków. Starting in 1909, he joined various pro-independence organizations and organized the scouting movement. Between 1911 and 1914, he belonged to the Union of Active Struggle (Związek Walki Czynnej) and the Polish Riflemen's Association (Polskie Drużyny Strzeleckie). Drafted into the Austro-Hungarian Army, following the outbreak of World War I, Sosabowski fought on the eastern front. He was active in the clandestine Polish Military Organization (Polska Organizacja Wojskowa). In November 1918, he joined the Polish Army. In 1923 he graduated from the Higher Military Academy in Warsaw. Until May 1927, he worked at the Fourth Department of the General Staff. Later he was appointed to a succession of leadership positions. From 1929 to 1937, Sosabowski held a chair at the Higher Military Academy. He published on education and character formation in the army. In 1937, he was appointed the regimental infantry commander of the Polish Legions and in 1939 of the Children of Warsaw infantry regiment, which he led in the defense of the Polish capital in September 1939. Sosabowski escaped captivity and joined the underground Service for the Victory of Poland. He was the first military emissary sent out to General Władysław Sikorski in Paris. In 1940 Sosabowski was appointed to lead the Polish First and then Fourth Division in France.

After the fall of France and the evacuation of the Polish units to Great Britain, on 23 September 1941, Sosabowski became the organizer and commander of the First Independent Parachute Brigade, the first paratrooper unit of the Polish Army. In June 1944, he was promoted to brigadier general. The British high command took over the brigade and sent it to participate in the invasion on the western front. In September 1944 the brigade participated in a failed Allied air assault near Arnhem and Driel in Holland (the so-called Operation Market-Garden), and in October 1944 it covered the Allied retreat near the Mosse River. In December 1944, for criticizing the Allied leadership, Sosabowski was recalled as the commander of the brigade. Until 1948, he served as the inspector of stage and guard units in the Polish Corps for Training and Placement, which was formed by the British to accommodate former soldiers of the Polish Armed Forces in the West. Following his discharge, Sosabowski worked as a blue-collar laborer at a factory in London. In 1946, the Communists stripped him of his Polish citizenship. Sosabowski authored, among other works, Wychowanie żołnierza obywatela (The upbringing of a citizen-soldier; 1931); Najkrótszą drogą (The closest route; 1957); and Droga wiodła ugorem (The road led through fallow land; 1967). Sosabowski's ashes were interred in Powązki Cemetery in Warsaw. (JS)

SOSIURA Volodymyr (6 January 1898, Debaltsevo, near Yekaterinoslav—8 January 1965, Kiev), Ukrainian poet. Born into a working-class family, Sosiura began working at a very young age; among other things, he was a miner in the Donbas. In 1918 he took part in an uprising against the Germans, and then he fought in the army of the Ukrainian National Republic (UNR). In 1920 he became a supporter of the Bolsheviks and joined the All-Russian Communist Party (Bolsheviks). He studied at a university (1922–23) and at the Institute of Public Education (1923–25) in Kharkov (Kharkiv). Sosiura made his literary debut in 1921, and his collection Chervona zyma (Red winter; 1922) was accepted as a model of revolutionary poetry. His poem about the Paris Commune, “1871 rik” (Eighteen seventy-one; 1923), as well as the collections Misto (City; 1924) and Snihy (Snows; 1925), were dominated by motifs of the revolution. In the 1920s Sosiura was a member of the literary groups Pluh and Hart and the Free Academy of Proletarian Literature (Vilna Akademiya Proletarskoy Literatury [VAPLITE]). He became one of the leading figures of the Ukrainian cultural revival. However, in his writing, he did not strictly follow the orders of the Soviet authorities. He became famous not only for his talent in rendering the atmosphere of war, the pathos of the revolution, and the building of a new political system, but also for the subtlety of his love poems and the lyricism of his descriptions of nature. There was also despair, sadness, and loneliness in his poems—for example, in the collections Zoloti shuliky (Golden hawks; 1927) and Koly zatsvitut akatsii (When acacias bloom; 1928). The situation of the Ukrainian intelligentsia of that period, torn between Communist and nationalist ideas, was depicted in the poem “Dva Volodky” (Two Volodkos; 1930) and in the collection Sertse (Heart; 1931), which were banned by the authorities shortly after their publication.

Stalinist persecutions and the Great Famine in the Ukraine in the 1930s brought Sosiura to the verge of a nervous breakdown. However, his writing did not change. He remained the only author of lyrical love poetry in the Ukrainian SSR. He published Chervoni troiandy (Red roses; 1932); Liubliu (1939; I love; 1939); and Zhuravli pryletily (The cranes have returned; 1940). In 1940 he also published the autobiographical poem “Chervonohvardiyets” (Red Guard). From 1942 to 1944 Sosiura was a war correspondent and published the collections Pid hul kryvavyi (In bloody tumult; 1942) and V hodyny hnivu (In the hour of anger; 1944). In 1948 he received a Stalin

Prize, and in 1949 he published the collection Zelenyi svit (Green world). In 1951 Sosiura was sharply attacked for “nationalist deviation,” allegedly expressed in the poem “Liubit Ukrainu” (Love your Ukraine; 1944), and from then on he was in disgrace until Stalin’s death. In the last years of his life Sosiura published, among other works, the collections Soloviyni dali (Nightingale distances; 1957); Tak nikhto ne kokhav (No one has ever loved so; 1960); and Osinni melodii (Autumn melodies; 1964). Sosiura’s collected works were published in the Soviet Union in 1929–30 (3 vols.), 1957–58 (3 vols.), and 1970–72 (10 vols.). (TS)

SOSNKOWSKI Kazimierz (19 November 1885, Warsaw—11 October 1969, Arundel, Canada), Polish general and politician. Sosnkowski came from an intelligentsia family. Upon graduation from a Petersburg high school, he studied at the Warsaw Polytechnic and then, from 1907, at the Lwów (Lviv) Polytechnic. He joined the Polish Socialist Party (Polska Partia Socjalistyczna [PPS]) in 1905. Later he enrolled in its Fighting Organization (Organizacja Bojowa) and served as its Warsaw District and then its Dąbrowa Basin commander. In 1908, Sosnkowski was a co-founder of the Union for Active Struggle and (in 1910) of the Riflemen’s Association, for which he was appointed deputy commander and chief of staff under Józef Piłsudski. As the closest collaborator of Piłsudski, Sosnkowski was assigned to be the deputy commander and chief of staff of the First Brigade of the Polish Legions. Promoted to colonel, Sosnkowski took over the brigade’s command in August 1916, only to be relieved of it by the Austrians in September. In April 1917, he became the deputy chief of the Military Department of the Provisional State Council, which was created under the German occupation of the Kingdom of Poland. In July 1917, Sosnkowski joined Piłsudski in refusing to swear the oath of allegiance to the emperors of Germany and Austria-Hungary and was therefore imprisoned with him in Gdańsk and Magdeburg.

Upon his return to Warsaw on 10 November 1918, Sosnkowski assumed the command of the Polish Army, which was then forming in the Warsaw region. In March 1919, he was appointed deputy minister for military affairs, and in June he was promoted to general of division. In May 1920, he commanded the Reserve Army. In August he became minister for military affairs, a post he held until May 1923 and then again, in the cabinet of Władysław Grabski, from December 1923 through February 1924. In April 1925, Sosnkowski commanded the army Corps District VII Poznań. On 13 May 1926, reacting to the coup d'état of Marshal Piłsudski, Sosnkowski unsuccessfully attempted to commit suicide. This prompted the marshal to exclude him from his most intimate circle. Following five months of hospital recuperation, Sosnkowski returned to active service as the inspector of the army. In November 1936, he was promoted to general of the army.

During the September campaign of 1939, Sosnkowski commanded the southern front. At the beginning of October he broke through to Hungary and later to France. On 12 October 1939, President Władysław Raczkiewicz nominated Sosnkowski as his successor and as minister of state. In General Władysław Sikorski's government Sosnkowski was minister without portfolio; chairman of the Committee of the Council of Ministers for the Homeland; chairman of the Political Committee of the Council of Ministers; and commander-in-chief of the Union of Armed Struggle (Związek Walki Zbrojnej [ZWZ]), the principal underground organization in occupied Poland. In the summer of 1940, Sosnkowski resigned as head of the ZWZ, and in July 1941 he quit all his posts, save that of successor to the president, to protest the conditions of a Polish-Soviet agreement (the Sikorski-Mayski Agreement). Following the death of Sikorski, Sosnkowski assumed the post of supreme commander of the Polish Armed Forces on 8 July 1943. Since he firmly opposed concessions to Stalin, the Soviets pressured the British government to have him removed. Sosnkowski believed that following the entry of the Red Army into Poland, the scenario of the 1939–41 Soviet occupation would repeat itself: Poland would be subjugated to the Communists. Therefore, he argued that a compromise with Stalin would only expedite the Sovietization of the Polish nation. Because he openly criticized the conduct of Great Britain toward the Warsaw Uprising, at the insistence of the British, he was dismissed as the supreme commander and successor to the president.

In November 1944, Sosnkowski left for Canada, where he lived in Arundel, near Montreal. After World War II, he became one of the leading political authorities of the Polish émigré community. U.S. President Dwight Eisenhower received Sosnkowski at the end of 1952 and reaffirmed his support for the liberation of Poland from the Soviet yoke. However, the presidential declaration remained an empty promise. Shortly after, at the invitation of the exiled Polish president, August Zaleski, Sosnkowski visited London, where he attempted to unite the émigré community. On 14 March 1954, his persistence led to the signing of the Unification Act, but when Sosnkowski appeared before President Zaleski to be appointed his successor, the latter prevaricated and refused to consider the matter until the lapse of his next term. Disappointed, Sosnkowski returned to Canada and withdrew from active politics. (WR)

SOUKUP František (22 August 1871, Kamenná Lhota, near Kutná Hora–11 November 1940, Prague), Czech journalist and Social Democratic politician. Soukup became interested in politics in his last year of high school in Kolín, joining a progressive student movement. After graduating from high school in 1890, he began to study law at the Czech University in Prague. He continued with political activities in the youth movement Omladina; as a result, he was expelled from the university in 1892. He continued to study law at the German university in Prague and in Graz. In 1896, after a split in the Czech Progressive Party, Soukup became a member of the Czechoslovak Social Democratic Workers' Party (Československá Sociálně Demokratická Strana Dělnická). One year later he co-founded the periodical Právo lidu and became its commentator on the sessions of the parliament in Vienna. Soukup advocated universal suffrage and was active among the Socialist youth. He maintained extensive contacts with Social Democrats abroad. From 1904 to 1938 he was a Czech representative in the Second International. After universal suffrage was instituted in 1907, Soukup served as an MP in the parliament in Vienna until 1911 and then from 1913 to 1918.

During World War I, Soukup worked with the national independence movement. He belonged to a group that established a Czech secret committee, later called the Mafia. Imprisoned for two months in 1915, Soukup was kept under surveillance after his release, and it was not until September 1917 that he resumed contacts with the Mafia. Under his influence, the Czech Social Democrats took an anti-Habsburg stance. A member of the Czechoslovak National Committee from July 1918, Soukup was active as its secretary and authored most of its statements. On 28 October 1918 Soukup was one of five politicians who proclaimed Czechoslovakia's independence, the so-called statesmen of 28 October (muži 28. října). Two weeks later he became a deputy to the Provisional National Assembly and the first minister of justice. He held this position until July 1919, and in 1920 he was elected a senator. He served as deputy speaker (1920–29) and speaker (1929–39) of the upper chamber of the Czechoslovak parliament. He was also active in the international arena, and in 1931 he became a member of the leadership of the Socialist International. Soukup was deeply shocked by the Pact of Munich. He wrote a sharp protest to the International; then, on his initiative, the Czechoslovak Democratic Party left this organization. On 31 December 1938 the last edition of Právo lidu that Soukup edited was published. In 1939 Soukup was twice arrested and detained by the Gestapo. His publications include the vast work 28 říjen 1918 (28 October 1918; 1928); T. G. Masaryk (1930); and Revoluce práce (Revolution of labor; 1938). (PU)

SPAHIU Bedri (1906, Gjirokastër, Albania–1999, Tirana), Albanian Communist activist. Born into a Bektashi family, Spahiu finished high school in Shkodër and graduated from an artillery school in Tirana. He was expelled from the army for being a member of a subversive group, and from 1932 to 1935 he was imprisoned. After his release, he worked as a representative of a commercial company in Gjirokastër. After the Italian invasion of Albania in 1939, Spahiu joined the Albanian Fascist Party and was a member until 1940. He then helped to found the Communist Party of Albania (CPA) and was one of its top leaders from its foundation. During the war Spahiu organized the structures of the CPA in the south of the country. In July 1943 he became a member of the General Staff of the Communist National Liberation Army. In 1944 he was head of an Albanian delegation that was sent to Bari to request Allied help. After the war, Spahiu was a prosecutor in the biggest show trials, including that of Koçi Xoxe. A member of parliament for the Gjirokastër district, Spahiu became a member of the presidium of the parliament in 1948, and from 1953 to 1956 he was deputy speaker of the parliament. He headed the Ministry of Reconstruction (October 1944–March 1946) and the Ministry of Education (April 1952–July 1954) and served as one of the deputy prime ministers (April 1952–August 1953). He also held the post of chairman of the Soviet-Albanian Friendship Society.

Expelled from the Politburo of the Albanian Labor Party in June 1955, Spahiu worked at a company in Elbasan for almost two years. In 1956 he was interned in Kanine, near Vlorë. Spahiu's fall was caused by a conflict with Enver Hoxha over state control of special services and his positive attitude toward a reestablishment of relations with Yugoslavia during the thaw between Moscow and Belgrade. Initially Spahiu was sentenced to ten years in prison, and then his sentence was extended. Fearing for his life, he regularly sent letters to the state authorities demanding that he be given a private cell. In 1971 he was one of the first prisoners of the new Benca Penitentiary, near Tepelenë. Spahiu was released toward the end of 1990. In 1991 in the periodical Republika, he critically reviewed his past in the article “Bedri Spahiu revizionon Bedri Spahiu” (Bedri Spahiu critically reviews Bedri Spahiu). One year later Spahiu was accused in the press of the massacre of a National Front (Balli Kombëtar) unit in Gerhot in September 1943 and of maintaining contacts with Italian officers during the struggle against the non-Communist resistance movement. SPAHO Mehmed (13 March 1883, Sarajevo–29 June 1939, Belgrade), Muslim politician from Bosnia and Herzegovina. Spaho finished primary and secondary school in Sarajevo and then studied in Vienna. With a doctorate in law, he began working in a law office in Sarajevo (1908). He subsequently served as secretary of the Chamber of Commerce and Crafts of Bosnia and Herzegovina until 1918. Before World War I Spaho joined the Independent Muslim Party (Muslimanska Samostalna Stranka). In 1921 he became chairman of the Yugoslav Muslim Organization (Jugoslavenska Muslimanska Organizacija), which had been founded in 1919. Spaho became an indisputable leader of the Muslims in the Kingdom of Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes (SHS). Like Slovene politicians, he generally favored a federal model of the state, but for tactical reasons, he often formed coalitions with centralist Serbian parties. From December 1918 to February 1919 Spaho was minister of forestry and mining; from March to December 1922 he was minister of trade and industry; from July to September 1925 he was minister of finance; and from April 1927 to January 1929 he was again minister of trade and industry. After King Alexander I Karadjordjević established a royal dictatorship in 1929, Spaho joined the opposition to the Serbian government. In November 1932 he supported the so-called Zagreb Manifesto announced by Vladko Maček, in which absolutism, centralism, and unitarism were condemned. As a result, Spaho was briefly detained.

In the summer of 1936 Spaho joined the Yugoslav

Radical Union Party (Jugoslovenska Radikalna Zajednica), a new political party founded by Prime Minister Milan Stojadinović that won a substantial majority in the Skupština (parliament). Spaho entered the government of Stojadinović. He also remained in the cabinet of Dragiša Cvetković (from February 1939), but shortly after this cabinet was constituted, Spaho died suddenly in unexplained circumstances. Spaho had contributed to the success of negotiations that led to the signing of the Sporazum (Agreement) between the Serbs and the Croats after his death, in August 1939. The aim of Spaho's political efforts was to maintain an integral and autonomous Bosnia and Herzegovina within Yugoslavia that would not become dependent on the Serbs or the Croats. Spaho authored a monograph on Gazi Husrev Bey. He also published extensively in the periodicals Behar, Novi Behar, Pravda, and Nova Evropa. (AO)

SPEKKE Arnolds (14 June 1887, Vecmuižas, Courland—27 July 1972, Washington, D.C.), Latvian diplomat and historian. In 1906–7 Spekke studied mechanics at the Riga Polytechnic and from 1908 Romance philology at Moscow University. He graduated from the latter in 1915 and then taught German and ancient languages in several high schools and at the Institute of Archaeology in Moscow. In 1918 he returned to Latvia. He worked as a teacher and schoolmaster, and from 1919 to 1933 he lectured in Romance philology at the University of Riga. From 1922 Spekke was a professor; in 1925–27 he was dean of the Department of Philology and Philosophy; and from 1927 to 1929 he was deputy rector of this university. In 1930 he received a Ph.D. in philology. From October 1933 Spekke was Latvian ambassador to Italy and later to Greece, Bulgaria, and Albania, while residing in Italy. After the Soviet invasion of Latvia and the incorporation of the country into the USSR, in August 1940 Spekke was dismissed. He stayed in Milan and later in Rome, where he worked as a teacher and translator. In 1944–45 Spekke worked with the Polish periodical Orzeł Biały. From April 1954 he was Latvian chargé d'affaires and general consul in the United States. After the death of Kārlis Zariņš, in May 1963 Spekke took over the entire Latvian diplomatic service in exile. In October 1970 he retired. Spekke received many honors, including the Polish order of Polonia Restituta, and he authored many important works on the history of Latvia, including the following: History of Latvia: An Outline (1951); Some Problems of Baltic-Slavic Relations in Prehistoric and Early Historic Times (1962); and Balts and Slavs in Their Early Relations (1965), as well as the memoirs *Mani studiju gadi Maskavā. ŠPIDLA Vladimír (22 April 1951, Prague), Czech politician. In 1976 Špidla graduated in history and archaeology from the School of Arts of Charles University in Prague. He subsequently worked in Jindřichův Hradec, taking up a variety of jobs, both white collar (such as archaeologist) and blue collar (such as dairy worker). In 1990 he became a clerk at a district office in Jindřichův Hradec, and from 1991 to 1996 he was director of the local job center there. In 1990 in South Bohemia, Špidla was one of the initiators of the revival of Czechoslovak Social Democracy (Československá Sociální Demokracie; later renamed the Czech Social Democratic Party: Česká Strana Sociálně Demokratická [ČSSD]), and he became chairman of the local party committee. In 1992 he joined the ČSSD leadership and soon became a trusted associate of Miloš Zeman. In June 1996 Špidla became a member of parliament and chairman of the parliamentary committee for social policy and health care. In 1997 he became vice-chairman of the ČSSD. After early elections in June 1998 and the victory of the Social Democrats, Špidla became first deputy prime minister and minister of labor and social affairs in Zeman's government. After Zeman announced his plans to retire from politics following the next elections and decided not to seek reelection as party leader, Špidla was elected chairman of the ČSSD at a party congress in April 2001. He then announced that the line of the party would be shifted to the left. After the elections of June 2002, which again brought victory to the Social Democrats, Špidla became head of a government formed in coalition with the Freedom Union—Democratic Union (Unie Svobody—Demokratická Unie [US—DEU]) and the Christian Democratic Union—Czechoslovak People's Party (Křesťanská a Demokratická Unie—Československá Strana Lidová [KDU—ČSL]). He served as prime minister of the Czech Republic from 15 July 2002 to 1 July 2004. In the fall of 2002 Špidla came into sharp conflict with Zeman, who played a peculiar game around the presidential elections. This led to a deep conflict within the ČSSD and the electoral defeat of all the Social Democratic candidates. In June 2003 Špidla led his country to a referendum in which the Czech people voted for accession to the European Union. (PU)

ŠPILJAK Mika (28 November 1916, Odra, near Sisak, Croatia), Croatian Communist activist. After finishing primary school, Špiljak worked as a shoemaker and was active in the trade union movement. In 1935 he became a member of the League of Yugoslav Communist Youth, and in 1938, a member of the Communist Party of Yugoslavia (CPY) in Croatia. In June 1941 he joined the Partisans led by Josip Broz Tito. During World War II Špiljak was promoted to secretary of the district committee of the Communist Party of Croatia (CPC). He became a member of the Central Committee (CC) of the CPC in February 1944. From 1945 onwards he served as secretary of the Zagreb City Committee of the party. From 1948 to 1950 Špiljak was chairman of the Zagreb City Council, and in 1951 he became a member of the Politburo of the CC of the League of Communists of Croatia (LCC). He was head of the government of the Croatian republic (1963–67), prime minister of the federal government of Yugoslavia (16 May 1967–18 May 1969), and chairman of the federal trade union board (1969–78). Špiljak was an unswerving follower of Tito's political line. After the death of Tito, as part of the rotating leadership of the state, Špiljak served as chairman of the state presidency from 15 May 1983 to 15 May 1984. In his capacity as formal head of state, in February 1984 he made a visit to the United States, where he was received by President Ronald Reagan, who appreciated Yugoslavia's neutral policy during a new stage of the Cold War. In February of that year Špiljak opened the Olympic Winter Games in Sarajevo. From May 1984 to May 1986 he served as chairman of the LCC. Špiljak was forced to resign as result of his conflict with Stipe Šuvar. (JD/WR)

SPIRU Nako (4 January 1918, Durrës–20 November 1947, Tirana), Albanian Communist activist. The son of a Durrës tobacco factory owner, after finishing a school of commerce in Corfu, Spiru studied political economy at Turin University. Along with Enver Hoxha (among others), he belonged to a Communist group called Puna (Work) in

Korçë and helped to found the Communist Party of Albania (CPA) in November 1941. Spiru was an organizational secretary of a youth group within the CPA, and, after the death of Qemal Stafa, he became the leader of this group. Spiru wrote popular articles for the underground press. Initially he was regarded as the right-hand man of Hoxha, who noticed Spiru's brilliance and organizational talent, as well as his penchant for scheming. In November 1944 at a plenum of the CPA Central Committee (CC) in Berat, Spiru changed tactics. Backed by Yugoslavia, Spiru (together with Sejfulla Malëshova and Koçi Xoxe) attacked Hoxha, forcing him to make a self-criticism. In 1945 Spiru married Liri Belishova, a high-ranking party activist. From 1946 to 1947 Spiru held the ministry of the economy and headed the State Committee for Economic Planning. He was regarded as being in favor of cooperation with the Soviet Union. In 1945–46 Spiru made visits to Moscow in various capacities, including that of representative of the executive of the Albanian-Soviet Friendship Society. Spiru was against the pro-Yugoslav faction led by Xoxe and rejected Belgrade's proposals that Albanian industrial plants be closed down and Albania be treated as a raw material base. Spiru invited Soviet advisers, trying to organize assistance for Albania. As political strife within the party grew, Spiru began to be accused of collaboration with the occupier because during the Italian occupation his family allegedly had befriended a major in the Italian Army and invited him to their home. Attacked by Xoxe for his anti-Yugoslav stance and deprived of Hoxha's support, Spiru allegedly committed suicide. Belishova maintained that Spiru was murdered on Hoxha's orders. (TC)

SPRINGOVICS Antonijs (31 October 1876, Rezekne–1 October 1958, Riga), archbishop of Riga, primate of Latvia. In 1893 Springovics graduated from a municipal school in Rēzekne and in 1897 from a theological seminary in St. Petersburg. He worked as a priest in parishes and schools near Orel and Pinsk and from 1905 in Liksne in Latvia. In 1917 Springovics was appointed general curate to Edward Ropp, the archbishop of Mogilev (now Mahilyow). After the visit of papal nuncio Achille Ratti (later Pius XI) to Riga, Springovics was appointed bishop of Riga and was ordained on 22 March 1920. At the same time he became the primate of independent Latvia. After signing a concordat with Latvia in 1922, Pius XI raised Riga to the rank of archbishopric, and Springovics was appointed archbishop on 25 October 1923. Springovics advocated moderation in the Latvianization of the Catholic Church in Latvia and opposed the removal of Polish priests. In 1934 in order to negotiate a modus vivendi with the new government, which favored the Protestants, Springovics met with Kārlis Ulmanis, who had assumed dictatorial powers in Latvia. The government did not always comply with established rules, but the Latvian Church emerged unscathed from a confrontation with the Peasant-Nationalist regime of Ulmanis. During World War II Springovics avoided Soviet and German deportation. In 1947 the Communist authorities arrested his auxiliary bishop, Kazimirs Dulbinskis. Springovics was allowed to stay, but he was given very little freedom to continue his pastoral activities. (WR/EJ)

SPYCHALSKI Marian (6 December 1906, Łódź–7 June 1980, Warsaw), Polish Communist activist. Spychalski was adopted into a working-class family. In 1931 he graduated from the Warsaw Polytechnic and joined the Communist Party of Poland. In 1935 he was appointed supervisor in the department of urban development with the city administration in Warsaw. In 1937 he took the Grand Prix in an urban development competition in Paris. During World War II Spychalski was in the underground, joining the Polish Workers' Party (Polska Partia Robotnicza [PPR]) in 1942. He was a co-founder and, between January and August 1942, chief of staff of the People's Guard. He worked closely with Władysław Gomułka. In December 1943 Spychalski became a member of the Home National Council (Krajowa Rada Narodowa [KRN]). In early 1944, he was appointed chief of the information department of the General Staff of the People's Army (Armia Ludowa [AL]). Between March and June 1944, as a member of the KRN delegation, Spychalski traveled to Moscow. Upon his return, he served for a few months as chief of the Supreme Staff of the Polish (Communist) Army. From September 1944 through March 1945, he worked as the mayor of Warsaw and chairman of its National Council. Between 1944 and 1948, Spychalski was a member of the PPR Central Committee (CC); in May 1945 he was elevated to its Politburo; and in December 1948 he automatically entered the CC and the Politburo of the Polish United Workers' Party (Polska Zjednoczona Partia Robotnicza [PUWP]). From March through April 1949, Spychalski served as deputy minister of national defense and deputy commander-in-chief for political-educational affairs of the (Communist) Polish Army. In 1945, he was promoted to brigadier general. In 1947, he became an MP. In June 1948, during a CC plenum, he was psychologically coerced to criticize Gomułka. In April 1949 he was appointed minister for reconstruction and later for construction. In November 1949 Spychalski was dismissed from all of his official posts; afterwards, he worked as an architect in Wrocław. Arrested in May 1950 (despite his parliamentary immunity, which was not officially revoked until 1951) and charged with assisting the infiltration of the army by counterrevolutionary agents, Spychalski was imprisoned and tortured until his release in March 1956.

Rehabilitated in July 1956, Spychalski returned to the post of deputy minister of national defense and became chief of the Main Political Board of the Polish Army in October 1956. During the Eighth Plenum of the party, he was restored as a member, and during the third congress of the PUWP in March 1959, he was again coopted to the Politburo. Between November 1956 and April 1968, Spychalski served as minister of national defense. He restored to the military many commanders formerly associated with the underground AL. From 1957 to 1972, Spychalski was an MP again. In 1963, he was promoted to the rank of marshal of Poland. He displayed a passive attitude toward the anti-Semitic purge in the military at the beginning of the 1960s, notwithstanding that it undermined his own position in the army. At the end of Gomułka's reign, Spychalski was attacked by the so-called partisan group of Mieczysław Moczar. Following the March 1968 events, he was dismissed from the Ministry of National Defense, and in April 1968 he was appointed chairman of the Council of State and of the All-Polish Committee of the Front of National Unity. Spychalski actively participated in the December 1970 events; he was involved on the anti-crisis staff. Spychalski's political career ended with the fall of Gomułka. At the end of 1970 and the beginning of 1971, he was relieved of all his posts. (PK)

ŠRAMEK Jan (12 August 1870, Grygov, near Olomouc–22 April 1956, Prague), Czech Catholic priest and Christian Democratic leader. In 1892 Šramek graduated from a theological seminary in Olomouc and was ordained a priest. From 1902 he lectured on theology at a seminary in Brno. In 1924 he received a Ph.D. in philosophy. He was elected an MP in 1906, and in 1913 he became head of the National Council (Zemski Vybor) in Moravia. After the creation of Czechoslovakia, between September 1921 and October 1922 Šrámek was minister of railways in the government of Edvard Beneš. In 1922 he was elected president of the unified Czechoslovak People's Party (Československá Strana Lidová [ČSL]), whose program was based upon the principles of the encyclical Rerum Novarum of Pope Leo XIII. Šrámek was one of the organizers of the Czech Catholic trade unions. Although initially he had a good relationship with Reverend Andrej Hlinka, the leader of the Slovak Catholics, from the early 1920s there was a growing conflict between them: Šrámek supported the administrative autonomy of Slovakia within the framework of a unitary state, while Hlinka sought constitutional equality for both parts of the state. In October 1922 Šrámek became minister of health in the government of Antonín Švehla, and later he headed the departments of post and social welfare in this cabinet. In 1926 he became deputy prime minister, and when in February 1929 Švehla resigned after a heart attack, Šrámek temporarily took over the duties of head of government. In the elections of October 1929 the ČSL lost many votes; therefore Šrámek left the government. In 1930 he published Životní data, dokumenty, vzpomínky, úvahy (Biography, documents, memoirs, thoughts).

During the Munich crisis of 1938 Šrámek counted on Soviet support and opposed capitulation. After the Munich agreement was signed, he went to France and then to England, where in December 1939 he co-founded the Czechoslovak National Committee. Since he proved to be an efficient mediator between the supporters of Beneš and the adherents of Milan Hodža, Šrámek soon became head of the committee. He transformed this body into a provisional government-in-exile that on 21 July 1940 was recognized by Great Britain. As prime minister, Šrámek supported plans to create a Polish-Czechoslovak federation; these plans were crowned with a preliminary agreement with the Polish government of Władysław Sikorski. Later, however, Šrámek favored the policy of President Beneš, who, on 12 December 1943, signed a treaty of friendship and mutual assistance with the USSR and subsequently an agreement with the Czechoslovak Communists. These treaties formed the basis of the coalition government of Zdeněk Fierlinger, established in March 1945. The ČSL joined this government.

After his return to Czechoslovakia, Šrámek became deputy prime minister in both governments of Fierlinger (April 1945–July 1946). He protested the ceding of the Subcarpathian Ukraine to the USSR. In the elections of May 1946 Šrámek obtained a parliamentary seat, although his party had lost its former influence, even in the Moravian countryside, where it had been the strongest party. Šrámek remained in the government of Klement Gottwald as deputy prime minister, but because of old age and illness, he was less and less active. Although at the time of the crisis in January–February 1948 Šrámek acted cautiously and in a conciliatory way, believing that too harsh a reaction to the Communist actions might only cause the situation to deteriorate, on 20 February, along with other non-Communist ministers, he resigned in protest against the corrupt practices of the Communists in the Ministry of Interior and against the growing terror. This gave Gottwald a chance to illegally replace the vacancies with Communist ministers and to seize full power. Fearing arrest, Šrámek attempted to leave the country but was arrested and imprisoned by the police. He spent the rest of his life in prison and under house arrest in a monastery, where he died. ŠROBÁR Vavro (9 August 1867, Lisková, Slovakia–6 December 1950, Olomouc), Slovak politician, journalist, and doctor. Born into a Catholic peasant family, in 1886 Šrobár was expelled from a Hungarian high school in Banská Bystrica for spreading “Pan-Slavic propaganda.” He graduated from high school in Přerov, Moravia. From 1888 to 1898 he studied medicine in Prague, where he became a leading activist of the Slovak academic youth and maintained contacts with Tomáš Garrigue Masaryk. After returning to Slovakia, Šrobár worked as a doctor in Ružomberok. He was one of the ideologues of the young Slovak intelligentsia centered around the liberal monthly Hlas. He strongly criticized the conservative center (the so-called Martin center) of the national movement, led by Svetozár Hurban-Vajanský. Šrobár himself remained under the influence of positivist ideas, Pan-Slavism, evolutionism, and Darwinism. In the spirit of Masaryk, he encouraged education among peasants and the upgrading of the economic standards of the country. He called for the democratization of political and cultural life, advocated close cooperation with the Czechs, and promoted the idea of a “single Czechoslovak nation.” Because of his activities, Šrobár was imprisoned in Ružomberok (1906) and Szeged (1907–8).

During World War I Šrobár worked with Czech activists. He drafted a resolution in which the participants in the 1918 May Day gathering in Liptovský Sv. Mikuláš demanded the right to self-determination for the nations of Austria-Hungary. It was the first such Slovak document, and émigré politicians could use it for propaganda in the international forum. In October 1918 Šrobár joined the leadership of the Czechoslovak National Committee in Prague. After the establishment of the Czechoslovak state (28 October 1918), he ardently implemented the policy of centralization. From 4 to 14 November 1918 Šrobár served as prime minister of the Slovak provisional government. He subsequently became minister plenipotentiary for the administration of Slovakia. He organized the Czechoslovak administration, which consolidated its power after the invasion by the Hungarian Red Army was repulsed and the ephemeral Slovak Soviet Republic was abolished in mid-1919. Šrobár resorted to dictatorial methods of governing, as a result of which he was criticized not only by the members of the Slovak People's Party (led by Father Andrej Hlinka), but also by the Social Democrats, including Ivan Dérer, who replaced Šrobár as minister plenipotentiary in April 1920. In the interwar period Šrobár was one of the leaders of the Agrarian Party in Slovakia. He sat in the parliament from 1918 to 1935 (from 1925 as a senator). He also lectured at Comenius University Medical School in Bratislava, where he was given a professorship in 1935. He sharply opposed Hlinka's party and demands for Slovak autonomy. Šrobár's publications include the memoirs Pamäti z vojny a väzenia (War and prison memoirs; 1922); Oslobodené Slovensko (The liberation of Slovakia; 1928); and Z môjho života (From my life; 1946).

During World War II Šrobár organized an underground group in Slovakia. This group recognized the Czechoslovak government-in-exile led by Edvard Beneš. After the outbreak of the Slovak National Uprising, Šrobár, together with the Communist Karol Šmidke, took the helm of the Slovak National Council (Slovenská Národná Rada [SNR]). He also became honorary chairman of the Democratic Party (Demokratická Strana). As a member of the SNR delegation, in March 1945 Šrobár took part in negotiations in Moscow on the establishment of a new Czechoslovak government, and he assumed the post of minister of finance in this government. Before the elections in 1946 Šrobár helped to found the Party of Freedom (Strana Slobody), which, however, failed to enter parliament. He represented this party in the leadership of the National Front. After the Communist coup in February 1948, Šrobár assumed the portfolio of minister of unification. (MG)

SRŠKIĆ Milan (3 March 1880, Belgrade, Serbia–12 April 1937, Belgrade), Serbian politician from Bosnia. Srškić completed law studies in Vienna, where he also earned a doctorate. He actively worked for the autonomy of religious schools in Bosnia and Herzegovina, contributing to the periodicals Srpske riječi in Sarajevo and Die Zeit in Vienna. In 1910 he was elected to the Sabor (Assembly) of Bosnia and Herzegovina. At the beginning of World War I Srškić was in Russia; from there he returned to his country toward the end of the war. In 1918 he was a member of the Yugoslav Committee (Jugoslovenski Odbor), a member of the provisional executive of Bosnia and Herzegovina, and a deputy to the Constitutional Assembly. He was elected to parliament in 1923, 1925, 1927, and 1931. In 1923 Srškić became minister of forestry and mining in the government of Nikola Pašić. He also headed the ministry of interior (1924 and 1932) and the ministry of justice (1926–27, 1929–31). A member of the Serbian Radical Party and a staunch supporter of the monarchy, Srškić was one of the main executors of the dictatorial policy of King Alexander Karadjordjević in Bosnia and Herzegovina after 1929. From 13 July 1932 to 27 January 1934 Srškić served as prime minister. He left the Serbian Radical Party and was one of the founders of the authoritarian ruling Yugoslav National Party (Jugoslovenska Nacionalna Stranka). (WR)

STAMBOLIĆ Ivan (5 November 1936, Brezova, near Ivanjica–25 August 2000, Novi Sad), Serbian Communist activist. Stambolić was born into a family with Communist traditions. Working in a factory, he also studied law at the University of Belgrade, where he met Slobodan Milošević, who was to become his closest friend and protégé. Stambolić was the best man at the wedding of Milošević and Mira Marković. After completing his studies, Stambolić entered politics, encouraged by his uncle, Petar Stambolić, who was a close associate of Josip Broz Tito. Stambolić became the director of the state company Tehnogas and held this post until 1973, when he was promoted to chairman of the Belgrade Chamber of Commerce, and Milošević was appointed his successor. Later Stambolić served as prime minister of Serbia. In April 1984 he resigned as chairman of the Belgrade City Committee of the League of Communists of Serbia (LCS) in favor of Milošević. Stambolić became head of the Central Committee (CC) of the LCS. In 1986 he became chairman of the presidency (president) of the Socialist Republic of Serbia. He lent his support to Milošević's election to the position of head of the LCS, although some warned him against doing so. In April 1987 Stambolić made a big mistake when he did not personally go to Kosovo but instead sent Milošević, who fueled nationalist feelings, presenting himself as a defender of the Serbs against the Albanians. Milošević also exploited the conflict in Kosovo for his political games, accusing Stambolić of incompetence. On 23–24 September 1987 at the Eighth Plenum of the LCS CC—broadcast live on television—Milošević effected the dismissal of Dragiša Pavlović, who was supported by Stambolić. This was Stambolić's political defeat, and it was sealed with his forced resignation as president on 14 December 1987.

In November 1987 Stambolić became the director of the Yugoslav Bank for International Economic Cooperation and held this post until 1997. In April 1995, after a few years of silence, he gave an interview in Sarajevo. A collection of Slobodan Inić's interviews with Stambolić, titled Put u bespuce (Road to nowhere), was published in the same year. In this book, Stambolić presented his views on the events of the 1980s and on the end of his political career. Stambolić did not intend to reenter politics or to run in the presidential elections, yet he severely criticized Milošević. On 25 August 2000, a few weeks before the presidential elections, Stambolić did not return from the park in which he jogged every day. His remains were found in March 2003. According to the findings of the investigation that followed, Stambolić had been abducted by officers of the now disbanded Special Operations Unit, killed near Novi Sad, and buried in a lime pit. STAMBOLIĆ Petar (12 May 1912, Brezova, Serbia), Yugoslav Communist activist, ethnic Serb. Stambolić attended high school in the village of Brezova and then in Ivanjica and Čačak. In 1932 he began to study at the School of Agriculture of the University of Belgrade. He became a member of the League of Yugoslav Communist Youth in 1933 and a member of the Communist Party of Yugoslavia (CPY) in 1935. In December 1941 he joined the General Staff of Josip Broz Tito's Partisans in Serbia, and at the beginning of 1944 he became commander of the General Staff. At the second session of the Anti-Fascist Council for the National Liberation of Yugoslavia in November 1943

Stambolić was elected to its presidium. After World War II, he was a member of the party leadership in the Serbian republic and at the federal level. He was a member of the Central Committee (CC) of the Communist Party of Serbia (CPS) from 1945 to 1952 and then a member of the CC of the League of Communists of Serbia (LCS) from 1952 to 1969. Stambolić served as a member of the CC Politburo of the CPS (1945–52), secretary of the CPS CC (1948–52), and secretary of the LCS CC (1952–57). From January to November 1968 he headed the LCS CC. He was a member of the CPY CC (1949–52) and the CC of the League of Communists of Yugoslavia (LCY) (1952–69 and 1974–86). He was a member of the LCY CC Executive Committee (1954–66) and chairman of the LCY CC Ideological Committee (1958–63). He sat on the Presidium of the LCY CC (1966–69 and 1974–81) and the Presidium of the LCY (1969–74 and 1978–86). Stambolić served as deputy prime minister and minister of finance in the government of the Serbian republic (1945–47) and minister of agriculture in the federal government (1947–48). He was prime minister of Serbia (1948–53), speaker of the Serbian parliament (1953–57), and speaker of the federal parliament (1957–63). A close associate of Tito, Stambolić served as prime minister of Yugoslavia from 29 June 1963 to 16 May 1967. He was a member of the presidency of the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (May 1974–May 1985), its vice-chairman (1974–75 and 1981–82), and its chairman (May 1982–May 1983). (AO)

STAMBOLIYSKI Aleksandur (1 March 1879, Slavovitsa–14 June 1923, near Pazardzhik), Bulgarian Peasant Party leader. After attending agricultural colleges in Sadovo and Plevan, Stamboliyski studied agriculture in Halle, Germany. In 1899 he attended the founding congress of the Bulgarian Agrarian National Union (Bulgarski Zemedelski Narodni Suyuz [BANU]). After returning to Bulgaria, he turned to politics. On 10 November 1904, at the Sixth BANU Congress in Varna, Stamboliyski was elected chairman of the BANU and appointed editor-in-chief of Zemedelsko zname, a party newspaper. In his essay "Politicheski partii ili suslovni organizatsii?" (Political parties or state organizations?), Stamboliyski laid down the ideological foundations of the Bulgarian agrarian movement. Considering cities as sources of evil, he praised the peasant virtues and promoted the idea of cooperatives, as he believed that cooperatives would modernize farming in traditional peasant communities, upgrade living standards in rural areas, and help create a more egalitarian society. Stamboliyski's ideology exerted a strong influence on the peasant movement both in Bulgaria and abroad—for example, in Bohemia and Croatia. In 1911 the BANU, led by Stamboliyski, protested the new constitution, which consolidated the tsar's rule.

During World War I Stamboliyski sharply protested Bulgaria's involvement on the side of the Central Powers; as a result, he was sentenced to life imprisonment in 1916. After the outbreak of a military rebellion in Radomir, he was released and sent there to restore order among the mutinous troops. Instead, Stamboliyski joined in the proclamation of the Republic of Radomir and became its president on 27 September 1918. After this rebellion was suppressed, he went underground for some time, but as early as October 1918 he became minister of public works in the government of Teodor Teodorov.

After the parliamentary elections in August 1919, on 2 October 1919 Stamboliyski assumed the post of prime minister of a coalition government formed by the BANU, the liberals, and the nationalists. On 17 November he represented Bulgaria at the signing of the Treaty of Neuilly. After an unsuccessful general strike organized by the Communists, he dissolved parliament and called new elections on 28 March 1920. His party was five seats short of being able to establish an independent government; therefore, a dozen or so seats of other parties were declared invalid, and on 20 May Stamboliyski formed a new government based only on the BANU. In May 1921 the parliament, dominated by his supporters, enacted an agricultural reform that limited land ownership to thirty hectares (seventy-five acres). Land owned by monasteries was also confiscated. Many leading opposition politicians (even those who, like Aleksandur Malinov, had opposed the policies of Tsar Ferdinand) were arrested under the pretext of being responsible for Bulgaria's defeat in war. Hoping for concessions, Stamboliyski tried to improve relations with the victorious Entente states. To that end, in the fall of 1920 he went on a three-month tour of Europe, visiting France, Great Britain, Italy, Switzerland, Poland, and other countries. In late 1920 Bulgaria was admitted into the League of Nations. However, Stamboliyski failed to get the Entente to fulfill its promise that Bulgaria would gain the Thracian coast of the Aegean Sea. His efforts to improve relations with the Kingdom of Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes resulted in the Treaty of Niš (23 March 1923), under the terms of which Stamboliyski promised to combat the Macedonian independence movement. The opposition called this treaty treason, and the Internal Macedonian Revolutionary Organization (IMRO) undertook military action against the government. Pressured by the young

Tsar Boris III, traditional parties, and particularly the IMRO, as well as by the Communists (whose power had grown), and faced with discontent among his own supporters, Stamboliyski—with the help of his guards—increasingly resorted to dictatorial methods of government. As a result, he won the parliamentary elections of 23 April 1923, when the BANU obtained 53 percent of the votes and 85 percent of the seats. However, this electoral success did not prevent Stamboliyski's fall. On 9 June 1923 the secret National Alliance (Naroden Sgovor) and the Military League, led by Damian Velchev, supported by a part of the army, overthrew Stamboliyski's government. Stamboliyski himself was captured by Military League soldiers and IMRO members in the vicinity of the village of Golak, near Pazardzhik, and he was brutally murdered. (WR)

STANCHEV Kiril (14 December 1895, Kyustendil, Bulgaria–11 April 1968), Bulgarian military man. Stanchev graduated from a military school in Sofia (1915) and then fought in World War I. He was subsequently the commander of regiment and lecturer at a military school in Sofia. As one of the founders and leaders of an underground organization of military men holding leftist views, Stanchev was dismissed from the army after the monarchist coup of 1934. Arrested in 1935, he was sentenced to death in 1936, but his sentence was commuted to life imprisonment. In 1940 he was released under amnesty. Stanchev began to study law at Sofia University. At that time he established contacts with the Communists and was one of the main organizers of the coup of 9 September 1944 in Sofia. He became a member of a delegation that conducted talks with the leadership of the Soviet Second Ukrainian Front. From 1944 to 1945 Stanchev commanded the Second Bulgarian Army. Although he had ties with the Communists, the opposition regarded him as rather neutral politically and even considered him a close associate of Damian Velchev, the minister of war. When in September 1945 Nikola Petkov called for the dismissal of the government of Kimon Georgiev, he suggested that Stanchev assume the ministry of war in the future cabinet. This was enough for the Communists to treat Stanchev as an enemy. At the end of July 1946 he was dismissed as commander of the Second Army and arrested for allegedly leading an organization called the Military Union (Voenen Suyuz). Subjected to torture, Stanchev confessed to being a leader of this organization, which had allegedly sought to overthrow the government. However, Stanchev incriminated neither his superior, Velchev, nor Petkov, disappointing those who had trumped up this trial. The Stanchev case led to a conflict in the Politburo of the Communist Party. Although some Communist activists (for example, Traycho Kostov) demanded a death sentence for Stanchev, finally—under pressure from Georgi Dimitrov—Stanchev was sentenced to life imprisonment in October 1947. He served eighteen years of this sentence. Released in 1965, Stanchev died three years later. (AG)

STANCULESCU Victor Atanasie (10 May 1928, Tecuci), Romanian Communist activist and general. After graduating from an officer training school and a military college, Stanculescu gradually rose through the army ranks. In the 1970s he worked in the Ministry of National Defense, and from 1981 to 1986 he served as deputy minister. He subsequently served as first deputy minister of defense until December 1989. On 17 December 1989 Stanculescu was responsible for the suppression of protests in Timișoara; the suppression gave rise to a revolution and the overthrow of Nicolae Ceaușescu. From December 1989 to February 1990 Stanculescu was minister of defense. He subsequently served as minister of defense in the government of Petre Roman until May 1991. At that time he supervised the reconstruction of the security apparatus. In 1991 he was promoted to the highest rank of general. From May to September 1991 Stanculescu was minister of industry, and in 1993 he became director of a credit bank. From 1992 to 1994 he was a delegate of the London-based Balli Group, and he subsequently served as senior adviser to the director of Group London PLC until 1997. In 1995 he became vice-president of Robank. In 1995 the American Biographical Institute awarded him a prize for outstanding professional achievements, and the International Biographical Center in Cambridge named him man of the year. In May 2000 Stanculescu was sentenced in absentia to fifteen years' imprisonment because he was found co-responsible for the death of 72 people and the wounding of 253 people who had protested in Timișoara in December 1989. In May 2000 Romania asked Interpol for help in finding Stanculescu and bringing about his extradition. (PC)

STANKIEWICZ Adam (24 December 1891, Arlyanyaty,, near Ashmyany—29 November 1949, near Irkutsk, Siberia), Catholic priest, Belorussian religious activist, politician, and historian. Stankiewicz's brother, Jan Stankiewicz (1891–1976), was a philologist, an MP in the Assembly of the Republic of Poland (1928–30), and a Belorussian activist in exile. In 1914 Stankiewicz graduated from the Catholic Seminary in Wilno (Vilnius) and in 1918 from the Catholic Theological Academy in Petrograd. In 1911 he began to be involved in public life, founding a Belorussian club at the seminary in Wilno. This club was officially recognized by the rector. In 1917 Stankiewicz helped to found the Belorussian Christian Democratic Union (Khrystsiianskaia Dêmokratychnaia Zluchnasts [KhDZ]) in Petrograd, and he attended the First Congress of Belorussian Parties and Organizations in Minsk in March of that year. Stankiewicz became a member of the Council of the Belorussian People's Republic. In 1919 he returned to Wilno, where he revived the periodical Krynitsa in Belorussian. This periodical was addressed to the Catholic community. He also worked as a religion teacher at a Belorussian high school in Wilno and edited the periodical Khrystsiianskaia Dumka. From 1922 to 1927 Stankiewicz was an MP in the Assembly of the Republic of Poland. He was a member of the successor to the KhDZ, the Belorussian Christian Democratic Alliance, renamed Belorussian Christian Democracy in 1926 and the Belorussian People's Union in 1935. After the Parliamentary Group of the Belorussian Peasants' and Workers' Hromada was established (1925), Stankiewicz founded a parliamentary faction of the Belorussian Peasant Union. From 1924 to 1926 he was the chairman of the Belorussian School Society, and subsequently he became the director of the Belorussian Institute of Economy and Culture.

After Poland was defeated and the Vilnius region was seized by Lithuania (1939), Stankiewicz became the chairman of the Belorussian Center in Lithuania. During the German occupation he continued to publish Krynitsa, but he refused to collaborate with the Nazi authorities. He supported anti-Nazi efforts and tried to help the Jewish people. Arrested by the NKVD in 1944, Stankiewicz was sentenced to twenty-five years in Soviet forced labor camps in 1949, and he perished in Siberia. Stankiewicz authored many books on the history of Belorussia, among them the following: Rodnaia mova u sviatyniakh (The mother tongue in the churches; 1929); Kastus Kalinoucki (1933); Muzhytskaia Prauda i idëia nezalezhnastsi Belarusi (“Muzhytskaia Prauda” and the idea of Belorussian independence; 1933); Da historyi belaruskaha palitychnaha vyzvalennia (On the history of Belorussian political liberation; 1935); Belaruskii khrystsiianski rukh (The Belorussian Christian movement; 1939); and Khrystsiianstva i belaruskii narod (Christianity and the Belorussian nation; 1940). STANKOVIĆ Borislav (31 March 1875, Vranje, Serbia–21 October 1927, Belgrade), Serbian writer. Stanković lived in poverty from childhood. Orphaned at an early age, he was brought up by his illiterate grandmother Zlata, whose character he immortalized in his later works. After finishing primary school, he attended high school in Niš, graduating in 1896. He subsequently enrolled as a student in the Department of Economics and Politics of the Superior School in Belgrade, but he never graduated. Stanković made his literary debut in 1898. One year later he published the first collection of his stories, Iz starog ivandjelja (From the old gospel). From 1897 to 1900 Stanković worked at a printing house, then in the Ministry of Education, the Ministry of Foreign Affairs (from 1901 on), and the Ministry of Finance in Belgrade (1903–12). Stanković wrote most of his works in 1900–12, when he published, among other works, the drama Koštana (1902) and the novel Nečista krv (Tainted blood; 1910). In 1913 he began working in the Ministry of Education. During World War I Stanković was interned in Bosnia. After the war he resumed his former post, but he ceased writing and lived in isolation. In his works, Stanković depicted the traditional Balkan society: a circle of a peculiar fatalism and biological motivation. In a masterly way he portrayed merchants, peasants, beggars, and women, depicting people who had had been shaped during many centuries of foreign rule. Stanković enriched the Serbian language with borrowings from rural dialects, full of archaisms and influences from other Balkan languages. After his death, eight volumes of his Sabrana dela (Collected works; 1928–30) were published. They included the unfinished dramas Tašana (1910) and Jovča (1910), as well as the war memoirs Pod okupacijom (Under occupation; 1922). (WR)

STANOVNIK Janez (4 August 1922, Ljubljana), Yugoslav Communist activist, ethnic Slovene. In March 1941, while at the University of Ljubljana, Stanovnik became a member of the Committee of the Liberation Front, and, along with Christian Socialists, he opposed the pro-German policy of the government. He joined the Partisans led by Josip Broz Tito during World War II. After the war, he earned a doctorate and became director of the Institute of International Politics and Economics in Belgrade (1956–62). He also served as head of Tito’s office; a minister in the federal government of Mika Špiljak (1967); a co-worker in the UN Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development in Geneva; and UN Economic Commission for Europe (ECE) executive secretary (1968–82). In 1982 Stanovnik became a professor at the Department of Economics of the University of Ljubljana. As chairman of the presidency (president) of the Slovene Republic (May 1988–May 1990), Stanovnik received representatives of the Human Rights Defense Committee; this was seen as a gesture of support from Slovene political leaders for Janez Janša’s adherents, who had been arrested as a result of their conflict with the army. At the same time Stanovnik advocated that the Slovene republic remain part of Yugoslavia, and he publicly stated (for example, in April 1989) that separating from Yugoslavia would be a suicidal step for Slovenia. He also did not resign his membership in the League of Communists of Slovenia–Party of Democratic Renewal. Stanovnik received the Golden Honorary Medal of Freedom of the Republic of Slovenia (2002). His publications include Gospodarski razvoj Jugoslavije v luči svetovnega gospodarskega razvoja (Economic development of Yugoslavia in the light of world economic development; 1958); Mednarodni gospodarski sistem: Od dominacije k enakopravnosti (The international economic system: From domination to equal rights; 1982); and Svet v dolgovich in mednarodni monetarni sklad (The world in debt and the International Monetary Fund; 1985). STAPIŃSKI Jan (21 December 1867, Jabłonica Polska–17 February 1946, Krosno), Polish Peasant Party politician. In 1889 Stapiński graduated from a Jasło high school. He then studied law for a year at the University of Lemberg (Lwów, Lviv). In the 1890s, he worked for the Concordia Insurance Company, but he also published prolifically in the press and periodicals put out by the populist leaders Reverend Stanisław Stojałowski and Maria and Bolesław Wysłouch. Stapiński was one of the pioneers of the populist movement in Galicia. In 1895, he co-founded the Peasant Party (Stronnictwo Ludowe), and in 1905 he joined the Polish Peasant Party (Polskie Stronnictwo Ludowe [PSL]). Between 1902 and 1934, he published and contributed to Przyjaciel Ludu (A friend of the people). From 1898 to 1900 and 1907 to 1918, he was a deputy to the Austrian Council of State and to the Galician National Parliament (Sejm Krajowy) (1901–8). In 1908 Stapiński was elected chairman of the PSL. After a split in the party, he headed the PSL–Left. During the parliamentary elections of 1919 Stapiński represented his party in the Constitutional Assembly. After the PSL–Left joined the dissidents from the PSL–Piast, Stapiński became a deputy chairman of a new group, the Peasant Union (Związek Chłopski), which soon united with the politicians who split from the PSL–Liberation (PSL–Wyzwolenie) to form the Peasant Party (Stronnictwo Chłopskie [SCh]). Stapiński continued on as a deputy chairman of the SCh. However, in 1928 he was expelled from the party for having too close links with the followers of Józef Piłsudski. Subsequently, he was elected to the parliament from the Nonparty Block of Cooperation with the Government (Bezpartyjny Blok Współpracy z Rządem [BBWR]) list. Stapiński officially joined the BBWR in 1930, but disillusioned with the sanacja government, he left active political life and devoted himself to his farm in Klimkówka, near Gorlice. During the Nazi occupation he was hiding in Lesser Poland. Stapiński authored Pamiętnik (Memoirs), published posthumously in 1959. (WR)

STAROSOLSKYI Volodymyr (8 January 1878, Jarosław–25 February 1942, Mariinsk, Western Siberia), Ukrainian theorist of law, lawyer, sociologist, and politician. Born into a Galician family of lawyers, Starosolskyi graduated from high school in Kraków and subsequently studied in Lemberg (Lviv, Lwów), Kraków, Vienna, and Prague. After earning a Ph.D. in Prague in 1909, he continued his studies in Heidelberg, Germany. Starosolskyi was active in the Ukrainian student movement. In 1900 in Lemberg he helped to establish Young Ukraine, a radical student organization that strove for the Ukrainization of the University of Lemberg. He also edited the press organ of this organization. In 1902 he co-organized the so-called secession of Ukrainian students, who temporarily transferred to study at universities in Austria, Bohemia, and Germany in protest against the mainly Polish authorities of the University of Lemberg. Starosolskyi was a member of a foreign committee of the Ukrainian Radical Party and then a member of the leadership of the Ukrainian Social Democratic Workers' Party (Ukraińska Sotsial-Demokratyčeskaya Rabochaya Partiya [USDRP]) in Galicia. In the 1920s, during a stay in Czechoslovakia, he belonged to the USDRP leadership in exile.

In 1907 Starosolskyi opened a law practice in Lemberg. In 1908 he was the defense counsel in the trial of Myroslav Sichynskyi, who had assassinated Count Andrzej Potocki, the governor of Galicia. In 1914 Starosolskyi opened a law practice in Gródek Jagielloński (now Horodok, Ukraine). One of the founders of a Ukrainian paramilitary organization called the Sich Riflemen, Starosolskyi was the organization's chairman from 1913. After the outbreak of World War I, Starosolskyi became a member of the Ukrainian Chief Council and a member of the military command of the Ukrainian Sich Riflemen. As a member of the Military Committee, he took part in preparations for the takeover of power in Lemberg on 1 November 1918 and for the establishment of the Western Ukrainian National Republic (Zakhidno-Ukraińska Narodna Republika [ZUNR]). In the fall of 1919, after the ZUNR united with the Ukrainian National Republic (Ukraińska Narodna Republika [UNR]), Starosolskyi worked as vice-minister of foreign affairs in the government of Isaak Mazepa. In 1920–27 Starosolskyi lived in Vienna and Prague. He continued his party work in the USDRP, as well as his scholarly work as associate professor and lecturer at the Ukrainian Free University, the Ukrainian Sociological University, and the Ukrainian Academy of Economics. In 1928 he returned to Lwów. He resumed his law practice and defended representatives of the young generation of various Ukrainian organizations, from Communists to members of the Organization of Ukrainian Nationalists (OUN). Starosolskyi attempted to create a programmatic and moral alternative to integral nationalism, which was increasingly popular among the Galician youth. He began to criticize the ideology of Dmytro Dontsov, yet he was opposed to the concept of a dictatorship of the proletariat. In the autumn of 1939, after the Red Army occupied Lwów, Starosolskyi became a professor at the university there. Arrested the following year, he was sentenced to ten years' imprisonment. He was subsequently deported to Mariinsk in Western Siberia and perished there.

Starosolskyi published Das Majoritätsprinzip (The principle of primogeniture; 1916); Metodolohichna problema v nauksii pro derzhavu (The problem of methodology in the science of the state; 1925); and Do pyttannia pro formy derzhavy (On the issue of the state system; 1925). He also authored the books Teoriia natsii (Theory of the nation; 1921) and Derzhava i politychne pravo (The state and the political law, 2 vols.; 1924). In the former he presented the nation as a phase in the development of forms of human life and justified the right to national self-determination, which was to fulfill itself as both national and social liberation (democracy, abolition of class, and universal will). In the latter he foresaw that all European nations would be formed into separate states and then federalized in order to reduce absolute sovereignty and to create an efficient system to defend the rights of individuals. STARZYŃSKI Stefan (19 August 1893, Warsaw–19 March 1944? Germany), Polish politician, entrepreneur, and pundit. In 1914, Starzyński graduated from the August Zieliński Higher Courses in Trade. Then he studied law at the University of Warsaw and completed an officer training school. In 1910, he had joined the Union of Progressive-Independentist Youth (Związek Młodzieży Postępowo-Niepodległościowej). In 1913 and 1914, he served on its Central Committee in the Kingdom of Poland. In 1912 Starzyński became involved with the Union of Active Struggle and the Riflemen's Association in Warsaw. He was arrested several times by the Russian authorities. Between 1914 and 1917, he served as an officer with the First Brigade of the Polish Legions. After the oath crisis in July 1917, Starzyński was interned in Beniaminów; he then joined the clandestine Polish Military Organization. In 1918, he volunteered for the Polish Army, fighting on the Ukrainian front. In 1919, he was assigned to the High Command, and in 1921 he was dismissed from the army as a captain of the reserves. Between 1921 and 1924 Starzyński served as general secretary of the Polish delegation in the Joint Polish-Soviet Reevacuation and Special Commission in Moscow. He was an active supporter of Piłsudski. Starzyński was promoted to director of a department at the Ministry of the Treasury, and in September 1929 he was handed a vice-ministerial portfolio at the ministry. Between 1930 and 1933, he served as an MP on behalf of the Nonparty Bloc of Cooperation with the Government (Bezpartyjny Blok Współpracy z Rządem [BBWR]). In 1931 he commenced teaching at the Main Trade School in Warsaw. In 1933, he was appointed deputy chairman of the Bank of the National Economy (Bank Gospodarstwa Krajowego [BGK]) and commissar of the National Loan. He was known for his support of economic statism and state interventionism in the economy.

From 1933 through 1934, Starzyński chaired the

BBWR in Warsaw, and between 1934 and 1939 he was the commissary mayor of Warsaw. In 1937, he initiated a four-year plan to develop and modernize the capital. The plan was dubbed "The capital presents its front to the Vistula River." In 1937, Starzyński became an activist of the pro-government Camp of National Unity (Obóz Zjednoczenia Narodowego [OZN]) as the chairman of its Warsaw section, and in 1938 he was elected to the Senate from the OZN lists. In September 1939, he was appointed civilian commissioner with the Command of the Defense of Warsaw. Starzyński rendered civilian assistance to the military; in practice this translated into a mass mobilization of the Polish society to fight. Thus, a legend was born of Starzyński as the leader of the fighting capital. Starzyński participated in the conceptualization and establishment of the Polish Underground State. Following the capitulation of Warsaw, he was arrested by the Germans and imprisoned in Pawiak Prison on 27 October 1939. In December 1939 he was transferred (most likely) to Berlin. According to some sources, Starzyński was sent to Dachau; according to others, he was sent to the potassium mine at Baelberge. The circumstances and the precise date of his death remain unknown. His symbolic grave is at Powązki Cemetery in Warsaw. Starzyński authored numerous economic works, including Rola państwa w życiu gospodarczym (The role of the state in economic life; 1927) and Myśl państwowa w życiu gospodarczym (Etatist thought in economic life; 1928). STAYNOV Petko (19 May 1890, Kazanluk–24 July 1972, Sofia), Bulgarian lawyer and politician. After finishing high school in Stara Zagora (1908), Staynov studied law and administration in Grenoble and Paris, graduating in 1911. From 1911 to 1912 he continued his studies in Leipzig. He fought as an officer in the Balkan Wars (1912–13). In 1914 he earned a Ph.D. in economic and political sciences from the University of Paris. From 1919 to 1920 Staynov headed the Office for the Press in Bulgaria. In 1923 he began working at Sofia University, first as an associate professor (1937–47) and then as full professor and dean of the Department of Administrative Law (1947–63). He also lectured at the Free University (1925–39). In 1935 Staynov became a corresponding member and in 1942 a full member of the Bulgarian Academy of Sciences. From May 1930 to June 1931 Staynov served as minister of railways, post, and telegraph. He was a minister to Belgium (1934) and France (1934–35). In 1934 he became a member of the International Institute of Public Law, and in 1935, a member of the International Institute of Constitutional and Political History. In December 1941 Staynov protested in parliament against Bulgaria's declaration of war on the United States and Great Britain. He also signed a protest against the deportation of Bulgarian Jews in 1943. He called for a change in Bulgarian foreign policy: Bulgaria should cease to side with Germany in the war; there should be rapprochement with the Soviet Union and the establishment of a government that would observe the constitutional rules. Along with twelve other opposition politicians, Staynov signed an appeal to the regents on these issues (7 August 1944). Staynov served as deputy to the National Assembly from 1923 to 1946 and then, under Communist rule, from 1950 to 1972.

After the coup of 9 September 1944, Staynov served as minister of foreign and religious affairs until March 1946. He was a member of the Bulgarian delegation to the armistice negotiations between Bulgaria and the Soviet Union, the United States, and Great Britain in Moscow on 28 October 1944. He also took part in negotiations on the establishment of a federation of South Slavic nations (1944). In 1949 Staynov became a member of the National Council of the Fatherland Front and a member of the National Council for the Defense of Peace in Bulgaria. From 1949 to 1959 he served as secretary of the Department of Legal and Economic Sciences of the Bulgarian Academy of Sciences. Staynov's publications include Administratsiia i pravosudie v Germaniia (Administration and the judiciary in Germany; 1923); Administrativno pravosudie (Administrative judiciary; 1936–37); Administrativno pravo (Administrative law; 1945); Voенно административно прavo (Military administrative law; 1946); and Razdelnostta na vlastta i konstitutsiata (The separation of powers and the constitution; 1946). STECKI Jan (22 March 1871, Siedliska, near Lubartów–30 June 1954, Bełżyce), Polish conservative politician. The son of an estate manager, Stecki graduated from high school in 1889 and then studied medicine at Warsaw University and participated in the Association of Polish

Youth–Zet. Arrested temporarily in 1891, in 1893 he joined the National League (Liga Narodowa) but was also a member of the Workers' Committee of the Polish Socialist Party for a while. After getting married in 1900, Stecki managed the Łańcuchów estate and participated in the Lublin Agricultural Association. In 1906 he was elected to the First State Duma and worked in its Agricultural Commission. Elected again to the Second State Duma, he prepared a proposal of autonomy for the Kingdom of Poland. After the outbreak of World War I Stecki supported the Entente, but in December 1917 he became minister of interior in the Jan Kucharzewski government of the Regency Council. In protest against the Treaty of Brest-Litovsk, in March 1918 Stecki resigned but continued to serve in the same capacity in the next cabinet, that of Jan Kąty Steczkowski, from April to October 1918.

After Poland regained independence, Stecki was on the Board of Directors of the Association of Landowners (Związek Ziemian [ZZ]); from June 1919 he was its chairman, and in September 1919 he became chairman of the Supreme Council of Landowners' Organizations. Stecki protested the expropriation of large estates without compensation, a ruling passed by the Constituent Assembly in July 1919. During the Polish-Soviet war, in July 1920 he initiated a ZZ resolution offering estate mortgages for the defense of Poland. In the elections of 1922 Stecki was elected MP on behalf of National Democracy, but after the party reached a compromise on land reform with the Peasant Party–Piast (the Lanckorona Pact of May 1923), he moved to the Christian National Agricultural Party. After the May 1926 coup d'état Stecki supported Józef Piłsudski, and in 1930 he was elected senator on behalf of the Nonparty Bloc of Cooperation with the Government. When in 1933 it was disclosed that Stecki had obtained a loan from ZZ funds, he became a target of sharp criticism and gave up the ZZ chairmanship and his senatorial seat. He continued to publish articles. During World War II and the Nazi occupation Stecki lived in Łańcuchów. After the war, the estate was confiscated as part of the Communist land reform. Stecki moved to Lublin, where he worked in the provincial administration. He authored a lot of articles, pamphlets, and other works, mainly on land reform, among them the following: "W obronie prawdy" (In the defense of truth; 1928); "Wartość i ceny ziemi" (The value and price of land; 1937); and "Zagadnienie rozwoju gospodarczego wsi polskiej" (The question of economic development of the Polish countryside; 1938). STEFAN [original name Stoyan Popgeorgiev] (19 September 1878, Shiroka Luka, near Devin–14 May 1957 Banja, near Karlovo), exarch of the Bulgarian Orthodox Church. Stefan attended a rural elementary school in Shiroka Luka and then went to a high school in Oriakhovo. In 1899 he finished a theological seminary in Samokov, and in 1904 he graduated from the Kiev Theological Academy. While a student, Stefan embraced Russophile and Pan-Slavic views. Before going to Russia, he worked as a village teacher. After completing his studies, he taught at a high school in Plovdiv and at a seminary in Istanbul. He also served as secretary to Josif I, the Bulgarian exarch. Ordained on 16 October 1910, he took the monastic name of Stefan. In 1911 he was named archimandrite. After World War I, Stefan studied at the University of Freiburg, earning a Ph.D. in 1919 for a dissertation on the Bogomil heresy. After returning to Bulgaria, he rose through the ranks of the Orthodox Church. In 1921 he was ordained titular bishop of Martianopolis, and on 29 March 1922 he was elected the metropolitan of Sofia. De facto, Stefan became the most important clergyman in Bulgaria. De jure, the election of the exarch was postponed because of the domestic situation in Bulgaria and because of a conflict within the Orthodox Church over the extent of the jurisdiction of the exarchate of Bulgaria. Furthermore, Stefan was in opposition to Tsar Boris III. After the royal dictatorship was established in 1935, Stefan founded an Orthodox Church committee for peace and cooperation in the Balkans, which was seen as an expression of support for the opposition. He also took part in ecumenical work, using his contacts with Old Catholics and Anglicans. During World War I Stefan protested the persecution of the Jewish people and of the Orthodox Church and the Orthodox faithful in Serbia.

On 21 January 1945 Stefan was officially appointed exarch of Bulgaria. The Communists tried to exploit his prestige, and Stefan believed that it was necessary to cooperate with Stalin and the Bulgarian Communists in order to gain concessions for the Orthodox Church. As early as February 1945 he went to Moscow and took part in negotiations with the hierarchs of the Russian Orthodox Church. He strove to end the conflict between the Russian and Bulgarian churches, which went back to 1872. He was given consent by the hierarchs of the Moscow patriarchate to transform the exarchate of Bulgaria into an autocephalous church. In return, Stefan fully supported the policies of Stalin and the Communists. On 8 September 1946, along with all members of the Bulgarian Holy Synod, Stefan called for the abolishment of the monarchy and the establishment of a republic. In 1947 he officially blessed the establishment of the Information Bureau of the Communist and Workers' Parties, and in July 1948 at the General Synod of Orthodox Churches in Moscow he praised the Kremlin's activities aimed at uniting the Slavic nations. Despite his servility, Stefan became the victim of triumphant totalitarianism. Abducted by the Communists on 8 September 1948, he was forced to move to the village of Banja, near Karlovo, where he was held under house arrest until the end of his life. In 2001 the Yad Vashem Institute honored Stefan posthumously with the title of "Righteous among Nations." (MC)

ŠTEFÁNEK Anton (15 April 1887, Vel'ké Leváre, Slovakia–29 April 1964, Žiar nad Hronom, Slovakia), Slovak sociologist and politician. In 1898 Štefánek began to study in Vienna, but he discontinued his studies owing to financial difficulties. He belonged to a circle of the young Slovak intelligentsia centered around the liberal monthly Hlas. Inspired by Tomáš G. Masaryk, Štefánek promoted education among the peasants, the economic development of provincial Slovakia, and the democratization of public life. He called for close cooperation with the Czechs and criticized the activists of the nationalist movement. In Hlas, he promoted modern philosophy and rationalism and opposed (among others) the neo-Thomist František Jehlička. In 1906 Štefánek began working in Budapest. He initially edited the periodical Slovenský týždenník and then the periodical Slovenský obzor from 1907 to 1908. In 1908 he became editor of L'udové noviny. In 1910 he went back to Budapest and became the editor-in-chief of the newspaper Slovenský denník. During World I Štefánek worked on the editorial staff of the Prague-based periodical Národní listy. He also maintained contacts with the activists of the so-called Mafia, a Czech secret political organization, and in October 1918 he joined the Czechoslovak National Committee. Štefánek helped to organize the Slovak school system. He was one of the Slovak leaders of the Agrarian Party, on whose ticket he won a parliamentary seat, which he held from 1918 to 1920. In 1924 Štefánek completed his studies, earning a Ph.D. from the Department of Philosophy of Komenský University, Bratislava. In 1924 he began working in the Ministry of Education. From February to December 1929 he served as minister. In that year he again became an MP, and in 1935, a senator.

Štefánek was one of the leading promoters of the idea of the “Czechoslovak” nation. He discussed Masaryk’s influence on the process of shaping Slovak thought in the book Masaryk a Slovensko (Masaryk and Slovakia; 1931), and he described the concept of Czechoslovak unity in the works Slovenská a československá otázka (The Slovak and the Czechoslovak question; 1922); Československo a autonómia (Czechoslovakia and autonomy; 1923); and Československý problém (The Czechoslovak issue; 1924). Štefánek was a pioneer of Slovak sociology. From 1937 he held the Chair of Applied Sociology at Bratislava University. He dealt with the phenomenon of the nation and nationalism and with the sociology of rural communities. He emphasized the importance of empirical methods. A Czechophile, Štefánek was briefly interned after the Slovak state was established in March 1939. However, he was later allowed to continue his scholarly work. In 1942 he became a full professor and a member of the newly established Slovak Academy of Sciences and Arts. The work Základy sociografie na Slovensku (Basics of sociography of Slovakia; 1945) is a synthesis of his research. In 1945 Štefánek became rector of Bratislava University, but then his position gradually weakened. After the Communist coup, he was forced to retire in April 1949. In 1950 the Chair of Sociology was abolished for political reasons. (MG)

ȘTEFĂNESCU-DELĂVRANCEA Barbu (5 April 1858, Bucharest–11 May 1918, Iași), Romanian writer, journalist, and politician. In 1882 Ștefănescu-Delăvrancea graduated from medical and legal studies at the University of Bucharest. In 1884 he joined the Social Democratic movement, and from 1890 he belonged to the Conservative Party. From 1892 to 1914 he was an MP, and in 1899–1901 and 1906–8 he was mayor of Bucharest. Ștefănescu-Delăvrancea was minister of public works in a conservative government (1910–12) and minister of industry in a liberal government (1917–18). In 1917–18 he actively supported the alliance with the Entente, and he was a declared adversary of Hungary. During the stay of Romanian authorities in Iași, he strongly advocated the unification of all Romanian territories and a continuation of the struggle against the Central Powers until final victory. Ștefănescu-Delăvrancea made his journalistic debut with a series of patriotic articles in România libera during the struggle for independence in 1877. In 1884–1918 he published in many periodicals, among them Epoca, Familia Românul, Revista nouă, Democrația, Convorbiri literare, România, Placăra, and România libera. He also published Guvern, prefecti și deputați (Government, prefects, and MPs; 1890); Chestiunea națională (The national question; 1897); and A doua conștiința (Double consciousness; 1922). Ștefănescu-Delăvrancea is well known for having written plays on national questions and short stories presenting the life of the common people. He was on friendly terms with the wife of King Charles I, Queen Elisabeth, known under the pen name of Carmen Sylva. (FA/TD)

ŠTEFÁNIK Milan Rastislav (21 July 1880, Košariská, near Myjava, Slovakia–4 May 1919, Bratislava), Slovak politician. Born the sixth of twelve children into the family of a poor Lutheran pastor, Štefánik finished a rural elementary school and then a gymnasium in Szarvas. From 1897 to 1904 he studied philosophy in Zurich and then astronomy at Charles University in Prague, earning a Ph.D. in astronomy in 1904. He subsequently went to France, where he was in charge of research at the astronomical observatory at Meudon. Štefánik conducted astronomy observations all over the world: Spain, England, Germany, Russia, the United States, North Africa, Brazil, Australia, the Fiji Islands, and New Zealand. On 28 April 1911 he observed a solar eclipse in Tahiti. In 1912 Štefánik received French citizenship, and in 1914 he was made a Knight of the Legion of Honor. When World War I broke out, Štefánik volunteered to serve in the French air force. In 1915 he started efforts to establish separate Czechoslovak units under the auspices of the French Army. In November 1915 he was wounded in an air crash in Albania. After recovering, he was encouraged by Vavro Šrobár to enter into cooperation with Tomáš G. Masaryk and Edvard Beneš. Their cooperation resulted in the establishment of the Czechoslovak National Council in France. Štefánik became vice-president of this council. Thanks to his great skills, he was promoted in the French Army. In 1916 he became a captain, in 1917 a major, and in 1918 a colonel and then a general. From 1916 to 1917 Štefánik traveled to Italy, Romania, and Russia with the mission of ensuring that Czech and Slovak prisoners of war were given special status. In the autumn of 1917 he visited the United States, where he recruited Slovak volunteers to fight in France. After the Czechoslovak Legion was formed in Russia, Štefánik received permission to establish a Czechoslovak army in France (16 November 1917) and in Italy (May 1918). In April 1918 in Rome he co-organized the Congress of Captive Nations of Austria-Hungary.

When Štefánik learned, during a visit to Japan, that Beneš and Masaryk had put his name to the Independence Declaration of 18 October 1918, he asked them for an explanation regarding the vaguely formulated statements concerning Slovakia's status in the future union, but he did not receive a clear answer. As a result, he lost his post as minister of war in the provisional Czechoslovak government. In late 1918 and early 1919 Štefánik visited the Siberian headquarters of the Czechoslovak Legion. A firm opponent of the Bolsheviks, he anxiously observed that his position toward them had weakened and that cooperation with Admiral Aleksandr Kolchak was getting complicated. In January 1919 Štefánik went back to Paris and then to Italy, from where he flew to his country. His plane crashed while attempting to land. The causes of the accident remain unexplained. The Slovaks suspected that Štefánik's plane had been shot down either by mistake or on the orders of Czech leaders, who had allegedly wanted to get rid of a dynamic and troublesome partner. The legend of Štefánik, which developed after his tragic death, did not help to solve the mystery, particularly as the traces of his work and death were allegedly covered up, both during the interwar period and after World War II. STEFANYK Vasyl (14 May 1871, Rusów, near Śniatyń [now Rusov, near Snyatyn, Ukraine]–7 December 1936, Rusów, Poland) Ukrainian writer and politician from Galicia. Stefanyk was born into a rich peasant family. Expelled from a high school in Kołomyja (Kolomyia) for belonging to a secret self-education group, he moved to Drohobych. Stefanyk made his literary debut in Narod, a Lemberg (Lviv, Lwów) periodical edited by Ivan Franko. In 1892 Stefanyk began to study at the Jagiellonian University Medical School in Kraków, where he met many outstanding members of the Young Poland movement, including Władysław Orkan and Stanisław Przybyszewski. The lifestyle of Kraków's bohemia and the works of leading Western modernist writers influenced Stefanyk, whose letters of that period are deeply introspective and of a poetic nature. Some of these letters were published in the periodical Literaturno-Naukovy Vistnyk in 1898 and then in the collections Synia knyzhchka (Blue book; 1899); Kaminnyi khrest (1900; The Stone Cross, 1971); Doroĥa (The road; 1901); and Moie slovo (My word; 1905). Stefanyk also published short-story collections. In these works the influence of Polish modernism can be found. Stefanyk's stay in Kiev and Poltava in 1903 resulted in contacts with Mykhailo Kotsiubynskyi and Lesya Ukrainka. Later, Stefanyk lived in the countryside, in Steców (Pokutia region, now in Ukraine) and in Rusov.

From 1901 to 1916 Stefanyk ran his farm and was involved in politics. In 1908–18 he sat in the Austrian parliament in Vienna as a representative of the Ukrainian Radical Party (URP). Influenced by the bloody events of World War I in Galicia, Stefanyk decided to resume writing. In 1916 he wrote the collection Zemlia (The land) which was published 1926). In November 1918 he became vice-president of the National Council of the Western Ukrainian National Republic (Zakhidno-Ukrainska Narodna Republika [ZUNR]), and in January 1919 in Kiev he represented the ZUNR during the signing of the Act of Unification between the ZUNR and the Ukrainian National Republic (Ukrainska Narodna Republika [UNR]). After the fall of the ZUNR, Stefanyk remained in Poland. In 1922 he became chairman of a URP county organization. The Soviet authorities granted him a pension, which he accepted from 1928 until 1933, when information about the Great Famine in Ukraine was revealed. Complete editions of Stefanyk's literary output were published in 1927 in the Ukrainian SSR, in 1933 in Lwów (Lviv), in 1948 in Ratisbon, and in 1964 again in the Ukrainian SSR. Stefanyk was a master of the short story. He depicted human life as an arena of suffering, acts of pure fate, and tragedy. His attachment to Pokutia manifested itself not only as the place of origin of his characters, but also in the dialect of his prose. Stefanyk's stories were translated into French (1975) and English (1971, 1988). The library of the National Academy of Sciences of Ukraine (formerly the Ossolineum Library) in Lviv has been named after him. (TS)

STEINHAUS Hugo (14 January 1887, Jasło–25 February 1972, Wrocław), Polish mathematician. Upon graduating from high school in Jasło, in 1906 Steinhaus commenced mathematical and philosophical studies at the University of Lemberg (Lwów, Lviv). Next, he transferred to Göttingen, where he defended his doctoral dissertation in mathematics in 1911. During World War I Steinhaus fought in the Polish Legions as an artillery officer. In 1916 he returned to the University of Lwów, received his advanced doctoral degree the following year, and was appointed full professor in 1920. Steinhaus taught at the University of Lwów until 1941. In the course of his early academic career, he met Stefan Banach, and together they arrived at many important mathematical discoveries. Along with their collaborators, dubbed the “Lwów mathematical school,” they developed a new branch of mathematics: functional analysis. Among their greatest achievements was the “Banach-Steinhaus proof.” In 1929, both scholars founded the Studia Mathematica, a multilingual periodical that was soon recognized as one of the most important in its field. In 1937, along with Stefan Kaczmarz, Steinhaus worked out the theory of orthogonal ranks, which was published in the United States after World War II. During the Nazi occupation, Steinhaus went into hiding because of his Jewish origins. He supported himself by clandestine teaching. In November 1945 he moved to Wrocław (Breslau), where he taught at the local university until his retirement. Steinhaus was a member of the Polish Academy of Arts and Sciences and, from 1952, of the Polish Academy of Sciences. After the war, he became interested in applying mathematics to cartography and statistical quality control, as well as in game theory. Steinhaus published about 250 original scholarly works. His Kalejdoskop matematyczny (Mathematical kaleidoscope; 1938) was translated into ten languages. Many of Steinhaus’s students, including one of the founders of American atomic science, Stanisław Ulam, became internationally known. In 1992 Steinhaus’s Wspomnienia i zapiski (Memoirs and notes) were published posthumously. (WR)

STEMACHOWSKI Andrzej (28 January 1925, Poznań), Polish lawyer and politician. During World War II Stelmachowski was a soldier in the Home Army (Armia Krajowa). He received a law degree from Poznań University in 1947 and earned a doctorate there in 1950. He began working at Warsaw University, becoming an associate professor in 1962 and a full professor in 1973. From 1962 to 1969 he worked at Wrocław University, and in 1970 he also took up a position at the Warsaw Academy of Catholic Theology. In August 1980 Stelmachowski became an adviser to the Inter-Factory Strike Committee in Gdańsk. From 1980 to 1981 he was an expert at the Center for Social and Labor Initiatives of Solidarity. In 1981 he became an adviser to the Independent Self-Governing Trade Union of Independent Farmers–Solidarity. In 1975 he became a member of the Primate’s Council for the Construction of Churches. Stelmachowski was a co-founder and chairman (1982–85) of the Organizational Committee of the Church Foundation for Polish Agriculture, but it failed to achieve its goals because of opposition from the Communist authorities. Stelmachowski works with the Polish Episcopate. In 1972 he became a member of the Club of the Catholic Intelligentsia (Klub Inteligencji Katolickiej) in Warsaw and served as its chairman from 1987 to 1990. In December 1988 he joined the Civic Committee of the Chairman of Solidarity. During the summer strikes of 1988 Stelmachowski played a great role in bringing about the first negotiations between Lech Wałęsa and General Czesław Kiszczak. One of the initiators of the Round Table negotiations, Stelmachowski was involved in their plenary and working sessions. From 1989 to 1991 Stelmachowski served as a senator of the Civic Parliamentary Caucus (Obywatelski Klub Parlamentarny [OKP]) and as senate speaker. From December 1991 to June 1992 he was minister of national education in the government of Jan Olszewski. In 1990 he co-founded and then became chairman of the Polish Community Association (Stowarzyszenie Wspólnota Polska). (AF)

STEPINAC Alojzije (8 May 1898, Brezani, near Krašić–10 February 1960, Brezani, near Krašić), cardinal and primate of Croatia. Stepinac was the fifth of eight children born into a peasant family. During World War I he was inducted into the army and fought on the Italian front. After being taken captive, he joined the Yugoslav Legion, which was formed of Croatian and Slovenian prisoners of war alongside the coalition army. Fighting on the front lines near Salonika, Stepinac attained the rank of lieutenant; he received the Order of the Star of Karadjordjević after the war. In 1919 he began studying at the School of Agriculture at the Academy of Economics in Zagreb. However, in 1924 he decided to become a priest. He took up studies at the Gregorian University in Rome and received a Ph.D. in philosophy in 1927 and in theology in 1931. He was ordained on 26 October 1930. After his return to Yugoslavia Stepinac began work as a diocesan priest, and then he served in the Zagreb curia. Because of his piety and energy, the archbishop of Zagreb, Antun Bauer, saw him as his successor. In May 1934 Pius XI appointed Stepinac titular archbishop of Nicopolis and coadjutor with the right of succession to the archdiocese of Zagreb. Stepinac became the youngest archbishop of the Catholic Church at that time. In a short period he visited half of the parishes in the archdiocese and initiated annual pilgrimages to Marija Bistrica.

After his predecessor's death on 7 December 1937, Stepinac assumed the post of archbishop ordinary of Zagreb. He supported a unified Yugoslavia but one based upon a federation of autonomous nations, not a centralized autocratic state dominated by Serbs, as was Yugoslavia at that time. Seeing growing tensions between the Croatian National Party and the government in Belgrade; the terrorist activities of the Ustashe-in-exile of Ante Pavelić; and radical tendencies among the Catholic youth of the Križari (Crusaders) movement, Stepinac strenuously sought a Serb-Croat agreement and contributed to its signing in April 1939. The agreement stipulated autonomy for Croatia within the framework of Yugoslavia. From 1939 to 1941 Stepinac took care of Czech, Polish, and Jewish refugees from German-occupied countries and organized a special committee of Caritas in Zagreb, thereby attracting the attention of the Nazis.

When in June 1941 the Germans conquered Yugoslavia and the created a puppet Croatian state under Pavelić, Stepinac continued his activities in dramatically difficult circumstances—all the more so because Pavelić professed his attachment to Catholicism, and part of the clergy favored him. In a special pastoral letter of 28 April 1941 Stepinac regarded the formation of the Croatian state as “the creation of God’s hand” and welcomed it by singing a Te Deum in the Zagreb cathedral. However, he repeatedly asked the Ustasha authorities, and Pavelić personally, to stop the massacre of Serbs and Jews. The authorities demanded declarations of nationalism and arrested many moderate Croatian politicians. In November 1941, following the instructions of the Holy See, the Croatian bishops founded a committee for re-Catholicization and thus made it more difficult for the Ustashe to exterminate minorities. In May 1942 Stepinac refused to accept the methods adopted by the government. He then gave priests confidential instructions to admit Serbs and Jews into the Catholic Church, assuming that they may leave it after the war. Although many priests supported the regime, Pavelić was “disappointed” with the attitude of bishops, especially with the position of Stepinac. The archbishop publicly stated that “we have always stressed in public life the principles of God’s eternal laws, regardless of whether they related to Croats, Serbs, Jews, gypsies, Catholics, Muslims, the Orthodox, or anyone else.” In October 1943 the Ustashe temporarily put Stepinac under house arrest and waged propaganda attacks against him.

After the liberation of Yugoslavia by the Communist partisans of Josip Broz Tito, Stepinac decided to remain in the country, despite the arrests and persecutions of the clergy. After the murder of the Franciscans from the monastery in Široki Brijeg, on 24 March 1945 Stepinac issued a pastoral letter defending the Croatian nation. Arrested in May 1945 Stepinac but was released. Stepinac met with Tito and spoke in defense of the constitution and human rights. He also rejected Tito’s proposal of creating a national Catholic Church. On 20 September 1945 Stepinac published a pastoral letter in which he criticized the hatred contained in the Communist doctrine. As a result, the Titoist authorities launched a massive propaganda attack. In November 1945 Stepinac was assaulted and stoned by Tito’s partisans in uniform. In a series of press attacks Stepinac was presented as an adherent of Pavelić and the Nazis. Various false statements were produced. In 1946 the Communists organized a series of trials of priests, who testified under torture that the archbishop had collaborated with the occupying power. Arrested on 18 September 1946 and accused of collaboration and support of the cruelties of the Ustashe, on 11 October 1946 Stepinac was sentenced in a fake trial to sixteen years of forced labor. Before the announcement of his sentence, Stepinac gave a speech that has passed into history as the “Stepinac’s defense.” As Tito’s government was generally recognized, the trial did not evoke protests in the international arena, and Stepinac’s heroism was not known.

In December 1951 Stepinac was released from prison in Lepoglava and put under house arrest in his native village of Krašić. On 29 November 1952 Pope Pius XII named him cardinal, which led Tito to break off diplomatic relations with the Holy See. Stepinac continued to refuse to leave his country, and until his death he remained an opponent of the anti-religious policy of the Communists. Stepinac died in his native village, exhausted by a blood disease. There is some suspicion that he was poisoned. In 1985, the prosecutor in his case, Jakov Blažević, admitted publicly that the charges against Stepinac had been trumped up. In 1992 the authorities of independent Croatia rehabilitated the cardinal. On 3 October 1998 Pope John Paul II beatified him during a ceremony in Marija Bistrica. After his death some of his writings and documents were published: Stepinac govori: Život i rad, te zbirka govora, propovijedi, pisama i okružnica velikog hrvatskog rodoljuba i mučenika dra Alojzija Stepinca (Stepinac speaks: The life, work, and collection of speeches, sermons, letters, and circulars of the great patriot and martyr, Dr. Alojzije Stepinac; 1967) and Alojzije Stepinac: Propovijedi, govori, poruke 1941–1946 (Alojzije Stepinac: Sermons, speeches, 1941–1946; 1996). STEPONAVIČIUS Julijonas (18 October 1911, Gervečiai–18 June 1991, Vilnius), Lithuanian archbishop of Vilnius. Steponavičius graduated in theology from Wilno (Vilnius) University and was ordained in June 1936. In 1936–39 he worked as a school chaplain in Grodno and then as a parish priest in Palūše, Daugėliškis, and Adutiškis. On 11 September 1955 he was consecrated auxiliary bishop of Panevėžys. Two years later the Holy See appointed him apostolic administrator of the Panevėžys and Vilnius dioceses with the right of a resident bishop. He took over these posts after the death of the ordinary bishop, Kazimieras Paltarokas, in 1958. In 1961 Steponavičius was arrested by the Soviet authorities and deported to the village of Žagarė, situated outside these dioceses. Kept under house arrest for years, he could not perform his duties, but for Lithuanian Catholics he remained a symbol of their martyrdom under Soviet power. After Algirdas Brazauskas became the new head of the Communist Party of Lithuania in October 1988 and after he turned the Vilnius cathedral over to the Catholics, in December 1988 Steponavičius was allowed to return to the capital. He visited Rome and was received by Pope John Paul II, and on 5 February 1989 he solemnly took over the duties of the archbishop of Vilnius. (WR)

STERE Constantin (13 June 1865, Khorodishte, Bessarabia–26 June 1936, Bucov, Romania), Romanian politician, journalist, and writer. The son of a landowner of Greek descent, Stere graduated from high school in

Kishinev, where, as early as 1881, he met members of the Russian organization Narodna Vola (People's Will). As a member of youth groups, he organized self-education meetings in Kishinev and Odessa. These meetings were suppressed by the Russian police. In 1886 Stere was sentenced to three years in exile in Tobolsk. In March 1889 he co-organized a prisoners' revolt; as a result, he was condemned to a further three years. While in exile in the Krasnoyarsk region, Stere met, among others, Vladimir Lenin and Józef Piłsudski. In 1892 he escaped to Romania. In the following year he began to study at the School of Law of the University of Iași, graduating in 1897. In 1893 he began publishing articles in the periodical Evenimentul literar, and later he co-edited Viața Românească, one of the most important Romanian literary periodicals. In 1898 Stere joined the National Liberal Party, and as its nominee was deputy mayor of Iași from 1898 to 1899. At the end of the nineteenth century Stere became involved in the movement against the Russian occupation of Bessarabia and helped Romanian youth from Bessarabia to study in Romania. In 1901 he won a seat as a deputy to the Romanian parliament and was given a professorship in law at the University of Iași, where he later served as rector. He also designed a program of social reforms based on the development of schools and agricultural cooperatives. After the 1905 revolution in Russia, Stere—supported by radical liberals from his party—attempted to establish a political representation of peasants and warned against tensions in rural areas; such tensions led to a bloody revolt in Moldavia in 1907. Influenced by Social Democratic concepts of revolution, Stere worked out a program for the non-capitalist development of rural areas through the support of small farms and agricultural cooperatives and through a greater involvement of peasants in political life. Stere put this program forward in the work Social-democratism sau poporanism? (Social democracy or populism? 1908). In February 1914 he submitted to the government of Ion I.C. Brațianu a program of universal suffrage and the parceling out of large estates.

During World War I Stere represented a pro-German orientation. He presented arguments in favor of this position in Marele razboi și politica României (The great war and Romanian policy; 1918). Stere remained in German-occupied Bucharest and published the German-sponsored periodical Lumina, which was strongly involved in combating the influences of the Romanian government, at that time based in Iași. In this periodical Stere also attacked the royal family and the army. These attacks were prompted by Romania's alliance with tsarist Russia. In March 1918 Stere approved the unification of Bessarabia with Romania, announced by the pro-German government of Alexandru Marghiloman. In the last stages of the war Stere joined the Bessarabian National Council (Sfatul Țării) and supported the union of Bessarabia and the Old Kingdom of Romania, thus avoiding accusations of collaboration with the defeated Central Powers. After the end of the war, Stere established ties with the Peasant Party, led by Ion Mihalache, and later with the National Peasant Party (Partidul Național Țărănesc [NPP]), led by Mihalache and Iuliu Maniu. Stere contributed to the merger of Mihalache's and Maniu's parties into the NPP in 1926. He also organized the NPP structures in the Bessarabian territory. Stere was one of the main theorists of Romanian peasant socialism (țărănismul). As a result of his conflict with NPP leaders who came from Transylvania and represented a more moderate political program, Stere left this party and in 1931 founded the Radical Peasant Party (Partidul Radical-Țărănesc), but it was of little importance. Stere wrote the vast autobiographical novel In preajma revoluției (In the revolutionary circle, 8 vols.; 1935–38). (FA/TD/WR)

STERNIUK Volodymyr (12 February 1907, Pustomyty, near Lemberg [Lviv, Lwów]–29 September 1997, Lviv), bishop of the Ukrainian Greek Catholic Church. Sterniuk studied philosophy and theology in Belgium, where he joined the Redemptorist order in 1927. Ordained into the priesthood in 1931, he completed theological studies in 1932 and then returned to Galicia to do his pastoral work in the dioceses of Tarnopol (Ternopil) and Stanisławów (now Ivano-Frankivsk). When the Soviet authorities abolished the Ukrainian Greek Catholic Church in 1946, Sterniuk refused to recognize the decision to incorporate its structures into the Orthodox Church. As a result, he was arrested. After five years in exile in Yertsevo in Siberia, he returned to Pustomyty, where he worked at various odd jobs, including that of night watchman, all the while continuing his pastoral work in the underground Uniate Church. In 1967 Archbishop Vasyl Velychkovskyyi secretly consecrated him bishop. In 1972 Metropolitan Josyf Slipyi appointed Sterniuk locum tenens (acting archbishop) of Lviv and Halych. Sterniuk held this position until August 1989, when the Soviet authorities agreed to the relegalization of the Ukrainian Greek Catholic Church. In 1989–91 Sterniuk led negotiations with the political authorities and the hierarchs of the Russian Orthodox Church concerning the return of church property and institutions abolished after 1946. In 1991 Sterniuk handed over his duties to Metropolitan Myroslav Lubachivskyyi. (WR)

STETSKO Yaroslav, pseudonyms “Z. Karbovych” and others (16 January 1912, Tarnopol [Ternopil]–5 July 1986, Munich, Germany), Ukrainian politician and journalist. Born into the family of a Uniate clergyman, Stetsko studied at the Universities of Kraków and Lwów (Lviv), where he joined the underground Ukrainian Nationalist Youth, the Ukrainian Military Organization, and the Organization of Ukrainian Nationalists (OUN). He was aligned with the so-called youth group within the OUN. In 1932 Stetsko became a member of the OUN leadership (Provid), responsible for ideology and propaganda. Repeatedly arrested, Stetsko was sentenced to five years' imprisonment in 1936 but was released under an amnesty in 1937 and then emigrated. While abroad, Stetsko worked with Roman Shukhevych and with the “youth groups” at home. He helped to organize a convention of the OUN in Rome, although he did not accept its resolutions. After the defeat of Poland in 1939, Stetsko worked with Stepan Bandera. He helped to found the Bandera faction of the OUN (OUN-B) and was a member of the leadership of the OUN-B. He also organized the OUN Mobile Units (Pokhidni Grupy) and the Ukrainian National Committee. On 30 June 1941, after the Germans occupied Lviv, Stetsko issued a proclamation of the restoration of Ukrainian statehood and announced the establishment of a government, of which he became prime minister. On 12 July 1941 Stetsko was arrested and taken to Berlin. Since he refused to annul the proclamation of Ukrainian statehood, he was incarcerated (along with Bandera) in the Zellenbau block of the Sachsenhausen concentration camp. He was released in the fall of 1944.

After the end of World War II, Stetsko settled in Munich. In the late 1940s he emigrated to the United States. After the Foreign Units of the OUN (Zakordonnyye Chastyny OUN [ZCh OUN]) were established, Stetsko (together with Bandera) joined the ZCh OUN Leadership Bureau. Stetsko became the leader of the OUN in the United States. From 1946 until the end of his life he was head of the Anti-Bolshevik Bloc of Nations. After the death of Bandera, Stetsko became the leader (providnyk) of the ZCh OUN. From 1967 onwards he served on the executive board of the World Anti-Communist League, and in 1969 he became head of the OUN-B. Stetsko wrote Trydtsiatoho chervnia 1941 (June 30, 1941; 1967), an account of the attempts to establish a Ukrainian government in 1941. Stetsko authored numerous ideological and propaganda brochures. He was against the democratization of the OUN and was known for his dogmatism. Stetsko's works Ukraińska vyzvolna kontsepsiia (The Ukrainian liberation concept; 1987) and Ukraine and the Subjugated Nations (1989) were published posthumously. (GM)

ȘTIRBEI Barbu (4 November 1872, Bucharest–25 March 1946, Bucharest), Romanian prince and politician. Știrbei was descended from the Wallachian family of hospodars (rulers) and was closely connected with the royal court; between 1913 and 1919 he was an administrator of royal domains. He was closely connected with King Ferdinand I (1914–27) and his wife, Queen Maria. He was friends with Ioan I. C. Brătianu, prime minister in 1922–26 and 1926–27. Politically neutral, during King Ferdinand's grave illness Știrbei served as prime minister (4–21 June 1927). Earlier, he was co-author of the Dynastic Act of 4 January 1926, which excluded the heir to the throne, Charles, from the succession. When, despite this act, Charles succeeded to the throne in 1930, Știrbei left for France and Great Britain. From then on he represented a pro-British orientation. King Michael, Marshal Antonescu, and Iuliu Maniu appointed Știrbei a secret negotiator in talks with the Allies in Cairo in the spring of 1944. Ultimately, the results of the talks were unfavorable to Romania. Știrbei was an adviser to King Michael during the coup of 23 August 1944, and then he was a member of a Romanian delegation that on 12 September 1944 was successful in negotiating a cease-fire. He also advised King Michael at the time of the king's conflict with the government of Petru Groza and during the "royal strike." Știrbei also supported the main opposition parties—that is, the Liberals and the Peasants. (FA/TD)

STOICA Chivu (8 August 1908, Buzau–18 February 1975, Bucharest), Romanian Communist activist. After finishing primary school, Stoica worked on the railroads.

In 1929 he joined the Union of Communist Youth and in 1931 the Communist Party of Romania (Partidul Comunist din România). In 1933, along with Gheorghe Gheorghiu-Dej, Stoica was one of the leaders of a strike in the Grivița factory in Bucharest. Arrested in the same year, he was sentenced to fifteen years' imprisonment for Communist activities. In April 1944 Stoica attended a prisoners' meeting led by Gheorghiu-Dej; at the meeting they decided to take over control of the party, which in 1943 had changed its name to the Romanian Communist Party (Partidul Comunist Român [RCP]). Stoica was released in August 1944, after the Red Army entered Romania. In 1945 he became a member of the Central Committee (CC) of the RCP. He was a deputy member (1948–52) and a member (1952–68) of the CC Politburo, and in 1967 he became secretary of the CC of the Romanian Workers' Party (Partidul Muncitoresc Român [RWP]; again renamed the Romanian Communist Party in 1965). Stoica served as minister of industry (April 1948–November 1949), then minister of metallurgical and chemical industries (until May 1952) and minister of metallurgical and engineering industries (October 1953–October 1955). He was deputy chairman of the Council of Ministers (March 1950–August 1954) and then first deputy prime minister (until October 1955). After the Twentieth Congress of the CPSU, Stoica opposed de-Stalinization, supporting Gheorghiu-Dej. From 2 October 1955 to 21 March 1961 Stoica served as prime minister. After Gheorghiu-Dej's death and Nicolae Ceaușescu's coming to power, Stoica served as chairman of the Council of State from 24 March 1965 to 9 December 1967. In 1968 he was stripped of all his positions as a result of Ceaușescu's purge of the party leaders closely linked with Gheorghiu-Dej. Stoica returned to public life after the new leadership consolidated its power. In 1974 he assumed the minor post of chairman of the Central Party Board. (LW)

STOICHKOV Grigor (2 February 1926, Gorna Malina), Bulgarian Communist activist. During World War II Stoichkov joined the Communist Partisans. After the war, he gradually rose through the ranks of the party and the state administration. He served as minister of transportation (1969–73), minister of public works and architecture (1973–84), and minister of public works and urbanization

(1984–86). He was deputy prime minister from 1976 to 1989 and a deputy member of the Politburo of the Central Committee of the Bulgarian Communist Party from 1984. As head of a natural disasters commission, Stoichkov was responsible for withholding information from the Bulgarian public about the true extent and consequences of the catastrophe at the Chernobyl nuclear power station in April 1986. The true information was given only to the top-ranking regime officials, who were thus able to protect their families from radiation. After the fall of Todor Zhivkov in November 1989, Stoichkov was accused of causing a threat to public health. Forced to resign his party and governmental positions in December 1989, he was brought to trial in April 1991 and was sentenced to three years in prison in December 1991. In June 1992 his sentence was commuted to two years. (WR)

STOJADINOVIĆ Milan (23 July 1888, Čačak–October 1961, Buenos Aires), Yugoslav politician of Serb nationality. Stojadinović graduated from the University of Belgrade, and then he studied in England, France, and Germany. From 1914 he worked in the Serbian Ministry of Finance. In 1920–22 he lectured on economics at the University of Belgrade and was active in the Radical Party. In December 1922 he became finance minister, and, except for one interruption, he held the post until April 1926. Stojadinović was elected to parliament in 1923, 1925, and 1927, and he was (among other things) president of the parliament's finance committee. He edited Samouprava, a periodical of strong nationalist tendencies.

After the elections of May 1935 Prince Paul, whose wife was friends with Stojadinović's, appointed Stojadinović prime minister. In this capacity Stojadinović, who was regarded as an outstanding political personality, implemented a strong-arm policy toward the opposition and supported a gradual rapprochement with the Axis countries, particularly on the economic plane. In 1936 Stojadinović escaped an attempt on his life. In April 1937 he signed a non-aggression treaty with Italy. The treaty guaranteed the existing borders and recognized Italian rights in Albania, but it also stipulated the withdrawal of Italian support for the Croatian separatists of Ante Pavelić. Although Stojadinović attempted to implement the policy of "equal distance" toward the Axis countries and the Western democracies, in practice between 1937 and 1938 he expressed himself in favor of Germany and Italy. Therefore he remained indifferent to the annexation of Austria and to the partition of Czechoslovakia, Yugoslavia's ally in the Little Entente. He believed that good relations with the Third Reich might guarantee the security of Yugoslavia. When the parliament ratified, under his influence, a concordat with the Holy See, the Orthodox Patriarchate of Serbia excommunicated all those who had voted in favor of the motion, including Stojadinović. Stojadinović himself removed all the opponents of this decision from the government party. With street demonstrations and under pressure from the Orthodox Church, the Senate did not support the act, and Stojadinović lost the political battle. He was also against a compromise between the Serbs and Croats. After the elections of December 1938, when the opposition gained 45 percent of the vote and did not support very far-reaching cooperation with Berlin, Stojadinović's position was weakened. During a visit of the Italian minister of foreign affairs, Galeazzo Ciano, in January 1939 Stojadinović showed too much ambition toward leadership; therefore Regent Paul brought about his removal in February 1939. During a coup in March 1941 Stojadinović was interned, and then he was delivered to the British authorities, which held him in Mauritius until 1948. Later he was allowed to go to South Africa and then to Argentina, where he published the periodical La Economista. Stojadinović's memoirs, Ni rat ni pakt: Jugoslavija između dva rata (Neither war nor compromise: Yugoslavia between two wars), were published posthumously in 1963 in Buenos Aires. (WR)

STOJAN Antonín Cyril (22 May 1851, Beňov u Přerova–29 September 1923, Olomouc), Czech archbishop and politician. Born into a large, poor family, thanks to the financial help of his uncle, Stojan graduated from high school in Kroměříž (1872) and then entered a metropolitan seminary in Olomouc. He took holy orders in July 1876. While a student at the seminary, he became interested in the work of the Slavic Apostles and made pilgrimages to Velehrad, a Cistercian abbey in Moravia where, according to legend, Saint Methodius was buried. Stojan worked in the town of Příboř, where he succeeded in (among other things) organizing a gymnasium in Svěbohov in 1887–88 and then a gymnasium in Dražovice in the diocese of Brno by 1908. At that time Stojan earned a doctorate from the Higher Seminary in Olomouc. He believed that the work of Saints Cyril and Methodius was common to all Slavic nations and that it should be a foundation for their spiritual, cultural, and national revival, as well as for their return to a union with Rome. In 1892 Stojan founded the Saints Cyril and Methodius Mission, which promoted the idea of Christian unity among the Slavic nations, first in Bohemia, later in Slovakia, and after 1918 also in the Kingdom of Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes, as well as among the Czech and Slovak émigrés in the United States. The mission organized three international union congresses in Velehrad (1907, 1909, and 1911) and then three other international conferences (1914, 1921, and 1922); these resulted in the establishment of the international Velehrad Academy (Akademie Velehradská) and the scholarly periodical Acta Academiae Velehradensis.

Stojan was also active in Svatý Hostýn, the largest Marian sanctuary in Moravia, around which he developed a mass pilgrimage movement. He established the Center of Svatý Hostýn, whose numerous units were active in Bohemia and Moravia. He initiated fund raising for the construction of a Jesuit monastery, which was erected in Hostýn in 1885. In March 1897 Stojan obtained a seat in the Austrian parliament in Vienna on the ticket of the National Catholic Party. He again became an MP in Vienna in 1901, 1907, and 1911. From 1900 to 1907 he also served as an MP in the Moravian Provincial Diet in Brno. In the autumn of 1918, at the time when the Czechoslovak Republic was being created, Stojan took part in many rallies and demonstrations. He supported the establishment of a common state of Czechs and Slovaks and promoted this idea among Slovak Catholic activists. Stojan initiated the establishment of the Czechoslovak People's Party (Československá Strana Lidová [ČSL]), which was a joint political representation of Czech and Slovak Catholics. In October 1918 Stojan was a member of the National Council in Olomouc. In November 1918 he joined the National Assembly in Prague. In April 1920 he obtained a senatorial seat on the ČSL ticket and held this seat until the end of his life. A gifted speaker, Stojan enjoyed general respect. As an MP, he was particularly devoted to the development of the educational system and, after 1918, to the normalization of relations between the Church and the state. He also strove for the establishment of a scholarship system for youth from poor families.

In September 1920 Stojan was elected vicar capitular of the archdiocese of Olomouc and became provisional head of the archdiocese. On 10 March 1921 Pope Benedict XV appointed him metropolitan of Olomouc. On 3 April 1921 Stojan was consecrated bishop. He continued to promote the idea of the revival of Czech Catholicism in the spirit of Cyril and Methodius—for example, through retreats that he conducted in Velehrad. As tens of thousands of people attended these retreats, they can be said to have shaped the Czech intelligentsia at the turn of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. On 25 July 1923 Stojan had a stroke that left him partially paralyzed. Soon afterwards he died. He was buried in the royal chapel in Velehrad. His beatification process began in July 1965 and was completed on the diocesan level in October 1985. Stojan was the author of many popular and scholarly articles. (AGr)

STOJANOVIĆ Ljubomir (6 August 1860, Užice, Serbia—3 June 1930, Prague), Serbian politician, historian, and philologist. After graduating from high school in Belgrade, Stojanović studied at the Department of History and Philosophy of the Superior School (Velika Škola) in Belgrade, graduating in 1883. He later studied in Vienna, St. Petersburg, Berlin, and Leipzig. In 1888 he began working as a teacher at a high school in Belgrade. In 1891 he became an associate professor and in 1893 a full professor at the Superior School. In 1892–1905 Stojanović served as chairman of the Serbian Literary Association (Srpska Književna Zadruga). In 1897 he entered politics, becoming a member of the Radical Party (Radikalna Stranka), which was in opposition to the government at that time. After the Radical Party merged with the Progressive Party in 1901 and became reconciled with the absolutism of King Alexander Obrenović, Stojanović (together with a group of younger activists of the Radical Party) left the party in 1902 and founded the Independent Radical Party (Samostalna Radikalna Stranka [SRS]). Stojanović became vice-chairman and then chairman (1904–12) of the SRS. After King Alexander was assassinated in 1903, the SRS joined the government of Jovan Avakumović, and Stojanović held the post of minister of education from June to October 1903. After the parliamentary elections, Stojanović continued to hold this post in the government of Sava Grujić until January 1904. On 25 May 1905 Stojanović became head of the government, serving simultaneously as minister of interior. He resigned on 7 March 1906, when Grujić again became prime minister. Stojanović briefly held the portfolio of minister of education, resigning in April of that year. He again assumed the portfolio of education in the government of Stojan Novaković (February–October 1909). Because of a disagreement with other SRS leaders, in 1912 Stojanović left the SRS and retired from public life. In 1913 he became secretary of the Serbian Academy of Sciences.

After World War I, Stojanović (along with, among others, Jaša Prodanović) was a co-founder of the Yugoslav Republican Democratic Party (Jugoslovenska Republikanska Demokratska Stranka [JRDS]), which called for the introduction of a republican and federal system. Stojanović was a member of the party leadership until 1923, when he resigned in protest against a law that forbade public officials to comment on the political system of the state. Stojanović authored a great number of articles and books on the political system and history of Serbia and on the Serbian language, including the following: Državna uprava u demokratiji (State government in a democratic system; 1911); O državnim činovnicima (On state officials; 1911); Nekoliko misli o našem novom državnom uređenju (Some reflections on our new state political system; 1919); and Republikanski pogledi na nekoliko savremenih pitanja (Republican views on some contemporary issues; 1920). Stojanović also wrote the biographies Život i rad Vuka St. Karadžića (The life and work of Vuk S. Karadžić; 1924) and Stari srpski letopisi i rodoslovi (Old Serbian, chronicles and genealogies; 1927). (WR)

ŠTOLL Ladislav (26 June 1902, Jablonec on Nisou–6 January 1981, Prague), Czech Communist activist, literary critic, and journalist. After graduating from high school, Štoll worked as a bank clerk. In 1926 he joined the Communist Party of Czechoslovakia, and in 1929 he began working for its press organs. Between 1934 and 1937 he lectured in Moscow, from where he returned as an avowed Stalinist. In 1946 he became a professor and later the rector of the Higher Party Political and Social School. In the late 1940s and early 1950s, Štoll became the official literary critic, and he recognized Socialist realism only. He became known as a dogmatic Marxist and became a symbol of Stalinism in culture. He was also associated with the vulgarization of literary criticism. The term "Štollism" became a part of colloquial speech and was used in combination with the Soviet word zhdanovshchina. From 1952 on, Štoll held high posts in the government and in cultural institutions. He served as minister of higher education, minister of education, and minister of culture. From 1962 to 1968 and after 1972, he was director of the Institute of Czech and World Literature in the Czechoslovak Academy of Sciences. Štoll performed all the scientific and academic functions although he did not have higher education qualifications. (PU)

STOLOJAN Theodor (24 October 1943, Târgoviște), Romanian politician. Stolojan graduated with a bachelor's degree from the Bucharest Academy of Economic Studies in 1966. He worked at the Ministry of Food Industry (1966–72) and was a lecturer at the Bucharest Academy of Economic Studies (1974–80 and 1990–91). He held a variety of positions in the Ministry of Finance, including that of inspector general at the Department of State Revenue (1988–89). After the collapse of Nicolae Ceaușescu's regime, Stolojan served as vice-minister (December 1989–June 1990) and minister of finance (June 1990–April 1991). From 1 October 1991 to 19 November 1992 Stolojan served as prime minister of a coalition government supported mainly by the post-Communists and the Christian Democratic National Peasants' Party. He failed to halt an economic crisis or curb inflation. From 1992 to 1999 Stolojan worked at the World Bank. In August 2000 he joined the National Liberal Party (Partidul Național Liberal [NLP]), on whose ticket he ran for the presidency of Romania in November 2000, but he came in third, with 11.8 percent of the vote. In August 2002 Stolojan became chairman of the NLP. (AB)

STOMMA Stanisław (18 January 1908, Szacuny [now in Lithuania]), Polish lawyer, politician, and journalist. In 1932 Stomma received a law degree from Stefan Batory University, and in 1937 he earned a Ph.D. there. He was awarded a postdoctoral degree by the Jagiellonian University in Kraków, where he worked until 1950. From 1953 to 1978 Stomma was an associate professor and a full professor there. Before World War II, Stomma was a member of the Association of Catholic Academic Youth called Odrodzenie (Revival). In 1946 he became an editor of the monthly Znak. Stomma authored, among other works, the famous article "Maksymalne i minimalne tendencje społeczne katolików" (Maximal and minimal social tendencies of Catholics; 1946), in which he called for the intellectual strengthening of Polish Catholicism instead of a struggle against the Communists over the form of the political system in Poland. From 1945 to 1953 and then again after 1956 Stomma was a member of the editorial staff and one of the leading journalists of the weekly Tygodnik Powszechny.

In October 1956 Stomma co-founded the All-Polish

Club of Progressive Catholic Intelligentsia. In 1957 he joined the Club of the Catholic Intelligentsia (Klub Intelligencji Katolickiej [KIK]) in Warsaw and served as its vice-chairman from 1958 to 1962. He was also active in the Kraków KIK, which he headed between 1958 and 1964. Stomma was an MP in the Polish Assembly from 1957 to 1976. Stomma created the concept of neo-positivism, which recognized the necessity of respecting the political and geopolitical realities of the Polish People's Republic without accepting Marxism-Leninism. This concept of realism was a starting point for a demand for the gradual evolution of the system through the extension of the rule of law, civil rights, rights of the Church and the faithful, and the rationalization of the economy. This program was pursued in the Assembly by members of the Znak Parliamentary Caucus, for which Stomma served as president from 1957 to 1976. In 1958 Stomma initiated a dialogue with Germany with the aim of overcoming hostilities and subsequently reaching a normalization of relations based on the recognition of the border on the Oder and Neisse lines. In 1968 Stomma was co-author of a parliamentary question submitted by Znak members to the prime minister concerning persecutions of protesting students. In 1976 Stomma was the only MP who did not vote in support of amendments to the constitution, as a result of which he lost his parliamentary seat. From 1981 to 1985 he chaired the Primate's Social Council. From 1984 to 1989 he was chairman of the Club of Political Thought called Dziekania, which brought together various groups of the Catholic intelligentsia. From 1988 to 1990 Stomma was a member of the Civic Committee of the Chairman of Solidarity. In 1989 he took part in the Round Table negotiations. In 1989 he became a senator. Stomma was a member of the Civic Parliamentary Caucus and then the Democratic Union Caucus. Stomma authored works in the field of penal law and books of commentaries: Myśli o polityce i kulturze (Thoughts about politics and culture; 1960); Czy fatalizm wrogości: O stosunkach polsko-niemieckich 1871–1933 (The fatalism of animosity: Polish-German relations 1871–1933; 1980); and the memoirs Pościg za nadzieją (Chasing hope; 1991). STOYANOV Khristo (25 January 1892, Oriakhovo–5 March 1970, Shumen), Bulgarian Peasant Party activist. In 1914 Stoyanov graduated in law from Sofia University. In 1910 he founded a student group whose members represented views close to those of the Bulgarian Agrarian National Union (BANU). Stoyanov published in the periodicals Vertokeshchnik (1909–12) and Selski Glas. He fought as an officer in the Balkan Wars (1912–13) and in World War I. After 1918, he ran a law practice and was active in the Shumen region. Stoyanov served as minister of foreign affairs (March–June 1922) and minister of interior (March–June 1923) in the government of Aleksandur Stamboliyski. After the coup of 9 June 1923, Stoyanov was arrested but escaped from prison and emigrated to Yugoslavia. While in exile, he called for a common front with the Bulgarian Communist Party (BCP). After returning to Bulgaria, Stoyanov attended the unification conference of the BANU–Vrabcha 1 and the BANU–Aleksandur Stamboliyski in 1933, and he became head of a BANU district party organization in Shumen. During tsarist rule Stoyanov was arrested several times. After 1944, he was active in the BANU led by Nikola Petkov. Stoyanov had a rather compromising attitude toward the Communists but failed to create a program that would be acceptable both to the Communists and to the independent peasant party. Arrested in 1947, Stoyanov was sent to the Belene concentration camp, which he left as a completely broken man. (AG)

STOYANOV Petko (30 November 1879, Oryakhovo–7 December 1973, Sofia), Bulgarian lawyer, economist, and politician. In 1902 Stoyanov completed law studies in St. Petersburg and subsequently specialized in finance and economics in Munich (1902–3). From 1905 to 1909 he was a prosecutor and a member of the Sofia District Court. In 1923 he was the prosecutor in a trial against the ministers of the government of Vasil Radoslavov (1913–18). In 1909 Stoyanov became an associate professor. From 1916 to 1947 he worked as a professor of finance at Sofia University. He also served as the dean (1915–16 and 1935–36) of the School of Law of Sofia University. Stoyanov was one of the founders, a professor (from 1929), and deputy director (1923–47) of the Balkan Middle East Institute of Political Sciences, which was renamed the Free University in 1924. Stoyanov was elected a corresponding member (1923) and then served as a full member (1935–49) of the Bulgarian Academy of Sciences. He also served as secretary (1938–44) of the Philosophical and Social Department of the Bulgarian Academy of Sciences, chairman (1926–44) of the Bulgarian–Turkish Society, and editor-in-chief (1929–38) of the periodical Stopanska misul. Initially Stoyanov was a leading activist of the Radical Democratic Party, but he left it in 1927 and joined the Democratic Party. He also served as a deputy to the National Assembly (1919–23, 1931–39). During World War II Stoyanov was in opposition to the pro-German government. He criticized the parliament's enactment of a law on the protection of the nation and protested the deportation of Bulgarian Jews. In 1942 he joined the Communist-dominated Fatherland Front.

After the coup of 9 September 1944, Stoyanov became minister of finance in the cabinet of Kimon Georgiev and held this position until 17 August 1945. He was also a member of the Bulgarian delegation that signed an armistice between Bulgaria and the Soviet Union, Great Britain, and the United States in Moscow on 28 October 1944. In March 1945 Stoyanov unsuccessfully tried to revive the Radical Party. After leaving the government, he boycotted the elections to the National Assembly in 1945 and then joined the opposition Bulgarian Agrarian National Union (BANU), led by Nikola Petkov. On 11 June 1947 Stoyanov was stripped of his parliamentary seat for his anti-government speeches at the Sixth Grand National Assembly. In 1949 he was deprived of membership in the Bulgarian Academy of Sciences and sent to the Belene concentration camp. Released after a few years, he remained in retirement. He was rehabilitated posthumously in March 1990. Stoyanov's publications include Osnovni nachala na finansovata nauka (Basic principles of the science of finance; 1933); Biudzhetut na suvremenata durzhava (The budget of a modern state; 1938); and Danuchno pravo (Tax law; 1943). STOYANOV Petur (25 May 1952, Plovdiv), politician and lawyer, president of Bulgaria. After receiving a law degree from Sofia University in 1972, Stoyanov worked as an attorney in Plovdiv until 1992. In 1989 he became a member of the Club for the Support of Glasnost and Perestroika and a member of the coalition Union of Democratic Forces (Sayuz na Demokratichnite Sili [UDF]). Stoyanov was a spokesman for the UDF in Plovdiv (1990–92), deputy minister of justice in the government of Filip Dimitrov (1992–93), vice-chairman of the National Club for Democracy (1993), chairman of the UDF Legal Council (1993–94), deputy to the National Assembly (1994–97), vice-chairman of the UDF parliamentary group, and vice-chairman of the UDF coalition responsible for domestic policy (1995–96). He was a UDF candidate in the presidential primary elections on 1 June 1996. In the presidential elections held on 26 October and 3 November 1996, Stoyanov defeated the post-Communist candidate Ivan Marazov, and on 19 January 1997 he assumed the office of president. The beginning of his term coincided with a political and economic crisis in the country. Stoyanov mediated in negotiations among political forces concerning the conclusion of an agreement about early parliamentary elections and measures to overcome the crisis. He dissolved the parliament, established an interim administration under Stefan Sofiyanski consisting of UDF politicians (12 February–21 May 1997), and called elections to the National Assembly, which brought victory to the UDF. Having brought the economic crisis under control, Stoyanov sought closer relations with and then admission to NATO and the European Union. This goal became more immediate after Bulgaria supported NATO air raids on Yugoslavia in the spring of 1999. In the next presidential elections Stoyanov reached the second round and then lost to the post-Communist candidate, Georgi Parvanov, on 18 November 2001. (JJ)

STRANDMANN Otto August (30 November 1875, Vadli, near Undla–5 February 1941, Kadrina), Estonian politician. Strandmann attended high school in Tallinn and St. Petersburg and then passed his final examinations at an Estonian high school in Tallinn. He subsequently worked in the Tallinn branch of the Russian State Bank for some time and later studied law at the University of St. Petersburg (1899–1901) and at Dorpat (later Tartu) University (1901–3). After graduating, Strandmann ran a law practice in Narva and Tallinn. He had to begin earning a living at a young age. In his youth he also established ties with the radical movement led by Konstantin Päts, and worked on the editorial staff of Teataja, the leading press organ of the Estonian left. From 1904 to 1905 Strandmann sat on the Tallinn City Council as a member of the first-ever Socialist group to be elected to this council. After the defeat of the Russian revolution of 1905, Strandmann had to emigrate. From 1905 to 1909 he lived in Switzerland and other West European countries and then returned to Tallinn, where he again ran a law practice. Shortly before the February 1917 revolution, he became prosecutor of the Tallinn District Court. After the fall of tsarism in February 1917, Strandmann was quickly promoted within the structures of the newly established Estonian state. In 1917–18 he served as chairman of the Estonian Provincial Assembly (Eesti Maanõukogu). From 1918 to 1919 he was successively minister of justice and minister of agriculture in the Provisional Government. During the German occupation of Estonia, Strandmann was arrested in 1918. After the German forces were driven out of Estonia, he became a member of the Constituent Assembly (Asutav Kogu).

From 9 May to 18 November 1919 Strandmann held the post of prime minister, and from 1920 to 1921 he served as minister of war. As leader of the Estonian Labor Party (Eesti Tööerakond), Strandmann won the largest number of seats in the first parliament and became its speaker. He was also elected head of state (riigivanem). He greatly contributed to the passing of bills introducing agricultural reforms in a much more radical form than those adopted in other Central European countries. The Estonian reforms did not provide for any compensations, and not only land, but also live stock was expropriated. In this way the influence of the German landed gentry in Estonia was destroyed, and tensions in the countryside were eased because the granting of land ownership to leaseholders was accompanied by the granting of land to landless peasants. As minister of finance (1924), Strandmann was the driving force behind the reforms, which were based on cutting public expenditure, restricting credit, reducing imports, and promoting exports, while abandoning the subsidization of industry and recognizing agriculture as the main lever for the development of the national economy. However, these reforms did not prevent a drop in the popularity of the Labor Party, which suffered splits and a steady decline in public support from one election to the next. Still, Strandmann managed to win a seat in each of the five successive terms of parliament. He also became minister of foreign affairs and minister of finance. From 1927 to 1929 he was ambassador to Poland. This appointment reflected Estonia's efforts to achieve a rapprochement with Poland because Strandmann held unequivocally pro-Polish personal sympathies. From 9 July 1929 to 12 February 1931 Strandmann served as head of state and continued a pro-Polish line in foreign policy. In 1933 he became ambassador to Paris, Belgium, and the Vatican. He served as ambassador until November 1939. After the Red Army occupied Estonia in June 1940, Strandmann avoided arrest for some time. In 1941 he committed suicide when NKVD officers came to arrest him. (AG)

STRÁNSKÝ Jaroslav (15 January 1884, Brünn [Brno]–13 August 1973, London), Czech lawyer, journalist, and politician. In 1907 Stránský received a law degree from the Czech University in Prague. Before World War I he wrote commentaries on the domestic policies of the Habsburg monarchy, mainly for Lidové noviny, a periodical published by his father, Adolf Stránský. At that time Stránský was also active in the People's Progressive Party in Moravia (Pokroková Strana Lidu na Moravě). In 1918, along with the whole party, Stránský joined the Czechoslovak National Democratic Party (Československá Národní Demokracie) and became one of its leaders. In March 1921 he resigned his parliamentary seat in protest against the policy of the Prague center. Shortly afterwards, along with Karel Engliš, Stránský established an opposition "Moravian wing" in the Czechoslovak National Democratic Party. In 1925 the conflict reached its apogee, and Stránský, together with a group of Moravian activists, left the party and founded the National Labor Party (Národní Strana Práce [NSP]). After a failure in the parliamentary elections, the NSP joined the Czechoslovak National Socialist Party (Československá Strana Národně Socialistická) in 1929. From 1918 to 1921 and from 1929 to 1938 Stránský sat in the National Assembly. From 1929 to 1938 he also served as deputy chairman of the foreign affairs committee of the Chamber of Deputies. In 1925 he became the owner of the František Borový publishing house, and he also succeeded his father as the publisher and editor-in-chief of Lidové noviny. In his journalism Stránský protested against fascism and corruption and attacked particular politicians, including Jiří Stříbrný. In 1921 he became an associate professor and in 1934 a full professor of criminal law. From 1945 to 1948 he was full professor at Masaryk University in Brno.

In 1938 Stránský was a member of the Committee for the Defense of the Republic (Výbor na Obranu Republiky) and protested Czechoslovakia's capitulation to Munich. On 16 December 1938 he resigned his parliamentary seat, and in 1939 he went into exile in Great Britain. From 1941 to 1945 Stránský served as minister of justice of the Czechoslovak government-in-exile. Like President Edvard Beneš, he harbored the illusion that after the war it would be possible to establish relations with the Soviet Union while maintaining democracy. In March 1945 Stránský took part in Moscow negotiations that resulted in the formation of a coalition government with the Communists. After the war, Stránský was a member of the Presidium of the National Socialist Party and a deputy to the National Assembly. He also served as minister of justice in the government of Zdeněk Fierlinger (April 1945–May 1946), and then he became deputy prime minister. From May 1946 to February 1948 he served as minister of education in the cabinet of Klement Gottwald. A firm critic of the Communists, Stráský repeatedly protested against Communist practices. On 20 February 1948, along with other ministers representing democratic parties, he resigned his position. After the Communist coup d'état, Stráský, along with his family, emigrated to Great Britain in March 1948. He worked with Czechoslovak émigré organizations there; for example, he helped to found the Czechoslovak section of the BBC and broadcast on Radio Free Europe under the pseudonym of Jan Zedník. (PU)

STRÁSKÝ Jan (24 December 1940, Plzeň), Czech economist and politician. From 1963 to 1970 Stráský studied at a school of commerce in Plzeň and pursued philosophical and political economy studies at Charles University, Prague. From 1958 to 1990 he worked for the Czechoslovak central bank, initially in the town of Blovice, near Plzeň, and then at the head office in Prague. In 1964 Stráský became a member of the Communist Party of Czechoslovakia (CPC). During the so-called normalization he left the party in 1969 and was then expelled from it in 1970. In the 1970s and 1980s Stráský was active in the dissident movement, in the Democratic Initiative and elsewhere. From 1990 to 1991 he was a deputy director of Komerční Banka and an adviser to the prime minister of the Czech Republic. In the spring of 1991 he was a co-founder of the Civic Democratic Party (Občanská Demokratická Strana [ODS]), which was established from the remnants of the Civic Forum (Občanské Fórum [OF]). From May 1991 to July 1992 he served as deputy prime minister of the Czech government and chairman of its Economic Council.

From 1 July to 31 December 1992 Stráský was the last prime minister of the federal government of Czechoslovakia, simultaneously acting as minister of foreign trade. After Václav Havel resigned as president of the federation, Stráský became acting president on 20 July 1992. His government was formed as a result of an agreement between the strongest parties—the ODS in the Czech Republic and the Movement for Democratic Slovakia in Slovakia—and its mission was to supervise the peaceful dissolution of the federation of the republics. From June to December 1992 Stráský also served as a deputy to the Czech National Council. In November 1992 he became vice-chairman of the ODS and held this position until December 1997. After the dissolution of Czechoslovakia, he sat in the Czech parliament from January 1993 to June 1998. From January 1993 to October 1995 Stráský was minister of transportation and subsequently served as minister of health in successive cabinets of Václav Klaus until early January 1998. After the outbreak of a scandal linked to the illegal financing of the ODS in November 1997, which led to the breakup of the ruling coalition and the collapse of Klaus's government, Stráský, together with some of the party activists, left the ODS and founded the Freedom Union (Unie Svobody) in December 1997. In 1998 Stráský retired, and in January 2001 he became head of the Provincial Office of South Bohemia Province. (PU)

STŘÍBRNÝ Jiří (14 January 1880, Rokycany–21 January 1955, Valdice), Czech journalist and political activist. At the beginning of the twentieth century Stříbrný wrote articles for Socialist and nationalist newspapers. In 1911 he became editor of České slovo. From 1911 to 1918 he served as a National Socialist MP in the parliament in Vienna. During World War I he initially served in the Austro-Hungarian Army, but in 1917 he joined the anti-Habsburg resistance movement, and in 1918 he joined the Czechoslovak National Committee, which on 28 October 1918 passed a bill on the establishment of the Czechoslovak state. Stříbrný signed this bill on behalf of the National Socialists. He was deputy to the National Assembly from 1918 to 1928 and from 1929 to 1935. In 1920–26 he was deputy chairman of the Czechoslovak National Socialist Party (called the Czech National Socialist Party from 1897 to 1918 and the Czechoslovak Socialist Party from 1918 to 1926). Stříbrný was minister of post and telegraphs (until 1919), minister of railways (1919–20 and 1922–25), and minister of national defense (1925–26). From 1924 to 1925 he also served as deputy prime minister, and from 1920 to 1926 he was a National Socialist representative in the Pětka (Five) inter-party agreement.

Stříbrný's political career collapsed in 1926, when, following an electoral failure the year before, an open struggle for power broke out among the party members. As a result of his conflicts with President Edvard Beneš and chairman of the party Václav Klobučák, Stříbrný—who increasingly drifted toward the right—was expelled from the party at its congress in September 1926. In the same year he established the Tempo press company, which published Polední list and Expres. They soon became press organs of his new political enterprises. In 1927 Stříbrný founded the pro-Fascist Party of Slavic National Socialists, transformed in 1930 into the extreme nationalist National League, which won three parliamentary seats and one senatorial seat in the elections. At that time cooperation was established with the National Fascist Community, led by General Radola Gajda. In 1935 the National League merged with the Czechoslovak National Democratic Party, led by Karel Kramář, and with the National Front, led by František Mareš, to form the National Union, and Stříbrný became its vice-chairman. In 1937 the National League left this coalition and at the end of 1938 joined the Party of National Unity (Strana Národní Jednoty), led by Rudolf Beran. This party drew on authoritarian concepts. During World War II Stříbrný retired from public life and refused to take part in the Nazi propaganda campaign. Nevertheless, he was imprisoned in 1945 and sentenced to life imprisonment in 1947 for “crimes against the republic.” He died in prison. Stříbrný wrote the polemical book TGM a 28. říjen (Tomaš G. Masaryk and 28 October; 1938). He was also the author of extensive political memoirs, which he wrote in prison. (PU)

STROKACH Timofey (19 February 1903, Bialotserkevka, Primorsky krai, Russia–15 August 1963, Kiev), Soviet political and military activist in the Ukraine. From 1919 to 1922 Strokach fought with the Communist partisans in the Far East. A Red Army soldier from 1923 onwards, he served (among other places) in the border guards. He joined the Bolshevik party in his youth. At the Fourteenth Congress of the Russian Communist Party (Bolsheviks) in December 1925 Strokach joined its Central Committee (CC). In 1941–46 he was deputy people’s commissar of interior of the Ukrainian SSR. At the beginning of the German-Soviet war in 1941 he commanded the “destructive battalions” (istrebitelnye bataleny) and partisan units. Strokach was co-responsible for the decision to murder prisoners held in Lviv prisons before the Germans entered the town. From June 1942 to 1945 he headed the Ukrainian Staff of the Partisan Movement in the territories occupied by the Third Reich. He commanded units that organized sabotage against the Germans and fought against the Ukrainian and Polish pro-independence partisans. These units often incited hostilities between the Poles and the Ukrainians. In 1944 Strokach became lieutenant general. As minister of interior of the Ukrainian SSR (1946–56), he was responsible for the bloody suppression of units of the Ukrainian Insurgent Army. From 1956 to 1957 Strokach served as deputy minister of interior of the Soviet Union and head of the Main Board of Border Guards and the Interior Army of the Ministry for Internal Affairs of the Soviet Union. He was a deputy to the Supreme Soviet of the USSR and to the Supreme Soviet of the Ukrainian SSR. After the Twentieth Congress of the CPSU Strokach left the CC. He authored the memoirs Nash pozvynoi—svoboda (Our call—freedom; 1975). (GM)

STROKATA-KARAVANSKA Nina (31 January 1926, Odessa), Ukrainian dissident. During her studies at the Medical Institute in Odessa, Strokata-Karavanska married the poet Svyatoslav Karavanskyi, sentenced to twenty-five years for independentist activity in 1945. After graduation (1947) she worked as a microbiologist. After her husband was released during the second “thaw” of Nikita Khrushchev in 1962, she worked with him, but in 1965 he was arrested again. For her endeavors for his release she was harassed by the KGB. In May 1971 Strokata-Karavanska was arrested, and a year later she was sentenced to four years of labor camp. She was detained in the camp for women in the Mordvinian Autonomous SSR, where she participated in protest actions and hunger strikes. Thanks to information about her passed to the West, in 1974 she became a member of the American Society for Microbiology. After her release in December 1975 Strokata-Karavanska was banned from returning to the Ukraine and forced to settle in Tarusa, near Kaluga, where she was kept under police surveillance and persecuted. In November 1976 she joined the founders of the Ukrainian Helsinki Group and continued her protests. In November 1979 she was forced, along with her released husband, to leave the USSR. They went to the United States, where she was active in the support of human rights in the Ukraine. Strokata-Karavanska edited the volume Ukrainian Women in the Soviet Union: Documented Persecution (1980); she authored the memoirs A Family

Torn Apart (1981) and several short essays on Ukrainian women political prisoners. (WR)

STROŃSKI Stanisław (18 August 1882, Nisko–20 October 1955, London), Polish politician. Stroński graduated with a degree in Romance philology, and from 1909 he lectured at the Jagiellonian University in Kraków. In 1904, he joined the National Democratic Party and in the following year the National League. However, in 1908 he left the party in protest of its pro-Russian line. He then founded the newspaper Rzeczpospolita. Between 1913 and 1914 Stroński was a deputy to the Galician Home Parliament. After the outbreak of the war in 1914, he was interned by the Austro-Hungarian authorities as an enemy of the Central Powers. Released in 1917, he was active in the National Committee of Poland (Komitet Narodowy Polski), editing its main organ, L'Indépendance Polonaise, which also served as the voice of the Polish delegation to the Paris Peace Conference. Between 1922 and 1924, Stroński edited Rzeczpospolita and then, until 1928, the newspaper Warszawianka. He launched strident journalistic attacks against Józef Piłsudski and his policies. From 1927 to 1939 Stroński was a professor at the Catholic University of Lublin. In 1922, he was elected to the parliament as a Christian Democrat, but following the coup d'état of 1926, he returned to the nationalist movement. In 1928 he was coopted to the Grand Council of the Camp of Great Poland. In 1928 and 1930 he was elected to the parliament from the National Party (Stronnictwo Narodowe [SN]) lists. Stroński was a determined critic of the sanacja regime. At the end of the 1930s, he advocated collaboration between the SN and the (Christian Democratic) Front Morges. After the fall of Poland, in October 1939 Stroński became deputy prime minister and minister for information and documentation in the government of General Władysław Sikorski. He left the government following the general's death in July 1943. Stroński was a member of a commission to establish culpability in the September 1939 defeat of Poland. In July 1941, he supported a treaty with the Soviet Union. After the war, he remained in Great Britain, where he taught at the Polish University in Exile from 1950. Stroński authored many works of punditry, including the collection Pierwsze lat dziesięć 1918–1928 (The first ten years, 1918–1928; 1928). (WR) ŠTROUGAL Lubomír (19 October 1924, Veselí nad Lužnicí, Tábor district), Czech Communist activist. In 1945 Štrougal took up law studies at Charles University in Prague, graduating in 1949. In 1948 he began working in the apparatus of the Communist Party of Czechoslovakia (CPC). From 1957 to 1959 he was secretary general of the CPC committee in České Budějovice, and in 1958 he became a member of the party Central Committee (CC). Štrougal served as minister of agriculture, forests, and water management from March 1959 to June 1961 and minister of interior from June 1961 to April 1965. In 1963 he became a member of a commission of the CPC CC whose task was to finish the process of rehabilitating party members. Štrougal served as secretary of the CPC CC (April 1965–April 1968), deputy prime minister (April–December 1968), and chairman of the Economic Council (1968–69). In August 1968, after Prime Minister Oldřich Černík had been taken to Moscow, Štrougal substituted for him for several days. At that time he refused to join the “workers’ and peasants’ government” formed by Alois Indra. In November 1968 Štrougal was elected a member of the Presidium and reelected secretary of the CPC CC responsible for party work in the Czech territory. From 1960 to 1969 he was a deputy to the National Assembly. After the federalization of the country, he served as deputy to the People’s Chamber of the Federal Assembly until 1989.

In August 1968 Štrougal initially reacted negatively to the invasion of Czechoslovakia by Warsaw Pact troops, but he soon joined the pro-Moscow bloc. However, he represented a pragmatic rather than an ideological line. On 28 January 1970 he became prime minister and endorsed the so-called normalization policy. He was one of the top figures in Gustav Husák's regime. After Miloš Jakeš took over as leader of the CPC in December 1987, Štrougal insisted that economic reforms be undertaken; as a result, he came into conflict with Jakeš and resigned as prime minister on 12 October 1988. Štrougal was also expelled from the CPC Presidium. In November 1989 he was one of the candidates for the post of secretary general of the party, but after Karel Urbánek was appointed to this post, Štrougal, who also lost his parliamentary seat owing to the reconstruction of parliament, retired from politics in December 1989. In February 1990 he was expelled from the CPC. In 2000 the Office for the Documentation and Investigation of the Crimes of Communism accused Štrougal of an abuse of power and of preventing the punishment of security officers who had committed crimes at the time when he was serving as minister of interior. Štrougal's trial began in December 2001, but in February 2002 the Prague City Court cleared him of charges. (PU)

STRZELECKI Ryszard (31 January 1907, Warsaw–10 January 1988, Warsaw), Polish Communist activist. Before World War II Strzelecki was a blue-collar laborer. In 1942, he joined the (Communist) Polish Workers' Party (Polska Partia Robotnicza [PPR]), the People's Guard, and then the People's Army. Between 1945 and 1948, he was an alternate member of the PPR Central Committee (CC). He was appointed deputy head of the Organizational Department of the PPR Provincial Committee in Katowice, and between 1945 and 1946 he served as its second secretary. From December 1945, Strzelecki was a deputy to the Home National Council (Krajowa Rada Narodowa [KRN]) and then to the parliament (1947–56). Between 1946 and 1948, he served as the first secretary of the PPR Provincial Committee in Kraków. After the creation of the (Communist) Polish United Workers' Party (Polska Zjednoczona Partia Robotnicza [PUWP]), from December 1948 Strzelecki was a member of its CC and first secretary of its Provincial Committee in Katowice. From 1950 to 1951 he worked as deputy minister of transportation; between September 1951 and April 1957, as minister for railroads; and as minister of transportation until February 1960. A hard-liner, Strzelecki belonged to the orthodox Stalinist Natolin group and later to the faction of Mieczysław Moczar. In January 1960, he was appointed secretary of the PUWP CC, and in November 1964 he became a full member of its Politburo. His advancement came on the heels of the purge of party liberals by first secretary Władysław Gomułka. Strzelecki was responsible for the Main Political Administration of the Polish Army and for the CC Administrative Department. From 1968 he was responsible for inter-party collaboration, trade unions, national councils, and the CC Organizational and General Departments. He became an increasingly close aide to Gomułka, and he belonged to the top leadership of the party. From 1961 Strzelecki was a member of the Council of State, and between 1961 and 1972 he served as an MP. During worker unrest on the Baltic Sea coast in December 1970, Strzelecki supported Gomułka's decision to fire on the demonstrators. Along with the first secretary and his top aides, Strzelecki was expelled from the Secretariat and the Politburo (20 December 1970), the CC (December 1971), and the Council of State (March 1972). A party commission to establish culpability for the unrest of 1970 judged Strzelecki to be co-responsible for the crisis, but he suffered no other consequences. (PK)

STRZEMBOSZ Adam (11 September 1930, Warsaw), Polish lawyer and politician. Strzembosz studied at the Jagiellonian University in Kraków and then at Warsaw University. After 1956 he was involved in efforts to revive the Polish scouting movement. When he saw that scouting had again come under Communist control, he left the Polish Scouting Association in 1958. Although he had a degree in international law, Strzembosz could not enter the diplomatic service because he was not a member of the Communist Party. After graduating, he worked in the Social Insurance Institution (Zakład Ubezpieczeń Społecznych) and in the Ministry of Labor and Social Welfare. After doing a legal internship, Strzembosz began working as a judge at a court for juveniles in 1961. After receiving the postdoctoral degree, he became an associate professor (docent) at the Institute for Judicial Law Studies in 1974. Because of his activities in support of Solidarity, Strzembosz lost his job at the court and at the institute after the introduction of martial law in December 1981. He found employment as a lecturer at the Catholic University of Lublin. A participant in the Round Table negotiations, Strzembosz served as deputy minister of justice in the government of Tadeusz Mazowiecki from September 1989 to June 1990 and subsequently became first president of the Supreme Court and chairman of the State Judiciary Council. He opposed a radical verification process for judges, as he believed in the self-purification of the judiciary, but he also advocated lustration and partial de-communization. Strzembosz was a candidate in the 1995 presidential elections but was unsuccessful and withdrew before election day. In October 1998, on his last day in office, Strzembosz appointed Bogusław Nizieński as public interest commissioner, opening the way for lustration procedures. After retiring in 1999, Strzembosz resumed teaching at the Catholic University of Lublin. (AG)

STUČKA Pēteris (26 July 1865, Koknese, Livonia–25 January 1932, Moscow), Soviet activist of Latvian descent. Born into a peasant family, in 1888 Stučka graduated from the School of Law of St. Petersburg University. While a student, he was drawn to socialism. In the 1890s he was one of the leaders of a national Marxist movement called Jaunā strāva (New Current). He edited its periodical, Dienas Lapa, from 1888 to 1891 and from 1895 to 1897. In 1895 Stučka became active in the Social Democratic movement. Arrested and sentenced to exile in 1897, he served his sentence in Vitebsk, Slobodsk, and Vyatka. Released in 1903, he co-founded the Social Democratic Workers' Party of Latvia in 1904. An active member of the Bolshevik faction, he was involved in the work of a party organization in St. Petersburg from 1907 on; for example, he contributed to the newspaper Pravda. He also served as deputy to the second State Duma and as party delegate to the Stuttgart Congress of the Second International in 1908. In February 1917 Stučka was elected to the Executive Committee of the St. Petersburg Soviet of Workers' and Peasants' Deputies. In the summer of 1917 he organized the base for a Bolshevik coup in Riga, and in October 1917 he became chairman of the Military Investigation Committee of the Petrograd Military and Revolutionary Committee.

After the Bolshevik coup of November 1917, Stučka served as acting people's commissar of justice, subsequently becoming deputy people's commissar of justice. He was also a member of the board of the Commissariat of Foreign Affairs and a delegate to the peace negotiations with the Central Powers in Brest-Litovsk. In March 1918 Stučka joined the Central Committee (CC) of the All-Russian Communist Party (Bolsheviks) and was appointed people's commissar of justice. He co-authored the constitution of the Russian Federal Soviet Socialist Republic (RSFSR), which deprived former great landowners and entrepreneurs of the protection of the law. He also co-authored decrees issued by Lenin that extended Bolshevik law to territories beyond Bolshevik control. Stučka led the attempts to establish Bolshevik rule in Latvia. He subsequently left the office of head of the Commissariat of Justice to become head of the government of Soviet Latvia on 14 December 1918. After Riga was occupied by the Red Army, Stučka held his office there until May 1919, when the Red Army withdrew from Riga and his government left for Russia. Stučka's unpopular agrarian policy was one of the factors that undermined his government in Riga. In October 1919 Stučka became a member of the Council of People's Commissars' select committee to counteract profiteering; in May 1920 he became a member of the CC of the Bolshevik party; and in March 1921 he became a deputy people's commissar of justice. In 1923 he was made chairman of the Supreme Court of the RSFSR, and he also became a professor and head of a department at Moscow University. In 1927 Stučka co-authored the new civil code. A Marxist theorist of law and an editor of the periodical Revoliutsiia prava, he was a co-founder of the Institute of Soviet Law in Moscow in 1931 and then served as the first director of this institute. Stučka (was also one of the leaders of the Communist Party of Latvia, a member of its Foreign Office, and a representative of this party to the Communist International. During the Soviet rule in Latvia (1940–41 and 1945–91) Stučka belonged to Latvia's Communist pantheon. A town built in the late 1960s was named after him. After Latvia regained independence, the name of this town was changed, and Stučka's statue in front of the presidential palace in Riga was removed. Stučka's publications include Kurs sovetskogo grazhdanskogo prava (Outline of Soviet Civil Law) 3 vols.; 1927–31. (EJ)

STUDNICKI Władysław (3 November 1867, Dünaburg [Daugavpils]–10 January 1953, London), Polish politician and pundit. As a young man, Studnicki was a working-class activist. Between 1888 and 1889 he was a member of the Second Proletariat. From 1890 through 1896 he was exiled to Siberia. In 1897 he joined the Polish Socialist Party. Then he became involved with the Peasant Party and National Democracy. In 1905 he moved to Warsaw and broke away from the nationalists. In 1912 he participated in a congress of independentist activists in Zakopane, when the clandestine military treasury was established. After the Germans occupied Warsaw, in 1916 Studnicki co-founded and led the Club of Polish Statists (Klub Państwowców Polskich), which backed the Central Powers. He advocated collaboration with Germany, postulated the abandonment of the Polish Western lands, and spoke in favor of extending Poland's eastern borders to the Dvina and Berezina Rivers. Between 1917 and 1918 he served on the Provisional Council of State and the State Council of the Kingdom of Poland.

Following World War I, Studnicki worked as the supervisor of the statistical office of the Central Board for the Eastern Territories (Centralny Zarząd Ziem Wschodnich), adviser at the Ministry of Industry and Trade, and an official at the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. From 1930, he was also a lecturer at the newly founded Research Institute of Eastern Europe (Instytut Naukowo Badawczy Europy Wschodniej) in Vilnius. Following the death of Józef Piłsudski, Studnicki repeatedly clashed with his successors. He published political, economic, and historical articles in various periodicals, including the monarchist Słowo. Studnicki's brand of conservatism favored a strong but lawful state. He criticized communism stridently and strongly supported cooperation with the Third Reich. After the outbreak of World War II, Studnicki proposed to the Germans that he form a collaborationist government. However, because he objected to the Nazi terror, he was arrested and imprisoned, first in Warsaw and then, in 1941, in Berlin. After the war, Studnicki emigrated to Great Britain. He wrote numerous works, including the following: Od socjalizmu do nacjonalizmu (From socialism to nationalism; 1904); Wskazania polityczne irredentysty polskiego (Political directives of a Polish irredentist; 1913); Szkice polityczne z zakresu polityki międzynarodowej (Political sketches from the field of international politics; 1917); Ludzie, idee i czyny (People, ideas, and deeds; n.d.); Sprawa polska (The Polish question; 1919); Z przeżyć i walk (From experience and struggles; 1928); and System polityczny Europy a Polska (The European political system and Poland; 1935). STUDYNSKYI Kyrylo (4 October 1868, Kamianka, near Tarnopol [Ternopil]–1941, place unknown), Ukrainian literary scholar and social activist. Born into the family of a clergyman, Studynskyi attended high schools in Tarnopol and Lemberg (Lviv, Lwów) from 1878 to 1887. He subsequently studied theology in Lemberg (1887–89) and theology and Slavic philology in Vienna (1889–94), earning a Ph.D. in philosophy. In 1893 Studynskyi became an MP in the parliament in Vienna. In 1896 he received the postdoctoral degree from the Jagiellonian University in Kraków. In 1897–99 he taught Ukrainian literature at the Jagiellonian University and worked in Kraków high schools. It was not until 1900 that Studynskyi was given a professorship at the University of Lemberg; until then the appointment had been blocked by the university authorities. In 1899 he became a full member of the Taras Shevchenko Scientific Society (NTSh). One of the leaders of the Ukrainian Social Christian Party, Studynskyi edited its press organ, Ruslan, from 1897. As a member (1905–14) of the National School Council of Galicia, he strove for the development of a system of education with Ukrainian as the language of instruction. He worked in the Prosvita Educational Society and in a teachers' union called Uchytelska Hromada (serving as its president from 1916 to 1920). At the beginning of the 1920s Studynskyi served as president of a Galician unit of the Relief Committee for Starving Ukrainians and as president of the Ukrainian Fund for War Widows and Orphans. In late 1918 the authorities of the Western Ukrainian National Republic (Zakhidno-Ukraińska Narodna Republika [ZUNR]) appointed him commissioner for the University of Lemberg for the duration of the war against Poland. Since he refused to declare loyalty to Poland, Studynskyi was interned in the Baranów and Dąbie camps from 1919 to 1920.

After Poland defeated the ZUNR forces, Studynskyi was not allowed to work at the University of Lwów and worked for the NTSh. In 1923–32 he was the president of the NTSh, an academic institution that served as a substitute for a Ukrainian university in Poland. From 1921 to 1922 Studynskyi was also president of the Ukrainian National Council. In 1924 he supported the return of the historian Mykhailo Hrushevskyi to the Ukrainian SSR, and thanks to his friendship with Hrushevskyi, Studynskyi succeeded in establishing cooperation between the NTSh and the All-Ukrainian Academy of Sciences (VUAN) in Kiev. In 1927–29 Studynskyi visited Kharkov (Kharkiv) on several occasions. Thanks to him, the NTSh received occasional financial support from the Soviet authorities. In September 1929 he organized a visit to Lwów by Mykola Skrypnyk, the minister of education of the Ukrainian SSR. Studynskyi frequently spoke favorably about the prospects of developing Ukrainian science under Soviet rule. This political commitment—as well as Studynskyi's conflict with Serhiy Yefremov, a writer sentenced in the “trial” of the Union for the Liberation of Ukraine in the Ukrainian SSR in 1930 and regarded as a national hero in Galicia—led to Studynskyi's being insulted by members of the Organization of Ukrainian Nationalists (OUN) and sharply criticized for his activities by the press. Studynskyi was even accused of being a Soviet agent; as a result, at the beginning of 1932, he resigned as president of the NTSh. At the same time, as the Ukrainization policy in the Soviet Union came to an end, in October 1933 Studynskyi was also deprived of a VUAN academic title, which he had held from 1924, and he was then accused of being a Polish agent.

The Soviet authorities again needed Studynskyi after 17 September 1939. On 26–28 October 1939 he presided over sessions of the People's Assembly of Western Ukraine in Lviv at which a resolution was passed to incorporate Western Ukraine into the Ukrainian SSR. In March 1940 Studynskyi was elected deputy to the Supreme Soviet of the Soviet Union. In 1939 his professorship was reinstated, and he was appointed deputy rector of the University of Lviv. Studynski used his position to help the persecuted. On 24 June 1941 he was forcibly evacuated into the depths of the Soviet Union and perished under unknown circumstances. Studynskyi published over five hundred scholarly works on the history of literature and on Ukrainian culture. (TS)

STULGINSKIS Aleksandras (26 February 1885, Kutaliai, near Taurage–22 September 1969, Vytėnai, near Kaunas), Lithuanian Christian Democratic politician. The sixteenth child of an agricultural tenant, Stulginskis completed a gymnasium in Libava (Liepaja), and studied theology in a diocesan seminary in Kaunas and at the university in Innsbruck. In 1913 he graduated from the Agricultural Institute in Halle and then worked as an agronomist in Alytus. During World War I he was active in Vilnius (Wilno), where he organized courses for teachers and published the periodical Ukininkas. He also belonged to the Lithuanian Relief Committee for War Victims. Stulginskis ran a twenty-five-acre farm near Vilnius. He became aligned with Christian Democracy and from 1917 headed this party in the region of Vilnius and was the secretary of its central committee. Elected to the Council of Lithuania (Taryba), Stulginskis signed the Lithuanian declaration of independence of 16 February 1918. He spoke against placing Wilhelm von Urach on the Lithuanian throne. In 1918 Stulginskis presided over a Christian Democratic conference in Vilnius that adopted a rather moderate program for the party, whose spokesman he was. Elected to the Lithuanian Constituent Assembly (Seimas), in 1920 Stulginskis, along with fifteen other Christian Democratic MPs, founded the Lithuanian Farmers' Union (Lietuvos Ukininku Sajunga) and became its leader. In 1920–22 he also served as chairman of the Constituent Assembly of Lithuania.

On 21 December 1922 Stulginskis was elected the second president of Lithuania and remained in office until May 1926. Under his presidency Lithuania established diplomatic relations with Western countries, joined the League of Nations, and seized the region of Klaipėda.

Economic relations also became stabilized. Stulginskis represented a conservative-national trend in the peasant movement, one that was reluctant to make major overtures toward Poland. This trend was closely tied with Christian Democracy. Stulginskis belonged to a narrow circle of six leaders heading a bloc of three Christian Democratic parties: Christian Democracy proper, the Farmers' Union, and the workers' Labor Federation. In March 1923 Stulginskis dissolved the parliament and called new elections in which Christian Democracy won an absolute majority. Although this bloc lost power in the elections of 1926, Stulginskis remained an MP. After the coup of 17 December 1926 he was the chairman of the Constituent Assembly until its dissolution by the nationalists of Antanas Smetona on 12 April 1927.

Stulginskis rejected a proposal by the nationalists that he enter the government, and he withdrew to his farm in Jokubovas, near Kretinga. In 1925–30 he directed the Lithuanian scouting movement. In 1938 he took part in a world congress of Lithuanians in Kaunas and gave a speech in which he stressed the importance of democracy for small countries. After the Soviet invasion Stulginskis was arrested by the NKVD in July 1940 and was deported to a camp in the Siberian region of Krasnoyarsk. He worked in very harsh conditions in a sawmill. In 1952 he received an additional sentence of twenty-five years of forced labor camp. Released in 1954, he joined his wife Ona (née Matulaitė), who had been sent to the Komi ASSR. In 1956 the Soviet authorities allowed them to return to Lithuania, where Stulginskis worked until his death as a gardener. His only daughter, Aldona Juozėviciene, graduated in medicine in Kaunas, evaded arrest in 1940, and left for the West in 1944. Stulginskis's Atsiminimai (Memoirs) were published in Chicago in 1980. STURDZA Dimitrie Alexandru Prince (10 March 1833, Miclăușeni, Moldavia–8 October 1914, Bucharest), Romanian historian and politician. Sturdza was descended from a family of hospodars (rulers) of Moldavia whose surname was also written Sturza or Stourza. From 1851 to 1855 he studied law and history at the University of Bonn. He began his political career in 1857, becoming secretary of the Divan ad hoc of Moldavia, a commission that prepared the groundwork for the unification of Wallachia and Moldavia. Devoted to the unification idea, Sturdza initially worked with Alexandru I. Cuza, the prince of Romania from 1859. In 1860, though, he joined the opposition to Cuza. Sturdza organized a coup d'état (23 February 1866), as a result of which Cuza was forced to abdicate and Prince Karl of Hohenzollern-Sigmaringen (the future King Charles I) became prince of Romania. Sturdza played an important political role in Romania for the next ten years, until 1876–77, when he came into conflict with Charles. Although Sturdza had studied in Germany, unlike Petru P. Carp or Titu Maiorescu, he had a pro-French and anti-Hungarian stance. In 1875 Sturdza founded the National Liberal Party (Partidul National Liberal), in which he played a decisive role, serving as its chairman from 1892 to 1911. He also held a number of governmental positions, including those of prime minister (1895–96, 1897–99, 1901–2, and 1907–8); minister of public works (1866–67, 1876–77, and 1902–3); minister of finance (1870–71, 1877, 1878–80, 1881, and 1902); minister of foreign affairs (1882–85, 1895–96, 1897–99, 1901–2, and 1907–8); minister of interior (1896); minister of war (1901–2 and 1902–4); and minister of education (1885–88). When in charge of the government, Sturdza contributed to the balancing of the budget through a savings policy from 27 February 1901 to 4 January 1906. Appointed prime minister for the fourth time (25 March 1907), he faced the task of suppressing a peasant revolt in Moldavia. He entrusted the post of minister of war to General Alexandru Avarescu, who put down this revolt at the cost of ten thousand lives. On 9 January 1909 Sturdza resigned owing to ill health. Shortly before his death, in order to for the country to attain social peace, he called for the expropriation of some landed estates.

A member (from 1871) and secretary (1871–92) of the Romanian Academy, Sturdza generously supported it with his own funds. Sturdza's publications include Memoriu asupra portretelor domnitorilor români (Bibliography of portraits of Romanian rulers; 1874); Partidul National Liberal de la 1876 pînă la 1878 (The National Liberal Party from 1876 to 1878; 1888); Europa, Rusia și România (Europe, Russia, and Romania; 1890); Acte și documente relative la istoria renascerei României (Acts and documents on the Romanian historic revival, editor, vol. 11; 1889–1909); Chestiunea națională (The national issue; 1894); Documente privitoare la istoria românilor (Documents on Romanian history, editor, vols. 5–6; 1894–95); Carol I, Roi de Roumanie (Charles I, king of Romania; 2 vols.; 1899–1904); and Serbare la împlinirea vârstei de 70 ani, 25 februarie 1903 (My seventieth birthday, 25 February 1903; 1903). STUS Vasyl (8 January 1938, Rakhnivka, near Vinnytsya–4 September 1985, Perm), Ukrainian poet and democratic activist. In 1964 Stus graduated in pedagogy at Donetsk, and then he studied and worked at the Taras Shevchenko Institute of Literature in Kiev, publishing poems and articles in the official press. From 1965 Stus increasingly opposed the persecutions of Ukrainian intellectuals by the KGB. Expelled from the institute, he worked on a subway construction site in Kiev. In April 1968 Stus signed a letter of 139 dissidents to Leonid Brezhnev protesting the trials of young Ukrainian artists. From then on he published his poems and political texts in samizdat publications only. He published, for example, the poetry volumes Zymovi dereva (Winter trees; 1968) and Veselyi tsmintar (Happy cemetery; 1970). Stus took part in most protests against Soviet persecutions in the Ukraine. On 12 January 1972 he was arrested and sentenced to five years of labor camp and three years of exile. Stus was imprisoned (among other places) in Camp No. 35 in Perm. After his release from labor camp, Stus was beaten up by KGB functionaries following his publication of an open letter, “Ya obviniayu” (I accuse), in which he accused the police of persecuting the Ukrainian people. In 1980 he was sentenced again, this time to ten years of labor camp, for his participation in the Moscow Helsinki Group. He openly supported the Polish Solidarity movement. Stus died in Camp No. 36 near Perm. (WR)

STYPUŁKOWSKI Zbigniew (26 March 1904, Warsaw–30 March 1979, London), Polish politician. In 1925 Stypułkowski graduated in law from Warsaw University and joined the National Popular Union (Związek Ludowo-Narodowy [ZLN]). In 1930 he became the youngest MP in the Assembly during its third term. In September 1939 he participated in the war against the Germans. Stypułkowski was seized by the Soviets and was held in a temporary camp in Talitsa in the Urals. Exchanged on the basis of a German-Soviet agreement, in the spring of 1940 he arrived in Warsaw, where he organized the Polish military underground. He presided over the political committee of the National Armed Forces (Narodowe Siły Zbrojne [NSZ]), which was initially against unification with the Home Army (Armia Krajowa [AK]). Appreciating the organizational development of the AK and realizing its political necessity, Stypułkowski brought about the incorporation of part of the NSZ into the AK in March 1944. Stypułkowski was one of sixteen leaders of Underground Poland who were treacherously arrested by the NKVD in March 1945. Taken to Moscow and interrogated in Lubyanka Prison, during the Trial of the Sixteen Stypułkowski delivered a now famous plea for his case. On 21 June 1945 he was sentenced to four months' imprisonment, although he was the only defendant who refused to plead guilty. Stypułkowski returned to Warsaw, and in November 1945 he managed to get to London. He played an important role in the political life of Polish émigrés there. In London, he represented the National Party (Stronictwo Narodowe) in the Political Council, and in 1959–70 he was its representative in Washington, D.C. Stypułkowski published well-known memoirs about the Trial of the Sixteen: Zaproszenie do Moskwy (Invitation to Moscow; with a preface by H. R. Trevor-Roper, 1962; 1977). (WR) ŠUBAŠIĆ Ivan (27 May 1892, Vukova Gorica, near Karlovac, Croatia–22 March 1955, Zagreb), Croatian politician, prime minister of the Yugoslav government-in-exile. Šubašić began to study theology but in 1914 discontinued his studies because he was inducted into the Austro-Hungarian Army. He was sent to the Serbian front. Sentenced to death for desertion but pardoned, he later fought on the Italian front and in Galicia. After World War I, Šubašić completed law studies and worked as an attorney. One of the leading activists of the Croatian Peasant Party, Šubašić was elected to parliament on the ticket of this party in 1938. After an agreement between the Serbs and Croats was signed on 26 August 1939, he became the governor (ban) of the newly established Croatian province (banovina). After the coup d'état of March 1941 and the German invasion of Yugoslavia, Šubašić left for England. He called for the unity of Yugoslavia and condemned the killings of the Jewish and Serbian people by the Ustashe, led by Ante Pavelić. In 1942, though, Šubašić also became critical of the Chetniks, led by Colonel Dragoljub (Draža) Mihailović. His criticism undermined the unity of the Yugoslav émigré community in the face of claims by the Communists, led by Josip Broz Tito.

On 1 June 1944 King Peter II appointed Šubašić prime minister of a government that was to reach an agreement with the Communists. On 1 November 1944 Šubašić entered into an agreement with Tito, under the terms of which—in exchange for promises of democratic freedoms, free elections, and the admission of several émigré politicians into the coalition government—he agreed to recognize the Communist-dominated Anti-Fascist Council for the National Liberation of Yugoslavia (AVNOJ) as a provisional parliament and to accept Tito as head of the new government. Šubašić made King Peter recognize this compromise. In March 1945 Šubašić became minister of foreign affairs in Tito's cabinet. He then made far-reaching concessions to the Communists and condemned the activities of Mihailović. However, Šubašić's compromises did not help. He was totally unable to pursue a policy independent from the Communists and was even refused permission to go to a conference of ministers of foreign affairs in London. Under these circumstances, he resigned his governmental position on 8 October 1945 and retired from politics. (WR)

SUBEV Khristofor (3 May 1946, Gabrovo), Bulgarian monk and politician. Subev studied nuclear physics, and after graduating, he worked as a teacher. In 1980 he joined a religious order and began to study theology at the Theological Academy in Sofia. He was one of the founders of the Committee for Religious Rights, Freedom of Conscience, and Spiritual Values. Subev came into conflict with the patriarchate of the Bulgarian Orthodox Church, supported by the Holy Synod, which blocked the registration of this committee. In April 1989 Subev was arrested and sentenced to eighty days in prison for "disseminating false information." After his release, he founded the Salvation (Spasenie) Christian Union, and, as its leader, he joined the Union of Democratic Forces (UDF) in 1990. Promoted to vice-president of the UDF National Coordinating Committee, Subev held this position until June 1992. In October 1991 he also became a deputy to the National Assembly on the UDF ticket. At that time he maintained close contacts with Konstantin Trenchev, leader of the Podkrepa trade union. From January to March 1990 Subev took part in round table talks, the results of which he did not accept, as he believed excessive concessions had been made to the Communists. He demanded that the forty years of Communist rule be immediately investigated and evaluated, and he also called for lustration and de-communization. Subev's conflict with the authorities of the Bulgarian Orthodox Church also intensified. His demands for the immediate resignation of Patriarch Maxim (whose opponents maintained that he had not been elected in conformity with canon law or church tradition) and for the election of a new head of the Orthodox Church led to a split in the Orthodox Church in Bulgaria. In mid-1992 a group of hierarchs elected Bishop Pimen as the new patriarch, while the rest remained faithful to Maxim. On 26 June 1992 Subev was elevated to bishop of Makariopol, and one month later he was excommunicated by Maxim. The split in the Orthodox Church coincided with a conflict within the party. The post-Communists supported Maxim, while the UDF supported Pimen. Subev is often accused of mixing religion with politics and of an authoritarian style of governing the institutions that are under his authority. (AG)

SUCHOCKA Hanna (3 April 1946, Pleszew), Polish politician. In 1968 Suchocka graduated from the School of Law of Adam Mickiewicz University in Poznań. She began lecturing there in 1972, earning a Ph.D. in 1975. A specialist in constitutional law, in 1969 Suchocka joined the Democratic Party (Stronnictwo Demokratyczne [SD]). From 1980 to 1985 she was an MP in the Assembly. A member and expert in Solidarity from 1980, in 1982 Suchocka voted against the decree imposing martial law in Poland and outlawing Solidarity and against repressive penal laws; as a result, she was suspended as an SD member. She then began lecturing at the Catholic University of Lublin. In 1984 she left the SD in protest against a proposal for a new electoral law. In the elections of 4 June 1989 she obtained a seat as a representative of the opposition and joined the Civic Parliamentary Caucus (Obywatelski Klub Parlamentarny [OKP]). Suchocka was a member of the Presidium of the OKP, a member (from 1991 on) of the Democratic Union (Unia Demokratyczna [UD]), vice-chairman of the Assembly Legislative Committee, and deputy chairman of the Constitutional Committee (1991–93). In 1992 she served as vice-president of the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe and head of the Polish delegation to the Council of Europe.

From 10 July 1992 to 25 October 1993 Suchocka was prime minister. Her government was based on a center-right coalition formed with (among others) the Christian National Union (Zjednoczenie Chrześcijańsko-Narodowe), Christian Democratic parties, Solidarity, the UD, and the Liberal Democratic Congress (Kongres Liberalno-Demokratyczny). Faced with economic difficulties and the social effects of systemic transformation and beset by protest actions by post-Communist trade union activists and activists of the Self-Defense (Samoobrona) Party (who, for example, set up road blocks all over the country), Suchocka's government was also attacked by the post-Communists in the Assembly. Trying to maintain correct relations with President Lech Wałęsa, Suchocka fell afoul of Wałęsa's opponents, who organized spectacular street demonstrations against him. Trying to prevent the destabilization of the country, Suchocka tolerated the surveillance of anti-Wałęsa groups by the secret services. Because the leaders of Solidarity wanted to exploit social dissatisfaction for their own purposes, in May 1993 Solidarity MPs called for a vote of no confidence in Suchocka's government; she lost it by one vote and had to resign. President Wałęsa dissolved the parliament and called new elections, which were held in September 1993 and brought defeat to the post-Solidarity parties. Suchocka won a seat on the UD ticket. In 1994 she became a member of the Presidium of the National Council of the Freedom Union (Unia Wolności), on whose ticket she was reelected as an MP in September 1997. In 1994 Suchocka was elected to the Council of the Pontifical Academy of Social Sciences at the Vatican. Suchocka has authored numerous scholarly works on the organization of the state political system, law and order, and human rights. In 2001 Suchocka became the Polish ambassador to the Holy See. (AF)

SUCIU Ioan (4 December 1907, Blaj–27 June 1953, Sighet Marmăției), Romanian Greek Catholic bishop. The son of a Greek Catholic priest, Suciú graduated from high school in Blaj. In 1925, along with his friend Liviu Chinezu, he left for Rome, where he studied theology. In 1930, he successfully defended his doctoral dissertation in theology, and in 1931 he was ordained. Suciú returned to Blaj, where he taught religion at a high school for boys and at the local theological academy. He focused on young people in particular; hence his nickname, “the Shepard of the Youth.” In the slums of Blaj, Suciú also ministered to the gypsy children. In 1940, he was named auxiliary bishop of Oradea (Arad) under Bishop Valeriu Frențiu, thus becoming the titular bishop of Moglena-Slatina in Bulgaria. Following the expulsion of Frențiu, when Oradea was reincorporated into Hungary (1940), Suciú substituted for him in the diocese. In 1947, upon Frențiu's return, Suciú was named the apostolic administrator of the Alba-Iulia and Fargaș archdioceses. In June 1947, as Communist repression against the Church intensified, Suciú issued a pastoral letter calling on believers to resist. Suciú's fearless attitude toward the regime was constant; for example, in December 1947, he delivered a sermon in Bucharest calling communism the ideology of satan. In September 1948, the Communists stripped Suciú of his bishop's post. On 28 October, along with all other Greek Catholic bishops in Romania, Suciú was arrested and imprisoned in the Dragoslavele Monastery. At the beginning of 1949, the bishops were transferred to the Căldărușani Monastery, which had been turned into a prison. In May 1950, Suciú was brought to the Ministry of Internal Affairs in Bucharest for interrogation. In September he was sent to the Sighet Marmăției Prison. Accused of links to the anti-Communist guerrilla movement in the mountains of Transylvania, after three years of imprisonment under inhuman conditions, Suciú fell seriously ill and died. He never faced a trial and was never sentenced. The process of his beatification in the Greek Catholic Church is under way. (LW)

SULYOK Dezső (28 March 1897, Simaházapuszta–18 May 1965, New York), Hungarian politician. The son of a miller, Sulyok was orphaned at the age of nine and was brought up by an uncle. After high school he was inducted into the army and served on the Italian and Russian fronts from 1916 to 1918. After returning to Hungary, Sulyok completed a course for police officers. Under the Hungarian Soviet Republic (HSR), he was responsible for public security in the town of Pápa in 1919. After the fall of the HSR, Sulyok became commander of a police unit. In February 1920 he left the army and began to study law at Budapest University. After earning a doctorate and passing the bar, he opened a law office in Pápa in 1924. He joined the ruling Party of Unity and served as a member of its presidium from 1926 to 1931. Because this party did not support his candidacy before the parliamentary elections in 1931, Sulyok retired from politics. In 1935 he ran in the elections as an independent candidate and won a seat in parliament from Pápa, outstripping even the official candidate of the ruling party. In 1937 Sulyok joined the opposition Independent Smallholders' Party (ISP). In 1938 he raised a parliamentary question on the Jewish descent of Prime Minister Béla Imrédy, who insisted on passing anti-Jewish laws. As a result, Imrédy resigned. However, in the spring of 1939 Sulyok voted against the second anti-Jewish law.

From January 1942 to June 1943 Sulyok served on the Russian front. In 1943 he became co-chairman of the ISP civic platform. He helped to draft an anti-war memorandum that was presented to Prime Minister Miklós Kállay. Arrested and interned in Nagykanizsa in April 1944, Sulyok was released after two months, thanks to the intervention of József Mindszenty, the bishop of Veszprém. After the Arrow Cross Party came to power in October 1944, Sulyok had to go into hiding. From April to September 1945 he served as mayor and commander of the police in Pápa. He was elected to the ISP National Executive Committee in August 1945, a deputy to the Provisional National Assembly in June 1945, and a deputy to the National Assembly in November 1945. In November 1945 Sulyok was a prosecutor in Imrédy's trial. After Zoltán Tildy was elected president, Sulyok was one of the candidates for the office of prime minister, but the leftist parties opposed his candidacy. The Communists hated his legally accurate parliamentary questions. On the demand of the Leftist Bloc (Communists and Social Democrats), Sulyok and nineteen other MPs were expelled from the ISP on 12 March 1946. A few days later Sulyok co-founded the Hungarian Freedom Party (Magyar Szabadság Párt [MSP]). He became its chairman and the editor-in-chief of its press organ, Holnap. After the Communists modified the electoral law in 1947, Sulyok was prevented from running in the upcoming elections. In July 1947 he disbanded the MSP and resigned his parliamentary seat.

Fearing arrest, on 14 August 1947 Sulyok fled from Hungary. On 7 October 1947 he was stripped of his Hungarian citizenship. He settled in the United States, where he served as a member of the Executive Committee of the Hungarian National Committee from 1949 to 1950. He left this committee because of a conflict with Ferenc Nagy and Béla Varga, whom he accused of conducting a conciliatory policy toward the Communists. In 1948–50 Sulyok was the editor of the newspaper Amerikai Magyar Népszava and the author of many publications issued through émigré publishing houses. His memoirs, Zwei Nächte ohne Tag (Two nights without a day), were published in Switzerland in 1948, and in 1954 they came out in Hungarian in New York. After 1956 Sulyok founded the independent Hungarian October 23rd Movement, which did not play any major role. (JT)

SUPILO Frano (30 November 1870, Cavtat–25 September 1917, London), Croatian politician. Supilo graduated from an agricultural school in Gruž, and in the 1890s he edited the periodical Crvena Hrvatska. From 1899 he lived in Rijeka, where he edited the journal Novi List. In a few years he transformed this bilingual Italian-Croatian journal into an influential political organ. Along with Ante Trumbić, Supilo belonged to the ideologists of the Croatian Party of Rights (Hrvatska Stranka Prava) in Dalmatia. He defended the interests of Croats and Serbs in Austria-Hungary. He was one of the drafters of the Rijeka Resolution, adopted on 3 October 1905 by Croatian politicians; in it they expressed themselves in favor of Hungarians who were aiming at full independence and against the domination of Austria. The resolution received the support of the Serbs who were living in the Habsburg monarchy on condition that the status of Croatia-Slavonia would be changed; democratization of the electoral law would be introduced; and freedom of the press, freedom of speech, and freedom of association would be respected. The resolution initiated the creation of the Croatian-Serbian Coalition, which, under the leadership of Supilo, won the elections to the Sabor (Assembly) in May 1906. In 1909, after the Austrian historian Heinrich Friedjung published documents alleging that the politicians of the coalition had secretly collaborated with the Belgrade government, the Croats sued Friedjung, and the results of the ensuing trial brought discredit to the author of the accusation. Disappointed with cooperation with the Hungarians, Supilo withdrew from the leadership of the coalition and also from its ranks.

During World War I Supilo worked for Yugoslav unity, and he sought the recognition of the Serbian-Croatian-Slovenian alliance by the Entente states. Along with Trumbić and Ivan Meštrović, he co-founded the Yugoslav Committee (Jugoslavenski Odbor) in exile, which began its activities in December 1914. Supilo consistently expressed himself in favor of the unification of Serbs and Croats based on the principle of federation. In April 1916 he gave up his work in the committee after the rejection of his proposal to adopt a constitution before unification. Supilo was one of the signatories of the Declaration of Corfu (20 July 1917), whereby the South Slavic peoples would form a single kingdom. He did not live to see the implementation of this idea. After Supilo's premature death, collections of his texts were published: "Korespondencija Frana Supila iz perioda 1891–1914" (Letters of Frano Supilo from the period 1891–1914, Archivski Vestnik, 1963, no. 7); Pisma i memorandumima Frana Supila 1914–1917 (Letters and memoranda of Frano Supilo 1914–1917; 1967); and Politički spisi (Political writings; 1970). (AO)

SUSHKO Roman (1894, Remeniv, near Lemberg [Lwów, Lviv]–12 January 1944, Lviv), Ukrainian political and military activist. A lieutenant in the Ukrainian Sich Riflemen during World War I, Sushko fought in many battles, including those of Makivka and Lysonia. In 1916–17 he was held prisoner of war by the Russians. In 1918 he was a co-founder and colonel of the Sich Riflemen in Kiev, and then he became commander of a Sich Riflemen division. A colonel in the Ukrainian Galician army, Sushko was interned in Poland in 1919. In 1920 he became commander of the Sixteenth Brigade of the Sich Riflemen's Division, which fought against the Bolsheviks. In 1921 he commanded the Second Brigade during the Second Winter Campaign, led by Yuriy Tyutyunnyk. Co-founder of the Ukrainian Military Organization and its home commander from 1927 to 1930, Sushko was repeatedly arrested by the Polish authorities. He was one of the founders of the Organization of Ukrainian Nationalists (Orhanizatsiya Ukrayinskykh Natsionalistiv [OUN]) and worked in its military staff. Sushko was also editor of the periodical Surma. In the early 1930s he emigrated to Vienna. In September 1939 Sushko became commander of the Legion of Ukrainian Nationalists, which was formed under the aegis of the German. He led this legion to Stryi, but after the Soviet Union attacked Poland, the Germans dissolved it, and its soldiers were incorporated into auxiliary police units. At the end of 1939 Sushko settled in Kraków, where he was the leader (providnyk) of the OUN in the part of Poland known as the General Government. After an internal split within the OUN in 1940, Sushko remained loyal to Andriy Melnyk. Sushko developed the network of the OUN–Melnyk faction. From the summer of 1941 onwards Sushko lived in Lviv, where he was probably killed by activists of the OUN–Bandera faction. Sushko authored memoirs on the battle of Bazar and on his service in the Ukrainian Sich Riflemen. He also wrote the book Khto vbyv polkovnyka Otmarshaina? (Who killed Colonel Otmarshain? 1933). ŠUŠTAR Alojzij (14 September 1920, Grmada, near Trebnje), Slovene Catholic archbishop. Born into a peasant family, after graduating from high school at the Ljubljana Curia, Šuštar was sent to study theology in Rome in 1940. He took holy orders in October 1946. After earning a doctorate, he was sent to Switzerland, where he worked as an assistant to the parish priest in St. Moritz and taught philosophy and theology at a high school in Schwyz. He subsequently became a professor of moral theology and rector of a seminary in Chur. From 1971 to 1976 Šuštar served as a curate and as a secretary of the Council of European Episcopal Conferences. In 1977 he returned to Slovenia (then part of Yugoslavia), where he became a leading figure of the Catholic Church and the spiritual leader of the society. On 13 April 1980 he was consecrated archbishop of Ljubljana. He also became chancellor of the School of Theology in Ljubljana and president of the Conference of Slovene Bishops. Šuštar patiently strove for the return of the faithful to public life. Thanks to his moderate views and charming personality, he was able to attract many people to the Catholic Church who had previously stayed away from it. Šuštar played a major role in the revival of Slovene Christian Democracy, and in 1991 he was instrumental in bringing a moral dimension to Slovene efforts to regain independence. He also contributed to the recognition of the Slovene state by the Holy See. In August 1992 Šuštar requested that the government return church property that had been nationalized by the Communist regime after World War II. In March 1997 he retired. (WR)

ŠUŠTERŠIČ Ivan (29 May 1863, Ribnica–7 October 1925, Ljubljana), Slovene politician. Šušteršič studied law in Vienna from 1881 to 1885 and earned a doctorate in 1889. He subsequently worked as an attorney in Laibach (Ljubljana). In 1890 he helped to found the Catholic Political Society in Laibach. Elected to the parliament in Vienna in 1896 and 1897, he resigned his parliamentary seat in 1898. He again served as a member of parliament from 1900 to 1918. He was also a deputy to the provincial assembly of Krajina (1901–18). An active member of the Catholic National Party (Katoliška Narodna Stranka), Šušteršič was the de facto leader of this party from 1899 onwards, becoming its formal head in October 1902. In 1905 the Catholic National Party was renamed the Slovene People's Party (Slovenska Ljudska Stranka [SLS]). Šušteršič served as chairman of the SLS until November 1917. The SLS was composed of representatives of two different social orientations: the right-wing orientation, led by Šušteršič and supported by the higher-ranking clergy, and the Christian social orientation, led by Janez Krek and supported by peasants, the lower middle class, and the intelligentsia. In the elections to the provincial assembly of Krajina in 1908, the SLS won a sweeping majority, which strengthened Šušteršič's position on the political scene. He called for uniting the South Slavic nations within the framework of the Habsburg empire. Cooperation with the Croats on this unification issue resulted in the establishment of Croat and Slovene parliamentary representation in Vienna under Šušteršič's leadership. Because of his different attitude to the First Balkan War against Turkey, Šušteršič came into conflict with the majority of this representation at the end of 1912. In 1914 he resigned as chairman of the parliamentary representation and was replaced by Anton Korošec.

When, after the assassination of Archduke Francis Ferdinand in Sarajevo, Austria-Hungary declared war on Serbia on 28 July 1914, the SLS, led by Šušteršič, took a firm position against Serbia. The party's attitude met with many critical voices. However, Šušteršič's policies as governor of Krajina (January 1912–October 1918) enjoyed social support because he had successfully opposed the demands of the army that threatened the economy of the region. In 1917 Šušteršič was one of the founders of the Yugoslav Club and helped to draft the so-called May Declaration, which advocated that Slovenes, Croats, and Serbs be united into a common state within the Habsburg empire. Contrary to more and more politicians, Šušteršič did not demand independence for the South Slavic nations. After the war, Šušteršič went to Vienna and then to Switzerland. He tried to persuade the Vatican to put pressure on Italy to limit its territorial demands at the Paris Peace Conference. In the book Moj odgovor (My answer; 1922) Šušteršič criticized clericalism and stated that SLS links with Church hierarchs were harmful both to the multi-religious state and to the Church. After the establishment of the Kingdom of Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes, Šušteršič played a marginal role in politics. From February 1923 he edited the newspaper Ljudski dnevnik. In the parliamentary elections of 18 March 1923 the National People's Party (Narodna Ljudska Stranka) under his leadership obtained only 0.4 percent of the vote in the Slovene constituencies. In April 1923 Šušteršič again began working as an attorney. (AO)

SÜTŐ András (17 June 1927, Cămărașu [Pusztakamarás], Transylvania), Hungarian writer. Sütő graduated from Bethlen College, Aiud (Nagyenyed) in 1945. After World War II, he initially worked as a reporter and then as an editor of the Hungarian-language periodicals in Romania. An editor (from 1958) and then editor-in-chief (1971–89) of the literary periodical Új Élet, Sütő became one of the leading figures in the cultural life of Hungarians in Romania. In his writing, he eulogized the countryside and rural landscapes. Sütő won international recognition as the author of Anyám könnyű álmot ígér (Mother promised me a light sleep; 1970), a novel combining a plot set in a rural environment with universal sociological observations. In the novel Engedjétek hozzám jönni a szavakat (Let the words come to me; 1977) Sütő raised the issue of the responsibility of the grandfather generation for the outlook on life and national consciousness of grandchildren. The theme of Hungarian ethnicity in Transylvania grew stronger in Sütő's subsequent novels and essays—including Advent a Hargitán (Advent in Hargita; 1985)—which were published from 1981 to 1989 outside Romania. In his dramas Sütő referred to characters and events from the folk mythology of the Transylvanian Szeklers and reflected on the position of the individual in confrontation with totalitarianism. (MS)

ŠUVAR Stipe (17 February 1936, Zagvozd–29 June 2004, Zagreb), Croatian sociologist and Communist activist. Šuvar graduated in sociology (1960) and earned a doctorate in this field. From 1963 to 1972 he worked as an editor of the periodical Naše teme. He also rose through the ranks of the League of Communists of Croatia (LCC). In 1972 he became a member of the LCC Central Committee (CC). From 1974 to 1982 Šuvar served as minister of education and culture of the Croatian republic. He was the author of an unsuccessful reform of the educational system—called the šugarica after him—that was introduced in 1977–78 and resulted in an even greater politicization of teaching based on Marxism. After the death of Josip Broz Tito, Šuvar tried to continue Tito's ideological legacy. On his initiative, an ideological conference was held in October 1983 in Zagreb that revealed—against Šuvar's intentions—that the Titoist version of Marxism was already defunct. Closely linked to the Yugoslav army, Šuvar sabotaged reforms, and as late as May 1987 he called for a struggle against “bourgeois laws” and the recognition of the superiority of “class interests.” The LCC's pro-reform faction, led by Ivica Račan, decided to rid the party of Šuvar by promoting him to the post of rotating chairman of the Presidium of the League of Communists of Yugoslavia (LCY). Šuvar held this post from 30 June 1988 to 17 May 1989. In October 1988 he called a conference of the LCY Presidium at which a purge was conducted involving the expulsion of one-third of the 165-member CC and 5 members of the 23-member Presidium of the party. Šuvar was also Croatia's representative in the collective state presidency from 1989 to 1990 and its vice-chairman until 15 May 1991. After the breakup of the Yugoslav federation and the establishment of an independent Croatia, Šuvar retired from politics. He taught sociology and philosophy at the University of Zagreb. In 1997 he chaired the Returning Home Citizens' Committee and founded the Socialist Workers' Party of Croatia (Socijalistička Radnička Partija Hrvatske), but this party was of minor importance. Šuvar's publications include Klasno i nacionalno u suvremenom socijalizmu (Class and nation in modern socialism; 1970); Politika i kultura (Politics and culture; 1980); Samoupravljanje i alternative (Self-government and alternatives; 1983); and Sociologija sela (Rural sociology, 2 vols.; 1988). ŠVĀBE Arveds (25 May 1888, Lielstraupē–20 August 1959, Stockholm), Latvian historian and politician. From 1911 to 1915 Švābe studied the natural sciences, history, and law at Moscow University. In 1921–25 he completed studies in law and history at the university in Riga. He subsequently worked as a researcher at the university in Riga, as well as in Germany, Sweden, Poland, Austria, and Italy. His research resulted in, among other things, the work Agrarian History of Latvia (1928). In 1932 Švābe earned a Ph.D., and in 1936 he became a professor at the university in Riga. In 1927–40 he edited Latviesu konversācijas vārdnīca, a twenty-volume Latvian dictionary. After Latvia was incorporated into the Soviet Union in 1940, Švābe avoided deportation. In 1944 he fled from the Red Army to Sweden. In 1947 he became head of the Latvian National Committee in Germany. He later taught history at the University of Stockholm. In 1950 in Stockholm he began editing Latviju enciklopēdiju, an encyclopedia in the Latvian language. In 1950–55 Švābe published three volumes of this work. He also authored a history of Latvia in English, The Story of Latvia (1950). (WR)

SVARINSKAS Alfonsas (21 January 1925, Vatslavovo [now in Belarus]), Lithuanian priest and activist of the democratic opposition. In 1942 Svarinskas entered the Kaunas Seminary. After the Red Army again seized Lithuania, he was arrested in December 1946 and then sentenced to ten years in a forced labor camp and five years in exile for his pro-independence activities. In 1954, while in a forced labor camp in Abez in the Komi ASSR, Svarinskas was ordained into the priesthood by Bishop Pranciskus Ramanauskas. Released in 1956, he returned to Lithuania, where he exercised his pastoral ministry in the parish of Viduklė. Arrested again in April 1959, he was sentenced by the Supreme Court of the Lithuanian SSR to six years in a forced labor camp for “anti-Soviet activities.” He served his sentence in Mordvinia. Released in 1964, Svarinskas worked as a curate in the parish of Igliauka in Lithuania. In November 1979 he co-founded the Catholic Committee for the Defense of Rights of Believers, for which he was arrested in January 1983. In May 1983 he was tried, together with Father Sigitas Tamkevičius, and he was sentenced to seven years in a forced labor camp and three years in exile. In June 1983 around forty-seven thousand Lithuanians signed a petition for the release of both priests. In February 1987 Svarinskas was brought to the KGB headquarters in Vilnius, but after refusing to plead guilty, he was sent back to the labor camp in Perm. Soviet television then broadcast a diatribe on his activities. Released in July 1988, Svarinskas became chancellor of the archdiocesan curia in Kaunas in 1990. After Lithuania regained independence, he became head of the Lithuanian branch of Catholic Action. With the consent of Archbishop Vincentas Sladkevičius, as a sign of appreciation for the Church’s efforts to uphold Lithuanian national traditions, in September 1991 Svarinskas became a member of the Supreme Soviet of the Lithuanian SSR, and his election was supported by the Lithuanian Movement for Restructuring (Sajūdis). Svarinskas sat on the Supreme Soviet until the elections of October 1992 and was an advocate for the nationalist and conservative members of the clergy, who regarded the achievements of the Second Vatican Council with mistrust and were wary of all forms of liberalism. ŠVEHLA Antonín (15 April 1873, Hostivař, near Prague–12 December 1933, Hostivař), Czech Peasant Party politician. Švehla was born into a family of farmers. His father was the village headman (starosta) of Hostivař. Švehla finished three grades of high school in Prague and one grade of a German high school in Česká Lípa. He subsequently attended an agricultural vocational school. He then continued to study on his own and was particularly interested in politics and agriculture. From 1899 onwards Švehla ran his father’s farm. He began his public activities in 1893, founding the gymnastic society Sokol (Hawk). At the turn of the twentieth century Švehla became involved in the work of the newly established Czech Agrarian Party (Česká strana Agrární), co-founded by his father. In 1902 he became vice-chairman of the Czech Farmers’ Society (Sdružení Českých Zemědělců). He was seriously involved in the development of the party’s press organs. In 1901 Švehla became a member of the leadership and in 1903 the chairman of the Agricultural Press and Publishing Cooperative. In 1906 he succeeded in founding the press organs of the Czech Agrarian Party—the daily Venkov and the weekly Cep. In 1908 Švehla refused to run in elections to the parliament in Vienna, as he believed that he could do more in his country. He became an MP in the Czech Land Diet and chairman of the agrarian parliamentary representation. In 1909 he became chairman of the Czech Agrarian Party and in 1912 chairman of the Czech Club in the Land Diet. From this position he protested the dissolution of the Diet and its replacement by a commission appointed by the authorities in Vienna (the so-called anenské patenty of 26 July 1913).

According to Švehla, the Agrarian Party was to be a middle-of-the-road party, between the leftist Socialist parties and the right-wing conservatives. It was to become a mass movement with which the entire rural community, not only the great landowners, could identify. According to him, the nation consisted primarily of two equally important large social groups, the workers and the peasants, and the latter should be as well organized as the former. Švehla believed that the agrarian movement was part of the all-national movement, whose aim was to fight for the Czech nation’s historical right to statehood. From the beginning of World War I Švehla held an anti-Habsburg position and made efforts to unite Czech parties on issues concerning the legal status of the Bohemian lands. In 1916 he was one of the founders of the National Committee (Národní Výbor) and the Czech Union (Český Svaz) in the parliament in Vienna. After the arrest of Karel Kramář, Švehla became the leader of the Czech political representation, and he organized many political actions. Toward the end of the war Švehla started preparing for a takeover of power by Czech political forces and was involved in the building of an independent state, paying much attention to economic and social issues, as he realized there was the danger of a social revolution. In July 1918 Švehla became vice-president of the National Committee, which he reorganized in order to take over power. He was one of the leaders of the coup of 28 October 1918 and one of the founders of an independent Czechoslovakia. Along with Alois Rašín, František Soukup, Vavro Šrobár, and Jiří Stříbrný, Švehla signed a manifesto establishing the Czechoslovak state.

From 1918 Švehla sat in the National Assembly, and he held the post of minister of interior in the first Czechoslovak government (November 1918–July 1919). He tried to avert party conflicts and believed that a coalition that would strengthen and develop the young state's structures was more important than party interests. Švehla initiated the establishment of the Pětka (The Five), an informal decision-making organ that consisted of the leaders of the main political forces. In 1919 he became head of the Agrarian Party, which then took on the name of the Republican Party of the Czechoslovak Rural Community (Republikánská Strana Českosloveského Venkova), and in 1925 it was renamed the Republican Party of Peasants and Smallholders (Republikánská Strana Zemědělského a Maloroľnického Lidu). On 8 October 1922 Švehla became prime minister of an "all-national" broad coalition government (made up of the Agrarians, Peasant Party members, National Democrats, National Socialists, and Social Democrats). After the elections of November 1925 the center of gravity in parliament moved to the right. Švehla's new cabinet, based on a similar coalition but without the National Democrats and Social Democrats, was established on 9 December of that year but was short-lived. On 12 October 1926, after a short interlude of Jan Černý's cabinet of civil servants, Švehla again became head of a coalition government, known as the "government of the gentlemen's coalition." This coalition included the National Democrats, Agrarians, Populists, tradesmen, German parties, and members of Hlinka's Slovak People's Party, led by Father Andrej Hlinka. Švehla's government was a time of stabilization and prosperity. Švehla paid much attention to the strengthening of the country and the development of democracy. He also cared greatly for economic development. He completed the implementation of agricultural reforms under which great landed estates were parceled out and medium-size farms received aid. Švehla was a close associate of President Tomáš Garrigue Masaryk, whom he supported in the 1927 elections, refusing to run against Masaryk. Owing to ill health, on 1 February 1929 Švehla resigned his position and then retired from public life. (PU)

ŠVERMA Jan (23 March 1901, Mnichovo Hradiště, Mladá Boleslav County–10 November 1944, Mt. Chabenec, Lower Tatra Mountains), Czech Communist activist and journalist. The son of a lawyer, Šverma studied medicine and law at Charles University in Prague, but he failed to graduate owing to his extensive journalistic and political activities. In 1921 he joined the Communist Party of Czechoslovakia (CPC) and became active in the Communist Youth Union. He also edited the party daily, Rudé Právo. In 1926–28 Šverma studied at the Lenin School in Moscow. After his return to Czechoslovakia, at the Fifth CPC Congress in February 1929 he became a member of the Central Committee (CC) and Politburo of the party. Šverma supported the "Bolshevization" of the CPC and worked closely with Klement Gottwald. He was also active in the Communist trade unions. From August 1930 he was a member of the Executive Bureau of the Red Trade Union International (Profintern). In September 1932 Šverma took part in the Twelfth Plenum of the Executive Committee of the Communist International (Comintern). Šverma's position grew more important when Gottwald and Václav Kopecký left for Moscow in 1934 in order to avoid arrest. At the Seventh Congress of the Comintern Šverma was elected a deputy member of its Executive Committee.

In 1935 Šverma was elected an MP. According to Comintern instructions, he advocated the creation of a wide anti-Fascist front. As a result he supported Edvard Beneš for president, persuading other Communist deputies to follow suit. This step was not welcomed by the Kremlin or by Gottwald because they thought it too independent. Thus at the next Comintern Congress at the beginning of 1936 Šverma had to submit a self-criticism. In 1936–38 Šverma was editor-in-chief of Rudé Právo. After the Pact of Munich of September 1938, he voted against Emil Hácha in the presidential elections. Soon he left for Moscow, where he was active in the CPC leadership abroad. In 1939–40 Šverma was head of the foreign section of the CPC in Paris and edited the periodical Světovy rozhled. After the defeat of France in July 1940, he returned to Moscow, where apart from working in the party leadership he edited Czech and Slovak broadcasts on Moscow Radio and the periodical Československé listy. From 1941 Šverma was in the Panslavic Committee. During the Slovak National Uprising he was sent to Slovakia as a delegate of the CPC leadership abroad. During the retreat with the partisans Šverma died of exhaustion. (PU)

ŠVERMOVÁ Marie [née Švábová] (17 August 1902, Trnovany–14 February 1992, Prague), Czech Communist activist, wife of Jan Šverma. Švermová belonged to the group that initiated the Communist Party of Czechoslovakia (CPC) after a split in the Social Democratic movement, and she was a CPC member from its beginnings in 1921. In 1929–38 she was a member of the Central Committee (CC) of the CPC, and during World War II she worked in Moscow. After she returned to Czechoslovakia, in 1945–51 she belonged to the CC Presidium; until 1949 she was head of the Organization Department of the CC, and from 1949 to 1951 she was deputy secretary general of the CPC. Švermová actively supported the Stalinization of Czechoslovakia. In February 1951 she was deprived of all her positions and arrested. After a fake trial, on 28 January 1954 she was sentenced to life imprisonment. Soon the sentence was reduced to ten years, and in 1956 she was released. In 1963 Švermová was rehabilitated by the court and by the party authorities. In April 1963 she was accepted back into the party. During the Prague Spring she supported reforms, and in 1977 she signed Charter 77. (PU)

From 1947 to 1952 Sverstyuk studied at the Department of Logic and Psychology of Lviv University and then worked as a teacher of Ukrainian. From 1953 to 1956 he pursued postgraduate studies at the Psychological Research Institute of the Ministry of Education of the Ukrainian SSR. SVITLYCHNYI Ivan (20 September 1929, Polovynkyne, Luhansk district–25 October 1992, Kiev), Ukrainian dissident, literary critic, and poet. Born into a family of kolkhoz farm workers, Svitlychni finished high school in Starobelsk in 1947 and graduated in philology from the university in Kharkiv in 1952. He subsequently was a postgraduate student and, from 1957 to 1963, assistant professor at the Institute of Literature of the Academy of Sciences of the Ukrainian SSR. Forced to leave his job, Svitlychnyi worked at the Institute of Philosophy from 1963 to 1964. After 1965 he did not have a permanent job and published his articles under pseudonyms. Known for his non-conformist attitude, Svitlychnyi was involved in most of the independent cultural initiatives of the 1960s and 1970s. He became a great moral authority among “the generation of the sixties” (shestidesiatniki). He played a major role in the establishment of relations between the intelligentsias of Kiev and Lviv and also in the establishment of contacts with the Ukrainian diaspora in the West. In 1962–63 he helped to found the Club of Young Artists. On 30 August 1965 Svitlychnyi was arrested for “anti-Soviet propaganda and agitation,” but after a few months he was released as “socially safe.” From 1966 to 1971 he published extensively in the underground periodicals. Arrested again in January 1972, Svitlychnyi was sentenced to seven years in forced labor camps and five years in exile in April 1973. He served his sentence in labor camps near Perm. He was often additionally punished for taking part in protest actions and hunger strikes. In June 1978 Svitlychnyi was exiled to Ust-Kan in Altai. In August 1981 he suffered a stroke, which left him an invalid. Released in January 1983, he was no longer able to continue his opposition work. Svitlychnyi was a member of the International PEN Club from 1978 on, and in 1990 he became a member of the Association of Ukrainian Writers. In 1989 he received the Vasyl Stus Award, and in 1994 he was posthumously awarded the Taras Shevchenko Prize. Svitlychnyi wrote poetry and also translated from Slavic languages and French. His publications include the volumes Hrvatovani sonety (Sonnets behind bars; 1977); Sertse dlia kul i dlia rym (A heart for bullets and rhymes; 1991); and U mene—tilky slovo (I only have the word; 1994). A posthumous edition of his poems and a volume of memoirs, Dobrookyi: Spohady pro Ivana Svitlychnoho (The man with kind eyes: Memoirs of Ivan Svitlychnyi; 1998), were edited by his wife, Leonida, and his sister Nadia. His wife—a pillar of strength to the family—nursed him during his illness while he was in exile in Altai. His sister Nadia, an activist in the dissident movement, had been imprisoned in forced labor camps from 1973 to 1976, and in 1978 she settled in the United States. (TS)

SVOBODA Ludvik (25 November 1895, Hroznatín–20 September 1979, Prague), Czech general, president of the Czechoslovak Socialist Republic. During World War I Svoboda fought in the Czechoslovak Legion in Russia, taking part in the battles of Zborów and Bachmače (among others). He returned to Czechoslovakia in 1920, and from 1922 he served as an officer of the Czechoslovak Army. He held a number of military posts—for example, he was deputy commander of a battalion in Uzhhorod, a lecturer in the Hungarian language at the military academy in Hranice, and deputy commander and then commander of a battalion in Kroměříž; after the mobilization in 1938 he became commander of an infantry regiment. At the beginning of the German occupation Svoboda was active in the organization called Defense of the Nation. In June 1939 he moved to Poland, where, under the command of General Lev Prchala, he began to form the Czechoslovak Legion in Bronowice, near Kraków. The legion was formally established by a decree issued by President Ignacy Mościcki on 3 September 1939. On 18 September 1939 Svoboda moved, along with his units, to the territories that had been seized by the USSR, but he was interned and held in the Soviet Union until June 1941. After the German attack against the USSR Svoboda became commander of the first independent Czechoslovak battalion; in 1943 he became commander of the first independent Czechoslovak brigade; and in 1944 he became commander of the First Czechoslovak Army in the USSR. He quickly rose through the ranks of the army as well: in 1943 he became brigadier general, in April 1945 major general, and in August 1945 general of the army.

Svoboda returned to Czechoslovakia in April 1945, assuming the post of nonparty minister of national defense in the first Czechoslovak postwar cabinet, the so-called Košice Government. He also held the post in Klement Gottwald's government, established in July 1945. During the Communist coup in February 1948 Svoboda proclaimed the neutrality of the army, a move favorable to the Communists. At the time of the government crisis Svoboda did not resign; rather he collaborated with the Communists. He accepted the coup and soon joined the Communist Party. Since the Kremlin did not trust him and also because he did not conduct a sufficiently efficient purge of the army, in April 1950 Svoboda was replaced as minister of national defense by Alexej Čepička. Svoboda assumed the post of deputy prime minister and president of the national committee for physical education and sports. At the end of 1951 he was deprived of all his posts, and in 1952 he was arrested for a short time. After his release Svoboda worked as an accountant at a cooperative farm. In 1954 he returned to political life, becoming a member of the Presidium of the National Assembly. From 1955 to 1958 he was head of the Klement Gottwald Military Academy in Hranice, and later he headed the Military History Institute in Prague.

During the Prague Spring, after the resignation of Antonín Novotný, on 30 March 1968 Svoboda was elected president of Czechoslovakia, enjoying the confidence of the first secretary of the Central Committee (CC) of the CPSU, Leonid Brezhnev. However, after the invasion by the Warsaw Pact troops, Svoboda refused, after some hesitation, to appoint a “revolutionary government of workers and peasants.” Also, during talks with the Soviet leadership between 23 and 26 August 1968 in Moscow, Svoboda was successful in securing the participation in the negotiations of party leaders and reformers headed by Alexander Dubček, who had been interned during the Soviet invasion. In talks with interned members of the leadership of the Communist Party of Czechoslovakia (CPC), Svoboda insisted that they sign the “Moscow Protocol,” which annulled the previous decisions of the leadership and in fact announced the “normalization” of Czechoslovakia. After his return to Prague Svoboda began to trim and slow down the “normalization,” but at the same time he supported it. As early as 31 August 1968 he was coopted, along with Gustav Husák, to the CC of the CPC, in place of the reformers Čestmír Císař and František Kriegel. In 1969 Svoboda backed Husák, and he had a significant role in Husák’s taking over the post of first secretary of the CC of the CPC from Dubček. Thereafter, he passively watched the purges in the party, in the state apparatus, and in the culture. From April 1974 Svoboda effectively was not serving as president owing to ill health, but he refused to resign. On 25 May 1975 he was recalled as president. The direct reason was the fact that he had been diagnosed—by Soviet specialists from the notorious Serbsky Institute of Forensic Psychiatry—as suffering from “arteriosclerosis dementia.” Svoboda was the author of the memoirs Z Buzuluku do Prahy (From Buzuluk to Prague; 1960) and Cestami života (On the paths of life; 1971). SWIANIEWICZ Stanisław (7 November 1899, Düna-burg [Daugavpils]–22 May 1997, London), Polish economist and lawyer. After graduating from high school in Orel, Russia, Swianiewicz studied law in Moscow and Wilno (Vilnius). Then he studied economics in Paris, Breslau (Wrocław), and Vienna. In 1917, he joined the secret Polish Military Organization, and from 1919 to 1921 he served in the Polish Army, including the period during the Polish-Soviet war. After his dismissal from the army, Swianiewicz commenced working at Stefan Bathory University in Wilno. Initially, he was a graduate assistant, but after receiving first his doctorate and then an advanced postgraduate degree, he became an associate professor. He also lectured at the School of Political Sciences and supervised the Department of Economic Studies at the Research Institute of Eastern Europe in Wilno. A member of the Econometric Society and many Polish scholarly associations, Swianiewicz was considered a leading authority on totalitarian economies. Among other works, he published Lenin jako ekonomista (1930; Lenin as an economist; 1930); Problemy sowieckiej polityki gospodarczej (Problems of Soviet economic policy; 1934); and Polityka gospodarcza hitlerowskich Niemiec (The economic policy of Hitler’s Germany; 1938).

Mobilized in September 1939, Swianiewicz fought against the Nazis, including in the battle of Tomaszów Lubelski. Captured by the Soviets near Lwów (Lviv), he was transported to a POW camp in Kozielsk. On 19 April 1940, along with a group of other Polish officer prisoners, Swianiewicz was taken to the Gnezdovo railroad station, where he was separated from the others. He observed them being escorted from their cattle cars onto special buses. They were driven by the NKVD into a forest, and after a while, the buses returned empty. Swianiewicz was transferred first to the Lubyanka Prison and then to the Butyrki Prison in Moscow. He survived a brutal interrogation. He was accused of espionage against the Soviet Union, and in February 1941 he was sentenced to eight years in the camps. In August 1941, Swianiewicz was excluded from the Soviet “amnesty” for Polish prisoners, and he remained in the Ust-Vim camp until April 1942. He was freed following the persistent efforts of the Polish Embassy in Kuibyshev. After his release, Swianiewicz confirmed the claims that he was the only eye witness to the operation connected to the Katyn forest massacre. His story contradicted the official Soviet version that it was the Germans who were guilty. Protected to the utmost by Polish diplomats, Swianiewicz managed to leave for Iran, thus narrowly escaping an attempt by the NKVD to rearrest him. He then supervised the Bureau for Studies in Palestine. In 1944, Swianiewicz took over the eastern department at the Ministry of Peace Congress Preparations of the Polish government-in-exile in London. After the war, he returned to academia. He headed the Department of Economics and Trade at the Polish University College. Then he studied rural overpopulation in Eastern Europe and Asia at the University of Manchester. Between 1956 and 1958, Swianiewicz worked in Indonesia as a UNESCO expert. After returning to the United Kingdom, he lectured at the London School of Economics. In 1963, he took over the chair of economics and statistics at the University of Halifax in Canada. In 1965 he published Forced Labour and Economic Development. In 1973 Swianiewicz retired, and in 1977 he published his memoirs, W cieniu Katynia (In the shadow of Katyn), where he described in detail his experiences in the USSR. (WR)

ŚWIĄTEK Kazimierz [Belorussian: Svyontak] (21 October 1914, Valga, Estonia), cardinal of the Roman Catholic Church in Belorussia. Świątek was born into a Polish noble family. His father was killed in the Polish-Soviet war in 1920. In 1939 Świątek graduated from the Higher Theological Seminary in Pińsk. In April 1939 he was ordained a priest. He started his ministry in Prużany in the summer of 1939, but in the fall of that year, after the Soviet invasion of Poland, he was arrested by the NKVD, taken to Brest Prison, and hardly escaped death. Released after the German seizure of the town in June 1941, Świątek returned to his ministry in Prużany. In 1944 he was arrested again by the Soviet organs and sentenced to ten years of a labor camp. He served in the Vorkuta camps, where he secretly ministered among the prisoners. After his release in 1953 Świątek became a parish priest in the Pinsk cathedral. He continued his ministry despite constant harassment by the Soviet authorities. On 21 May 1991 Świątek was appointed archbishop of Minsk-Mogilev and administrator of the Pinsk diocese. On 26 November 1994 Pope John Paul II elevated him to the rank of cardinal. In his pastoral work Świątek dealt with the organization of church work and tried to avoid involvement in the current political struggles. Świątek enjoys enormous popularity among the Poles in Belorussia, although he avoids the identification of Roman Catholicism with the Polish culture. He supports Belorussian national revival, using the Belorussian language in public. (EM)

ŚWIĄTKOWSKI Henryk (2 April 1896, Dzierżążnia, near Płońsk–2 March 1970, Warsaw), Polish Communist activist. Born into a teacher's family, in 1920 Świątkowski graduated from the Law School of the University of Warsaw. In 1923 he joined the Polish Socialist Party. Between May 1931 and February 1934, he sat on its Supreme Council, and from 1928 through 1935, he represented it in the parliament. Świątkowski was a political trial lawyer in Zamość and Warsaw, defending Communists (among others). In 1940 and 1941 he was imprisoned in Pawiak Prison in Warsaw and in the Auschwitz concentration camp. After his release, he joined the leftist underground. In May 1944 Świątkowski became a member of the Supreme Council of the Workers' Party of Polish Socialists (Rada Naczelna Robotniczej Partii Polskich Socjalistów), which collaborated with the Communists. One of the leaders of the Communist-approved Polish Socialist Party (PPS), between February and June 1945 Świątkowski chaired its Supreme Council, and in July he was coopted as a member of the PPS Central Executive Committee. He strove to achieve its unification with the (Communist) Polish Workers' Party by purging the ranks of the PPS of non-conformist activists. In April 1945 Świątkowski was appointed deputy minister and in May 1945 minister of justice in the Provisional Government. In 1947, he became a professor at the University of Warsaw, presenting the idea that law was "the will of the ruling class." Świątkowski fulfilled his ministerial functions in the Provisional Government of National Unity and in succeeding governments that were fully controlled by the Communists. In December 1948, he became a member of the Central Committee of the (Communist) Polish United Workers' Party (Polska Zjednoczona Partia Robotnicza). From December 1948 to 1950 he also served on its Politburo and in the Secretariat. As minister of justice, Świątkowski rubber-stamped the crimes of Stalinism in Poland. He was relieved of his portfolio in April 1956 during the "thaw." He not only was not punished for his role in the Stalinization of the judiciary, but in 1957 he was also appointed dean of the Law School at the University of Warsaw. Świątkowski retired in 1961. ŚWIERCZEWSKI Karol, pseudonym "Walter" (10 February 1897, Warsaw–28 March 1947, near Baligród, Poland), Soviet general of Polish descent. The details of Świerczewski's descent, childhood, and youth are uncertain. According to the official biography, he was born into the family of a Polish skilled laborer in Warsaw. He had five siblings. He finished four grades of primary school, where he learned Russian. He worked as an apprentice in the workshops of the Gwiżdźński plant and then in the Gerlach factory. After his father's death in 1912, he became the main breadwinner in the family. In 1915 the withdrawing Russian troops evacuated the Gerlach factory and some of its employees, including Świerczewski and his family. They were sent to Kazan and then to Moscow, where he got a job in the Pravodnik cable factory.

After the Bolshevik revolution, Świerczewski joined the Red Guards (December 1917) and then the Bolshevik party (November 1918). As a soldier of the 123rd Rifle Regiment, he fought against the White Russian forces. In the summer of 1920 he took part in the Bolshevik invasion of Poland. Wounded two times, he spent several months in a hospital. Assigned to the Red Communist

School in March 1921, he taught infantry tactics. He was also promoted to battalion commander, later becoming a political commissar. As part of their training, in 1921 he and his students helped to beat the insurgent troops led by Sergey Antonov in Tambov Province. Later Świerczewski studied at the Frunze Military Academy. After graduating, he was successively promoted to chief of staff of a cavalry regiment in the Kiev Military District, deputy chief of the Seventh Department of the staff of the Belorussian Military District, and chief of the Fourth Department of the Board of the Red Army General Staff. He simultaneously served as deputy chief of one of the departments of the Soviet military intelligence directorate (Glavnoe Razvedyvatelnoe Upravlenie [GRU]). In December 1936 Świerczewski was sent, with the rank of general, to Spain, where he commanded the Fourteenth International Brigade on the southern front, and in February 1936 he became commander of Division A on the Madrid front. He later commanded the Thirty-fifth and then the Forty-fifth Divisions. He distinguished himself during the Saragossa offensive and the retreat on the Aragon front. Apart from fighting against Franco's forces, Świerczewski energetically conducted purges in the ranks of the international volunteers and executed prisoners of war as well as his own men. However, he was a very popular commander with the Stalinists. In May 1938 he was called back to the Soviet Union, where he became a lecturer at the Frunze Military Academy.

After the Third Reich attacked the Soviet Union in June 1941, Świerczewski commanded the 248th Rifle Division, and when it was defeated, he became commander of the Forty-third Reserve Rifle Brigade. Evacuated to the Siberian Military District, he reestablished the Kiev Officers' School there and became its commander. In August 1943 he was assigned, as deputy commander, to the First Corps of the Polish Military Forces, established with Stalin's approval. Świerczewski was also appointed deputy commander of the Polish Army in the Soviet Union and coopted to the Central Office of Polish Communists. He then commanded the Second Polish Army (August–October 1944) and the Third Army (October–December 1944). In January 1945 he again became commander of the Second Army. He also rose through the ranks of the Communist political structures in Poland. A deputy to the National Home Council (Krajowa Rada Narodowa [KRN]) and a member of the Central Committee of the (Communist) Polish Workers' Party (Polska Partia Robotnicza [PPR]), he closely adhered to Stalin's political directives—for example, by refusing clemency to former Home Army soldiers who were sentenced to death. The Second Polish Army under his command was part of the First Belorussian Front. Świerczewski distinguished himself in the battles of the Neisse River and Bautzen. When World War II ended, he was a lieutenant general.

In the summer of 1945 Świerczewski became chief inspector for military settlement and commander of the Poznań Military District. He was in charge of deporting the German population and settling demobilized Polish soldiers in place of the Germans. In February 1946 he was appointed deputy minister of national defense. In the following months he traveled abroad, conducting agitation among the Polish diaspora in Canada, the United States, and Mexico. After returning to Poland, he became an MP in the Polish Legislative Assembly as a result of the rigged parliamentary elections of 19 January 1947. At that time he was in charge of deporting the Ukrainian population from the territories of southeastern Poland (Operation Vistula). In March 1947, while on an inspection trip to the units he commanded, Świerczewski was killed in an ambush set up by the Ukrainian Insurgent Army (UPA). (JK/MC)

ŚWIERZYŃSKI Józef (19 April 1868, Wolnice, near Sandomierz–12 February 1948, Sandomierz), Polish doctor and politician. Born on the estate of his parents, Władysław and Helena (née Konarska), Świerzyński completed a gymnasium in Radom, and in 1887 he enrolled at the School of Medicine of Warsaw University, from which he graduated in 1893. During his studies he was active in secret associations of the pro-independence youth. After gaining a diploma, Świerzyński specialized in internal medicine at the university clinics in Berlin and Giessen. After his return to Poland he worked in a Warsaw hospital, and in 1897 he moved to Jeleniowo, to the estates inherited by his wife in the Świętokrzyskie Mountains. Świerzyński developed educational and social activities there, treating poor country folk for free. The recognition he gained as a result, as well as his joining the National League, led to his election to the State Duma as an MP for his constituency in 1905. Later he was also a member of the Second and Fourth Duma, from which he withdrew in 1915. In 1907 Świerzyński and his family moved from Jeleniowo to Szydłowice, near Sandomierz, where he bought an estate. During World War I he was active in the Relief Committee organized by Bishop Adam Sapieha. In 1917, as the representative of National Democracy, Świerzyński was elected to the Council of State of the Kingdom of Poland. On 23 October 1918 he was appointed head of its new government. Świerzyński sought the resignation of the Regency Council and the creation of a national government. On 3 November he made an attempt in that direction, but he did not get the support of the left or of the peasant parties; therefore he resigned. Between 1919 and 1921 Świerzyński participated in the preparation of the constitution. Later he withdrew entirely from political life and held only the post of chairman of the Polish Educational Society. In 1924, in recognition of his work, he was given the Commander's Cross of the Order of Polonia Restituta. Świerzyński lived and farmed in Szydłowice. At the end of 1939 he established contacts with the Polish underground, which was beginning to form, but because of his ill health his help was limited to financial support. In August 1944 the front line ran through Szydłowice, so Świerzyński and his family had to hide in the cellar. He and his family then went to Sandomierz. As a result of the agricultural reform of the Polish Committee of National Liberation, Świerzyński's land was expropriated, and he died in very difficult material circumstances. (WR)

ŚWIĘTOCHOWSKI Aleksander, pseudonyms "Poseł Prawdy," "Oremus," and others (18 January 1849, Stoczek Łukowski–25 April 1938, Gołotczyzna), Polish pundit and writer. The son of a teacher, Świętochowski graduated from high school in Lublin, and in 1866 he enrolled at the Main School in Warsaw. However, because the school was closed down by the Russian government, his studies were interrupted. In 1870 Świętochowski commenced publishing in Przegląd Tygodniowy, advocating the idea of Positivism. He rejected the Romantic tradition and championed "work at the foundations" (praca u podstaw), which was to raise the nation up from backwardness. He unequivocally supported the emancipation of women. In 1874, Świętochowski left for the University of Leipzig, where the following year he successfully defended his doctoral dissertation in psychology. He also wrote novels, novellas, and plays. His play Ojciec Makary (Father Makary; 1876) caused a scandal (among other things, it was accused of propagating moral anarchy) and ruined his chances of securing a professorship in Galicia. In 1880, Świętochowski founded his own paper, Prawda. It became one of the most influential organs of Polish Positivism. Among other pieces, in it he published his famous column, "Liberum Veto." His rejection of the insurgent tradition made him vulnerable to accusations of collaboration with the partitioning powers, even though he never advocated collaboration.

In the 1890s, Świętochowski was much less active. In 1902, he briefly flirted with the Polish Socialist Party. However, during the revolution of 1905, he advocated liberal democratic solutions, founding and leading the Progressive Democratic Union (Związek Postępowo-Demokratyczny). His links to the Socialists were further weakened because of a serious conflict with Józef Piłsudski, whom Świętochowski considered a terrorist until his dying day. Disappointed in politics, he returned to charity and social work. In 1906, he founded the Society for Polish Culture to fight illiteracy and to propagate the national culture. He sponsored the foundation of an all-female school in Gołotczyzna. Later, a school for boys was also founded. After the outbreak of World War I, Świętochowski sided with the Entente. When Poland regained its independence, he rejoined the political fray, vigorously fighting against Piłsudski, working with the National Democrats, and publishing in their Gazeta Warszawska. He attacked the national minorities (his aphorism was, "Just because vermin feast on an eagle, they won't grow wings"); he enthusiastically embraced right-wing nationalist Eligiusz Niewiadomski, the assassin of Poland's President Gabriel Narutowicz. Świętochowski broke off many old friendships because of his ideological evolution, his disillusionment with democracy, and a certain degree of support for an authoritarian government. However, he firmly criticized Piłsudski's coup d'état in May 1926. He wrote for the opposition press, mainly Christian Democratic papers. Świętochowski published the political pamphlet Genealogia teraźniejszości (The genealogy of the present; 1936) and also the highly valued monograph Historia chłopów polskich (The history of Polish peasants, 2 vols.; 1925–28). ŚWITALSKI Kazimierz (4 March 1886, Sanok–28 December 1962, Warsaw), Polish politician. Świtalski graduated from the University of Lwów (Lviv), where he also received a Ph.D. in philosophy. He was a member of the Union of Active Struggle and the Riflemen's Association. During World War I, from 1914 he served in the Polish Legions, fighting in the Austro-Hungarian Army, and in 1918 he joined the secret Polish Military Organization (Polska Organizacja Wojskowa [POW]). In December 1918, Świtalski became a political adjutant in the General Aide de Camp Office of the Head of State. He was one of the most trusted associates of Józef Piłsudski. From March 1919 to December 1921, Świtalski was his political aide and personal assistant, and between July and October 1920 he worked as secretary of the Council of State Defense. Afterwards, he published in the monthly Droga. In February 1925, he was dismissed from the army at his own request and participated in the preparations for Piłsudski's coup d'état.

Following the coup of May 1926, in June Świtalski was appointed deputy chief of the Civilian Chancellery of the President of the Polish Republic, fulfilling the function of liaison between Piłsudski and President Ignacy Mościcki. Between October 1926 and June 1928, he was director of the Political Department of the Ministry of Interior, organizing the parliamentary elections of 1928. Świtalski belonged to the so-called group of colonels, who supported strong-arm rule by the sanacja regime. Between June 1928 and April 1929 Świtalski was minister for religious confessions and public education, and from 14 April until 7 December 1929 he served as prime minister. His premiership coincided with the Great Depression. In 1930, Świtalski directed the sanacja campaign in the parliamentary elections and was responsible for abuses in the electoral process. Between 1930 and 1935, he was an MP on behalf of the Nonparty Bloc of Cooperation with the Government. From 1933 through 1935, he was the speaker of the Lower House (Sejm). Świtalski was co-author of the April Constitution and the Electoral Law of 1935, which stripped the political parties of the right to propose candidates for parliamentary deputies. Between 1935 and 1938, the president of Poland appointed him senator and deputy speaker of the Senate. However, his career was already on the wane at that time. Between 1935 and 1936 Świtalski served as the governor of Kraków Province. He co-founded the Józef Piłsudski Institute and became its deputy chairman. Between 1939 and 1945 he was in a German POW camp, Oflag Woldenberg. After the war, in 1945, Świtalski returned to Poland. He was imprisoned by the Communists between 1948 and 1956 but was rehabilitated after his release. Świtalski authored Diariusz 1919–1935 (Diary 1919–1935; 1992). (JS)

SYMONENKO Petro (1 August 1952, Stalino [now Donetsk]), Ukrainian Communist and post-Communist activist. From 1969 to 1974 Symonenko studied at the Donetsk Polytechnic Institute, graduating as a mining electromechanical engineer. He was a designer at an institute of the Dondniprovgulemash Works in Donetsk from 1974 to 1975 and an instructor and department head at the Donetsk City Committee of the Komsomol from 1975 to 1977. Symonenko was second secretary of the Donetsk City Committee of the Komsomol (1977–80), secretary of the Donetsk district committee of the Komsomol (1980–82), and secretary of the Komsomol Central Committee (1982–88). From January 1988 to September 1989 he was secretary of the City Committee of the Communist Party of Ukraine (Komunistychna Partiya Ukrainy [CPU]) in Zhdanov (now Mariupol). From 1989 to 1990 he served as secretary for ideology. In 1990 he became second secretary of the Donetsk Regional Committee of the CPU. From December 1991 to December 1993 Symonenko was deputy director of the Ukrvgulemash corporation. In 1993 he became first secretary of the Donetsk Regional Committee of the CPU, and on 19 June 1993, at a CPU congress, he was elected first secretary of the CPU CC. He became a deputy to the Supreme Council of Ukraine in 1994 and leader of the CPU parliamentary faction in 1998. In 1999 Symonenko was a CPU candidate for president of Ukraine. In the first round of the presidential elections he came in second, and in the runoff he obtained 37.8 percent of the vote and was defeated by Leonid Kuchma. In 2002 Symonenko joined the radical anti-presidential opposition formed by Yulia Tymoshenko and the Socialist Party leader, Oleksandr Moroz. He also supported Viktor Yushchenko in the presidential elections of 2004. (BB)

SYROVÝ Jan (24 January 1888, Třebíč–17 October 1970, Prague), Czech general and politician. After finishing a building school in Brno (1907), Syrový worked in various construction companies in Bohemia and, from 1912, in Russia and Warsaw. After the outbreak of World War I, he joined a Czech military unit in the tsarist army in Kiev; he fought in it from October 1914, initially as an ordinary soldier and then as an officer. In 1917 Syrový joined the Czechoslovak Legion, and, as a company commander, he distinguished himself in the battle of Zborów (Zboriv) in Galicia, in which he lost his right eye. Promoted to brigadier general in 1918, Syrový assumed command of Allied forces in the area of the Legion's operations but was then replaced by French general Pierre Janin, whereupon he was appointed commander of the Legion. Syrový served as commander of the Legion during the fighting in the Urals and Siberia and supervised its evacuation to Czechoslovakia in 1920. From 1920 to 1924 he was commander of the Bohemian military district. He subsequently served as deputy chief and, from 1 January 1926 to 1 December 1933, as chief of the General Staff of the army. Syrový was the first Czechoslovak citizen to hold this post (previously held by representatives of the French military mission). He then served as inspector general of the Czechoslovak military forces for five years. Syrový became major general in 1923 and general of the army in 1926. He greatly contributed to the development of the army, cultivated the Legion's traditions, and helped to develop the military doctrine of the state.

From March to October 1926 and from September 1938 to April 1939 Syrový served as minister of national defense in successive cabinets, and in two of them—the last pre-Munich cabinet and the first post-Munich one (22 September–1 December 1938)—he also served as prime minister. As head of the government, Syrový initially announced the mobilization of the army, but under pressure from the Western powers and when General Heliodor Píka had determined that the Western powers were unwilling to help in the case of an outbreak of war with Germany, Syrový was forced to accept the Pact of Munich of 30 September 1938. After President Edvard Beneš resigned, Syrový served as president from 5 October to 30 November 1938. After the Nazi occupation began, Syrový retired from public life and moved to the countryside, where he was kept under surveillance by the Gestapo. Nevertheless, in 1945 he was accused of collaboration with the occupiers. In 1947 the People's Tribunal found him guilty of failure to have ordered the destruction of military equipment and failure to preserve the dignity of a Legionnaire after 15 March 1939. Sentenced to twenty years' imprisonment, Syrový was released under an amnesty in 1960. Until his retirement in 1964 he worked as a night watchman. (PU)

SZABÓ Dezső (10 June 1879, Kolozsvár [now Cluj-Napoca], Transylvania–5 or 13 January 1945, Budapest),

Hungarian writer and journalist. Born into a Transylvanian Calvinist noble family with strong patriotic traditions, Szabó graduated from the Humanities Department of Budapest University as a member of the Eötvös Collegium, an elite school for particularly gifted youth. After graduation, he worked as a gymnasium teacher and was also engaged in committed journalism. He initially contributed to the periodicals Nyugat and Huszádik Század. His views were based on Christianity and on his belief in the superiority of folk culture over cosmopolitan urban culture and his hostile attitude toward capitalism and individualism, as well as on racial determinism, which led to anti-Semitic opinions. Supported by great erudition and literary talent, these views gave rise to many heated polemics and press attacks, winning him great popularity. One of the precursors of expressionism in Hungary, Szabó was also the founder of the so-called allegorical novella and one of the more acclaimed Hungarian naturalist prose writers. His most popular work, Az elsodort falu (The village that was swept away; 1919)—a novel about life in the Hungarian provinces—is interpreted as praise for the rule of Regent Miklós Horthy. In the 1930s, though, in his articles and in the periodicals he founded and edited (Kritikai Füzetek, Ludas Máttyás Füzetek), Szabó was aligned with those who protested against Horthy's social conservatism. At that time Szabó expounded his views in a series of eighty essays, each about one hundred pages long, published under the title Ludas Máttyás Füzetek (The essays of Matthias Goose) in 1934–42. A selection from this collection was also published under the title Egész látóhatár (The whole horizon; 1939). In the 1940s Szabó became an outspoken critic of fascism and Nazism, and he greatly contributed to the dispelling of illusions about Hungary's alliance with Nazi Germany. Seriously ill, Szabó died in solitude during the siege of Budapest by the Red Army. Until the end of the 1960s his name and works seldom appeared in print in Hungary, and when they did, it was in a negative context. (MS)

SZABÓ István Nagyatádi (from the town of Nagyatád) (17 September 1863, Erdősokonya–1 November 1924, Erdősokonya), Hungarian Peasant Party politician. The son of a smallholder, Szabó finished six grades of an elementary school and three grades of supplementary school but then had to give up education owing to financial difficulties. After military service in Budapest (1884–87), he returned to the countryside, where he ran a small farm.

He worked hard, and by the outbreak of World War I he had enough savings to enlarge his farm. From 1889 to 1904 Szabó worked as a judge in his home town. In 1904 he became a member of the local government of Somogy County. In January 1908 he helped to establish the Association of Smallholders of Somogy County and then became its head. A few weeks later he also became a member of the leadership of the Smallholders' Union in Hungary. In that year he also won a parliamentary seat, which he held until the end of his life. Dissatisfied with the policies of the ruling '48 and Independence, in 1909 Szabó co-organized a peasant congress in Nagyatád, where the '48 and Independence National Farmers' Party (48-as és Függetlenségi Országos Gazdapárt) was established, and he became its chairman. The program of this party included a demand to expropriate some of the large landed estates.

Fearing that the so-called historical Greater Hungary might disintegrate, Szabó passively observed the revolution of 31 October 1918, and it was not until ten days later that he joined the Hungarian National Council. In November his party was renamed the National Smallholders' Party. The program of the party included a radical agricultural reform and the introduction of universal suffrage and the secret ballot. In January 1919 Szabó became minister for agricultural reform and, one month later, minister of the economy in Dénes Berinkey's government, established after Count Mihály Károlyi was elected president. After the Hungarian Soviet Republic (HSR) was established, Szabó returned to the countryside. After the fall of the HSR, he briefly served as minister of agriculture in the government of István Friedrich (August 1919). He protested against the "White Terror" and plans to impose a military dictatorship; as a result, he was detained in September but was soon released on the orders of Miklós Horthy. Two months later Szabó's party merged with another agrarian party into the Smallholders' and Agrarian Laborers' Party (Országos Kisgazda és Földműves Párt [OKFP]), led by Szabó. Szabó served as minister for supplies (November 1919–August 1920) and minister of agriculture (August 1920–December 1921 and June 1922–October 1924) in the governments of Count Pál Teleki and Count István Bethlen. From December 1920 to June 1921 he also served as minister for smallholders' affairs.

On the orders of Prime Minister Teleki, Szabó drafted a proposal for agricultural reform that was enacted in November 1920 by the parliament in a form changed for the benefit of large estate owners. Szabó attempted to implement this law—which was linked to his name—but had to make numerous compromises and concessions. In the 1920s, under this law over 400,000 peasants gained on average 2.38 cadastral acres (2.47 acres to one hectare), and over 250,000 peasants received a building plot. In February 1922 Bethlen, along with his supporters, joined the OKFP and then transformed and expanded it as Unity Party (Egységes Párt), which, as the strongest parliamentary force, was the ruling party for over ten years. Szabó formally continued as its leader but actually had no influence in this new party. At the beginning of 1924 Bethlen attempted to force Szabó to resign, accusing him of involvement in a corruption scandal. Although the court was unable to prove anything against Szabó, in October 1924 Szabó resigned and returned to his native village, where he suffered a stroke and died. (JT)

SZABÓ János (17 November 1897, Zaruzsény [now in Romania]–19 January 1957, Budapest), one of the leaders of the Hungarian Revolution of 1956. Born into a poor peasant family from Transylvania, Szabó completed two grades of secondary school and then trained as a locksmith. From 1914 to 1918 he fought in the Austro-Hungarian Army. Under the Hungarian Soviet Republic (March–August 1919), Szabó served as a company commander in the Hungarian Red Army. After Transylvania was incorporated into Romania, he worked as a railwayman there. In 1944 Szabó moved to Hungary and worked as a chauffeur at the Ministry of Agriculture. From 1946 onwards he made a living doing odd jobs. In 1945 he joined the Hungarian Communist Party (HCP), and in 1948–49 he belonged to the Hungarian Workers' Party (HWP). In 1949 Szabó was sentenced to three months' imprisonment for trying to illegally cross the border. Arrested again in 1953 and charged with espionage, he was released after nine months in jail. On 26 October 1956 Szabó joined the insurgents from Széna Square in Budapest and soon became their leader. His group was repeatedly dispersed by So$ fa many of whom were arrested. Having surrendered Széna Square, his group continued fighting in the outskirts of Budapest. On 19 November Szabó was arrested. He was initially interrogated by KGB officers. On 14 January 1957 the Supreme Court sentenced Szabó, together with József Dudás, to death without the right of appeal on charges of leading a conspiracy against “the people’s government.” Szabó was executed five days later. SZAKASITS Árpád (6 December 1888, Budapest–3 May 1965, Budapest), Hungarian Socialist politician who cooperated with the Communists. Born into a very poor family, Szakasits began working as a carpenter and stonemason at the age of thirteen. He became active in the trade union movement before World War I. In 1919, under the Hungarian Soviet Republic, he took part in the plundering of bourgeois houses, as a result of which he was arrested by the Horthy authorities and spent almost one year in prison. Between the two wars Szakasits was a member of the Hungarian Social Democratic Party (Magyarországi Szociáldemokrata Párt [MSP]). In November 1938 he became the MSP secretary general, and from 1939 to 1944 he was the editor-in-chief of its press organ, Népszava. From 1941 on Szakasits increasingly sharply protested against the policy of Miklós Horthy. As a result of his close relations with the Communists, Szakasits was removed from the leadership of the MSP in June 1942. At the end of 1944, taking advantage of the fact that the MSP leader, Károly Peyer, had been imprisoned by the Germans, Szakasits took over the leadership of the MSP with the help of a group of his pro-Communist supporters.

From 1945 to 1948 Szakasits served as minister of state. At the beginning of 1945 he again became secretary general of the MSP and followed a policy of close cooperation with the Communists. He prevented Peyer from regaining the leadership of the party and effected the dismissal of Ágoston Valentiny, the MSP minister of justice who conducted an investigation on crimes committed by the political police. Szakasits also led a campaign against the ruling Independent Smallholders’ Party (ISP). In reward, after President Zoltán Tildy was forced to resign, Szakasits was made president of Hungary (3 August 1948), and when a Communist constitution came into force, he became chairman of the Presiding Council of the Hungarian People’s Republic (August 1949). In June 1948, at the “unification” congress of the two parties of workers, Szakasits was elected chairman of the newly established Hungarian Workers’ Party (Magyar Dolgozók Pártja [MDP]), but he actually did not have any power. The party purge machinery crushed him as well: imprisoned on 24 April 1950, Szakasits was dismissed from his position two weeks later and sentenced to life imprisonment in November 1950. Released in March 1956, Szakasits was rehabilitated four months later, but he was too discredited to play any role in the 1956 revolution. Under the government of János Kádár Szakasits served as an MP (from 1958), chairman of the Association of Hungarian Journalists, and deputy chairman and chairman (from 1963) of the Hungarian Peace Council. From 1959 until the end of his life Szakasits was a member of the Central Committee (CC) of the (Communist) Hungarian Socialist Workers’ Party, and from 1959 to 1963 he served as chairman of the World Union of Hungarians. SZÁLASI Ferenc (6 January 1897, Kassa [now Košice, Slovakia]–12 March 1946, Budapest), Hungarian leader of the extreme right-wing nationalists. Szálasi’s father was a Transylvanian Armenian by the name of Salosján, and his mother came from a mixed Slovak-Hungarian family. After graduating from the Military Academy in Wiener Neustadt (1915), Szálasi was promoted to lieutenant and fought on the Italian front until 1918. In 1924 he graduated from another military academy. From 1925 on he held various positions in the General Staff in Budapest. In 1930 he joined the Hungarian Life League, a secret organization with a racist program. Promoted to major in 1932, Szálasi began to work in counterintelligence in 1933. In the work “Cél és Követelésék” (Goals and demands; 1933) Szálasi presented his own ideological system, known as Hungarism, which combined extreme populism, nationalism, and anti-Semitism. Like in Nazism, a special role was to be played by the leader, who was best aware of the problems plaguing the nation. Banned from conducting political activities in the army, Szálasi was allowed to retire from the army in 1935. He then founded the Party of National Will (Nemzet Akaratának Pártja), but it was disbanded in April 1937 and Szálasi was sentenced to three months’ imprisonment for subversive activities. In March 1938, after his release, he brought about a unification of the extremely rightist groups into the Hungarian National Socialist Party–Hungarist Movement (Magyar Nemzeti Szocialista Párt–Hungarista Mozgalom) and served as its leader. This party gained popularity as a result of its propaganda of territorial revisionism; slogans of radical agricultural reform; and calls for combating Bolshevism, liberalism, plutocracy, and the Jews.

Arrested again in the spring of 1938, Szálasi was sentenced to three years in prison for anti-state activities. In February 1939 his party was declared illegal, but with German financial and political support it was soon revived as the Arrow Cross Party–Hungarist Movement (Nyilaskeresztes Párt–Hungarista Mozgalom); it obtained over one million votes and 12.5 percent of the seats in the elections of May 1939. In 1940 Szálasi was released from prison under an amnesty declared on the occasion of the Second Vienna Award of August 1940, when Hungary regained Northern Transylvania. In the autumn of 1943 the Germans increased their pressure on Regent Miklós Horthy because of the increasingly uncertain stance of Hungary as their ally. A day after Horthy failed in an attempt to extricate Hungary from the war (15 October 1944), Szálasi—with the help of German occupation troops—took over power, and Horthy was forced to make him prime minister. On 3 November, as a self-appointed “head of the nation” (nemzetvezető), Szálasi combined the powers of head of state and prime minister. His main aim was to continue the war, as he believed in the victory of the Third Reich. He ordered a general mobilization, and the state machine introduced unlimited terror. Many thousands of Jews were killed or deported to extermination camps. Deserters from the front lines and people of anti-Nazi views were imprisoned and executed. As the Red Army approached, Szálasi and his government moved to western Hungary, and at the end of March 1945 he fled to Germany. Captured by U.S. troops on 5 May, Szálasi was returned to Hungary five months later. Brought before the People’s Tribunal in Budapest, he was tried for war crimes, sentenced to death on 1 March 1946, and executed. Szálasi naplója (Szálasi’s diary) was published in Budapest in 1978. SZAMUELY Tibor (27 December 1890, Nyíregyháza–2 August 1919, Austria), Hungarian Communist activist.

Szamuely came from a Jewish merchant family. He became involved in the worker movement in his youth. After going to Budapest, he worked as deputy editor of a minor anti-clerical periodical, and in 1913 he joined the editorial staff of the Socialist newspaper Népszava. At that time he drafted an anti-church pasquinade about a “Country of the Virgin Mary under the Yoke of Priests.” Inducted into the army in 1914, Szamuely was taken prisoner by the Russians. In captivity he consolidated his revolutionary views. In January 1918, after his release, he arrived in Moscow, where he met Béla Kun. Together they edited Bolshevik papers in Hungarian and campaigned among former Hungarian prisoners of war for a world revolution on the side of Lenin. A political commissar in an international battalion in Moscow, Szamuely often traveled to Switzerland on the orders of the Bolshevik authorities. After a meeting with Lenin in late 1918, Szamuely hatched a plan to seize power in Hungary, and in January 1919 he went to Budapest.

Arrested on suspicion of having committed killings in Russia but then released, from February to March 1919 Szamuely de facto headed the Hungarian Communist Party (HCP), most of whose members were in prison. After an agreement between the Social Democrats and President Mihály Károlyi was reached in late March 1919, these Communists were released, and a radical left-wing government was established. Szamuely became deputy commissar for military affairs and commissar for trade and education of the Hungarian Soviet Republic (HSR). He was a member of the radical, terrorist wing of the HSR authorities and served as a liaison officer between these authorities and Lenin. In April 1919 Szamuely was appointed political officer of the Budapest military district. In this role he was responsible for the killings and lynchings of “counterrevolutionaries” and “enemies of the people.” He personally led many such actions. In May Szamuely flew to Moscow; from there he brought Lenin’s appeal to the Hungarian proletariat. In June 1919 he also briefly served as commissar for production of the short-lived Slovak Soviet Republic. Szamuely’s zealotry led to the unleashing of terror, which ended with the fall of the HSR. Szamuely fled Budapest, crossed the Austrian border, and then was killed in unclear circumstances, probably in an encounter with the soldiers of Miklós Horthy. (WR) SZÁNTÓ Zoltán (17 December 1893, Nagykanizsa–26 March 1977, Budapest), Hungarian Communist activist. The son of a butcher, Szántó graduated from a school of commerce. In 1914, after completing officer training, he was sent to the Galician front. Taken prisoner by the Russians in May 1916, he became involved in the Russian revolutionary movement. After returning to his country, Szántó helped to establish the Hungarian Communist Party (HCP) in November 1918. Under the Hungarian Soviet Republic (HSR) Szántó held a variety of positions, including those of regiment commander in the Hungarian Red Army and political commissar of a division. In the summer of 1919, after the fall of the HSR, Szántó fled to Vienna, where he became a deputy member of the HCP Central Committee (CC) in the spring of 1926. After returning to Hungary, he was arrested in January 1927 and sentenced to eight and a half years in prison. Released in 1935, Szántó emigrated to Moscow, where he worked in the secretariat of the Communist International, and in 1938 he became HCP representative on the Comintern Executive Committee. During World War II he edited Hungarian-language broadcasts for Moscow Radio. In 1944 he became editor-in-chief of the Hungarian Kossuth Radio in Moscow.

After returning to Hungary in June 1945, Szántó became secretary of an HCP committee in northwestern Hungary and a member of parliament (1945–47). He served as ambassador to Belgrade and Tirana (1947–49) and then Paris (until 1954). In May 1945, on behalf of Prime Minister Imre Nagy, Szántó organized the Information Office of the Council of Ministers in Budapest and then became its chairman. He also joined the CC of the Hungarian Workers' Party (Magyar Dolgozók Pártja [HWP]). After the fall of Nagy in the spring of 1955, Szántó became ambassador to Warsaw. In late July 1956 he returned to Hungary. At a late-night CC meeting on 23 October 1956 he was elected a member of the HWP Politburo. He soon joined an even more important executive committee of the party. On 30 October on his initiative the Hungarian Socialist Workers' Party (Magyar Szocialista Munkáspárt [HSWP]) was established. The following day Szántó became a member of the seven-member committee of the HSWP. Along with György Lukács, he was against Hungary's withdrawal from the Warsaw Pact. On 4 November Szántó was granted asylum in the Yugoslav Embassy in Budapest. On 18 November, like Lukács, he left the embassy building and was arrested by the Russians. On 23 November, together with other members of Nagy's group, Szántó was interned in Romania. He almost immediately dissociated himself from this group, and during the investigations he testified against Nagy and his associates. After returning to Hungary in the autumn of 1958, Szántó retired. (JT)

SZÁSZ Béla (9 July 1910, Szombathely–25 June 1999, Norfolk, England), Hungarian politician. In 1928 Szász began to study at the Department of Economics of the Technical University of Budapest. He later studied Hungarian and French philology and art history at Péter Pázmány Royal Hungarian University in Budapest. In 1930 he began to study at the Sorbonne. While a student, Szász joined the illegal Communist movement and contributed to the periodicals Virradat and Kortárs. In 1932 the Horthy authorities sentenced Szász to a three-month imprisonment. In 1937 he emigrated to France, where he worked as an assistant to Jean Renoir. He shot films and wrote articles for newspapers. In 1939 he edited Üzenet, a Paris-based periodical of Hungarian writers. From 1939 to 1946 Szász lived in Argentina. He worked as a laborer to make ends meet and was a keen photographer. In 1941 he became secretary general of the South American Movement of Free Hungarians and the editor-in-chief of the newspapers Szabad Magyar Értesítő and Új Világ. After returning to Hungary in 1946, Szász worked as editor of the periodicals Képes Hét and Jövendő. In 1948 he began working at the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, and in 1949 he was transferred to the Ministry of Agriculture, where he headed a press department.

On 24 May 1949 Szász was arrested on a false charge of spying in connection with the case of László Rajk. Despite being tortured, Szász did not plead guilty. Sentenced to ten years' imprisonment in 1950, he was released on 1 September 1954, and then he was rehabilitated. Szász worked as a reviewer of manuscripts submitted to various publishing houses. On 6 October 1956, at the funeral of Rajk and his associates, Szász delivered a funeral speech on behalf of the surviving co-defendants. In 1957 he emigrated again. He initially lived in Vienna and then settled in England. From 1959 to 1963 Szász participated in the work of the Imre Nagy Institute in Brussels. The year 1963 saw the publication of his famous memoirs, Minden kényszer nélkül: Egy műper története (Volunteers for the Gallows: Anatomy of a Show-Trial), 1971). This book is still the most credible chronicle of lawlessness surrounding the Rajk trial. It was translated into many languages, but it was not until 1989 that it could be legally published in

Hungary. In 1965 Szász became a commentator for the Hungarian section of the BBC. In 1991 he was honored with the Ius Humana prize, and in 1994 he was awarded the Imre Nagy Commemorative Plaque. (JT)

SZEKFŰ Gyula (23 May 1883, Székesfehérvár–29 June 1955, Budapest), Hungarian historian. In 1904 Szekfű became a history and Latin teacher at the elite Eötvös Collegium and at Budapest University. After earning a Ph.D., he worked at the Hungarian National Museum, and then he began working at the State Archives (1908) and at the Imperial Court Archives in Vienna (1909). In 1916 Szekfű became a visiting lecturer at the university in Budapest. In 1925 he took up the Chair of the Recent History of Hungary there and founded a new school of thought. In 1927 Szekfű founded and, until 1938 edited, the liberal-conservative cultural periodical Magyar Szemle, which was highly regarded by the Hungarian intellectual elite. During World War II Szekfű actively opposed Hungary's involvement on the side of the Third Reich. After Germany occupied Hungary in March 1944, he went underground. In 1945 he entered the diplomatic service. He served as ambassador to Moscow until 1948. He became an MP (1953) and a member of the Presiding Council (1954). In 1925 he became a corresponding member and in 1941 a full member of the Hungarian Academy of Sciences.

Szekfű left a very strong mark on twentieth-century Hungarian historiography. He was an opponent of the "laws of history" and emphasized the role of a creative spirit in history. However, he was against a romantic-national understanding of Hungarian history and adhered to the principles of the verification of sources, rational argumentation, and scientific proof. His work Három nemzedék (Three generations; 1920) provided historical legitimization for the takeover of power by Miklós Horthy after the fall of the Hungarian Soviet Republic; still, Szekfű was less critical of the role of the Habsburgs in Hungarian history than other authors. Szekfű played a major role in raising the nineteenth-century poet Sándor Petőfi to the position of the greatest figure in Hungarian history. From the 1930s on Szekfű openly criticized fascism from the conservative and Christian points of view. He presented a pessimistic vision of social evolution in Három nemzedék és ami utána következik (Three generations and what comes next; 1934). Although Marxists sharply criticized him, Szekfű was the only eminent prewar Hungarian historian who neither emigrated nor was imprisoned after the Communists came to power. Communist historiography accepted many of his views on

Hungarian history and its heroes. Among Szekfű's other major works are the following: Petőfi centenárium (The one hundredth birthday of Petőfi; 1924); A magyar állam életrajza (Curriculum vitae of the Hungarian state; 1917); Magyar történet (Hungarian history, 8 vols.; 1929–33 [co-authored with Bálint Hóman]); Állam és nemzet (State and nation; 1942); Valahol utat veszítettünk (We lost our way somewhere; 1942–43); and Az öreg Kossuth (The old Kossuth; 1952). SZÉLL Kálmán (8 June 1843, Gasztony–16 August 1915, Rátót), Hungarian politician. Born into a lesser gentry family, Széll received a law degree from Budapest University. In 1861 he passed an official exam and two years later earned a Ph.D. In 1867 he became deputy head of Vas County. In the same year he married. His wife—a daughter of Mihály Vörösmarty, the finest Hungarian Romantic poet—had been brought up by Ferenc Deák, one of the greatest nineteenth-century Hungarian politicians and the co-author of the Compromise (Ausgleich) of 1867, by which the Dual Monarchy of Austria-Hungary was established. Elected to the parliament on the slate of the ruling party in 1868, Széll served as an MP until 1911. From 1875 to 1878 he was minister of finance. He then became the managing director and chairman of the Mortgage Bank, which under his management became one of the most important banks in Hungary. On his Rátót estate, he created a model farm, famous for cattle breeding. On 26 February 1899 Széll became prime minister of Hungary. At the beginning of 1903, as a result of his efforts, an agreement on the restoration of economic union between Austria and Hungary, necessary for the maintenance of the monarchy, was signed with the Austrian prime minister, Ernst von Körber (hence it is also known as the Széll-Körber Compact). When Francis Joseph, emperor of Austria and king of Hungary, soon insisted on an increase in military spending and on the recruitment of Hungarians into a common army, the parliamentary opposition reacted by stonewalling and demanding that first Hungarian be introduced as the language of military service and in the commands of military units stationed in Hungary. As a result of this parliamentary obstruction, on 27 June 1903 the government collapsed. In 1905 Széll left the Liberal Party (Szabadelvű Párt), which lost the elections after having been in power for thirty years. He then went over to the Constitutional Party (Alkotmánypárt), which was a part of the “national coalition” that ruled the country from 1906 to 1910. Széll became chairman of the Constitutional Party and held this post until 1910. He later refused to take part in governing the state and devoted himself to business. (JT)

SZENT-GYÖRGYI Albert (16 September 1893, Budapest–22 October 1986, Woods Hole, Massachusetts), Hungarian biochemist, winner of the 1937 Nobel Prize for physiology or medicine, representative of the fourth generation of scholars in the family. While a student at the University of Budapest (1911–17), Szent-Györgyi became interested in morphology, conducting independent research on tissue samples in the family’s Lenhossék Institute. After earning a medical degree, he underwent further training and conducted research at the Universities of Bratislava, Prague, Berlin, Leiden, Groningen, and Oxford, earning a Ph.D. in 1927. In 1928 Szent-Györgyi identified vitamin C as ascorbic acid, which he isolated from paprika, and in 1933 he established its chemical structure. From 1931 to 1945 he was a professor at the University of Szeged. Using his scholarly authority and international connections, Szent-Györgyi joined the diplomatic efforts of Miklós Kállay’s government to extricate Hungary from World War II. In 1943 he traveled to Turkey to negotiate with the representatives of the Western powers, but these negotiations were only a qualified success, partly as a result of a restrained response from the Allies and partly because of a failure to keep this mission secret from the Germans. From 1945 to 1947 Szent-Györgyi taught at the University of Budapest. He also served as vice-president of the Hungarian Academy of Sciences (until 1948). In 1947 he left for the United States, where he became a recognized authority in the biochemistry of muscles and the mechanisms of cell respiration. From the mid-1960s onwards he occasionally visited Hungary for scholarly purposes. From the mid-1970s on his works began to be published in Hungary again. After his death, the Medical University in Szeged was named after him. Szent-Györgyi’s most important works include Muscular Contraction (1947), Az élet jellege (The essence of life; 1975), and Introduction to a Submolecular Biology (1960). (MS)

SZEPTYCKI Stanisław (3 November 1867, Przyłbice, near Jaworów–9 October 1950, Korczyn), Polish general. Szeptycki came from an aristocratic family. He was the brother of Andriy Sheptytskyi, the Greek Catholic archbishop metropolitan of Lviv (Lwów). He graduated from high school in Kraków, the Military Technical Academy in Vienna (1888), the Higher Cavalry School (1892), and the School of the General Staff (1896). Gradually advancing in the Austro-Hungarian Army, Szeptycki first became chief of staff of an infantry brigade and then, in 1904, military attaché in Russia as an observer at the Russian-Japanese front. Upon his return in 1906, he was appointed chief of staff of a cavalry division and, in 1912, military attaché to Italy. During World War I Szeptycki served on the Supreme Command and then became chief of staff of the Second Corps. At the end of 1915 he was transferred to lead the Thirtieth Artillery Brigade. On 16 July 1916 he was appointed commander-in-chief of the Third Brigade of the Polish Legions, on 1 August deputy commander of the Legions, and on 21 November commander of the Legions. Because of their differences regarding the Central Powers, Szeptycki clashed with Józef Piłsudski. Whereas Szeptycki was loyal to the Austro-Hungarian leadership, Piłsudski played a complex political game. Between April 1917 and February 1918, Szeptycki served as the Austro-Hungarian governor general in Lublin. He quit his post to protest the Treaty of Brest-Litovsk between the Central Powers and the Bolsheviks. The treaty limited the territory of the Kingdom of Poland, severing the Chełm (Kholm) area from it. Subsequently, Szeptycki was transferred to the Italian front.

At the end of October 1918, Szeptycki arrived in Warsaw, where he was appointed by the Regency Council to become the inspector general of the Polish Army in the making. When, upon his release from Magdeburg Prison Piłsudski appeared in Warsaw, Szeptycki handed him the reins of command over the Polish Army, and he became chief of the General Staff. At the beginning of 1919, Szeptycki nipped a rightist coup in the bud in Warsaw. On 7 February 1919, he tendered his resignation, protesting the Piłsudskite “political intrigues” aimed against him. He took over the command of the Lithuanian-Belorussian Division and, as of April 1919, the Lithuanian-Belorussian front in the struggle against the Bolsheviks. In June 1919, Szeptycki was promoted to the rank of major general. In July 1920 he led the Fourth Army. During the retreat of the Polish troops, a serious clash occurred between Szeptycki and Piłsudski over the command of the military. Following the peace treaty of Riga with Soviet Russia, in March 1921 Szeptycki became the army inspector in Kraków, and in 1922 he led the Polish units to Upper Silesia, which was awarded to Poland by the Council of Ambassadors. Between June and December 1923 he was minister of military affairs with the center-right government of Wincenty Witos, but afterward he returned to his post as the army inspector in Kraków. After the coup d'état of May 1926, Szeptycki resigned his commission and was shifted to the inactive reserves, completely withdrawing from public life. (WR)

SZIGETHY Attila (10 March 1912, Kapuvár–12 August 1957, Győr), one of the leaders of the Hungarian Revolution of 1956. After completing secondary school, Szigethy became a notary. In the mid-1930s he sympathized with the peasant movement, and in 1939 he joined the National Peasant Party (Nemzeti Parasztpárt [NPP]). In 1943 he attended a meeting in Balatonszárszó at which representatives of various orientations (from Catholics and peasants to Communists) condemned Nazism and the regime of Miklós Horthy. After Germany occupied Hungary (March 1944) and the Arrow Cross Party came to power (October 1944), Szigethy sheltered people who were being persecuted, including István Dobi. In 1944 he joined the activities of the Peace Party, which served as a cover for the Communist Party. A local leader of the NPP after the war and a member of parliament from 1947 to 1957, Szigethy was obedient to the Communists. From 1950 to 1954 he was vice-president of the National Council of Győr-Sopron County. In late 1954, as a supporter of the reforms of Prime Minister Imre Nagy, Szigethy was dismissed from his position and appointed director of a state farm in Győr-Sopron County.

On 26 October 1956 Szigethy was elected president of the newly established Provisional National Council in Győr. During the revolution he tried to maintain order and prevent bloodshed in this city. On 28 October he demanded that Nagy abolish the Office of State Security (Államvédelmi Hatóság [ÁVH]), call multiparty parliamentary elections, and enter into negotiations on the withdrawal of Soviet troops from Hungary. On 30 October, by mobilizing the employees of Győr's big factories and soldiers of local units of the Hungarian Army, Szigethy successfully thwarted an attempted putsch against Nagy's government. On that day the Transdanubian National Council was established, and on the following day Szigethy was elected its chairman. Some leaders, including József Dudás, wanted to turn this council into a counter-government to Nagy's cabinet, but Szigethy rejected this idea. On 2 November he headed the council's delegation at negotiations with Nagy in Budapest. After an agreement was reached, Szigethy called on Győr's workers to cooperate. After the second Soviet intervention (4 November), Szigethy went into hiding for a few days, but then he returned to Győr and tried to prevent the arrests of local leaders of the revolution. After the uprising was suppressed, János Kádár attempted to win Szigethy over and offered him the post of government commissioner or minister, but Szigethy rejected this offer. In February 1957 Szigethy went with an official delegation of the Patriotic People's Front to Bulgaria. Arrested on 3 May 1957, he was deprived of his parliamentary seat six days later. Before his trial began, Szigethy committed suicide after several unsuccessful attempts. (JT)

SZILÁGYI József (24 April 1917, Debrecen–24 April 1958, Budapest), Hungarian Communist activist, one of the leaders of the Hungarian Revolution of 1956. Szilágyi graduated from a high school run by the Evangelical Reformed Church, and in 1939 in Debrecen he received a diploma in law. In 1937, while a student, he joined the leftist March Front, and in 1938 he became a member of the Communist Party, which was illegal at that time. Arrested in the spring of 1940, Szilágyi was sentenced to three years' imprisonment for trying to overthrow the system. Released in March 1944, he remained in hiding until the end of World War II. After the war, he became the chief of police in Debrecen and later organized the national command of the police. From 1947 to 1948 Szilágyi served as head of the Security and Army Department of the Central Committee (CC) of the Hungarian Communist Party (HCP) and then of the Hungarian Workers' Party (Magyar Dolgozók Pártja [HWP]). In 1949 Szilágyi questioned the credibility of the trial of László Rajk and his associates; as a result, he was removed from his position, and from 1950 he worked as head of a department in a company that sold agricultural products. In July 1953 he became a co-worker of Prime Minister Imre Nagy. After Nagy was forced out of office, Szilágyi was expelled from the HWP at the beginning of 1956.

On 13 October 1956 Szilágyi spoke on behalf of his friends and brothers-in-arms at the ceremonial funeral of officers who had been the victims of the regime of Mátyás Rákosi. On 22 October he spoke at a rally held by students of Budapest Technical University; at the rally a decision was made to demonstrate in solidarity with the Poles. During the first days of the revolution Szilágyi worked with Sándor Kopácsi in the Budapest Department of the Ministry of Interior, and he negotiated with delegations of the insurgents, trying to limit the number of victims. Szilágyi was one of the aides of Prime Minister Nagy who convinced him to change political direction (27 October). He subsequently organized and headed Nagy's secretariat. On 4 November Szilágyi found refuge in the Yugoslav Embassy, and on 22 November, along with other members of the Nagy group, he was interned in Romania. On 27 March 1957 he was brought back to Budapest. During the investigation Szilágyi refused to answer questions, as he believed the proceedings were illegal, and he went on a hunger strike. Because of this, his case was excluded from the trial of the Nagy group. On 22 April 1958 the Supreme Court sentenced Szilágyi to death without the right of appeal on charges of leading a conspiracy against "the government of the people." Szilágyi was executed two days later. Information about his execution was not announced to the public until June 1958, when a communiqué was issued about the trial and execution of Nagy and his associates, together with whom Szilágyi was ceremonially reburied in June 1989 in Budapest. SZLACHCIC Franciszek (5 February 1920, Buczyna, near Chorzów—4 November 1990, Warsaw), Polish Communist activist. As a young man, Szlachcic worked at the Jaworzno coal mine as a porter. During World War II, he joined the secret (Communist) People's Guard and then the People's Army. In 1943, he became a member of the Polish Workers' Party. After 1945 he worked in the Communist police, in both the uniformed Civic Militia and the plain clothes' Security Office. Among other functions, Szlachcic headed the Provincial Office of Public Security in Olsztyn. In 1953 he graduated from the Party School of the Central Committee (CC) of the Polish United Workers' Party (Polska Zjednoczona Partia Robotnicza [PUWP]), in 1956 from the Higher Military School in Moscow, and in 1960 from the Coal Mining–Steel Works Academy in Kraków. At the time, Szlachcic was a close aide of Mieczysław Moczar. From May 1962 to February 1971, Szlachcic served as deputy minister of interior. In 1963, he was promoted to brigadier general of the Civic Militia. In 1964 he became a deputy member of the PUWP CC, maintaining close contact with the representatives of the Soviet secret services. During the spring of 1968, he directed the police pacifications of student demonstrations. In November 1968, he became a full member of the PUWP CC. In December 1970, he played a significant role in the ousting of Władysław Gomułka and his replacement by Edward Gierek. During the struggle between Moczar and Gierek, Szlachcic supported the latter, and in 1971 he was coopted to the top leadership. He supported the policy of openness toward the West and became a patron of some of the conformists among the intelligentsia. In December 1971 Szlachcic became secretary and member of the Politburo. He supervised the militia and the secret police. Between February and December 1971 he served as minister of interior, and from 1972 through 1974, he sat on the Council of State. By the beginning of 1974, Szlachcic had become the most serious rival to Gierek, and he became the target of attacks of the supporters of the first secretary. In May 1974 Szlachcic became deputy prime minister, but in the following month he was dismissed from the CC Secretariat and the Council of State. In December 1975 he was expelled from the Politburo and the PUWP CC. He became head of the Polish Committee of Norms and Measures (from 1979, the Polish Committee of Norms, Measures, and Quality), keeping his post until 1985. Szlachcic published Gorzki smak władzy: Wspomnienia (A bitter taste of power: Memoirs; 1990). (PK)

SZÓCS Géza (21 August 195,3 Târgu-Mureș [Marosvásárhely], Transylvania), Hungarian poet and politician from Transylvania. Szócs graduated in Hungarian and Russian languages and literatures from Babeș-Bolyai University in Cluj. In 1974 he became an editor of and contributor to leading Hungarian-language periodicals in Romania. In 1980 he became editor of the samizdat periodical Ellenpontok, as a result of which he was persecuted. In 1986 Szőcs emigrated to Switzerland, where he worked with Hungarian and Romanian pro-independence communities and for Radio Free Europe. From 1989 to 1990 Szőcs was director of the Budapest section of Radio Free Europe. In 1990 he returned to Romania, where he became senator and secretary general of the Democratic Alliance of Hungarians in Romania (DAHR), the largest Hungarian minority organization in Romania. Szőcs later served as vice-chairman of the DAHR and was a member of its radical wing. In 1992 he became director of the Transylvanian Press, Book, and Information Publishing House. Since 1974 Szőcs has been publishing poems in which he often draws on fairy tale and surrealist motifs for inspiration. He has authored the following poetry volumes: Te mentél át a vízzen? (Did you walk on water? 1975); Kilátótorony és környéke (The observation tower and the surrounding area; 1977); Ki cserélte el a népet? (Who has exchanged our nation? 1996); and Passió (Passion; 1999). SZTÓJAY Döme [originally Stojaković] (5 January 1883, Versec [now Vršac, Serbia]–22 August 1946, Budapest), Hungarian general, war criminal. Born into a Serbian family in Temes County (now Timiș, Romania), in 1902 Sztójay graduated from a cadet school in Pécs and then continued military studies in Budapest. After doing his military service in various units, he studied at the Military Academy in Vienna (1907–10). In 1910 he was assigned to staff work. During World War I, until 1917 he was in the staff that commanded units in Bosnia and Herzegovina and in Dalmatia. He subsequently served as commander of the Twenty-first Mountain Brigade and head of the Balkan group in the intelligence department of the army high command. After the victory of the Hungarian republican revolution in October 1918, Sztójay became head of the intelligence, counterintelligence, and records department of the Ministry of Military Affairs. Under the Hungarian Soviet Republic (HSR) in 1919 he served as chief of intelligence and counterintelligence of the Hungarian Red Army. After the collapse of the HSR, he again became chief of intelligence in the Ministry of Military Affairs, and then, in November 1919, he was appointed chief of an intelligence group of the command of the National Army led by Miklós Horthy. From July 1920 to 1925 Sztójay was chief of the department of intelligence and counterintelligence. In 1925 he became military attaché with the rank of colonel of the general staff at the legation in Berlin.

In 1933 Sztójay became general. In December 1935 he was appointed ambassador to Berlin. Representing Hungary in the Third Reich, he was fully convinced that it was most beneficial for Hungary's interests to establish as close relations with Nazi Germany as possible. After Nazi troops occupied Hungary (22 March 1944), the Germans demanded that Sztójay be appointed prime minister, as well as minister of foreign affairs. As head of the government, Sztójay subordinated Hungary to the Germans. The opposition parties were disbanded; total press censorship was imposed; the Jews were first confined to ghettos, and then deportations to concentration camps began. The number of Hungarian soldiers fighting on the front increased to three hundred thousand. It was not until late June 1944 that Horthy stood up against Sztójay, banning further deportations of the Budapest Jews. On 29 August 1944, after Romania switched to the Allied side, Horthy dismissed Sztójay, who withdrew from public life. After Horthy resigned as regent and the Arrow Cross Party took over power, Sztójay did not accept any positions, yet in November 1944 he was promoted to lieutenant general in retirement. At the beginning of 1945 he fled to Germany, where he was arrested by the Americans in May 1945 and handed over to Hungary in October 1945. The People's Tribunal declared Sztójay a war criminal because of the directives he had issued as prime minister and on 22 March 1946 sentenced him to death by firing squad. The sentence was upheld by the appellate court and carried out in a prison in Budapest. (JT)

SZWALBE Stanisław (3 June 1898, Warsaw–17 September 1996, Warsaw), Polish Socialist and cooperative activist. Szwalbe came from an intelligentsia family and graduated from the University of Warsaw. Between 1917 and 1922 he was a member of the Polish Socialist Party (Polska Partia Socjalistyczna [PPS]). He was active in cooperative organizations, including the Union of Workers' Cooperative Societies (1919–25), the Społem (Togetherness) Union of Consumer Cooperatives, the Warsaw Building Cooperative (which he founded in 1922), and the Social Building Undertaking. Szwalbe belonged to the Society of the Workers' University (1928–39) and the Workers' Society of the Friends of Children (1928–39). Between 1927 and 1930, he lectured at the Free Polish Academy in Warsaw, and from 1928 through 1936 he sat on the board of the Institute of Social Economy.

During World War II, Szwalbe became a leader of the Workers' Party of Polish Socialists (Robotnicza Partia Polskich Socjalistów [RPPS]), working closely with the Communists. In May 1944, he became chairman of the RPPS Supreme Council and in February 1945 deputy chairman of the Central Executive Committee of the Communist-sponsored PPS. On 1 January 1944 Szwalbe joined the Communist-led Home National Council (Krajowa Rada Narodowa [KRN]). In May 1945, he was appointed its deputy chairman. In June 1945, he participated in a KRN delegation to Moscow for negotiations over the composition of the Provisional Government of National Unity. Szwalbe approved of the tactics of the Kremlin and the (Communist) Polish Workers' Party (PPR). Between July 1945 and September 1945, he chaired the PPS Supreme Council. Following the falsified elections of January 1947, Szwalbe became an MP and was appointed deputy speaker of the Assembly. During the "unification of the workers' movement"—which meant the absorption of the PPS by the Communists—Szwalbe developed some doubts in 1948, but eventually he supported the unification tactics of the PPR. Between December 1948 and March 1954, Szwalbe was a member of the Central Committee (CC) of the Polish United Workers' Party (Polska Zjednoczona Partia Robotnicza [PUWP]), and he also participated in its Central Revisory Commission. Purged from the leadership during the second party congress in 1954, Szwalbe remained in the leadership of the cooperative institutions. From 1949 to 1953 he chaired the Supervisory Council of Spółem, and between 1953 and 1955 he chaired the Council of the Central Union of Labor Cooperatives. In 1957 he became deputy chairman of the Supreme Cooperative Council and a year later a deputy chairman of the Cooperative Research Institute. Szwalbe published Wspomnienia i komentarze (Recollections and comments; 1996). (JS)

SZYDLAK Jan (24 November 1925, Siemianowice), Polish Communist activist. Szydlak finished a secondary school. He joined the Polish Workers' Party (Polska Partia Robotnicza [PPR]) in 1945 and the Polish United Workers' Party (Polska Zjednoczona Partia Robotnicza [PUWP]) in December 1948. He was an active member of the Union of Fighting Youth and the Union of Polish Youth operating in Silesia, Kielce, Szczecin, and other areas. In 1951 Szydlak finished the Party School of the Central Committee (CC) of the PUWP and began his party career in Silesia. He headed the Propaganda Department of the PUWP Provincial Committee in Katowice (1951–52) and served as its secretary (1952–54). For two years he served as secretary of the Main Board of the Union of Polish Youth, and then he was again secretary of the PUWP Provincial Committee in Katowice from 1957 to 1960. He was a deputy member (1954–64) and then a member of the PUWP CC. He also served as first secretary of the PUWP Provincial Committee in Poznań (1960–68) and as an MP in the Assembly (1961–80). In 1968 Szydlak took part in a propaganda campaign against intellectuals and students who were on strike. He became secretary of the CC and a deputy member of the PUWP CC Politburo in November 1968 and a member of the PUWP CC Politburo in December 1970. One of the closest associates of Edward Gierek, Szydlak was in charge of (among other things) economic policy and ideology. In 1973 and in 1976 he was considered as a candidate for prime minister. In 1971 Szydlak headed a special party commission to investigate the circumstances of the 1970 strikes on the Baltic Coast, but the commission formulated only superficial conclusions. Szydlak was secretary of the All-Polish Committee of the National Unity Front (1970–72) and chairman of the Main Board of the Polish-Soviet Friendship Society (1974–80). In November 1977 Szydlak left the PUWP CC Secretariat. From December 1976 to February 1980 he served as deputy prime minister and subsequently held the post of chairman of the Central Council of Trade Unions (Centralna Rada Związków Zawodowych) for several months. Szydlak left the Politburo in August 1980 and the CC in October 1980. (PK)

SZYMANOWSKI Karol (6 October 1882, Tymoszwówka, Ukraine–29 March 1937, Lausanne, Switzerland), Polish composer. In 1889, Szymanowski began to take piano lessons with his father and then in the music academy of Gustav Neuhaus in Yelizavetgrad. He graduated from high school in 1900. Between 1901 and 1905, he studied composing with Zygmunt Noskowski and Marek Zawirski in Warsaw. In 1905 he co-founded the Partnership of Young Composers. Later dubbed "Young Poland," the partnership organized concerts and published musical works. Szymanowski's C-minor Piano Sonata received an award at a Chopin competition in Lemberg (Lwów, Lviv) in 1910. Szymanowski traveled abroad quite a bit, and he gave concerts in Germany, Italy, Austria, Algeria, France, and Great Britain. In 1914 he returned to his home estate of Tymoszkówka, where he spent the war. Because of the anarchy and peasant attacks on manor houses in the Ukraine, Szymanowski sought shelter in Yelizavetgrad, and in 1919 he moved to Warsaw. Between 1920 and 1921, he and the famous violinist Paweł Kochoński traveled to the United States twice. In 1922 Szymanowski began visiting Zakopane as he became interested in Polish highlanders' music. From 1927 to 1929 Szymanowski served as director of the Warsaw Conservatory and between 1930 and 1932 as president of the Higher Music Academy in Warsaw. In 1930 he received an honorary doctorate in philosophy from the Jagiellonian University in Kraków. In 1935 he was awarded the State Music Prize. Despite tubercular bouts, Szymanowski performed in many European countries, including France, Belgium, Holland, Italy, Yugoslavia, Bulgaria, Germany, Denmark, Sweden, Norway, and the Soviet Union. Szymanowski died of tuberculosis at a sanatorium in Lausanne and was buried in the Crypt of the Distinguished at the Church of the Pauline Fathers on Skałka in Kraków. Szymanowski was an honorary member of the Czech Academy of Arts and Sciences, the Royal Academy of St. Cecilia in Rome, the Royal Music Academy in Belgrade, and the International Society of Contemporary Music.

Szymanowski's artistic output can be divided into three periods: early (until 1914), middle (Impressionistic), and late (dubbed "national"). The early period was characterized by the influences of Frédéric Chopin, Alexander Skryabin, Richard Wagner, Max Reger, and Richard Strauss. In this period Szymanowski created the variations for piano, First Symphony (1917), Second Symphony (1910), many chants (for example, The Love Chants of Hafisa; 1911), and the opera Hagith (1913). After a trip to Italy and a sojourn in Paris and London in 1914, Szymanowski fell under the influence of Impressionism. During World War I he wrote the Demeter cantata; a piece for piano, Metopy; a piece for violin, Myths (1915); the First Violin Concerto (1916); the Third Symphony (1916); and the Third Piano Sonata (1917). After the war, Szymanowski's compositions also reflect Eastern influences (The Chants of the Mad Muezin, 1918; the ballet Mandragora, 1920; chants to the lyrics of Rabindranath Tagore), as well as the influence of Claude Debussy and Maurice Ravel (Nocturne and Tarantella and the opera King Roger; 1926). After 1924, the dominant element in his works was Polish Kurpie and Podhale folklore, as well as Polish Renaissance music (Mazurkas for the piano, 1926; The Kurpie Chants, 1929; Stabat Mater, 1926; Fourth Symphony, 1932; Second Violin Concerto, 1932; the ballet Harnasie [Highland bandits], 1933).

Considered the greatest Polish composer of the first half of the twentieth century, Szymanowski achieved European fame thanks to the richness of his style and individualism, which absorbed the various eclectic influences of his times but always in his own, easily detectable, personal way. Szymanowski expounded his artistic credo in the novel Efebos (1918). His treatise Wychowawcza rola muzyki w społeczeństwie (The educational role of music in the society; 1925) still remains valuable. Posthumously, the following works of Szymanowski were published: Pisma muzyczne (Musical writings; 1984), Pisma literackie (Literary writings; 1994), and four volumes of Korespondencja (Correspondence; 2002). SZYMBORSKA Wisława (2 July 1923, Bnin [now a part of the town of Kórnik]), Polish poet. Between 1945 and 1948 Szyborska studied Polish literature and sociology at the Jagiellonian University in Kraków. She made her debut as a poet in 1945. Her first volume of poetry, Dlatego żyjemy (That's why we are alive), of a didactic and propagandist character, was published in 1952, and her second collection of poems, Pytania zadawane sobie (Questions put to myself), appeared in 1954. Initially deeply involved in the Communist reality, Szyborska was on the editorial staff of the weekly Życie Literackie from 1952 to 1966, contributing a regular book review column titled "Lektury nadobowiązkowe" (Nonrequired reading) from 1968 to 1981. A collection of these columns was published in 1973 under the same title. From the mid-1950s on, Szyborska gradually abandoned references to modern politics and switched to a personal lyric poetry written in an intellectual and moralizing style. She published further volumes of verse: Wołanie do Yeti (Calling out to Yeti; 1957); Sól (Salt; 1962); Sto pociech (No end of fun; 1967); Wszelki wypadek (Could have; 1972); and Wielka liczba (A large number; 1976). In her poems Szyborska reflected on the existential condition of man and on human attitudes to the passing of time. She presented individuals as beings subjected to the unchanging laws of biology, defenseless and misguided in their hopes and plans and at risk of being alienated and misunderstood. The following collections contain poems noteworthy for their refined simplicity, slightly ironic detachment, precise metaphors, and originality of language jokes: Ludzie na moście (1986; People on a Bridge, 1990); Koniec i początek (The end and the beginning; 1993); Widok z ziarnkiem piasku: 102 wiersze (1996; View with a Grain of Sand, 1995); and Chwila (2002; Chwila/Moment, 2003). Translated into many languages, Szymborska's poems have also won recognition abroad. She has been honored with numerous awards, including the Goethe Prize (1991) and the Herder Prize (1995). In 1996 Szymborska received the Nobel Prize for literature, which won her wide international recognition. Szymborska has been a member of the Polish Academy of Arts and Sciences since 1995. (WR)

SZYR Eugeniusz [originally Gershon] (15 April 1915, Łodygowice, near Żywiec–15 January 2000, Warsaw), Polish Communist activist. Szyr came from a Jewish working-class family. He graduated from high school, and from his youth he was involved with the extreme left, finally joining the Communist Party of Poland in 1934. In 1936, Szyr left for France, where he enrolled in the French Communist Party. From 1937 to 1938, he fought in the Spanish Civil War as a deputy commander of the Thirteenth Jarosław Dąbrowski International Brigade. In March 1939 he was interned in France and Algeria. In 1943, he went to the USSR, where he was assigned to the Union of Polish Patriots and (between 1944 and 1945) to the political apparatus of the Polish Army under Soviet control as chief of the General Organization Department of the Main Political Administration. After his return to Poland, Szyr joined the (Communist) Polish Workers' Party (Polska Partia Robotnicza [PPR]). In April 1947, he was appointed a deputy member of the Central Committee

(CC) of the PPR, and between December 1948 and July 1981 he was a member of the CC of the Polish United Workers' Party (Polska Zjednoczona Partia Robotnicza [PUWP]). From June 1964 through November 1968 Szyr was a member of the Politburo of the PUWP CC. Between 1945 and 1946 Szyr worked as director of the Economic Department of the Ministry of Industry; between March 1947 and April 1949 he was deputy minister of industry and trade; and between April 1949 and March 1954 he was deputy chairman of the State Commission for Economic Planning and later the chairman of the commission until July 1956. Szyr worked closely with the Stalinist economic dictator, Hilary Minc. In particular, from 1947 to 1949, he was the secretary of the Economic Committee of the Council of Ministers, playing an important role in the Stalinization of Poland's economy ("the battle for trade" and the etatization of the cooperative movement). From July to October 1956 he was minister for construction.

As a hard-liner, after the events of 1956, Szyr remained in the shadows for a while, only to return to the pinnacle of power once again. Between 27 October 1959 and 28 March 1972 he was deputy prime minister for economic affairs. His ascent is considered the halting point of the post-October 1956 economic reforms. Between June 1963 and December 1968 Szyr chaired the Committee for Science and Technology. After the March events of 1968, during the anti-Semitic campaign, Szyr was attacked by Communists of the younger generation, but he managed to stay in the government and the party CC because of the support of Władysław Gomułka. Between March 1972 and March 1976 he chaired the State Council for Raw Material Economics, and between March 1976 and October 1981, he served as minister of raw material economics. Szyr was a deputy to the Communist parliament in 1952–56, 1961–69, and 1972–76. (PK)

TAMÁSI Áron (20 September 1897, Farkaslaka [now in Romania]–26 May 1966, Budapest), Hungarian writer and politician. Tamási was born into a Szekler peasant family. Called up for the army in 1916, he took his high school final examinations a year later. In 1918 Tamási fought on the Italian front, where he distinguished himself in the battle of the Piave River. In fall 1918 he failed to return to his unit after a holiday and stayed in Transylvania, taken over by Romania. In 1922 Tamási graduated in law from the Higher School of Economics in Cluj and then worked as a bank clerk. In 1923–25 he lived in the United States, where he also worked at a bank. After his return in 1926, Tamási became a journalist for the Hungarian newspaper Újság, and he began to publish his works. His most famous work is the Ábel trilogy (1932–34) about the fortunes of a Hungarian boy living in a rural environment in a Romania-ruled Transylvania after 1919, then in Romania proper, and then in the United States. A part of this trilogy was translated into English as Abel Alone (1966). In 1934 Tamási became an editor of the literary journal Válasz in Cluj. In 1935, along with other writers, he supported the idea of the New Intellectual Front, and in 1937 he co-organized a meeting in Tîrgu Mureş where the problems of Transylvanian Hungarians were given a critical presentation.

In 1944 Tamási moved to Budapest. In 1945–47 he was a member of parliament representing the National Peasant Party (NPP), and from 1943 to 1949 he was a corresponding member of the Hungarian Academy of Sciences. In the first half of the 1950s he was ignored; after 1953 his works were published again. In 1954 Tamási became a member of the National Council of the Patriotic People's Front, reorganized by Prime Minister Imre Nagy. In September 1956 he was elected co-chairman of the Hungarian Writers' Association (HWA). Tamási was among the first writers to take sides with the revolution, reading his "Hungarian Sigh" on the air on 26 October 1956, a piece that was later also published in the form of leaflets. On 31 October Tamási became a member of the leadership of the renewed NPP, and, along with István Bibó and others, he formulated its program. On 28 December 1956, at a general meeting of the HWA he read a statement he had authored in which Hungarian writers took sides with the suppressed revolution. A year later, however, Tamási publicly distanced himself from the revolution, and in 1959 he became a founding member of the HWA that was established on "new foundations." From 1963 Tamási was a member of the leadership of the Hungarian Peace Council. (JT)

TAMKEVIČIUS Sigitas (7 November 1938, Gudoniai), archbishop of Kaunas. In 1955 Tamkevičius entered the Kaunas Seminary. He was in his third year when he was inducted into the Red Army, where the Communists made efforts to persuade him to abandon his priestly vocation. Discharged from military service in 1960, he returned to the seminary. The KGB unsuccessfully tried to recruit him as an informer, threatening him with expulsion from the seminary. After graduating from the seminary, Tamkevičius was ordained into the priesthood in April 1962 and joined the Jesuit order. He worked in the parishes of Prienai and Vilkaviškis, where he was constantly persecuted by the police because he taught religion to children and preached patriotic sermons. In 1969 he was banned from exercising his pastoral ministry, which he continued underground. In 1970 the KGB allowed him to return to the parish of Kybartai. In 1972 Tamkevičius became one of the leaders of a group that published the underground Chronicle of the Catholic Church of Lithuania. In November 1979 he was a co-founder of the Catholic Committee for the Defense of Rights of Believers. In the spring of 1983, along with Father Alfonas Svarinskas, Tamkevičius was arrested. In December 1983 he was sentenced to six years of forced labor camp and three years in exile. Around forty-seven thousand Lithuanians signed a petition for the release of both priests in June 1993. At the beginning of 1987 Tamkevičius was brought from the labor camp in Perm to KGB headquarters in Vilnius. After he refused to plead guilty, he was again sent to the labor camp. Released in 1988, he returned to Lithuania and became rector of the Kaunas Seminary. On 8 May 1991 he was consecrated bishop. On 4 May 1996 he was appointed archbishop of Kaunas, and on 19 November of that year he became president of the Conference of Lithuanian Bishops. (WR)

TAMMSAARE Anton H. [originally Anton Hansen] (30 January 1878, Vetepere, near Albu–1 March 1940, Tallinn), Estonian writer. Tammsaare came from a peasant family. With the help of his family and taking up various jobs, he graduated from high school (1903) and then became involved in the Konstanin Päts group and had articles published in the radical paper Teataja. After several years Tammsaare managed to save enough money to take up legal studies in Dorpat (Tartu), but tuberculosis forced him to stop in 1911. As a student, Tammsaare was involved in a radical group, Noor Eesti. He went to the Caucasus to improve his health, but after a year returned to Estonia for good. He spent the next six years on his brother's farm in the Kohtla-Järve region. After Estonia gained independence, Tammsaare moved to Tallinn, where he lived with his family until the end of his life. At the beginning, he was involved in political activities, but in the twenty-year period between wars he became entirely devoted to literature, remaining, however, an attentive and critical observer of the Estonian reality in the 1920s and 1930s.

Tammsaare's first works were strongly influenced by the classic writers of Estonian realism, chiefly August Kitzberg and Eduard Vilde, with whom he used to work at Teataja. The revolution of 1905 strongly affected his works. Characteristic of pieces written in this period were psychological portraits of characters such as Kaks paari ja üksainus (Two couples and an only daughter; 1902) and Vanad ja noored (The old and the young; 1903). As a student, Tammsaare touched upon the emancipation of women in the novel Üle piiri (Abroad; 1910). The peak of his literary career was in the independence period. In 1921 he published the drama Juudit and in 1922 a novel, Kõrboja peremees (The master of Kõrboja farm), one of the best Estonian psychological novels, and the five-part novel Tõde ja õigus (Truth and justice; 1928–33) is one of the most important achievements of Estonian literature. In addition to autobiographical themes and descriptions of authentic events from the country's history, in this novel Tammsaare depicted the fortunes of several Estonian generations involved in the revolutionary changes of the nineteenth century. Up to a point, the novel's main character is an alter ego for the author; disgusted by materialism and hypocrisy, the character decides to leave town after many years spent there, moves back to the village where he was born, and regains his calm and spiritual balance. As time went by, Tammsaare became more and more critical of the injustice of the social system, writing Elu ja armastus (Life and love; 1934), Ma armastasin sakslast (I loved a German girl; 1935), and Põrgupõhja uus Vanapagan (Misadventure of the new satan; 1939). In the 1930s he also went in for criticizing dictatorial regimes. For example, in the drama Kuningal on külm (The king is cold; 1936) Tammsaare clearly alludes to Päts's dictatorship. Tammsaare's synthesis of various styles and literary forms in his works is considered one of the main strengths of his writing. Tammsaare enjoyed tremendous authority among his compatriots when he was still alive; with time this appreciation turned into a cult of the writer, for whom a monument was erected in his native Albu while he was still alive. In 1958, in Tammsaare's former home, the authorities of the Estonian SSR arranged a museum dedicated to his writings. Tammsaare's Miniatures were published in English in 1977. (AG)

TAMOŠAITIS Antanas (18 August 1894, Smukučiai, near Raseiniai–July 1940, Kaunas), Lithuanian lawyer and politician, victim of communism. After graduating from a theological seminary in Kaunas in 1915, Tamošaitis taught in a high school, and from 1919 he worked as a school inspector in Zarasai County. In 1920 he was elected to the Constituent Assembly on behalf of the Populists and worked on the parliamentary commission for education. In 1922–25 Tamošaitis studied law at Kaunas University and (from 1925 to 1928) in Vienna and Paris. In 1928 he received a Ph.D. in law at Kaunas University on the basis of a dissertation on the German historical school in economic theory. From 1930 to 1939 Tamošaitis lectured in law at the same university and worked as a lawyer. In 1939 he represented Lithuania before The Hague Tribunal of Justice. In the last government of independent Lithuania, chaired by Antanas Merkys (September 1939–June 1940), Tamošaitis was minister of justice. He authored many articles on law and translated the Code of Hammurabi into Lithuanian. After the Red Army invaded Lithuania, on 12 July 1940 Tamošaitis was arrested by the NKVD and then tortured to death in the Kaunas prison. (WR)

TANCHEV Petur (12 July 1920, Gledka, near Chaskov–21 July 1992, Sofia), Bulgarian peasant activist. In 1935 Tanchev joined the Bulgarian Agrarian Youth Union (BAYU), and in 1945 he became a member of the Bulgarian Agrarian National Union (BANU). In 1941 he graduated in law from the University of Sofia. During his studies he was a leader of the illegal Peasant Youth Association affiliated with BANU and named after Alexandur Stamboliyski. In 1942 Tanchev was arrested for anti-state activities and then detained in Chaskov, where he participated in preparations for the 9 September 1944 coup. After the Fatherland Front took power, Tanchev became secretary of the Central Committee of the Democratic Youth Union (1944–46). In 1944–47 he was also chairman of the BAYU. In 1948–57 Tanchev was vice-secretary for organizational affairs of the Communist satellite BANU Chief Committee, and from 1951 he was a committee member. From 1957 to 1974 he was secretary of the BANU Chief Committee, and then until December 1989 he was its first secretary. From March 1962 to March 1966 he was minister of justice and then deputy prime minister in the government of Todor Zhivkov (12 March 1966–9 July 1971) and first deputy prime minister in the government of Stanko Todorov (9 July 1971–1 November 1974). A member of the National Assembly from 1950 to 1990, in 1958–61 Tanchev was its deputy speaker. In 1971–89 Tanchev was first deputy chairman of the State Council, fully supporting the Communist regime. Tanchev authored publications on the building of a “developed Socialist society” and on BANU “cooperation” with the Bulgarian Communist Party. (JJ)

TÁNCZOS Gábor (2 April 1928, Budapest–6 December 1979, Budapest), Hungarian Communist activist, one of the leaders of the 1956 revolution. Táncczos was the son of a paint salesman. During World War II he worked as a nurse in a concentration camp hospital. In 1945 he joined the Hungarian Communist Party (HCP), and in 1946 he became HCP secretary in Baj County. After graduating from high school, Táncczos was sent to Budapest, where he became vice-secretary general of the Communist-dominated Hungarian National Student Association. In 1948 he took up philosophical studies in the Department of Humanities of Budapest University and was active in various youth organizations. In 1953 Táncczos graduated and became an assistant professor in the Department of Philosophy of this university. At the beginning of 1955 he was elected chairman of the Petőfi Circle (then the Petőfi Club), whose program he formulated in the spirit of Prime Minister Imre Nagy's reformist policy. After Nagy's removal, during one of the most memorable meetings of the circle in June 1956, the Hungarian press was openly criticized. Despite party attacks, Táncczos refused to do a self-criticism; therefore the Central Committee of the party passed a resolution that banned the club.

On 23 October 1956 Táncczos participated in a student demonstration criticizing the inconsistencies of Ernő Gerő's policy and demanding that Nagy be brought back to power. Táncczos took part in establishing the Revolutionary Council of the Hungarian Intelligentsia; after the uprising was suppressed, this group turned out to be one of the most significant organizations offering passive resistance to the new authorities led by János Kádár. On 4 November, Táncczos, along with his wife, joined Nagy's group, asking for asylum in the Yugoslav Embassy. Along with others, Táncczos was abducted on 23 November and kept in detention in Romania. In March 1957 he was taken back to Hungary and sentenced by the Supreme Court to fifteen years in prison on 19 August 1958 in a trial accompanying that of Nagy. In spring 1963 Táncczos was released on a pardon. He then taught in an evening high school and worked in the National Pedagogical Institute. At the end of his life he focused on the fate of the poor, gypsies, and Hungarians living in neighboring countries. In 1979 Táncczos signed a declaration of the emerging Hungarian opposition that expressed solidarity with imprisoned members of the Charter 77 human rights defense movement in Czechoslovakia. Táncczos committed suicide in a fit of depression. In 1990 his remains were moved to the quarters of the executed heroes of the 1956 Hungarian Revolution. (JT)

TARAND Andres (11 January 1940, Tallinn), Estonian politician and ecologist. In 1963 Tarand graduated in geography from Tartu University. From 1963 to 1965 he served in the Soviet Army and subsequently began working in the Tallinn Botanical Gardens, becoming the director at the end of the 1980s. From 1968 to 1970 Tarand took part in the Fourteenth Soviet Antarctic Expedition. In 1973 he earned a doctorate. In 1980, after police had brutally dispersed student demonstrations, Tarand (along with forty other intellectuals) sent a protest letter to the editorial staff of Pravda, in which discrimination against the Estonian language was also condemned. In 1987 Tarand became involved in the activities of the Green Movement (Roheline Likumine), which was founded during protests against the construction of a phosphorite mine that might have caused an ecological catastrophe. Initially Tarand was against the Green Movement's involvement in politics. He took part in the work of the People's Front. Elected to the Supreme Soviet of the Estonian SSR in 1990, Tarand became chairman of its Environmental Protection Committee. In September 1992, in the first free parliamentary elections, he was elected deputy and became minister of environmental protection (October 1992–November 1994).

On 8 November 1994 Tarand became prime minister following the resignation of the center-right cabinet led by Mart Laar, which was discredited by scandals only four months before the new elections. Tarand's cabinet was accepted, to a large extent, owing to the tolerance of the post-Communists. Both Tarand and the opposition regarded it as a provisional cabinet. Still, because he had not been involved in the rivalries among political parties in the 1992–94 period, Tarand enjoyed great popularity, and his government continued free-market reforms. Before the elections of March 1995 Tarand became the leader of the Moderates (Mõõdukad), which saved them from losing all seats in the parliamentary elections. However, the Moderates suffered a defeat in relative terms; therefore, on 17 April 1995 Tarand resigned as head of the government. In the March 1999 elections the Moderates obtained 15 percent of the vote, partly as a result of cooperation with the People's Party. In May 1999 the two parties merged into the People's Party Moderates (Rahvaerakond Mõõdukad). After the elections, Tarand was not invited to join the new center-right government led by Mart Laar. He became chairman of the parliamentary commission for foreign affairs. After the left wing of the People's Moderates suffered a defeat in the local elections in the autumn of 1999—while the right wing of the party, led by Toomas Hendrik Ilves, was quite successful—Tarand's influence diminished, and in 2001 he lost the leadership of the party to Ilves. The official reason for Tarand's resignation was that he was to run in the presidential elections of October 2001; however, he lost these elections. Tarand is one of the most famous Estonian intellectuals. A member of the ecological board of GLOBE, a non-governmental organization, he has authored over one hundred works in the field of climatology and urban environmental protection. In June 2004 Tarand was elected to the European Parliament. (AG)

TARASHKIEVICH Branislau (20 January 1892, Maciuliszki, Lithuania–29 November 1938, USSR), Belorussian politician and linguist. Tarashkievich came from a Catholic peasant family. While a student at the gymnasium in Wilno (Vilnius), he belonged to Polish pro-independence groups. He completed his secondary education in 1911 and historical and philological studies at the university in Petrograd in 1916. From 1911 Tarashkievich was a member of the Belorussian Socialist Hromada (Belaruskaia Satsialistychnaia Hramada) and from October 1917 a member of its Central Committee (CC). Between 1918 and 1920 he was one of the leaders of Belorussian Social Democracy. In 1918 Tarashkievich published a Belorussian grammar for the schools, and from 1918 to 1920 he lectured at the Pedagogical Institute in Minsk, laying the foundations of the modern national consciousness of the Belorussian people. At the beginning of 1919 Tarashkievich was temporarily arrested by the Soviets. From 1919 to 1920 he supported the federation plans of Józef Piłsudski, and in 1919–23 he belonged to the Polish Prawda (Truth) Freemason Lodge. In 1920 Tarashkievich became head of the Department of Belorussian Schools under the Polish administration and head of the Provisional Governing Committee of Central Lithuania, but without the support of the Belorussian National Committee in Wilno. In 1921–22 he was headmaster of the Vilnius Belorussian Gymnasium and one of the leaders of the Society of Belorussian Schools.

In 1922 Tarashkievich was elected to the Polish Assembly, where he headed the Belorussian Parliamentary Club. In most of his thirty-four Assembly speeches he protested the limits on Belorussian education and the restrictions on the social and national freedoms of the Belorussians living in the Eastern Borderland (Kresy) of the Second Republic of Poland. Tarashkievich campaigned for autonomy for these territories. Until 1925 he was involved in undertakings that were supposed to ensure the realization of Belorussian national interests within the framework of Polish democracy, particularly in the field of education. Seeing the fruitlessness of his endeavors, Tarashkievich became associated with communism, recognizing the USSR as an ally in the Belorussian national revival, especially since the Belorussian SSR enjoyed considerable freedom in the arena of national culture at that time. From 1925 he was president of the Belorussian Peasants' and Workers' Hromada (Belaruskaia Sialanska-Pratsounaia Hramada), which favored the creation of an independent Belorussian people's state. At that time the Hromada controlled most important Belorussian organizations and institutions in Poland. From 1925 Tarashkievich was also a member of the Communist Party of Western Belorussia. The Hromada became a hundred-thousand-member organization that threatened the Polish rule in the Eastern Borderland.

On 14 January 1927 Tarashkievich was arrested by the Polish authorities in Wilno. At a trial of Hromada leaders in Wilno he was sentenced to a twelve-year imprisonment for his activities against the Polish state. At the same time he was admitted in absentia as member of the Belorussian Academy of Sciences. In August 1929 Tarashkievich's sentence was commuted to six years. On 28 April 1930 he was released by decree of the president of the Republic of Poland, but he was arrested again in Tczew in February 1931. On 29 November 1931 the District Court in Wilno sentenced Tarashkievich to an eight-year imprisonment for his Communist activities. While in prison, Tarashkievich translated the Iliad, by Homer, and Pan Tadeusz (Master Thaddeus), by Adam Mickiewicz, into Belorussian. On 7 September 1933 Tarashkievich left for the USSR as a result of an exchange of political prisoners between Poland and the Soviet Union. As the Soviet authorities forbade him to stay in the Belorussian SSR, from 1933 Tarashkievich worked at the International Agriculture Institute in Moscow. Within the Great Purge, on 6 May 1937 Tarashkievich was arrested and accused of spying for Poland. Over a year later he was executed by firing squad. He was "rehabilitated" in 1957. In 1991 a collection of Tarashkievich's writings, under the title Vybranaia krytyka, publitsystyka, pereklady (Selected criticisms, political journalism, and translations), was published in Minsk. TARTO Enn (25 September 1938, Tartu), Estonian politician. At the beginning of the 1960s Tarto joined the Estonian National League (Eesti Rahvuslaste Liit), an underground organization founded in a forced labor camp; its program drew on the ideology of the prewar extreme right. Arrested many times by the KGB for his opposition activities, Tarto was imprisoned in 1956–60, 1962–67, and 1983–88, all together spending fourteen years in prisons and forced labor camps. Between his second and third terms, Tarto studied literature and Estonian philology (1969–71), but after graduating, he could get a job only as a laborer. Tarto was the main founder of the Estonian democratic opposition. In 1979, along with forty-five other dissidents from the Baltic republics, he signed the so-called Baltic Appeal, which described Estonia as an occupied nation and declared the Molotov-Ribbentrop Pact null and void. Tarto was a signatory of many public statements, including one in support of Polish Solidarity. Imprisoned in 1983, he maintained contacts with dissidents in Estonia. As a result, in 1987 he could support the Estonian Group for Publication of the Molotov-Ribbentrop Pact, which the dissidents founded. Tarto was the last Estonian political prisoner to be released from the camp in 1988.

In 1989 Tarto founded the Conservative Party, which did not work with the Estonian National Independence Party (Eesti Rahvusliku Sõltumatuse Partei [ERSP]), led by two other prominent dissidents, Lagle Parek and Tunne Kelam. This discord resulted in a rivalry between Tarto and Kelam, particularly after the elections to the Congress of Estonia, of which Tarto became deputy speaker. When Kelam, helped by the national Communists, attempted to overthrow Prime Minister Edgar Savisaar in 1990, Tarto unsuccessfully tried to exploit the failure of this attempt to oust Kelam as speaker of the Congress. In the 1992 parliamentary elections, Tarto ran on the ticket of the center-right Fatherland (Isamaa) party. When support for the government drastically eroded as a result of economic reforms and corruption scandals, he began to compete with Prime Minister Mart Laar for leadership of the Fatherland. Tarto lost this competition. The decline in the government's popularity, the halting of lustration and de-communization, wrong privatization decisions, and what Tarto considered an excessively conciliatory policy toward Russia influenced his decision to resign as a member of the Fatherland in 1994. He founded the Right-Wingers' Club, which became the Republican and Conservative People's Party (Vavariiklaste ja Konservatiivne Rahvaerakond). Elected to parliament in 1995, Tarto unsuccessfully tried to form a coalition with the post-nomenklatura Estonian Coalition Party. In 1998 he joined the Estonian People's Party (Eesti Rahvaerakond), led by Toomas Hendrik Ilves; it later merged with the Moderates to form the People's Party Moderates (Rahvaerakond Mõõdukad). Tarto enjoys considerable popularity among the Estonians. In the 1999 local elections in Tartu, where the People's Moderates suffered a defeat, he was the only representative of the party elected to the City Council. He is also chairman of the Council of the Human Rights Institute and a member of the leadership of the Estonian Defense League. (AG)

TASHKO Koço (1899, Alexandria–1984, Thumana, near Krujë), Albanian Communist activist. Tashko came from a wealthy merchant family. He graduated from an Arabic-language school in Cairo and then studied in Beirut and Triffin (United States); subsequently, he graduated from Harvard University. In the United States as of 1915, Tashko became involved in the activities of the Albanian minority. His father's friendly ties with Fan Noli enabled him to work at the Dielli periodical and the Aresimi association. In 1922–25 Tashko worked at the Albanian consulate in New York. After the 1924 revolution he returned to Albania and went to live in Korçe. He became involved in a Communist youth group in Korçe, and he was a close associate of Ali Kelmendi. In 1936 Tashko and Kelmendi went to Moscow, where Tashko worked for the Balkan section of the Comintern. On its order, Tashko returned to Albania in 1937. The directives he brought with him were accepted by the Puna (Work) group in Korçe but rejected by groups in Shkodër and Tirana.

After the Italian invasion of Albania in 1939, the Korçe group was the most active but confined itself to organizing street demonstrations. Tashko co-founded a joint central committee with the Shkodër Communists; this became possible because in January 1939 most Shkodër group members were arrested. As a co-founder of the Communist Party of Albania (CPA), Tashko was one of the few people who knew the basics of Marxist theory. During the wartime occupation he used the pseudonym “Skender Dine.” Tashko was secretary of the Council of the Anti-Fascist National Liberation Front, set up in May 1944 at a congress in Përmeti as a temporary legislative organ. From March 1946 until February 1947 he was a diplomat in Moscow, supporting strict cooperation between Albania and the USSR. From 1948 he was a member of the Central Committee of the Albanian Party of Labor and chairman of its Central Commission of Party Control. Probably involved in a Moscow-inspired conspiracy against Enver Hoxha, Tashko was dismissed in June 1956, and in September 1960 he was arrested as a supporter of continued cooperation with the USSR rather than the Hoxhachosen China. Incarcerated without a formal trial, in 1971 Tashko was put into a newly built prison in Benca, near Tepelena. During the last years of his life he was detained in Thumana. (TC)

TĂTĂRĂSCU Gheorghe (22 December 1886, Craiova–28 August 1957, Bucharest), Romanian lawyer and politician. Tătărăscu studied law in Paris in 1905–9 and received his Ph.D. in law there in 1912, defending a dissertation on the Romanian electoral system. In the 1920s he was undersecretary of state in the Ministry of Interior. In 1924 he was responsible for the bloody pacification of the village of Tatar Bunar in Bessarabia, where local peasants were accused of favoring the Communists. A member of the National Liberal Party (NLP), in December 1930 Tătărăscu was appointed its secretary general. From November 1933 to January 1934 he was minister of trade and industry. After the assassination of Prime Minister Ion G. Duca by an Iron Guard raiding party (29 December 1933), despite the objections of the party he led, on 5 January 1934 Tătărăscu accepted the offer of King Charles II and assumed the post of prime minister. He also remained minister of trade and industry and headed the ministries of war, defense industry, and interior. The protection that his government provided to domestic industry, writing off agricultural debts and promoting the state-owned sector, contributed to an economic improvement. At the same time, Tătărăscu governed by decree, maintained a state of emergency, and imposed censorship. In the wake of the autocratic government policy, a conflict escalated between Tătărăscu and the NLP chairman, Constantinu Brațianu, as a result of which Tătărăscu resigned from the party's leadership. He was prime minister until 28 December 1937. After the royal coup in February 1938, Tătărăscu supported the introduction of an anti-parliamentarian power system and assumed the position of foreign minister in the Government of National Unity of Patriarch Miron Cristea. On 30 March 1938 Tătărăscu became a member of the Crown Council, and between December 1938 and September 1939 he was ambassador to Paris. After the assassination of Armand Călinescu by the Iron Guard, Tătărăscu again became prime minister on 24 November 1939 and kept this post until 4 July 1940, when—as a result of a Soviet ultimatum—Romania had to give up Bessarabia and Northern Bukovina.

After General Ion Antonescu took power, Tătărăscu joined the opposition, supporting its attempts to get Romania out of its alliance with Germany. After the 23 August 1944 coup he joined the National Democratic Bloc. In October 1944 his liberal faction joined a coalition with the Communists, and on 6 March 1945 Tătărăscu was appointed deputy prime minister and foreign minister in the cabinet of Petru Groza. Because his biography included anti-Communist activities, Tătărăscu acted not only out of opportunism, but also out of fear. In the November 1946 elections his party formed a coalition bloc with the Communists. In charge of diplomacy, Tătărăscu chaired the Romanian delegation to the Paris Peace Conference (1946–47), and in February 1947 he signed the peace treaty. He hoped for financial assistance from the West, and he wrote a special memorandum on this issue, the theses of which were incompatible with the Communists' stance. When Ana Pauker accused him of treason and collaboration with the West in November 1947, Tătărăscu was dismissed and soon incarcerated in Sighet Prison. Broken by torture, he testified in the Lucrețiu Pătrășcanu trial. In 1955 he was released. Tătărăscu's works include, among others, Relele organice ale armatei noastre (The natural perimeters of our army; 1913); Pe drumul anarhiei (On the way to anarchy; 1920); Internaționala III și Basarabia (The Third International and Bessarabia; 1925); Besarabie et Moscou (Bessarabia and Moscow; 1926) and Mărituriile pentru istorie (Historical merits; 1996). TATARKA Dominik (14 March 1913, Drienové–10 May 1989, Bratislava), Slovak writer. After high school in Trenčín, Tatarka graduated from Charles University in Prague in Slovak and Romance philology in 1938. Subsequently he spent a year studying at the Sorbonne in Paris. In 1939–44 Tatarka taught French in high schools in Žilín and Martin. In 1944 he took part in the Slovak National Uprising and joined the Communist Party of Slovakia (CPS). After the war he worked as a journalist for (among other publications) the journals Pravda and Literárny život. In 1949–51 Tatarka was secretary of the Association of Czechoslovak Writers and then a screenwriter for Czechoslovak Film. In 1969 he received the title of Artist of Merit, but his objections to the Warsaw Pact aggression and the so-called normalization led to repression against him. In October 1969 Tatarka turned in his CPS membership card. Constantly under surveillance, in 1970–71 he worked as a blue-collar laborer. He was deprived of the opportunity to earn money in any other way and was banned from traveling and publishing. In 1977 Tatarka signed Charter 77.

Tatarka made his literary debut in 1942 with a collection of short stories, V úzkosti hl'adania (In the unrest of the search), and in 1944 he published a novel, Panna zázračnica (Miss Miracle-Maker), in which he showed a fascination with surrealism and existentialism. After the war, Tatarka took to political literature and Socialist realism, publishing, among other works, the novel Farská republika (The republic of shavelings; 1948), a satire on the Slovak Republic at wartime, and then two “production” novels. Soon after that, however, he cracked down on communism in Démon súhlasu (Demon of agreement, 1956; published as a book in 1963); in subsequent novels—Rozhovory bez konca (Unending conversations; 1959) and Prútené kreslá (Wicker armchairs; 1963)—Tatarka reflected philosophically on love as the basis of the meaning of life. In the 1970s and 1980s he had his works published illegally, out of the reach of censors, as well as abroad. He presented the totalitarian reality of Czechoslovakia and memories from his own life. Tatarka's most important work from that period is a prose trilogy: Listy do večnosti (Letters to eternity; 1988), Sám proti noci (Alone against the night; 1984), and Písanky (Writings; 1984); it included autobiographical themes permeated with eroticism and showed an expressive picture of life in a “normalized” Czechoslovakia. Abroad Tatarka also published the draft V ne-čase (In evil-time; 1986) and a tape-recorded tale, Navrávačky (Blabbing; 1988). Tatarka authored screenplays, received many prestigious awards, and also translated works by French writers. In 1990 in Stockholm the Dominik Tatarka Award was established. (PU)

TAVČAR Ivan (28 August 1851, Poljanje, near Škofjo Loko–19 February 1923, Ljubljana), Slovene politician, pundit, and lawyer. Tavčar came from a poor peasant family with many children. In 1875 he graduated in law from Vienna University. After almost a ten-year apprenticeship he opened his own legal practice in Ljubljana (1884). From his youth he showed literary interests. Tavčar owed the style and spirit of his first pieces to the influence of Christian Friedrich Grabbe; in these he used the convention of romantic lyricism to express native Slovenian subject matter. After 1871 Tavčar became interested in the theories of the theologian Anton Mahnič; these gave his nationalism a Catholic and anti-German character. Tavčar advocated autonomy for Slovenia. Also in this period he became close to Ivan Hribar. Together they established the periodical Slovan, and then in 1894 they assumed leadership of the National Liberal Party, renamed in 1905 the National Progressive Party. This party advocated radical views and opposed both the conciliatory liberals, who ruled Kraina with Habsburg consent, and the clerical conservatives. In addition to autonomy, Tavčar and Hribar advocated pan-Slavism and promoted the Yugoslav idea. The formula they developed turned out to be effective. Tavčar himself was a long-term councilor of Ljubljana (1884–1921) and its vice-mayor (1909–10) and mayor (1911–21). He sat in the local parliament of Kraina (1889–1918) and the Austrian Council of State in Vienna (1901–6). In addition to his political work, Tavčar was a businessman. Together with Hribar in 1900 he co-founded the first Slovenian bank, which he later directed (1916–23). After World War I he supported the creation of the Kingdom of Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes, but because of his deteriorating health he did not play a major political role. In his works Tavčar idealized the Slovene peasants. He authored (among other works) a cycle of twelve novels, Med gorami (Among the mountains; 1876–88), and dozens of other pieces, the most famous of which are Izza kongresa (After the congress; 1905–8); Cvetje v jeseni (Autumn flowers; 1917); and Višoška kronika (The Višoška chronicle; 1919). Tavčar's Zbrano delo (Complete works) was published in Ljubljana in eight volumes (1951–59). (MC)

TEEMANT Jaan (12 September 1872, Vigala—after 1941, USSR), Estonian politician. Teemant graduated in law from Petersburg University, and then he worked as an attorney in Tallinn. During the 1905 revolution he was, together with Konstanin Päts, one of the leaders of the "Tallinn radicals," a socially radical group close to the Russian Socialist Revolutionaries that advocated a radical program for combating the tsarist system: a boycott of government institutions, tax collection, and military service, as well as arming the peasants and expropriating the major landed estate owners. When the police shot sixty people in Tallinn after a series of demonstrations on 16 October 1905, tensions dramatically increased. On 10–12 December the All-Estonian Meeting of People's Delegates gathered in Tallinn; during the meeting two tactics clashed: those of the moderates and those of the radicals. Teemant, representing the radical wing, was elected chairman of the meeting, defeating the moderate Jaan Tõnisson. The radicals demanded that the tsarist system be overthrown and a revolutionary local self-government be established; the moderates favored constitutional changes. When on 10 December 1905 martial law was imposed in Tallinn and Harjumaa, Teemant, in danger of arrest, had to flee the country, where he was later sentenced to death in absentia. After the martial law had been lifted, Teemant returned to Estonia, where he was sentenced to one and a half years in prison and to forced settlement near Archangel.

Released after the February 1917 revolution, Teemant joined the then established Farmers' Party (Põllumeeste Kogu [FP]), led by Päts. In the National Council (Maapäev) elections held on 7 and 8 July 1917 this party won the most votes, and Päts became prime minister of the Provisional National Government, which proclaimed the independence of Estonia on 24 February 1918. In 1918–19 Teemant was attorney general of Estonia, and then he was an MP in the second, third, and fourth terms. From 15 December 1925 to 22 June 1926 he was head of state (riigivanem) for the first time, heading a coalition government consisting of the FP, liberals, New Settlers, Christian nationalists, and National Liberals. After parliamentary elections Teemant assumed this function again, this time leading a government without the (liberal) Estonian Labor Party but with nationalists and large landowners. This cabinet was reconstructed in February 1927 and lasted under his leadership until 9 December 1927. After the FP and the New Settlers merged into the Agrarian Union (AU), on 19 February 1932 Teemant returned to the position of prime minister of a government supported by the AU and Tõnisson's National Center Party. This cabinet lasted until 20 June 1932, when new elections were held. When in office, Teemant signed an Estonian-Soviet non-aggression treaty on 5 May 1932. In the same year he received an honorary doctorate from Tartu University.

During the Great Depression Teemant and Päts went separate ways for good. Whereas Päts decided to reach for dictatorial powers, Teemant supported democracy and became an opposition member after Päts's coup d'état of 1934. Teemant signed a memorandum protesting the dictatorship; it was also signed by three other riigivanem: Tõnisson, Ants Piip, and Juhan Kukk; it was published on 5 November 1936 in the Finnish daily Helsingin Sanomat. After the Molotov-Ribbentrop Pact had been signed, the Baltic Germans were evacuated, and Teemant became the Estonian proxy in a fund managing the real estate of the displaced. When the Red Army entered Estonia, putting an end to its independence, Teemant was arrested by the NKVD on 23 July 1940. Sentenced to ten years in prison in 1941, Teemant died in unknown circumstances. (WR) TEJCHMA Józef (14 July 1927, Markowa, Rzeszów Province), Polish Communist activist. Born into a peasant family, after graduating from high school in Łańcut, Tejchma received a Master’s degree from the Higher School of Social Sciences at the Central Committee (CC) of the Polish United Workers’ Party (Polska Zjednoczona Partia Robotnicza [PUWP]) in 1958. He began his career as a youth activist in the Union of Rural Youth of the Republic of Poland called Wici (Związek Młodzieży Wiejskiej Rzeczypospolitej Polskiej–Wici [ZMW RP–Wici]). He then served as an instructor at the Main Board of the Union of Polish Youth (Związek Młodzieży Polskiej [ZMP]) (1948–51), representative of the ZMP Main Board at the construction site of Nowa Huta (1951–54), deputy head of the Organizational Department of the ZMP (1954–55), and chairman of the Main Board of the Rural Youth Union (Związek Młodzieży Wiejskiej [ZMW]) (February 1957–July 1963). In 1952 Tejchma joined the PUWP. In March 1959 he became a deputy member, and in June 1964 a member, of the PUWP CC. From November 1963 to June 1964 he headed the CC Agricultural Department. From June 1964 to March 1972 he served as the CC secretary, and in November 1968 he became a member of the CC Politburo. Tejchma enjoyed the trust of Władysław Gomułka, first secretary of the PUWP CC, and was among his close associates, but in December 1970 he was among those who brought about the removal of Gomułka.

In March 1972 Tejchma resigned as the CC secretary to become deputy prime minister, and from February 1974 to January 1978 he also served as minister of culture. He was regarded as a representative of a moderate wing within the party leadership and a someone who tolerated a certain relaxation of the ideological straitjacket imposed on the culture. For example, with Tejchma’s permission, Andrzej Wajda could make the film Człowiek z marmuru (Man of marble). In February 1979 Tejchma resigned as deputy prime minister, and he headed the ministry of education until April 1980. At the Eighth Congress of the PUWP in February 1980 Tejchma was not elected to the CC Politburo. From May to October 1980 he was ambassador to Switzerland. He then returned to Poland and again served as minister of culture and arts until October 1982. He subsequently worked in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, and from 1984 to 1988 he was ambassador to Greece. An MP in the Assembly (1958–80), Tejchma served as chairman of the PUWP Parliamentary Caucus from 1970 to 1972. He was secretary of the All-Polish Committee of the National Unity Front from June 1971 to January 1972 and its vice-president from July 1971 to July 1983. Tejchma published his memoirs, Pożegnanie z władzą (Farewell to power; 1996). (PK/WR)

TELEKI Pál (1 November 1879, Budapest–3 April 1941, Budapest), Hungarian politician and geographer, count. Born into an aristocratic family from Transylvania, after graduating from college, Teleki received a Ph.D. in 1903 and began lecturing in geography at Budapest University. From 1913 he was a corresponding member and from 1922 a full member of the Hungarian Academy of Sciences. From 1909 to 1913 he was director of the Institute of Geography, and in 1910–23 he was secretary general and deputy chairman of the Hungarian Geographical Association. Before World War I Teleki made a number of research trips in Europe, North Africa, and America. During World War I he briefly served on the southern front. In 1919 Teleki became a professor. As a politician, Teleki realized the paramount importance of social issues; however, he represented conservative and anti-Semitic views. In 1917 he presided over the Hungarian Association of Population Growth and Racial Hygiene Policy, in 1917–18 he was president of the All-National Veterans’ Care Office, and in 1918–19 he was chairman of the Hungarian Territorial Defense League. In 1905–10, 1915–18, 1920–21, 1922–26, and 1938–41 Teleki was an MP, and from 1927 to 1938 he was a member of the upper house.

When in Switzerland in March 1919, Teleki learned about the establishment of the Hungarian Soviet Republic (HSR). He went to Vienna, where he joined the Anti-Bolshevik Committee, set up in April 1919 by Count István Bethlen. In June of the same year, as a close associate of Admiral Miklós Horthy, Teleki became foreign minister of the counter-government established in Szeged. After the fall of the Austro-Hungarian monarchy Teleki used his scientific knowledge to defend Hungarian territorial integrity. Under his leadership an ethnographic map of Hungary was produced at the beginning of 1919. In 1920 Teleki was a member of the Hungarian delegation participating in peace talks in Paris. From April 1920

Teleki was foreign minister, and from 19 July 1920 to 14 April 1921 he was prime minister; at the same time, until September 1921, he was head of diplomacy. As prime minister, Teleki had to ratify the peace treaty that he himself signed (among others) in Trianon on 4 June 1920. Teleki opposed armed groups that used white terror against active HSR participants. On his orders, the minister of agriculture, István Nagyatádi Szabó, worked out a blueprint for an agrarian reform. Teleki's name is also associated with the numerus clauses, passed in September 1920, which discriminated against Jews at universities. In foreign policy Teleki represented a pro-French orientation. During the first attempt of Charles IV Habsburg to regain the Hungarian throne (March–April 1921), Teleki was supportive of him; therefore, he stepped down after the move became a fiasco.

In the 1920s and 1930s Teleki was mainly occupied with research and advocacy of the Hungarian policy of territorial revision. In 1924 he founded the Hungarian Sociographical Institute and in 1926 the Institute of Political Sciences. He was also the main founder and leader of Hungarian scouting. Teleki was chairman of the Christian National Party. He also founded the Hungarian Revisionist League. Teleki hoped that German support would help achieve Hungarian revisionist goals, but he very quickly recognized the dangers from Hitler's Third Reich, and he tried to confine its influence in Hungary. In 1932–36 Teleki was chairman of the Stipend Council, in 1936–37 he was chairman of the National Education Council, and from 1936 he chaired the board of Hungarian Institutes acting abroad. Teleki organized international conferences and personally invited outstanding people to Hungary to win their support for Hungarian revisionism. At Regent Horthy's request, in May 1938 Teleki accepted the religion and national education portfolio in the government of Béla Imrédy. After the latter's resignation, Teleki assumed leadership of the government on 16 February 1939.

Under Teleki's rule in March 1939, following the fall of Czechoslovakia, Transcarpathian Ruthenia was reincorporated into Hungary, whereby the Polish-Hungarian border was restored, and in August 1940, as a result of the second Vienna Award, Northern Transylvania was incorporated. On 24 February Hungary joined the anti-Comintern Pact. In May 1940 a second bill was passed that limited the rights of the Jews, and a third one was prepared. In September 1939 Teleki maintained neutrality regarding the Polish-German War. With Horthy's consent, he refused to permit German Army units to cross Hungary on their way to the battlefield in Poland. As a friend of the Poles, with Horthy's acceptance, Teleki opened the Polish-Hungarian border to them and then looked after

Polish refugees. He advocated a policy of so-called military neutrality. He vigorously opposed the extreme right and had a number of Arrow Cross activists detained or arrested. Teleki had to give in, however, on the issues of Hungarian-German economic agreements and the right of the Volksbund to act in Hungary. Teleki believed the Germans and their allies would lose the war, and he did everything he could to keep his country neutral and not take part in the war on the side of the Third Reich at any price at all. The purpose of the Hungarian-Yugoslav friendship treaty Teleki signed in December 1940 was to create a gap in the German ring surrounding Hungary. After the anti-German coup in Belgrade on 27 March 1941 his policy crumbled into ruins. Teleki came to the conclusion that if Hungary joined the German-Italian invasion of Yugoslavia, a British declaration of war on Hungary would become unavoidable. Not willing to participate in a future national disaster for his country, Teleki committed suicide after Regent Horthy expressed willingness to take part in the attack on Yugoslavia. This symbolic step earned him great respect in international opinion. Teleki authored a number of scientific works, among them the following: Atlasz a japán szigetek cartográfiájának történetéhez (Historical atlas of Japanese cartography; 1909); Amerika gazdasági földrajza (Economic geography of America; 1922); Általános gazdasági földrajz (General economic geography; 1927); as well as a documentary propaganda piece, The Evolution of Hungary and Its Place in European History (1923). TELIHA Olena [née Shovheniva or Shovhenova] (21 July 1907, St. Petersburg–21 February 1942, Babi Yar, near Kiev), Ukrainian poet, journalist, and political activist. In 1922 Teliha emigrated with her parents to Czechoslovakia, where in 1924 she began to study philology at the Pedagogical Institute in Prague. Involved with the Ukrainian student community, she embraced Ukrainian national ideals. After marrying Mykhailo Teliha, she moved to Warsaw, where she taught at a Ukrainian school. In 1932 Teliha began contributing to Vistnyk, a periodical published in Lwów (Lviv). In Kraków from 1939 to 1941, she headed the literary-artistic society Zarevo and worked in the cultural sector of the Organization of Ukrainian Nationalists (OUN). After a split in the OUN, she supported the OUN–Melnyk faction (OUN–M), led by Andriy Melnyk. With the outbreak of the German-Soviet war in 1941 Teliha moved to Lviv and then, with a group of OUN supporters, to Kiev, where she became head of the Ukrainian Writers' Union and editor of the weekly Lytavry. After the Nazi regime closed down Lytavry's parent newspaper, Ukrainske Slovo, and replaced it with Nove Ukrainske Slovo, Teliha refused to cooperate. Arrested by the Gestapo on 9 February 1942, about a week later, along with a group of other Ukrainian nationalists, Teliha was executed by a firing squad in Babi Yar. After the war, her poems were published in separate collections: Dusha na storozhi (The soul on guard; 1946); Prapory dukha (The banners of the spirit; 1947); and Olena Teliha: Zbirnyk (Olena Teliha: Collection; 1977). Teliha's poems also appeared in English as Boundaries of Flame: A Complete Collection of Poetry (1977). (GM)

TEOCTIST [originally Toader Arapaşu] (7 February 1915, Tocileni–30 July, 2007, Bucharest), Patriarch of the Romanian Orthodox Church (ROC). After primary school in Tocileni (1927), Teoctist attended a seminary at the Vorona Monastery, Botoşani County (1928–31). He joined an order in 1931. He attended a seminary at Neamţ Monastery and then a seminary at Cernica Monastery (1932–40). In 1935 he took his monastic vows at Bistriţa-Neamţ Monastery, receiving the name of Teoctist. A hierodeacon from 1937, from 1940 to 1945 Teoctist studied theology at the University of Bucharest and also worked at the local archbishopric office and then as a deacon in the Patriarchal Cathedral. In 1945 he was transferred to the metropolitan cathedral in Iaşi, and was ordained a hieromonk. In 1946 Teoctist was elevated to archimandrite. From 1948 to 1950 he served as vicar of the archdiocese of Iaşi. In 1948, on the initiative of the Communist authorities and Metropolitan Justinian, Teoctist unsuccessfully tried to persuade the Romanian Uniate bishops imprisoned by the Communist authorities at the monastery of Dragoslavele to join the Orthodox Church. In 1950, on Justinian's recommendation, the Holy Synod of the ROC elected him assistant bishop to the patriarch. From 1950 to 1954 Teoctist was rector of the Theological Institute of Bucharest, secretary of the Holy Synod of the ROC, and vicar of the archdiocese of Bucharest. In 1962 he became bishop of Arad. In 1963 the Congress of the Romanian Orthodox Bishops in America appointed him bishop of Detroit, but he was refused an entry visa to the United States and Canada and did not assume this position. In 1973 he became archbishop of Craiova.

After the death of Patriarch Justinian in 1977, Teoctist became archbishop of Iaşi and metropolitan of Moldavia and Suceava, becoming de facto head of the ROC. He did not protest when in 1977 the Communist authorities ordered the destruction of the historic Orthodox church in Enei in Bucharest, as well as many other places of religious worship in Romania. From 1980 to 1982 Teoctist served as locum tenens in the absence of the archbishop of Sibiu and metropolitan of Transylvania. On 10 November 1986 he became metropolitan of Muntenia and Dobrogea and Patriarch of the ROC. Throughout the Communist regime Teoctist accepted the complete subordination of the ROC to the Communist authorities. On 17 December 1989 he supported the repressive measures introduced by Nicolae Ceauşescu against protesters in Timişoara, and on 21 December he supported the imposition of a state of emergency. After the overthrow of Ceauşescu on 22 December 1989 and the outbreak of unrest in Romania, Teoctist, fearing for his life, was in hiding in one of the monasteries for several weeks. In 1991 he called for a boycott of the Catholic Church as long as the office of Pope was held by John Paul II, who insisted, among other things, on the return of property seized by the ROC from the Uniate Church. At the beginning of the 1990s Teoctist admitted he had made mistakes during the Communist era. He initiated a rapprochement with the Catholic Church and established contacts with the Pope, who visited Romania in 1999. In 1999 Teoctist became an honorary member of the Romanian Academy of Sciences. In October 2002 he made a visit to the Vatican, where he issued a joint ecumenical statement with Pope John Paul II. TEODOROIU Ecaterina [originally Cătalina Toderoiu] (14 January 1894, Vădeni, near Tîrgu Jiu–22 August 1917, near Muncelu), Romanian national heroine. After Romania had entered World War I in 1916, Teodoroiu voluntarily joined the Romanian Army. From October 1916, she took part in the defense of German-besieged Tîrgu Jiu. Subsequently, she took part in regular battles with the Germans, which earned her a promotion to second lieutenant. In November 1916 she was taken prisoner by the Germans but escaped several days later. In the same month she was wounded in action and was sent to a hospital as a result. In March 1917 she received a medal for valor and was made a lieutenant. Teodoroiu was killed in battle at Muncelu, leading a charge of her troops. Her life and the way she died resulted in her postwar popularity as a national heroine, inspiring Romanian artists to create patriotic pieces of art about her. In the early 1920s, one of the first Romanian-made motion pictures was titled Ecaterina Teodoroiu. (AB/LW)

TEODOROV Teodor (27 March 1859, Elena–5 August 1924, Borovets), Bulgarian politician. In 1880 Teodorov finished high school in the Russian town of Nikolayev. In 1883 he received a law degree from New Russia University in Odessa. After returning to Bulgaria, he worked as a deputy public prosecutor in the Sofia District Court and as a judge in Ruse. After receiving a Ph.D. in law from Paris University in 1886, he assumed the post of public prosecutor in the Sofia District Court. He was also a judge of the Appeals Court and a defense attorney. In 1896 Teodorov became a member of the National Party and soon became one of its leaders. He served as minister of justice (February 1896–March 1897), minister of finance (August 1897–January 1899 and March 1911–July 1913), minister of foreign and religious affairs (October–November 1918), and prime minister and minister of foreign affairs (28 November 1918–6 October 1919). In 1919 Teodorov headed the Bulgarian delegation to the Paris Peace Conference.

From 1919 to 1923 Teodorov was a firm opponent of the government of the Bulgarian Agrarian National Union (BANU), led by Aleksandur Stamboliyski. In November 1920, after the National Party merged with the Progressive Liberal Party into the United National Progressive Party (UNPP), Teodorov became the leader of the UNPP. He joined the Constitutional Bloc, which was established in the summer of 1922 and which consisted of the Democratic Party, the Radical Democratic Party, and the UNPP. Teodorov attended an anti-government congress of the Constitutional Bloc in Turnovo (15 September 1922), as a result of which he was arrested and imprisoned in Shumen. In 1923 he was to stand trial as one of those who had brought about the first “national catastrophe” in Bulgaria in 1913, but his trial was prevented by the coup of 9 June 1923. After the BANU government was overthrown, Teodorov and his party joined the Democratic Alliance. Teodorov served as deputy to the National Assembly (1894–99 and 1901–24), deputy to the Grand National Assembly (1911), and president of the Eighth National Assembly (1894–96). (JJ)

TERELYA Yosyp (27 October 1943, Transcarpathia), Ukrainian dissident. After completing courses at a building school, Terelya worked as a blue-collar laborer. Arrested for the first time in 1962 and sentenced to a four-year imprisonment for “disloyalty,” he managed to escape from prison twice. From 1965 to 1966 he was in hiding in Transcarpathia. Captured in March 1966 and sentenced to seven years in a forced labor camp, he served his sentence in a camp in Ladychyn; in prisons in Vinnytsya, Kirovohrad, and Vladimir; and in the camps of the Mordvinian ASSR. After another attempt to escape, Terelya was transferred to Vladimir in September 1969. He was imprisoned in a psychiatric hospital in Dnepropetrovsk and Berehovo in Transcarpathia and then at the Serbian Institute in Moscow. In 1970 he went on a hunger strike in the psychiatric “hospital” in Sychevka. In 1976 Terelya wrote an open letter to Yury Andropov, head of the KGB, protesting his imprisonment and the inhumane conditions in this hospital. The letter was published in the West as “Notes from a Madhouse” (1977). Released in 1977, Terelya was soon imprisoned again and spent the next four years in prisons and psychiatric hospitals. A practicing Uniate, after his release in 1982 Terelya established the Initiative Group for the Defense of the Rights of Believers and of the Church in Transcarpathian Ukraine. His brother Boris, who was in hiding for a year and a half after he had blown up a section of the pipeline near Uzhhorod, was killed in a clash with the KGB in June 1982. Arrested at the end of 1982, Terelya was sentenced to one year in a forced labor camp for “parasitism.” Released in December 1983, he joined the work of the Central Committee of Ukrainian Catholics. In 1984 he renounced his Soviet citizenship and began publishing The Chronicle of the Catholic Church in Ukraine. Arrested in February 1985, two months later Terelya sent an open letter from prison to Lech Wałęsa, expressing his appreciation for Polish workers’ leaders and for the Polish Episcopate. On 20 August 1985 in Uzhhorod Terelya was sentenced again, this time to seven years in a forced labor camp and five years in exile. He was released in the spring of 1987, on the wave of perestroika. Along with his family, Terelya was allowed to go to Canada, where he edited the periodical Khrest. (WR)

THAÇI Gasper (23 January 1889, Shkodër–26 May 1946, Shkodër), Albanian Roman Catholic bishop. Thaçi graduated from a theological seminary in Shkodër and then studied in Italy. Ordained in January 1911, he worked as a parish priest in Nenshat Dajç and Qelez in the diocese of Sappa. In 1930 he was moved to Shkodër, where he took over the local parish. Owing to the ailing health of the ordinary archbishop of Shkodër, Lazer Mjedja, Thaçi often replaced him in his duties. On 19 March 1936 Thaçi was appointed the ordinary archbishop of Shkodër and at the same time the primate of Albania. In 1939–43 Thaçi distanced himself from the Italian occupation authorities. After the war, despite Communist pressure, he refused to break with the Holy See. Thaçi died because of long-time diabetes. He was initially buried in the Shkodër Cathedral, but in 1967 his remains were removed from there in the course of a new wave of antireligious repressions following the proclamation of Albania as the first atheist state in the world. THAÇI Hashim (24 April 1968, Burojë [Broja], Drenica region, Kosovo), Albanian politician from Kosovo. Thaçi studied history at the University of Prishtina. From 1989 to 1991 he took part in protests against the abolition of Kosovo's autonomy. In 1993 he organized military resistance of the Kosovo Albanians and joined the Kosovo Liberation Army (Ushtria Çlirimtare e Kosovës [KLA]). For a few years he worked at the Institute of History in Tirana and then went to Switzerland and Austria. In 1996 in the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (FRY), Thaçi was sentenced in absentia to ten years' imprisonment for his activities in the KLA. He called for independence for Kosovo, where he returned in 1998. On behalf of the KLA, he became a member of the Albanian delegation that held negotiations with the Serbs in Rambouillet, near Paris. He initially opposed the agreement proposed by the mediators but finally accepted it. After the Serbs rejected this agreement, NATO began bombing the FRY. After the bombings ended in June 1999, the KLA fighters were enthusiastically greeted as heroes and victors, and Thaçi gained wide support among the Kosovo Albanians. Despite protests by Ibrahim Rugova, Thaçi became prime minister of the provisional government of Kosovo.

The provisional government's attempts to assert its authority in Kosovo and Thaçi's style of governing caused protests from the UN mission. Thaçi also quickly lost public support. The KLA was suspected of having links with organized crime and using brutal methods against its opponents. The KLA was to be demilitarized by September 1999, and then it was transformed into the Kosovo Protection Corps, operating under the auspices of the United Nations. In November 1999 Thaçi founded the Democratic Party of Kosovo (Partia Demokratike e Kosovës [PDK]). On 15 December 1999 UN representatives and the Kosovo Albanians' leaders, including Rugova and Thaçi, concluded an agreement, under the terms of which, among other things, the provisional government headed by Thaçi was abolished. The Joint Interim Administrative Structure was established, which was to function until the elections. Thaçi's position weakened because of his conflict with Ramush Haradinaj, the former KLA commander who founded his own party, the Alliance for the Future of Kosovo, in April 2000. In the local elections held in Kosovo on 18 October 2000, the PDK won some 27 percent of the votes, losing to Rugova's party, the Democratic League of Kosovo, which obtained 58 percent of the votes. In the parliamentary elections of 18 November 2001 the PDK obtained 25.5 percent of the votes, which allowed it to block the election of Rugova as president of Kosovo for several months. Finally, though, in March 2002 a compromise was reached, and the PDK was allowed to name its candidate for prime minister. However, owing to Rugova's -unwillingness to accept Thaçi, the post of prime minister was given to Bajram Rexhepi. (AO)

THALER Zoran (21 January 1962, Kranj), Slovene diplomat. In 1986 Thaler completed studies in political science and international relations at the University of Ljubljana. After the elections of April 1990, he became a member of parliament. In May 1990 he was appointed vice-minister of foreign affairs in the government of Lojze Peterle. Thaler was a member of the Liberal Democratic Party, renamed Liberal Democracy of Slovenia (Liberalna Demokracija Slovenije [LDS]) in March 1994, and on its ticket he was elected to parliament in December 1992. In 1993 he became chairman of the parliamentary committee for international relations. In January 1995 he became minister of foreign affairs. At that time the efforts of the diplomatic service were primarily aimed at integrating Slovenia with the European Union (EU) and NATO, and this required improving relations with Italy. In March 1995 Italy withdrew its objections to an association agreement with the EU that Slovenia sought. The agreement was finally signed in June 1996. However, the opposition, as well as the MPs of the co-ruling Slovene Christian Democratic Party, were dissatisfied with Thaler's policy and passed a vote of no confidence against him in May 1996. In July 1996 he resigned his position. Thaler again became minister of foreign affairs in the new government of Janez Drnovšek, which was established in February 1997. Following a decision made in Madrid on 8 July 1997 to admit only Poland, the Czech Republic, and Hungary into NATO, Thaler was increasingly criticized in Slovenia. The mood improved when on 15 July 1997 the European Commission recognized Slovenia as one of the applicant states that was to start negotiations for admission to the European Union. Nevertheless, Thaler resigned at the end of July 1997. (AO)

THON Ozjasz Jehoshua (13 February 1870, Lemberg [Lwów, Lviv]–11 November 1936, Kraków), Zionist activist in Poland. Thon graduated in philosophy and sociology from Berlin University and from a rabbinical school in Berlin. It was then that he met Teodor Herzl, co-organized the first Zionist congress in Basel, and published Zur geschichtsphilosophischen Begründungen des Zionismus (1897). From 1897, Thon was a rabbi in Kraków. He co-founded the Zionist movement and numerous Jewish organizations in Galicia. For many years, he led the Zionist Organization of Western Galicia and Silesia. He founded the Ezra Library, the Solidarity Association, and Nowy Dziennik, the first Jewish daily published in Polish. Thon published (among other works) the monographs Herbert Spencer (1910) and Teodor Herzl (1914). In 1919, he represented the Galician Jews in the Comité des Délégations Juives during the Paris Peace Conference. Thon was a member of the Executive Committee of the World Zionist Organization. He represented the Kraków Zionists in the first Polish Assembly (1919–22) and was reelected for subsequent terms. In 1935, as a result of the debilitation of Zionist organizations, Thon failed to keep his seat for another term. He propagated the study of Hebrew, founded a number of Tarbut schools in Poland, and co-organized the Judaic Institute in Warsaw. Thon's memoirs were published in the Pirkei Galizyah collection (1957), and some of his parliament speeches are in Sejm redes 1919–1922 (1923). The Israeli town of Beth Jehoshua bears his name as a tribute to his memory. (WR)

THUGUTT Stanisław (30 July 1873, Łęczycza–15 June 1941, Stockholm), Polish politician and cooperative activist. Thugutt came from a well-educated family; his father was a doctor. He graduated from Wojciech Górski High School in Warsaw and took business courses in Łódź. From his youth he worked in various private companies in the (Russian-controlled) Polish Kingdom and eventually came to live in Warsaw, where he was appointed literary manager for the weekly Ziemia. In 1915–16, when he was a soldier in the Polish Legions, Thugutt voiced radical social and anti-Russian opinions, and he edited the Biuletyn periodical of the Central National Committee. The Germans blocked Thugutt's candidature for the Provisional State Council, established by the Austro-Hungarian and German occupying authorities. In 1918, he was imprisoned in the Modlin and Warsaw Citadel prisons. Thugutt was minister of interior in Ignacy Daszyński's Provisional People's Government of the Republic of Poland, established on 7 November 1918, and he kept this position until January 1919 in the government of Jędrzej Moraczewski. During the right-wing coup d'état attempt of 4–5 January 1919 he was briefly arrested.

As a prominent member of the Masonic Great National Lodge, Thugutt was considered very influential in the first period of the Second Republic. In 1919, he was coopted into the Polish National Committee in Paris as a delegate of the head of state, Józef Piłsudski. During the Polish-Soviet war he volunteered to fight on the front. In 1917–24 he was a member of the Polish Peasant Party–Liberation (Polskie Stronictwo Ludowe–Wyzwolenie [PSL–Liberation]), and from 1921 to 1924 he was chairman of its Main Board. In November 1922 Thugutt was elected MP and subsequently was appointed leader of the PSL–Liberation parliamentary fraction. He put forward Gabriel Narutowicz as candidate for president. After the fall of the Wincenty Witos government in 1923, President Stanisław Wojciechowski entrusted Thugutt with forming a new government; the attempt ended in failure because of the resistance of the center-right parties. In July 1924, Thugutt was offered the portfolio of foreign affairs in the government of Władysław Grabski. After encountering objections from his party colleagues, Thugutt left the PSL–Liberation parliamentary fraction. Eventually he became deputy prime minister in charge of nationality affairs (November 1924–May 1925). As radical views were becoming increasingly dominant in the PSL–Liberation, in April 1925 Thugutt left the party, along with Kazimierz Bartel, and joined the Labor Club, supporting Piłsudski. He did not support the May 1926 coup, though. Critical of the sanacja policies, Thugutt was one of the leaders of the Centrolew, an opposition bloc of leftist and centrist parties. Thugutt was a leading cooperative activist; for example, he chaired the Association of Cooperativists (1932–39) and the Cooperative Research Institute (1931–39). He was a member of the State Tribunal and chairman of the Parliamentary Speaker's Court in the case of Wojciech Korfanty. From 1931, Thugutt belonged to the Peasant Party, and during 1935–38 he was chairman of its Supreme Council. After the outbreak of World War II, General Władysław Sikorski called Thugutt to England, but he never reached his destination as he died on his way there. (PK)

TIEF Otto (14 August 1889, Uuskula Rapla–5 March 1976, Ahja), Estonian politician and lawyer. In 1910–16 Tief studied law at St. Petersburg University, where he belonged to Rotalia, an Estonian academic corporation. During the Estonian war of independence Tief commanded the elite battalion of the Academic Legion (Vabadus Sõjas Kalevlaste Maleva), serving the Estonian Supreme War Committee (Eesti Sojaväelaste Ülemkomiteessee). After the war, Tief graduated in law from Tartu University, and from 1923 to 1926 he worked as a legal counselor in the Ministry of Justice. At the same time, he was a leader of the New Settlers Association (Asunike Koondis [SA]) which, founded in 1923, represented the farmers endowed with land after land reforms. Tief was also elected to the parliament on behalf of the SA. From July 1926 to March 1927, he was minister of labor and social affairs, and from March to December 1927, he was minister of justice in the government of Jaan Teemant. Afterwards, he was registered as a chartered attorney and opened his own legal practice. From 1928, Tief worked as a counselor at the Agricultural Bank. He was later elected to the parliament, but he did not play an important role in politics until wartime.

In the summer of 1944 Tief assumed the leadership of the National Committee of the Estonian Republic (Eesti Vabariigi Rahvuskomitee), set up a few months earlier and made up of politicians of various parties. The committee aimed at establishing contacts with the Western Allies and getting Estonia out of the war, as well as keeping it independent from the USSR. Its plans fell flat. On 18 September 1944, the acting Estonian president, Jüri Uluots, appointed a government of the Estonian Republic with Tief as prime minister. Tief's cabinet declared independence. However, it failed when it attempted to organize its own armed forces, independent of the Germans, and to capture power in Tallinn. On 21 September, Tief's government and acting president Uluots decided to leave Estonia and move their headquarters to Sweden. During the evacuation, on 10 October 1944, Tief was arrested, as were most of his ministers; subsequently he was brought before the Soviet Supreme Military Court, which sentenced him to ten years in labor camp. Tief was kept in camps in Siberia and Kazakhstan. In 1956, he was released and returned to Estonia, but two years later, he was arrested again and sent to work in the Ukraine. From 1965, Tief lived in Ainazis in Latvia. A few days before his death he was allowed to return to Estonia but was ordered to settle far from Tallin, in Ahja, near Tartu. (AG)

TIGRID Pavel [originally Pavel Schönfeld] (27 October 1917, Prague–31 August 2003, Prague), Czech journalist and politician. Before World War II Tigríd studied law at Charles University in Prague. In March 1939 he emigrated to England, where he worked as a journalist for the Czechoslovak section of the BBC and edited the periodicals Kulturní zápisník (in Czech and Slovak) and Review 42 (in English). In June 1945 Tigríd returned to Prague and worked briefly in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs and later for the press organs of the Czechoslovak People's Party (Československá Strana Lidová [ČSL]). From 1945 to 1948 he was a commentator for the periodicals Lidová demokracie and Ozbory, and from 1946 to 1948 he was editor-in-chief of the weekly Vývoj. In his articles Tigríd criticized the developments in Czechoslovakia; as a result, he came into conflict with the Communists.

During the Communist coup of February 1948 Tigríd was in West Germany, where he stayed. In Frankfurt, he founded the Committee for Aid to Czechoslovak Refugees. From 1951 to 1952 he was the program director of the Czechoslovak section of Radio Free Europe. In November 1952 Tigríd resigned this post and left for the United States, where he made a living as a waiter. He also studied at Columbia University. In 1956 he founded the quarterly Svědectví—the most important periodical of the Czech émigré community initially published in the United States—and until 1990 was its editor-in-chief. In 1960 Tigríd left for Paris, where he lived for the next thirty years and continued publishing Svědectví. In 1966 the court in Prague sentenced him in absentia to fourteen years' imprisonment. One of the main spokespersons for the Czechoslovak political émigré community, Tigríd actively promoted the Czechoslovak opposition and dissident movement in the West. In Svědectví, various factions of the opposition movement could freely exchange their views: both writers like Václav Havel and Milan Kundera and party reformers like Zdeněk Mlynář published articles there. The periodical played a very important role after the Prague Spring, during the apathy of the “normalization” period in Czechoslovakia, when it published critical commentaries on the situation in the country, as well as many documents from the interwar and Stalinist periods. At that time Tigríd also strove for a dialogue between émigrés who had gone into exile in 1948 and in 1968.

In 1990 Tigríd returned to Czechoslovakia. He initially served as a member of the Council of Consultants to President Havel, and from 1991 to 1992 he was an adviser to Havel. In 1992 the last issue of Svědectví was published. From January 1994 to June 1996 Tigríd served as minister of culture, appointed on the recommendation of the Christian Democratic Union–Czechoslovak People's Party (Křesťanská a Demokratická Unie–Československá Strana Lidová [KDU–ČSL]). In 1996 Tigríd unsuccessfully ran in the elections to the Senate on the KDU–ČSL ticket. From March 1997 until the end of 1998 he served as the president's adviser on Czech–German relations. The author of a great number of articles, Tigríd also wrote several plays and books, devoted mainly to the analysis of the Communist system; these include Ozbrojený mír (Armed peace; 1948); Marx na Hradčanech (Marx in Hradčany; 1960); Politická emigrace v atomovém věku (Political refugees in the age of the atom; 1968; 1974; 1990); Le printemps de Prague (1968); La chute irrésistible d'Alexandre Dubček (1969); and a fictionalized history of Czechoslovakia, Kapesní průvodce inteligentní ženy po vlastním osudu (An intelligent woman's pocket guide to her own fate; 1988). TILDY Zoltán (18 November 1889, Losonc [now Slovakia]–3 August 1961, Budapest), Hungarian Peasant Party politician. Tildy's father was a comitat (county) official. After graduating from the Theological Academy of the Evangelical-Reformed Church in Pápa, Tildy spent one year on scholarship at the Assemblé College in Belfast, Ireland. After returning to Hungary, between 1921 and 1929 he served as pastor in the town of Szenna and later in Tahitótfalu. He edited the only national daily of the Hungarian Calvinists, Keresztény család, and the journals Téli újság, Református lelkipásztor, and Magyarföld. Between 1928 and 1932 Tildy was director-pastor of the Hungarian Tract Society, and later, until 1946, he was pastor of the Protestant church in Szeghalom. Already in 1917 Tildy had joined the National Independence Party. From 1922 he was a member of the Unity Party, which was founded to support the consolidation program of Prime Minister Istvan Bethlen. The main aim of the program was to improve the tragic economic and social situation of Hungary after the war and revolution.

In 1929–30 Tildy co-organized the Independent Smallholders' Party (Független Kisgazdapárt [ISP]), and he became its executive vice-president. From 1936 he was an MP, representing the district of Szeghalom, and from 1939 he represented the district of Békés. From January 1940 Tildy was plenipotentiary executive president of the party. From 1942 he advocated the establishment of an alliance with the workers' parties, and he tried to persuade Regent Miklós Horthy to quickly withdraw from the war. After the Germans entered Hungary in March 1944, Tildy continued his activities in the underground. On 11 October 1944 he talked with Horthy, who finally agreed to a peace agreement to win over the approaching Red Army. However, it did not prevent a coup staged by the Arrow Cross Party. From November 1944 Tildy was leader of the ISP and head of the editorial staff of the political weekly Független Kisgazdapárt.

In November 1945 the ISP won the elections, gaining 57 percent of the vote. The party declared its support for parliamentary democracy, respect of property rights and civic liberties, and a foreign policy based on an alliance with the Western Allies. After the elections, on 15 November 1945, Tildy became prime minister, and on 11 February 1946, after a proclamation of the republican system, he was elected the first president of the Hungarian Republic. From the end of 1946, when the Communists intensified their arrests of “plotters” in the ISP, Tildy was more and more indecisive, especially because his family got involved in obscure interests. When in May 1947 the Communists demanded the resignation of Prime Minister Ferenc Nagy, Tildy accepted the change of government and agreed to call new elections at the end of August; in these the fractious ISP suffered defeat. Still serving as president, Tildy continued to authorize the participation of the ISP in the government, as well as the purge, which led to the subordination of the party to the Communists.

Despite these moves, Tildy failed to save his post. When his son-in-law, Viktor Csornoky, was accused of corruption and treason, on 30 June 1948 the Communists forced Tildy to resign. Between August 1948 and May 1956 Tildy was held under house arrest in Budapest. On 27 October 1956 he became minister without portfolio and in practice deputy prime minister in the government of Imre Nagy. During the Hungarian Revolution, Tildy was involved mainly in developing contacts with peasant organizations and with churches. In his radio speeches, Tildy came out in support of a multiparty system, national independence, and freedom. He also called for the reorganization of the ISP. On 4 November Tildy left the parliament building through the cordon of Soviet soldiers surrounding the building. Soon after, he was arrested, and on 15 June 1958, in the trial of Imre Nagy and associates, Tildy was sentenced to six years by the People’s Judicial Council of the Supreme Court. In April 1959, owing to his advanced age, and in fact because of illness, Tildy was released under an individual amnesty. Until his death he lived in seclusion. (JT)

TIMOSHENKO Semyon (18 February 1895, Furmanka, near Odessa–31 March 1970, Moscow), Soviet marshal of Ukrainian descent. The son of a peasant, during World War I Timoshenko served in the tsarist army, but in October 1917 he joined the Bolshevik units, which were transformed into the Red Army in early 1918. In 1919 Timoshenko joined the Bolshevik party, as a result of which he quickly rose through the ranks. He commanded a cavalry brigade that in 1919 became part of the Cavalry Army led by Semyon Budenny. In the summer of 1920 Timoshenko fought against Polish forces in Kiev and then against the forces led by General Pyotr Wrangel and Nestor Makhno. Timoshenko completed military courses (1922) and courses for commanders at the Lenin Military and Political Academy (1930). From 1933 to 1935 he was deputy commander of the Belorussian Military District, and from 1935 to 1937 he was commander of the Kiev Military District. He then assumed command of the Military District in the Northern Caucasus and Kharkiv (1937) and command of the Military District in Kiev (1938). In the spring of 1938 Timoshenko was accused of being an “enemy of the people,” but he was saved by Nikita Khrushchev, the new first secretary of the Central Committee (CC) of the Communist Party (Bolshevik) of Ukraine (CP[B]U).

In 1939 Timoshenko joined the CC of the All-Union Communist Party (Bolsheviks). As a commander of the Ukrainian Front, he led the invasion of Poland on 17 September 1939. Although he announced that the Red Army was marching into Poland to offer its assistance against Germany, the Soviets treated the captured members of the Polish armed forces as prisoners of war, and Polish officers were arrested and handed over to the NKVD, which massacred them in 1940. In January 1940 during the Soviet-Finnish war Timoshenko was placed in command of the Red Army’s operations but failed to force the Finns to capitulate. In May 1940 he was appointed marshal and then commissar for defense of the Soviet Union. In July 1940 he barely escaped an assassination attempt by activists of the Polish pro-independence underground. After Germany invaded the Soviet Union in June 1941, Timoshenko became commander of the Western and Southwestern Fronts and consequently assumed the position of deputy commissar for defense. He commanded the Stalingrad Front (1942) and the Northwestern Front (1943), and then he was appointed the Soviet Supreme Command representative for coordinating army movements, mainly in the Balkans. After World War II, Timoshenko served as commander of the Military District in the Urals (1945–49) and then in Belorussia (1949–60). From 1949 to 1960 he was a member of the CC and of the Politburo of the Communist Party of Belorussia. In 1952 he became a deputy member of the CC of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union (CPSU). After retiring in 1960, Timoshenko chaired the State Committee for War Veterans. (WR) TISCHNER Józef (12 March 1931, Stary Sącz–28 June 2000, Kraków), Polish priest and philosopher. Tischner came from a highlander family and spent his childhood in Łopuszna. After graduating from high school in Nowy Targ, for a year he studied law, and in 1950–55 he studied theology at the Jagiellonian University in Kraków. Ordained in 1955, Tischner continued philosophical studies at the Catholic Theology Academy (CTA) in Warsaw and, from 1957 to 1959, at the Philosophical-Historical Department of the Jagiellonian University. He was tutored by Roman Ingarden. In 1963, Tischner received a Ph.D. on the basis of his dissertation “Ja transcendentalne w filozofii Edmunda Husserla” (The transcendental me in Edmund Husserl’s philosophy; 1963). In 1968, Tischner received a scholarship and spent a year at the University of Louvain, Belgium. His stay there resulted in the dissertation “Studia z teorii świadomości” (Studies in the theory of consciousness), which earned him a postdoctoral degree at the CTA in 1974. In the 1970s, Tischner became increasingly influential in Poland’s intellectual life. While sticking to the phenomenological tradition, he headed for the philosophy of drama and the metaphysics of good, taking his own path, different from that of Husserl. In an article titled “Schyłek chrześcijaństwa tomistycznego” (The decline of Thomist Christianity; 1970), he called into question the philosophical primacy of Thomism on the grounds that it rendered faith ideological and concealed the Revelation. From that point there was not a significant debate in the Polish Church in which Tischner did not take part; many of them he initiated himself. His most important texts from that period are found in the books Świat ludzkiej nadziei (The world of human hope; 1975) and Myślenie według wartości (Thinking by the values; 1982). At the end of the 1970s, Tischner also took issue with Marxism in the book Polski kształt dialogu (The Polish shape of dialogue; 1979).

The year 1980 marked the beginning of Tischner’s public activity. His October 1980 sermon at Wawel Castle in Kraków during a mass for Solidarity leaders (“Solidarity means carrying one another’s burdens”; “The deepest solidarity is that of consciences”) initiated a series of texts published in Tygodnik Powszechny. Later, those texts were published as a collection titled Etyka Solidarności (The ethics of solidarity; 1981); in them Tischner reflected on the ethical dimensions of contemporary events. Since then he was generally regarded as the chaplain of Solidarity. The sermon he preached at the First Congress of Solidarity became part of its official documents. In a homily that Pope John Paul II preached at Zaspas in Gdańsk in 1987, he cited Tischner’s texts as the ones that best rendered the truth about Solidarity. Accepting the duty of the chaplain of the Association of the Tatra Highlanders in 1980, Tischner set out to “crystallize the highlander idea.” He organized annual masses at Mt. Turbacz and supported the development of the highlander culture. Owing to his initiative, the Tatra farmers gained the opportunity to study in Austria; they also received help with equipment. The literary aftermath of Tischner’s support for the highlanders was the sermons he preached in the local highland dialect and the book Historia filozofii po góralsku (History of philosophy the highlander way; 1997).

After 1989, Tischner supported the Poles in their endeavors to build a new social, political, and—first and foremost—ethical order. He wrote articles for Tygodnik Powszechny; these were collected and published in books such as Nieszczęsny dar wolności (The unfortunate gift of freedom; 1993), W krainie schorowanej wyobraźni (In the land of morbid imagination; 1997), and Ksiądz na manowcach (A stray priest; 1999). Tischner also continued purely philosophical activities. The works in which he presented his own original philosophy include Filozofia dramatu (The philosophy of drama; 1990) and Spór o istnienie człowieka (The debate over the existence of man; 1998). From 1982, Tischner was dean of the Philosophical Department of the Papal Theological Academy in Kraków several times. When he was elected rector, he refused to accept the position on the grounds that it would be incompatible with his priestly duties. For many years, Tischner was president of the Institute for Human Sciences in Vienna. He received a number of awards. In 1999, he was decorated with the Polish Order of the White Eagle. The last years of his life were marked with a struggle with cancer of the larynx. In this period, Tischner’s literary output intensified even further. His writings touched upon the profoundest religious experiences: the relation of freedom and grace, as well as mercy. In a telegram sent after Tischner’s death, John Paul II wrote, “He was a man of the Church, always careful not to lose sight of man when defending the truth.” (ZS)

TISO Jozef (13 October 1887, Bytča–18 April 1947, Bratislava), priest, president of Slovakia. Born into a large family of farmers, after completing a Catholic school (where he studied in Slovak, Hungarian, and German), Tiso attended a gymnasium in Žilina. Then he began theological studies in Nitra and in a Hungarian seminary, Pazmaneum, in Vienna. He was ordained in 1910 in Vienna. Tiso began his pastoral work in 1910 in the Slovak village of Osčadnice and then in Rajca, combining pastoral work with social engagement. Tiso created cultural-educational associations and people's banks through the parish. In 1913 he went to the parish in Bánovce-nad-Bebravou and was involved in pastoral work there until 1945. After the outbreak of World War I Tiso became the chaplain of a Slovak regiment from Trenčín. However, he was soon taken seriously ill and was moved to Nitra, where he worked at a local theological seminary, lecturing in moral and pastoral theology. From 1920 to 1923 Tiso was a secretary to Bishop Karel Kmetko in Nitra. In 1924 he became a parish priest in Bánovce-nad-Bebravou.

From his youth Tiso remained under the influence of Reverend Andrej Hlinka, acting in favor of the national emancipation of the Slovaks. He sought equality for the Slovak language in pastoral work and religious instruction. He spoke against the use of Church structures for the Magyarization of Slovak Catholics. From the mid-1920s Tiso was a member of the leadership of Rev. Hlinka's party, the Slovak People's Party (Slovenská Ľudová Strana [SL'S]). Between 1925 and 1939 he was an MP to the National Assembly, a president of the parliamentary club, and vice-president of the SL'S. In 1927–28, when the Prague government encouraged Slovak autonomists to co-rule, Tiso held the post of minister of education and physical culture. In the parliament he supported Slovak autonomy within the framework of a common state with the Czechs. He was critical of Prague centralism, which, according to him, led to economic difficulties and mass unemployment in Slovakia. At first Tiso put his hopes in President Edvard Beneš, who had pledged to respect the program of Slovak autonomy. When Beneš failed to keep his promise, Tiso increasingly sharply criticized the president of Czechoslovakia.

After the Pact of Munich and the First Vienna Award, when Transcarpathian Ruthenia was ceded to Hungary and Slovakia gained autonomy within Czechoslovakia (19 November 1938), Tiso became prime minister of the autonomous Slovak government. On the night of 9–10 March 1939 the president of Czechoslovakia, Emil Hácha, dismissed the autonomous Slovak government, and the army assumed power in Slovakia. For a short time Tiso found himself under house arrest. Despite pressure from adherents of the Third Reich, Tiso hesitated to ask Hitler for political support. He thought the situation was not ripe enough to proclaim an independent state. On 13 March 1939 Tiso was summoned to Berlin, where Hitler informed him that the liquidation of Czechoslovakia had been determined. Tiso was only to agree to the proclamation of independence of Slovakia. Otherwise Hitler threatened to allow the occupation of Slovakia by Hungarian troops. Under these circumstances Tiso accepted the proclamation of independence of Slovakia. He refused, though, to announce the declaration of sovereignty on Berlin radio, stating that this was in the area of competence of the Slovak parliament. However, he accepted a telegram prepared by the Germans that stated that Hitler would guarantee the independence of Slovakia. On 14 March 1939, at a meeting of the Slovak parliament, the sovereignty of Slovakia was unanimously announced, and the creation of an independent state was proclaimed.

From 14 March to 28 October 1939 Tiso was prime minister, and then until early April 1945 he was president of Slovakia. The government he headed swerved between authoritarianism and a Slovak version of fascism, supported by, among others, Prime Minister Béla Tuka. Tiso tried to organize the sociopolitical life of Slovakia on the authoritarian model, although the parliament still functioned. During the war Slovakia was completely subordinated to the Third Reich, in both foreign and domestic policy; extreme forces, represented by paramilitary units, the Hlinka Guard, gradually began to come into prominence. At first, because of favorable circumstances stemming from the war, the Slovak economy flourished. However, after 1943 the negative effects of the dependence on Germany became more obvious and led to an increase of opposition to Tiso's rule. Severe repressive measures were taken against the opposition, mainly the Communists, but also against the representatives of other parties. Tiso was responsible for the involvement of the Slovak Army in the aggression against Poland in September 1939, for the declaration of war against Great Britain and the United States, and for the participation of the Slovak military in an attack on the USSR in June 1941. At home he allowed the Fascist circles, rallied around Alexander Mach and Tuka, to carry out the so-called Aryanization—that is, nationalization—of Jewish property and to introduce the so-called Jewish code on 9 September 1941. The code outlawed Slovak citizens of Jewish nationality. From March 1942 many of them were deported and killed in Nazi death camps. Over all, around seventy thousand Slovak Jews perished. As a result of the intervention of the Holy See in 1943, Tiso forbade the further deportation of Jews.

After the outbreak of the Slovak National Uprising in August 1944, Tiso sided with the Nazi army, supporting the bloody pacification it carried out. He thought that the uprising was instigated only by Communists sent from Moscow and that it threatened the independence of the state. He did not attempt to negotiate with the military leaders of the uprising. In October 1944, at a victory parade in Banská Bystrica, Tiso personally decorated the commanders of the German units. In the struggle against the partisans the Operational Units of the Hlinka Guard supported the Germans. In the autumn of 1944 Tiso's rule was mainly based upon the backing of German garrisons. The apparatus of violence—especially the Hlinka Guard, led by a Germanophile, Otomar Kubala, and the Headquarters of State Security—functioned until the end of the war. On 3 April 1945 Tiso fled to Austria and took refuge in a Benedictine monastery, Kremsmünster, where the American Army interned him in June. Tiso was delivered to Czechoslovak authorities in September 1945. On 2 December 1945 a public trial of top Slovak leaders, including Tiso, began in Bratislava. Tiso was sentenced to death, and President Beneš rejected his plea for pardon. At an extraordinary meeting on 16 April 1947, the Czechoslovak government led by Prime Minister Klement Gottwald decided to confirm the death sentence, despite the votes of ministers from the Czechoslovak People's Party and the Slovak Democratic Party. As a result Tiso was hanged.

After Slovakia's proclamation of independence in 1992 a discussion on Tiso's role in the recent history of Slovakia was launched. It was emphasized that although personally Tiso was often an opponent of radical activities in the domestic arena and tried to prevent the involvement of greater numbers of Slovak forces in the war on the side of the Third Reich, he bore responsibility for the policy of loyalty to Hitler. Despite the endeavors of Slovak nationalists, Tiso was not officially rehabilitated. (AGr)

TISZA István (22 April 1861, Geszt–31 October 1918, Budapest), Hungarian politician. Tisza was a son of Count Kálmán Tisza, a leading nineteenth-century Hungarian politician, co-founder of the ruling Liberal Party (Szabadelvű Párt [LP]). When he was only fourteen years old, Tisza passed his high school final exams and took up legal and economic studies in Budapest and then in Berlin and Heidelberg, where he graduated. In 1881, he received a Ph.D. in political science in Budapest. Tisza belonged to the Evangelical Reformed Church. For five years he ran a family estate, and then he was elected MP as an LP representative in 1886. In 1897, Tisza received, from Emperor Francis Joseph, the title of count that had belonged to his uncle Lajos Tisza. Like his father, Tisza was a staunch advocate of the 1867 compromise. He held the view that only in alliance with Austria and within the monarchy could Hungary maintain the status of a power and—under the leadership of the native aristocracy and nobility—maintain its territorial integrity because it was a country that had so many national minorities. Tisza believed in law and order and a constitutional system as long as they strengthened rather than weakened the Hungarian state. He was against expanding voting rights on the grounds that such a move would jeopardize Hungarian supremacy in the state. A supporter of dualism, Tisza was determined to prevent the opposition from taking power since the opposition was against the 1867 compromise. Therefore, he tacitly supported voting abuse that prevented the opposition from winning elections.

On 3 November 1903, Tisza became prime minister. The task he considered crucial was to overcome the parliamentary obstruction of the opposition, which did not want to let a bill pass that would increase the number of recruits called up for the joint Austro-Hungarian Army. Tisza was not willing to accept compromise solutions; he rejected all proposals to transform the monarchical structure. His rigid stance made the parliamentary chambers look more and more often like a battlefield (fights, damaged equipment, and the like). In addition, Tisza ruthlessly combated workers' and agrarian-Socialist movements. In April 1904 he did not hesitate to order a violent crackdown on a strike of railroaders. He ordered the police to open fire on Romanian peasants who participated in a demonstration in the village of Élesd, leading to thirty-three deaths. In November 1904 he pushed for a modification of parliamentary regulations that resulted in the breakup of the LP, its defeat in the parliamentary elections, and Tisza's resignation from the government on 18 June 1905.

After a government had been established by a national coalition in 1906, Tisza withdrew from the political scene. After the fall of the coalition in 1910, he returned, setting up the National Labor Party (Nemzeti Munkapárt [NLP]) and winning the parliamentary elections. The NLP gained an absolute parliamentary majority. On 22 May 1912, Tisza became speaker of the parliament. Because of the Balkan Wars, he accelerated the draft for increased numbers of recruits; the following day this move resulted in a series of strikes and a huge, bloodily suppressed demonstration of workers (the so-called bloody Thursday). Five days later, there was an unsuccessful bomb attempt to kill him. In June, Tisza pushed for a bill to increase the joint army and had opposition parliamentarians forcibly removed if they protested it. One of them made a failed attempt on Tisza's life and then committed suicide. Tisza removed all obstructions; on his orders, the police did not let opposition MPs into the parliament building for two months.

On 10 June 1913, Tisza became prime minister again. Immediately after the assassination of the heir to the throne, Francis Ferdinand, and his wife in Sarajevo, he was against declaring war on Serbia as he considered the monarchy not to be sufficiently prepared for it. He was also afraid lest Russia join the war. Three weeks later, he changed his mind, mobilizing society both in the parliament and outside of it. Convinced that all forces must be concentrated on the war, he was even more against proposals for political reforms. After the death of Francis Joseph in 1916, his successor, Charles IV, refused to support Tisza and his rigid policies, contrary to his predecessor. Therefore, on 15 June 1917 Tisza resigned. Since his party had a parliamentary majority, he was able to torpedo the reformist initiatives of his successor, Sándor Wekerle. To set a personal example, in summer 1917 Tisza went to the front lines for over two months as the commander of a cavalry regiment. When he returned to Budapest, a third unsuccessful attempt on his life was made. Dislike for him turned into hatred as the situation at the front deteriorated. In fall 1918, as the personification of a war already lost and of a dual state that was falling apart, Tisza was the most hated politician in Hungary. On the last day of October, he was shot dead by an eight-soldier unit in his own house. The perpetrators were never caught. (JT)

TITO Josip [originally Broz] (7 May 1892, Kumrovec—4 May 1980, Ljubljana), Yugoslav Communist leader. Tito was the seventh of fifteen children born into a Catholic peasant family on the borders of Croatia and Slovenia. From early youth he worked as a locksmith, crisscrossing his homeland, as well as Czechoslovakia and Germany. In 1910 he joined the Croatian Social Democratic Party. From 1913 he served in the Austro-Hungarian Army. In 1915 he was taken captive by the Russians. He stayed in the Ural Mountains and then worked as a mechanic in the Volga region and in Siberia. Released after the February 1917 revolution, he went to Petrograd, where he was active in the preparations for the Bolshevik coup.

Arrested by the authorities of the Provisional Government and sent again to Siberia, he took part in the revolution as a member of the Red Guard in Omsk and then in Kazakhstan.

In 1920 Tito returned to Yugoslavia as a Bolshevik activist. After the outlawing of the Communist Party, he was arrested twice, in 1923 and 1927. At that time he officially served as the secretary general of the metalworkers' trade union. In April 1927 Tito illegally joined the party committee in Zagreb, and in 1928, as a supporter of Stalin in his fight against Trotsky, he became a deputy member of the Politburo of the party. Arrested again in 1929, he spent five years in prison, where he met (among others) Moša Pijade, the leading ideologist of the party. After his release, Tito resumed his conspiratorial work, traveling, for example, to Paris, Vienna, and Prague. For a year he worked in Moscow in the Balkan unit of the Comintern. Although he was known there as "Comrade Walter," it was then he assumed another of his pseudonyms, Tito, as his surname. In the spring of 1936 he became an organizational secretary of the Central Committee of the Communist Party of Yugoslavia (CPY). As a loyal Stalinist, he avoided the massacre among the Yugoslav Communists during the great purge of 1937–38; according to some reports, he was an accomplice to it. In 1937 the Comintern designated him as the provisional secretary general of the party. Tito then promoted his supporters—among others, Milovan Djilas, Aleksander Ranković, and Edvard Kardelj. He also mobilized Yugoslav volunteers to fight on the side of the Spanish Republic. In October 1940 a secret CPY conference accepted Tito as the head of the party. The Communists remained passive when the Yugoslav government signed the anti-Comintern Pact. They also did not take action after Hitler's invasion of Yugoslavia in June 1941, as Berlin was still Moscow's ally.

Only after Hitler's invasion of the USSR did Tito, heading a Communist faction of the anti-German guerrillas in occupied Yugoslavia, issue a call to arms. He issued a general declaration, "Death to fascism; freedom to the people," which gained him support especially in the countryside. His partisans controlled a sizable mountainous part of the country. For a long time the general headquarters of the movement remained in Serbian Užice. There the Communists created a revolutionary government for the freed areas, excluding from this government the partisans of Colonel Dragoljub (Draža) Mihailović—that is, the Chetniks, linked with the government-in-exile of King Peter in London. Tito's partisans received Soviet aid, though in amounts suitable for the tactics of Stalin, who was apprehensive that excessively swift Communist successes might complicate his game with the Western Allies. In November 1941 the Germans attacked Užice. Tito's partisan army, involved at the same time in struggles against the Croatian Ustashe and the Chetniks, suffered great losses.

After the fall of the “Užice Republic” the movement centered in Bosnia and Montenegro, where Tito quickly rebuilt his troops. In November 1942 he established the Anti-Fascist Council for the National Liberation of Yugoslavia (Antifašističko Vijeće Narodnog Oslobodjenja Jugoslavije [AVNOJ]), which proclaimed the program of a federal people’s republic. Tito became the head of its provisional government, gaining the title of marshal. Despite further losses in the battles at the Neretva and Sutjeska Rivers against the Germans, the Italians, and the Ustashe at the beginning of 1943, Tito’s guerrillas continued to revive because their tactics and AVNOJ’s program appealed to the peasants more than the strategy of the Chetniks, who were gathering strength and weapons for a decisive attack at the time of the Allies’ offensive. After the capitulation of Italy in September 1943 Tito’s troops of around fifty thousand partisans became considerably reinforced with weapons and equipment seized from the Italians. In May 1944 the German offensive in Bosnia again threatened the partisans, and Tito himself barely avoided being captured in his headquarters in Drvar. The Allies’ backing for the government-in-exile and the Chetniks was diminishing; therefore from mid-1944 Tito’s supporters liberated the country from the Germans and also eliminated the Chetniks. In September 1944 Tito met with Stalin and behaved as though he were his partner rather than his subordinate, which made the Soviet dictator suspicious.

Under pressure from the Allies, on 1 November 1944 Tito made an agreement with the London government-in-exile of Ivan Šubašić. In return for including several ministers-in-exile in the provisional government led by Tito, Šubašić would recognize AVNOJ as a provisional parliament and guarantee that King Peter would not return home without the approbation of the “Yugoslav masses.” The Big Three accepted the agreement in Yalta. On 6 March 1945 Tito became the head of the provisional government, in which Šubašić assumed the portfolio for foreign affairs. Tito’s supporters immediately broke the agreement, deposing the king, changing the name of the state, and establishing Communist legislation. When the ministers-in-exile resigned in protest, the Communists increased the terror. The Communist political police arrested not only Serb collaborators and Croatian Ustashe, but thousands of innocent people as well. Particular repression fell upon Slovene and Croatian Catholics.

In November 1945 the Communists organized an election. According to the announced results, 90.6 percent of the vote supposedly went to the Communist lists. In March 1946 Mihailović was captured. After a fabricated trial he was sentenced to death and executed in July 1946. In a show trial the Communists also sentenced the primate of Croatia, Archbishop Alojzije Stepinac, to sixteen years of hard labor. With considerable influence upon the part of society to which the socially radical and federal program of the Communists was a counterpoint to the unstable and Serb-dominated Yugoslavia, Tito imposed a brutal Stalinist dictatorship upon the country. Although in Yugoslavia tensions appeared between Tito’s administration and Soviet advisers who interfered in domestic matters, in Moscow Tito was at first treated as one of the prominent leaders of the Communist movement. Tito actively supported the Greek Communist guerrillas. In 1947 he belonged to the promoters and founders of the Communist Information Bureau (Cominform). At the same time, he aimed at the unification of Yugoslavia, Albania, and Bulgaria into a Balkan federation. The project won the support of the leader of the Bulgarian Communists, Georgi Dimitrov, but provoked objections from Stalin, who summoned Tito and Dimitrov to Moscow. Dimitrov went, but Tito sent only his delegates. The delegates agreed to consult on Yugoslavia’s foreign policy with the Kremlin, but Tito rejected this agreement. In response the USSR withdrew its military advisers in March 1948. Tito’s conciliatory letter expressing regret and a willingness to cooperate closely was met with Stalin’s fundamental criticism of Tito, who replied that he was willing to invite the leaders of the USSR for ideological talks but reserved the right of self-determination in regard to national aims. Stalin rejected this standpoint as “arrogant” and “anti-party.”

In June 1948 the conflict was revealed in a Cominform statement that denounced the ideology and policy of the Yugoslav leaders. Soon, in Moscow’s propaganda, “Titoism” became an enemy as terrible as “imperialism,” and Tito himself was described as a “watchdog of imperialism.” Yugoslavia, isolated from the West, found itself in a vacuum. Tito took control of the situation within the party by purging it of around one hundred thousand members suspected of disloyalty. Around fifteen thousand supporters of the Cominform were imprisoned in a concentration camp at Beli Otok, and several leading Stalinists were murdered. At first Tito attempted to outdo the USSR in Communist orthodoxy, but a collapse of the economy forced him to change course. In 1950 the collectivization of the countryside was abandoned, and the supervision of industry was decentralized with the introduction of the self-management system of ownership. In return for Yugoslavia’s sealing off of the border between Yugoslavia and Greece—which definitely undermined the position of the Greek Communists—the United States granted Yugoslavia $1 billion in economic aid. The new constitution of June 1953 strengthened the federal character of the state. At the same time, Tito suppressed the supporters of further reforms by removing their leading spokesman, Džilas, and sentencing him to a long prison term.

After Stalin's death the Soviet collective leadership began to seek a reconciliation with Yugoslavia, and in May 1955 Nikita Khrushchev came to Belgrade with a conciliatory mission. Soviet-Yugoslav relations improved thereafter, but Tito remained fully independent in foreign policy. In 1956 he condemned the Soviet invasion of Hungary, although he agreed to deliver Imre Nagy, who took refuge in the Yugoslav Embassy. In 1968 Tito criticized the Warsaw Pact invasion of Czechoslovakia. However, he avoided antagonizing the Kremlin, and in 1971 he and Leonid Brezhnev signed a treaty of mutual non-interference in domestic matters. In 1979 Tito protested the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan. Tito was one of the founders and leaders of the movement of non-aligned states. In 1961 a conference of the movement was held in Belgrade. Tito visited numerous countries in Africa, Asia, and Latin America, including Cuba, where he tried to persuade Fidel Castro to assume a more independent position from the USSR. Tito visited the United States four times and also maintained good relations with India and China. In domestic policy he held the government apparatus in an iron grip but opened Yugoslavia to Western tourists and allowed the Yugoslavs to travel abroad to earn money. Income from tourism and foreign assistance supported the Yugoslav balance of payments. In 1966 Tito eliminated the influence of Aleksander Ranković and his political police and based his power upon the party and the state bureaucracy. In 1971 he suppressed national ferment in the Croatian party. In 1974 he became Yugoslavia's president for life. At first Tito was a man of modest material needs, but as the years went by, he surrounded himself with increasing luxury. Apart from a residence on Brioni Island, he owned seventeen palaces, as well as hunting grounds, and his vanity and fondness for splendor became an open secret. Tito was married three times, the last time to Jovanka Budisavljević. His funeral in 1980 was an unprecedented gathering of world political leaders. After Tito's death the state he created began to disintegrate. (WR)

TITULESCU Nicolae (4 March 1882, Craiova–17 March 1941, Cannes), Romanian politician. After graduation from college, Titulescu obtained a Ph.D. in legal sciences from a university in Paris in 1905. The same year he began scholarly work at the university in Iași. He started his political career in February 1908, joining the Conservative Democratic Party of Dumitru (Take) Ionescu. In 1912 Titulescu became an MP. From August 1913 he took part in the committee for the affairs of Southern Dobruja during the Bucharest peace conference. After Romania entered World War I, Titulescu became a member of the government for the first time, assuming the portfolio of minister of finance in the cabinet of Ion Brătianu and then in the cabinet of Ionescu. After the capitulation of Romania, Titulescu left for Paris to continue actions in favor of his country. He was one of the delegates to the Paris Peace Conference. From July 1920 he was minister of finance in the governments of Alexandru Averescu and Ionescu, implementing a tax reform. On 16 December 1921 Titulescu became envoy to Great Britain and held the post, with a year's break, until October 1932. At the same time, from 1 April 1924, he served as the permanent representative to the League of Nations. From 1925 Titulescu participated in the works of the International Diplomatic Academy in Paris, of which he became vice-president.

In July 1927 Titulescu assumed the post of minister of foreign affairs for the first time in the government of Ion Brătianu, and he held the post until August 1928. Between 1930 and 1931 he presided over the debates of the Eleventh and Twelfth Sessions of the League of Nations Assembly. Moreover, on 16 October 1930 he became a member of the Permanent Court of Arbitration in The Hague. Between October 1932 and August 1936, after his return from a post in London, Titulescu again served as minister of foreign affairs in the governments of Ion Duca and Gheorghe Tătărescu. At that time he enjoyed an almost autonomous position in the government. Titulescu's diplomatic achievements include the transformation of the Little Entente from a strictly military alliance into a political and economic alliance (30 May–1 June 1933), the normalization of Romania's relations with the USSR (9 July 1934), and the creation of the Balkan Entente (9 February 1934). The second term of his ministry coincided with a deterioration of relations with Italy and Poland. Titulescu sharply opposed Italian aggression against Ethiopia in 1935. He was also one of the most ardent advocates of imposing severe economic sanctions on Italy. Problems in the relations with Poland resulted from Titulescu's attempts to sign a treaty of mutual assistance with the USSR. These moves met with protests in Romania as well. As a result of international pressure and domestic opposition, which rallied around King Charles II and was supported by the Polish ambassador, on 29 August 1936 Titulescu was removed from the government under the pretext of its reconstruction. As minister, Titulescu was considered an outstanding politician and a leading opponent of fascism and territorial revisionism. After his dismissal from the government Titulescu never returned to politics. He went to Switzerland and then to France, where he remained from 1937 until his death. Some of Titulescu's works, including Documente diplomatice (Diplomatic documents; 1967), were issued in Romania under Communist rule, while others were issued in the 1990s. Titulescu's Documente confidentiale (Confidential documents) were published in 1992 and Romania's Foreign Policy in 1994. (FA/TD)

TKACHOU Mikhas (10 March 1942, Mstsislau, Belorussian SSR–31 October 1992, Minsk), Belorussian historian and politician. In 1964 Tkachou graduated from the Department of History of the Belorussian State University in Minsk. He began working at the Institute of History of the Academy of Sciences of the Belorussian SSR in 1968 and at the Institute of History of Hrodna University in 1978. Tkachou earned a doctorate in history in 1987 and became a professor in 1989. His research focused particularly on defense architecture in Belorussia in the thirteenth–eighteenth centuries. He wrote the books Zamki Belorussii (The castles of Belorussia; 1987), Zamki i liudzi (Castles and people; 1991), and Pakhodnia (Torch; 1994). From 1989 Tkachou was one of the leaders of the Belorussian democratic opposition. A co-founder of the Belorussian People's Front, he became its vice-chairman in June 1989. In 1991 he founded the Belorussian Social Democratic Hromada and became its first chairman. From 1989 to 1992 he was responsible for the history section of the Belorussian Encyclopedia publishing house. In 1992 he became the editor-in-chief of this publishing house. Tkachou died suddenly of coronary heart disease. (EM)

came from Transylvania. After theological studies in Rome, he took holy orders in March 1939. In 1940 in Rome, he received a Ph.D. in theology. He worked in Transylvanian parishes, also teaching Latin and Italian. After World War II, when the Communists began to eliminate the Greek Catholic Church, Todea was arrested and released five times in 1946. In 1948, Greek Catholic bishops and priests were faced with the dilemma of either joining the Orthodox Church or risking most severe punishments. Todea was one of the priests who chose strict obedience to the Pope. After another incarceration in 1948, he escaped arrest and went into hiding. On 19 November 1950, Bishop Joseph Schubert secretly consecrated him bishop; subsequently, Todea assumed the duties of archbishop in the towns of Făgăraș and Alba Iulia. Caught by the political police in January 1951, after long and brutal interrogations in the prisons in Tîrgu Mures, Bucharest, Jilava, and Uranus, Todea was sentenced to hard labor for life in December 1952. He was kept in a number of prisons—for example, in Sighet; in Râmnicu Sărat from 1955; in Pitești from 1957; and in Gherla from 1962. Todea was released in 1964, when the new party leader, Nicolae Ceaușescu, announced an amnesty for political prisoners. Todea settled in Reghin, where he clandestinely performed his duties as bishop in spite of constant persecutions and obstacles from the authorities. During a secret meeting of Romanian Greek Catholic Church leaders in 1986, Todea was elected chairman of the episcopate and received the title of metropolitan. After the fall of the Ceaușescu regime in December 1989, the Greek Catholic Church was formally recognized. In 1990, Pope John Paul II recognized Todea as the leader of Romanian Greek Catholics and appointed him cardinal on 28 June 1991. In 1992 Todea suffered a stroke but did not formally retire until July 1994. (WR)

TODOROV Stanko (10 December 1920, Klenovik [now Kolosh], near Radomir–17 December 1996, Sofia), Bulgarian Communist activist. In 1936 Todorov became a member of the Working Class Youth Union and in 1943 a member of the (Communist) Bulgarian Workers' Party. While doing his military service, he co-founded illegal Communist groups. After these activities were discovered, Todorov fled the barracks and went into hiding. In 1943 he was sentenced to death in absentia. Todorov was a member of the staff of partisan groups in Sofia. Seriously wounded during a skirmish with the police, he was captured but managed to escape from prison during the Allied bombing of Sofia in March 1944. After the coup of 9 September 1944, Todorov initially worked in the district committee of the Working Class Youth Union (until 1947) and then served as secretary of the Central Committee (CC) of the People's Youth Union (until 1949). He subsequently rose through the ranks of the Communist Party. Todorov served successively as secretary of the district committee of the Bulgarian Communist Party (BCP) in Sofia (1950), first secretary of the BCP district committee in Burgas (1950–52), head of the CC Agricultural Department (1952), and member of the BCP CC (1954–90). One of the top leaders of the party from 1957 to 1988, he served as CC secretary (1957–59 and 1966–71) and deputy member (1959–61) and member of the BCP CC Politburo (1961–88).

Todorov also held top governmental positions. He served as minister of agriculture in the governments of Vulko Chervenkov and Anton Yugov (September 1952–February 1957); minister of agriculture and forestry in Yugov's cabinet (February–July 1957); deputy prime minister (25 December 1959–20 November 1962); Bulgaria's permanent representative to the Council for Mutual Economic Assistance (CMEA; also known as Comecon) (1960–65); chairman of the State Planning Committee (25 December 1959–27 September 1962); deputy prime minister in the cabinet of Todor Zhivkov (27 November 1962–22 November 1966); and prime minister (9 July 1971–18 June 1981). A deputy to the second through ninth National Assemblies (1954–90) and to the Seventh Grand National Assembly (1990), Todorov served as parliamentary speaker from 1981 to 1990. In 1989 he was appointed to the parliamentary commission for drafting constitutional amendments. Todorov was a close associate of Zhivkov for many years. It was not until the late 1980s that their relationship deteriorated, and Todorov was dismissed from the party leadership because of the role of his wife, Sonia Bakish, in the establishment of the Citizens' Committee for the Protection of Ruse on 3 March 1988. On 10 November 1989 Todorov was instrumental in removing Zhivkov from power. After the BCP was transformed into the Bulgarian Socialist Party (BSP), Todorov was elected a member of the BSP Supreme Council, but he was not reelected at the BSP congress in September 1990. In October 1990 he resigned his parliamentary seat and retired from public life. Todorov's publications include Usilni godini: Izbrani proizvedeniya 1949–1979 (Intensive years: Selected works; 1980) and Do vurkhovete na vlastta (Rising to the top; 1995). (JJ)

TOKARSKI Julian (25 December 1903, Czersk–15 August 1977, Warsaw), Polish Communist activist. The son of a laborer, after finishing primary school, Tokarski worked as a turner. In 1921 he joined the Communist Workers' Party of Poland (Komunistyczna Partia Robotniczej Polski [KPRP]). In 1927–29 Tokarski was a member of the Central Committee (CC) and CC secretary of the Union of Communist Youth. In 1929 he left for the USSR, where he underwent Comintern training, and he joined the All-Union Communist Party (Bolsheviks). During World War II, Tokarski was active in the Central Bureau of Polish Communists, and in 1943 he became a political officer of the Polish Army, which was formed in the USSR at that time. In 1944 he became deputy commander of the First Armored Corps for political and educational affairs, and in 1945 he was appointed to a similar post in the Internal Security Corps (Korpus Bezpieczeństwa Wewnętrzznego [KBW]). Tokarski subsequently joined the apparatus of the Polish Workers' Party (Polska Partia Robotnicza [PPR]). From September 1947 to December 1948 he was first secretary of the Provincial Committee of the PPR in Warsaw Province. He subsequently became secretary and later first secretary of the Warsaw City Committee of the Polish United Workers' Party (Polska Zjednoczona Partia Robotnicza [PUWP]) in Warsaw. In 1950 for a short time Tokarski headed the Cadres Department of the party's Central Committee. From October 1950 to February 1952 he served as minister of heavy industry and until April 1955 as minister of machine industry; in July 1956 he became minister of motor industry. As a representative of the Stalinist wing of the party, Tokarski was dismissed in October 1956. However, in April 1959, when the former Natolin faction (Natolińcy) began to consolidate its position, Tokarski again became deputy head of the CC Economic Department, and in October 1959 he was appointed deputy prime minister. In December 1965 he resigned from this post, but he continued to serve as a member of the State Council. In June 1969 he retired. Tokarski was an uneducated dogmatist and a faithful follower of the Stalinist "iron-hand" policy. (WR)

TÓKÉS László (1 April 1952, Cluj-Napoca [Kolozsvár, Klausenburg], Transylvania), bishop of the Hungarian Evangelical Reformed Church in Transylvania. Tóké is the son of a pastor. After graduating from high school, he studied theology at the Protestant Institute of Theology in Cluj, earning a degree in 1975. He then began working as an assistant pastor in Braşov (Brassó). Subjected to compulsory assimilation during Nicolae Ceauşescu's dictatorship and deprived of their schools and cultural institutions, the Hungarians in Romania sought refuge in the church. From the beginning of his work, Tóké was pestered by the political police (Securitate), who, by resorting to bribery, blackmail, and threats, tried to persuade him to inform on his colleagues and his parishioners. From 1977 to 1984 Tóké served as pastor in Dej [Dés]. At that time he published an article in Ellenpontok (the first underground periodical in Romania) on the fate of the local Hungarian community and a vast work on the situation of his church, most of whose bishops collaborated with the Securitate. In 1984 Tóké was dismissed and was unemployed for over two years. His father, Dr. István Tóké, who had served as deputy bishop, was also dismissed from his position.

In 1986 Tóké organized a sit-in strike in protest against the abuses in the Church and against restrictions on the freedom of religion. He became famous abroad, and since the Ceauşescu regime did not want to spoil Romania's image in the international arena, Tóké was appointed assistant pastor (1986) and soon afterwards pastor in Timişoara (Temesvár). For his criticism of the situation of his church and protests against the destruction of Hungarian villages in Romania, from 1988 he was systematically persecuted. At the beginning of 1989 church and state authorities filed a lawsuit against Tóké and banned him from giving sermons. In agreement with the authorities, the bishop who supervised Tóké ordered that Tóké be moved to a remote province. Tóké refused to obey this order. In April 1989 his parishioners stood up in his defense. In the summer of that year, Panorama, a program on Hungarian Television, presented an interview with Tóké that focused on the destruction of Hungarian villages by Romanian authorities and exposed the Communists' anti-religious policies. In the autumn of 1989 Tóké was de facto under house arrest. As a result of the local bishop's efforts, a municipal court ordered his eviction from his church flat, which gave rise to an uprising in Timişoara. On 15 December the parishioners gathered around the church and Tóké's flat to prevent his eviction. In the following days other people joined the protesters, standing up against military units sent to dispel the demonstrators. The events in Timişoara triggered off social unrest in Bucharest one week later, eventually leading to the fall of Ceauşescu.

In 1990 Tóké was a member of the Provisional Council of the National Salvation Front. In March 1990 he became bishop of the Evangelical Reformed Superintendency for the district of Királyhágómellék, with its seat in Oradea (Nagyvárad). He also became co-chairman of the Synod of the Evangelical Reformed Church in Romania. Elected honorary chairman of the Democratic Union of Hungarians in Romania, Tóké represents its radical wing. In 1992 he became a member of the Honorary European Senate and a member of the Order of the Knights of St. John. In 1999 he was elected president of the World Federation of Hungarian Calvinists. Tóké has received many Hungarian and foreign awards and distinctions, including the Grand Cross of the Order of Merit of the Hungarian Republic in 1999. He has been awarded honorary doctorates by the Reformed Theological Academy of Debrecen (1990), Regent University, Virginia Beach, United States (1991), and Hope College, Michigan, United States (1991). TOMANOVIĆ Lazar (1845, Lepetane, Boka Kotorska, Montenegro–November 1932?), Montenegrin politician. Born into a peasant family, Tomanović attended secondary schools in Zadar and Novi Sad and then studied law in Budapest and Graz, where he earned a doctorate. While a student, he became a member of the United Serbian Youth. After returning to Montenegro, Tomanović served as secretary of the Senate and president of the Supreme Court, and he held numerous ministerial positions. He contributed to the Cetinje-based periodicals Nova Zeta (1889–92), Grlica (1889–97), and Glas Crnogorca (1891–1903). From 17 April 1907 to 19 June 1912 Tomanović served as prime minister of Montenegro. He worked closely with Prince Nicholas (the future King Nicholas). Planning a complicated game for influence in the Albanian territories and for Montenegro's participation in the Balkan Wars, the king removed Tomanović from power. Tomanović's publications include the memoirs Iz moga ministrovanja (My years as minister; 1921). (WR)

TOMÁŠEK František (30 June 1899, Studénka–4 August 1992, Prague), cardinal, Czech primate. Tomášek was born into the large family of a teacher. In 1918, he graduated from the Slavonic High School in Olomouc and then took up studies in the Theological Department at Olomouc University. His spiritual formation was greatly affected by the Olomouc metropolitan, Archbishop Antonín Stojan, who consecrated Tomášek in July 1922. In 1927–34, Tomášek worked as a catechist in the town of Kelč u Hranic in Moravia. In 1934, he became a lecturer in the Theological Department at Olomouc University, and in 1947 he was appointed a professor at this university. In the 1930s and 1940s, Tomášek published thirty-one books and papers on pedagogy and catechization. Some of his books, like Katechismus and Pedagogy, were reissued a number of times. Tomášek worked at the university until 1950, except during the period of German occupation. Pope Pius XII appointed Tomášek auxiliary bishop of the Olomouc archdiocese. On 14 October 1949 he was secretly ordained bishop by the Olomouc archbishop, Josef Matoch. Tomášek was not allowed to fulfill his duties, however, and he was soon incarcerated in a concentration camp for priests in Želiv. He was kept there from 23 July 1951 until 28 May 1954. After his release Tomášek began performing his priestly duties under the strict control of the authorities in the town of Moravske Huzové, near Olomouc. On 18 February 1965, Pope Paul VI appointed him apostolic administrator of the Prague archdiocese. Earlier, the Prague metropolitan, Cardinal Josef Beran, who had been kept in detention for many years, agreed to leave Prague in return for his freedom. Cardinal Beran accepted this compromise since it meant that the Prague metropolitan province could have a legally acting bishop.

Tomášek participated in the Second Vatican Council, where he was on committees that worked on developing ecumenical bonds with the Orthodox Church. In 1968, he was one of the initiators of the lay and clerical organization called Council Renovation Endeavor, aimed at replacing the Communist-founded movement of “patriot-priests.” As others, Tomášek had to remain silent after the Warsaw Pact invasion of Czechoslovakia in 1968. However, as the authorities intensified their persecutions of the Church, he supported the so-called underground church, with which he was in constant touch. On 24 May 1976, Pope Paul VI appointed Tomášek cardinal in pectore—that is, without publicly announcing his name—and on 30 December 1977 he was consecrated archbishop of Prague.

Tomášek remained in close contact with Pope John Paul II, who knew well the realities of church life in Czechoslovakia. The change in the so-called Eastern policy of the Vatican enabled Tomášek to conduct a more independent policy toward the authorities in the 1980s. Initially, he hesitated and made some concessions, such as signing the so-called anti-Charter, a document inspired by the authorities and condemning the signatories of Charter 77. However, at the beginning of the 1980s Tomášek established contact with representatives of the democratic opposition. He initiated the Great Novena and the Decade of Spiritual Renovation of the Nation before the 1,000th anniversary of the martyr’s death of Saint Adalbert (Vojtech). Many times he stood up for the violated rights and freedoms of citizens, becoming one of the greatest moral authorities in the country. In 1988, in a special pastoral letter Tomášek supported the appeal of Moravian Catholics (led by Augustin Navrátil), who collected signatures for a thirty-one-point petition to the authorities that demanded that religious freedoms and the separation of church and state be respected. By the end of 1988, around six hundred thousand people had signed the petition, which was subsequently submitted to President Gustav Husák. Tomášek also stood up for the Slovak Catholics who had been imprisoned after a demonstration in Bratislava in March 1988. In 1989, he repeatedly urged the authorities to take up a dialogue with the society.

When on 17 November 1989 in Prague an independent demonstration was suppressed—which was the beginning of the Velvet Revolution—Tomášek was in the Vatican, where the canonization of Agnes of Prague, a Czech princess, was being celebrated on his initiative. On 21 November 1989, immediately after his return home, Tomášek issued an extensive statement in which he presented a severe criticism of the forty years of communism in Czechoslovakia and of the current situation in the country. The statement met with an enthusiastic reception from two hundred thousand demonstrators gathered in a Prague park. On 25 November, Tomášek supervised a celebration in which the relics of St. Agnes were brought to Prague, and he expressed the support of the Church for democratization. He urged his compatriots to combine courage with prudence and to renounce violence. The celebration, broadcast by state television, evoked a lively response in the society. After Václav Havel assumed the presidency, Tomášek supported his efforts to build a democratic society. He supported the president’s appeal for an agreement between the Czech and German nations. Together with Havel, he issued an invitation to Pope John Paul II, who paid a visit to Czechoslovakia in April 1990. Legal regulations passed soon after that visit provided a solution to the most urgent needs of the Catholic Church. Preparations were made for new nominations of bishops; also, laws that restricted the public activity of the Church were repealed, and measures were taken with the aim of returning some confiscated Church property. During his pilgrimage to the Czech Republic, John Paul II said that Tomášek's attitude toward recent injustices "was one of the most vocal expressions of the solidarity of the Church with the persecuted, of solidarity with the people." Tomášek put a lot of effort in endeavors to maintain the Czechoslovakian federation. He repeatedly appealed to Czech and Slovak politicians to be reasonable and moderate and to put the problems of the entire country before their particular interests. The last letter Tomášek submitted to the state authorities was an appeal to maintain the federal state. On 27 March 1991, John Paul II accepted Tomášek's resignation as metropolitan of Prague, handed in because he was of retirement age and in ailing health. Tomášek held honorary doctorates from Charles University in Prague and the University of the Most Sacred Heart of Jesus in Milan, Italy. (AGr)

TOMAŠIĆ Nikola (13 January 1864, Zagreb–29 May 1918, Trešćerovec, near Ozlja), conservative Croatian politician. Tomašić graduated in law in Zagreb. In 1890–91, he was an undersecretary in the Ministry for Croatian Affairs in Budapest. From 1892 he was a professor of economics at Zagreb University. In 1892 Tomašić was also elected a member of the Croatian National Parliament as a representative of the National Party (Narodna Stranka), and he remained an MP until 1906. He was closely associated with the governor (ban) of Croatia, Károly Khuen-Héderváry. When the latter became prime minister of Hungary in 1903, Tomašić was appointed minister for Croatian affairs and chairman of the National Party. After the Croatian-Serb Coalition had been formed in December 1905, the National Party's position became weaker, especially after the coalition won the 1908 elections. After Khuen-Héderváry had again become prime minister of Hungary, at the beginning of 1910 Tomašić was appointed ban of Croatia. He did not manage to mitigate the conflict between the Hungarian authorities and the Croats and Serbs, whose aspirations were increasing, and he left his position in January 1912. (WR)

TOMAŽIĆ Ivan Jožef (1 August 1876, Miklavž, near Ormož–26 February 1949, Maribor), Slovene Catholic bishop. Tomažić graduated from a theological school in Maribor and was ordained in 1898. In 1906 he received a Ph.D. in theology in Innsbruck. He served as secretary to the bishop of Maribor and taught Church history in a theological school. In 1928 Tomažić was appointed auxiliary bishop and in 1933 ordinary bishop of Maribor. He issued a declaration encouraging the Church and priests to stay above interparty struggles; for it he was criticized by clerical politicians. Tomažić developed Catholic Action, Virgin Mary congregations, the Bishop Anton Slomšek Memorial Brotherhood of Cyril and Methodius, and other educational and religious institutions. In 1934 he headed the Eucharistic Synod of Bishops, and in 1936, special celebrations in memory of Bishop Slomšek. Thanks to his endeavors, a new seminary for priests was built in Maribor, as was a Higher Theological School (transformed into agricultural schools by the Communists after the war). During World War II Tomažić advocated "Non ego, sed Deus" (Not me, but God) and protested the German occupation policies. Owing to his uncompromising position, he faced numerous problems in the administration of his diocese of five hundred thousand believers. After the war the Communist authorities ignored Tomažić because his wartime position did not fit the official image of the collaboration of the Catholic clergy. (AO)

TOMKO Jozef (11 March 1924, Udavské), Slovak cardinal. Tomko commenced his theological studies at a seminary in Bratislava. In 1945 he was sent to study in Rome, where he graduated from the Pontifical Lateran University in 1949. Later he received doctorates in theology, canon law, and the social sciences. Tomko was ordained in March 1949. He taught at the Pro Deo University (1950–55) and at the Pontifical Gregorian University in Rome (1970–78). For fifteen years he served as vice-rector and then became rector of the Nepomucenum Pontifical College for clerical students from Bohemia, Moravia, and Slovakia. In 1962 Tomko became a member of the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith. In 1966 he joined in the preparations for the first Synod of Bishops. In December 1974 he became undersecretary of the Congregation for Bishops. On 12 July 1979 he was elected titular archbishop. On 15 September 1979 he was consecrated bishop by Pope John Paul II; this move was seen as support for the persecuted Catholic Church in Slovakia. Tomko incorporated Slovakia's national emblem into his bishop's coat of arms. From 1980 to 1983 Tomko took part in preparations for two ordinary synods, and in 1980 and 1985 he also helped to prepare two extraordinary synods. On 12 July 1979 he became secretary general of the Synod of Bishops. He represented the Holy See at international conferences and ecumenical meetings, including the Conference of the Latin American Episcopate in Puebla, Mexico (1979), and Rio de Janeiro (1980) and the World Council of Churches in Geneva.

On 25 May 1985 Tomko was appointed cardinal, the first Slovak member of the college of cardinals in the twentieth century. From May 1985 to May 2001 he was prefect of the Congregation for the Evangelization of Peoples and grand chancellor of the Pontifical Urban University. Tomko's missionary work extended to all continents other than Europe and North America. He made fifteen visits to Africa, Asia, Latin America, Australia, and Oceania. He contributed to the establishment of 182 new dioceses and ordained 60 bishops. He authored many scholarly works on topics including mixed marriage, modern Christianity, and the role of Ss. Cyril and Methodius in Slovak history. He also wrote his memoirs, Na misijných cestách (On missionary paths; 1989). Tomko was awarded many honorary doctorates, including those from the Academy of Catholic Theology in Warsaw and universities in the United States and Taiwan.

Tomko was also involved in Slovak issues. He initiated the establishment of the Institute of Ss. Cyril and Methodius in Rome for Slovak candidates for the priesthood. He helped to draft the papal constitution "Praescriptionum sacrosancti" of 30 December 1977, which ended the period of provisional Church administration existing in Slovakia since 1918. Slovakia became an independent ecclesiastical province, with its seat in Trnava. Tomko also maintained contacts with the Slovak diaspora in Western Europe and the United States. In 1968, for the first time since 1945, Tomko was able to go to his homeland. Later he was not allowed to visit his country for many years. It was not until the second half of the 1980s that he was allowed to visit his homeland again. In the 1990s Tomko went to Slovakia several times. In 1991, speaking before the Slovak National Council, he called for the revival of social life and emphasized that the weakest social groups should be protected during the systemic transformation. In March 1995 Tomko was awarded an honorary doctorate by Komenský University in Bratislava. (AGr)

and subsequently completed political economy studies in Leningrad (now St. Petersburg) in 1978 and pursued specialization studies in Great Britain and the Soviet Union. From 1979 to 1983 he was an assistant professor at the Economic Institute in Sofia and from 1984 to 1988 a lecturer at Sofia University, where he earned a Ph.D. and then the postdoctoral degree in 1988. In 1985–89 Tomov was an adviser to Prime Minister Georgi Atanasov. On 10 November 1989, as leader of the Movement for Democratic Socialism (Dvizhenie za Demokratischen Sotsializum [DEMOS]) within the Bulgarian Communist Party (BCP), Tomov was involved in the removal of Todor Zhivkov and his team from power. At the Fourteenth Congress of the BCP (30 January–2 February 1990), Tomov joined the leadership of the party. After the BCP was transformed into the Bulgarian Socialist Party (BSP), he was elected a member and coordinating secretary of the BSP Supreme Council and vice-chairman of the BSP Presidium. From 20 December 1990 to 8 November 1991 Tomov served as a deputy prime minister, representing the BSP in the coalition government of Dimitur Popov.

In 1992 Tomov was appointed head of the shadow cabinet of the BSP, but he gradually departed from the line of the new party leadership with Zhan Videnov at the helm. In 1993 in parliament Tomov founded the Citizens' Union for the Republic (Grazhdansko Obedinenie za Republikata), and in July 1993 he finally left the BSP and established the Democratic Alternative for the Republic (Demokraticzna Alternativa za Republikata), which did not pass the threshold of 4 percent of the vote in the elections to the National Assembly in December 1994. In October 1996 Tomov unsuccessfully ran in the presidential elections. In the following year he took the helm of the Bulgarian Euroleft (Bulgarska Evrolevitsa [BEL]), a new center-left party that won seats in parliament in the elections of April 1997 and then supported Ivan Kostov's government, joining the so-called pro-reform majority. In 1998 opposition to the government increased among BEL members; as a result, in the local elections of October 1999 the BEL formed a coalition with other opposition parties. Tomov was a deputy to the Grand National Assembly (1990–91) and to the National Assembly (1991–94 and 1997–2001), a member of the World Future Society, director of the East-West Institute in New York, and the founder and general director of the Center for Twenty-first Century Strategic Research. Tomov's publications include Sotsializum i samoupravlenie (Socialism and self-government; 1989); Firmenata organizatsiia i strategicheskite strukturni promeni v iekonomikata (Corporate organization and strategic structural problems in the economy; 1989); and Chetvurtata tsivilizatsiia (The fourth civilization; 1998). TÕNISSON Aleksander (17 April 1875, Härjanurme [Herjanorm], Livonia–30 June 1941, Tallinn), Estonian general. Tõnisson served in the tsarist army from 1896 onwards, initially as a volunteer. In 1899 he graduated from a military school in Vilnius. In 1904–5 he fought in the Russo-Japanese War. In 1909 he became a battalion commander in Riga. As a soldier of this battalion he fought in World War I. After the February 1917 revolution, Tõnisson formed the first Estonian military units. He subsequently commanded the First Estonian Regiment, which captured Riga, and fought in the region of Haapsalu and Muhumaa. Arrested after the Bolshevik revolution for refusing to comply with an order, Tõnisson was sentenced to death but managed to escape. He returned to Estonia, where he helped to establish the Estonian Army. On 17 December 1917 he became commander of an infantry brigade and deputy commander of the first Estonian division. On 25 March 1918 he was one of the first three officers promoted to major general. Unable to oppose the German invasion, Tõnisson made his way to Finland, but after the German capitulation, he returned to Estonia and assumed command of the Virumaa front. In late December 1918 and early January 1919 he succeeded in halting the offensive of the Bolshevik troops, which at a critical moment got as close as thirty kilometers from Tallinn. In November and December 1919, in the final stages of the war against the Bolsheviks, Tõnisson commanded the defense of Narva. He succeeded in keeping the town in Estonian hands, which influenced the course of ongoing negotiations in Tartu, which ended in a cease-fire in January 1920.

From July to October 1920 Tõnisson served as minister of war in the government of Jaan Tõnisson. In 1927–33 he served as president of the Central Union of Officers of the Republic. He also published extensively but was not involved in active politics. From May to October 1933 Tõnisson again served as minister of war in the government of Konstantin Päts and was a permanent member of the board of the Defense Ministry. After the coup staged by Päts in 1934, Tõnisson was forced to retire. Gradually, though, he came to accept the dictatorship. He served as president of the Tartu City Council from 1934 to 1939 and president of the Tallinn City Council from 1939 to 1940. In 1937 he became a member of the National Assembly. He also served as a member of the pro-government Fatherland League (Isamaaliit) and a member of the sixth parliament

(1938–40). After the Red Army occupied Estonia in June 1940, Tõnisson was arrested and then murdered in a prison in Tallinn. (AG)

TÕNISSON Jaan (22 December 1868, Viljandi–after 1940, USSR), Estonian lawyer and politician. Tõnisson came from a wealthy peasant family. After graduating in law, from 1896 he published a liberal national periodical, Postimees, in Dorpat (Tartu) for over thirty years. He also became the owner of the periodical. Tõnisson promoted national awareness among the Estonian peasants, which was opposed to German influence. He supported mass education and the principles of the cooperative movement. He stressed the necessity of forming an ethical foundation for Estonian independence. He was a friend of Tomáš Garrigue Masaryk. In 1898 Tõnisson became the leader of the Union of Farmers in Tartu, which propagated modern methods of farming in the country. He initiated annual agricultural exhibitions. From 1899 to 1905 he organized several national conferences on agricultural issues. In 1898 he contributed to the establishment of the first Estonian agricultural cooperative. During the revolution of 1905 Tõnisson created the Progressive Peasant Party and was a co-organizer of the National Assembly in Tartu on 27 November 1905. At that time he advocated a moderate plan for the autonomy of Estonia within the framework of the Russian empire, and he supported the tsarist program of reforms. Therefore he was not persecuted after the revolution and sat in subsequent State Dumas.

In 1906 Tõnisson organized the first Estonian gymnasium. In 1915 he founded the Baltic North Committee, which sought to establish cooperation between Estonia and the Scandinavian countries. In March 1917 he became leader of the Estonian autonomists, who brought about the creation of the Estonian National Council (Maapäev). Tõnisson was an advocate of a northern union with Lithuania, Latvia, and the Scandinavian countries. On 25 August 1917 he launched a campaign for the full independence of Estonia. As a delegate of the Maapäev, in London Tõnisson received the support of Great Britain, whose armed forces cooperated with the Estonian Army in the liberation of the country from the Germans and then in the defense against the Bolsheviks.

In independent Estonia Tõnisson headed the national-liberal Estonian Democratic Party (Eesti Demokraatlik Erakond) and then the Estonian People’s Party (Eesti Rahvaerakond [EPP]). He was an MP representing these parties in the Constituent Assembly and in subsequent parliaments. From 18 November 1919 to 28 July 1920 Tõnisson was prime minister. On 2 February 1920 he signed a peace treaty with Soviet Russia that recognized the full independence of Estonia. Tõnisson again became the head of government between 9 December 1927 and 13 November 1928. In 1930–32 he was minister of foreign affairs. On 18 May 1933 he became prime minister for the third time. Then Tõnisson implemented the devaluation of the Estonian kroon, which revived exports in the long run but provisionally intensified economic problems; these increased the popularity of the Fascist-like Estonian League of War of Independence Veterans (Eesti Vabadussõjalaste Liit [EVL]) and the protests of the Socialists. On 11 August 1933 Tõnisson's government introduced a state of emergency. The results of a referendum of 14–16 October 1933, in which the majority of society backed anti-democratic changes in the constitution, were the final blow for Tõnisson. Submitting his resignation, he lifted the state of emergency, but this failed to prevent the EVL from taking advantage of the democratic rules of the game. The majority of the press, mainly agrarians and Fascists, greeted the resignation of Tõnisson's government, as well as his rescinding of the state of emergency, with derision.

After the assumption of power by Konstantin Päts in 1934, Tõnisson, as a supporter of parliamentary democracy, found himself in the opposition. However, he welcomed the reinstatement of the state of emergency and the delegitimation of the EVL. The EPP disintegrated and then was dissolved by Päts. Tõnisson returned to Tartu. He was the chair of the department of sociology at the local university and of the Estonian-Swedish Society. On several occasions he protested the authoritarian rules; for example, he signed a memorial of the democratic opposition that was published in Finland in November 1936. In 1938 Tõnisson regained his seat in parliament and was one of seventeen opposition MPs in the eighty-member parliament. Along with three former prime ministers—Juhan Kukk, Ants Piip, and Jaan Teemant—Tõnisson protested the electoral abuse. After the Red Army entered Estonia in June 1940, Tõnisson proposed his candidacy in the “elections” to the People's Assembly from a list that was independent of the Communists but was annulled by the Russians. He was soon arrested by the NKVD and deported far inside Russia, and his further fate was unknown. (WR)

TOOME Indrek (19 September 1943, Tallinn), Estonian Communist activist. In 1968 Toome graduated in electronic engineering from the Technical University in Tallinn and joined the Communist Party of the Soviet Union (CPSU). From 1972 to 1978 he was first secretary of the Central Committee (CC) of the Estonian Komsomol, and from 1978 to 1984 he was first secretary of the Tallinn Committee of the Communist Party of Estonia (CPE). In 1972 he became a member of the Supreme Soviet of the Estonian SSR. From 1984 to 1987 he was deputy chairman of the Council of Ministers of the Estonian SSR. A typical apparatchik, Toome initially ignored the policy of perestroika and maneuvered between a dogmatic group led by Karl Vaino, then first secretary of the CC of the CPE, and his own Komsomol colleagues, led by Edgar Savisaar. Toome's appointment as CC secretary for ideology was a prelude to the dismissal of Vaino. This did not mean the introduction of more liberal policies toward the pro-independence opposition. When on 24 February 1988—the anniversary of the prewar Estonian independence day (until then proscribed)—the opposition organized a demonstration, Toome, feeling that the former ruling clique's time was coming to an end, demonstrated some flexibility by organizing an alternative rally.

On 1 April 1988 Toome announced the beginning of perestroika in the Estonian SSR and encouraged support for it. When Vaino Väljas came to power, Toome became one of the symbols of cooperation that the CPE established with the Popular Front in the summer of 1988. The Popular Front, whose leaders included Savisaar, called for sovereignty for the Estonian SSR within the Soviet Union. As part of the cooperation efforts, attempts were made to remove the former associates of Vaino from power and to thwart the anti-Communist opposition's efforts to restore the full independence of the state. After the Supreme Soviet of the Estonian SSR adopted a declaration of sovereignty of the republic within the Soviet Union on 16 November 1988, Toome resigned as secretary of the CC to become prime minister of the republic. Although still a supporter of a reorganized Soviet Union, he took steps to make his country economically independent from Moscow. He founded the Free Estonia (Vaba Eesti) bloc, but it obtained only 12 seats out of 105 in the elections to the Supreme Soviet of the republic. The new parliament was under pressure from the right-wing-dominated Congress, which strove for the restitution of Estonian independence and the restoration of the status quo in 1940. This led to a drop in popularity of a new treaty with the Soviet Union, under which Estonia was to remain part of the USSR. Toome, who supported this treaty, also became less popular. On 30 March 1990 he resigned. Under his leadership Free Estonia evolved toward economic liberalism, and Toome came into conflict with Savisaar, the new prime minister.

In the autumn of 1990 Toome became a supporter of the restitution of independence and even began to accuse Savisaar of attempts to transform Estonia—formally independent—into a satellite of the newly emerging Russia. In the spring of 1990, on behalf of the Supreme Soviet of the Estonian SSR, Toome conducted unsuccessful negotiations with the Soviet deputy prime minister. After Estonia regained its independence, Toome retired from politics to become a businessman. Since 1992 he has been the development director of a construction company, SRV Kinnisvara AS. Toome's name has appeared several times in the media in connection with corruption scandals involving representatives of central and local governments. In 1994 he was even detained on charges of corruption but was released for lack of evidence, and he resumed his work for the company. (AG)

TOPULLI Çerçiz (1880, Gjirokastër–17 July 1915, Fushë e Shtoit), Albanian pro-independence activist. Topulli began his patriotic activities in a secret association called Për Lirinë e Shqipërisë, which operated in Gjirokastër. In 1906 he assumed command of a military unit that operated in the south of the country, in the region of Korçë-Gjirokastër. He became famous after his unit assassinated the commander of the Turkish gendarmerie in Gjirokastër in March 1908. In January 1907 Topulli wrote the manifesto "Nga malet e Shqipërisë" (From the Albanian mountains), which was addressed to the Albanian nation and published in the periodical Shpresa e Shqipërisë. In this manifesto, he called for the separation of the Albanian territories from the Ottoman Empire and the establishment of an independent state through a national uprising. The Young Turk revolution of 1908 changed the character of his activities. Topulli became involved in the establishment of Albanian political clubs, as well as schools with Albanian as the language of instruction. After a declaration of independence was proclaimed on 28 November 1912, Topulli joined the government security units led by Ismail Kemali. After the outbreak of World War I, he moved to Shkodër. When Montenegrin troops seized Shkodër, Topulli was arrested on 15 July 1915. King Nicholas's order that Topulli be released failed to arrive in time. Along with a group of other Albanians, Topulli was sentenced by a military court to death as a rebel and then executed by a firing squad. In 1937 his mortal remains were buried in Gjirokastër. (TC)

TOSHEV Andrey (4 April 1867, Stara Zagora–10 October 1944, Sofia), Bulgarian politician and biologist. In 1885 Toshev graduated from high school in Edirne (Adrianople) and then worked as a teacher in Salonika, Stara Zagora, and Varna (1890–95). After completing studies in the natural sciences in Geneva and Brussels (1891), he taught at high schools in Salonika, Stara Zagora, and Varna and at the Military School in Sofia (1892–1903). In 1903–5 Toshev was Bulgaria's trade representative to Monastir (now Bitola, Macedonia), and then he served as diplomatic representative to Montenegro (1905–6), Greece (1906–8), Serbia (1908–13), Turkey (1913–14), Switzerland (1915–16), the Austro-Hungarian Empire (1917–18), and Austria (until 1920). Toshev was a member of the Bulgarian delegation during the signing of the peace treaty in Constantinople (now Istanbul) in 1913. From 21 April to 23 November 1935 Toshev served as Bulgarian prime minister, helping to consolidate the monarchical system in Bulgaria. He was also an accomplished scholar. In 1898 he became a corresponding member, and in 1900 a full member, of the Bulgarian Literary Society, which was later transformed into the Bulgarian Academy of Sciences. Toshev headed the Department of Natural Sciences and Medicine of the Bulgarian Literary Society from 1901 to 1903 and the Department of Natural Sciences and Mathematics of the Bulgarian Academy of Sciences from 1929 to 1930. Toshev's publications include Ranni spomeni 1873–1879 (Early memoirs 1873–1879; 1890); Balkanski vojni (The Balkan Wars, 2 vols.; 1929–31); Surbsko-bulgarskata razpra (The Bulgarian-Serbian dispute; 1932); Stranitsi iz minaloto na surbsko-bulgarskite otnosheniya (Pages from the past of Serbo-Bulgarian relations; 1941); and Bulgariya i neinite susiedi (Bulgaria and its neighbors; 1943). TOŠOVSKÝ Josef (28 September 1950, Náchod), Czech economist and politician. Upon graduating in foreign trade from the Prague School of Economics in 1973, Tošovský was employed in the State Bank of Czechoslovakia, where he worked his way up the ladder to become an adviser to the president of the bank. In 1977 he underwent further training in Great Britain, and in 1980, in France. From 1984 to 1985 he worked at the London branch of Živnostenská Banka, becoming deputy director of this branch in 1989. Tošovský was a member of the Communist Party of Czechoslovakia from 1976 to 1989. In December 1989 he was appointed president of the State Bank of Czechoslovakia, which under his leadership was transformed into an independent central bank. After the breakup of Czechoslovakia, he was appointed governor of the Czech National Bank on 20 January 1993, and he successfully carried out the separation of the Czech and Slovak korunas. Tošovský achieved considerable success in stabilizing the Czech currency, curbing inflation, and establishing the internal convertibility of the Czech koruna. For his achievements he has been honored with numerous awards, including the title of Central Banker of the Year 1993. During the economic slump in the Czech Republic (1996–97), Tošovský defended the stability of the Czech koruna and came into conflict with Prime Minister Václav Klaus on several occasions. After the collapse of Klaus's government and in the face of difficulties in forming a new ruling coalition, at the end of 1997 President Václav Havel entrusted Tošovský with the task of forming a cabinet that was to consist partly of civil servants and that was to rule the country until early elections in June 1998. From 2 January to 7 July 1998 Tošovský served as prime minister. Since he had no parliamentary base, his role was reduced to administering the state. After the end of his mission, Tošovský again became governor of the Czech National Bank on 22 July 1998, but on 30 November 2000 he resigned to become chairman of the Financial Stability Institute of the Bank for International Settlements in Basel. TÓTH Ilona (23 October 1932, Árpádföld–26 June 1957, Budapest), Hungarian doctor, victim of communism. In 1951 Tóth passed her secondary school final examinations at a school where she had served as secretary of the Working Youth Union. In the same year she entered medical school. In October 1956 she trained in internal medicine at the hospital on Szövetség Street in Budapest. On 23 October, along with her colleagues, Tóth took part in a demonstration, and two days later she was assigned to work at the hospital on Sándor Péterffy Street, where she joined the Voluntary Ambulance Service. On 1 November she became acting head of an auxiliary hospital unit. After the end of fighting, Tóth joined the political resistance movement, helping to draft and distribute leaflets and to print the illegal periodical Élünk. On 20 November she was arrested and accused of killing an unidentified man, probably a security agent. Tóth was tried along with two writers, Gyula Obersovszky and József Gáli. The show trial was intended to prove an alleged plot by two “counter-revolutionary” groups: writers and insurgents. On 8 April 1957 the court of first instance sentenced Tóth to death. On 20 June 1957 the Supreme Court upheld the sentence, accusing her in addition of being involved in anti-state opposition and a plot against “the government of the people.” As a result of international protests, Obersovszky's and Gáli's death sentences were commuted, but Tóth was executed. TRAJKOVSKI Boris (25 June 1956, Strumica, Macedonia–26 February 2004, near Stolac, Bosnia-Herzegovina), Macedonian politician. Trajkovski earned a law degree at Ss. Cyril and Methodius University in Skopje in 1980. Specializing in commercial and employment law, he was head of the legal department at the Slobodna construction company in Skopje until 1997. That year Trajkovski became mayor of the Kisela Voda municipality in Skopje. He was chairman of the Foreign Relations Commission of the Internal Macedonian Revolutionary Organization–Democratic Party for Macedonian National Unity (Vnatrešno-Makedonska Revolucionerna Organizacija–Demokratska Partija za Makedonsko Edinstvo [IMRO–DPMNU]). When the party won the parliamentary elections in fall 1998, Trajkovski became deputy minister of foreign affairs. As a moderate member of the nationalist IMRO–DPMNU, he ran for president of the republic in November 1999. He reached the second round behind a Social Democrat, Tito Petkovski, who tried to take advantage of anti-Albanian fears. In contrast, the nationalist Trajkovski stressed economic problems and proved victorious in the second round. Since his inauguration on 15 December 1999 Trajkovski has been active on the international level, trying to strengthen the position of Macedonia and to improve relations with neighboring countries. A Methodist in an overwhelmingly Eastern Orthodox land whose Albanian population is Muslim, Trajkovski was a voice of moderation, a fact evidenced during the Albanian insurgency of 2001, when he was able to counterbalance the saber rattling of the right-wing Ljubčo Georgievski government. In May 2001 Trajkovski issued a settlement plan including a partial amnesty for the Albanian guerrillas, extensive linguistic rights, educational reform, and the inclusion of greater numbers of Albanians in state institutions. The plan led to the Ohrid Agreement, signed in August 2001, and it eased the ethnic tensions in Macedonia. Trajkovski perished in an airplane crash. (DP)

TRAMPCZYŃSKI Wojciech (8 February 1860, Dębłowo, near Gniezno—2 September 1953, Poznań), Polish politician. After graduating from high school, Trąpczyński studied law at the University of Breslau (Wrocław) and was an activist in the Slavic Literary Society. In 1886, after receiving a degree, he settled in Posen (Poznań), where he ran a law and notary practice. Trąpczyński was the defense counsel in the political trials of Polish pro-independence activists in the German courts. From 1901 to 1902 he was a member of the Poznań City Council, chairman of its Polish Circle (Koło Polskie), and president of the Law Committee. From 1905 to 1912 he was the director of Bazar, a company that rendered great services to the Polish cause. From 1910 to 1918 he was an MP in the Prussian parliament, and from 1913 to 1919 he chaired the Polish Circle there. In 1912 Trąpczyński was elected to the Reichstag. An outstanding speaker, he became famous for his criticism of the anti-Polish policy of the German authorities in the Prussian partition of Poland. He protested the land expropriations and the abolition of Polish as the language of instruction in the schools. During World War I Trąpczyński criticized the economic war policy of the Reich. From 1912 on he worked with the National Democratic Party (Narodowa Demokracja [ND]). During World War I he was a member of the secret Interparty Civic Committee and later a member of the underground and pro-coalition Central Civic Committee in Posen.

In November 1918 Trąpczyński took part in negotiations on the establishment of a central government in Warsaw and in negotiations with the Prussian government in Berlin. He became a member of the Supreme People's

Council (Naczelna Rada Ludowa), on behalf of which he served as chief president of the province and regency of Poznań from 4 January 1919 until the time when Greater Poland (Wielkopolska) was incorporated into the Republic of Poland. In January 1919 Trąpczyński was elected to the Legislative Assembly on the ND ticket. After the Assembly was constituted in February of that year, he became its speaker. He organized the Assembly Chancellery, the Speaker's Guard, and the Speaker's Court. In the summer of 1920, during the Bolshevik offensive, Trąpczyński became a member of the State Defense Council. He also chaired the Central Plebiscite Committee, the Committee for Aid to Repatriates, and the Committee for Aid to Soldiers in Poland. In the November 1922 elections he was elected senator on the ND ticket. In December 1922 he became speaker of the senate and organized its work. Re-elected to the Assembly in 1928 and 1930, Trąpczyński was a member of the presidium of the parliamentary National Caucus and a member of the Political Committee of the National Party (Stronnictwo Narodowe [SN]) and of the Great Poland Camp (Obóz Wielkiej Polski [OWP]). A critic of the sanacja government system, Trąpczyński gave extensive testimony in defense of the MPs tried in the Brześć trial. In the late 1930s he drifted to the opposition groups of the so-called Morges Front. After the German invasion of Poland, the Nazi authorities forced Trąpczyński to move from Poznań to Warsaw in 1940. After the Warsaw Uprising of 1944, he settled in Milanówek. In the spring of 1945 he returned to Poznań. Before the January 1947 elections, Trąpczyński attempted to establish a Catholic party in Poznań, but the Communist authorities thwarted his efforts. TRAYKOV Georgi (2 April 1898, Vurbeni [Ksino Nero, now in Greece]—14 January 1975, Sofia), Bulgarian Peasant Party activist. Traykov's family had fought for the liberation of Bulgarians in Aegean Macedonia and then settled in Varna. In 1919 Traykov became a member of the Bulgarian Agrarian National Union (BANU). He co-founded the Bulgarian Agrarian Youth Union (BAYU) in 1922 and organized a peasant armed struggle in the Varna district after the overthrow of Aleksandur Stamboliyski's government in June 1923. Arrested after the failure of the 1923 Communist uprising but released under an amnesty in 1924, Traykov became secretary of the central leadership of the BAYU and editor of the newspaper Mladezhko zname, a BAYU press organ. An active leader of the BANU in the Varna district, Traykov sought rapprochement between the BANU and the Bulgarian Communist Party (BCP) after the coup of May 1934. In 1943 he became a member, and later the chairman, of the underground District Committee of the Fatherland Front (FF) in Varna.

After the coup of 9 September 1944, Traykov helped to establish the Communist-dominated FF government in Varna. In May 1945 he became chairman of its Executive Council. He also served as secretary (1945–48) and chairman (1972–75) of the FF National Council. After the Communists broke down the BANU; arrested its independent leaders; and sentenced its chairman, Nikola Petkov, to death and then executed him, Traykov was elected BANU secretary at the Twenty-seventh BANU Congress in December 1947 and chairman of the BANU Supreme Committee in 1974. In October 1948 the BANU Supreme Council under his leadership accepted the leading role of the BCP. In return for his total submissiveness to the Communists, Traykov was appointed to top governmental positions. He served as minister of agriculture and state property (November 1946–December 1947), deputy prime minister (December 1947–April 1956), minister of agriculture and forestry (December 1947–December 1948), minister of agriculture (December 1948–January 1950), first deputy prime minister (until April 1964), and chairman of the Council for Agricultural Affairs (November 1962–March 1966). Traykov accepted the total collectivization of agriculture and the brutal suppression of peasants who resisted collectivization. From 1971 to 1974 he served as first vice-president of the Council of State. He served as deputy to the National Assembly (1945–46, 1950–75) and the Grand National Assembly (1946–49). From 1971 to 1972 he served as chairman of the Sixth National Assembly. Traykov's publications include Izbrani proizvedeniya 1944–1973 (Selected works 1944–1973; 1980) and Izbrani suchineniya (Selected works, 2 vols.; 1985). (JJ)

cia), Czech monk and missionary, martyr of the Catholic Church. In 1903 Trčka entered the Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer (Redemptorists) in Červenka, and after one year he took his first monastic vows. After graduating from a seminary in Obořiště, he took holy orders in 1910. He worked in Bohemia and Moravia. In 1919 he joined the Redemptorists of the Eastern rite and began his missionary work among the Uniate faithful in Lwów (Lviv), and in 1920 he moved to Stanisławów (now Ivano-Frankivsk, Ukraine). At the end of 1921 Trčka began working in eastern Slovakia. He served as the superior of the monastery in Stropkov and then in Michalovce. From March 1945 on he headed the newly established Uniate Redemptorist Vice-Province. After the Uniate Church in Czechoslovakia was formally abolished, Trčka continued his work in union with the Holy See. In 1950 he was interned in Podolinec. Two years later he was accused of collaboration with Bishop Pavel Gajdič and spying for the Vatican, and he was then sentenced to twelve years' imprisonment. Trčka died in prison of pneumonia. In 1990 he was formally rehabilitated. On 4 November 2001 he was beatified by Pope John Paul II. (MG)

TRENČEV Konstantin (8 February 1955, Stara Zagora), Bulgarian trade union activist. In 1970 Trenchev graduated from high school in Algeria, where he lived with his parents. After returning to Bulgaria, he graduated in medicine and began working in the emergency ambulance service in Stara Zagora. In February 1989 he founded the Podkrepa Labor Confederation, the first independent trade union in Bulgaria. This trade union, consisting of only two hundred members in 1989, grew to five hundred thousand members two years later. Trenchev was initially imprisoned for his trade union activities but was released on the day before the overthrow of Todor Zhivkov's regime in November 1989. In 1990 Podkrepa did not join the Union of Democratic Forces (UDF), maintaining the status of an observer, because, according to Trenchev, Podkrepa did not seek power. Trenchev was critical of the Round Table agreements (January–March 1990 and similar to the Polish one), which, he believed, left too much power to the Communists. The radical activities of Podkrepa and its leader intensified after the June 1990 parliamentary elections. Among other things, Trenchev stirred up riots that ended up in the vandalization of the Sofia headquarters of the post-Communist Bulgarian Socialist Party (BSP). When the government of Andrey Lukanov launched market reforms, Trenchev organized street protests, hurling vulgar insults at the prime minister and calling for the deportation of BSP members to Siberia.

At the end of 1990 Trenchev supported the UDF's efforts to take over power from the BSP, and by organizing a general strike in which almost one million people took part, he was instrumental in forcing the resignation of Lukanov. At that time, the press published information on Trenchev's cooperation with the security services during Zhivkov's dictatorship. In January 1991 Trenchev signed an agreement with Dimitur Popov's government; in it Trenchev promised to stop strike actions during the first months of "shock therapy," but he failed to keep his promise. Trenchev's role as a constant protester has won him the position of indisputable leader of Podkrepa, which still has over two hundred thousand members. He has combined his trade union activities with an ostentatious devotion to the Orthodox Church and an active engagement in conflicts within the Orthodox Church after the 1992 split. Trenchev has always been seen as a supporter of the restoration of the monarchy, and as early as 1993 he sought to invite Simeon II to Bulgaria. (AG)

TREPPER Leopold (23 February 1904, Nowy Targ–19 January 1982, Jerusalem), head of Die Rote Kapelle, the Soviet intelligence network in Germany. The son of a Jewish shopkeeper from Galicia, after World War I Trepper joined Hashomer Hatzair, a Zionist revolutionary organization. Wanted by the police for his participation in the Kraków events of 1923, he left for Palestine. In 1925 he joined the Communist Party. Expelled by the British, in 1929 Trepper landed in France, where he worked for the Communist press. In 1932 he arrived in the USSR, where, at the Julian Marchlewski University in Moscow, he completed studies that he had begun at the Jagiellonian University in Kraków. Then he graduated from a special school of the Soviet intelligence service. In March 1939 Trepper installed himself as head of the GRU in Brussels. In one year, he became the USSR's most important source of intelligence information in Western Europe. After the German invasion of the USSR in June 1941, Trepper already headed seven intelligence networks in the countries occupied by the Third Reich. He transmitted around 1,500 radio messages during the war. In December 1942 Trepper was arrested by the Gestapo. Trepper knew that the GRU had a second intelligence network, so to save his life, he testified extensively on Die Rote Kapelle. Treated considerably well and used as a decoy, Trepper escaped in July 1943 and remained in hiding until the liberation of France, maintaining contact with Moscow. In May 1945 he was called to Moscow, arrested, and sentenced to nine years of labor camp. After his release in 1954 Trepper managed to leave for the Polish People's Republic. He settled in Warsaw, becoming head of the Cultural Society of Jews in Poland. During the Communist anti-Semitic campaign in 1967 Trepper's family managed to leave for Israel, while he was not allowed to go on the grounds of raison d'état. In the West, mass protests against this stance of the Polish People's Republic were organized; therefore in November 1973 the Edward Gierek administration finally allowed him to leave. In Israel, Trepper wrote his memoirs, The Great Game (1977). (WR)

TRIFUNOVIĆ Miloš (Miša) (30 October 1871, Užice, Serbia–19 February 1957, Belgrade), Serbian politician. Trifunović graduated from high school in his native Užice. In 1894 he completed philosophical studies in Belgrade and then worked as a teacher at a high school in Užice. In 1903 he was elected to parliament, in which he sat for many years, serving as its secretary for several periods. A member and one of the leaders of the Serbian Radical Party, Trifunović later became first deputy to the party leader, Aca Stanojević. He contributed to the newspapers Samouprava and Odjek and to the periodicals Srpski književni glasnik and Novi život. For many years Trifunović was a member of the cabinet, serving as minister of education and religious affairs (June 1917–November 1918), minister of education (February–May 1920, December 1922–May 1923, April 1926–February 1927, March 1941–June 1943), minister of public works (March–July 1924), and minister for religious affairs (November 1924–April 1926). During World War II, when Germany occupied Belgrade in April 1941, King Peter II and the government initially took refuge in Jerusalem, and from there moved to London. In October 1941 Trifunović went to North America as a member of a Yugoslav delegation that sought American and Canadian support for the independence and territorial integrity of Yugoslavia. On 6 June 1943 he became prime minister and minister of interior of the Yugoslav government-in-exile. In the face of Italy's capitulation, in July 1943 Trifunović's government approached Great Britain, the Soviet Union, and the United States with a proposal to establish an army of about one hundred thousand. This army was to consist of Yugoslav citizens, as well as Yugoslav prisoners of war in Italy.

However, this plan was rejected by the Great Powers. On 10 August 1943 Trifunović's government was dismissed. After the war, Trifunović returned to Yugoslavia but did not play any political role. (AO)

TRIPALO Mika (16 November 1926, Sinj, Croatia), Croatian Communist activist. At the age of fifteen Tripalo joined the Partisans led by Josip Broz Tito, and in 1943 he became a member of the Communist Party of Yugoslavia. During World War II he was active in Communist youth organizations. He served as secretary of the League of Yugoslav Communist Youth (Savez Komunističke Omladine Jugoslavije [SKOJ]) in Kotor and Knin. After 1945 Tripalo graduated from high school in Sinj and subsequently completed law studies in Belgrade. In 1950 he graduated from the Djuro Djaković Political School. From 1947 to 1953 he served as secretary and chairman of the Croatian organization of People's Youth (Narodna Omladina). From 1953 to 1955 he was chairman of the Central Committee (CC) of the League of Yugoslav Students (Savez Studenata Jugoslavije). From 1955 to 1962 he was secretary of the CC of the federal organization of People's Youth. In 1962 Tripalo was promoted to secretary of a district party committee in Zagreb. He became a member of the CC of the League of Communists of Yugoslavia (LCY) in 1958, a member of the LCY CC Executive Committee in 1963, and secretary of the LCY CC Executive Committee in 1966. At the Ninth Congress of the LCY in 1969 he was elected to the Presidium of the LCY CC.

Tripalo was in favor of greater ideological openness. From the late 1960s, he supported Croatian efforts to increase the cultural autonomy of the Yugoslav republics and nations. An advocate of greater independence for Croatia, he worked with Savka Dapčević-Kučar, the leader of the Croatian party. As a result of their efforts, at the Tenth Plenum of the CC of the Communist Party of Croatia (CPC) in January 1970, conservatives and supporters of centralism were expelled from the leadership of the party. The dogmatists counterattacked, exaggerating the threat of the growing nationalist mood in Croatia. The "Croatian Spring" was halted at the Seventeenth Session of the Presidium of the LCY CC, which was held on Brioni Island at the end of April 1971. In mid-May several supporters of liberalization were expelled from the CC of the CPC. Tito himself came to Croatia to support the conservatives. This led to even stronger opposition from the most radical Croatian activists, who called for "state sovereignty" for the republic. On 22 November 1971 students went on strike in Zagreb. At a meeting of the Croatian party leaders with Tito in Karadjordjevo on 30 November, Tripalo defended the views of the leadership of the CPC. He emphasized, among other things, that Croatia did not have equal access to loans from the International Monetary Fund or from the Soviet Union. On the following day, at the Twenty-first Session of the Presidium of the LCY CC, Tito admitted that the economic claims of the Croatian leadership were justified, but he stressed that it was a "class" rather than a "national" issue and that a loosening of the unity of the party and the state must be prevented. Under pressure from the central leadership of the LCY, on 8 December Tripalo resigned all his positions, and the following day Dapčević-Kučar did the same. They were accused of national factional work. As a result of a purge that was launched in late 1971 and early 1972, 740 people were expelled from the party, and around 400 people resigned their party positions. For many years Tripalo was sidelined in public life. After 1991, he joined the leadership of the Croatian People's Party (Hrvatska Narodna Stranka). Tripalo's publications include Hrvatsko proljeće (Croatian Spring; 1989). (WR) TROCHTA Štěpán (26 March 1905, Francova Lhota, Vsetín district, Moravia–6 April 1974, Litoměřice), Czech cardinal. Born into a family of smallholders, Trochta's father died in Trochta's childhood. Trochta studied in a seminary run by the Salesians in Turin, where he took holy orders in June 1932. After returning to Czechoslovakia, he briefly worked in a Salesian parish in Moravia and then in a Salesian institute in Prague. In the 1930s Trochta established Salesian institutions to care for youth, as well as workshops and sports clubs in the poorest districts of Prague. He was also a member of the leadership of Junák, a Catholic scouting organization. From the beginning of the Nazi occupation, Trochta maintained contacts with the Czech resistance movement. His patriotic sermons, preached in Holy Cross Church in Prague, enjoyed great popularity. Arrested in 1940, Trochta was released after some time. In May 1942, following the assassination of Reinhard Heydrich, the governor of the Protectorate of Bohemia and Moravia, Trochta was arrested again and sent to the concentration camp in Terezín and then to Mauthausen, where, among other things, he worked in a quarry. He was finally imprisoned in Dachau, where he remained until the end of the war.

After returning to Czechoslovakia in 1945, Trochta resumed his pastoral work in a Salesian parish in Prague. On 27 September 1947 he was appointed bishop in Litoměřice, where the Communist authorities had forced the resignation of Bishop Alois Weber, an anti-Fascist but a German. Trochta was consecrated bishop on 16 November 1947 in Prague. In assuming his position, he emphasized that he was going to minister to all Catholics, regardless of their nationality. He also rejected the notion of the collective responsibility of the German people. Trochta defended the independence of the Church; for example, he prevented the so-called patriot priests, loyal to the Communist government, from taking control of the theological seminary. From June 1949 onwards Trochta was interned in his own residence, and the government of the diocese was handed over to a vicar capitular who was dependent on the Communist authorities. On 10 January 1953 Trochta was arrested. After a brutal interrogation, he was sentenced to twenty-five years in prison in a show trial in 1954.

Released under an amnesty in 1960, Trochta was banned from exercising his pastoral ministry. He began working as a bricklayer. As a result of hard physical work, he had a heart attack in 1962. From then on he lived in Church-run charity houses, including one in Radvanov, where he met Archbishop Josef Beran in 1965. Rehabilitated during the Prague Spring, Trochta again became the bishop of Litoměřice on 1 September 1968. On 5 March 1973 Pope Paul VI appointed him cardinal. At the time of increasing persecution of the Church, during the so-called normalization, Trochta attempted to defend the freedom of the Church. He was one of the key figures in the underground church in Bohemia. He secretly ordained many underground priests, who did their pastoral work without the permission of the Communist authorities. Seriously ill after an eye operation, Trochta died a few hours after an interrogation in the office for religious affairs. His funeral liturgy was celebrated by Cardinal Karol Wojtyła, the metropolitan of Kraków, but the authorities banned him from delivering a funeral speech. (AGr)

in Zagreb, Vienna, and Graz, earning a doctorate in 1890. He subsequently worked as a lawyer in Split. He was elected to the Dalmatian Diet in 1895 and to the Austrian parliament (Reichsrat) in Vienna in 1897. Elected mayor of Split in 1905, Trumbić played a great role in drafting the Rijeka Resolution, adopted by Croatian politicians on 3 October 1905; in it they protested Austrian domination and supported the Hungarians, who sought full independence. The adoption of this resolution was supported by the Serbs and led to the establishment of the Croatian-Serbian Coalition, which was successful in the elections of May 1906. Trumbić strove for the unification of the South Slavic nations outside Austria-Hungary. From 1914 to 1918 he was in exile. He unsuccessfully attempted to dissuade the Entente states from making territorial concessions to Italy at the expense of the South Slavic nations; these concessions were sealed in the secret Treaty of London in 1915. From 1915 to 1918 Trumbić served as president of the Yugoslav Committee, whose position in the international arena was undermined by the fact that the Serbian government refused to recognize it as a legitimate representation of Slovenes, Croats, and Serbs. After the National Council of Slovenes, Croats, and Serbs was constituted in October 1918, Trumbić was appointed its official plenipotentiary.

While negotiating with the Serbian government of Nikola Pašić, Trumbić failed to break the resistance against a federal model for a future state, under which all the nationalities would be afforded equal rights. Trumbić was one of the signatories of the Declaration of Corfu (20 July 1917), which called for the creation of a common kingdom of Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes under the rule of the Karadjordjević dynasty. He also conducted negotiations with the Italian deputy, Andrea Torre, on the revision of the 1915 Treaty of London, leading to the signing of an agreement on 7 March 1918. This was an important step toward overcoming Italy's reluctance to the establishment of a Yugoslav state. In April 1918 in Rome Trumbić headed the Yugoslav delegation to a congress of all nationalities of Austria-Hungary except the Germans and Hungarians. In October 1918 he negotiated the establishment of a state with Prime Minister Pašić and Anton Korošec, the representative of the National Council in Zagreb. These negotiations resulted in the Geneva Declaration of 9 November 1918. In December 1918, after the creation of the Kingdom of Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes under the rule of the Karadjordjević dynasty, Trumbić became minister of foreign affairs in its first government and held this post until November 1920. He was one of the delegates to the Paris Peace Conference, where he showed great diplomatic skills. Trumbić had the final word in border negotiations with the Italians, although he was not fully content with the Treaty of Rapallo between Italy and the Kingdom of Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes (12 November 1920).

In domestic policy, Trumbić opposed plans to establish a centralist state and proposed a federal model. His relations with Stjepan Radić were not good. When Radić began to work with Pašić, Trumbić established a competition group, the Croatian Federal Peasant Party, in 1926, but it failed to gain much influence. After the tragic death of Radić in 1928, Trumbić began to work with the Croatian Peasant Party (CPP), which he joined formally in 1931. He firmly opposed the dictatorship of King Alexander I. Trumbić supported the adoption of the so-called Zagreb Manifesto, passed by the Croatian opposition in November 1932, in which absolutism, centralism, and unitarism were condemned. After CPC chairman Vladko Maček was sentenced to three years' imprisonment, Trumbić became an interim leader of the party. Until the end of his life Trumbić was in opposition to the authorities in Belgrade. His memoirs, Iz mojih političkih uspomena (From my political memoirs), were published in 1936. (AO)

TRUSAU Aleh (7 August 1954, Mstsislau, Belorussian SSR), Belorussian historian and politician. In 1976 Trusau graduated from the Department of History of the Belorussian State University. In 1981 he earned a doctorate in history. From 1976 to 1991 he worked at the Belorussian Architectural Preservation and Restoration Institute. He studied Belorussian architecture of the eleventh through seventeenth centuries and organized its restoration. From 1990 to 1995 Trusau was a deputy to the Belorussian Supreme Soviet. He served as deputy chairman of the Commission for Education, Culture, and Preservation of the Historical Heritage. Since 1989 he has been linked with the democratic opposition. Trusau was one of the top leaders of the Rebirth Belorussian Popular Front. A co-founder of the Belorussian Social Democratic Hromada, Trusau served as its chairman from 1992 to 1995. In 1999 he became chairman of the Belorussian Language Society. Trusau works at the Belorussian University of Culture. (EM)

TSANKOV Aleksandur (29 June 1879, Oryakhovo–17 July 1959, Buenos Aires, Argentina), Bulgarian politician. After graduating from high school in Ruse in 1900, Tsankov studied law at the University of Sofia and then law and economics in Munich, Breslau (Wrocław), and Berlin. He started his political career in the Social Democratic Party but left it in 1907. After graduation, he returned to Bulgaria. He worked in a bank and from 1911 at the University of Sofia. From 1916 Tsankov was an associate professor, then a full professor, and in 1919–20, rector. In 1916 he published Voynata na narodite (War of nations). After the war he was in opposition to the Aleksandur Stamboliyski dictatorship. In 1922 Tsankov co-founded and became leader of the secret National Alliance (Naroden Sgowor). Along with the secret Military League of Damyán Velchev and with the support of part of the army, on 9 June 1923 Tsankov overthrew the Stamboliyski regime and took the lead of a new government based on the Democratic Alliance which included the National Alliance and radical, democratic and populist parties formerly in opposition to the Stamboliyski regime. In September 1923 he baffled an attempted Communist coup, outlawed the Communist Party of Bulgaria, and stabilized the political situation by a brutal repression of the supporters of the Populist and Communist dictatorships. For this reason the extreme left called him a "bloody professor." On 4 June 1926 Tsankov resigned in favor of Andrey Lyapchev, and he assumed the position of speaker of the National Assembly.

In May 1930 Tsankov became minister of education, but, increasingly disappointed with democracy, he broke with the Democratic Alliance, and in 1932 he created the National Social Movement (Narodno Sotsyalno Dvizhenye [NSM]), whose program was modeled on Italian fascism. In 1931 Tsankov published the textbook Politicheska ikonomia (Political economy). Thanks to a split in the military faction Zveno and in the Military League, the NSM began to gain followers, and Tsankov planned to introduce authoritarian power. In reaction to these plans, on 19 May 1934 the Zveno leaders toppled the democratic government of Nikola Mushanov and assumed dictatorial power themselves. The foreign policy of the new government of Kimón Georgiev, as well as Georgiev's republican rhetoric, caused Tsar Boris III to remove this government in January 1935. Although Tsankov had followers among the tsar's supporters, Boris was reluctant to build on new rightist movements, and he preferred a bureaucracy and a part of the army as the foundation for his royal dictatorship. Tsankov was even temporarily interned. During World War II he was in moderate opposition to the tsarist rule, but he declared support for the pro-German policies. In 1942 Tsankov published Trite stopanski sistemi (Three economic systems), in which he analyzed capitalism, communism, and the Nazi economy, rating the last the highest. When on 9 September 1944 the pro-German government collapsed as a result of a left-ist coup, Tsankov left for Vienna, where under German shelter he founded a Bulgarian government-in-exile. After the fall of the Third Reich, Tsankov stayed in Austria. A Communist court sentenced him to death in absentia, and in 1949 the occupation authorities forced him to emigrate to Argentina, where he died. In 1998 Tsankov's Bylgariya v burno vreme: Spomeni (Bulgaria in stormy times: Memoirs) was published in Bulgaria. (WR)

TSANKOV Georgi [originally Veselinov] (26 March 1913, Kytina, near Sofia–21 November 1990, Sofia), Bulgarian Communist activist. After joining the Bulgarian Communist Party (BCP) in 1932, Tsankov was active in the trade union movement until 1938 and then in the district committee and the municipal committee of the BCP in Sofia. After the coup of 9 September 1944 he became secretary of the BCP Municipal Committee in Sofia and a member of the National Council of the Fatherland Front. Then until 1948 he was secretary general of the Central Committee (CC) of the General Trade Union of Workers in Bulgaria. Thanks to the support of Vulko Chervenkov, who surrounded himself with national activists who were younger but totally obedient to Stalinist orthodoxy, in 1948 Tsankov became a member of the CC and then BCP CC secretary for organizational affairs. From January 1951 to March 1962 he served as minister of interior. In 1954 Tsankov joined the Politburo, becoming one of the most powerful men in Bulgaria. He was in charge of the entire persecution apparatus. He was responsible for political terror, forceful suppression of the resistance to collectivization, concentration camps, and the system of mass surveillance of citizens. In July 1956, along with Anton Yugov and other senior officials of the interior and military ministries, Tsankov was in Moscow, where they met with Anastas Mikoyan and Mikhail Suslov to discuss ways of preventing the system's erosion from the "thaw." After Tsankov's subsequent visit to the Kremlin at the end of 1959, a system of "teams," modeled on those of the Soviet Union, was introduced in Bulgaria. These "teams"—that is, voluntary workers' brigades—fought against trivial offenses and also controlled factory workforces.

From 1946 Tsankov was a deputy to the parliament, and from 1947 to 1949, a member of the Presidium of the Grand National Assembly. On 17 March 1962 he was appointed deputy prime minister; the appointment in fact only seemed to be a promotion because Tsankov simultaneously lost his influence in the security apparatus. In this way, Todor Zhivkov undermined the independence of this apparatus, since the new minister, General Diko Dikov, came from the army. After consultations in Moscow, in a speech at the Eighth Congress of the BCP on 5 November 1962, Zhivkov demanded that Tsankov be dismissed from all his posts and from the CC. On 20 November 1962 Tsankov ceased to be deputy prime minister. In this move Yugov and former party leader Chervenkov were expelled as well, under the guise of eliminating the remnants of the "personality cult"; however, the move in fact greatly consolidated Zhivkov's control over the entire government apparatus in Bulgaria. In 1964 Tsankov was dismissed from his parliamentary post, and after that he sank into obscurity. He was never brought to justice for his activities. (JJ/WR)

TSELEVYCH Volodymir (21 April 1891, Lemberg [Lviv, Lwów]–1944, Saratov), Ukrainian politician and lawyer. Tselevych graduated from high school and then from the Department of Law of the University of Lviv, where he later he worked as a judge and journalist. In 1918–21 he was secretary of the Ukrainian Citizens' Committee (Horožańskij Komitet), representing the interests of the Ukrainian population after the army of the Western Ukrainian National Republic was dislodged by the Polish Army. In July 1925 Tselevych was co-founder and from 1928 secretary general of the Ukrainian National Democratic Union (Ukraińsko Nacionalno-Demokratyczno Objednanije [UNDO]). During the May coup of 1926 he was dismissed as judge and temporarily arrested. In 1928–30 Tselevych was an MP on behalf of the UNDO and deputy chairman of the Ukrainian parliamentary club. In 1930 he was arrested again and put in the Brest Fortress prison. His case was separated from those of the Polish MPs and then discontinued. In 1932–35 Tselevych was editor of the Lviv weekly Svoboda, and from 1932 to 1937 he was the UNDO secretary general. In 1935 he was the co-author of an agreement between the UNDO and the Polish government. As a result, in 1935–39 he was an MP again. After the Red Army entered eastern Poland in September 1939, Tselevych was arrested by the NKVD and imprisoned in Brest, Moscow, and Saratov, where he died. (WR)

TSVIKEVICH Aleksandr (1888, Brest-Litovsk–30 December 1937, Minsk), Belorussian philosopher, historian, and politician. In 1912 Tsvikevich graduated from the University of St. Petersburg. In 1917 in Moscow he founded the Belorussian People's Hromada, a party that rallied refugees from Belorussia. Opposed to an agreement with the Poles, Tsvikevich actively participated in the creation of the Belorussian People's Republic (BPR). After its proclamation at the beginning of 1918, he was a delegate of the BPR to the peace negotiations in Brest-Litovsk, and then he was minister of foreign affairs in the BPR government. Then Tsvikevich went into exile in Czechoslovakia, where from 1923 he served as prime minister of the BPR. At a conference of Belorussian émigré circles in Berlin in the fall of 1925, Tsvikevich advocated the recognition of the Belorussian SSR government as the only representation of the Belorussian nation. Tsvikevich resigned his post and returned to Minsk at the end of 1925. At first he worked in the People's Commissariat of Finance of the Belorussian SSR, and then he served as secretary at the Institute of Belorussian Culture. From 1929 he was a professor of history at the Belorussian SSR Academy of Sciences. Tsvikevich mainly did research on the history of political thought in Belorussia and on Belorussian national consciousness. In November 1930, along with a few hundred other intellectuals, Tsvikevich was accused of being a member of the Belorussian Liberation Union, an anti-Soviet conspiratorial organization that actually did not exist. Convicted and deported to Siberia, he was executed by firing squad. Tsvikevich was the author of several scholarly works, which are still topical today—for example, Belarus: Palitychny narys (Belarus: A political outline; 1919); Adradzhennie na Belarusi i Polshcha (Revival of Belarus and Poland; 1921); and Zapadno-russizm (Western Russophilia; 1929). TÜBELIS Juozas (18 April 1882, Ilgalaukiai, Rokiškis County–30 September 1939, Kaunas), Lithuanian agronomist, social activist, and politician. In his youth Tübelis was aligned with the radical movement. In 1908 he graduated from the Technical University of Riga. While a student, he took part in the work of Lithuanian nationalist organizations, serving as publisher and editor-in-chief of Lietuvos Ukininkas, Viltis, and Rygos Garsas. After graduating, Tübelis worked as a teacher and journalist. Inducted into the tsarist army in 1915, he was assigned to work in the War Commissariat. As a result of his efforts, the Lithuanian Relief Committee received 100,000 rubles, which made it possible to offer substantial aid to war refugees. Tübelis's frequent official visits to Russia enabled him to contact and financially support Lithuanian colonies scattered throughout Russian territory. He also worked in commissions that prepared Lithuanian textbooks.

In the first government of independent Lithuania, established on 11 November 1918, Tübelis assumed the portfolio of minister of agriculture. In subsequent cabinets he served as minister of education (1919) and again minister of agriculture (1919–20). After the end of the armed struggle for Lithuania's independence, Tübelis retired from active politics and became involved in business, where he was very successful, co-founding trade and production companies, mainly in the field of agricultural processing (Maistas, Pienocentras, and Lietukis), as well as the Lithuanian Regional Electric Power Station Company. These enterprises were important for the economy of the newly established state. One of the major entrepreneurs in Lithuania, Tübelis was a member of the Chamber of Agriculture and the Chamber of Commerce and Industry. After Antanas Smetona came to power in 1926, Tübelis returned to active politics. He owed his meteoric career and rise to top governmental positions not only to his excellent professional qualifications, but also to the fact that he was Smetona's brother-in-law. In 1927 Tübelis assumed the portfolio of minister of finance. After Augustinas Volde-maras was dismissed as prime minister, Tübelis became head of the government on 23 September 1929. In 1931 he became head of the Union of Lithuanian Nationalists (Tautininkų Sąjunga), becoming the second most important politician in Lithuania after Smetona. In 1935, as a result of a peasant strike, Tübelis changed the composition of the cabinet. He continued as prime minister until 28 March 1938 and simultaneously almost uninterruptedly served as minister of finance. In 1929 he also briefly held the ministry of foreign affairs, and in 1938 he additionally served as minister of agriculture. Tübelis proved to be an efficient administrator and deserves credit for relatively quickly pulling Lithuania out of the economic crisis of the 1930s and putting the economy on a steady growth track. He founded his policy on a strong currency, sharp financial discipline, and limitations on foreign debt and imports. However, the state coordinated activities supporting exports, particularly those of agricultural produce. Under Tūbelis's government the cooperative movement also developed. The litas was one of the most stable European currencies, and Lithuania successfully developed until the end of the 1930s. The crisis of March 1938, linked to the Polish-imposed establishment of diplomatic relations, led to the collapse of his cabinet, and Tūbelis became head of the Central Bank. (AG)

TUDJMAN Franjo (14 May 1922, Veliko Trogovišće–10 December 1999, Zagreb), president of Croatia. Tudjman was born in a village in the Croatian Zagorje. His father, Stjepan, was a well-known political activist during the interwar period and a member of the leadership of the Croatian Peasant Party (Hrvatska Seljačka Stranka). Tudjman graduated from high school in Zagreb. In 1941 he deserted from the Croatian Army and joined the anti-Fascist guerrillas of Josip Broz Tito. He served in the Radić Brothers Brigade and later on the staff of the Tenth Partisan Corps, which operated in the southwest regions of Croatia. After the war Tudjman continued his career in the army; for example, he was an officer of the General Staff of the Yugoslav People's Army. In 1957 he graduated from the Military Academy in Belgrade, and in 1961 he was promoted to major general. He was the youngest general in the Yugoslav Army at that time. As a result of a conflict with Tito, Tudjman retired from military service and returned to Zagreb. In 1962 he became director of the Institute of the History of the Workers' Movement in Croatia and held the post for six years. At that time he was the editor-in-chief of the periodical Putovi revolucije. He also lectured on recent history in the Department of Philosophical Sciences of Zagreb University. In 1965 Tudjman defended his postdoctoral dissertation, "Uzroci krize monarhističke Jugoslavije od ujedinjenja 1918 do sloma 1941" (The sources of crisis of monarchist Yugoslavia from the unification in 1918 to the collapse in 1941). He also worked as an editor of the Military Encyclopedia, the Encyclopedia of Yugoslavia, and many other scholarly publications. Tudjman attended scholarly congresses and symposia in many European countries and the United States; among other things, he conducted a series of lectures on supremacy and coexistence in the nuclear era at Harvard University.

In 1967 Tudjman was accused of "Croatian nationalism" and was expelled from the League of Communists of Yugoslavia. From 1970 he worked in Croatian cultural and educational associations; for example, he was one of the leaders Croatian Matrix. He belonged to the Association of Croatian Publishers and Booksellers and to the Union of Croatian Writers. At that time Tudjman wrote a considerable part of his over 150 publications on military doctrine, recent history, politics, law, and international relations. Among other things, he came to the conclusion that for propaganda purposes Tito's regime had exaggerated the crimes committed by the Ustashe in the Jasenovac concentration camp. This was considered a manifestation of Croatian nationalism. As a result, Tudjman was accused of anti-Yugoslav activities during the so-called Croatian Spring of 1971, when Croatian party reformers put forward a proposal for the reform of the self-government system that also included increased autonomy for the union republics. In 1972 Tudjman was sentenced to two years of prison on the charge of propagating separatism. After his release from prison, he devoted himself to writing. Among other works, he published Nacionalno pitanje u suvremenoj Evropi (The national movement in contemporary Europe) and Velike ideje i mali narodi (Great ideas and small nations), reflecting on the right of self-determination of nations in the light of international law and to the Croatian question in the twentieth century.

Soon after Tito's death, in 1982, Tudjman was arrested again and sentenced to three years in the severe Lepoglava Prison because of interviews that had appeared on German television and French radio in which he postulated the introduction of democracy and political pluralism. For many Croats he became a leader struggling for national sovereignty. In 1983, owing to illness, Tudjman was temporarily released from prison, but after a few months he had to return. Finally he was released in 1984. In 1987 he obtained a passport and left for Canada and the United States, where he met with Croatian emigrants. Tudjman wanted to eliminate the old divisions between the Ustashe and the partisans. Modifying history, he whitewashed the crimes of both sides. Soon he was a recognized leader of the entire Croatian emigration, which financially supported his activities to rebuild a sovereign Croatian state. Later he also traveled throughout Europe, seeking support from the international community for this idea.

In June 1988 Tudjman founded the Croatian Democratic Union (Hrvatska Demokratska Zajednica [HDZ]), which favored the independence of Croatia. In June 1990 he was elected the leader of the HDZ. In April

1990 the HDZ won the first free elections since 1945 to the Croatian parliament (Sabor). In May 1990 the Sabor appointed Tudjman president; this was the beginning of Croatia's secession in June 1991. Tudjman was reelected president of Croatia by popular vote in July 1992, when he gained 57 percent of the vote. In 1991 he also assumed the post of commander-in-chief of the army. In the war against the Serbs (1991–95) Tudjman had the support of a definite majority of the nation. After initial failures in the struggles for Krajina and Slavonia in the summer and autumn of 1991, Tudjman succeeded in building an efficient and modern army. In May 1995 Croatian units regained Western Slavonia, and in August 1995 they seized Krajina, causing an exodus of nearly one million Serbian refugees. After the outbreak of conflict in Bosnia and Herzegovina, Tudjman initially supported forces aiming at the creation of an autonomous Croatian republic in Herzegovina with its capital in Mostar, and then he formed an alliance with Muslim forces against the Serbs. Along with Alija Izetbegović, the president of Bosnia and Herzegovina, and Slobodan Milošević, the president of Serbia, Tudjman took part in peace negotiations in Dayton, Ohio, where on 21 November 1995 the Dayton Agreement, which ended the war in Bosnia, was signed. In the general elections of 1997 Tudjman was elected president of Croatia for the third time. The same year, as a result of international mediation, he regained Baranja, the last part of Croatia that still remained under Serbian occupation. He also committed himself to respecting the rights of the Serbian minority. Tudjman was accused of having created a corruption-generating system with one predominant party and of not seeking a reckoning for the crimes committed by the Ustashe. At the time of his rule the HDZ was victorious in all the elections, and its majority in the parliament gave it unlimited legislative freedom. Legal guarantees of human rights and freedom of the press were violated. The return of Serbian refugees to Krajina was not secured. At the same time, Tudjman did counteract the activities of the other smaller parties with more parties with more clearly fascist and expansionist programs, which unanimously turned to Fascist ideology and spread propaganda for creating a "racially pure Croatia." Tudjman received many national and international awards, including that of Catarina de Medici. He was also doctor honoris causa of the university in Seville. After Tudjman's death, his cult ended, and the HDZ lost the elections. (AGr)

TUDOR Corneliu Vadim (28 November 1949, Bucharest), Romanian nationalist politician. Tudor graduated from high school in Bucharest in 1967. In the same year he began to study philosophy at the University of Bucharest. After graduating in 1971, he worked as a journalist for the periodical România Liberă-Magazin. In 1975 he underwent training at the Reserve Officers' School in Bucharest, where he began working with the political police, Securitate. In the same year he became an editor at the Romanian Press Agency (Agentia Româna de Presa; Agerpress). From 1978 to 1979 Tudor studied history in Vienna. From 1979 until the collapse of Nicolae Ceaușescu's regime in December 1989, he worked as an editor at Agerpress and served as Ceaușescu's eulogist and "court poet" and remained very close to the Romanian dictator and his family. In 1990 Tudor became the owner of a press group and began to publish nationalist and populist periodicals, România Mare and Politică. In 1991 he co-founded the Great Romania Party (Partidul România Mare [PRM]), a nationalist and anti-Semitic party of which he became the leader. The PRM brought together former Communist ideologues and former Securitate members who began to draw on peculiarly understood Christian and national values and opposed privatization and market reforms. In 1992 Tudor became a senator on the PRM ticket, and until 1995 he worked closely in parliament with the ruling post-Communist Party of Social Democracy in Romania (Partidul Democrației Sociale din România [PSDR]). From 1996 to 2000 Tudor again served as a senator, and his party strengthened its position in the parliament. In the parliamentary elections of 26 November 2000 Tudor became a senator for the third time, and the PRM came in second, with 19.5 percent of the vote. In the first round of the presidential elections, held on the same day, Tudor obtained 28.3 percent of the vote and went on to the second round, in which he obtained 33.2 percent of the vote, losing to Ion Iliescu. Tudor's party remained in opposition to the ruling PDSR and to President Iliescu. Tudor has published a dozen or so volumes of poetry and has written several plays. (LW)

TUKA Vojtech (Béla in Hungarian) (4 July 1880, Piarg [now Štiavnické Bane]–20 August 1946, Bratislava), Slovak lawyer and politician. Tuka was born in a Magyarized Slovak family. Until the age of forty he considered himself a Hungarian. He completed law studies in Budapest, Berlin, and Paris. He could speak several languages but knew Slovak poorly. In 1907–14 Tuka lectured on law in Transylvania and in the Department of Law of the University of Budapest. Then he became chair of the Department of the Philosophy of Law at the Hungarian Elizabethan University in Bratislava. Tuka maintained that during World War I his Slovak national consciousness matured. Some researchers think that joining the Slovak nationalists was just a part of Tuka's work as an agent for the Hungarian special services, which wanted to infiltrate the Slovak irredentist movement. Reverend Andrej Hlinka accepted Tuka into the leadership of the Slovak People's Party (Slovenská Ľudová Straná [SL'S]) so as to gain votes and financial support from the Hungarian minority. As early as 1921, on the personal orders of Reverend Hlinka, Tuka developed a plan for the autonomy of Slovakia. At that time he also became editor-in-chief of the periodical Slovák, an organ of the SL'S. From the beginning of the 1920s Tuka favored Italian fascism, and in 1923 he established ties with a Munich unit of the Nazi movement. From 1923 to 1929 Tuka was the leader of a paramilitary organization called Rodobrana, which became the Hlinka Guard (Hlinkova Garda) in 1938. In 1925 he was elected to the Czechoslovak National Assembly.

At the beginning of 1928 Tuka wrote his famous text, "Vacuum iuris," for Slovák. In it, he proved that the Czechoslovak agreement on a common state—the so-called declaration of St. Martin—contained a secret addendum that stated that the agreement was valid for ten years only. Thus, he reasoned, a new state agreement was necessary, and it had to be signed by 30 September 1928; otherwise that "loophole" (vacuum iuris) would take effect. According to Tuka, the legal situation required that the Slovaks decide once again whether they wanted a common state with the Czechs. In 1929 Tuka was arrested and in September 1929 sentenced to fifteen years of prison for attacks against the territorial integrity of Czechoslovakia and for espionage for Hungary. Because of Tuka's trial, Reverend Hlinka had to rescind the policy of normalizing relations with Prague. After eight years of prison, in July 1937 Tuka was pardoned by President Edvard Beneš. Although Tuka was banned from returning to Slovakia, he appeared there nonetheless, instigating anti-Czechoslovak demonstrations. After his release from prison he was still active in the SL'S and attempted to establish close ties with the German Nazis. In 1937 Tuka prepared a plan for autonomy that in June 1938 was passed as an official SL'S program. The plan, designed on the model of the Austro-Hungarian political system, envisioned the creation of a Czechoslovak unionist republic consisting of two parts: the Czech and the Slovak. Tuka maintained close relations with the leadership of the Third Reich, attempting to push through the leadership of the SL'S a decision to proclaim the independence of the Slovak state.

In January 1939, along with Alexander Mach, Ferdinand Ďurčanský, and the leaders of the Deutsche Partei (the party of the German national minority in Slovakia), Tuka founded the German-Slovak Society, which became an important lobby in favor of the pro-German policy of Slovakia. On 12 February 1939, along with Franz Karamsin, the leader of the German minority in Slovakia, Tuka was received by Hitler in Berlin. Tuka arbitrarily declared, "I place the fate of my nation in your hands, my Führer; my nation expects full liberation with your help." He was assured then that the Third Reich would support an independent Slovakia. In March 1939, along with Ďurčanský, Tuka appealed to Hermann Göring for his support in the creation of a Slovak state. From 14 March 1939 Tuka was deputy prime minister, minister of interior, and vice-president of the SL'S.

On 27 October 1939, against the will of President Josef Tiso, who, however, yielded to Berlin's demands, Tuka became prime minister of Slovakia. Later Tuka prepared a coup against Tiso, whom he accused of a lack of radicalism and too little support for the policy of the Third Reich. In 1940 Tuka was forced by Tiso to go on sick leave. However, after a meeting of a Slovak delegation with Hitler in Salzburg in June 1940, Tuka resumed his post of prime minister. At the same time, he became minister of foreign affairs and served as the rector of the university in Bratislava. After his return from Salzburg, Tuka announced that he intended to "finish the national revolution"—that is, complete the total fascisization of Slovakia. At the beginning of 1941 he proclaimed a fourteen-point program that became the political platform of the extreme rightist forces in the SL'S.

Without informing President Tiso, on 22 June 1941 Tuka announced in the parliament that Slovakia had declared war against the USSR and the Western Allies. A few months later he personally prepared anti-Jewish laws that he announced on 9 September 1941 without the knowledge of the other members of the cabinet or Tiso. These were a Slovak version of the Nuremberg Laws; they initiated the Aryanization process of the Slovak economy and social life. Along with Mach, the minister of interior, Tuka organized the deportation of Jews beginning in March 1942. From about ninety thousand Slovak Jews, over fifty-seven thousand were deported to the concentration camps in German-occupied Poland and Germany, and only eight hundred of them survived. The deportations were stopped in the autumn of 1942, after Tiso's intervention, when it turned out that instead of labor camps the Jews had been deported to places of extermination. Tuka was dismissed as prime minister in September 1944, when the Slovak National Uprising broke out. In 1945 he fled to Austria, where he was captured by the Americans and extradited on the request of the Slovak public prosecutor's office. On 29 September 1945 a plane arrived in Bratislava with Tiso, Tuka, and other Slovak activists who were considered war criminals. As the result of a trial before the National Tribunal in Bratislava, Tuka was sentenced to death and executed. (AGr)

TUMAS-VAIŽGANTAS Juozas (8 September 1869. Maleišiai, Rokiškis County—29 April 1933, Kaunas), Lithuanian priest, writer, and politician. Tumas-Vaižgantas was born into a peasant family. While a student at a high school in Dvinsk (now Daugavpils, Latvia), he developed an interest in literature and writing. After graduating from the Kaunas Seminary, Tumas-Vaižgantas was ordained a priest in 1893. Because he showed his patriotic feelings, he was constantly transferred from one parish to another. From 1896 to 1902 he edited the periodical Tėvynės Sargas, which was printed in Eastern Prussia and smuggled into the Russian territories inhabited by the Lithuanians. Tumas-Vaižgantas's brother was sentenced to five years in exile in Siberia for distributing this periodical. Church authorities subsequently banned Tumas-Vaižgantas from his editorial and publishing activities without the bishop's permission. During the 1905 revolution Tumas-Vaižgantas attended the Grand Lithuanian Assembly in Vilnius as a representative of Christian Democratic groups. In 1907 he joined the editorial staff of the periodical Viltis, where he met Antanas Smetona and Juozas Kubilius. In 1911 he went to the United States, where he raised funds to support an educational society. After returning to his country, he wrote his impressions in Ten gera, kur mūsų nėra (The grass is always greener on the other side; 1912), calling on his compatriots not to leave their homeland in search of an easier life abroad. In 1914 Tumas-Vaižgantas began to edit the periodical Rygos Garsas, and in 1915 he became a member of the Lithuanian Central Relief Committee in Petrograd. In June 1917 he attended the Lithuanian Conference in Petrograd and wholeheartedly supported the demands for Lithuanian independence. In 1920 he returned to Kaunas, where he edited periodicals representing nationalist views: Tauta, Trimitas, and Mūsų Senovė. From 1920 to 1932 he was rector of the Church of the Assumption of the Blessed Virgin Mary in Kaunas, and from 1922 to 1929 he taught Lithuanian literature at the University of Kaunas.

Tumas-Vaižgantas was a very prolific author. He started his literary life by publishing small pieces under the pen name of Juozapas iš Popšutės and then took on the pseudonym "Vaižgantas," which he subsequently added to his surname. His writings awoke patriotic feelings but also dislike of Poles and other nations. His most popular works include the stories Karo vaizdai (War sketches; 1915) and the novels Pragiedruliai (Rays of hope; 1918), which described life in Samogitia at the end of the nineteenth century; Dėdės ir dėdienės (Uncles and aunts; 1920); Išgana (The degenerate; 1929); and Žemaičių Robinzonas (Samogitian Robinson; 1932), in which he combined elements of reportage, descriptions of customs, psychology, allegory, and poetic fiction. TUPURKOVSKI Vasil (8 April 1951, Skopje), Macedonian Communist and post-Communist politician. Tupurkovski graduated from the School of Law of Ss. Cyril and Methodius University in Skopje (1972) and from the University of Michigan Law School (1973). In 1976 he earned a Ph.D. in international public law from Ss. Cyril and Methodius University in Skopje. From 1974 to 1976 Tupurkovski was an assistant professor at the School of Law of this university, becoming an associate professor in 1976 and a full professor in 1983. He served as the chairman of the League of Yugoslav Communist Youth (Savez Komunističke Omladine Jugoslavije [SKOJ]) from 1979 to 1980, a member of the Presidium of the League of Communists of Yugoslavia (LCY) from 1986 to 1989, and a member of the collective presidency of Yugoslavia from 1988 to 1992. Until 1990 Tupurkovski called for maintaining the Yugoslav federation. He was also a sports activist: in 1992 he became president of the Macedonian Olympics Committee, and until 2000 he served as president of the Association of the Balkan National Olympics Committees.

In 1995 Tupurkovski was a special envoy of President

Kiro Gligorov to the United States, where he spoke against the policy of equal distance toward all of Macedonia's neighbors. In 1998 he founded the Democratic Alternative (Demokratska Alternativa [DA]), a political party that brought together former Communists who had links with Belgrade. In alliance with the Internal Macedonian Revolutionary Organization–Democratic Party for Macedonian National Unity (Vnatrešna-Makedonska Revolucionerna Organizacija–Demokratska Partija za Makedonsko Nacionalno Edinstvo [IMRO–DPMNU]), the DA won twelve seats in the 1998 elections, and eight of its members became ministers in the government of Ljubčo Georgijevski. From November 1998 to December 1999 Tupurkovski served as director of the Agency for Reconstruction and Development. On 27 December 1999 he became first deputy prime minister. In December 2000 he resigned his position and withdrew the DA from the government, accusing the prime minister of a failure to introduce reforms and of violating the rules of democracy. Tupurkovski ran in the 1999 presidential elections as the leader of the DA. He did not gain the support of the IMRO–DPMNU, though, and in the first round obtained 16.1 percent of the vote, losing to Boris Trajkovski, a candidate supported by the IMRO–DPMNU. In July 2000 Tupurkovski became minister without portfolio in the government of national unity. In the 2002 parliamentary elections the DA failed to enter parliament. Tupurkovski is a member of the International Law Association. He has written works on UN peace missions, a textbook on international public law (1984), and historical books, including Istorija na Makedonija od drevnina do smrtta na Aleksandar Makedonski (History of Macedonia from earliest times until the death of Alexander the Great; 1993) and Istorija na Makedonija od smrtta na Aleksandar Makedonski do makedonsko-rimskite vojni (History of Macedonia from the death of Alexander the Great to the Macedonian-Roman wars; 1994). TUROWICZ Jerzy (10 December 1912, Kraków–27 January 1999, Kraków), Polish journalist and politician. After graduating from high school, Turowicz studied at the Department of Machine Construction of the Technical University in Lwów (Lviv) from 1930 to 1934 and at the Department of Philosophy of the Jagiellonian University from 1934 to 1939. From 1930 onward he was active in the Association of Catholic Academic Youth known as Odrodzenie (Revival), an organization that shaped the youth in the spirit of open Catholicism. In 1939 Turowicz became the editor-in-chief of the Kraków-based daily Głos narodu. During the Nazi occupation he lived in Kraków, which always remained his hometown.

At the beginning of 1945 Turowicz helped to establish the weekly Tygodnik Powszechny, initiated by Archbishop Adam Sapieha, the metropolitan of Kraków. After a few months of editing the weekly, Turowicz became its editor-in-chief, and in June 1946 he also became the co-editor of the monthly Znak. In Tygodnik Powszechny Turowicz brought together the most eminent Catholic writers and journalists, including Father Jan Piwowarczyk, Paweł Jasienica, Stefan Kisielewski, and Stanisław Stomma. While avoiding a direct involvement in politics, the weekly strove to defend values threatened by communism and promoted not only Catholicism, but also a culture based on Christianity yet open to dialogue with all social and political movements. In March 1953, when the editorial staff led by Turowicz refused to print a panegyric on Stalin after the dictator's death, the authorities of the Polish People's Republic suspended the publication of Tygodnik Powszechny, while the pro-regime PAX Association began to publish an identically titled periodical under the editorship of Jan Dobraczyński. Turowicz lost his job and was forced to rely on occasional translations and the support of his friends.

After October 1956, the new authorities of the Polish United Workers' Party (Polska Zjednoczona Partia Robotnicza [PUWP]), led by Władysław Gomułka, agreed to permit the revival of Tygodnik Powszechny under Turowicz's editorship. At that time the line of the weekly was often described as "political neo-positivism." Turowicz was a commentator at the sessions of the Second Vatican Council and promoted its teachings. This led to tensions between the editorial staff and the Church hierarchs, who, led by Cardinal Stefan Wyszyński, the primate of Poland, were more cautious in promoting post-conciliar renewal among the faithful, fearing the erosion of Polish Catholicism as a result of some kind of "progressivism." In March 1964 Turowicz signed the "Letter of 34" in defense of the freedom of culture, in retaliation for which the Communist authorities reduced the circulation of Tygodnik Powszechny. In January 1966 at a meeting of the All-Polish Committee of the National Unity Front Turowicz defended an address issued by the Polish bishops to the German bishops and denounced by the Communist authorities; his stance prompted a fierce attack against him by Gomułka. After March 1968, Turowicz invited poets and writers persecuted by the regime (also those with an anti-clerical past, such as Antoni Słonimski) to publish in Tygodnik Powszechny. This facilitated cooperation among various groups opposing communism. In January 1976, together with activists linked to the parliamentary group called Znak, Turowicz signed a letter to the Assembly Constitutional Committee in protest against proposed amendments to the constitution. In the second half of the 1970s Tygodnik Powszechny became a forum for authors associated with the Workers' Defense Committee (Komitet Obrony Robotników [KOR]), who published under pen names. In October 1978 the weekly solemnly celebrated the election of Cardinal Karol Wojtyła as Pope John Paul II.

In 1980 Turowicz and Tygodnik Powszechny helped to establish the Independent Self-Governing Trade Union–Solidarity (Niezależny Samorządny Związek Zawodowy–Solidarność). After martial law was imposed, the weekly was suspended for six months. Reestablished, it continued to serve as a platform for opposition groups calling for social dialogue and—with the increase in economic stagnation and social apathy—for political changes. In the 1980s Turowicz was a member of the Episcopal Subcommittee for Dialogue with Judaism and a member of the Primate's Social Council. On 10 October 1986, along with Lech Wałęsa, Tadeusz Mazowiecki, and Bronisław Geremek, Turowicz signed a statement calling for a new political climate in Poland, to be established by meeting people's expectations. On 31 May 1987, on the eve of another visit by Pope John Paul II to Poland, Turowicz signed a statement that set out the basic goals of the opposition, including trade union and political pluralism. On 18 December 1988 Turowicz became a member of the Civic Committee of Lech Wałęsa. He also took part in the Round Table negotiations on the side of the opposition.

After Mazowiecki's government was formed in September 1989, Turowicz and his weekly supported economic and political reforms. In the spring of 1990 Turowicz supported Mazowiecki, who ran against Wałęsa in the presidential elections. Turowicz co-founded Civic Movement–Democratic Action (Ruch Obywatelski–Akcja Demokratyczna), which criticized Wałęsa for dictatorial leanings and methods. In the 1990s Turowicz promoted a model of liberal Catholicism in his weekly, often critical of the Church hierarchs; his position caused protests by other Catholic groups. On the fiftieth anniversary of Tygodnik Powszechny, Pope John Paul II summed up its achievements in a special letter to Turowicz, emphasizing the great accomplishments of the weekly and its editor-in-chief but expressing regret over the lack of understanding of the Church's place in the reemerging Polish democracy. TUSAR Vlastimil (18 October 1880, Prague–22 March 1924, Berlin), Czech Social Democratic politician. Tusar completed a two-year trade school. In 1903–8 he was a journalist, and between 1908 and 1911, editor-in-chief of a Brno publication, Rovnosti, which under his direction became a daily newspaper. Between 1911 and 1918 Tusar was an MP in the Vienna parliament. After the outbreak of World War I, he initially supported the pro-Habsburg policy of the leadership of Czech Social Democracy. Later, however, at an international meeting of trade union activists in Switzerland in September 1917 he changed his orientation, establishing a cooperative relationship with the Czech independence movement. At the end of the war Tusar led negotiations with the Austrian authorities. On 27 October 1918 he gave a signal from Vienna for Alois Rašín, one of the leaders of the independence movement linked with a conspiratorial political organization called Maffie (Mafia), to take over power. In 1918–21 Tusar was an MP in the Czechoslovak parliament, and from 1918 to 1919 he represented Czechoslovakia in negotiations in Vienna on the delimitation of the Austrian–Czechoslovak border; in these he gained considerable success owing to his personal acquaintance with many Austrian politicians. From 8 July 1919 Tusar was prime minister of subsequent cabinets of the “red and green coalition,” with a membership of Socialist nationalists, landowners, and some Slovak politicians. Under pressure from the radical left in the party, Tusar, as a representative of the right wing of Social Democracy, resigned on 15 September 1920. From 1921 Tusar was Czechoslovak representative in Berlin, where he strove for the normalization of Czechoslovak–German relations. (PU)

TUWIM Julian (13 September 1894, Łódź–27 December 1953, Zakopane), Polish poet of Jewish descent. After graduating from high school in Łódź, Tuwin studied law and philosophy at Warsaw University (1916–18). He made his literary debut in 1913. From 1916 to 1919 he contributed to the student periodical Pro arte et studio. He co-founded the literary cabaret Pod Picadorem (1918) and the Skamander group of experimental poets (1920), and he worked with Warsaw cabarets. Tuwim was literary director of the Qui pro Quo cabaret from 1919 to 1932 and the Cyrulik Warszawski (Barber of Warsaw) cabaret from 1935 to 1939. In 1924 Tuwim became a staff writer for the weekly Wiadomości Literackie and was on the staffs of the satirical periodicals Cyrulik Warszawski (1926–33) and Szpilki (1936–39). In 1939, after the outbreak of World War II, Tuwim emigrated via Romania to France. After the fall of France, he went to Portugal, then to Brazil, and finally to the United States, settling in New York, where he lived for five years. In 1939–41 Tuwim contributed to the weekly Wiadomości Polskie, Polityczne i Kulturalne and (in 1942–46) to Nowa Polska, a London-based leftist weekly edited by Antoni Słonimski. During the war Tuwim wrote “Kwiaty Polskie” (Polish flowers; 1949), an epic lyrical poem that drew on the Romantic tradition; in it Tuwim combined patriotic and religious elements with reflections on the causes of the 1939 defeat of Poland. Tuwim called for an agreement between Poland and the Soviet Union, thereby alienating the Polish political émigré community; in 1946 he returned to Poland. From 1947 to 1950 Tuwim worked as an artistic director of the Nowy Theater in Warsaw and wrote pieces that affirmed the Communist reality.

Tuwim was one of the leading and most popular twentieth-century Polish poets. He drew on the experience of Russian Futurism and German Expressionism. He introduced everyday themes into poetry and often used colloquial language. His first poems, in which he broke away from the decadent style of the Young Poland movement, include the volumes Czyhanie na Boga (Lying in wait for God; 1918); Sokrates tańczący (1920; The Dancing Socrates and Other Poems, 1968); Siódma jesień (The seventh autumn; 1922); and Wierszy tom czwarty (Poems, volume 4; 1923). Tuwim gradually drifted toward classicism in the volumes Rzecz czarnoleska (The Czarnolas speech; 1929); Biblia cygańska (The gypsy Bible; 1933); and Treść gorejąca (The burning content; 1936). In his later works, Tuwim became involved in social issues, expressing pacifist, liberal, and anti-nationalist views; examples are the collection of satires Jarmark rymów (Rhyme fair; 1934) and the satirical poem “Bal w Operze” (Ball at the Opera House; 1936; full edition, 1946). Tuwim collected folklore and historical tidbits, which he then published as (among others works) Czary i czarty polskie (Polish magic and demons; 1923); Wypisy czarnoksiężskie (Magic excerpts; 1923); Polski słownik pijacki (Polish drunkard’s dictionary; 1935); Antologia bachiczna (Bacchanalian anthology; 1935); Cztery wieki fraszki polskiej (Four centuries of Polish epigrams; 1937); Cicer cum caule, czyli Groch z kapustą (Mishmash, 3 vols.; 1958–63); Pegaz dęba, czyli panopticum poetyckie (Poetic collection of curiosities; 1950); and Księga wi- erszy polskich XIX w. (The book of nineteenth-century Polish poems, 3 vols.; 1954). Tuwim translated Russian literature and was the editor of many anthologies, songs, cabaret monologues, and children’s pieces, including Lokomotywa (1938; Locomotive, 1939). Tuwim’s Dzieła (Works, 5 vols.; 1955–64); Wiersze wybrane (Selected poems; 1969); Wiersze zebrane (Collected poems, 2 vols.; 1975); and Pisma zebrane (Collected writings, 6 vols.; 1986–93) were published posthumously. TYCHYNA Pavlo (27 January 1891, Pisky, Chernihiv region–16 September 1967, Kiev), Ukrainian poet. Tychyna initially studied at home and then went to a local school. He made his debut as a poet in 1906. From 1907 to 1913 he studied at a seminary and from 1913 to 1917 at the Institute of Commerce in Kiev. At that time he contributed to the periodical Svitlo and the newspaper Rada and worked for the Ukrainian theater of Mykola Sadovsky. Tychyna welcomed the national revival movement after the February 1917 revolution, as evidenced by the 1917 poem “Zoloty homin” (Golden hubbub). In 1918 he published his first poetry collection, Soniashni kliarnety (Solar clarinets). His next collections—Pluh (The plow; 1920); V kosmichnomu orkestri (In the cosmic orchestra; 1921); Skovoroda: Uryvky z symfonii (Skorovoda: Symphony fragments; 1923); and Viter z Ukrainy (The wind from Ukraine; 1924; dedicated to Mykola Khvylovyi)—consolidated Tychyna’s position as one of the most innovative Ukrainian poets.

In 1923 Tychyna moved to Kiev, where he worked for the periodical Chervonyi shliakh. Initially he belonged to the literary group Hart, and in 1927 he became a member of the Free Academy of Proletarian Literature (Vilna Akademiia Proletarskoy Literatury [VAPLITE]), which consisted of twenty-two writers led by Khvylovyi, who was regarded as the leading representative of national communism in Ukraine. Tychyna’s membership in the VAPLITE became a pretext to accuse him of Ukrainian “bourgeois nationalism.” As a result of these accusations, Tychyna ceased publishing for some time. In 1929 he became a member of the Academy of Sciences of the Ukrainian SSR, and in 1938, a deputy to the Supreme Soviet of the Ukrainian SSR and to the Supreme Soviet of the Soviet Union. From 1936 to 1939 and from 1941 to 1943

Tychyna served as director of the Institute of Literature of the Academy of Sciences of the Ukrainian SSR. At that time he wrote several poetry volumes, including Chernihiv (1931); Partiia vede (The party is our guide; 1934); and Stal i nizhnist (Steel and tenderness; 1941), already written in the style of Socialist realism. Tychyna's work became a paragon of the subordination of Ukrainian literature to Stalinism. During the German-Soviet war Tychyna was evacuated to Bashkiria, where he wrote the moving poem "Pokhoron druha" (Funeral of a friend; 1942). In 1943–48 Tychyna served as minister of education of the Ukrainian SSR. From 1953 to 1959 he was chairman of the Supreme Soviet of the Ukrainian SSR. In the 1950s and 1960s Tychyna wrote several poetry collections, all in the spirit of Socialist realism and apologias for the Communist system. (BB)

TYKHYI Oleksy (27 January 1927, YIzhivka, Stalino [now Donetsk] Province–6 May 1984, Perm), Ukrainian human rights activist. Tykhyi studied at the Agricultural Institute in Zaporizhzhya and at the Institute of Transport Engineering in Dnepropetrovsk. He later graduated in philosophy from Moscow University and then worked as a teacher in the region of Zaporizhzhya and Stalino. Arrested in mid-January 1957 on charges that included the criticism of Soviet schools and writing a letter to the Central Committee (CC) of the CPSU in protest against the Soviet invasion of Hungary, Tykhyi was sentenced to seven years in a forced labor camp in May 1958. He served his sentence in Mordvinia. Released in 1964, he worked as a laborer. Tykhyi became involved in distributing samizdat publications and published articles on the disappearance of the Ukrainian language and culture in the Donbas region. In June 1976 during a search of Tykhyi's home the police confiscated his collection of quotations from famous Ukrainians, Mova narodu (Speech of the people).

In February 1977 Tykhyi was arrested again for "anti-Soviet agitation," but the real reason was the fact that he had co-founded the Ukrainian Helsinki Group in November 1976. He was tried together with Mykola Rudenko. In July 1976 Tykhyi was found to be a recidivist and sentenced to ten years in a forced labor camp and five years in exile. He was sent to Sosnovka in Mordvinia.

He took part in protests, and in the spring of 1978 he was on a hunger strike for fifty-two days. In the summer of 1978 Tykhyi and Vasyl Romaniuk (the future bishop Volodymyr) wrote the work Istorychna dolia Ukrainy (Historical fate of Ukraine), in which they sharply criticized Soviet ethnic policy in Ukraine from the point of view of the UN Universal Declaration of Human Rights. They called for using Soviet constitutional provisions for the defense of the national rights of the Ukrainian people. In April 1979, while on a hunger strike, Tykhyi suffered internal hemorrhaging. He was blackmailed with threats that the results of an operation might depend on whether or not he denounced and gave up his opposition activities, but he refused. The operation was done in such a careless way that the doctor could be suspected of ill will. Despite his serious condition, Tykhyi was often put in solitary confinement. In March 1980 he was transferred to the village of Kuchino, near Perm, and punished in a similar way, but he did not give up his protests. In 1982 and 1984 Tykhyi twice underwent operations in a prison hospital in Vsekhsvyatka. He died in a prison hospital in Perm. In November 1989 Tykhyi's remains were brought to Kiev and reburied in Baykovo Cemetery. (TS)

TYUTYUNNYK Yuriy (20 April 1891, Budyshcha, near Chernigov [Chernihiv]–1929, Moscow), Ukrainian officer and politician. In 1917 Tyutyunnyk organized Ukrainian military units in Simferopol and Zvenyhorodka. He was a member of the Ukrainian Central Rada (Council) and president of the Kiev Revolutionary Committee, which was preparing an uprising against the government of Hetman Pavlo Skoropadskyi. In February 1919 Tyutyunnyk became chief of staff of Matviy Hryhoryiv's guerrilla group, which operated in the southern Ukraine. After getting across the Bolshevik front, Tyutyunnyk made his way to the army of the Ukrainian National Republic (UNR) and became commander of the Kiev group in the Kiev offensive in August 1919. During the winter campaign of 1919–20 he commanded the Kiev division and served as deputy commander of the UNR army, with the rank of brigadier general. After the Riga Peace Treaty was signed, Tyutyunnyk organized new military units (known as the Ukrainian Insurgent Army) in Lviv (Lwów) to fight against the Bolsheviks. In early November 1921 three military units led by Tyutyunnyk, about 1,500 strong, made their way to the Bolshevik-controlled Ukrainian territory to the east of the Zbruch River. However, Tyutyunnyk failed to rally wider circles of the Ukrainian public to join the struggle, and after the defeat at Bazar, where the Bolsheviks murdered their prisoners of war, he returned to the territories of the Second Republic of Poland. Taking advantage of an amnesty, Tyutyunnyk became formally reconciled with the Bolsheviks and went to the Ukrainian SSR in 1923. He lectured at the Red Officers' School in Kharkiv and wrote screenplays. Arrested by the political police (OGPU) in the late 1920s, Tyutyunnyk was executed as a Polish spy. His memoirs were published in the periodicals Literaturno-naukovy visnyk and Zahrava, and his political and military sketches in various publications; these sketches include "Zymovyi pokhid 1919–1920" (Winter campaign of 1919–1920; 1923) and "Z Poliakamy proty Ukrainy" (With the Poles against Ukraine; 1924). U

UDOVENKO Hennadiy (22 June 1931, Kryvy Rih), Ukrainian diplomat and politician. Udovenko graduated from the Foreign Relations Department of Kiev University in 1954. He continued his studies at the Institute of Economics and Agriculture. In 1955–58 he was head of a kolkhoz near Kiev. From 1959 he was first secretary of the Communist Party committee and head of the departments of economic organization and personnel in the Foreign Ministry of the Ukrainian SSR. From 1965 to 1971 Udovenko worked in the UN Secretariat in Geneva, and from 1977 to 1980 he was head of the department of conference services in the UN headquarters in New York. From 1980 to 1985 he was deputy minister of foreign affairs of the Ukrainian SSR, and from 1985 to 1992 he was the republic's representative to the United Nations. In July 1985 Udovenko presided over the UN Security Council. From 1989 to 1991 he was vice-president of the UN Social and Economic Council, and in 1991, vice-president of the Forty-sixth UN General Assembly Session. In 1997 he presided over its Fifty-second Session. From 1992 to 1994 Udovenko was ambassador of independent Ukraine to Poland, and in August 1994 he became Ukrainian foreign minister. In this capacity he helped to resolve basic problems between Ukraine and Russia (for example, the division of the Black Sea Fleet and the determination of the status of Crimea), and he consolidated the pro-Western orientation of Ukraine. For instance, he did not object to Poland's entry into NATO. In 1996–98 Udovenko was also a member of the security council of the Ukrainian president.

In March 1998 Udovenko won a seat on the Supreme Council on the lists of the National Movement of Ukraine (Narodny Rukh Ukrainy [NMU]), so he resigned from his position as foreign minister in April 1998. At the time of a split in the NMU in February 1999, Udovenko supported its chairman, Vyacheslav Chornovil. When the latter was killed in a car crash in March 1999, Udovenko became head of the party and its parliamentary caucus. However, Yuri Kostenko's faction, which had caused the split, did not recognize Udovenko. Udovenko and Kostenko ran separately in the presidential elections of November 1999, when Udovenko gained 1.2 percent of the vote. In January 2000 two different parties registered from what had been the NMU; the Udovenko faction kept the original name. In connection with the hijacking and death of the journalist Grigory Gongadze in 2001, Udovenko supported actions against President Leonid Kuchma, who was accused of involvement in the affair. In early 2002 both former NMU factions joined the election coalition Our Ukraine (Nasha Ukraina) of Viktor Yushchenko. In the April 2002 elections Udovenko won a seat on behalf of this coalition. Udovenko has demanded a resumption of the investigation into the death of Chornovil. (TS)

UDRŽAL František (3 January 1866, Dolní Roveň–24 April 1938, Prague), Czech politician. In 1886 Udržal graduated from a higher agricultural school in Tábor and then went to Germany for training. He did his military service in Budapest, attaining officer rank, and from 1894 he ran his own estate in Dolní Roveň. Udržal joined entered political life in the 1890s. At first he was active in the Young Czech Party, but in 1906 he joined the Agrarian Party, which was programmatically closer to him. He soon became one of the party leaders, co-author of its political program, and a co-worker of Milan Hodža. Between 1897 and 1918 Udržal was a member of the Viennese parliament. In the first decade of the twentieth century he began to work with Antonín Švehla. Udržal was one of the founders of the Czech Association of Deputies and became its chairman. From 1917 to 1918 he was the first vice-chairman of the Chamber of Deputies. During World War I he mainly resided in Vienna but maintained contacts with the Czech independence movement, providing it with information.

After the creation of the Czechoslovak state, between 1918 and 1935 Udržal was an MP and, until 1937, a senator. In 1921–25 and 1926–29 he held the post of minister of national defense in the cabinets of Edvard Beneš and Švehla, and he developed the armed forces of the young state. Udržal focused mainly on supplying the army with military equipment and on reinforcing its personnel with proven soldiers. He also nurtured good relations with the allies of Czechoslovakia, especially with France, where he went on an official mission in 1925 and gained confirmation of a Czechoslovak-French alliance. On 1 February 1929 Udržal became prime minister, taking over the post after the withdrawal of his party colleague, Švehla, from political life. Udržal retained his post after the parliamentary elections in the fall of 1929, which were won by the Agrarians, and after the formation of a broad coalition of all parties that rejected fascism and communism. At that time Udržal was also the chairman of the parliamentary club of his party. As head of government, he had to face the serious worldwide economic crisis of the Great Depression. Udržal's health was also weakened by intraparty struggles with Jan Malypetr, so he resigned as prime minister on 29 October 1932. He left the political scene because of ill health in December 1937. In the last months of his life Udržal supported the work of the first Czech mutual insurance company in Prague. (PU)

UHDE Milan (28 July 1936, Brno), Czech writer and politician. Uhde graduated in philosophy from Brno University in 1958. In 1958–70 he edited the monthly Host do domu and lectured at the Music Academy in Brno. From 1971 to 1989 he remained jobless because of political repression. Uhde published under pseudonyms in samizdat publications and abroad. He was a signatory of Charter 77; from 1988 he edited Lidove noviny, and in 1989–90 he was editor-in-chief of Atlantis Press, which he founded along with his wife. After the Velvet Revolution, from June 1990 to June 1992 Uhde was minister of culture of the Czech Republic. In 1991 Uhde co-founded the Civic Democratic Party (Občanská Demokratická Strana [ODS]) and was one of its leaders. From June to December 1992 he was an MP and speaker of the Czech National Council; from January 1993 to June 1998 he was an MP, and from January 1993 to June 1996 he was speaker of the parliament of the independent Czech Republic. When scandal concerning ODS financing broke out and when the Václav Klaus government stepped down in January 1998, Uhde left the party and joined the newly established Union of Freedom (Unie Svobody). Disappointed with its program, he soon left the political arena.

Uhde is one of the creators of the Czech theater of the absurd. A rationalist criticizing historical myths and clichés, he wrote allegorical stories full of sad humor. His plays and radio plays have been translated into many languages, among them French and German. Uhde made his literary debut in 1952 publishing short poems; in 1962 he published the volume Lidé z přízemí (People from the ground floor). In the 1960s he published the allegorical and satirical plays Král Vávra (King Vavra; 1965) and Děvka z města Théby (A girl from Thebes; 1967); numerous radio plays; and the short stories “Hrách na stěnu” (Wasting one’s breath; 1964) and “Záhadná věž v B.” (A mysterious tower in B.; 1967). Uhde made critical allusions to the Communist system and social relations in Czechoslovakia. In his later dramas—such as Hra na holuba (Playing a dove; 1974) and Zvěstování aneb Bedřichu: Jsi anděl (Annunciation or Bedřich: You’re an angel; 1986)—Uhde stigmatized the empty rituals confining human freedom. He also wrote song lyrics and puppet theater plays, and he collaborated with the Brno theaters Divadlo X and Divadlo na Provázku. Uhde also authored the screenplay for the movie Šach-mat Vaše Vysosti (Checkmate, Your Highness; 1969). Uhde’s columns from the 1990s were published in the volume Česká republika, dobrý den (Good morning, Czech Republic; 1995). (PU)

UKRAINKA Lesya [originally Larysa Kosach-Kvitka] (25 February 1871, Zvyahel–1 August 1913, Surami, Georgia), Ukrainian poet, playwright, translator, and literary critic. Ukrainka was the daughter of the well-known Ukrainian writer and social activist Olena Pchilka, the sister of Mikhailo Drahomanov, a veteran Ukrainian Socialist. She was on friendly terms with such outstanding personalities of Ukrainian culture as Olha Koblyanska, Ivan Franko, Vasyl Stefanyk, and Mikhailo Hrushevsky. Because Ukrainka had bone tuberculosis, she studied at home, attaining a vast education in the humanities. She spoke many languages, including Russian, French, German, English, Italian, Greek, Polish, Bulgarian, and Latin. She traveled to Germany, Austria-Hungary, and Italy for health reasons, but these journeys also expanded her cultural horizons. Ukrainka translated the works of Homer, Adam Mickiewicz, Victor Hugo, Heinrich Heine, George Byron, and others. In 1890 she wrote a textbook for her sister: Starodavnya istoriya skhidnykh narodiv (Ancient history of the eastern nations; 1918). Ukrainka made her debut as a poet in 1884 in the Lviv periodical Zorya. It was then that she took the pen name of Lesya Ukrainka. In 1885 in Lviv she published (with her brother Mikhailo) a volume of translations from Nikolay Gogol. Her world outlook was largely shaped by her yearly stay at her Uncle Drahomanov’s in Sofia.

In 1896 Ukrainka criticized the French poets who gave a warm welcome to Tsar Nicholas II when he visited France. In her protest she called Russia a “prison of nations.” In the mid-1880s Ukrainka’s family moved to Kiev, where she joined a poetry group, the Pleiad. The first collection of Ukrainka’s original works, Na krilyakh pisen (On the wings of songs), appeared in Lviv in 1893. It was also there that she published her second volume, Dumy i mriyi (Thoughts and dreams; 1899). The third collection, Widhuky (Echoes), was published in Chernyovtsi in 1902. Ukrainka’s first play was Blakytma Troyanda (Blue rose), written in 1896 and presenting the life of the Ukrainian intelligentsia. A special place in her work is taken by dramatic poems dealing with the Babylonian bondage of the Israelis: “Na ruinakh” (On the ruins; 1903); “Vavylonskyi polon” (Babylonian bondage; 1903); and “V domu roboty—v krayini nevoli” (In the house of labor—in the country of bondage; 1906). In these works Ukrainka developed analogies between the Babylonian bondage and the fate of the Ukrainians in the Russian empire. In the drama Kassandra (1907) Ukrainka’s vision of a ruined Troy became a metaphor for an enslaved Ukraine. In the drama V katakombakh (In the catacombs; 1905) she sharply criticized the passivity and amicability of the Ukrainian intelligentsia. In the drama Rufin i Pristsilla (1908) she contrasted the brutal force of Rome with a magnificent Christian woman. Her drama Boyaryn’a (Princess; 1910) also includes strong anti-Russian elements. Ukrainka’s other outstanding works include the dramas Kamynnyi hospodar (Landlord of stone; 1912) and Lisova pisnya (Song of the forest; 1911). In 1907 Ukrainka was temporarily arrested, and at the end of her life she was often living under police surveillance because of her contacts with Russian Marxists. She also spent much time in Egypt and the Caucasus for health reasons.

Ukrainka was one of the leading Ukrainian poets at the turn of the twentieth century. Her lyrics increasingly engaged with social and political affairs. She advocated bravery and a national struggle. She greatly modernized the poetic form of Ukrainian drama but also wrote prose. Ukrainka contributed to a number of Ukrainian periodicals, such as Literaturno—naukowyi visnyk, Nova hromada, Narod, Dzvin, and Ridnyi kray. (BB)

ULASAU Aleksandr (16 August 1874, Wilejka–June 1941, Minsk), Belorussian editor and politician of Russian descent. Ulasau graduated from a theological seminary in Pinsk, and in 1899–1905 he studied at the Polytechnic Institute in Riga. At the end of 1904 he was a co-founder of the Belorussian Socialist Hromada, and in 1907–14 he was editor of the periodical Nasha Niva. From 1912 to 1915 Ulasau edited the periodicals Sakha (for the countryside) and Luchynka (for children). In 1918 he became a member of the Council of the Belorussian People’s Republic. In 1919 he initiated the resumption of Nasha Khatka, a Belorussian editing association in Wilno (Vilnius). In 1922–27 Ulasau was a Polish senator. He also acted in the Association for Belorussian Education and published in the Wilno press. In September 1939 Ulasau was arrested by the NKVD and sentenced to five years’ imprisonment. According to information obtained by his family, he was shot by the NKVD during the evacuation of the Minsk prisons. (EM)

ULASHCHYK Mikola (14 February 1906, Vitskaushchyna–14 November 1986, Minsk), Belorussian historian and archaeologist. Ulashchyk graduated in history from the Belorussian University in Minsk in 1929. In 1930–55 he was arrested three times and spent the next ten years in and out of prison for “anti-Soviet” activities. Ulashchyk taught at Moscow University (1948–49) and in high schools. From 1955 he was employed at the Academy of Sciences of the USSR, dealing with the earliest history of Belorussia and Lithuania, as well as with the implementation of the tsarist agrarian reform of 1861 in the western provinces of the Russian empire. Ulashchyk’s major works include the following: Ocherki po arkeografii i istochnikovedeniiu istorii Belorussii feodalnogo perioda (Studies in archeography and knowledge of sources for a history of feudal Belorussia; 1973); Vvedenie v izuchenie belorussko-litovskogo letopisaniia (Introduction to studies in Lithuanian and Belorussian chronicle writing; 1985); and Byla takaya vyoska (There was once a village like this; 1989). ULMANIS Guntis (13 September 1939, Riga), Latvian politician. The grandson of Kārlis Ulmanis, during mass Soviet repressions, on 14 June 1941 Ulmanis was deported with his family to the Krasnoyarsk district in Siberia. In 1946 the family was allowed to return to Latvia, but because of a ban on settlements in Riga, they moved to Kuldīga and, in 1949, to Jūrmala. In 1963 Ulmanis was allowed to graduate from the Department of Economics of the Latvian State University in Riga. In 1963–65 he served in the Soviet Army, and later he worked as an economist in the construction industry and in the Riga town administration. At the same time, he started lecturing at Riga University. From 1965 to 1989 Ulmanis belonged to the Communist Party of the Soviet Union. In 1971 he became director of the Riga administration of social services. After Latvia regained its independence (1991), Ulmanis joined the Latvian Agrarian Union (Latvijas Zemnieku Savienība) in 1992. In June 1993 he was elected to the parliament (Saeima). After three rounds of voting, on 7 July 1993 Ulmanis was elected president; this had a symbolic meaning, considering his family connections. As president, Ulmanis supported market reforms and Latvian efforts to integrate with West European structures. Nevertheless, in July 1994 he refused to sign radical legislation on citizenship and naturalization. On 18 June 1996 he was reelected for a second term, during which he continued his former foreign policy. In January 1997 Ulmanis criticized the personnel decisions of Prime Minister Andris Šķēle, which led to the resignation of the whole cabinet. After the termination of his second term on 8 July 1999, Ulmanis retired. He authored, among other works, No tevis jau neprasa daudz (I do not expect much from you; 1995) and Put' prezidenta (The president's way; 1996). (EJ)

ULMANIS Kārlis (4 September 1877, Bēztes, Courland–20 September 1942, Krasnovodsk), Agrarian politician, president of Latvia. Born into a peasant family, in 1896 Ulmanis graduated from high school in Jelgava and in 1897 from a dairy economics school in East Prussia. In 1902–3 he studied agriculture at the Higher Technical School in Zurich, Switzerland, and from 1903 to 1905 he studied at the Agricultural Institute in Leipzig. Ulmanis worked as an agronomist, social worker, and editor of the periodical Lauksaimnieks in Livonia. During the Russian revolution of 1905 he demanded that Latvian be used in the schools; for this he was arrested in September 1905. Imprisoned in Pskov, after his release in May 1906 Ulmanis worked on his brother's farm. Avoiding another arrest, Ulmanis left to go abroad. In 1906–7 he taught at an agricultural school in Saxony, and in 1907 he arrived in the United States. In 1909 he graduated from the Department of Agriculture of the University of Nebraska, and then he lectured there. Ulmanis returned to Latvia in 1913, taking up a job as an agronomist in an agricultural society in Valmiera and Riga. During World War I Ulmanis supported Latvian organizations of war refugees. In 1914–15 he edited the periodical Zeme. From April to September 1917 he was a member of the Livonian Land Council and its deputy governor. In April 1917 he co-founded and became one of the leaders of the Latvian Agrarian Union (Latviešu Zāmieku Sanienība [LAU]). He also edited agricultural periodicals.

From the beginning of 1918 Ulmanis worked for Latvian independence within the multiparty Democratic Bloc and then within the Provisional Latvian National Council (PLNC) in Riga.

On 18 November 1918, when the PLNC proclaimed the independence of Latvia, Ulmanis became head of its provisional government. On the same day his cabinet issued a declaration of the political principles of the new state, including territorial integrity and parliamentary democracy. Apart from serving as prime minister, Ulmanis was minister of agriculture (November–December 1918), minister of supplies (November 1918–December 1919), and minister of war (October 1919–June 1920). In view of the domination of German troops and Bolshevik proclamations of a Latvian Soviet Republic, on 7 December 1918 Ulmanis agreed to let the Germans organize the defense of Latvia in return for the recognition of its sovereignty in internal affairs. On 3 January 1919 Bolshevik troops, helped by Red Latvian Riflemen, captured Riga. Ulmanis and his government left for Liepāja, from where they controlled only a small area, but thanks to desertions of the Latvian Riflemen, the concentration of Estonian troops in the north, and German volunteers in the middle of Latvia, they survived. At the beginning of February 1919 General Rüdiger von Goltz came to Liepāja to take over command of a German corps. He prevented recruitments to the Latvian Army and wanted to make Latvia a stepping stone for his plans to restore the German empire, which would include the Baltic area. The Germans established a puppet government with Andrievs Niedra at the head, but their attempt to topple Ulmanis failed since he found refuge on a Latvian vessel under British protection. The Latvian Army, supported by the Estonians and the Entente, managed to recapture Riga on 23 May 1919. On 8 July the Ulmanis government returned to Riga and took diplomatic steps aimed at the international recognition of Latvia. During a battle with the White Russian army of Pavel Bermond-Avalov in October 1919, Ulmanis was lightly wounded. At the end of November 1919 the German attack was forced back, and soon the whole of Latvian territory was under the control of the Ulmanis government. On 11 August 1920 Ulmanis concluded a treaty of non-aggression with Soviet Russia that recognized Latvian independence. In May 1920 the Latvian Constituent Assembly was convened; on 1 June it passed a provisional constitution, and on 22 December 1919, a land reform that strengthened the social foundations of the new state. Ulmanis remained prime minister until 18 June 1921.

In subsequent parliaments Ulmanis was the leader of the second largest faction of the LAU and frequently held ministerial posts. From 24 December 1925 to 6 May 1926

he was prime minister; from May to December 1926 he was foreign minister; and from 27 March to 5 December 1931 he was prime minister again. Ulmanis blocked changes in the electoral system, which caused strong fragmentation in the parliament. Later some thought that Ulmanis had already considered taking dictatorial powers. On 17 March 1934 Ulmanis became prime minister again, striving to combat an economic depression and the threat of a coup by the extreme right. On 15 May 1934, with the help of a relatively numerous LAU paramilitary organization, Ulmanis introduced a state of emergency, arrested leaders of the left and extreme right, and dissolved the parliament and all political parties, including the LAU. He then ruled with the help of a “national unity” government, based on politicians from the LAU and other parties, the bureaucracy, and the military. On 11 June 1936 Ulmanis also took over the duties of the president. He never changed the constitution, which he had promised to do. The economic and political system was based on corporations or “chambers.” The State Economic Council was created, composed of four economic chambers (industry and trade, handicrafts, agriculture, and labor), while the State Cultural Council included two chambers (literature and arts and the free professions). As dictator, Ulmanis developed a personal cult around himself. He thought that the peasantry was the principal stratum of society, and he identified it with the national interest. He was an advocate of agrarianism and saw medium-size family farms as the driving force of the national economy. Among other works, Ulmanis published Sabēdriskē raksti un runas (Writings and public speeches; 1935); Runas un raksti 1899–1918 (Speeches and writings 1899–1918; 1939); and Dzīves filozofija (Philosophy of life; 1940).

After the signing of a forced agreement with the USSR in October 1939, when Ulmanis had to accept the introduction of Soviet military bases and twenty thousand Red Army soldiers, Ulmanis stayed in power. On 15 June 1940 the Kremlin sent another ultimatum, which Ulmanis also accepted. This did not prevent a full-scale Soviet invasion the next day. Apart from Red Army units, a special Soviet envoy, Andrey Vyshinsky, came to Riga to supervise the takeover of power. Ulmanis became a hostage of the invaders and agreed to legislative changes allowing for new elections. On 19 June he was forced to step down, and a new government was formed by Augusts Kirhenšteins. Ulmanis intended to leave for Switzerland, which the Soviets promised him he could do, but on 22 July he was forced to take a train to Moscow, from where he was transferred to a special NKVD-controlled apartment in Voroshilovsk (now Stavropol). On 4 July 1941 Ulmanis was arrested and, owing to the approaching front, he was soon moved to Ordzhonikidze, Baku, and then to Krasnovodsk in Turkmenistan, where he died in prison. He was buried in a common grave, and his body was never identified. Ulmanis’s Klausaities vestures solos (Listening to the footsteps of history; 1968) and Redzu jaunu dzīenu nakam (New prospects for the future; 1992) were published posthumously. (EJ/WR)

ULUOTS Jūri (13 January 1890, Kirbla–9 January 1945, Stockholm), Estonian lawyer and politician. After high school Uluots studied law at the University of St. Petersburg, graduating in 1915. Later he continued his studies in Rome and practiced as a judge in Haapsalu (1918–19). In 1919 Uluots was elected to the Estonian Constituent Assembly and then to the parliaments of subsequent terms on behalf of the Farmers’ Union (Pöllumeestekogude) of Konstantin Päts. At the same time he lectured in Roman law at the University of Tartu. In 1925 Uluots became an associate professor and in 1927 a full professor at this university. In 1924–31 and 1942–44 he was dean of the Department of Law and from 1931 to 1934 deputy rector of this university. During the constitutional crisis Uluots was elected head of the parliamentary commission for the amendment of the constitution. He presented the results of the commission’s work on 18 March 1932, but they proved disappointing to the Union of Veterans of the War of Independence (Eesti Vabadussõjalaste Liit [EVL]), which strove for a totalitarian political system. After the fall of the Karl Eenpalu government in October 1932, Uluots failed to create another cabinet. After the coup and introduction of a state of emergency by Päts in March 1934, Uluots was moderately critical of these steps, so he was seen as a candidate for opposition leader. But in February 1935 he agreed to head the Fatherland League (Isamaaliit), a new pro-government party created after the dissolution of all previous parties. He also became one of the key ideologues of the new authoritarian system.

At the end of September 1939, when the Kremlin sent an ultimatum to Tallinn demanding the introduction of Soviet bases in Estonia, as well as extraterritorial roads and a change of government, Uluots became a member of the Estonian delegation negotiating in Moscow. On 28 September 1939 the Estonian government agreed to the Kremlin's conditions, and on 12 October 1939 Uluots became the new prime minister. He tried to widen the political foundation of his cabinet, but only Ants Piip of the Center Party agreed to head the Foreign Ministry. Uluots attempted to attract the fractured EVL, but he failed. His government tried at all costs to avoid further Soviet demands and closed its eyes to the use of Soviet bases in Estonia for air raids against Finland (November 1939–March 1940). In the face of the Soviet invasion of mid-June 1940 Uluots resigned and avoided arrest and deportation.

After the German invasion of the USSR in June 1941, a local Estonian administration emerged spontaneously. At the beginning of July 1941 Uluots convened a political council in Tartu consisting of politicians who had avoided Soviet deportation, but no formal government was announced. On 29 July he sent a memorandum to the German authorities suggesting the creation of an Estonian government and army to cooperate with the Germans against the Soviet Union. Instead, on 21 December 1941 the Germans established a Land Administration Office (Landerverwaltung; Omaavalitsus) headed by an EVL member, Hjalmar Mäe. The Germans offered Uluots the presidency of this office, but in view of its limited powers, he refused. On 1 February 1944 Mäe called all Estonians born between 1904 and 1923 to arms against the approaching Red Army. Uluots supported this appeal in a special radio speech, counting on the delay of German capitulation until the Western powers defeat the Third Reich on the western front. These calculations failed. By September 1944 all of Estonian territory was in Soviet hands again. At the end of the German occupation Uluots, as the last prime minister of independent Estonia and thus the legal substitute for the absent President Päts, appointed Otto Tief as prime minister. In view of the Soviet takeover, Uluots left for Sweden, where he soon died. Uluots authored (among other works) the following: Eestima õiguse ajalugu (History of law in Estonia, 2 vols.; 1930); Grundzüge der Agrargeschichte Estlands (Outline of the agrarian history of Estonia; 1935); and Die Verträge der Esten mit den Fremden im XIII Jahrhundert (Estonian agreements with foreigners in the thirteenth century; 1938). UNDER Marie (27 March 1883, Tallinn–25 March 1980, Stockholm), Estonian writer. The daughter of a German teacher, in 1891–1900 Under studied in a private German school where she mastered German, French, and Russian. Apart from those languages, she was fluent in Estonian and Finnish. Under wrote her first poems in German at the age of thirteen. Forced to make her living early, she worked as a bookseller. At seventeen she met the writer Eduard Vilde, who drew her into the radical group of Konstanin Päts and his newspaper, Teataja, and she worked on its editorial staff. In 1902 Under married a bookkeeper, Karl Hacker, a Germanized Estonian, with whom she had two daughters. Then for four years she lived in Kuchino, near Moscow.

Under's talent developed slowly. Ants Laikmaa, an Estonian painter with whom she had a love affair, convinced her to write in Estonian. From 1906 she maintained a literary salon in Tallinn. A new love affair with the poet Artur Adson became another incentive to write. Under's divorce proceedings with Hacker dragged on for years, providing reasons for spicy gossip. In 1924 Under married Adson. In 1917 she published her first volume, Sonetid (Sonets), and the following year another, Eelõitseng (Early maturing), which included mostly love poetry influenced by Impressionism. Estonian independence also influenced her views and style. Brought up in the German tradition in the center of the so-called Siuru Group, Under began to promote Expressionism and Futurism. In 1920 she published a collection of translations from contemporary German poetry and then two volumes of her own in which she adopted new German patterns: Verivalla (Bloodletting; 1921) and Pärisosa (Legacy; 1923). This change in style corresponded with Under's assault on bourgeois values in a widely publicized volume, Sinine Puri (Blue sail; 1918), where, apart from a criticism of social relations, she developed erotic poetry. In the course of time Under's writing showed a growing disillusionment with life and human nature, and she drew attention to the conflict between the individual and society, as well as between good and evil. In the volume Õnnevarjutus (Ellipse of happiness; 1929), Under used folk motifs, which greatly influenced poets making their debuts in the 1930s.

In 1922 Under was among the co-founders of the Association of Estonian Writers; from 1932 she was an honorary member of the Estonian Literary Society, and in 1937 she was accepted into the PEN Club in London. She survived the first Soviet occupation (1940–41), and after the German invasion she published a volume, Jõulutervitus (New Year's greetings; 1941), in which she praised the heroism of the Estonians. In view of a second Soviet occupation, Under decided to emigrate to Sweden, where she worked as an archivist in the Theater Museum in Stockholm. In 1954 Under published Sädemed tuhas (Sparks in ashes), and in 1963, Ääremail (Borderland), in which she dealt with uprooting and homelessness in a universal sense. Fluent in six languages, Under was among the key translators of world literature into Estonian. For instance, she translated works by Friedrich Schiller, Johann Wolfgang Goethe, Boris Pasternak, and Pär Lagerkvist. Under spent her last years in a hospital. Totally banned in Soviet Estonia, after 1955 some of Under's works were published there, and in 1963 the authorities of the Estonian SSR even sent her birthday greetings. (AG)

URBAN Jerzy (3 August 1933, Łódź), Polish journalist and editor. Born into a journalist's family, after World War II Urban studied at Warsaw University but did not graduate. During his studies he belonged to the Stalinist Polish Youth Association (Związek Młodzieży Polskiej). In 1955–57 Urban contributed to the weekly Po prostu, criticizing social pathologies. From 1961 he worked for the weekly Polityka but was fired for his independent views in 1963. Thanks to good contacts with party leaders responsible for the press, Urban got a job on the weekly Życie Gospodarcze and published in popular papers such as Kulisy and Ekspres Wieczorny under the pseudonym "Jerzy Kibic." His articles were stylized as ironic court coverage and presented social relations in a critical light. In 1980 Urban spoke decidedly against Solidarity. Thanks to the support of Deputy Prime Minister Mieczysław Rakowski, in August 1981 Urban became a government spokesman. His role on the team of General Wojciech Jaruzelski was more important than his formal position, since he became a key adviser and the co-author of many of Jaruzelski's pronouncements. As an unscrupulous and cynical propagandist, at his press conferences of the 1980s Urban was as clever as he was deceitful in slandering leaders of the democratic opposition and the Catholic Church. In a series of aggressive articles published under the pseudonym "Jan Rem" in the weekly Tu i Teraz in 1984, Urban contributed to the hostile campaign that preceded the murder of Reverend Jerzy Popiełuszko by three officers of the security service (Służba Bezpieczeństwa [SB]). In 1987–88 Urban co-authored special analyses, submitted to Jaruzelski, in which he presented a strategy of retreat from communism without the Communists' giving up power. From April 1989 he was head of the Committee for Radio and Television and minister without portfolio. In the elections of June 1989 he lost.

After leaving the government in August 1989, Urban published a couple of scandalous best sellers. Taking advantage of the freedom of the press, in 1990 he founded the weekly Nie, in which he addressed those affected by "transformation neurosis," using extremely vulgar language and disregarding all values. Urban gained fame and fortune taunting the public with visions of a denominational state ruled by the Catholic clergy. He aggressively attacked post-Solidarity governments, contributing to the electoral success of the post-Communist Democratic Left Alliance (Sojusz Lewicy Demokratycznej [SLD]) in September 1993. Attempts to curb the abusive style and lies of Nie were usually fruitless. For instance, in 1996 court proceedings concluded that Urban's disclosure of state secrets could not justify depriving him of the right to practice journalism. Although he lost some trials, Urban won (for example) a case against Ryszard Bender, who had called him the "Goebbels of martial law." Nie became the foundation of Urban's personal wealth. Urban belongs to the business elite, supplementing profits from Nie with revenues from the pornographic industry, in which he has become a magnate. In 1990 Urban joined the post-Communist Social Democracy of the Polish Republic and (in 1999) the SLD, but his contacts with the party leadership have cooled since 2001, when he began to criticize the post-Communist government of Leszek Miller. Urban's testimony before a special parliamentary commission to investigate a corruption case against Lew Rywin in March 2003 threw new light on the functioning of the post-Communist oligarchy. (AG)

URBÁNEK Karel (22 March 1941, Bojkovice, near Uherské Hradiště), Czech Communist activist. In 1962–69 Urbánek worked as a train dispatcher, and in 1970–72 he was head of the Bojkovice railway station. From 1973 he was active in the South Moravian district committee of the Communist Party of Czechoslovakia (CPC) in Brno. In 1982 he became secretary and in 1984 first secretary of the CPC town committee in Brno. In 1986 he became a member of the CPC Central Committee. From 1988 to 1989 Urbánek was a member of CPC CC Presidium and chairman of a special committee for party work. After the first week of the Velvet Revolution, on 24 November

1989, he became CPC secretary general, replacing Miloš Jakeš. Because of the fall of the Communist regime, he held this position only until 21 December 1989. Until the first free elections of June 1990 Urbánek was chairman of the CPC Central Control Commission, but after the elections he left the public scene entirely. (PU)

URBŠYS Juozas (29 February 1896, Šateikiai, near Kėdainiai–2 May 1991, Kaunas), Lithuanian officer, diplomat, and politician. During World War I Urbšys worked in the Central Lithuanian Relief Committee in Moscow (1915–16). In 1917 he graduated from a Russian military school, and he served in the tsarist army. After his return to Lithuania in 1918, Urbšys volunteered for the Lithuanian Army and took part in the war of independence as an officer of the general staff. He ended his military career as a captain in 1922, and he started to work in the diplomatic service. Urbšys was sent to Berlin (1922–27) and Paris (1927–33). Simultaneously he published a major work on the incorporation of the Vilnius (Wilno) region into Poland, Medžiaga Vilniaus ginčo diplomatinei istorjai (Materials in the history of the diplomatic conflict on the Vilnius issue; 1932). In 1933–34 Urbšys headed the diplomatic mission to Riga and worked in the Foreign Ministry, first as head of the Political Department (1934–36), then as secretary general (1936–38), and finally, from December 1938, as minister of foreign affairs.

As the head of diplomacy, Urbšys struggled with problems beyond the powers of Lithuania, while increasing pressure from mighty neighbors was putting an end to independence. On 22 February 1939 Urbšys had to sign an agreement with the Third Reich ceding the Klaipėda region to it. Despite desperate attempts, Urbšys could not prevent the Soviet occupation and incorporation of Lithuania into the USSR. Under Soviet pressure, in agreement with President Antanas Smetona, Urbšys made the decision to annex the Vilnius region, offered by the Soviets after their invasion of Poland, in exchange for consent to the entry of Soviet garrisons into Lithuania (agreement of 10 October 1939). Expecting a Soviet invasion, on 30 May 1940, Urbšys instructed Lithuanian diplomatic missions abroad that in such a case the envoy to Italy, Stasys Lazoraitis, would be responsible for Lithuanian foreign policy. On 14 June 1940 Urbšys was called to Moscow to discuss another Soviet ultimatum. Although he failed to prevent the Soviet invasion the next day, he stubbornly defended the Lithuanian standpoint. Therefore, on 16 June he was arrested and deported with his family deep into

Russia. Urbšys lived there for sixteen years. In 1956 he was allowed to return to Vilnius, where until his death he worked as a translator of French literature. Among other works, he translated those of Gustave Flaubert, Molière, and Romain Rolland. In 1988 the publication of Urbšys's memoirs on the tragic years 1939–40 became a political sensation. At the end of Soviet rule Urbšys became a symbol of the continuity of Lithuanian aspirations for independence and a remainder of the violence of which Lithuania was a victim. (AG)

URSÍNY Ján (11 October 1896, Rakša, near Martin, Slovakia–8 January 1972, Slovakia), Slovak Peasant Party politician. After graduating from a farm school in Šlapanice in Moravia, Ursíny returned to farm in his native village. He was also active in agricultural organizations. Between 1935 and 1938 he sat in parliament as a representative of the Slovak Democratic Party (SDP). In September 1938 he signed an agreement in Zlín by which many SDP activists joined the party of Reverend Andrej Hlinka. Under the rule of Reverend Josef Tiso, Ursíny moved to the opposition, along with the group of Josef Lettrich. Between 1939 and 1942 Ursíny was held prisoner by the Germans. After his release he established contacts with the left and the Communists, and he joined the conspiratorial Slovak National Council, which was preparing an uprising against the Germans in the summer of 1944. After the collapse of the uprising, Ursíny was a member of a delegation that in October 1944 reached an agreement with the government of Edvard Beneš on the composition of a coalition government. After his return to Slovakia via Moscow, Ursíny worked in this government's delegation for the affairs of the territories occupied by the Red Army and in the Presidium of the Board of Commissioners, which served as the provisional Slovak government. In March 1945 Ursíny assumed the post of deputy prime minister in the governments of Zdeněk Fierlinger and Klement Gottwald. In the elections of May 1946 Ursíny entered parliament, and his party won the elections in Slovakia, becoming the fourth largest parliamentary faction. During preparations to take over full power at the end of September 1947, the Communist-dominated security organs arrested Ursíny's secretary, Otto Obuch, who was accused of organizing an “anti-state plot,” which implicated Ursíny. On 30 October 1947 Ursíny resigned his post, and after the Communist coup of February 1948 he was arrested. In April 1948 he was sentenced to seven years’ imprisonment on the basis of false evidence. Released in 1953, Ursíny returned to his farm work, and from then on he did not play any political role. URSU Gheorghe (1 July 1926, Soroca, Bessarabia–17 November 1985, Bucharest), Romanian dissident, victim of communism. During World War II, along with his family, Ursu moved to Galați, where he graduated from high school in 1945. In July 1944 he joined a Communist youth organization. In 1950 he graduated from the Bucharest Polytechnic College. In 1943–85 Ursu kept a diary in which he not only registered events, but also recorded his comments, increasingly critical of the tyrannical Communist regime. Ursu worked in the Institute of Construction Design in Bucharest. In the 1970s he kept sending letters to the organ of the Romanian Communist Party, Scînteia, and the periodical Contemporanul; these letters stigmatized official anti-Semitism, demagoguery, and abuse of power. In 1977 two of these letters were broadcast by Radio Free Europe (RFE). In January 1985 the security police, Securitate, searched Ursu’s apartment and confiscated his diary and other materials. In August 1985 Ursu was severely criticized at a special gathering of his institute; on 21 September he was arrested, accused of having founded a “reactionary” organization, collaboration with the RFE, and illegal possession of U.S.$16. Among those who defended him abroad were U.S. congressmen. After almost two months of brutal interrogation Ursu was murdered in Calea Rahovei Prison. The case received extensive coverage in the Western media. Ursu’s Europa mea (My Europe; 1991) was published posthumously. (WR)

UZUNOVIĆ Nikola (3 May 1873, Niš–20 September 1954, Belgrade), Serb politician. Born into a merchant’s family, Uzunović graduated in law from Belgrade University. Then he worked as a judge, mayor of his hometown of Niš, and governor of southern Serbia. In 1905 he was elected an MP on behalf of the Serbian Radical Party (SRP), and he belonged to its leadership. When the Kingdom of Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes came into being in 1918, Uzunović was one of the Serb leaders that advocated the centralist option. The parliamentary crisis of the kingdom and the growth of importance of the SRP helped Uzunović’s career. From March 1921 to April 1926 he was minister of land reform, then minister of public works, post, and telegraph. From 8 April 1926 to 17 April 1927 Uzunović was prime minister. At the same time he headed a centrist faction of the SRP closely associated with King Alexander I. After the royal coup of January 1929 and the proclamation of a dictatorship, Uzunović was minister without portfolio in the government of General Petar Živković (January 1929–January 1932). When the king granted a new constitution, introducing the appearance of parliamentary rule, in September 1931 Uzunović became head of one of the government parties, the Yugoslav Radical Peasant Democracy, which became the Yugoslav National Party (Jugoslovenska Nacionalna Stranka [YNP]) in 1933. Uzunović was close to the royal court but still in the shadow of General Živković. After the latter’s resignation, from 17 January to 22 December 1934 Uzunović was prime minister again. The assassination of King Alexander (October 1934) and a relatively moderate policy introduced by Prince Paul Karadjordjević and the new prime minister, Milan Stojadinović, deprived Uzunović and the YNP leadership of influence on Yugoslav politics. VACAROIU Nicolae (24 October 1943, Tighina, Bessarabia [now Moldova]), Romanian politician. In 1964 Vacaroiu graduated from the Academy of Economic Studies in Bucharest. From 1986 to 1989 he served as deputy chairman of the State Planning Commission. A close associate of Ion Iliescu, Vacaroiu was active in the post-Communist National Salvation Front, representing a conservative approach to market reforms and reluctance toward rapprochement with the West. On 13 November 1992 Vacaroiu became the prime minister of a government based on a coalition of the Democratic National Salvation Front (Frontul Democrat al Salvării Naționale), the Romanian National Unity Party, the nationalist Great Romania Party (Partidul România Mare [PRM]), and the Socialist Party of Labor. His government pursued a policy of deterring transformations and rapprochement with Vladimír Mečiar's Slovakia and Slobodan Milošević's new Yugoslavia. At the end of 1992 Vacaroiu came into conflict with the Transylvanian Hungarians, who sought autonomy, but at the beginning of 1993 he managed to get the situation under control. In February 1993 Romania signed an association agreement with the European Union (EU), but the government made little effort to accelerate accession negotiations with the EU. In 1993 demonstrations by the Jiu Valley coal miners almost brought about the collapse of Vacaroiu's government. Despite his conservative views, under Vacaroiu's rule the Bank of Romania limited the issue of the lei and in April 1994 freed its exchange rate. The structural transformations proved too weak to put Romania on the road to development. As a result of growing economic stagnation and social discontent, the post-Communists lost the elections of November 1996. Consequently, Vacaroiu resigned on 12 December 1996. In the new parliament, he became deputy speaker of the Senate, representing the post-Communist opposition. After the electoral success of the post-Communist Party of Social Democracy in Romania (Partidul Democrației Sociale din România [PDSR]), Vacaroiu became speaker of the Senate and vice-chairman of the PDSR on 20 December 2000. VĀCIETIS Jukums (23 November 1873, Lutriņi, Courland–28 July 1938, USSR), Soviet military man of Latvian descent. Vācietis graduated from high school in Kuldīga in 1891, from the Military Academy in Vilna (Wilno, Vilnius) in 1895, and from the Academy of the General Staff in Petersburg in 1909. He served as an infantry officer. At the beginning of World War I Vācietis was wounded, and in 1915 he became commander of the Zemgale Latvian Riflemen's battalion (as of 1916, a regiment), which fought on the Latvian front in 1915–17. From 1916 Vācietis was a colonel, decorated with the Golden Sword of St. George for bravery. After the Bolshevik revolution, in November 1917 soldiers elected Vācietis commander of the Second Latvian Riflemen's Brigade. In December 1917 he was made corps commander, temporarily of the Twelfth Army, and later he was head of the operations department of the Revolutionary General Staff. In January and February 1918 Vācietis led the disarmament of the Polish First Corps of General Józef Dowbór-Muśnicki. In April 1918 he was appointed commander of the Latvian Riflemen's Division and led a bloody suppression of a rebellion of Social Revolutionaries in Moscow. Then he was appointed commander-in-chief of the Eastern Front. From September 1918 to July 1919 Vācietis was commander-in-chief of the armed forces of the Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic, and from January to March 1919 he was commander-in-chief of the Latvian Soviet Army. After a conflict with the top Bolshevik command, in July 1919 Vācietis was dismissed and temporarily arrested. The Bolshevik authorities did not agree to his return to Latvia, where he had sent his family. From 1922 Vācietis was a senior lecturer, professor, and head of the Department of Military History at the Military Academy of the Red Army in Moscow. He authored (among other works) Latviešu strēlnieku vēsturiskā nozīme (The historical importance of the Latvian Riflemen, 2 vols.; 1922–24), arguing that Red Latvian riflemen had fought for Latvian independence against monarchists. Vācietis was murdered during the Great Purge. (EJ)

VACULÍK Ludvík (23 July 1926, Brumov, Zlin district), Czech writer and journalist. In 1941–46 Vaculík worked in the Bata shoe factory in Zlin and Zruči-nad-Sázavou. At the same time he studied at a trade high school. In 1950 he graduated in journalism from the Higher Political and Social School in Prague. In 1948–51 Vaculík worked as a tutor in boarding schools. From 1953 to 1957 he was an editor for Rudé Právo Press, and in 1959–65 he edited radio broadcasts for youngsters. From the mid-1960s Vaculík was increasingly outspoken in criticizing Communist cultural policies, publishing a lot in the periodicals Literární listy and Literární noviny, whose editor he was from 1965. Vaculík became widely known for a critical speech at the Fourth Congress of Czechoslovak Writers in June 1957, in which he said that for twenty years no social problems had been solved in Czechoslovakia, and for the manifesto “Dva tisíce slov” (Two thousand words), published in June 1968 in Literární listy. Vaculík was the co-author of the manifesto; in it the Communist totalitarian system was critically analyzed. The authorities pronounced the manifesto counter-revolutionary, and Vaculík was banned from publishing. During the so-called normalization, Vaculík was one of the leading representatives of the democratic opposition, and he published in the uncensored press and abroad. In 1973 he became director of the Petlice underground press, which had published about four hundred books by 1989. In 1977 Vaculík was one of the first signatories of Charter 77. After the Velvet Revolution of 1989, he returned to journalism, mainly to Lidové noviny, where he critically assessed contemporary issues. He was, for instance, the first to touch upon the taboo subject of the split of Czechoslovakia.

As a writer, Vaculík made his debut in 1963 with the novel Rušný dům (A living house), in which, based on his experiences as a tutor in boarding schools, he described the moral decline among youngsters and the hypocrisy of the Communist system. His next novel, Sekyra (The axe), brought him even wider renown. In it he critically analyzed real socialism. In the novels Morčata (The Guinea pigs; 1977) and Český snař (Czech dreambook; 1983), Vaculík introduced an atmosphere of the absurd. In the latter, he ironically presented the Czech intelligentsia under totalitarianism. The book was based on the author’s memories of 1971–80, when he was constantly under the surveillance of the security services. Vaculík’s memories of childhood and his student years were included in Milí spolužáci (My dear school friends; 1995), while those of 1969–72 were in Nepaměti (A non-memoir; 1998). Vaculík also published a collection of essays, Jaro je tady (Spring is here; 1987); Srpnový rok (The August year; 1990); and Stará dáma se baví (The old lady has fun; 1991). (PU)

VAGNORIUS Gediminas (10 June 1957, Plungė), Lithuanian politician. In 1980 Vagnorius graduated as an engineer-economist from the Vilnius Engineering Construction Institute (now the Vilnius Gediminas Technical University [VGTU]). From 1980 to 1987 he worked as a teacher at the VGTU. Elected a member of the broad leadership of the Lithuanian Movement for Restructuring (Sąjūdis) in 1988, Vagnorius was a close associate of its leader, Vytautas Landsbergis. In March 1990 Vagnorius became a member of the Presidium of the Lithuanian Supreme Council. After Soviet special forces occupied the Lithuanian television broadcast center in Vilnius and Prime Minister Kazimiera Prunskiene was forced to resign, Vagnorius became head of the government on 13 January 1991. His situation was very difficult. Attacked by Prunskiene, who accused his government of being unconstitutional, and criticized by the extreme nationalists, Vagnorius was in charge of the difficult task of making the Lithuanian economy independent from Russia, dismantling the system of kolkhozes (collective farms), and replacing the ruble by the Lithuanian currency. Although the reforms he implemented were partially successful, a sudden decrease in the standard of living in Lithuania led to a drop in popularity of Sąjūdis and of Vagnorius himself. Moreover, the failure of a project to print new litas banknotes—for which the government had awarded a contract to an irresponsible American firm—led to a conflict between Vagnorius and the Bank of Lithuania. Vagnorius resigned on 22 July 1992, and his party lost the elections of October 1992 and went over to the opposition. However, Vagnorius won a seat. In 1992–96 he was one of the leaders of the Homeland Union–Conservatives of Lithuania (Tėvynės Sąjunga–Lietuvos Konservatoriai [TS–LK]), the largest opposition party in parliament. On 28 November 1996, after the TS–LK won the new parliamentary elections, Vagnorius became head of a government formed in coalition with the Christian Democrats. As long as Algirdas Brazauskas served as president, Vagnorius had to make compromises, as their views often clashed. Vagnorius’s cooperation with the next president, Valdas Adamkus, was much easier. In November 1997 Vagnorius’s government rejected the offer of Russian unilateral guarantees for Lithuania’s independence and emphasized Lithuania’s aspirations to join NATO. Vagnorius served as prime minister until 3 May 1999. In the elections of 2000 he won a seat on the ticket of the moderate Conservatives. (WR)

VÄHI Tiit (10 January 1947, Kaagjärve), Estonian politician and businessman. Vähi graduated in mechanical engineering from the Technical University of Tallinn (1970). Employed at a transport base in Valga (1972), he rose to become its director (1976–89). A member of the Communist Party of Estonia (CPE), Vähi served as minister of transport of the Estonian SSR in the government of Indrek Toome in 1989 and then in the government of Edgar Savisaar from 1990 to 1992. Vähi sought cooperation with the Nordic countries. He was also successful in transferring control of Estonia's transportation to authorities within the republic and making them independent from the central administration in Moscow. Having realized that the role of the CPE was coming to an end, Vähi resigned his party membership in 1989 and was one of the founders of the Estonian Coalition Party (Eesti Koorderakond [ECP]) in December 1991. The ECP—founded after a split in the post-Communist Free Estonia (Vaba Eesti) group—represented the industrial management apparatus, which, in the new circumstances, wanted to introduce a free market economy.

After the collapse of Savisaar's government on 30 January 1992, Vähi became prime minister of a government that was composed of members of Free Estonia and the ECP but was also supported by the anti-Communist camp. The new ruling team was seen as a barrier against Savisaar, who was being accused of dictatorial leanings. Vähi's government was an interim one, meant to remain in power until the first free parliamentary elections were called in October 1992. Vähi unsuccessfully strove for the withdrawal of the Russian Army from Estonia. Fearing the Russian factor, he did not insist on the return of the Estonian SSR's KGB archives, which had been removed to Moscow. He also did not launch lustration and favored close economic cooperation with Russia and a strong position for Russia in Estonia's economy. However, Vähi replaced the Russian ruble with the Estonian kroon, curbed galloping inflation, and founded a privatization agency. Vähi resigned on 21 October 1992. He did not run in the parliamentary elections of October 1992, as he chose the prestigious post of mayor of Tallinn (1993–95), which gave him control over nearly one-third of Estonia's population and the biggest foreign investment center. Although he did not sit in parliament, Vähi took over the leadership of the ECP in 1993.

As a result of social discontent caused by "shock therapy" and numerous scandals with which the center-right wing was entangled, Vähi and his electoral bloc (the ECP and the People's Union) won the 1995 parliamentary elections, and on 17 April 1995 Vähi again became prime minister. After his election, economic transformations slowed down because Vähi was in favor of maintaining large subsidies, particularly for agriculture, and expanding welfare policies. His cabinet was based on a coalition with the Center Party, led by Savisaar, but when in October 1995 it was revealed that Savisaar, while serving as minister of interior, had bugged other politicians, this coalition broke up. Vähi changed partners by inviting the liberal Reform Party, led by Siim Kallas, to join the government. However, program differences between the partners and then the presidential elections led to the breakup of this coalition as well. In December 1996 Vähi formed a minority government, which he headed only until 17 March 1997, when he was forced to resign as the result of a corruption scandal: the media revealed that as mayor of Tallinn, Vähi had allotted flats to his acquaintances and family members, bypassing legal procedures. Vähi resigned as leader of the ECP and as MP. In 1998 he became one of the directors of the metal-producing Silmet Group. (AG)

VAIDA-VOEVOD Alexandru (27 February 1873, Alparét [now Bobâlna], Transylvania–25 May 1950, Bucharest), Romanian politician. After graduating from high school in Kronstadt, Vaida-Voevod studied medicine at the university in Vienna. He completed his studies in 1894. While still a student, he joined the Romanian national movement; in 1896 in Vienna, at a meeting of members of this movement, he for the first time publicly accused Hungary of violating the rights of the Romanian population in Transylvania. In the same year Vaida-Voevod became a member of the Romanian National Party (Partidul Național Român [RNP]) in Transylvania. An MP (1906–7) in the Hungarian parliament on the RNP ticket, Vaida-Voevod strove for the implementation of agricultural reform, the introduction of universal suffrage, and the right of women to study at universities, but above all he protested the forced Magyarization of schools in Transylvania. Because of his activities, in 1907 he was expelled from parliament, but in 1910 he was reelected as an MP. From 1914 to 1918, the Hungarian authorities forced Vaida-Voevod into exile in Vienna and Switzerland. At that time he leaned toward the concept of restructuring Austria-Hungary in a federalist spirit; this notion was supplemented by a Daco-Romanian idea of uniting all Romanian lands under Habsburg rule, which would de facto mean the end of the Old Kingdom of Romania. In this spirit Vaida-Voevod worked with the Slovak politician Milan Hodža and Archduke Francis Ferdinand. The defeat of the Central Powers and the collapse of Austria-Hungary determined the fate of the other Romanian territories. The Romanian National Central Council, established in Transylvania in October 1918, pursued a policy of faits accomplis. On 18 October 1918 in the Hungarian parliament Vaida-Voevod announced the separation of Transylvanian Romanians from Hungary. Vaida-Voevod was also a member of the National Assembly in Alba Iulia, which voted for the unification of Transylvania and Banat with the Old Kingdom of Romania (1 December 1918).

From 1918 to 1920 Vaida-Voevod was a member of the Transylvanian Governing Council, led by Iuliu Maniu; in 1919 the council passed decrees on agricultural reform and the Romanization of the University of Kolozsvár (Cluj). Vaida-Voevod served as head of the department of foreign affairs in this council. From December 1918 to December 1919 he also held the post of minister for Transylvanian affairs. From 9 December 1919 to 19 March 1920 Vaida-Voevod was premier and foreign minister. He also was a member of the Romanian delegation to the Paris Peace Conference (1919). As prime minister, Vaida-Voevod signed the peace treaty with Austria at Saint-Germain-en-Laye (10 December 1919). From 1919 to 1920 he served as speaker of the Chamber of Deputies of the Romanian parliament.

Vaida-Voevod was a member of the Transylvanian National Romanian Party until 1926, when he helped to found the united National Peasant Party (Partidul Național țărănesc [NPP]). In 1933 he briefly served as chairman of the NPP. He also held the posts of minister of interior (November 1928–October 1930), minister of foreign affairs (June–October 1932), and minister of trade and industry (June–November 1933). As an NPP nominee, Vaida-Voevod twice held the post of prime minister: from 6 July to 20 October 1932 and from 14 January to 14 November 1933. In 1935, however, Vaida-Voevod severed his ties with the NPP and drifted toward a position close to the nationalist right wing. From 12 May 1935 to 10 February 1938 he headed the Romanian Front, an organization with a nationalist and anti-Semitic tinge but little political influence. A supporter of the coup staged by Charles II (10 February 1938), Vaida-Voevod became an adviser to the king and minister of state in the National Unity government led by Patriarch Miron Cristea. Vaida-Voevod again held the post of minister of state in early June and late July 1940, during a crisis brought about by a Soviet ultimatum demanding the cession of Bessarabia. After Charles II abdicated, Vaida-Voevod retired from politics. Vaida-Voevod's publications include Chestia Banatului (The question of Banat; 1924); Problema frontierilor românești (The problems of Romanian borders; 1926); and Memorii (Memoirs, 3 vols.; 1993–95). (FA/TD)

VAINO Karl (1923, Tomsk, Russia), Estonian Communist activist. Born and brought up in the Soviet Union, Vaino was almost totally Russified despite his Estonian descent. He initially used the name Kiril Voinov. He did not live in Estonia until 1947, when he went there on Moscow's orders, with other Communist activists, to assume key positions in the Estonian SSR, replacing local Communists who had lost the trust of Stalin. Despite many years spent in Estonia after the war, Vaino learned very little Estonian. A particularly servile activist, he was quickly promoted. He became a member of the Central Committee (CC) of the Communist Party of Estonia (CPE) in 1948 and a member of the Politburo in 1954. In 1960 he was promoted to the position of CC secretary for industry and held this position for the next eighteen years. In 1978, owing to the intensification of the Russification policy in all the territories of the Soviet Union, Moscow dismissed Johannes Käbin as head of the CPE and assigned the task of Russifying the Estonian SSR to Vaino. This appointment met with opposition within the party because Käbin wanted Vaino Väjljas to succeed him. After coming to power, Vaino expelled the more moderate leaders from the party. At that time he became a member of the CC of the CPSU, and he held that post until 1989.

As early as December 1978 the Politburo of the CC of the CPE passed a secret resolution "on the further improvement of the teaching of and access to the Russian language," as a result of which the Russification policy intensified. Russian was officially recognized as the language of "international communication," and according to party guidelines, only a "bilingual" person was trustworthy. Russian became compulsory as early as kindergarten, and in 1980 the number of hours taught in Russian at universities and colleges was increased. In response to protests against the appointment of Elsa Grechkina to the position of minister of education in the autumn of 1980—the protests broke out among students and intellectuals (the famous "Letter of 40," signed by Jaan Kaplinski, Marju Lauristin, and others)—Vaino launched repressive measures, including expulsions from the university, printing bans, and the like. However, mass public support and publicity on the issue in the world media forced the party to stop its offensive. After the system of food distribution in the Estonian SSR was made part of the Soviet Union-wide system of food supply, the standard of living in the Estonian SSR deteriorated. The crisis also affected industry. During Vaino's regime relations between Estonians and immigrants, who increasingly flooded into Estonia, worsened. The state of the natural environment also deteriorated. In 1979 Imre Arakas tried to assassinate Vaino.

The beginning of perestroika did not herald changes in Estonia. Vaino regarded the program launched by Mikhail Gorbachev as harmful and believed that it would cause opposition from CPSU dogmatists, who would expel Gorbachev, and Moscow's policy would then fall back into the same old rut. Initially, Moscow did not intend to introduce any changes in Estonia. In 1986, after information leaked to the public about plans to construct new phosphorite mines that might cause an ecological catastrophe, an open public rebellion broke out; as a result, after a series of protests in the spring of 1987, the government had to abandon these plans. The issue became a turning point in the history of the democratic opposition in Estonia, giving an impetus to the institutionalization of anti-Communist activities, which intensified in the second half of 1987 and the beginning of 1988. The brutal suppression of student demonstrations in Tartu acted as a catalyst for the activities of the opposition, which put forward demands for Vaino's dismissal. These demands gained mass support in the first half of 1988. Meanwhile, in the Politburo and the CPE CC a fierce struggle was going on between supporters and opponents of the reforms. Vaino consistently refused to meet the demands of the opposition. Finally Moscow forced his dismissal, fearing that the actions of the Popular Front might spontaneously turn into political activities over which the party might lose control or that they might even turn into a grassroots revolution. In June 1988 Vaino tried to manipulate the election of delegates to a CPSU conference. When the Popular Front called a demonstration in defense of free elections, he allegedly asked for military assistance. On 16 June 1988, the day before the demonstration, Vaino was dismissed from his position, with Gorbachev's consent, and he went to Moscow. (AG)

VAITOIANU Artur (14 April 1864, Ismail, Bessarabia–1956, Bucharest), Romanian general and politician. In 1886 Vaitoianu graduated from the Military Academy in Bucharest, where he lectured from 1897. By 1915 he had been promoted to general. During World War I Vaitoianu commanded an army corps during the battles of Giurgiu, Oltenița, and Râmnicu Sărat in 1916. Closely connected with the National Liberal Party (NLP) of Ion I.C. Brațianu, from 1916 Vaitoianu served on various political missions. From 1917 he was Romanian representative in Bessarabia, and after it was proclaimed a part of the Old Kingdom in April 1918, he was its representative to the Romanian government. The minister of interior from October to late November 1918, Vaitoianu was then minister of military affairs until September 1919. In this capacity he took part in the Paris Peace Conference and organized the Romanian occupation of Hungary (August–September 1919). From 27 September 1919 Vaitoianu was prime minister and minister of interior; despite Entente orders, he was reluctant to withdraw troops from the territory that was to be incorporated into Hungary. Vaitoianu resigned on 1 December 1919, and his successor, Alexandru Vaida-Voevod, gave in to pressure from the Entente. From January 1922 to October 1923 Vaitoianu was again minister of interior, and then, until March 1926, minister of transportation. In the 1930s he sided with the dissidents from the NLP led by Gheorghe Brațianu. From February to late March 1938 Vaitoianu was minister of state without portfolio in the so-called government of national unity, which actually initiated the royal dictatorship of King Charles II. In 1938–40 Vaitoianu was a member of the Crown Council, called by the king. After World War II he was arrested by the Communists and sentenced to long-term imprisonment in 1950. Vaitoianu died soon after his release. His brother, Alexandru Vaitoianu (1866–1939), was also a general. (FA/WR)

VAIVODS Julijans (18 August 1895, Vārkava, Latgale–24 May 1990, Riga), Latvian cardinal. After graduating from high school in Preiļi, in 1913–18 Vaivods studied at a Catholic theological seminary in St. Petersburg (Petrograd). Ordained in April 1918, in view of the closing of the Theological Academy by the Bolsheviks, Vaivods gave up further studies and returned to Latvia. In 1918–25 he worked as a vicar and school chaplain in Aglona, Rēzekne, and Daugavpils. From 1925 he was parish priest in Ciecere, Saldus, Vaiņode, Alsunga, Dviete, and Ventspils in Courland. In July 1938 Vaivods was appointed parish priest and chancellor of the newly created diocese in Liepāja, and in April 1940 he was appointed vicar general of the Liepāja bishopric. In 1938–40 he studied at the Department of Catholic Theology at the University of Latvia in Riga. Vaivods avoided arrest during the Soviet occupation of 1940–41. During the German occupation he was dean of the Courland decanate.

After Bishop Antons Urbšis left for Germany, from October 1944 to July 1947 Vaivods performed the duties of the bishop of Liepāja and then returned to the position of vicar general. In January 1958 he was arrested for dissemination of “anti-Soviet” publications and sentenced to two years of labor camp in Mordovia. In 1960 Vaivods came back to Latvia, but since the authorities did not agree to his return to Liepāja, he worked as a parish priest in Vainode. In 1961–62 he was parish priest of St. James Cathedral in Riga and then vicar general of the Riga metropolis. On 18 November 1964 in Polish Częstochowa Vaivods was consecrated bishop and appointed apostolic administrator of the Riga archbishopric and the Liepāja bishopric. In 1965 Pope Paul VI appointed him a member of the commission of canon law, and on 2 February 1983 Pope John Paul II appointed him a cardinal. Vaivods became the first cardinal on the territory of the Soviet Union. He was buried in the Aglona basilica. His works—Krīstīgās baznīcas vēsture senajā Livonijā (History of the Catholic Church in Old Livonia; 1994) and Baznīcas vēsture Kurzemē XIX un XX gadsimtos (History of the Catholic Church in Courland in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries; 1994)—were published only posthumously. VALENTIĆ Nikica (24 November 1950, Gospić, Croatia), Croatian politician. Valentić studied law at the University of Zagreb. He was the editor-in-chief of the periodical Pravnik, and from 1978 to 1983 he served as director of housing cooperatives. He subsequently worked as an attorney (1983–90) and the director of the INA petrochemical works (1990–93). A member of the Croatian Democratic Union (Hrvatska Demokratska Zajednica [HDZ]), Valentić was promoted to the post of its deputy chairman. After the 1992 elections, he became a member of parliament. On 29 March 1993 Valentić assumed the post of prime minister, replacing Hrvoje Šarinić. Under his government, Croatia’s economic situation significantly improved. After an anti-inflation package was introduced in October 1993, inflation—which in 1993 had soared to 1,600 percent—dropped to 95 percent in 1994 and about 4 percent in 1995. In May 1994 a new currency was introduced, the kuna. It was the name of the currency used at the time of the independent state of Croatia during World War II. In 1994 a decline in national income was halted, and as a result of the reform of the tax system, the budget was balanced. Exports increased; as a result, Croatia’s trade balance was positive. In 1994 also the Privatization Ministry was established. Valentić resigned as prime minister on 4 November 1995. In 1996 he became involved in private business, but he retained his membership in the HDZ. Before the elections to the lower chamber of parliament on 3 January 2000, the HDZ proposed him as its candidate for prime minister. After its electoral failure, the HDZ went over to the opposition. Following a split within the HDZ, Valentić has been a supporter of the Croatian Democratic Center (Hrvatski Demokratski Centar [HDC]) since April 2000. (AO)

VALEŠ Václav (7 April 1922, Smečno, Kladno district), Czech economist and political activist. Valeš graduated from a school of commerce in Slaný (1941) and from the School of Chemical Technology in Pardubice (1966). During World War II he was active in the resistance movement and was imprisoned by the Germans in the concentration camp in Terezín from 1941 to 1942. After the war, Valeš worked for ten years in the chemical plants in Záluží, near Most, and was promoted to deputy director. In 1956 he became deputy minister of the chemical industry, and from 1965 to 1968 he served as minister of the chemical industry department. From April to December 1968 Valeš was minister of foreign trade. From January to September 1969 he served as deputy prime minister and head of the Economic Council of the Czechoslovak government. A firm supporter of reforms, Valeš helped to prepare economic transformations. In the fall of 1969 he was dismissed from his governmental position, and one year later he was expelled from the Communist Party of Czechoslovakia. For ten years Valeš worked as a researcher in Prague. Arrested on trumped-up charges in 1980, he was held in prison until 1982. After his release from prison, Valeš retired. He returned to public life after the victory of the Velvet Revolution. From January to April 1990 he was an adviser to the prime minister, and subsequently he served as deputy prime minister of Czechoslovakia, chairman of the Economic Council, and vice-president of the State Defense Council until September 1991. After lustration accusations were made against him, Valeš resigned and then retired from public life. (PU)

VÄLJAS Vaino (28 March 1931, Kulakula, Hiiumaa), Estonian Communist activist. The son of a fisherman, Väljas graduated in history from Tartu University in 1955. He began his party career in 1949, becoming head of the Propaganda and Agitation Department of the Central Committee (CC) of the Communist Party of Estonia (CPE) on his native island of Hiiumaa. While a student, Väljas was secretary of the Komsomol at the university (1951–52) and in Tartu (1953–55) and then served as first secretary of the CC of the Estonian Komsomol (1955–61). In 1952 he also joined the CPSU. He became a deputy member of the Politburo of the CC of the CPE in 1956, first secretary of the Tallinn city committee of the CPE in 1961, and a member of the Politburo of the CC of the CPE in 1964. In 1971 Väljas joined the top-ranking leadership of the party, becoming the CC secretary for ideology. In 1973 he earned a Ph.D. in history. Owing to his rapid career rise, in the mid-1970s Väljas began to be considered as a potential candidate to succeed Johannes Käbin, the head of the party. Väljas, who enjoyed the support of Käbin, was not acceptable to Moscow, however. The Kremlin leaders believed that Väljas would not be an efficient executor of the Russification policy in Estonia, and in 1978 the post of secretary general of the CPE was given to the completely Russified dogmatist Karl Vaino. With Vaino's team coming to power Väljas's career collapsed. In 1980 he was removed from the CPE leadership and sent into political exile, becoming the ambassador of the Soviet Union to Venezuela (1980–86) and Nicaragua (1986–88).

The policy pursued by Vaino led to the deterioration of the situation in Estonia. Because Vaino opposed perestroika, the government in Moscow decided to introduce personnel changes in the CPE leadership. On 16 June 1988 Väljas became the first secretary of the party CC. One of his first decisions was to support the Popular Front's efforts for equal rights for Estonia within the framework of a planned new treaty with the Soviet Union. Väljas played a key role in the drafting of the Sovereignty Declaration of 16 November 1988. Under his rule the CPE shook off the dominance of the CPSU and consequently regained the trust of nearly one-third of the people of Estonia. Perceiving a threat from the opponents of the reforms, the Estonians regarded Väljas as the defender of the interests of the Estonian SSR. However, the guidelines that in 1988 might have been seen as radical and on which his program was based proved too cautious in the following year for the increasingly bold anti-Communist opposition. As a result, CPE structures began to disintegrate beginning in December 1989. Väljas tried to keep up with the changes, evolving toward national communism and greater independence from the CPSU, but these efforts did not prevent mass resignations from the party in 1989–91; these led to the marginalization of his role. Finally, in 1991 Väljas changed the name of the remnants of the CPE to the Estonian Democratic Labor Party (Eesti Demokraatlik Tööpartei), but the party was of minor importance and failed to win even 2 percent of the vote in the elections of 1995 and 1999. VALOSHYN Pavel (10 July 1891, Harkawicze, near Sokółka [now in Poland]–3 November 1937, Leningrad?), Belorussian social and political activist. Valoshyn finished six grades of a science-oriented high school. From 1908 to 1912 he worked as a telephone operator at the post office in Krynki (now in Poland). In 1912 he began serving in the Russian Army. During World War I he was taken prisoner by the Germans. At the end of 1917, searching for his family, Valoshyn went to Yekaterinoslav (Dnipropetrovsk, Ukraine), where he briefly worked as a policeman. During the Civil War in Russia Valoshyn first served in the White Russian Army, led by General Anton Denikin, and later he became a soldier in the Red Army. After the war, Valoshyn worked on the railways for one year, and in 1922 he returned to Harkawicze. He completed a Polish-language course and got a job as a telecommunications installer. Valoshyn soon joined the Belorussian Social Democratic Party, and in 1923 he became an MP in the Polish Assembly and a member of the Belorussian parliamentary representation, in which he was one of the most radical MPs. He demanded that the colonization of the Belorussian-populated territories be stopped and that the authorities approve the use of Belorussian as the language of instruction in the schools. Taking advantage of his parliamentary immunity, Valoshyn organized rallies during Orthodox Church fairs and at local markets. In 1925 he co-founded the Belorussian Peasants' and Workers' Hromada, and then he became a member of its Central Committee and represented it in the Assembly. Valoshyn organized the Hromada's district meetings in the region of Białystok, but they were usually dispersed by the police. A member of the Communist Party of Western Belorussia from December 1926 onwards, Valoshyn was arrested in February 1927, along with other Hromada leaders. In February 1927 he was sentenced to twelve years' imprisonment.

In 1932, as part of an exchange of political prisoners, Valoshyn was handed over to the Soviet authorities. For one year he was used in agitation work: he talked about the harsh situation of the working class in Poland. He later worked as deputy director of the Belorussian State Library in Minsk. In 1933 Valoshyn was arrested for being a member of a non-existent organization, the Belorussian National Center, which, according to the NKVD, was scheming to overthrow the Soviet government. In 1934 Valoshyn was sentenced to ten years in a forced labor camp on the Solovets Islands. In October 1937 he was tried again, and the court of the Leningrad NKVD sentenced him to death for spying for Poland. Valoshyn was subsequently executed by a firing squad. (EM)

VALTERS Miķelis (7 May 1874, Liepaya [Libau, Liepāja]–27 March 1968, France), Latvian diplomat and politician. Born into a working-class family, Valters finished school in Liepaya. Early on he became involved in the patriotic and literary movement known as the New Current. Arrested in 1897, he was held in prison for fifteen months. Fearing he might be exiled far inside Russia, Valters fled to Switzerland in 1899. He studied at the University of Bern and then received a law degree from the University of Zurich. In 1905 Valters returned to Latvia. During the 1905 revolution he was the leading activist of the Union of Latvian Social Democrats and was the first to put forward a program of struggle for independence, which was contrary to the position of the influential Social Democratic Workers' Party of Latvia. Valters believed that Latvia should fight against Russia and hoped for the disintegration of Russia. After the failure of the 1905 revolution, Valters was forced to emigrate to Finland and then to Germany, Switzerland, and England. From 1909 to 1910 he studied at the Sorbonne. In 1914 he published the theoretical treatise Mūsu tautības jautājums (The question of our nationality). In May 1917 Valters returned to Latvia and was one of the founders and theorists of the newly established Peasant Union. From November 1918 to August 1919 Valters served as minister of home affairs in the first government of Kārlis Ulmanis. On 16 April 1919, during the German coup, Valters was briefly detained in Liepāja. Valters was an envoy to Italy (1920–24) and France (1924–25), consul general in Königsberg, Germany (now Kaliningrad, Russia) (1925–34), and envoy to Poland (1934–37) and Belgium (1937–40). After the German Army invaded Belgium, Valters moved to Switzerland and then to France, where he lived until the end of his life. Valters's publications include Letland (Latvia; 1923), Baltengedanken und Baltenpolitik (1926), Das Verbrechen gegen die baltischen Staaten (1962), and collections of poems and memoirs. (EJ)

VANAGS Jānis (25 May 1958, Liepāja), archbishop of the Evangelical Lutheran Church of Latvia (ELCL). Vanags passed his high school final examinations in Liepāja. He subsequently graduated from the Department of Chemistry of the Latvian State University in 1982 and from a seminary in 1985. In 1982–85 Vanags worked as a chemistry teacher at a high school in Riga. Ordained a pastor in 1985, he served in St. John Lutheran Church in Saldus until 1993. Because under Soviet rule the Latvians had become largely atheistic, at the time of the revival of Latvian statehood Vanags actively helped to strengthen moral and religious values, particularly among the youth, by founding the Latvian Christian Movement for Rebirth and Renewal. In 1993 he was elected archbishop of the ELCL. An adviser to the Ministry of Justice and the founder of the Lutheran Academy in Riga, Vanags has received prestigious national awards, and in 1997 he was awarded an honorary doctorate by Concordia University, Fort Wayne, in the United States. Vanags actively opposes the ordination of women into the Lutheran Church. (EJ)

VAPTSAROV Nikola (24 November 1909, Bansko–23 July 1943, Sofia), Bulgarian poet and Communist activist of Macedonian descent. Vaptsarov studied at the Varna Polytechnic College, and from 1933 he worked as an engineer, specializing in shipbuilding. In 1934 he joined the illegal Bulgarian Communist Party. He was also a co-founder of the Macedonian Literary Circle in Sofia (1938). In 1941 Vaptsarov was active in the military section of the BCP, responsible for sabotage, in which he took part. Arrested in March 1942, he was sentenced to death and executed. Postwar Bulgarian Communist authorities launched a cult of Vaptsarov as an activist and revolutionary poet, and his collection Motorni pesni (Motor songs; 1940), close to the style of Vladimir Mayakovski, was presented as a model of "proletarian" literature. Vaptsarov was also widely published in other Soviet bloc countries. (WR)

VARES Johannes, pen name “Barbarus” (12 January 1890, Heimtali–29 November 1946, Tallinn), Estonian poet and politician. In 1917 Vares graduated from the Medical School of Kiev University. At that time he was a member of the Siuru poetry group (named after a mythical bird). From 1920 to 1939 he worked as a doctor in Pärnu and then in Tallinn. He also wrote poems and published successive volumes of poetry. In 1918 Vares published the first volume, Fata Morgana, followed by Inimene ja sfinks (Man and the Sphinx; 1919) and Katastroofid (1920; Disasters; 1920). Sensuous poems gradually gave way to more philosophical and allegorical poems, as seen in the collections Geomeetiline inimene (Geometric man; 1924); Multiplitseerit inimene (Multiplied man; 1927); Tulipunkt (Focus; 1934); Memento (1936); and Üle läve (Over the threshold; 1939). His poetry reflected his philosophy of pessimism.

In his circles Vares was known for his leftist views, but he was not involved in overt political activities. After the Red Army invaded Estonia in mid-June 1940, the special envoy of the Kremlin, Andrey Zhdanov, demanded that President Konstantin Päts appointed Vares as prime minister. After some delay and a display of military might by the Soviets, Päts yielded to this demand, and on 22 June 1940 Vares became the head of government. The composition of his cabinet, including the appointment of history professor Hans Kruus as deputy prime minister, was decided by Zhdanov. Vares reportedly initially strove to attain a status for Estonia similar to that of Mongolia—that is, that of an external satellite. However, he then yielded to the Soviets without major qualms and on 22 July 1940 put forward a motion that Estonia be incorporated into the Soviet Union. After the Estonian SSR was established in August 1940, Vares became chairman of its Supreme Soviet. His government conducted purges in the state and local government administrations and disbanded most social organizations and political parties, except for the Communist Party of Estonia. Vares endorsed three waves of deportations of Estonians far into the Soviet Union, during which thousands of Estonians lost their lives. After German troops occupied Estonia in June and July 1941, Vares went to the Soviet Union. In 1944 he published his last collection of propaganda poems, Rindeteedel (Way to the front). At the beginning of 1945 Vares returned to

Estonia and resumed the post of chairman of the Supreme Soviet of the Estonian SSR. He also served as a member of the Politburo of the Central Committee of the Estonian party. In November 1946 Vares allegedly committed suicide, but there are suspicions that his death was staged by the Soviet security services. (WR)

VARGA Béla (18 February 1903, Börcs–13 October 1995, Budapest), Hungarian priest and politician. Varga was born into a peasant family. As a student of a Benedictine gymnasium in Győr, in 1921 he joined insurgents who wanted to capture the town of Sopron, which was initially granted to Austria under a peace treaty. The action took place before a referendum that decided in favor of Hungary and, as a result, Sopron and its surrounding area went to Hungary. In 1921 Varga participated in Charles IV Habsburg’s attempt to return to the Hungarian throne. After graduating from high school in 1922, Varga completed studies in the Roman Catholic Theological College in Veszprém, and in 1926 he was ordained. Varga served as curate in Somlóvásárhely and in Várpalota, and from 1929 he was a presbyter in Balatonboglár. He was friends with a well-known politician and landowner, Gaston Gaál, who was head of a local organization of the Independent Smallholders’ Party (ISP). In 1931 Varga joined the ISP; from 1937 he was its deputy president, and in 1943 he served as president of its civic platform. In 1939 Varga entered parliament, where he voted against the new anti-Jewish law. The same year he was elected to a committee that was appointed by the Episcopate and aimed at supporting Catholics of Jewish origin.

After the German attack against Poland in 1939, at the request of Prime Minister Pál Teleki, Varga very actively participated in relief efforts for Polish refugees, maintaining contacts with Edmund Fietowicz, a representative of the Polish government to Hungary. In Balatonboglár, Varga established a Polish gymnasium, at that time the largest Polish secondary school in Europe; in it around eight hundred students had passed final examinations (matura) by 1944. He also helped French and Jewish refugees. Risking his life, Varga helped Polish couriers who went from Poland to London via Hungary. Varga was the first in Hungary to publish the results of an International Red Cross committee investigation that proved that the Katyń Forrest Massacre had been committed by NKVD units.

Varga rescued the son of future Polish prime minister Stanisław Mikołajczyk from the Gestapo. In 1943 Varga signed an ISP anti-war memorandum addressed to Prime Minister Miklós Kállay, and he also took part in a famous anti-war meeting in Balatonszárszó. Varga supported a parliamentary alliance with the Social Democrats. After the seizure of Hungary by Germany in March 1944, Varga went into hiding at a monastery in the countryside and later in Budapest. At the beginning of 1945 he was arrested by the Soviet authorities, and he accidentally escaped execution at the hands of the NKVD.

From February 1945 Varga was president of the ISP in Budapest, and from August he was deputy president of the party and a member of its Political Bureau. From April 1945 he was a deputy to the Provisional National Assembly. In the parliamentary elections of November 1945 Varga defeated the head of the Communist Party, Mátyás Rákosi, in his constituency. From February 1946 Varga was president of the National Assembly. After Ferenc Nagy was forced to resign as prime minister in May 1947, on 1 June Varga went to the West, fearing arrest by the Communists. The same month he was deprived of his Hungarian citizenship. He settled in New York and became a clergyman for the Congregation of Sisters of God's Love, which consisted mainly of Hungarian nuns. In 1949 Varga formed the Hungarian National Committee and became its president. In 1955 he was appointed a prelate of the Pope. Varga co-created the Hungarian section of Radio Free Europe. Within the framework of the Green International he worked closely with Mikołajczyk, and he received a high decoration from the Polish government-in-exile. During the uprising of 1956 Varga warned the Security Council of the UN about the Soviet invasion, but the Western powers did not recognize his right to represent Hungary. From 1960 Varga headed the Hungarian Committee in exile, which also included some leaders of the uprising. In May 1990, trying to emphasize the continuity of Hungarian democratic traditions, Varga took part in the inaugural session of the Hungarian parliament, elected in free elections. In 1991 he returned to Hungary. His house became a place of pilgrimage for Poles. Varga published Genocide by Deportation (1951). (JT)

VARNAVA [originally Petar Rosić] (29 August 1880, Pljevlja, Montenegro–24 July 1937, Belgrade), Patriarch of Serbia. The son of an agricultural laborer, after finishing primary school in Pljevlja, Varnava studied at a teacher training college and at a seminary in Prizren until 1898–99. In 1900 he received a scholarship funded by the Russian Orthodox Church, and from 1900 to 1905 he studied at the St. Petersburg Theological Academy, where, among other things, he attended lectures by the writer and philosopher Dmitry Merezhkovsky. In 1905 Varnava joined a religious order. In the same year he was named hierodeacon and then hieromonach. From 1905 to 1910 he worked as a clergyman in Istanbul, where he taught at a local Serbian school and contributed to the local newspaper, Carigradski glasnik. During a visit by the king of Serbia, Peter I Karadjordjević, to Patriarch Joachim III, Varnava was elevated to bishop and appointed head of the newly created eparchy of Debar-Veles, with its seat in Kičevo. Varnava's successes in establishing the Serbian Church conflicted with the interests of the Bulgarian exarchate. In 1917 he again went to Russia to seek support for a struggling Serbia and to conduct propaganda efforts. During the February 1917 revolution Varnava was in Petrograd. In November 1920 he was granted the bishopric of Skopje, which was under the jurisdiction of the patriarchate in Belgrade. His work played a great role in the revival of spiritual life in Macedonia.

Varnava's elevation to the patriarch of Serbia on 12 April 1930 occurred under complicated circumstances. A conflict with the Yugoslav government over the ratification of a concordat with the Vatican, which Varnava firmly opposed, ended in the 1937 excommunication of Prime Minister Milan Stojadinović and all the deputies to the Skupština (parliament) who had voted for the adoption of the concordat. This conflict further escalated when the prime minister expelled all opponents of the concordat from the ruling party and Varnava suddenly died. The public suspected that his death had been arranged by government agents, who were even suspected of poisoning Varnava. Under the circumstances Stojadinović abandoned plans to resume the debate on the matter; consequently, the status of the Catholic Church in Yugoslavia remained unregulated. Under Varnava's patriarchate a modern school of theology was established in Belgrade, and new rules for the spiritual and intellectual formation of clergymen were introduced. Religious and theological journalism flourished. Varnava introduced innovative methods of pastoral work, such as parish missions and the military ordinariate. He improved relations with other Orthodox Churches, particularly those in Romania and Bulgaria (the 1934 Declaration of Rila and the 1936 Declaration of Ohrid). He also supported the Russian Orthodox Church in exile, which settled in Sremski Karlovci, Yugoslavia, and continued its work there. Negotiations with the Slo-venes were successful, so the Orthodox community could return to Ljubljana. Under Varnava's patriarchate many new churches were built, and an icon-painting school was found in Rakovica. (AG)

VARONKA Yazep (17 April 1891, Sokółka County–4 June 1952, Chicago), Belorussian political activist and journalist. From 1909 to 1914 Varonka studied at the university in St. Petersburg. At the beginning of 1917 he joined the Belorussian Socialist Hromada, and from June 1917 he was a member of its Central Committee. He simultaneously headed the Belorussian Relief Committee for War Victims. At a meeting of the Great Belorussian Council, which was created from the Central Council of the Belorussian Parties and Organizations, in October 1917 Varonka pressed for autonomy for Belorussia. He co-initiated the First All-Belorussian Congress in December 1917 and was president of the Executive Committee (EC) of the Council of the Congress and head of the council's Foreign Department. Between February and July 1918 Varonka chaired the People's Secretariat of Belorussia, which was appointed by the EC, and he co-initiated the proclamation of the Belorussian People's Republic in March 1918. Varonka was editor-in-chief of the newspaper Belarускаia ziarnla and the periodical Varta. From the end of 1918 he oriented himself toward the Lithuanian Taryba (Council), seeing it as an ally in the struggle for Belorussian statehood. Varonka considered Poland and Russia as opponents of Belorussia's independence. From December 1918 to October 1920 Varonka was minister for Belorussian affairs in the government of Lithuania. He was also leader of the Belorussian Party of Socialists-Federalists. From November 1922 he served as president of the Belorussian Hromada in Kaunas. Varonka was the author of Belorusskii vopros k momentu Versalskoi mirnoi konferentsii: Istor-politicheski ocherk (The Belorussian question at the Versailles Conference: Historical and political outline; 1919) and Bialoruski rukh ad 1917 da 1920 hodu: Karotki ahlad (The Belorussian movement between 1917 and 1920: A short review; 1920). Varonka also wrote many historical and political essays, in which he described the development of the Belorussian national movement during World War I, as well as during the Bolshevik revolution, and he analyzed the current political situation. In 1923 Varonka left for the United States and settled in Chicago. In the United States, he was one of the founders of the Belorussian movement in exile and headed the Belorussian-American Association. (AS/SA)

VAS Zoltán (30 March 1903, Budapest–13 August 1983, Budapest), Hungarian Communist activist. While a gymnasium student, Vas joined the Communist Party. In 1919, under the Hungarian Soviet Republic, he was a party agitator. Arrested in 1921, he was subsequently handed over to Soviet Russia as part of an exchange of prisoners of war. Vas returned to Hungary in 1924, becoming secretary of an illegal Communist youth union. Arrested one year later, he was sentenced to sixteen years' imprisonment, but in 1940 he was exchanged (along with Mátyás Rákosi) for Hungarian flags taken by the Russian Army during the Springtime of Nations. He then went to the Soviet Union. Vas came back to Hungary in 1944 as one of the founders and leaders of the new political system. In 1945 he served as commissar for supplies for Budapest, and he became mayor of Budapest. From 1946 to 1949 Vas was secretary of the Supreme Economic Council. He then held the post of president of the State Planning Office (until 1953). From 1945 to 1956 he was a member of the Central Committee (CC) of the Hungarian Communist Party (HCP) and later a member of the Hungarian Workers' Party (HWP). From 1948 to 1953 he was a deputy member and then a full member of the HWP CC Politburo.

After the death of Stalin in 1953, Vas was dismissed from his prominent party and governmental positions and was appointed director of a group of coal mining enterprises based in Komló. In 1954 he returned to Budapest to become head of the secretariat of the Council of Ministers, and then he took the post of deputy minister of trade. During the 1956 revolution, Vas was one of the closest associates of Imre Nagy, responsible for supplies in Nagy's government. After Soviet troops occupied Budapest, Vas took refuge in the Yugoslav Embassy. Given guarantees of personal safety, he left the embassy building, but the Soviet Union reneged on the guarantees, and in December 1956 Vas and other members of Nagy's group were deported to Romania, where they were interned. Unlike the others, though, Vas was not brought to trial and was not convicted. In August 1958 he returned to Hungary, where he was forced to retire. He then devoted himself to writing historical works and memoirs. Vas published two volumes of memoirs: Viszontagságos életem (My stormy life; 1979) and Akkori önmagamról (About myself at that time; 1982). A third volume, which included an interesting account of the struggle for power in the Communist ranks after World War II, was not allowed to be published. It was published in fragments from the end of the 1980s onwards and caused quite a sensation, increasing the democratic and pro-independence tendencies among Hungarians. It was published as Betiltott könyveim (My banned book) in 1990. (MS)

VÁSÁRHELYI Miklós (9 October 1917, Fiume [Rijeka]–31 July 2001, Budapest), Hungarian Communist activist, one of the leaders of the 1956 revolution. Born into a middle-class family, from 1936 to 1937 Vásárhelyi studied law at a university in Rome, where he became interested in Fascist ideas. From 1939 to 1942 he continued his law studies in Debrecen. In 1938 he joined the illegal Hungarian Communist Party (HCP). During World War II he was called into the labor service and worked at a munitions factory. In 1944 he joined the military resistance movement. In 1945 Vásárhelyi began working for Szabad Nép, the central press organ of the HCP. From 1951 he was an editor of the periodical Művelt Nép and the editor-in-chief of the periodical Hungary-Vengriya (1952–54); from May 1954 he was deputy head of the Information Office of the Council of Ministers. One of the closest associates of Prime Minister Imre Nagy, Vásárhelyi was dismissed from his position after Nagy was removed from office in April 1955. In May 1955 Vásárhelyi was given a party reprimand because he had demanded an explanation regarding Hungarian-Yugoslav relations and a review of the sentences passed in the trial of László Rajk. In October 1955 Vásárhelyi was a signatory of a memorandum presented to the Central Committee of the Hungarian Workers' Party (HWP) by writers protesting the tightening of party controls over culture. Because of this, he was expelled from the HWP in December 1955.

On 1 November 1956, during the revolution, Vásárhelyi became head of the press bureau of Nagy's government. On 23 November, along with other members of Nagy's group, he was interned in Romania. On 10 April 1957 Vásárhelyi was brought back to Hungary, and on 15 June 1958, in the trial of Nagy and his associates, he was sentenced to five years' imprisonment by the Supreme Court. Released in April 1960 under an amnesty, Vásárhelyi began working as a lecturer in 1961 and then as a supplies officer. From 1972 to 1990 he was a researcher at the Institute of Literary Studies of the Hungarian Academy of Sciences. He concentrated on the history of the press. In 1979 Vásárhelyi signed a declaration of the newly established Hungarian opposition expressing solidarity with the imprisoned members of Charter 77, a Czechoslovak human rights defense movement. From 1984 until the end of his life he served as a personal representative of George Soros in the Soros Foundation in Hungary. He was also president of this foundation. In 1985 Vásárhelyi co-organized the only meeting of all opposition movements in Monor. He was a founding member (1988) and president (until 1992) of the Committee for Historical Justice, which set itself the task of bringing about a ceremonial reburial of Nagy, his associates, and all victims of the 1956 revolution. On 16 June 1989 Vásárhelyi spoke at the solemn funeral for Nagy and his associates. From 1988 to 1989 he co-founded the liberal Alliance of Free Democrats (AFD), and in 1990 he became a member of its National Council. From 1990 to 1994 Vásárhelyi served as a member of parliament on the AFD ticket. (JT)

VASILE Radu (10 October 1942, Sibiu), Romanian politician. In 1967 Vasile graduated with a bachelor's degree from the Department of History of the University of Bucharest. From 1967 to 1969 he worked at the Village Museum in Bucharest, and from 1969 to 1972 he was a researcher at the Nicolae Iorga Institute of History of the Romanian Academy of Sciences. Vasile continued his career at the Bucharest Academy of Economic Studies. In 1993 he became a professor. A member of the Christian Democratic National Peasants' Party (Partidul Național Țărănesc Creștin Democrat [CDNPP]) since 1990, Vasile served as its spokesman for economic reforms, deputy chairman (1990–92), and secretary general (1996–98). In 1996 he became a senator and served as deputy speaker of the Senate from 1996 to 1998. From 1997 to 1998 Vasile represented the Romanian parliament in the Council of Europe. On 17 April 1998 he became prime minister. Under his government, economic stagnation in Romania continued, and the social crisis culminated in a protest march on Bucharest by the Jiu Valley coal miners (January 1999), with clashes with the police along the way. Because the opposition parties supported the miners' protest (known as the mineriada), President Emil Constantinescu and Vasile entered into negotiations with the miners, and Vasile signed a negotiated agreement with the miners' leader, Miron Cozma, at the Cozia Monastery. When the miners broke this agreement, the government used force. Cozma was arrested and sentenced to eighteen years' imprisonment, and the next mineriada was suppressed with repressive measures. Social unrest continued, and in March 1999 Vasile suffered a heart attack. Finally, on 17 December 1999 he resigned as a result of conflicts within the ruling coalition, formed by the PNȚCD and the Democratic Party, led by Petru Roman. In February 2000 Vasile went over to the Romanian National Party (Partidul Național Român). In the elections of November 2000 he won a senatorial seat on the ticket of the Democratic Party (Partidul Democrat). (AB)

VASILYEV Yordan (26 September 1935, Radomir), Bulgarian literary scholar, writer, and politician. Vasilyev is the son of a rich doctor persecuted by the Communist regime after World War II. In 1948 his family was forced to move to Troyan, where Vasilyev graduated from a gymnasium. He studied Bulgarian philology at Sofia University. Expelled in his fourth year for political reasons, he finally graduated in 1959. Vasilyev worked as a literary critic for the periodicals Septemvri (1966–67), Literaturna misul (1969–75), and Letopisy (1989–90). He was dismissed from work several times, among other reasons for contacts with Bulgarian activists of the inter-war period. These contacts shaped Vasilyev's independent attitude as a researcher and as a person. In 1967 he married the poet Blaga Dimitrova. Their shared literary interests subsequently led to opposition work. Dismissed from the editorial staff of the periodical Literaturna misul, Vasilyev found employment at the Institute of Literature of the Bulgarian Academy of Sciences (BAS), where he was a member of a team dealing with periodicals; as a result, he gained an encyclopedic knowledge of Bulgarian history, literature, and public life. Vasilyev earned a doctorate in 1988 and became an associate professor at the BAS in 1990. In November 1988 he co-founded the dissident Club for the Support of Glasnost and Perestroika. In the spring of 1989, along with Dimitrova, Vasilyev stood up in defense of the Bulgarian Turks, who were being forced to emigrate. Vasilyev was repeatedly arrested by the security services for statements he gave to the foreign media. At the end of 1989 he became active in the Union of Democratic Forces (UDF). He co-founded Demokratiia, the first independent newspaper, and served as its editor-in-chief from 1990 to 1991. In the 1990 elections to the National Assembly Vasilyev defeated General Dobri Dzhurov. In May 1991 he took part in a hunger strike in protest against the adoption of a new constitution. In the next parliament, Vasilyev served as chairman of a committee for national security, and in this capacity he visited NATO headquarters in Brussels in 1991. Vasilyev was chairman of the BAS General Assembly from 1991 to 1995 and a member of the BAS Executive Council from 1996 to 1998. Vasilyev's publications include books about Ivan Khadzhiiski (1988) and Khristo Radevski (1993) and the memoirs Patila i radosti (Miseries and joys; 2002). (WDj)

VASYLENKO Mykola (14 February 1866, Esman, Chernihiv region—3 October 1935, Kiev?), Ukrainian lawyer and politician. From 1885 to 1890 Vasylenko studied medicine, history, and philology at the university in Dorpat (Yuryev, Tartu). He subsequently taught at a gymnasium in Kiev, worked in the Russian Ministry of Interior (1902–5), and edited the periodical Kievskiy otkliki. In 1907 he was arrested for “disloyalty.” After his release, Vasylenko took up legal studies, which he completed in 1907 in Odessa. He worked as an attorney and was active in the Russian Constitutional Democratic Party. After the February 1917 revolution, Vasylenko briefly served as deputy minister of education in Petrograd. In January 1918 he became a member of the board of the Ukrainian Supreme Court. He then served as prime minister and minister of education in the government of Hetman Pavlo Skoropadskiy. In August 1918 he also became speaker of the senate. Vasylenko contributed to the foundation of Ukrainian state universities in Kiev and Kamenets-Podolsky (Kamyanets Podilskiy), the Ukrainian Academy of Sciences (UAS), and the National Library. After the overthrow of the hetman's government, Vasylenko retired from politics and devoted himself to science. After the Bolshevik government was established (1920), he was elected president of the UAS but was not approved by the Bolsheviks. He was allowed to head the UAS Socioeconomic Department. In 1924 Vasylenko was arrested and sentenced to ten years' imprisonment but was released under an amnesty. In 1929 he was dismissed from all his positions in the UAS. A ban was placed on the publication of his works, and then Vasylenko was arrested again. He probably perished in prison. Vasylenko edited Materialy dlia istorii ekonomicheskogo, iuridicheskogo i obshchestvennogo byta staroy Malorossii (Materials on the history of the economic, legal, and social life of Old Little Russia, 3 vols.; 1901–8); many volumes of source documents for the study of Ukrainian law during the time of the Republic of Poland; Ocherki po istorii Zapadnoy Rusi i Ukrainy (Studies in the history of Western Rus and Ukraine; 1916); and

VASYLKO Mykola (21 March 1868, Czernowitz, Austria-Hungary [Cernăuți, Chernivtsi]–2 August 1924, Bad Reichenhall, Germany), Ukrainian politician from Bukovina. A landowner and a descendant of Bukovinian nobles, Vasyenko studied at the Theresianum in Vienna. Later he served as mayor of Łukawiec, near Wyżnica (now Lukavets, near Vyzhnytsya), and later he was elected to the local Bukovinian diet. From 1898 to 1918 he was an MP in the parliament in Vienna and deputy chairman of the Ukrainian parliamentary representation. Vasyenko was granted the title of baron. He often defended the rights of the Ukrainians from Bukovina. Along with the leaders of Bukovinian Romanians, Jews, and Armenians, he extracted many concessions from the Austrian authorities. As a result of his efforts, an unpopular governor of the province was dismissed in 1903, and then a Ukrainian high school was founded in Vyzhnytsya. Vasyenko was one of the founders of the Hutsul Bukovinian Battalion, a volunteer unit that fought alongside the Austro-Hungarian Army from 1915 to 1916. He was one of the supporters of the so-called Austro-Ukrainian solution, hoping that if the Central Powers won the war, it would be possible to unite Eastern Galicia, Bukovina, Volhynia, and Podolia into an autonomous state within the Habsburg empire. After the outbreak of World War I, Vasyenko co-founded the General Ukrainian Council (Zahalna Ukraiinska Rada) in Lemberg (Lwów, Lviv) in August 1914. He also organized assistance to war refugees and the victims of military operations. He took part in the negotiations that led to the signature of the Treaty of Brest-Litovsk between Bolshevik Russia and the Central Powers (March 1918). He served as a representative of the Western Ukrainian National Republic in Austria (1918–19) and in Switzerland and Germany (1919–24). Vasyenko published Posolska diyatilnist v Derzhavnyi Radi i Kraievym Soymy v rokakh 1901–3 (Parliamentary work in the Council of State and the Provincial Parliament from 1901 to 1903; 1904). (WR)

VAZOV Ivan (27 June 1850, Sopot, Bulgaria–22 September 1921, Sofia), Bulgarian writer, poet, and political activist. Born into the family of a rich trader, Vazov studied in a school of commerce. He made his debut as a writer in 1870.

In the 1870s he became involved in the national liberation movement among the Bulgarian émigrés in Romania. He took part in the 1876 uprising. After the outbreak of the Russo-Turkish war in 1877, Vazov returned to Bulgaria with the Russian Army. After Bulgaria gained autonomy in 1878, he held various administrative positions in the Principality of Bulgaria and served as a deputy to the Provincial Assembly of Eastern Rumelia. When Stefan Stambolov assumed power in 1886, following the unification of Bulgaria with Eastern Rumelia, Vazov, a confirmed Russophile, thought it best to leave Bulgaria. He found refuge in Istanbul and then in Odessa, where he devoted himself to literary work. In 1889 he returned to Bulgaria and settled in Sofia. After Stambolov's fall in 1894, Vazov twice served as a deputy to the National Assembly (in 1894 and 1896). From 1897 to 1899 he served as minister of culture and education and then retired from public life but continued writing. The celebration of fifty years of his work as a writer in 1920 turned into a national demonstration.

Vazov was a prolific poet, short story writer, novelist, and playwright. He introduced the achievements of modern European style into Bulgarian literature, but his artistic design, requiring that literature be realistic and national in character, to some extent set him apart from the European modernists. Vazov's best novels and short stories deal with the Bulgarian nation's struggle for liberation from the Turkish yoke at the end of the nineteenth century and combine elements of realism with patriotic romanticism. Vazov's work was regarded as a continuation of the work of Khristo Botev. Vazov's most famous novel, the two-volume Pod igoto (1889–90; Under the Yoke, 1894), describes the 1876 uprising, and the novel Nemili—nedragi (Unloved and unwanted; 1881) portrays the life of Bulgarian émigrés. Vazov also published many other historical novels, including Kazalarskata Tsaritsa (The empress of Kazalar; 1903) and Ivan Aleksandur (Ivan Alexander; 1907); several poetry collections, including Izbavlenie (Salvation; 1878), Polia i gori (Fields and mountains; 1884); and Lulaka mi zamirisa (I smelled lilac; 1919); the drama Kum propast (Toward the abyss; 1910); as well as collections of stories. Vazov's writing has become part of the canon of twentieth-century Bulgarian literature. (WR)

ily of an agricultural laborer, Veimer became involved in revolutionary activities in his youth, and in 1922 he joined the Communist Party. After his participation in an attempted Communist coup d'état in Tallinn (December 1924), Veimer was sentenced to life imprisonment. Released under an amnesty in 1938, he again became involved in party activities. After the Soviet invasion in June 1940, Veimer began a meteoric career. After the "elections" of July 1940, he became a deputy to the People's Assembly, which was then transformed into the Supreme Council of the Estonian SSR. In August 1940 Veimer became the people's commissar of light industry, and at the beginning of 1941 he joined the Central Committee (CC) of the Communist Party (Bolshevik) of Estonia (CP[B]E). He also received a diploma from the Department of Economics of Tartu University. After the Germans occupied Estonia, Veimer was evacuated to the Soviet Union. In 1944, after Estonia was again occupied by Soviet troops, he returned to Tallinn. He became chairman of the Council of People's Commissars of the Estonian SSR, which was transformed into the Council of Ministers of the Estonian SSR in 1946. In March 1951, as part of a purge campaign, Veimer was replaced by Aleksei Müürisepp, who was totally Russified. Veimer became director of the Economics and Law Institute of the Academy of Sciences of the Estonian SSR. As a result of the Khrushchev's "thaw," Veimer was appointed chairman of the People's Economic Council of the Supreme Soviet of the Estonian SSR (1957–65) and then deputy prime minister of the republic (1955–68). He was also reinstated to membership in the CC of the Communist Party of Estonia (1958–76) and the Supreme Soviet of the Estonian SSR (1958–77). Throughout this time Veimer pursued an academic career, becoming a member of the Academy of Sciences of the Estonian SSR in 1967 and serving as its chairman from 1968 to 1973. However, he merely wrote clichéd papers on economic problems of the Estonian SSR. (AG)

VELCHEV Damian (20 February 1883, Gabrovo–25 January 1954, France), Bulgarian general and politician. In 1903 Velchev graduated from a military school in Sofia. He served in the Bulgarian Army during both Balkan Wars and in World War I. After the end of World War I Velchev was one of the leading organizers, in addition to Kimon Georgiev, of the secret Military League (1919), the secret nationalist Officers' League, and the political group called Zveno (Link), for which he was expelled from the army in February 1921. In June 1923 Velchev was one of the main organizers of the coup that overthrew the dictatorial rule of Aleksandur Stamboliyski. From 1923 he was deputy commander and from 1927 commander of the Military Academy in Sofia. In 1928 he was again expelled from the army because of his conflict with the war minister, General Ivan Vylkov. In 1929 Velchev initiated the reestablishment of the Military League, which had been dissolved after the coup. From 1928 he studied at Sofia University, and in 1932 he graduated in law. At the beginning of the 1930s Velchev was head of the League of Reserve Army Officers. He returned to active politics in 1933, and he played a key role in preparing and staging a military coup in May 1934. The coup overthrew the democratic government of Nikola Mushanov and established a military cabinet. Velchev refused to become prime minister, so the post was assumed by Georgiev. The government abolished all political parties, imposed censorship, and took action against the Internal Macedonian Revolutionary Organization (IMRO). As the result of a counteroffensive by royalist forces, the dictatorship of Tsar Boris III was established. In July 1935 Velchev left for Yugoslavia, where he directed activities against Tsar Boris. When in October 1935 Velchev attempted to return to the country, he was arrested at the border, tried, and on 22 February 1936 sentenced to death. His sentence was commuted to life imprisonment. In 1940 he was released under an amnesty.

During World War II Velchev began to associate with the Communists, deluding himself into believing that an agreement with the USSR would allow Bulgaria to become independent from Germany and to preserve its sovereignty at the same time. He supported the participation of the Zveno group in the Fatherland Front, formed in the summer of 1942 with the Communists, Peasant Party members from the group called Pladne, and the Socialist left. Velchev played a key role in organizing the Sofia coup of 9 September 1944. The coup toppled the government of Konstantin Muraviev. In the new cabinet, headed by Georgiev, Velchev became minister of defense. After some hesitation he condoned the bloody purge of the army command and accepted the subjection of the army to the control of Soviet political commissars; he also condoned sending Bulgarian soldiers to the front in Austria and Hungary. In May 1945 Velchev was promoted to colonel general (the highest general rank in Bulgaria). After the end of the war he appointed General Ivan Kinov, a Bulgarian with Soviet citizenship, as head of staff. Velchev also had to sanction another purge of around three thousand Bulgarian officers and to approve the replacement of those officers by two thousand Soviet officers. However, as the Bulgarian Communists steadily consolidated their position, from 1945 Velchev became their main target.

The Communists tortured his personal secretary to death, trying to extort testimony against Velchev from him. As Velchev opposed further army purges, which were conducted by the Communist security minister Anton Yugov, in September 1946 the Communists sent him to a diplomatic post in Switzerland. Fearing for his life, on 25 October 1947 Velchev refused to return to Bulgaria. As a result, he was deprived of his Bulgarian citizenship. He spent the rest of his life in exile in France. (JJ/WR)

VELYCHKOVSKYI Vasyl (1 June 1903, Stanisławów [now Ivano-Frankovsk, Ukraine]–30 June 1973, Canada), bishop of the underground Greek Catholic Church in the Ukraine. After graduating from a theological seminary in Lwów (Lviv), in 1925, Velychkovskyi took vows in the Redemptorist Order, and in October 1925 he was ordained a priest. Between 1929 and 1935 he worked in different parishes in Volhynia. Then he was hegumen (prior) of the Redemptorists in Stanisławów. During World War II Velychkovskyi worked in Kam'yanets Podilskyy and Ternopil (Tarnopol), where he also served as hegumen. Arrested by the MVD (Ministry for Internal Affairs) on 11 April 1945, he was interrogated in a Kiev prison for more than three years. Sentenced to death, Velychkovskyi awaited execution for over three months. His sentence was commuted to ten years of labor camp. From 1949 Velychkovskyi was held in in Kirov, Vorkuta, and other labor camps, where he conducted pastoral work among the prisoners. Released in 1955, Velychkovskyi returned to Lviv, where he continued his work in the underground Greek Catholic Church. Secretly designated a bishop in 1959, he was formally ordained by Metropolitan Josif Slipyi in 1963. During the Czechoslovak Prague Spring Velychkovskyi officially served as a Uniate bishop. Arrested again on 2 January 1969 and sentenced to three years' imprisonment in March 1970, he was held in prison in Kommunarisk in the Donbas. Released in 1972, he was forcibly displaced to his family in Yugoslavia. From Yugoslavia he went via Rome to Canada, where he worked among the Ukrainian émigrés until his death. On 27 June 2001 Pope John Paul II beatified Velychkovskyi at a solemn Holy Mass in Lviv. (WR)

VENCLOVA Tomaš (11 September 1937, Klaipeda [Memel]), Lithuanian poet. Venclova is the son of Antanas Venclova, a leftist writer who accepted the post of minister of education offered by the Soviets in 1940 and after World War II served as president of the Union of Lithuanian Writers. In 1960 Venclova graduated in Lithuanian language and literature from Vilnius University, where in 1966 he began to teach applied linguistics and the history of Western literature. At that time he translated the works of (among others) T. S. Eliot, James Joyce, and Boris Pasternak into Lithuanian. He also published his own pieces in various periodicals. In 1972 Venclova published his first collection of poems, Kalbos ženklas (Sign of speech), astonishing in its originality and with a combination of traditional form, great imagination, and rich metaphors. Despite his father's position, Venclova more and more openly criticized the Communist system, and in May 1975 he wrote a letter to the Central Committee of the Communist Party of Lithuania stating that the Communist ideology was alien to him, that it had caused much harm to Lithuania, and that to accept it would be hypocritical of him. In November 1976 he co-founded the Lithuanian Helsinki Group, which monitored Soviet violations of human rights in Lithuania. In 1977 he was allowed to emigrate from Lithuania.

When Venclova went to the United States, he was invited to give lectures in literature at the University of California, Berkeley. Meanwhile, he was stripped of his Soviet citizenship. In 1980 he became professor of Russian literature at Yale University. He published little, but every piece he wrote was enthusiastically received by critics. His style, marked by an ironic wit and a distanced perspective toward reality, won him critical recognition and the artistic friendship of eminent East European writers, including Czesław Miłosz and Joseph Brodsky. Venclova was one of few Lithuanian dissidents who maintained friendly contacts with Poles. He often translated works by Polish writers, including Miłosz and Stanisław Barańczak. In December 1981 Venclova signed a protest by Western intellectuals against the imposition of martial law in Poland. Venclova's most famous works include poems from the collection Winter Dialogue (1987) and the essays Forms of Hope (1989). A retrospective collection of his poems was published in Lithuania in 1992. In 1996 in the United States Venclova published the study Aleksander Wat: Life and Art of an Iconoclast. In 1999 he was awarded the Lithuanian Order of the Cross of Vytyis.

He has been a contributor to the Polish quarterly Zeszyty Literackie and a member of its editorial staff. Venclova has recently settled in Kraków, Poland. (WR)

VERDEȚ Ilie (10 May 1925, Comănești, Bacău County–20 March 2001, Bucharest), Romanian Communist activist. Verdeț's mother, Regina Manescu, was the sister of Nicolae Ceaușescu. Verdeț finished several grades of primary school and then worked as a miner. In 1945 he joined the Romanian Communist Party (Partidul Comunist Român [RCP]). From 1945 to 1948 he studied economics at the University of Bucharest. After graduating, he moved to Banat, where, from 1948 to 1954, he worked in the apparatus of the Romanian Workers' Party (Partidul Muncitoresc Român [RWP]; established in 1948). In 1954 Verdeț became head of a department in the RWP Central Committee (CC); from 1954 to 1965 he was first secretary of the RWP in Hunedoara, and from 1960 to 1989 he served as a member of the RWP CC (which was again renamed the Romanian Communist Party [RCP] in 1965). From 1961 to 1989 Verdeț was a member of parliament. After Ceaușescu came to power in 1965, Verdeț became one of the top leaders of the RCP. He was a deputy member of the CC Executive Committee from 1965 to 1966 and a full member from 1966 to 1986. He held the posts of deputy prime minister (March 1965–January 1967) and first deputy prime minister (December 1967–January 1969, March 1974, March 1978–March 1979). He was a member of the Standing Presidium of the RCP CC (1966–74 and 1984–86), secretary of the CC (1974–78 and 1982–85), and a member of the RCP Executive Committee Politburo (1977–86). In addition, in 1974–78 and 1982–89 he served as chairman of the Central Council of Workers' Control over the Economy and Social Activities. From 1978 to 1979 he again served as first deputy prime minister and also held the post of chairman of the State Planning Committee. From 29 March 1979 to 21 May 1982 Verdeț was deputy prime minister. In this capacity, he was a pliable tool of Ceaușescu. From October 1985 to September 1987 he served as minister of mining. On 22 December 1989, during the turmoil after the overthrow of Ceaușescu, Verdeț unsuccessfully attempted to form a new government, but the initiators of the coup took over control. In November 1990 Verdeț established the populist Socialist Labor Party (Partidul Socialist al Muncii [PSM]), and in 1991 he became its chairman. In the elections of 1992 the PSM won 3 percent of the votes and thirteen seats but was later marginalized; therefore, in 2000 Verdeț resigned as its leader and retired from public life. (LW)

VERES Péter (6 January 1897, Balmazújváros–16 April 1970, Budapest), Hungarian writer and politician. Veres's mother was a servant. After finishing four grades of primary school, he worked as a swineherd, servant, and railroad worker. In 1914 he joined the Agrarian-Socialist movement and continued his education on his own. From 1917 to 1918 Veres fought on the Italian front. In 1919, under the Hungarian Soviet Republic (HSR), he was a member of a commission for parceling out land and a member of the community directorate in Balmazújváros. Interned by the Romanian troops in Brașov (Brassó), Veres returned to Hungary in 1921. A court in Debrecen sentenced him to one year in prison for his activities under the HSR. In 1922 Veres founded a village committee of the Hungarian Social Democratic Party (HSDP) in Balmazújváros, as well as the National Trade Union of Agrarian Workers. Veres made his literary debut with the book Az Alföld parasztsága (Peasants of the Great Hungarian Plain; 1936), whereby he joined the so-called peasant writers' movement. He contributed to the leftist and peasant periodicals Válasz, Gondolat, and Kelet Népe, defending the rights of poor peasants and calling for a solution to the agrarian issue. In 1937 Veres was one of the founders of the March Front. In 1939 he co-founded the National Peasant Party (Nemzeti Parasztpárt [NPP]) and became a member of its leadership. In 1941 he wrote Falusi krónika (Rural chronicle). In 1943 in Balatonszárszó Veres attended a meeting of representatives of various opposition movements, from Catholic to Communist; at the meeting he pointed out that it was necessary to choose a leftist path after World War II. During the war Veres was inducted into the labor service units. After the Germans occupied Hungary in March 1944, he went into hiding.

Elected to parliament on the NPP ticket in November 1945, Veres served as an MP until the end of his life. From 1945 to 1947 he was president of the National Council for Land Property Regulation and played an active role in implementing the agricultural reform of March 1945. From 1945 onwards he supported the party's full cooperation with the Communists. Veres served as minister of construction and public works (March–September 1947) and minister of national defense (until September 1948). At the end of 1948 he was dismissed because he propagated the notion of the superiority of peasant farming; still, in 1949 he became a member of the leadership of the National Council of the Patriotic People's Front, and from 1954 to January 1957 he served as president of the Association of Hungarian Writers (AHW). Veres was the author of the trilogy Három nemzedék (Three generations; 1950–57), a novel of peasant life in the first half of the twentieth century. In 1953 he became a supporter of Imre Nagy.

On 23 October 1956 Veres read an AHW statement at a student demonstration in front of the statue of General Józef Bem in Budapest. During the first days of fighting, the Corvin Lane insurgents wanted Veres to become prime minister. On 31 October he became a member of the leadership of the reorganized NPP. As late as 28 December 1956 he chaired a general AHW meeting at which those present supported the revolution. He refused to join the Writers' Council, whose aim was to support the government of János Kádár. Veres was interrogated several times, and officials of the Ministry of Interior insisted on his arrest. Veres was a co-founder of the reorganized AHW, established on "new foundations" in 1959. He was a very popular author, and his works were translated into seventeen languages. In the 1960s the authorities exploited Veres's popularity; therefore, he received many prizes and awards. (JT)

VERHUN Petro (18 November 1890, Gródek Jagielloński [now Horodok], near Lemberg [Lwów, Lviv]–7 February 1957, Angarskiy, Krasnoyarsk region, Soviet Union), Uniate priest, martyr for the faith. After graduating from a seminary, Verhun was ordained into the priesthood by Archbishop Andriy Sheptytskyi in October 1927 and sent to Germany to minister to Ukrainian Catholics living there. Later he was appointed apostolic visitor to Germany. On 15 June 1945, after the Soviet Army captured Berlin, Verhun was arrested by the Soviet security services and taken to Kiev. On 3 June 1946 he was sentenced to eight years in a labor camp, although he had never been a Soviet citizen. Verhun served his sentence in extremely harsh conditions in the camps of Boymy and Inta, all the while continuing his pastoral work. After his release, he was forced to settle in Siberia. The Soviet authorities consistently denied him the right to return to Germany, although Verhun had German citizenship. He died in exile in the Krasnoyarsk region. On 27 June 2001 Pope John Paul II beatified Verhun at a solemn Holy Mass in Lviv. (WR) VERNADSKYI Volodymyr (12 March 1863, St. Petersburg, Russia–6 January 1945, Moscow), Ukrainian natural scientist and mineralogist, one of the pioneers of geochemistry, biogeochemistry, and the science of the noosphere and the biosphere. In 1885 Vernadskyi graduated from the Department of Physics and Mathematics of St. Petersburg University. From 1888 to 1890 he studied abroad. He subsequently taught at Moscow University (1890–1911; a professor from 1897). He then gave up his university post in protest against the reactionary education policies of the tsar's government. In 1911 Vernadskyi organized the first expedition in search of radioactive ores. In 1912 he became a full member of the Russian Academy of Sciences, and in 1914, director of the Geological and Mineralogical Museum of the Academy of Sciences in St. Petersburg. From June 1917 onwards Vernadskyi lived in Ukraine. In June 1918, at the behest of Mykola Vasylenko, the minister of education in the government of Hetman Pavlo Skoropadskyi, Vernadskyi became head of a commission for drafting a parliamentary bill on the Ukrainian Academy of Sciences (Ukraińska Akademiya Nauk [UAN]). In mid-November 1918 the project was endorsed by Skoropadskyi. Vernadskyi served as the first president of the UAN from 1918 to 1919.

From 1920 to 1921 Vernadskyi was a professor at the university in Simferopol. In 1922 he founded the Radium Institute in Petrograd. From 1923 to 1926 he lectured at Charles University, Prague, and at the Sorbonne in Paris, where he worked with (among others) Maria Skłodowska-Curie. In 1926 Vernadskyi became a member of the Czechoslovak Academy of Sciences, and in 1928, a member of the French Academy of Sciences. He served as a professor at the London School of Slavonic Studies. From 1928 on he directed the Radium Institute of the Soviet Academy of Sciences. In the 1930s Vernadskyi conducted research on heavy water and began the construction of the first Soviet cyclotron. In 1939, along with his co-workers, he established a commission on isotopes. Vernadskyi's research focused on the physicochemical processes involved in the formation of minerals, including radioactive ones. Vernadskyi is particularly famous for his theory of the structure of aluminosilicates. In his honor one mineral was named vernadite. The National Library of Ukraine was also named after him. Vernadskyi authored nearly four hundred scientific works, including the following: Opyt opisatel'noy mineralogii (The experience of descriptive mineralogy, 2 vols.; 1908–22); Istoriia mineralov zemnoy kory (The history of minerals of the earth's crust; 1923–36); La géochimie (Geochemistry; 1924); La biosphère (1929; The Biosphere, 1986); Ocherki geokhimii (Studies in geochemistry; 1924); and Biokhimicheskie ocherki (Biochemical studies; 1922–32, 1940). VESELICA Marko (9 January 1936, Glavice, near Sinj, Croatia), Croatian politician. Veselica completed studies in economics at the University of Zagreb, earning a Ph.D. in economic theory. From 1967 to 1971 he worked as an associate professor at the Department of Economics of the University of Zagreb. A member of the board of Matica Hrvatska (a Croatian cultural and publishing organization), Veselica was one of the leaders of the Croatian Spring, at which time he served as an MP in the federal parliament in Belgrade. During the suppression of “Croatian nationalism,” Veselica was expelled from the League of Communists of Croatia on 23 July 1971, arrested on 11 January 1972, and soon afterwards sentenced to seven years’ imprisonment and four years’ ban on public activities for “activities against the nation and the state.” Named by Amnesty International as the “prisoner of the year” in 1976 and “prisoner of the world” for November in 1977, Veselica was released in December 1977. In 1981, after giving an interview to the German magazine Der Spiegel, in which he described the Croatian question as “the fatal disease of Yugoslavia,” Veselica was accused of “falsely presenting the Yugoslav reality” and sentenced to eleven years’ imprisonment and four years’ ban on public activities.

Released in 1988, Veselica (along with Franjo Tudjman) founded the Croatian Democratic Union (Hrvatska Demokratska Zajednica [HDZ]) in 1989, but after a conflict over leadership Veselica seceded from the HDZ, and on 4 November 1989 he established the Croatian Democratic Party (CDP), which won thirteen seats in parliament in the 1990 elections. In 1992 the CDP won no seats in the Sabor (Legislature), and in December it merged with the Croatian Christian Democratic Party to form the Croatian Christian Democratic Union (Hrvatska Kršćansko-Demokratska Unija [CCDU]), of which Veselica served as president from 1992 to 2001. In the 1999 elections the CCDU formed a bloc with the radical Croatian Party of Rights, led by Anto Djapić, and jointly won five seats. In 1990 and 2002 Veselica was elected president of the Croatian Association of Political Prisoners (Hrvatsko Društvo Političkih Zatvorenika). He served as an MP from 1995 to 1999. He is also a member of the board of the Trade Unions of Croatia and vice-president of the Dr. Ivo Pilar Croatian Geopolitical Association. Veselica is against the agreement with the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia (ICTY) in The Hague, as he believes that war criminals should be tried in Croatia. According to Veselica, Croatia should adopt from the West only “what is needed.” He is against building an open civil society and in favor of a national and agricultural character for Croatia. Veselica authored Zov savjesti iz hrvatskog Sibira: S vjerom u Hrvatsku (The call of conscience from the Croatian Siberia: With faith in Croatia; 1990). (JD)

VESNIĆ Milenko (13 February 1863, Dunište, Sandžak, Serbia–15 February 1921, Paris), Serbian politician. Vesnić studied law in Berlin, Munich, and Leipzig. In 1891 he began working in the Serbian Ministry of Foreign Affairs and briefly served as secretary at a legation in Istanbul. After leaving the diplomatic service, he edited the periodical Pravnik. From 1892 onwards Vesnić taught international law at the School of Law of Belgrade University. From 1893 to 1894 he served as minister of education and subsequently resumed the post of professor of law at Belgrade University. Following the publication of a letter in the Paris periodical Les Temps in 1899, Vesnić was arrested and sentenced to prison. Pardoned the following year, he returned to the diplomatic service after 1903, serving as an envoy to Istanbul, Paris, and Rome. In 1906 Vesnić briefly served as minister of justice in the government of Nikola Pašić. In the first half of 1919 Vesnić was a delegate of the Kingdom of Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes (SHS) to the Paris Peace Conference. At a session of the Supreme Council of the Paris Peace Conference in February 1919 he put forward a demand that not only Montenegro, Bosnia, Dalmatia, Slovenia, Bačka, and Banat be incorporated into the SHS, but also south Styria and parts of Carinthia, Trieste, and Gorizia. However, these additional demands were rejected. From 16 May 1920 to 1 January 1921

Vesnić served as prime minister. He signed an agreement with Italy on the demarcation of a final border between it and SHS, succeeded in quelling a dangerous wave of strikes, and called parliamentary elections. Vesnić died suddenly. (WR)

VIDENOV Zhan (22 February 1959, Plovdiv), post-Communist Bulgarian politician. Videnov graduated from the English Language High School in Plovdiv and from the Moscow State Institute of International Relations in 1985. From 1985 to 1986 he worked in the Biotekhnika and Avtoelektronika factories in Plovdiv. From 1986 to 1989 he was a member of the Dimitrov Communist Youth League. From 1989 to 1990 he again worked at Avtoelektronika. After the Bulgarian Communist Party (BCP) was transformed into the Bulgarian Socialist Party (BSP) on 3 April 1990, Videnov was elected a member of its Supreme Council. From 1991 to 1997 he was a member of the Presidium, and from 16 December 1991 onwards, chairman of the Presidium of the BSP Supreme Council and a deputy to the National Assembly, reelected for successive terms. From 25 January 1995 to 23 December 1996 Videnov served as prime minister, and in this capacity he represented the interests of the party nomenklatura and impeded systemic transformations. His government pursued a pro-Russian and anti-Western policy that led to the breakdown of supplies to the consumer market. His government was brought down by a deepening economic and sociopolitical crisis in Bulgaria. On 24 December 1996 Videnov resigned as leader of the BSP. (JJ)

VIEST Rudolf (24 September 1890, Revúca [now in Slovakia]—spring of 1945, Flossenbürg, Germany?), Slovak general. In 1909 Viest graduated from an industrial school in Budapest, where he subsequently worked for a construction company. In 1914 he was taken prisoner of war by the Russians. He then enlisted as a volunteer in the Serbian Army. In 1916, as a soldier of this army, he fought in Dobruja and was wounded. He subsequently served as an officer in the Czechoslovak Legions in Russia and fought against the Bolsheviks in Siberia. In 1920 Viest made his way, via Japan, Canada, and the United States, to Czechoslovakia, where he graduated from the Military College in Prague. From 1922 to 1923 he served as deputy military attaché in Budapest and then became chief of staff of the Second Infantry Division in Plzeň. From 1925 to 1929 Viest was a military attaché in Poland. After returning to his country, he commanded a regiment in Trnava and served as chief of staff of the district command in Bratislava. He later became commander of the seventh and sixth military corps. In 1933 he was promoted to brigadier general. In 1938 Viest became a major general, the only Slovak in pre-Munich Czechoslovakia to do so.

Viest was a member of the Czechoslovak delegation at the First Vienna Arbitration in 1938. After the award was made, he became a member of the Slovak-Hungarian delimitation commission, which demarcated new borders between Slovakia and Hungary. On 14 March 1939, just after independence was proclaimed by the Slovak parliament, Viest signed a memorandum in protest against this proclamation and in support of a common Czechoslovak state. In 1939 Viest briefly served as inspector general of the Slovak Army and maintained contacts with the newly formed resistance movement at home and abroad. In August 1939 he emigrated to France, where he served as commander of the First Division of the Czechoslovak Army (January–June 1940), and he was also a member of the Czechoslovak National Committee. In 1940 Viest became an adviser to the president-in-exile of Czechoslovakia. From 1940 on he worked in the defense ministry of the government-in-exile, and in 1944 he briefly served as defense minister. In 1940, by a decision of the president of the Slovak Republic, Viest was stripped of his rank of major general, and two years later he was sentenced to death in absentia. In August 1944 in Moscow Viest took part in negotiations of the London-based Czechoslovak government-in-exile. After the outbreak of the Slovak National Uprising, he made his way from Moscow to Slovakia, and on 7 October 1944, in difficult circumstances, he replaced Ján Golian as commander of the First Czechoslovak Army. On 27 October 1944 Viest issued his last order, calling for the continuation of fighting in the mountains after the collapse of the uprising. On 3 November 1944, Viest (together with Golian) was captured by the Germans in Pohronský Bukovec and then deported to Germany. Tried in Berlin, Viest was condemned to death. The circumstances of his death are unknown; most probably he was executed in the Flossenbürg concentration camp. In 1945 Viest was posthumously promoted to four-star general. (PU)

VIKE-FREIBERGA Vaira (1 December 1937, Riga), psychology professor, president of Latvia. After World War II, Vike-Freiberga lived with her parents in a refugee camp in Germany, from where the family emigrated to Canada. She graduated from the University of Toronto and then earned a Ph.D. from McGill University in Montreal. From 1965 to 1998 Vike-Freiberga worked as a psychology professor at the University of Montreal. She held many prestigious scholarly positions, including president of the Canadian Psychological Association, deputy chairperson of the Science Council of Canada, and president of the Académie des Lettres et des Sciences Humaines of the Royal Society of Canada. Vike-Freiberga's numerous scholarly publications include Latvian Sun-songs (1988; co-authored by her husband, Imants Freibergs, professor of computer science at the University of Quebec in Montreal) and Linguistics and Poetics of Latvian Folk Songs (1989). She has also written several dozen articles. Vike-Freiberga is a prominent specialist in the field of Latvian folklore. Increasingly active in the public life of a revived Latvia in the 1990s, Vike-Freiberga was appointed director of the Latvian Institute in Riga in the autumn of 1998. On 17 June 1999 the parliament chose Vike-Freiberga for president by a slim majority, comprised of the People's Party, the Social Democrats, and the Fatherland and Freedom Party; on 8 July of that year she assumed the office of president. She was reelected as president on 20 June 2003. As the head of state, Vike-Freiberga kept the country's foreign policy on a Western-oriented course, in which Latvia's bid to join NATO and the European Union was a priority, and she supported Latvia's economic transformation. After the parliament passed a new language bill that limited the use of languages other than Latvian (December 1999), Vike-Freiberga refused to sign it and returned it to the parliament to be revised according to EU standards. In September 2000 she was awarded an honorary doctorate by the University of Latvia in Riga. Vike-Freiberga managed to lead Latvia into NATO and the European Union in 2004. (WR)

VILDE Eduard (4 March 1865, Pudivere–26 December 1933, Tallinn), Estonian writer, playwright, and politician. In 1882 Vilde graduated from a German high school. From 1883 to 1886 he worked on the editorial staff of Virulase in Dorpat (Tartu, Yuryev), and from 1887 to 1888, on the editorial staff of Postimees in Tallinn and then in Riga (1889–90), where he contributed to Zeitung fuer Stadt und Land, and in Berlin (1890–92), where he became acquainted with socialism and French Impressionism. Both these movements played a crucial role in shaping Vilde as a writer and politician. In 1893 he returned to Estonia and worked for Postimees in Yuryev (1893–96). From 1897 to 1898 he was the editor-in-chief of the Narva-based newspaper Virmalist. From 1898 to 1901 he worked as a journalist for Eesti Postimees in Tallinn. In 1901–4 he was one of the leading editors of the newspaper Teataja, which was founded and published by Konstantin Päts. In 1904–5 Vilde also contributed to the Yuryev-based Uudiseed. He took an active part in the 1905 revolution, and, after its failure he emigrated to Switzerland and then to Finland, where he published the satirical newspaper Kaak. From 1906 to 1917 Vilde lived in various countries of Europe and in the United States. After the outbreak of the February 1917 revolution, Vilde returned to Estonia, where he again was a journalist and did freelance work for the Estonia Theater. From 1919 to 1920 he was the head of the Copenhagen-based propaganda bureau of the Estonian National Council (Maapäev), and subsequently he became Estonia's envoy to Berlin. In 1920 he resigned and spent the next three years in Germany. He returned to Estonia in 1923. In 1928 he became an honorary member of the Finnish Writers' Union. In 1929 he was granted an honorary doctorate by the Department of Philosophy of Tartu University.

Vilde is considered the first Estonian professional writer and the first representative of realism in Estonian literature. His first stories were targeted at a mass audience and are characterized by humor, sharp language, and a strong plot. Vilde's total output consists of thirty-three volumes. Among other things, his success resulted from his unique worldly refinement and his wide contacts. A true European, Vilde transplanted fashionable ideas of socialism and realism into art on an Estonian background. He condemned social inequities that led to the difficult financial and spiritual situation of workers and peasants. He addressed these issues in such books as the novel Külmale maale (To the frozen land; 1896) and the three-volume saga Mahtra soda (The Mahtra war; 1902). The latter was based on documents and accounts that Vilde had collected concerning a 1858 peasant uprising against the German landed gentry. Kui Anija mehed Tallinnas käisid (When the Anija men went to Tallinn; 1903) and the trilogy Prohvēt Maltsvet (The Prophet Maltsvet; 1905–8) address similar issues. Vilde also dealt with the emancipation of women. His last novel, Mäeküla piimamees (Milkman from Mäeküla), is a critique of social conditions in which a German baron could buy a poor peasant's consent to seduce his wife. Vilde also wrote plays, but they were less successful. (AG)

VILFAN Josip (30 August 1878, Trieste–8 March 1955, Belgrade), Slovene politician. In 1901 Vilfan completed law studies in Vienna. He initially worked in a law office in Trieste and then in the office of the renowned Croatian politician Matko Laginja in Pola (Pula). In 1904 Vilfan returned to Trieste, where in 1909 he opened his own law office and ran it until 1928. He entered the political scene in 1906, when he became secretary of Edinost (Unity), a society founded in 1874 for the defense of the rights of Slovenes living in Trieste and the neighboring area. Vilfan held this position until 1909. From 1910 until the dissolution of Edinost in 1928, he served as its chairman. Vilfan accused the Italian administration of irregularities in conducting a census in the Trieste area and was instrumental in bringing about a revision of the census in 1910. Its results showed that nearly fifty-seven thousand people used Slovene in everyday speech. In 1909 and 1913 Vilfan was elected to the Trieste City Council.

Vilfan defended the principle of equal rights for all nations. With the collapse of the Habsburg empire, he unsuccessfully strove for the incorporation of Trieste into the Kingdom of Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes and emphasized that the rights of the Italian minority must be respected. Elected to the parliament in Rome on two occasions, in 1921 and 1924, Vilfan defended the rights of the Slovene and Croatian minorities and protested against Fascist tendencies. On his initiative a congress on national minorities in Europe was held in Geneva. Vilfan presided over the congress and ran its permanent office. As a result of his efforts, the issue of the protection of minority rights in Europe became widely known, but although it gained international recognition, the Fascist authorities did not approve of it and outlawed Edinost. After a meeting with Benito Mussolini in 1928, Vilfan left Italy and went to Yugoslavia and thence to Vienna, where he ran an office of the congress of national minorities in Europe until 1939. In 1939, in the face of the imminent outbreak of World War II, Vilfan moved to Belgrade. From 1945 to 1947 he was a member of the Institute of International Affairs of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of Yugoslavia. He also took part in the preparations for the Paris Peace Conference, where Yugoslavia signed the peace treaty with Italy in 1947. (AO)

VILMS Jüri (13 March 1889, Arkma, near Viljandi–13 April 1918, Helsinki, Finland), Estonian lawyer, journalist, and politician. In 1911 Vilms completed law studies in Yuryev (now Tartu, Estonia) and then ran a law practice in Tallinn until 1917. He began his political career in 1917. He published articles in Päevaleht and was one of the founders of the Estonian Social Radical Party, later transformed into the Estonian Labor Party. Despite his young age and lack of political experience, Vilms quickly rose to a prominent position in the Estonian National Council (Maapäev). On 19 February 1918, along with Konstantin Päts and Konstantin Konik, Vilms joined the three-man Estonian Salvation Committee (Eesti Päästmises Komitee [ESC]), which was given extraordinary powers by the Estonian National Council. Shortly before the German occupation of Estonia, Vilms co-signed the declaration of Estonian independence (24 February 1918). He became deputy prime minister and minister of justice in the provisional government of the new state led by Päts. The declaration of Estonian independence was passed during the struggle between the Germans and the Bolsheviks for supremacy over Estonia. Both stated that the declaration was illegal and treated those who had initiated it as rebels. Vilms attempted to escape to Finland, but after crossing the frozen Gulf of Finland on foot, he was caught by the Germans and executed by a firing squad. In 1920 his ashes were returned to Estonia and buried in Püüsi. Because of the circumstances of his death and his young age, Vilms was often cited as an archetype of the national hero and a martyr in the struggle for independence. Jaan Kross devoted a novel to Vilms, and Vilms appeared as a character in several films. VIŠINSKIS Povilas (29 June 1875, Ušnėnai, near Šiauliai–26 June 1906, Berlin), Lithuanian editor and literary critic. After graduating from high school in Šiauliai in 1894, Višinskis began to study the natural sciences at St. Petersburg University, but he contracted tuberculosis and had to discontinue his studies. While still a student, he began researching Lithuanian folklore. From 1899 to 1906 he edited the periodical Varpas and co-edited the daily Vilniaus žinios. At that time he published extensively. In 1901 Višinskis expressed support for a “free and independent Lithuania, liberated from foreign and domestic despots.” He was a co-founder of the Lithuanian Democratic Party. He also rendered great services to Lithuanian literature, promoting many new talented writers, such as Julija Žymantienė-Žemaitė, Jonas Biliūnas, and Jonas Krikščiūnas-Jovaras. In 1900 Višinskis deliberately let the authorities sentence him to a fine and one day in jail for publishing a poster printed in Lithuanian using the “Latin-Polish alphabet.” Since his lawyer stated that the poster had been printed in the “Latin-Lithuanian” alphabet, in 1903 an appeal was granted and Višinskis was released because it was proved that the sentence had been based on a non-existent regulation. By reducing to absurdity the tsar’s ban on printing in Lithuanian using the Latin alphabet, Višinskis contributed to the abolition of this ban by the Russian authorities in May 1904. Under his influence, some Poles, including Władysław Putwiński (Vladas Putvinskis) and Maria Pieczkowska (Marija Pečkauskaitė), changed their national identity, becoming Lithuanian nationalists. Višinskis died prematurely of tuberculosis. His collected writings, Raštai, were published in 1964. (WR) VISOIANU Constantin (4 February 1897, Urlați–2 January 1994, New York), Romanian politician. In 1919 Visoianu completed philosophical and legal studies in Paris. In 1920 he earned a Ph.D. in law from the Sorbonne. From 1927 to 1929 and from 1932 to 1936 he was a close associate of the minister of foreign affairs, Nicolae Titulescu. Visoianu was secretary of the Arbitration Commission in Paris (1926–29) and an expert on the Romanian delegation to the League of Nations (1929–31). He subsequently served as Romania’s representative in the General Secretariat of the League of Nations (until 1933). Visoianu was an envoy to the Netherlands (1933–35) and to Poland (1935–36). After Titulescu was forced to resign from the Ministry of Foreign Affairs in August 1936, Visoianu was dismissed from the diplomatic service. Aligned with the Liberal Party and the National Peasant Party, he was in opposition to the governments of King Charles II and Marshal Ion Antonescu. In April 1944, together with Prince Barbu Știrbei, Visoianu agreed to undertake a diplomatic mission whose aim was to switch Romania to the Allied side. Cease-fire negotiations in Cairo ended in failure as a result of opposition from the Kremlin.

Visoianu took part in preparations for the overthrow of Marshal Antonescu’s regime. After the coup d’état of 23 August 1944, Visoianu became minister of foreign affairs in the government of General Constantin Sănătescu and held this post in the cabinet of General Nicolae Rădescu until Rădescu’s fall on 28 February 1945. Visoianu signed the truce with the Allies in Moscow (September 1944). After leaving the government, he sharply criticized brutal Soviet interference in Romania’s domestic affairs. Fearing arrest, Visoianu fled Romania in October 1946. For some time he stayed in Switzerland and then settled in the United States, where he co-founded the Romanian National Committee (RNC) in 1947. In the same year the Communist authorities sentenced him in absentia to life imprisonment. From 15 November 1950 to 15 September 1975 Visoianu served as chairman of the RNC. He took an active part in the work of the Assembly of Captive European Nations (ACEN). He repeatedly protested the Soviet occupation of Romania, the abuses committed by the Communist regime in Romania, and the Soviet invasions of Hungary (1956) and Czechoslovakia (1968). Visoianu later resigned his position and disbanded the RNC because of the Western countries’ support for the seemingly independent foreign policy of Nicolae Ceaușescu’s regime. Visoianu authored Misiunile mele (My missions; 1997). (FA/WR)

VITKAUSKAS Vincas (4 October 1890, Uzhbale, Volkovysk district–3 March 1965, Vilnius), Lithuanian general. Between 1914 and 1916 Vitkauskas studied mathematics at the university in Moscow. In 1916 he was called up into the army, with which he was linked until his death. Vitkauskas graduated from a military academy and completed a sharpshooters’ course. After the outbreak of the war for the independence of Lithuania, he volunteered for the newly formed Lithuanian Army. He fought against the White Russians and against Poland. After the end of the warfare he was decorated with the Cross of St. Vytautas with Swords. In 1924–40 Vitkauskas worked on the general staff and was an instructor in an infantry school. Between 1926 and 1927 he commanded the Seventh Infantry Regiment and then returned to his work on the staff. In 1935 he rose to the rank of brigadier general; in 1939 was promoted to general of division, and in 1940 he assumed the post of commander-in-chief of the Lithuanian Army. When on 15 June 1940 a Soviet ultimatum was submitted to Lithuania, Vitkauskas objected to the use of the army to stop the Soviet aggression. He argued that the Lithuanian Army had no chance in a clash with the Red Army. Two days later Vitkauskas assumed the post of minister of national defense in the so-called people's government. After the annexation of the country by the USSR, Vitkauskas actively helped to incorporate the Lithuanian Army, as the Twenty-ninth Territorial Corps, into the Red Army. After the outbreak of the German-Soviet war on 22 June 1941, Vitkauskas fled to Moscow, where he lectured at the Higher Military Academy, combining the post of lecturer with a seat on the Supreme Council of the USSR. After 1945 he returned to Lithuania and continued lecturing on military subjects at the University of Kaunas. Between 1946 and 1954 Vitkauskas was a deputy to the Supreme Council of the Lithuanian SSR. (AG)

VITOVSKYI Dmytro (8 November 1887, Meducha [Medukha], near Stanisławów [Ivano-Frankivsk]—8 July 1919, near Ratibor [now Racibórz in Poland]), Ukrainian officer and politician. Vitovskiyi studied at the university in Lemberg (Lviv, Lwów). He was the founder of and an activist in Ukrainian educational and paramilitary organizations in Stanisławów. During World War I Vitovskiyi served in the Ukrainian Sich Riflemen as a company commander with the rank of captain. On 19 October 1918 Yevhen Petrushevych became head of the Ukrainian National Rada (Council), which proclaimed the establishment of an independent state, and Vitovskiyi became head of the Military Commissariat of the Rada. On 31 October he ordered that the main strategic points of Lemberg be captured, and on 1 November he became the commander of the Ukrainian units that seized power in this city after the Austrians withdrew. For the next five days, Vitovskiyi served as the first commander of the Ukrainian Galician Army. He then became minister of defense of the Western Ukrainian National Republic and held this position until mid-February 1919. On 1 January 1919 he was promoted to colonel. From February to April of that year Vitovskiyi took part in the Paris Peace Conference as a delegate of the Ukrainian National Rada. On 8 May 1919, during a hearing before the Commission of the Paris Peace Conference, he presented a proposal for establishing the Polish-Ukrainian border on the San River. Since the Entente tried to exploit Poland's involvement in the war against the Bolsheviks, it evidently delayed recognizing the Ukrainian demands. Vitovskiyi signed a statement condemning the Allies' inability to halt the Polish offensive. On his way back from Paris, Vitovskiyi was killed in an air crash in Silesia. (WR)

VLAD Iulian (23 February 1931, Gogoșița), Romanian officer of the Communist political police. At the end of the 1950s Vlad served as a captain in the personnel administration of the political police, Securitate. He quickly rose through the ranks, becoming a major general in 1977. From May 1977 to December 1989 Vlad served as secretary of state in the Ministry of Interior; in April 1983 he became deputy minister of interior, in August 1984 colonel general (highest ranking general in Bulgaria), and in November 1987 head of the Securitate. Vlad led the forcible suppression of the strike of the Jiu Valley coal miners in August 1977 and the workers' demonstrations in Brașov in November 1987. He personally beat participants who were interrogated about the demonstrations in Brașov. After the overthrow of Nicolae Ceaușescu, Vlad was arrested on 26 December 1989. Initially he was tried for "taking part in genocide," for which life imprisonment was the maximum penalty, but later the classification of the crime was changed to "supporting genocide," for which ten years' imprisonment was the maximum penalty. On 22 July 1991 Vlad was sentenced to nine years' imprisonment. During his trial he was accused of various kinds of wrongdoing, including "abuses during detention" of over a thousand demonstrators in December 1989 and the persecution and discrediting of some Romanian intellectuals, including Dorin Tudoran, a poet and literary critic who had been forced to emigrate in July 1985. Vlad was also accused of tolerating corruption in customs houses, illegally bugging state officials, persecuting the Transcendental Meditation sect, detaining oppositionists as a preventive measure, and working closely with Elena Ceaușescu, particularly in tightening passport regulations and persecuting opposition activists, including the signatories of the so-called Letter of Six, former top-ranking Communist officials. Conditionally released owing to ill health on 30 December 1993, Vlad subsequently retired from public life. (AB)

VLAHOV Dimitar (8 November 1878, Kukuš [now Kilkís, Greece]–7 April 1953, Belgrade), Macedonian revolutionary and Communist activist. Vlahov studied chemistry in Germany and Switzerland. In 1903 he began working as a teacher in Salonika. He was a member of the Central Committee of the Internal Macedonian Revolutionary Organization (IMRO). After the Ilinden Uprising (1903), he was briefly detained. A supporter of autonomy for Macedonia within the framework of the Ottoman Empire, Vlahov was elected to the Young Turk parliament in Istanbul after the revolution of 1908. During World War I Vlahov commanded Bulgarian military districts in Vardar Macedonia and Kosovo. Subsequently, he was sent to Istanbul, Kiev, and Odessa as an envoy of the Bulgarian Army Directorate for Economic Affairs and Planning. After the war, as Bulgaria's consul and commercial attaché in Vienna, Vlahov attempted to negotiate an agreement between rival IMRO factions and the Communist International. When this agreement was rejected in 1924 by its two main signatories, Todor Aleksandrov and Aleksandŭr Protogerov, Vlahov lost his post in Bulgaria's diplomatic service. He remained in Austria as a political émigré and was active as a Comintern delegate to the Balkans. At the end of the 1920s Vlahov headed the District Committee of the IMRO of United Pirin Macedonia in Sofia, but because of his close relations with the Communists, he was forced to leave Bulgaria. After spending some time in Berlin and Paris, Vlahov went to the Soviet Union in 1935. He managed to escape with his life during the Great Purge only because of the intercession of Georgi Dimitrov. Meanwhile, Bulgaria's court sentenced him to death in absentia in 1936. From 1941 onwards, as a Comintern representative again, Vlahov was active in the Balkans, mainly in Greece. On 23 November 1943 he was appointed vice-president of the Anti-Fascist Council for the National Liberation of Yugoslavia (AVNOJ), a quasi-parliament of Communist Partisans led by Josip Broz Tito. In October 1944 Vlahov returned to Vardar Macedonia and joined the Communist Party of Yugoslavia. At that time he supported the concept of a Great Macedonia, which would include the Vardar part in the west, the Pirin part in the east, and the Aegean part in the south; as a result, he came into conflict with those—a majority in Skopje—who called for incorporating Vardar Macedonia into Yugoslavia. In 1946 Vlahov was appointed deputy speaker of the federal parliament in Belgrade and lost his political importance. His Memoari (Memoirs) were published in 1970. (WR)

VLK Miloslav (17 May 1932, Lišnice), cardinal, metropolitan of Prague, Czech primate. After graduating from high school in České Budějovice, Vlk did two years of military service. He subsequently studied history and archival studies at Charles University in Prague and then worked as an archivist in Třeboň, Jindřichův Hradec, and České Budějovice. It was not until 1964 that Vlk began to study theology at a seminary in Litoměřice. On 23 June 1968 he was ordained a priest and appointed secretary to Bishop Josef Hlouch of České Budějovice. Under pressure from the political authorities, in 1971 Vlk was transferred to the small parish of Rožmitál-pod-Třemšínem. In 1978 the Communist authorities revoked his license to exercise a priestly ministry. Vlk went to Prague, where he earned a living as a window cleaner for eight years. In 1986 he had to abandon this work for health reasons, and he took a job as an archivist at a bank. Throughout that time, Vlk maintained contacts with underground church circles and with democratic opposition activists. In January 1989 the authorities allowed him to resume his pastoral ministry for a “trial period.”

Shortly after the Velvet Revolution, Vlk was elected (14 February 1990) and then consecrated (31 March) bishop of České Budějovice. On 27 March 1991 he became archbishop of Prague and primate of the Czech Catholic Church. Like other Czech bishops, Vlk called for maintaining the federal state shared with Slovakia. Vlk's time in office was marked by negotiations that settled relations between the Church and the state in the Czech Republic and talks concerning the return of church property seized by the Communist authorities after 1945. Vlk repeatedly spoke out in defense of people who found themselves on the margins of society in the new economic circumstances. He strove for a Czech-German reconciliation. He supported the lustration law. He called on all clergymen who in conscience felt guilty of collaborating with the Communist secret police to give an account to their bishops, but he emphasized that the Church did not come to terms with its past through lustration but through penance and reconciliation. In 1933 Vlk was elected president of the Council of European Episcopal Conferences. On 26 November 1994 Pope John Paul II elevated him to cardinal. In 2000 Vlk ceased to serve as president of the Czech Bishops' Conference but continued as president of the Czech Episcopate's Council for the Media. Vlk is one of the leaders of Focolare, an international religious movement. (AGr)

VOITEC Ștefan (19 June 1900, Corabia–4 December 1984, Bucharest), Romanian Communist activist. In 1918 Voitec joined the Social Democratic Workers' Party of Romania (Partidul Social-Democrat al Muncitorilor din România), which was renamed the Socialist Party (Partidul Socialist) in the same year. In 1924 Voitec graduated from the Bucharest Polytechnic and the University of Bucharest. He subsequently worked as a teacher at Sfântul Iosif Gymnasium in Bucharest. From 1925 to 1927 he was the editor of the radical leftist daily Socialismul. He also contributed to many Socialist and Communist newspapers, including Libertatea, Lumea nouă, and Proletarul. In 1928 Voitec was one of the founders of the Socialist Workers' Party of Romania (Partidul Socialist al Muncitorilor din România), whose aim was to conduct a social revolution and which demanded that Romania officially recognize the Soviet Union. In 1938 this party joined the Social Democratic Party of Romania (Partidul Social-Democrat din România [PSDR]).

In 1944 Voitec was active in the United Workers' Front, formed by Communists and Socialists. The positions of Voitec and some other PSDR members evolved, approaching those of the Romanian Communist Party (RCP). After Ion Antonescu's government was overthrown and Soviet troops entered Romania, the RCP took over power. From 1944 to 1947 Voitec was minister of national education. From 1945 to 1946 he briefly served as minister of justice and was responsible for the Sovietization of the judicial system. In 1948 the pro-Communist groups of the PSDR merged with the RCP to form the Romanian Workers' Party (Partidul Muncitoresc Român [RWP]). Voitec served as deputy to the Grand National Assembly (from 1946 onwards) and deputy prime minister (1948–52 and 1957–61). From 1955 to 1956 he was a member of the Central Committee (CC), deputy member of the RWP Politburo, and minister of domestic trade. From 1957 to 1959 he was minister of the consumer goods industry. Voitec held the post of deputy chairman of the Council of State from 1961 to 1965 and from 1974 to 1984. In 1961–74 he was speaker of the parliament, and in 1965–84 he was a member of the RCP CC Executive Committee. The vice-chairman of the National Council of the Socialist Unity Front (1974–84), Voitec was a close associate of Nicolae Ceaușescu. (LW)

VOJTAŠŠÁK Ján (14 November 1877, Zákamenné, Dolný Kubín County [now in Slovakia]–4 August 1965, Říčany, Bohemia), bishop of Spiš, Slovak political prisoner. Born into a large peasant family, after graduating from high school in Ružomberok, Vojtaššák entered a seminary in Spišská Kapitula in 1895. It was then that he met Father Andrej Hlinka, who shaped his national consciousness and social views. In July 1901 Vojtaššák was ordained into the priesthood and then worked as a curate in the parishes of Orava and Spiš. An active supporter of the Slovak national movement, he protested the Magyarization of Slovak-populated parishes. In 1908 Vojtaššák co-founded, and then edited the periodical Sväta Rodina. In 1910 he became the parish priest of Veličná, where he developed Catholic organizations and organized assistance for the victims of World War I. He supported Hlinka's efforts to separate Slovakia from Hungary and to establish a common state with the Czechs. On 30 October 1918 in Turčiansky Sv. Martin Vojtaššák signed the declaration of the Slovak nation. He later worked for the establishment of an independent Church hierarchy in Slovakia and for its separation from the archdiocese of Esztergom.

On 13 November 1920 Vojtaššák was appointed bishop of Spiš. On 13 February 1921 in Nitra, he was consecrated bishop, along with two other Slovak clergymen, Karol Kmet'ko and Marián Blaha. They were the first Slovaks to be elevated to bishop. Vojtaššák initiated the organization of a synod of the Spiš diocese in 1924, contributed to the establishment of a new seminary, and developed charity services, as well as a network of Catholic schools. In 1939 he supported the establishment of the Slovak state. From 1940 to 1943, with the consent of the Holy See, he served as a member of the Council of State, a collective supervisory body with limited powers, and he protested the policies of the executive authorities. In 1943, having learned that Slovak Jews were being deported to Nazi extermination camps, Vojtaššák issued a protest to the Slovak authorities, as a result of which the deportations were stopped. He called for the establishment of a special committee to explain the real fate of the deported Jews. When the Communist-inspired uprising broke out in August 1944 and there were numerous killings and cases of violence, the victims of which included Catholic priests, Vojtaššák exhorted the clergy to stay in Slovakia and help those affected. Arrested in May 1945, he was held in a prison in Bratislava for seven months, although no charges were formally brought against him. Released in November 1945, he publicly protested the policies aimed at abolishing Catholic schools and limiting the rights of the faithful. In 1949 he threatened to excommunicate priests who adhered to the so-called peaceful clergy movement. Interned in his own residence on 3 June 1950, Vojtaššák was taken to a prison in Prague in October 1950. In January 1951, along with Bishop Michal Buzalka and the Uniate bishop Pavel Gojdič, Vojtaššák was accused of high treason in a show trial in Bratislava. In February 1951 he was sentenced to twenty-four years' imprisonment. He was imprisoned in Valdice, Leopoldov, and Ilava. In 1956 he was allowed to settle in a nursing home in Děčín, but after a few months he was again imprisoned. On his eightieth birthday, Vojtaššák received a congratulatory telegram from Pope Pius XII. The prison authorities persecuted Vojtaššák, assigning him to cells he had to share with criminals who tormented the ailing old man morally and physically. Released in September 1963, Vojtaššák was not allowed to return to Slovakia and had to settle in a nursing home near Prague. He was buried in Zákamenné. His funeral turned into a huge silent demonstration of Slovak Catholics. In 1977 his memoirs were published in Canada: Životopis Jána Vojtaššáka, biskupa spišského (Biography of Ján Vojtaššák, bishop of Spiš). (AGr)

VOLAJ Gjergji (21 September 1904, Shirokë, near Scutari [now Shkodër]–3 February 1947, Shkodër), Albanian Catholic bishop, victim of communism. Volaj attended St. Francis Xavier College in Shkodër and then studied theology in Padua from 1926 to 1930. Ordained a priest in Shkodër Cathedral (June 1930), he worked in the parish of Mali i Jushit, near Shkrel (Malesia e Madhe). In 1936 he was transferred to Shkrel, where he worked until 1940. On 26 June 1940 Volaj was consecrated bishop and appointed head of the diocese of Sappa. At that time he was the youngest Catholic bishop in the world. His seat was in Zadrimë. In 1944, despite his protests, Communist resistance units plundered the curia's buildings in Zadrimë. On 25 June 1946, during celebrations honoring the Virgin Mary, the patroness of Shkodër, Volaj gave his last homily to the faithful. Defending the rights of Albanian Catholics, he accused the Communist authorities of running a smear campaign. Arrested in 1947, after a short trial Volaj was executed by a firing squad in the Rozafat cinema in Shkodër. The reasons cited for the sentence included the fact that Volaj was a bishop of the Catholic Church. The place of his burial is not known. (TC)

VOLDEMARAS Augustinas (4 April 1883, Dysna, near Świeciany [Švenčionys]–16 December 1942, Moscow), Lithuanian politician. Voldemaras studied philology and history at St. Petersburg University. After graduating in history (1910), he worked as a lecturer. From 1914 to 1915 he studied in Italy and Sweden and then returned to Russia and obtained a professorship at the university in Perm. In 1916 Voldemaras joined the nationalist National Progress Party (Tautos Pažanga [NPP]), led by Antanas Smetona; it called for Lithuania's independence. In September 1917 Voldemaras was Lithuania's delegate to a Kiev conference of nationalities living in Russia; there he was appointed Lithuania's representative to the Ukrainian Central Rada. As an adviser to the Ukrainian delegation, Voldemaras also took part in the peace negotiations between the Bolsheviks and the Central Powers in Brest-Litovsk. In the summer of 1918 Voldemaras returned to Lithuania and was coopted into the Lithuanian Council (Lietuvos Taryba). On 11 November 1918 the Lithuanian Council appointed him prime minister of the first government of independent Lithuania. He also assumed the portfolio of foreign affairs. On 23 November Voldemaras signed an order on the organization of the Lithuanian Army. In December he went to Paris, seeking recognition for Lithuania and asking for the official admission of the Lithuanian delegation to the Peace Conference at Versailles. During his absence, a new cabinet was installed in Lithuania, although Voldemaras kept his post as foreign minister. After the elections to the Constituent Assembly in May 1920, Voldemaras resigned as prime minister. He worked as a lecturer, teaching academic pedagogical courses in Kaunas. When in February 1922 Vytautas Magnus University was established in Kaunas, Voldemaras became its dean of the School of Social Sciences. He also edited the periodical Tėvynės

Balsas, in which he sharply criticized the government's policies. Because of this, in 1923 he was expelled from Kaunas and transferred to Varniai, but the following year he returned to the university. In the 1926 elections Voldemaras won a seat on the ticket of the Union of Lithuanian Nationalists (Tautininkų Sąjunga [ULN]).

On 17 December 1926, the Nationalists, supported by Christian Democratic politicians and a part of the army, removed the center-left government of Mykolas Sleževičius from power. President Kazys Grinius resigned, entrusting the mission of forming a new government to Voldemaras. Smetona became the new president. Voldemaras's government was based on a coalition of Nationalists, Christian Democrats, and the Lithuanian Peasant Union. On 12 April 1927 the parliament passed a vote of no confidence in Voldemaras's government. In response, Smetona dissolved the parliament. Moreover, as Smetona and Voldemaras were reluctant to call new elections, the former allies of the Nationalists withdrew their support for the government. Still, Voldemaras stayed in power because he had the support of the administration and a segment of the army. He strove to improve Lithuania's relations with other countries. In the autumn of 1927 in Geneva he negotiated with Józef Piłsudski, convincing him that Lithuania did not want a war with Poland. On 29 January 1928 Voldemaras signed a border agreement with Germany and then a trade agreement with Italy. On 6 May 1929 three leftist students staged an attempt on Voldemaras's life, killing his assistant. Voldemaras became more involved in Iron Wolf (Geležnis Vilkas), a semi-secret paramilitary extreme nationalist organization. Fearing that Voldemaras wanted to stage a coup, Smetona dismissed him as prime minister on 19 September 1929 and then had him deported to Plateliai and later to Zarasai. After a group of officers indeed tried to overthrow Smetona's regime in June 1934, Voldemaras was sentenced to twelve years' imprisonment. In 1938 he was released under an amnesty but was forced to leave Lithuania. In 1939 Voldemaras attempted to return from France, where he lived, but he was arrested and expelled from Lithuania. Shortly after the Soviet invasion of Lithuania in June 1940, Voldemaras again returned to his country, but he was arrested by the Soviet authorities and sent to Ordzhonikidze in the Caucasus. When the Germans approached that region in 1942, Voldemaras was transferred to a prison in Moscow, where he died.

Voldemaras was regarded as a ruthless and extremely ambitious politician who sought dictatorial power. He left a considerable literary output. His doctoral dissertation on agrarian reforms under Emperor Hadrian was published in 1910. In his other historical works, he presented the Lithuanian point of view in the history of the Jagiellonian state. In the 1920s and 1930s Voldemaras published only political studies, such as Les relations russo-polono-lithuaniennes (1920) and La Lithuanie et ses problèmes: Lithuanie et Allemagne (1933). In 1976 a collection of his writings was published by Morkus Šimkus in Chicago. (WR)

VOLOBUYEV Mykhailo (24 January 1900, Nikolayev [Mykolayiv], near Kherson–1932, Soviet Union), Ukrainian economist of Russian descent. Volobuyev taught at the Technical High School of the National Economy in Kharkov (Kharkiv). In 1928 in Bilshovyk Ukrainy he published "Do problemy Ukrainiskoy ekonomiky" (On the problem of the Ukrainian economy), in which he stated that the Russian empire had not been a single economic system and that the Ukrainian economy should be examined separately from Russia because of its different development. Volobuyev defended Ukraine's right to control its economic resources. He also pointed out Russian chauvinism in its economic exploitation of Ukraine. Volobuyev's views became very popular in Ukraine, but the Communist authorities sharply attacked him, accusing him of being a "bourgeois nationalist" and an enemy of Soviet rule. Volobuyev was forced to recant his views in the periodical Kommunist, and in 1930 in Bilshovyk Ukrainy, in a second article, he condemned the "economic platform of nationalism." Nevertheless, Volobuyev was soon arrested and perished in the Gulag. All supporters of his views were also persecuted. (WR)

VOLODYMYR [originally Vasyl Romanyuk] (9 December 1925, ?–14 July 1995, Kiev), metropolitan of the Ukrainian Autocephalous Orthodox Church (UAOC). After the Red Army entered Eastern Galicia in 1944, Volodymyr was arrested by the NKVD and sent to a Soviet forced labor camp for his pro-independence work. From 1944 to 1953 he was imprisoned in Soviet forced labor camps in the Urals and in Kolyma. Freed from the camps, he was forced to remain in internal exile. In 1959 Volodymyr was allowed to return to Ukraine, and he was formally rehabilitated. He commenced correspondence studies at the Moscow Theological Seminary. Ordained in 1964, he began his pastoral ministry in Kosmach, near Kosiv in Pokutia. Arrested in 1972, Volodymyr was sentenced to seven years in a special-regime forced labor camp. He served his sentence in the camps of the Mordvinian ASSR. In 1975 he went on a hunger strike, and in February 1979 he joined the Ukrainian Helsinki Group. As punishment for that, upon his release from labor camp, Volodymyr was forced to settle in the Yakutian ASSR. Released in 1981, it was not until 1984 that he was able to resume his pastoral ministry in the parish of Pistyn. As Communist rule weakened in Ukraine, Volodymyr was consecrated bishop of Bila Tserkva and took on the name of Volodymyr in 1990. After the death of Archbishop Mstyslav Skrypnyk, Volodymyr became the Kiev metropolitan of the revived UAOC in October 1993. The year 1980 saw the publication of Volodymyr's A Voice in the Wilderness, a collection of letters, appeals, and essays concerning his imprisonment. (WR)

VOLOSHYN Avhustyn (17 March 1874, Kelechin, Subcarpathian Rus—11 July 1945, Moscow), Ukrainian Greek Catholic priest, leader of Subcarpathian Ruthenia. In 1892 Voloshyn entered a seminary in Uzhhorod, and after completing studies there, he studied in Budapest. He was ordained a Greek Catholic priest and worked in a parish in Uzhhorod. In 1900 he gained a diploma to teach mathematics and physics. From 1917 to 1938 Voloshyn headed a teachers' training school in Uzhhorod. He edited textbooks and literary works. Voloshyn's publications include O pismennom yazyke podkarpatskikh Rusinov (The literary language of Subcarpathian Rusyns; 1921) and Az-buka karpato-ruskoho i tserkovno-slavyanskoho chtennya (Outline of Subcarpathian Rusyn and Old Church Slavonic literature; 1924). Voloshyn was a prominent Ukrainian politician in Subcarpathian Ruthenia, which constituted a part of Czechoslovakia in 1918–38. Between 1919 and 1925 he was an MP in Prague. He also gained the title of papal chamberlain. After the Munich treaty of September 1938 Voloshyn became a leader of circles that saw a chance to create an independent Subcarpathian state supported by Nazi Germany. Under pressure from the Third Reich, Subcarpathia received autonomy within the framework of Czechoslovakia, and on 8 October 1938 Voloshyn became head of the government of the country. On 14 March 1939, at the same time the independence of Slovakia was announced, Voloshyn proclaimed the independence of Subcarpathian Ruthenia and became the president of the new state. When it turned out that on 11 March Germany had already agreed to the incorporation of Subcarpathia into Hungary and Hungarian forces invaded the territory, Voloshyn went to Prague (which was occupied at that time by the Germans) to continue pedagogical work. He became dean and later rector of the Ukrainian university in Prague. In April 1944 Voloshyn contributed to the unification of groups led by Hetman Pavlo Skoropadskyi and Andriy Melnyk and independent factions that remained outside the Ukrainian Supreme Liberation Council into a council advisory to Archbishop Andriy Sheptytskyi. Arrested in Prague by the Soviet security organs, Voloshyn was sent to Lefortovo Prison in Moscow and soon executed there. His Spomyny (Memoirs) were published in exile in 1959. (WR) VORONIN Vladimir (25 May 1941, Corjova, near Kishinev [now Chişinău]), post-Communist Moldovan politician, ethnic Russian. After graduating from a technical high school in Kishinev in 1961, Voronin became the manager of a bakery. From 1966 to 1971 he was director of a similar enterprise in Dubasari and subsequently worked in Moscow's Institute of Food Industry and was active in the district committee of the Communist Party of Moldavia (Partidul Comunist din Moldova [CPM]) in Dubasari and in the CPM regional committee in Ungheni. From 1980 to 1990 Voronin served as deputy to the Supreme Soviet of the Moldavian SSR. In 1983 he became a member of the Academy of Social Sciences of the Central Committee (CC) of the CPSU, a member of the CPSU CC, and head of the CC organizational department. Voronin was first secretary of the district party committee in Bender from 1985 to 1989 and minister of internal affairs (with the rank of general) of the Moldavian SSR from 1989 to 1990. Because he was an opponent of the policy of perestroika and since the CPM lost influence after the parliamentary elections in which the opposition took part, Voronin went to Moscow in 1990; there he worked as a lawyer in the Police Academy of the Ministry of Internal Affairs of the Russian Federation from 1991 to 1993.

In 1993 Voronin served as co-chairman of the organizing committee of a new Communist Party of Moldova (the CPM had been declared illegal in 1991), and in 1994 he became first secretary of the party. Although the Communists and Voronin did not openly question the independence of Moldova, they called for Moldova's close cooperation with the Commonwealth of Independent States (CIS) and for the introduction of Russian as an official language, and they distanced themselves from Romania and the Western countries. Voronin was against privatization, particularly against the privatization of land, and he supported state protectionism. In the 1996 presidential elections, Voronin obtained 10.2 percent of the votes, and in the second round he supported Petru Lucinschi, who became president. In 1997, following a split within the CPM, the party changed its name to the Party of Communists of the Republic of Moldova (Partidul Comuniștilor din Republica Moldova [PCRM]), and Voronin became its chairman. In the 1998 parliamentary elections the PCRM won 40 out of 101 seats, and Voronin became head of the largest parliamentary caucus. In order to enlarge its political base, in 1999 the PCRM partially accepted the existence of a market economy and a multiparty system. However, Voronin still opposed the privatization of land and the main branches of industry. He was also against Moldova's having ties with Romania, Western countries, and such organizations as NATO, the European Union, and the International Monetary Fund.

In 2000, in the face of a conflict between the parliament and President Lucinschi, the PCRM entered into an agreement with center and right-wing parties and succeeded in limiting the president's powers. However, the PCRM failed to elect a new head of state. As part of his struggle against the parliament, Lucinschi called early parliamentary elections, which were held in February 2001 and gave a sweeping victory to the PCRM (71 out of 101 seats). The new parliament elected Voronin as president of Moldova. He assumed the office on 7 April 2001. After his election, Voronin withdrew plans to integrate Moldova into the CIS. However, he did not seek a rapprochement with the West and saw Russia as Moldova's main partner. He also did not insist on the withdrawal of Russian troops from the separatist Transnistria. In 2001 Voronin ceased negotiations with this region concerning its possible unification with Moldova, thus justifying the presence of the Russian troops. At the beginning of 2002 the government established de facto by Voronin introduced Russian as an obligatory subject in schools. (LW)

VOSS Augusts (30 October 1916, Saltykovo, near Tobolsk, Siberia–10 February 1994, Moscow), Latvian Communist activist. Born into a family of Latvian settlers in Siberia, Voss completed teacher training courses and then worked as a teacher at schools in Tyumen Province (1933–36). In 1939 he graduated from the Department of Physics and Mathematics of the State Teachers' Institute in Tyumen and worked as a high school teacher in Armizonskoye. Mobilized into the Red Army in 1940, Voss completed a course for political commanders in 1941 and became a member of the All-Union Communist Party (Bolsheviks) in 1942. During the German-Soviet war he took part in the defense of Moscow, serving in the anti-aircraft units and later becoming deputy commander for political affairs in the Forty-third Latvian Division. Seriously wounded in January 1943, after recovery Voss returned to work as a headmaster of a high school in Vikulovo. In 1945 he went back to Latvia and started working in the apparatus of the Central Committee (CC) of the Communist Party of Latvia (CPL). In 1948 he graduated from the Higher Party School in Moscow and then worked as a secretary of the organizational committee of the CPL at the Latvian State University. In 1953 Voss became a lecturer in economic sciences at the Academy of Social Sciences of the CC of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union (CPSU). He was head of the Department of Culture and Science of the CPL CC (1953–54), a member of the CPL CC (from 1954 onwards), and a deputy to the Supreme Soviet of the Latvian SSR (1955–85). From 1954 to 1960 Voss served as head of the Organizational Department, and from 1960 to 1966, as secretary of the CC of the CPL. In 1966 he became first secretary of the CPL CC and in 1971 a member of the CPSU CC (until 1990). Voss intensified the Russification efforts started by his predecessors. He spoke very little Latvian; therefore, he tried to persuade the party and state apparatus to use Russian, which, according to him, was "the language of Socialist culture." Voss followed a policy of blind loyalty to Moscow and developed a program of industrialization in Latvia that stimulated an influx of Russian labor from the Soviet Union and the Russification of the society. In August 1984 Voss left the leadership of the CPL to assume the post of chairman of the Council of Nationalities of the Supreme Soviet of the Soviet Union and held this post until 1989. Voss authored Pēc Ļeņina novēlējumiem (Lenin's behests; 1968). (EJ)

VRHOVEC Josip (9 February 1926, Zagreb), Yugoslav Communist activist. In 1943 Vrhovec joined the Partisans

led by Josip Broz Tito, and in 1944 he became a member of the Communist Party of Yugoslavia (CPY). In 1951 he completed economic studies in Belgrade. From 1952 to 1969 Vrhovec was the editor-in-chief of the daily Vjesnik and the weekly Vjesnik u srijedu, and he worked as a correspondent in the United States. In January 1970 he became member of the Executive Committee of the Central Committee (CC) of the League of Communists of Croatia (LCC). Vrhovec started to advance through the political ranks after the so-called Croatian Spring, when Tito conducted a purge of the LCC in 1971. From December 1971 to April 1974 Vrhovec served as secretary of the LCC CC Executive Committee. He was a member of the Presidium of the CC of the League of Communists of Yugoslavia (LCY) (May 1974–June 1978, May 1983–May 1984) and chairman of its Committee for Ideological and Theoretical Affairs (May 1974–June 1978). Vrhovec served as federal secretary for foreign affairs (that is, foreign minister) (May 1978–May 1982), chairman of the Presidium of the LCC CC (May 1983–May 1984), and a member of the presidency of the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (14 May 1984–15 May 1989). VUIA Traian (17 August 1872, Surducul Mic [now Vuia Traian]–2 September 1950, Bucharest), Romanian attorney and pioneer of aviation. In 1892 Vuia enrolled in the School of Mechanics of the Technical University of Budapest. After one year, because of financial difficulties, he transferred to the School of Law of Budapest University, where he was able to continue his studies and work at the same time. In May 1901 Vuia earned a Ph.D. in law and then settled in Lugoj, where he designed his first flying machine. Owing to financial constraints, in July 1902 he decided to go to Paris—which was then considered the center of aeronautics—hoping to find someone interested in financing his project. In mid-February 1903 Vuia sent his project proposal to the Paris Academy of Sciences, which rejected it, stating that a heavier-than-air mechanical machine could not possibly fly. Despite many financial difficulties, Vuia did not give up. In the autumn of 1904 he began building an engine of his own invention. In the same year he received a patent for his invention in Great Britain. This aircraft, called the Traian Vuia 1, was completed in December 1905, and on 18 March 1906 it took off and flew a dozen or so meters at Montesson, near Paris. Vuia soon built new prototype machines, the Vuia 1-bis and Vuia 2. Between 1918 and 1922 he also constructed two helicopters. At the Paris Peace Conference in 1919 Vuia supported the Romanian cause in the international arena. In 1925 he designed a steam generator. During the interwar period Vuia continued his research in the field of aeronautics. During World War II he served as chairman of the Romanian National Front in France. In May 1946 he became an honorary member of the Romanian Academy (Academia Română). The name of Vuia's native village has been changed in his honor to Traian Vuia. (PC)

VUJOVIĆ Radomir (8 September 1895, Požarevac–1938? Soviet Union), Communist activist of Serbian descent. In 1911 Vujović joined a Socialist group at school. During World War I he studied in France, where he was active among Serbian students and radical French left-wing groups. In November 1919, under the pseudonym “Wolf,” Vujović attended the founding congress of the Communist Youth International (CYI), a section of the Communist International. He traveled through Western Europe establishing CYI units in Switzerland, Austria, and Germany. At the Second CYI Congress in Moscow (1921), Vujović was elected to its executive committee and became one of its two secretaries. He was a CYI representative accredited to the Comintern. In April 1922 Vujović was a member of a Comintern delegation to a meeting with representatives of other factions of the workers' movement in Berlin. After Willy Münzenberg left in 1923, Vujović became secretary general of the CYI. At the Fifth Congress of the Comintern Vujović became a member of the Executive Committee and the Presidium of the Comintern. He supported the faction led by Leon Trotsky; therefore, after Stalin's offensive, Vujović's position weakened. In May 1927 he was expelled from the Comintern's leadership and then from the party. Arrested in the summer of 1927, Vujović was held in prison for nearly five years. Released in 1932, he went to the Soviet Union. Arrested after Sergey Kirov's assassination in December 1934, Vujović was exiled to Verkhneural'sk and executed, most probably in 1938. (WR)

VUKIČEVIĆ Velimir (11 July 1871, Oparić, Serbia–27 November 1930, Belgrade), Serbian politician. Vukičević finished a gymnasium and then graduated from the Superior School (Velika Škola) in Belgrade (1893). He subsequently worked as a teacher at high schools in Škol and Belgrade. From 1902 to 1904 he was a school inspector in the town of Smederovo and later a lecturer at a teacher training college in Jagodina and a teacher at a high school in Pirot. Elected to the parliament on the ticket of the Serbian Radical Party, Vukičević served as minister of public works (1921–22), minister of post and telegraph (1924), and minister of education (1925). He later became president of the Belgrade stock exchange. On 17 April 1927 Vukičević became prime minister of a government based on the centralist radicals and the Serbian Democratic Party (Srpska Demokratska Stranka [SDS]). The position of his government weakened when the Croatian Peasant Party, led by Stjepan Radić, lost public support. However, Vukičević succeeded in securing the cooperation of the Slovene People's Party instead. The parliamentary elections of July 1927 strengthened the centralist forces and their allies. In February 1928 Vukičević's cabinet remained in power despite a split in the SDS, but protests by the opposition increased, particularly after the Peasant Democratic Coalition demanded a reorganization of the state along federalist lines and rights for the other nationalities equal to those of the Serbs. Parliamentary debates were more and more heated, with outbreaks of fistcuffs and police interventions. Unable to achieve its goals in parliament, the Peasant Democratic Coalition staged street demonstrations. Difficult relations with Italy added to the government's problems. Its concessive attitude caused sharp criticism by the opposition; in answer, government circles launched a press campaign against Radić. On 20 June 1928 a radical deputy fired shots during a heated parliamentary debate, killing two and wounding three opposition deputies, including Radić, who died of his wounds. In the face of the crisis that followed, Vukičević resigned as prime minister on 7 July 1928. (WR)

VUKMANOVIĆ Svetozar, pseudonym "Tempo" (3 August 1912, Podgor, Montenegro–7 December 2000, Reževići), Yugoslav Communist activist. After graduating from high school in Cetinje, Vukmanović studied law in Belgrade. He became an activist in the League of Yugoslav Communist Youth (Savez Komunističke Omladine Jugoslavije [SKOJ]) in 1932 and a member of the Communist Party of Yugoslavia (CPY) in 1933. Arrested several times for his political activities, in October 1940 Vukmanović was elected to the CPY Central Committee (CC), where he used the pseudonym "Tempo." On 26 September 1941 he became commander of the General Staff of Josip Broz Tito's Partisans in Bosnia and Herzegovina. In February 1943, as a delegate of the CPY CC and the General Staff, Vukmanović went to Macedonia, where he strengthened the Communist organization promoting the Yugoslav cause: he established a new CC of the Communist Party of Macedonia and the General Staff of the Partisans in Macedonia, who launched successful military operations. On 20 June 1943, Vukmanović, representing Yugoslavia, and Enver Hoxha, representing Albania, signed a draft agreement on the establishment of a permanent General Staff of the National Liberation Army of the Balkans by August 1943. Vukmanović also discussed this idea in Greece but failed to gain support. As a result of the negative attitude of the Bulgarian Communists, Tito abandoned the idea of establishing the staff in September 1943. However, Vukmanović gained the consent of the Communist Party of Greece for Macedonians to establish separate military units within the Greek People's National-Liberation Army in August 1943.

In March 1945 Vukmanović became deputy minister of national defense, and in 1948, minister of mining. He served as president of the Council for Industry, and from 1953 on he headed the Economic Council, advising the Federal Executive Council. From 1952 to 1958 Vukmanović was vice-president of the Federal Executive Council, and from 1958 to 1967 he was head of the Central Council of Yugoslav Trade Unions. He became a member of the Executive Committee of the CC of the League of Communists of Yugoslavia (LCY) in 1952 and secretary of the CC in 1958. From October 1966 on Vukmanović sat on the LCY CC Presidium. Vukmanović's publications include the following: O narodnoj revoluciji u Grčkoj (1950; How and Why the People's Liberation Struggle of Greece Met with Defeat, 1985); Ekonomski problemi Jugoslavije (Yugoslavia's economic problems; 1954); Aktuelni problemi međunarodnog sindikalnog pokreta (1962; Topical Problems of the International Trade Union Movement, 1962); Problemi razvoja i unapređenja socijalističke poljoprivrede: Izabrani govori i članci (Problems of the development and promotion of Socialist agriculture: Selected speeches and articles; 1967); Revolucija koja teče (Revolution in progress; 1971); Borba za Balkan (1981; Struggle for the Balkans, 1990); Pisma iz Reževića (Letters from Reževići; 1983); and Zašto se i kako raspala Jugoslavija (Why and how Yugoslavia disintegrated; 1994). VUKOTIĆ Janko (18 February 1866, Čevo, Montenegro—4 February 1927, Belgrade), Montenegrin and Yugoslav military commander. In 1886 Vukotić graduated from the Military Academy in Modena, Italy. He subsequently served in the Montenegrin Army and was promoted to brigadier in 1902. After the Montenegrin Army was reorganized in 1910, Vukotić assumed command of the First Division. During the First Balkan War he commanded the eastern front, and in mid-November 1912 the units he led besieged Shkodër. In 1914 Vukotić was appointed chief of staff of the army and commander of the northern front. When the Austro-Hungarian troops launched a southward offensive at the end of October 1915, the army resisted for three months but then surrendered. Vukotić was put in charge of the evacuation of the government from Cetinje. On 12 January 1916 he became commander-in-chief of the army, but the following day the capital was forced to surrender. For a few days he continued to command the retreat. After the capitulation, Vukotić was held prisoner for the rest of the war. When the Kingdom of Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes was established after the end of World War I, Vukotić served in its army (from 1919 on). In 1926 he was promoted to general. (WR)

VULKOV Ivan (19 January 1875, Kazanluk—20 April 1962, Stara Zagora), Bulgarian general and politician. In 1896 Vulkov graduated from the Military School in Sofia and then served in the arsenal, in the artillery, and in other units. In 1909 he graduated in land surveying from the General Staff Academy in St. Petersburg. Vulkov fought in the Balkan Wars (1912–13) as chief of staff of the troops that laid siege to Adrianople (Edirne). From 1913 to 1915 he worked as a lecturer at the Military School in Sofia. After Bulgaria joined World War I on the side of the Central Powers, Vulkov held a variety of military positions, including those of commander of an infantry regiment and chief of staff of an infantry division. From 1919 to 1923 he was the director of the Cartographic Institute. Co-founder (1919) and then chairman of the Military League, Vulkov took part in the military coup of 9 June 1923. After accepting the portfolio of minister of war in the government of Aleksandur Tsankov in June

1923, Vulkov suppressed the Communist uprising of September 1923. After an assassination attempt on the life of Tsar Boris III in Sveta Nedelya Cathedral in Sofia (April 1925), Vulkov unleashed a reign of terror. In January 1926 he became minister of war in the government of Andrei Liapchev and strove to subordinate the Military League to the tsar. When his efforts failed, he tried to replace the Military League with the State Military League (1928). In July 1923 Vulkov became major general, in March 1925 lieutenant general, and in May 1928 colonel general (highest rank of general in Bulgaria). In January 1929 he retired. He subsequently served as minister plenipotentiary to Italy until 1934 and then retired from politics. In 1954 the Communists sentenced Vulkov to death for “activities against the people.” Because of his advanced age, the sentence was commuted to life imprisonment. Vulkov died in prison. His publications include Voenna topografija (Military topography; 1911) and Iztochniia sektor pri blokadata i atakata na Odrinskata krepost 1912–1913 g. (The eastern sector during the blockade and attack on the Adrianople Fortress in 1912–1913; 1913). Vulkov edited the periodicals Godishnik na Geografskia institut pri Ministerstvoto na voinata (1922–29) and Bŭlgarska voenna misul (1943). (JJ)

VYDŪNAS Vilius [originally Storasta] (22 March 1868, near Heydekrug, Prussia [now Šilutė, Lithuania]—20 February 1953, Detmold, West Germany), Lithuanian writer and philosopher. After graduating from a teacher training college in Ragnit, East Prussia (now Neman, Kaliningrad district, Russia), Vydūnas taught French and English at a high school in Tilsit (now Sovetsk, Russia) until 1912. While a student at the Universities of Leipzig and Berlin, he mastered Sanskrit and developed a lifelong interest in Indian philosophy. From 1917 to 1919 Vydūnas taught Lithuanian language and literature at Berlin University. He was the most prominent representative of the Lithuanian community in East Prussia during the interwar period. He strove to develop the Lithuanian culture in the so-called Lithuania Minor and criticized the German policy of Germanization—for example, in the work Sieben Hundert Jahre deutsch-litauischer Beziehungen (1932), for which he was persecuted by the Nazis. In 1935 the Lithuanian cultural institutions that he supported were disbanded. Vydūnas himself was arrested in 1938. Vydūnas’s writings to a great extent drew on Oriental religious philosophy, fashionable during the interwar period. He was a proponent of the doctrines of pantheism and reincarnation. He also promoted an idealistic vision of the medieval pagan culture of Lithuania. Vydūnas's most important works are the dramas Prabočių šešėliai (Shadows of ancestors; 1908), Amžina ugnis (The eternal fire; 1912), and Pasaulio gaisras (The world on fire; 1928). (WR) VYNNYCHENKO Volodymir (7 August 1880, near Kherson–6 March 1951, Mougins, France), Ukrainian writer and politician. In 1901, during his studies at Kiev University, Vynnychenko joined the Revolutionary Ukrainian Party, which in 1905 was transformed into the Ukrainian Social Democratic Party (USDP). From 1907 he was a member of its Central Committee. In his first literary works—Holota (Rascaldom; 1905) and Kto voron? (Who's a crow? 1906)—Vynnychenko depicted the life of the provincial populace, its misery and suffering. Later on he often reached for a means of expression that would show the brutality of social relations. Vynnychenko spent 1907–14 in exile, mainly in France. At that time he wrote many works presenting the experience of the revolution of 1905: the dramas Velykyi molokh (1907; The Great Moloch, 1907), Brekhnia (The lie; 1910), and Chornaya pantera i bilyi medvid (The black panther and the white bear; 1911); the novel Chestnist z soboiu (Honesty to oneself; 1911); and the ironic Zapyšky kyrpatoho Mefistofelia (Notes by Mefisto; 1917). After his return to the Ukraine he joined in the independence activities of the Ukrainian Social Democrats.

In April 1917 Vynnychenko was among the chief founders of the Ukrainian Central Rada (Council). He also assumed the post of its vice-president. In May 1917 he was a member of a Rada delegation to Petrograd that demanded autonomy for the Ukraine and recognition of its provisional government by Russia. After the Russian Provisional Government rejected these demands, on 23 June 1917 Vynnychenko wrote the First Universal of the Rada, proclaiming the independence of the Ukraine. Five days later he became the head of the General Secretariat, which functioned as a provisional executive government, and also headed the Secretariat of Home Affairs. On 11 July 1917 Vynnychenko met with a delegate of the Russian Provisional Government, Alexander Kerenski, who de facto recognized the Secretariat as the Ukrainian government. On 20 November 1917 Vynnychenko signed the Third Universal of the Rada, in which the Ukrainian National Republic (UNR) was proclaimed. Despite the laudable democratic principles and individual freedoms declared by the authorities of the republic, its territory continued to be the scene of peasant attacks on mansions and of Jewish pogroms. The Fourth Universal of the Rada (24 January 1918), after which the UNR was recognized by the Central Powers, also failed to put an end to the atrocities. Nor did it avert the Bolshevik offensive in the northeast of the country. Since Vynnychenko's political line—which relied upon radical revolutionary agitation and at the same time sought an agreement with the Bolsheviks—failed, at the end of January 1918 Vynnychenko resigned from the Secretariat. During the occupation of the Ukraine by the Central Powers Vynnychenko mediated between the representatives of the Rada and Hetman Pavlo Skoropadskyi. On 14 November 1918 Vynnychenko became the head of the Directorate. Under pressure from the Bolshevik offensive, the Directorate had to move to Vynnytsa, where, after another failure to reach an agreement with the Bolsheviks, on 13 February 1919 Vynnychenko resigned from his post and went into exile. There he wrote his three-volume memoirs, Vidrodzhenya Ukrainy (The revival of the Ukraine), describing the struggle for the independence of the country; they were published in Canada in 1985.

After the Bolsheviks created the Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic in January 1920, Vynnychenko accepted the concept of cooperation with Soviet Russia on the basis of the Bolshevik declaration of 6 November 1919 on the sovereignty of the Ukraine. He returned to the Ukraine and discussed joining the USSR government and the Politburo of the Ukrainian Communist Party (Bolshevik). Vynnychenko was appointed vice-president of the Council of People's Commissars of the USSR, but he did not join the party. Disappointed with the lack of possibilities for independent activities and prospects of sovereignty for a Communist Ukraine, Vynnychenko went into exile again. In 1926 in Lviv (Lwów) he published Povrot na Ukrainu (Return to the Ukraine), in which he explained his decision of cooperation with the Bolsheviks. Between 1922 and 1928 Vynnychenko published the Nova Ukraina journal in Prague. After that he left for France, where he mainly wrote. In 1928 he published Soniachna mashyna (Sunny machine), and in 1949, Nova zapovid (New prophecy), in which he outlined Utopian solutions to world conflicts. Other works were published after his death—for example, the novel Slovo za toboiu, Staline (Funeral speech for Stalin; 1971) and Krasa i syla (Beauty and power; 1988). After 1991 many of Vynnychenko's works were reprinted in the Ukraine. (WR)

VYSHYVANYI Vasyl [originally Habsburg-Lothringen Wilhelm] (10 February 1895, Pula, Croatia—after 1949, Soviet Union), Austrian duke, son of Archduke Karl Stephan of Saybusch, Galicia, Austria-Hungary (now Żywiec, Poland). In February 1918 Vyshyvanyi commanded the Austrian troops, including the Ukrainian Sich Riflemen, that entered southern Ukraine. After the Treaty of Brest-Litovsk was signed in February 1918, he supported the cause of Ukrainian independence. In May 1918 he announced—to the indignation of the Galician Poles—that Emperor Charles was ready to divide Galicia between the Poles and the Ukrainians. Because Vyshyvanyi was sympathetic toward the cause of Ukrainian independence, some conservative circles in Ukraine wanted him to become the ruler of Ukraine. In the autumn of 1918 he transferred his headquarters from Zaporizhzhya to Bukovina. In 1919 he served as colonel in the army of the Ukrainian National Republic (UNR) and an adviser to Ataman (commander-in-chief) Symon Petlura. Disinherited from the Saybusch estates, Vyshyvanyi lived in Austria during the interwar period. In August 1947 he was arrested by order of the Soviet Ministry of Internal Affairs (MVD) in Vienna and deported to the Soviet Union, where he either perished in prison (1949 or 1951) or died soon after being released in 1956. VYTVYTSKYI Stepan (13 March 1884, Uhorniki [Uhornyky], Galicia—19 October 1965, New York), Ukrainian politician. Vytvytskyi graduated in law and then earned a doctorate. While a student, he was the leader of the Academic Hromada in Lemberg (Lviv, Lwów) and the Sich Society in Vienna. After graduating, he opened a law practice in Drohobych. He was active in various Ukrainian community organizations. From 1915 to 1918 Vytvytskyi was an editor of the periodicals Dilo and Svoboda. In 1918 he became the secretary of the Ukrainian National Council of the Western Ukrainian National Republic (Ukraiinska Natsionalna Rada Zakhidno-Ukraiinskoy Narodnoy Respubliki [ZUNR]). On 22 January 1919 in Kiev Vytvytskyi took part in the ceremony of uniting the ZUNR and the Ukrainian National Republic (Ukraiinska Narodna Republika [UNR]). He subsequently represented Ukraine in negotiations with the Entente states. In late 1919 Vytvytskyi served as deputy chairman of the UNR Directorate delegation to Warsaw, but then he resigned this post in protest against the position of the Ukrainian government during the negotiations. After the fall of the UNR, Vytvytskyi left for Austria and headed the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of Yevhen Petrushevych's Ukrainian government-in-exile in Vienna. From 1921 to 1923 Vytvytskyi headed the Ukrainian missions in Paris and London. After returning to Poland, he worked as a lawyer. He also served as chairman of the local board of the Prosvita Society in Drohobych and belonged to almost every Ukrainian organization in this city. At that time Vytvytskyi represented a more conciliatory attitude toward Poland. In 1928 he became a deputy senator on the ticket of the Ukrainian National Democratic Alliance (Ukraiinske Natsionalno-Demokratychno Obyednannya [UNDO]), and in 1932 he joined the UNDO Central Committee. In 1938 he became deputy chairman of the UNDO. From 1935 to 1939 Vytvytskyi served as a member of the Polish parliament. After World War II, he lived in Germany, where he co-founded the Ukrainian National Council and served as its vice-president and minister of foreign affairs. Vytvytskyi subsequently moved to the United States, where in 1954 he became president of the UNR government-in-exile. (WR)

WAJDA Andrzej (6 March 1926, Suwałki), Polish film and theater director. During World War II Wajda worked on the railways and attended secret educational classes. He received a degree in painting from Kraków's Academy of Fine Arts in 1949 and in film directing from the State Film School in Łódź in 1953. Wajda made his debut as a film director with the film Pokolenie (Generation) in 1955 and as a theater director at the Wybrzeże Theater in Gdańsk in 1959. One of the main founders of the Polish school of cinematography in the 1950s, Wajda directed such films as Kanał (Canal; 1957) and Popiół i diament (Ashes and diamonds; 1958). He later often drew upon the time of war for inspiration—for example, in the films Krajobraz po bitwie (Landscape after battle; 1970), Korczak (1990), Pierścienek z orłem w koronie (The ring with a crowned eagle; 1992), and Wielki tydzień (Holy Week; 1995). Wajda is also famous for screen adaptations of Polish literary classics, including Popioły (Ashes; 1965), based on a novel by Stefan Żeromski; Brzezina (Birch grove; 1970) and the Oscar-nominated Panny z Wilka (Lasses from Wilko; 1979), based on the prose works of Jarosław Iwaszkiewicz; Wesele (The wedding; 1973), based on a drama by Stanisław Wyspiański; the Oscar-nominated Ziemia obiecana (The promised land; 1975), based on a novel by Władysław Reymont; and Pan Tadeusz (Master Thaddeus; 1998), based on the epic poem by Adam Mickiewicz. Wajda's films presenting the Communist experience include Człowiek z marmuru (Man of marble; 1977), Bez znieczulenia (Without anesthesia/Rough treatment; 1978), and Człowiek z żelaza (Man of iron; 1981). In such films as Wszystko na sprzedaż (Everything for sale; 1969), Polowanie na muchy (Hunting flies; 1969), and Panna Nikt (Miss Nobody; 1996) Wajda dealt with contemporary social issues. Some of his films were made in cooperation with foreign producers; for example, Danton (1983) was made in France. His films often gave rise to heated political and ideological disputes.

Wajda has worked with many theaters, both in Poland (including Kraków's Old Theater and Warsaw's Atheneum and Powszechny Theaters) and abroad (including Berlin's Schaubühne Theater, Moscow's Sovremennik Theater, Tokyo's Benisan Theater, and New Haven's Yale Repertory Theater). His most important theater productions include Wyspiański's Noc listopadowa (November night; 1974); Stanisława Przybyszewska's Sprawa Dantona (The Danton affair; 1975); Z biegiem lat, z biegiem dni . . . (As years go by, as days go by . . . ; 1978); Zbrodnia i kara (Crime and punishment; 1984), based on Fyodor Dostoevsky's novel; and William Shakespeare's Hamlet (1989). Wajda also worked with Polish Television to make the series Ziemia obiecana (1975) and Z biegiem lat, z biegiem dni . . . (1980).

Wajda was artistic director of Film Unit X (1972–83) and president of the Polish Filmmakers' Association (1978–83). In 1982 he became an honorary member of the British Academy of Film and Television Arts (BAFTA) and then a member of the European Film Academy and the Union of European Theaters. In 1988 he joined the Civic Committee of the Chairman of Solidarity, where he chaired a subcommittee for culture and the media. Wajda served as senator (1989–91) and chairman of the Polish President's Council for Culture (1992–94). He became a member of the Polish Academy of Arts and Sciences in 1994 and a member of the French Académie des Beaux-Arts in 1997. In 1987 he received the Kyoto Prize, which allowed him to initiate the establishment of the Manggha Center of Japanese Art and Technology in Kraków (1994). Wajda is the holder of many film awards, including the most prestigious ones: the Grand Prix at the Cannes International Film Festival (1981), the French César Award (1982), the Felix Award (1990), the Silver Bear Award in Berlin (1996), the Golden Lion in Venice (1998), and an Honorary Oscar for Lifetime Achievement (2000). Wajda has received numerous honorary doctorates, as well as the highest state distinctions of Japan, France, and Germany. In 2000 he received the prestigious Grand Award of the Culture Foundation. Wajda critically drew on national tradition but also sought inspiration from universal values. As a result, his films have appealed to audiences throughout the world. By using poetic metaphors and expressive symbolism, he raised contemporary moral issues. Wajda has authored autobiographical books, including Powtórka z całości (Revision of the whole; 1986); Wajda mówi o sobie: Wywiady i teksty (Wajda talks about himself: Interviews and texts; 1991); Podwójne spojrzenie (Double insight; 1998); O polityce, sztuce, o sobie (On politics, art, and himself; 2000); and Kino i reszta świata (The cinema and the rest of the world; 2000). WAŁĘSA Lech (29 September 1943, Popowo, Bydgoszcz Province), Polish worker, social activist, and politician.

In 1961 Wałęsa graduated from a vocational school for agricultural machinery technicians in Lipno. In 1967 he began working as an electrician in the Gdańsk Shipyard (then called the Lenin Shipyard). He took part in the workers' protests in December 1970 and was elected to the strike committee. Arrested and interrogated, he made some commitments to the secret police but did not fulfill them later. Released four days after the fall of Władysław Gomułka's regime, Wałęsa was active in the trade unions, holding a variety of positions, including that of trade union safety inspector. In February 1976 at a trade union meeting Wałęsa criticized the situation in Poland, and as a result he lost his job. After several months, he managed to get a job as an electrician at ZREMB Repair and Construction Works. In June 1978 he began to work with the underground Founding Committee of the Free Trade Unions of Pomerania. In July 1978 he was twice arrested by the secret police, and in December he was fined for taking part in a demonstration commemorating the victims of the December 1970 events, and he was again dismissed from his job. In 1979 Wałęsa became one of the editors of Robotnik Wybrzeża, a periodical of the Free Trade Unions. He was one of the signatories of the Charter of Workers' Rights and a co-organizer of an anniversary demonstration on 18 December 1979 at which he delivered a speech to several thousand people announcing that within a year a monument to the victims of the December 1970 events would be erected. In January 1980 Wałęsa was a member of an unofficial workers' committee whose aim was to defend workers dismissed from Elektromontaż, a large Polish electrical construction firm where he had been working since May 1979. In February 1980 he lost his job again for taking part in protest actions.

On 14 August 1980, after the outbreak of a strike in the Gdańsk Shipyard, Wałęsa climbed over the shipyard fence and joined the workers at a rally inside. Elected head of the Strike Committee, Wałęsa became head of the Inter-Factory Strike Committee (Międzyzakładowy Komitet Strajkowy [MKS]) on 16 August. He led the strike, proving himself to be a charismatic leader with excellent skills in communicating with mass audiences. Wałęsa led the negotiations with Deputy Prime Minister Mieczysław Jagielski. He approached Tadeusz Mazowiecki and Bronisław Geremek with a proposal to establish a committee of experts to advise the MKS. This committee supported Wałęsa during the negotiations with the government delegation. On 31 August Wałęsa signed the August Agreement. He became chairman of the Inter-Factory Founding Committee of Independent Self-Governing Trade Unions in Gdańsk. On 17 September 1980, at a congress of representatives of the new trade unions, a national federation of unions was established under the name of the Independent Self-Governing Trade Union–Solidarity (Niezależny Samorządny Związek Zawodowy "Solidarność"). Wałęsa became chairman of its National Coordinating Commission (Krajowa Komisja Porozumiewawcza), the supreme executive body of the union.

Wałęsa won great popularity as the leader and icon of Solidarity. He had a great ability to sense the mood of crowds at big rallies and easily established excellent rapport with his audience. He emphasized his Catholicism and was in constant touch with Church authorities. He advocated a moderate strategy and tried to avoid an all-out confrontation with the Communist authorities. However, he always agreed to local confrontations when he sensed a determination to undertake them; in all cases, though, he strove for an agreement that would end the conflict and widen the scope of freedom. In March 1981, following the Bydgoszcz conflict, Wałęsa opposed a general strike. In his day-to-day work and during negotiations with the authorities, especially during particularly dramatic conflicts, Wałęsa was supported and advised only by a handful of his close associates and experts. This caused criticism from various groups and circles within Solidarity, which accused him of dictatorial leanings. On 2 October 1981, at the First Congress of Solidarity in Gdańsk, Wałęsa was elected chairman of the union by 55 percent of the votes.

On 13 December 1981 Wałęsa was interned. He was detained in Chylice, near Warsaw, then in Otwock, and in May 1982 he was transferred to Arłamów in the Bieszczady Mountains. He refused to capitulate or to condemn the participants in the civil resistance movement. Released on 14 November 1982, Wałęsa was subsequently treated as a "private person." In 1983 he was again employed as a worker in the Gdańsk Shipyard. He did not go underground but maintained regular contacts with Solidarity activists and advisers, Church authorities, and foreign politicians and journalists. He appealed to the authorities of the Polish People's Republic to restore trade union pluralism. Pope John Paul II granted him special audiences during his pilgrimages to his homeland in 1983 and 1987. In 1983 Wałęsa received the Nobel Prize for Peace. After the amnesty of 1986, Wałęsa established the Provisional Council of Solidarity, transformed into the National Executive Commission in 1987. In May 1988 he joined the strike in the Gdańsk Shipyard, and in August 1988, during another strike, he supported the demand for the legalization of Solidarity. However, Wałęsa accepted an offer to negotiate with the authorities, and on 31 August he met with General Czesław Kiszczak; the meeting marked the beginning of a process of negotiations that ultimately led to the Round Table Talks. On 30 November 1988 Wałęsa took part in a televised debate with Alfred Miodowicz, leader of the state-sponsored All-Polish Alliance of Trade Unions. This debate was widely seen as Solidarity's triumphant return to the official political arena. In December 1988 Wałęsa visited France, where he was received with honors befitting a head of state.

On 18 December 1988 the Civic Committee of the Chairman of Solidarity was constituted. It was composed of the most famous Solidarity activists, as well as experts and organizations that cooperated with Solidarity. On 6 February 1989 Wałęsa took part in the inaugural sessions of the Round Table Talks. He subsequently participated in major decisions that prepared the ground for the agreement of 5 April 1989. Wałęsa did not run in the elections of 4 April 1989, but his photographs with each Solidarity candidate—printed in the form of a poster—were a basic element of the victorious electoral campaign. In August 1989 Wałęsa called for an agreement in the coalition of the Civic Parliamentary Club (Obywatelski Klub Parlamentarny [OKP], consisting of Solidarity MPs and senators), the United Peasant Party (Zjednoczone Stronnictwo Ludowe), and the Democratic Party (Stronnictwo Demokratyczne). He proposed Mazowiecki as a candidate for prime minister. In the fall of 1989 Wałęsa made visits to several West European countries and the United States. On 15 November he spoke in the U.S. Congress, where his speech was received with an ovation. At the end of 1989 Wałęsa began to propose initiatives that were in the government's powers; for example, he demanded the withdrawal of Soviet troops from Poland (January 1990). He also criticized the government for its slowness in reforming the country. At the Second Congress of Solidarity (19–25 April 1990) Wałęsa was reelected its chairman. He announced his intention to run for the office of president of the Republic of Poland.

In the spring of 1990 Wałęsa confronted the government group within the Solidarity camp, declaring the so-called "war at the top." He had the support of those Solidarity circles that had lost direct influence on the government and on the OKP leadership, as well as of many local Solidarity activists. As a result of Wałęsa's efforts, the membership of the Civic Committee of the Chairman of Solidarity was expanded, and a new group of leaders took over the initiative within the committee; consequently, the adherents of Mazowiecki's government left the OKP on 24 June 1990. In his electoral campaign Wałęsa criticized the government and called for accelerated political transformations, decommunization, general ownership reforms ("100 million [zloty] for every citizen"), and a return to grass-roots social activity. Wałęsa obtained 40 percent of the votes in the first

On 22 December 1990 Wałęsa was sworn in as president of the Republic of Poland. However, he never tried to deliver on his election promises. He established a cabinet, led by Jan Krzysztof Bielecki, that continued the economic reforms started by Leszek Balcerowicz (who kept the post of deputy prime minister). Activists of the Center Alliance (Porozumienie Centrum) took charge of the President's Chancellery, but after a conflict with Wałęsa, they resigned on 1 November 1991. Wałęsa dissolved the parliament elected in June 1989 and called free parliamentary elections on 27 October 1991. In the new Assembly, he appointed a cabinet headed by Jan Olszewski, on the motion of a center-right coalition, but his relations with Olszewski were bad. On 4 June 1992, after a scrutiny action by Minister Antoni Macierewicz (who produced a list of alleged Communist collaborators with Wałęsa on it), Wałęsa supported the dismissal of the government. He assigned the post of prime minister to Waldemar Pawlak, leader of the Polish Peasant Party (Polskie Stronnictwo Ludowe [PSL]). In the face of difficulties in forming the government, Wałęsa supported a coalition of Solidarity parties and a cabinet with Hanna Suchocka at the helm (July 1992). After the Assembly passed a vote of no confidence in the government on 28 May 1993, Wałęsa dissolved the parliament and called early elections. These elections, held on 19 September 1993, were based on a new electoral statute. Its results brought defeat to post-Solidarity parties and success to the (post-Communist) Alliance of the Democratic Left (Sojusz Lewicy Demokratycznej [SLD]).

Wałęsa was forced to enter into cooperation with the SLD–PSL coalition, but he maintained the constitutional right to veto Assembly resolutions and continued to have a say in the appointment of the ministers of foreign affairs, interior, and national defense. He often came into conflict with the SLD–PSL coalition and with Prime Ministers Pawlak and Józef Oleksy. Wałęsa's personnel policy was characterized by instability; he tried to justify it with theoretical arguments (for example, the so-called bumper theory, according to which some politicians are needed to front unpopular reforms and should be replaced once they lose the public trust). Wałęsa increasingly relied on the support and advice of his former chauffeur, Mieczysław Wachowski, who was suspected of links with the former Communist security services but was nevertheless promoted to a ministerial position in the President's Chancellery. Wałęsa tried to maintain special relations with top-ranking military officers. He supported the concept of stretching the law to find solutions that would suit him, particularly for personal advantage. This approach came to be known as the “falandization of the law” (from the surname of Minister Lech Falandysz, Wałęsa’s main legal adviser). Between 1990 and 1995 Wałęsa lost the support of successive groups of the intelligentsia and the post-Solidarity parties. He also lost his former ability to establish rapport with the masses, and he withdrew from public meetings. In the 1995 presidential elections Wałęsa obtained 33 percent of the votes in the first round and 48 percent in the second round, losing to Aleksander Kwaśniewski, leader of the SLD. After losing the elections, Wałęsa established the Christian Democratic Party of the Third Republic of Poland (Chrześcijańska Demokracja III Rzeczypospolitej Polskiej), but this party failed to enter the Assembly in the 1997 elections. The Lustration Court cleared Wałęsa of charges of working with the former secret police; therefore, he ran in the 2000 presidential elections, but he gained barely over 1 percent of the vote. Wałęsa authored the memoirs Droga nadziei (1990; Way of Hope, 1987) and Droga do wolności (1991; The Struggle and the Triumph: An Autobiography, 1992). Wałęsa often gave lectures and public speeches in various countries. (AF)

WARSKI Adolf [originally Warszawski] (20 April 1868, Warsaw–1937?, Soviet Union), Polish Communist activist of Jewish descent. Warski finished six grades of high school. He established ties with the revolutionary movement in his youth, becoming a member of the International Social Revolutionary Party Proletariat, and he co-founded the Polish Workers’ Union (Związek Robotników Polskich [ZRP]) in 1889. After the tsarist police broke up the ZRP, Warski went into exile in France and Germany (1892), serving as one of the main leaders of the Social Democracy of the Kingdom of Poland (Socjaldemokracja Królestwa Polskiego [SDKP]), renamed the Social Democracy of the Kingdom of Poland and Lithuania (Socjaldemokracja Królestwa Polskiego i Litwy [SDKPiL]) in 1900. A close associate of Rosa Luxemburg, Warski was one of the leading ideologues of the revolutionary left, which opposed the reconstruction of the Polish state and called for close cooperation with Russia as part of a world revolution. From 1905 to 1907 Warski organized strikes in the Kingdom of Poland. After the failure of the revolution of 1905, he made his way back to Germany, where he was interned during World War I.

In the fall of 1918 Warski returned to Warsaw. He co-founded the Soviets of Workers’ Delegates and the Communist Workers’ Party of Poland (Komunistyczna Partia Robotnicza Polski [KPRP]; renamed the Communist Party of Poland, Komunistyczna Partia Polski [KPP], in 1925). Warski was a member of the Central Committee (CC) (1919–24, 1925–29) and a member of the Politburo of the CC of the party (1928–29). As one of the party leaders, he supported Soviet Russia during the Polish-Soviet war in 1920. After the Treaty of Riga (March 1921), Warski consistently supported the Russian Bolshevik Revolution and maintained close contacts with the Soviet Embassy in Warsaw. However, he was instrumental in the party’s adoption of a modified program on national and agrarian issues. In 1923 Warski supported the faction led by Leon Trotsky in Trotsky’s struggle against Stalin; this led to a conflict within the KPP after the death of Lenin in 1924. As a result, Warski and the activists of the so-called majority faction were expelled from the leadership in July 1924. Warski kept his post as editor-in-chief of Nowy Przegląd, a theoretical periodical of the party. He and the KPP initially supported the coup staged by Józef Piłsudski in May 1926; however, as the pickets organized by the KPP were soon dispersed by the police, the Communists went over to the opposition. In 1926 Warski became a member of parliament by taking over Stefan Królikowski’s seat. He headed the Communist faction from 1928 on. As Communist activities were against the law and the causes Warski promoted were detrimental to the interests of the state, on 13 March 1929 the Polish Assembly stripped him of his parliamentary immunity and made a decision to hand him over to court authorities. On the party’s orders, in April 1929 Warski resigned his parliamentary seat and secretly made his way to the Soviet Union. Accused of “rightist deviation,” he was suspended as a KPP member in the same year. Arrested during the great purges in June 1937, Warski disappeared without trace. He was rehabilitated after the Twentieth CPSU Congress in 1956. In 1958 Warski’s two-volume Wybór pism i przemówień (Selected writings and speeches) was published. (WR)

WASILEWSKA Wanda (21 January 1905, Kraków–29 July 1964, Kiev), Polish Communist activist and writer. Wasilewska’s father, the eminent pro-independence Socialist politician Leon Wasilewski, did not devote much attention to her. In 1923 Wasilewska became a member of the Union of Independent Socialist Youth and established ties with the Communists. In 1927 she graduated in Polish philology from the Jagiellonian University in Kraków and began working as a teacher. She also edited Płomyk and Płomyczek, periodicals for children. She was active in the Workers' University Society. In 1925 Wasilewska began working with the International Organization for Aid to Revolutionaries. From 1934 to 1937 she was a member of the Chief Council of the Polish Socialist Party (Polska Partia Socjalistyczna [PPS]). She was active in the Polish Teachers' Association, in which the extreme left wing gained much influence, and in the League for the Defense of Human and Civic Rights. In 1936, on her initiative, a special issue of Płomyk came out in which the Soviet Union was glorified. Wasilewska co-founded the Congress of Culture Workers in Lwów (Lviv) in 1936 and co-organized a teachers' strike in 1937. Also in 1937 she began to contribute to Dziennik Popularny, a periodical that was linked to the Communist Party of Poland (Komunistyczna Partia Polski [KPP]) and supported a united leftist front. Wasilewska also published articles in both legal and illegal leftist papers and periodicals, including Łamy, Oblicze dnia, Po prostu, and Robotnik. Until 1939 she formally continued as a member of the PPS, although she followed the Kremlin's political line.

During the September 1939 campaign, Wasilewska went to Lwów and became involved in active political and social work under the Soviet occupation. At that time she published propaganda pasquinades on interwar Poland. She was made president of the local branch of the Union of Polish Writers. At the end of 1939 Wasilewska attempted to establish contacts with prewar PPS activists in Warsaw, but her efforts were unsuccessful because at the time of collaboration between the NKVD and the Gestapo she was seen in the company of German officers. As a Soviet citizen, Wasilewska was elected to the Supreme Soviet of the Soviet Union in 1940. In 1941 she joined the All-Union Communist Party (Bolsheviks) and worked on the Main Political Board of the Red Army. From 1941 to 1943 she edited Nowe Widnokregi, a periodical of the Communist left wing in the Soviet Union, and then the periodical Wolna Polska. Wasilewska had close relations with Stalin and initially advocated that Poland enter the state structures of the Soviet Union. At Stalin's instigation, she became president of the Main Board of the Union of Polish Patriots (Związek Patriotów Polskich [ZPP]) in June 1943 and in this capacity closely followed Stalin's guidelines. Wasilewska was the main founder of the Tadeusz Kościuszko First Division. On 15 July 1943 in Sielce on the Oka River she gave a fiery speech to Polish soldiers who were going to the front. In 1944 Wasilewska became a member of the Central Bureau of Polish Communists in the Soviet Union. She completely accepted Stalin's policy toward Poland, and in the summer of 1944 she was a founding member of the Polish Committee of National Liberation (Polski Komitet Wyzwolenia Narodowego [PKWN]), a Kremlin-dependent political structure that competed with the government-in-exile of the Republic of Poland. Wasilewska recommended PKWN members to Stalin. She was formally appointed vice-president of the PKWN and a member of the National Home Council (Krajowa Rada Narodowa [KRN]) but de facto did not exercise the powers of these positions. In the fall of 1944 Wasilewska took part in unsuccessful negotiations at the Kremlin conducted by Stanisław Mikołajczyk, the prime minister of the London-based Polish government-in-exile, with PKWN representatives on the establishment of a common government.

After the war, Wasilewska remained in the Soviet Union, where she married for the third time, this time becoming the wife of the Ukrainian writer Oleksander Kornychuk, and she settled in Kiev. She served as a deputy to the Supreme Soviet of the Soviet Union until 1964. In 1956 she became a member of the World Peace Council. Wasilewska was a leading representative of the propagandist revolutionary and Socialist realist movement in Polish literature. Her most important works include: Oblicza dnia (Colors of the day; 1934); Ojczyzna (Fatherland; 1935); Ziemia w jarzmie (Land under the yoke; 1938); Płomień na bagnach (Flame in the marshes; 1940); Tęcza (Rainbow; 1945); Rzeki płoną (Rivers on fire; 1952); and Że padliście w boju (That you fell in battle; 1958). In 1943 Wasilewska received a Stalin Prize for literature. Her collected writings were published in four volumes in Warsaw (1955–56), based on a similar six-volume Moscow edition. Before her death, Wasilewska recorded her memoirs in Warsaw. They were published in Archiwum Ruchu Robotniczego (Archives of the Workers' Movement) in 1982. (WD/WR) historian; father of Wanda Wasilewska. Wasilewski graduated from high school in St. Petersburg and then completed his studies in Lemberg (Lwów, Lviv) and Prague. While a student, he joined the National League (Liga Narodowa) and served as a member from 1893 to 1894. He dealt with ethnic issues relating to the Ukrainians and the Czechs. After graduation, Wasilewski went to Switzerland, where he joined the Union of Polish Socialists Abroad (Związek Zagraniczny Socjalistów Polskich [ZZSP]) in 1896. Elected to the ZZSP leadership at a congress of the ZZSP in 1897, he became one of the leaders of the Polish Socialist Party (PPS). He then took up the post of editor of Przedświt and moved along with this periodical to Kraków in 1903. During the 1905 revolution Wasilewski was briefly active in the Kingdom of Poland. After a split in the Polish Socialist movement in 1906, he was a leading activist of the PPS–Revolutionary Faction and a member of its Central Workers' Committee (along with Józef Piłsudski and Walery Sławek). He also edited Robotnik. A secretary of the Commission of Confederated Independence Parties from 1912 onwards, Wasilewski was one of the closest co-workers of Piłsudski during World War I. He was active in the Polish National Organization (Polska Organizacja Narodowa) (1914), the Supreme National Committee (Naczelny Komitet Narodowy) (1914–17), the Central National Committee (Centralny Komitet Narodowy) (1917), the Convention of Organization A (Konwent Organizacji A, a top secret group that operated during the time when Piłsudski was interned), and the Polish Military Organization (Polska Organizacja Wojskowa).

WASILEWSKI Leon, pseudonyms "Leon Płochocki" and "Osarz" (24 August 1870, St. Petersburg–10 December 1936, Warsaw), Polish politician, diplomat, and

After Poland regained its independence, Wasilewski served as minister of foreign affairs in the government of Jędrzej Moraczewski from November 1918 to January 1919. He then went to Paris, where he represented Piłsudski, the chief of state, on the Polish National Committee (Komitet Narodowy Polski) until April 1919. He subsequently worked with the Polish delegation to the Paris Peace Conference. After returning to Poland, Wasilewski dealt with Poland's relations with the Baltic states and Ukraine. From August 1919 to January 1920 he was in charge of a campaign aimed at establishing a government in Lithuania that would be favorably inclined toward Poland. In the autumn of 1920 he joined the Polish delegation to peace negotiations with Soviet Russia, and in March 1921 he was a signatory of the Riga Peace Treaty. Wasilewski supported the “Promethean” program, which called for independence for the Kremlin-dominated nations of the Soviet Union. In 1928 he became a member of the PPS Chief Board and its vice-president in 1931. Wasilewski was a member of the moderate wing of the party. In 1924 he became president of the Institute for Research in the Modern History of Poland; in 1929 an editor of its press organ, Niepodległość; and in 1931 president of the Institute for Ethnic Affairs. He was a member of the editorial committee of Piłsudski's Pisma—Mowy—Rozkazy (Writings, speeches, orders). An expert on ethnic issues in Central and Eastern Europe, Wasilewski authored the following (among other works): Narodowości Austro-Węgier (The nations of Austria-Hungary; 1907); Kwestia żydowska na ziemiach dawnej Rzeczypospolitej (The Jewish question in the lands of the former Republic of Poland; 1913); Śląsk polski (Polish Silesia; 1915); Polityka narodowościowa Rosji (Russia's ethnic policy; 1916); Rosja wobec Polaków w dobie konstytucyjnej (Russian attitudes toward the Poles during the constitutional period; 1916); Kresy Wschodnie (The Polish Eastern Territories; 1916); Ukraińska sprawa narodowa w jej rozwoju historycznym (The historical development of the Ukrainian national issue; 1925); Zarys dziejów PPS (An outline of the history of the PPS; 1925); Sprawy narodowościowe w teorii i życiu (Ethnic issues in theory and practice; 1929); Skład narodowościowy państw europejskich (The ethnic composition of European states; 1933); Kwestia ukraińska jako zagadnienie międzynarodowe (The Ukrainian question as an international issue; 1934); and Józef Piłsudski jakim go znałem (Józef Piłsudski as I knew him; 1935). WASIUTYŃSKI Wojciech (8 September 1910, Warsaw–19 August 1994, Rye, New York), Polish journalist and politician. Wasiutyński completed high school in Warsaw and graduated from the School of Law of Warsaw University in 1932. In 1936 he received a Ph.D. in the history of Polish law. During his studies he began writing for the national democratic press, and after graduating, Wasiutyński was one of the founders of the Radical Nationalist Camp (Obóz Narodowo-Radykalny [ONR]) which had elements of a totalitarian regime. He co-authored the ONR program declaration of September 1934 and the ONR Falangist program of 1937. He also presented his views in the book Naród rządzący (The ruling nation; 1934). In September 1939, along with a wave of refugees from Warsaw, Wasiutyński found himself in the Eastern Borderlands (Kresy), and then via Hungary he managed to get to France. There he was active in the National Party (Stronnictwo Narodowe [SN]). After the collapse of France Wasiutyński was threatened with arrest; therefore he left for Great Britain in September 1942. He served in the Tenth Dragoon Regiment in Scotland and then was assigned to the diplomatic service. From September 1944 he was again in active service and worked in the press section of the First Armored Division. After the demobilization Wasiutyński settled in London. Between 1948 and 1957 he was an editor of Mysł Polska and wrote for other emigrant magazines. He also worked with Radio Free Europe (RFE), the Polish Section of the BBC, and the Voice of America. In 1957 Wasiutyński was elected president of the Association of Polish Journalists in London. However, he resigned this post in 1958 because he assumed the post of deputy, and then director, of the Polish section of the RFE in New York. Wasiutyński moved to the United States, where he edited Nowy Dziennik and also wrote for the London Wiadomości. From 1958 until his death Wasiutyński was president of the Roman Dmowski Institute in New York. In postwar works Wasiutyński rejected totalitarian views and considerably broadened his political perspective. He published, for example, Tysiąc lat polityki polskiej (A thousand years of Polish policy; 1946); Millenium—tysiąclecie Polski chrześcijańskiej, 996–1966 (The millennium of Christianity in Poland, 996–1966; 1964); and an analysis of the history of the nationalist movement, Czwarte pokolenie (The fourth generation; 1982). He also wrote for the underground press in Poland. Wasiutyński exerted an ideological influence upon the Young Poland Movement in Poland. (WR)

WEISS Peter (7 July 1952, Bratislava), post-Communist Slovak politician. In 1975 Weiss completed his studies in philosophy at the university in Bratislava. From 1975 to 1989 he worked at the Marx-Lenin Institute of the Central Committee (CC) of the Communist Party of Slovakia (CPS), where he did research on Slovak society. In December 1989 he joined the CC of the CPS and the CC of the Communist Party of Czechoslovakia (CPC). In January 1990 he became president of the Executive Committee of the CC of the CPS. After the Velvet Revolution, Weiss was a representative of the younger, undiscredited Communist activists, quickly becoming one of the top party leaders. In June 1990 he became a deputy to the Slovak National Council, and in October, at a congress of the CPS in Prešov, he was elected the party's leader. Weiss insisted that the party dissociate itself from its disgraceful past and called for its transformation into a Western-style Social Democratic party. In order to make this transformation credible, in January 1991 the party changed its name to the Party of the Democratic Left (Strana Demokratickej L'ovice [SDL]), and in December 1991 a decision was made that the SDL leave the confederation with the Czech Communists, who had failed to undertake any internal reforms. These changes brought results: in the elections of June 1992 the SDL received almost 15 percent of the vote, becoming the second most influential party in Slovakia, and Weiss was elected deputy speaker of the Slovak parliament. In the elections of September and October 1994 the SDL achieved unsatisfactory results, which undermined Weiss's position. On 28 April 1996 at a congress in Nitra, Weiss lost the position of party chairman to Jozef Migaš. Weiss became SDL vice-chairman responsible for foreign policy and held this post until August 2000. From October 1998 to September 2002 Weiss served as chairman of a parliamentary committee for foreign affairs. However, he was losing influence in the SDL, which under Migaš's leadership increasingly drifted toward the left. In January 2002, along with (among others) Brigita Schmögnerova, Weiss left the SDL and founded the Social Democratic Alternative (Sociálnodemokratická Alternatíva [SDA]) on 20 February 2002. At the founding congress of the SDA on 13 April 2002 Weiss was elected its deputy chairman. In the elections of September 2002 the SDA received only 1.8 percent of the vote and failed to enter parliament; therefore, taking responsibility for this failure, Weiss resigned. (PU)

WEKERLE Sándor (14 November 1848, Mór–26 August 1921, Budapest), Hungarian politician. Born into a German family that had settled in Hungary, Wekerle graduated in law from Budapest University. In 1870 he became an official in the Ministry of Finance, in 1878 head of a department, and in 1882 ministerial adviser. In 1886 Wekerle became secretary of state and actually directed the finances of the state. From 1889 to 1895 Wekerle served as minister of finance, becoming the leading financial expert of the Habsburg monarchy. He reorganized the tax system and the financial accounts of Austria-Hungary, and he drafted bills on consumption taxes on sugar and alcohol, excise duties on tobacco, and the commutation of royalties and the conversion of national debts. In November 1892 Wekerle became prime minister and simultaneously held the portfolio of minister of finance.

The first Hungarian prime minister with a middle-class background, he established a balanced budget and made a switch to the gold standard. He also drafted legislation on the separation of church and state. With some effort, Wekerle pushed through bills introducing vital statistical records and obligatory civil marriages. In exchange for Emperor Francis Joseph's signature endorsing these bills, Wekerle offered to resign, which he did on 1 January 1895.

From 1896 to 1906 Wekerle was president of the Administrative Court and later also held the post of director of the National Casino. In 1905 the Liberal Party, which had ruled the country for thirty years, lost the elections to the opposition "national coalition," which drew on the tradition of the 1848–49 Hungarian Revolution and criticized the agreement of 1867 that gave Hungary autonomy in internal affairs. After more than a year of tension, Francis Joseph agreed that the "national coalition" could establish a government, on condition that the coalition would not change the foundations of the dualist state. This condition was accepted. On 8 April 1906 Wekerle—a politician faithful to the idea of the agreement of 1867—became head of this coalition government. He also served as minister of finance. Among other things, Wekerle planned to reform the tax system, but because he had to make numerous concessions since he did not have a sufficient political base (although he had joined the co-ruling Constitutional Party), only some of the reforms he had planned were implemented. Wekerle resigned on 17 January 1910. He became prime minister for the third time on 20 August 1917, becoming head of a minority government and trying to prevent the collapse of the monarchy. His plans to extend voting rights and grant broad autonomy to national minorities within the framework of the Hungarian kingdom ended in failure. On 31 October 1918, three days after Wekerle's resignation, a republican government led by Count Mihály Károlyi was established. Under the Hungarian Soviet Republic, Wekerle was held under arrest as a hostage. From the autumn of 1919 onwards he was involved only in business. Wekerle served as a member of parliament four times (1887–96, 1906–10, 1917–18, and 1920–21), always representing the party then in power. He was elected a corresponding member (1914) and then a full member (1918) of the Hungarian Academy of Sciences. He was a member of the Freemasons. (JT)

WEÖRES Sándor (22 June 1913, Szombathely–22 January 1989, Budapest), Hungarian poet and writer. Born into a wealthy family with landed gentry and military traditions, Weöres received a thorough education in his youth, studying aesthetics, history, law, and philosophy (he earned a Ph.D. in 1939). In 1928 he made his literary debut with the short story "Egyszer régen" (Once) and with poems published in the daily Hír and in papers and periodicals for youth. In 1932 Weöres published his poems in Nyugat, the leading Hungarian literary periodical of the time. He soon became one of its main contributors. Weöres published his first collection of poems, Hideg van (Cold), in 1934. In 1941 he founded and co-edited the Pécs-based periodical Sorsunk. After the end of World War II, Weöres moved to Budapest. An opponent of Socialist realism, he found it increasingly difficult to find a job and to publish his works. From 1949 on he published only translations that he did, as well as poems for children, which, because of their remarkable content and unique melody, were a part of the school canon for several generations of Hungarians. At the end of 1956 Weöres published A hallgatás tornya (The tower of silence), a collection of poems he had written over a period of thirty years; following this, he was again unable to publish anything until the mid-1960s. In 1970 Weöres received the Kossuth Prize, the nation's highest award for artists. Apart from poems and translations from many languages, Weöres also tried his hand at writing dramas: Színhátékok (Dramas; 1983). He won the widest acclaim for the poetic novel Psyché (Psyche; 1972), the history of a poetess' life written in nineteenth-century language. This novel was adapted for the stage many times and for the screen in 1979. Weöres's poems are characterized by a great richness of content, form, and language. The range of his inspiration is impressive, from antique cultures to African mythology and Chinese poetry. He was a master in the use of parable and allusion. He saw the absurdity of the world around him and the increasing mechanisms of self-destruction of man and man-made civilization. English-language translations of Weöres's poetry include Selected Poems (1970), If All the World Were a Blackbird: Poems (1985), and Eternal Moment: Selected Poems (1988). (MS)

WERBLAN Andrzej (30 October 1924, Tarnopol [now Ternopil, Ukraine]), Polish Communist activist and

historian. Werblan was born into a family of teachers. In September 1939 he found himself in the Soviet territories. Exiled to Siberia, he joined the Polish Army in the Soviet Union in 1943. He remained in the army until 1947 and then joined the Polish Socialist Party (Polska Partia Socjalistyczna [PPS]). In April 1948 Werblan became a member of the PPS Chief Council and first secretary of the PPS Provincial Committee in Białystok. In December 1948 he joined the Polish United Workers' Party (Polska Zjednoczona Partia Robotnicza [PUWP]). From 1952 to 1955 he studied history at Warsaw University, graduating in 1954, and at the Institute of Social Sciences of the PUWP CC, earning a doctorate from Adam Mickiewicz University in Poznań. Werblan simultaneously rose through the party ranks: he became a deputy member of the CC in 1948 and then served as a member of the PUWP CC from 1956 to 1981. In 1952–56 he was an MP in the Assembly. He headed the CC Propaganda and Agitation Department (beginning in 1956), the CC Propaganda and Press Department (1956–57), the CC Propaganda Department (1957–60), and the PUWP CC Education Department (1960–71). Regarded as an ally of Mieczysław Moczar, Werblan played a certain role in the anti-intelligentsia and anti-Semitic witch hunt of March 1968. He was an MP in the Assembly for the second time from 1961 to 1985, serving as deputy speaker from 1971 to 1982. The editor-in-chief of Nowe Drogi from 1972 to 1974, Werblan was seen as one of the leading party ideologues. He was a member of the CC Secretariat (December 1971–February 1974), secretary of the PUWP CC (until December 1980), and director of the PUWP CC Institute for Fundamental Issues in Marxism-Leninism (until 1981). In 1974 Werblan became an associate professor of political science at the University of Silesia. In 1975 he became a member of the Assembly committee for drafting amendments to the constitution of the Polish People's Republic; these amendments formalized the alliance between the Polish People's Republic and the Soviet Union, as well as the leading role of the PUWP. Werblan was a member of the PUWP CC Politburo (February–December 1980) and chairman of the PUWP Parliamentary Caucus in the Assembly (April–December 1980). After 1981 he increasingly dissociated himself from the party line and leaned toward its liberal faction. From 1981 to 1983 Werblan was a member of the Presidium of the All-Polish Committee of the National Unity Front. Werblan's numerous publications include Władysław Gomułka, sekretarz generalny PPR (Władysław Gomułka, the secretary general of the PPR; 1988). Werblan edited and prepared for printing Gomułka's Pamiętniki (Memoirs; 1994). (PK)

WIDY-WIRSKI Feliks (11 July 1907, Lwów [Lviv]–15 January 1982, Warsaw), Polish politician. After high school in Brodnica, Widy-Wirski completed medical studies at Poznań University in 1931. From 1932 he practiced as a gynecologist and was known for performing illegal abortions. He belonged to a pro-government faction of the National Workers' Party–Left (Narodowa Partia Robotnicza–Lewica) and to the radical Association of Polish Democratic Youth (Związek Polskiej Młodzieży Demokratycznej). Widy-Wirski was close to the radical left; for instance, he wrote approvingly of Lenin. Wounded in the September 1939 campaign, Widy-Wirski was taken prisoner of war, but he was released in 1940. He went to Warsaw and joined the underground activities of the radical group Zryw (Upsurge), transformed into the Party of National Upsurge. In November 1944 the party proclaimed itself in favor of the Polish Committee of National Liberation (Polski Komitet Wyzwolenia Narodowego), and Widy-Wirski was included in the National Home Council (Krajowa Rada Narodowa). At the beginning of 1945 Widy-Wirski became a member of the Communist Polish Workers' Party. On its behalf, along with Zygmunt Felczak, he reconstructed the prewar Christian Democratic Labor Party (Stronnictwo Pracy [SP]) and became its vice-president in July 1945. When the real SP leaders began to return to their official activities, they had to accept a fifty-fifty parity in the party leadership with the Upsurge activists. In July 1946, when the real Christian Democratic leaders gave up their membership in the party, which was actually controlled by the Communists, and unsuccessfully tried to form a separate party, Widy-Wirski became SP chairman. At the same time, he was provincial governor (wojewoda) in Poznań and deputy minister of information (from September 1946 to April 1947). Widy-Wirski became an MP after the falsified parliamentary elections of January 1947. Later he was deputy minister of culture and deputy minister of navigation. After the dissolution of the SP, some of its leaders joined the satellite Democratic Party, and Widy-Wirski joined its leadership. Since he was closely connected to Władysław Gomułka, on 2 November 1952 Widy-Wirski was arrested. Interrogated as a witness during preparations for Gomułka's trial and released in December 1954, Widy-Wirski was later deputy minister of health and a professor at the Polish Academy of Sciences. In 1956 he was accepted into the Polish United Workers' Party (Polska Zjednoczona Partia Robotnicza). A delegate to its Third and Fourth Congresses and an MP from 1957 to 1965, Widy-Wirski was a member of the leadership of the Association of Fighters for Freedom and Democracy (Związek Bojowników o Wolność i Demokrację). (WR)

WIED Wilhelm von (26 March 1876, Neuwied–18 April 1945, Predeal, Romania), prince of Albania. The son of Adolf Maximilian Karl Wied and Princess Mary of the Netherlands, Wied was also related to the Romanian ruling family of Hohenzollern-Siegmaringen. He served as an officer in the German Army. In July 1913, at a Conference of Ambassadors in London, under pressure from the Central Powers, Wied was elected prince of Albania. His rank as an officer and the fact that as a Protestant he did not identify himself with any of the major religious groups in Albania won Wied respect among the Albanian people. In February 1914 a delegation of Albanians headed by Essad Pasha Toptani came to the castle of Neuwied, where he lived, and invited him to accept the Albanian crown. In March 1914 Wied arrived in Albania along with his wife and a group of advisers. He established his residence in Dürres, which was designated as the capital of the country. Despite his official title of mbret (king), the Albanian people more often called him princ (prince). As the situation of the country was unstable, Wied's power was limited to a small part of the territory that was granted to Albania. His prestige among the Albanian people diminished significantly after he took refuge in a ship during an attack by the Muslim rebels on Dürres. Wied left Albania on 3 September 1914 because of the outbreak of World War I. However, he promised to return as soon as the international situation became stable. During the war Wied fought on the eastern front as a captain in the German Army. In January 1920 the congress in Lushnje, which defined the new political system of Albania, deprived him of the throne. Only the Italian diplomatic service worked for his return to the throne, at the price of maintaining Italian influence in Albania. After World War I, Wied and his family lived in the Tyrol and Munich and, from 1925, on the Romanian estate of his wife, Princess Sofia Waldenberg. In interviews, Wied repeatedly asserted that he was ready to return to the Albanian throne. (TC)

WIELOWIEYSKI Andrzej (16 December 1927, Warsaw), Polish journalist and politician. During the German occupation in World War II, Wielowieyski served as a soldier of the Home Army. After the war, he was a member of the Union of Rural Youth of the Republic of Poland called Wici (Związek Młodzieży Wiejskiej Rzeczypospolitej Polskiej–Wici [ZMW RP–Wici]). After receiving a law degree from the Jagiellonian University in 1947, Wielowieyski worked as a clerk. In 1961 he joined the editorial staff of the monthly Więź. He served as a member (from 1957), vice-chairman (1965–72), and secretary (1972–81 and 1984–89) of the Club of the Catholic Intelligentsia (Klub Inteligencji Katolickiej) in Warsaw. He was elected to the leadership of Pax Romana, the International Catholic Movement for Intellectual and Cultural Affairs. In 1978 Wielowieyski co-founded the “Experience and Future” seminar series and co-authored “Raport o stanie Rzeczypospolitej i drogach wiodących do jej naprawy” (Report on the condition of the Republic of Poland and ways to improve it), which included a description of the crisis in Poland and proposals for reforms that would not undermine the foundations of the political system of the Polish People's Republic. Wielowieyski subsequently co-authored further “Experience and Future” reports. In August 1980 he was an expert-adviser to the Inter-Factory Strike Committee in the Gdańsk Shipyard. He subsequently became an adviser to the National Coordinating Commission (Krajowa Komisja Porozumiewawcza) of Solidarity and headed its Center for Social and Labor Initiatives. From 1981 to 1985 Wielowieyski was a member of the Primate's Social Council and a journalist for church periodicals, including Królowa Apostołów and Gość Niedzielny. From 1983 on he was one of the advisers to Solidarity (which had been declared illegal during martial law in Poland). Wielowieyski played an important role in getting negotiations started between Solidarity and the Communist authorities in 1988. In December 1988 he became a member of the Citizens' Committee of the Chairman of Solidarity. From February to April 1989 he took part in the Round Table Talks. In 1989–91 Wielowieyski served as deputy speaker of the Senate. In 1991 he became an MP in the Assembly. He was also a member of the Citizens' Parliamentary Caucus. He joined the Democratic Union (Unia Demokratyczna) in 1991 and subsequently was a member of the Freedom Union (Unii Wolności) from 1994 to 2001. In 1992–93 Wielowieyski was vice-chairman of the Polish delegation to the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe. He authored many works devoted to socioeconomic issues and to Catholic sexual ethics and education, including Przed nami małżeństwo (Preparing for marriage; 1974). (AF)

WIERZBICKI Andrzej (7 June 1877, Warsaw–11 February 1961, Warsaw), Polish engineer, businessman, and politician. Wierzbicki graduated from the Technological Institute in Petersburg. From 1910 he belonged to the National League, and from 1912 he was director of the Association of Industrialists of the Kingdom of Poland. During World War I Wierzbicki was a member of the Central Civic Committee, the Main Charity Council (Rada Główna Opiekuńcza), and the Inter-Party Circle connected with National Democracy. In 1916–17 he was a member of the Provisional Council of State (Tymczasowa Rada Stanu). In 1917–18 he was one of the leaders of the Society for Economic Independence, a political representation of Polish big business. In November 1918 Wierzbicki became minister of industry and trade in the government of Józef Świerzyński. In 1919 he joined the National Committee of Poland and headed the Polish economic delegation to the Paris Peace Conference. On his return to Poland in 1919 Wierzbicki was co-founder of the Central Association of Polish Industry, Mining, Trade, and Finance, called the Lewiatan for short. In the following years he played a key role in the association as its general director and, from 1932, chairman of the board. Wierzbicki was a member of the boards of many enterprises and banks, including Bank Handlowy w Warszawie S.A. (1918–20 and 1928–49) and the Bank of Poland (1928–32), as well as of government advisory bodies. In 1919–28 he was an MP on behalf of National Democracy and, in 1935–38, on behalf of the ruling Sanacja. In September 1939 Wierzbicki joined the Committee for the Defense of Warsaw. During the Nazi occupation he was imprisoned in Pawiak Prison in Warsaw and Montelupi Prison in Kraków. After the war he retired. Among other works, Wierzbicki authored Idea i taktyka gospodarcza (Economic ideas and practice; 1928), Program gospodarczy Lewiatana (The economic program of the Lewiatan; 1933), and W terenie i z trybuny (On the premises and from the tribunal; 1936), as well as the memoirs Pamiętniki i dokumenty (Memoirs and documents; 1957) and Żywy Lewiatan (Lewiatan alive; 2001). WITASZEWSKI Kazimierz (1 April 1906, Warsaw?–22 February 1992, Warsaw), Polish Communist activist. Born into a working-class family, Witaszewski was a textile worker. A trade union activist, he was imprisoned at Bereza Kartuska for his activities in the Communist Party of Poland (Komunistyczna Partia Polski [KPP]). During World War II he found himself in the Soviet Union. A political officer in the Polish Army in the Soviet Union (1943–44), Witaszewski was one of the Kremlin's most trusted co-workers. In 1944 he joined the (Communist) Polish Workers' Party (Polska Partia Robotnicza [PPR]) and briefly served as head of the Trade Union Department of the PPR Central Committee (CC). He subsequently became mayor of the city of Łódź. In 1944 Witaszewski became a deputy to the National Home Council (Krajowa Rada Narodowa [KRN]), and until 1956 he served as an MP in the Legislative Assembly and the Assembly. He was secretary general of the Provisional Central Commission of Trade Unions (1944–45) and then chairman of the Central Commission of Trade Unions (November 1945–November 1948). From 1948 to 1949 he was deputy minister of labor and social policy. Witaszewski joined the Polish United Workers' Party (Polska Zjednoczona Partia Robotnicza [PUWP]) in December 1948 and was a member of the PUWP CC from 1948 to 1968. He served as first secretary of the PUWP Provincial Committee in Wrocław (1949–51) and head of the PUWP CC Personnel Department (1951–52). From 1952 to 1956 he was deputy minister of national defense, head of the Main Political Board of the Polish Army, and one of the closest co-workers of Marshal Konstantin Rokossovsky. Witaszewski was aligned with the dogmatic Natolin faction (Natolińcy), and in the spring of 1956 he was against the dissemination of Nikita Khrushchev's secret report, which exposed Stalin's crimes. A supporter of hard-line policies, Witaszewski was called "General Bludgeon," an allusion to his preference for brutal methods of solving conflicts. As a result of the "thaw" in 1956, he lost his post and served as a military attaché in Prague from 1957 to 1959.

As part of his struggle against the liberal faction in the PUWP, Władysław Gomułka appealed for support from members of the Natolin faction, including Witaszewski, whom he appointed head of the Main Political Board of the Polish Army in 1959. From 1960 to 1968 Witaszewski headed the crucial Administrative Department of the PUWP CC. He was in charge of (among other things) controlling government and personnel affairs in the special services and the army, as a result of which he held a particularly strong position in the power structure. He was personally involved in actions against the Catholic Church—for example, trying to prevent the construction of a church in Nowa Huta in 1960 and in sabotaging the 1966 celebrations of the Millennium of Christianity in Poland. From 1968 to 1971 Witaszewski was a member of the PUWP Central Audit Commission. (PK)

WITKIEWICZ Stanisław Ignacy, pseudonym “Witkacy” (24 February 1885, Warsaw–18 September 1939, Jeziory [Ozery], Volhynia), Polish painter, playwright, and art theoretician. Witkiewicz’s father, Stanisław Witkiewicz, was a writer, painter, literary critic, and leading thinker of the Young Poland movement. Brought up in an atmosphere of artistic freedom, already in his childhood Witkiewicz showed great abilities combined with an unbridled imagination. From 1904 to 1910 he studied at the Academy of Fine Arts, under, among others, Józef Mehoffer. He traveled extensively in Germany, Italy, and France, exploring modern tendencies in art. In 1914 he went to Australia as an illustrator for an anthropological expedition led by Bronisław Malinowski. At the end of World War I, as an officer in the tsarist guard regiment, Witkiewicz witnessed the Bolshevik revolution—a traumatic experience that left a distinctive stamp on his work and ultimately on his life. In 1918 he settled in Zakopane, where he painted and wrote and was a founding member of a group called Formiści Polscy (Polish Formists). Witkiewicz was an exponent and theoretician of the “pure form” theory, which ignored existing cultural content and values. He included the concepts of “pure form” in a number of his studies, including Nowe formy w malarstwie i wynikające stąd nieporozumienia (New forms in painting and the resulting misunderstandings; 1919); Szkice estetyczne (Esthetic sketches; 1922); and Teatr: Wstęp do teorii Czystej Formy w teatrze (Theater: An introduction to the pure form theory in theater; 1923). From 1925 to 1927 Witkiewicz ran the experimental Formist Theater in Zakopane, and in 1926 in Warsaw he opened a commercial “portrait studio,” where he painted—often under the influence of drugs—original, expressionist portraits of various people. He also wrote many plays, but they were seldom staged during the interwar period because they included shocking scenes and dialogue. Witkiewicz’s theatrical works include Tumor Mózgowicz (Tumor brainowich; 1921); Kurka wodna (The water hen; 1922); W małym dworku (1923; Country House, 1997); Jan Maciej Karol Wścieklica (1925); and Mątwą (The cuttlefish; 1933), as well as Szewcy (Shoemakers; premiere in 1957), Matka (1964; The Mother and Other Unsavory Plays: Including the Shoemakers and They, 1993), and Oni (They; 1966), which were not staged during his lifetime. Witkiewicz also published fantasy and grotesque novels, including 622 upadki Bunga czyli demoniczna kobieta (1910; The 622 Downfalls of Bungo or the Demonic Woman, 2000); Pożegnanie jesieni (Farewell to autumn; 1927); and Nienasyce (1930; Insatiability: A Novel in Two Parts, 1977). He wrote Pojęcia i twierdzenia implikowane przez pojęcie istnienia (Concepts and theses entailed by the concept of existence; 1935), a philosophical treatise in which he outlined the system of biological monadism.

Witkiewicz’s works are characterized by a great freedom of composition, macabre humor, and the surrealistic grotesque. In his works he depicted the disintegration of traditional society and its values. Highly regarded by some and considered a scandalmonger and amateur by others, Witkiewicz was a member of the artistic avant garde of interwar Poland. He became subject to recurrent fits of depression and committed suicide upon hearing of the Soviet invasion of Poland. His dramas became very famous in the 1960s, when they began to be staged in Western Europe and soon thereafter throughout the world. At first considered a pioneer and then a classic writer of twentieth-century absurdist literature, Witkiewicz earned his place in the pantheon of world literature, and his works were translated into many languages. In 1970–74 a three-volume edition of his Pisma zebrane (Collected writings) was published in Kraków. His Seven Plays were published in English in 2004. (WR)

WITOS Wincenty (22 January 1874, Wierzchosławice, near Tarnów–31 December 1945, Kraków), Polish Peasant Party politician. Witos’s father was a smallholder and sometimes worked as a woodcutter. Witos was a very gifted child, but because of poverty he finished only a rural elementary school, and then he ran a farm. In 1891 he took part in the electoral campaign for Jakub Bojko, a Galician peasant leader. From 1895 to 1899 he served in the Austrian Army and then joined the Polish Peasant Party (Polskie Stronnictwo Ludowe [PSL]). In 1903 Witos was elected to the PSL Chief Council, and then he became the mayor of the municipality of Wierzchosławice. In 1908 he became an MP in the Galician Provincial Diet in Lemberg (Lwów, Lviv) and in 1911 an MP in the Austrian parliament in Vienna. In December 1913 Witos was one of the initiators of a split in the PSL, and then he supported the Polish Peasant Party–Piast (PSL–Piast). In February 1914 he became deputy chairman of the PSL–Piast, and after the outbreak of World War I, he joined the Supreme National Committee (Naczelny Komitet Narodowy [NKN]), on which he served as vice-president of its western section in Kraków. Witos did not actively support Austria-Hungary, adopting a wait-and-see attitude and then demanding full independence for Poland. From 1917 to 1918 he was a member of the National League (Liga Narodowa). He co-initiated a resolution presented by the Polish Circle (Koło Polskie) in the Austrian parliament on 28 May 1917 that demanded independence for Poland and defended Poland's right to access to the sea. After the Austrian Army was disarmed, Witos became head of the Polish Liquidation Commission (Polska Komisja Likwidacyjna [PKL]) in Kraków on 28 October 1918. He did not join the Lublin-based Provisional People's Government of the Republic of Poland (Tymczasowy Rząd Ludowy Republiki Polskiej), headed by Ignacy Daszyński, as he believed that this government did not reflect the real political power structure in Poland and that its program was too radical. At the end of 1918, though, Witos subordinated the PKL to the central government, headed by Jędrzej Moraczewski, in Warsaw.

In the Second Republic of Poland, Witos initially played a key political role. He was chairman of the Main Board of the PSL–Piast (1918–31) and chairman of the party's parliamentary representation (1919–27 and 1930–31). Elected to the Legislative Assembly in January 1919, he was a candidate of the left for the chamber's speaker. In December 1919, as a result of an agreement reached by the PSL–Piast with the Polish Peasant Party–Liberation (PSL–Wyzwolenie) and the National Peasant Union (Narodowe Zjednoczenie Ludowe), the centrist cabinet of Leopold Skulski was established. Witos headed the Assembly's Agrarian Commission and played an important role in the adoption of an agricultural reform bill in July 1919 and a bill on the implementation of the agricultural reform in July 1920. In the face of the Bolshevik offensive on Warsaw, Witos became head of the coalition Government of National Defense on 24 July 1920. His appeal to the peasants helped to consolidate them around the cause of independence. After the Soviet threat was gone, the constitution of March 1921 was adopted, and the division of Upper Silesia between Poland and Germany was decided, Witos resigned as prime minister on 13 September 1921 because of the breakup of the ruling coalition. In November 1922 Józef Piłsudski proposed Witos as president of the Republic of Poland, but owing to objections from the PSL–Liberation, the candidacy was not officially put forward. In the spring of 1923 Witos was a co-author and signatory of the so-called Pact of Lanckorona, which led to the establishment of a coalition formed by the National Democrats, the Christian Democrats, and the PSL–Piast. These groups reached a compromise on the agricultural reform, and a cabinet headed by Witos and backed by a parliamentary majority was established. Witos served as prime minister from 28 May to 14 December 1923, but he failed to halt inflation, which turned into hyperinflation and a social crisis. During riots in Lesser Poland (Małopolska) in the autumn of 1923, the government used force, as a result of which several people were killed or wounded. On 10 May 1926 Witos again became prime minister of a center-right majority government (the so-called Chjeno-Piast coalition), but he failed to counter a growing wave of criticism or to prevent Piłsudski from staging a military coup d'état that overthrew the government.

After the coup of May 1926, Witos returned to his family farm at Wierzchosławice. He firmly criticized the new form of government. He succeeded in rebuilding the influence of the PSL–Piast among the peasants. In 1929 he was one of the founders of the so-called Centrolew, a center-left coalition of opposition parties. Witos organized and took part in many rallies against the sanacja regime. On 29 June 1930 he co-founded the Congress for the Defense of People's Rights and Freedoms in Kraków. On 10 September, along with other Centrolew leaders, Witos was arrested and imprisoned in the Brześć fortress. In November 1930 he was released on bail, but soon the authorities removed him from all the public and business positions he still held and dismissed him as mayor of Wierzchosławice. In 1931 Witos took part in the unification of the PSL–Piast, the PSL–Liberation, and the Party of Peasants (Stronnictwo Chłopskie [SCh]) into the Peasant Party (Stronnictwo Ludowe [SL]), and he became the chairman of the SL Chief Council. Witos was tried in the Brześć (Brest) trial (1931–32) and was sentenced to one and a half years' imprisonment. In September 1933, after the sentence became final and binding, Witos left for Czechoslovakia, from where he exerted a great influence on the opposition activities against the sanacja regime. For example, in 1936 he co-founded the opposition Morges Front, and in 1937 he advocated a general peasant strike. At that time, his views evolved toward the left; these were expressed in (among other things) his support for an agricultural reform without compensation to landowners. However, Witos was against the participation of Communists in the “people’s front.” After Nazi troops occupied Prague, the Gestapo searched for Witos as it wanted to win his cooperation; therefore he secretly returned to Poland on 30 March 1939. Briefly detained, Witos was released after a few weeks. An unquestionable authority among the peasants and a symbol of peasant resistance to the ruling camp, Witos became chairman of the SL on 17 May 1939. In the face of a threat to Poland, he called for unity among the Poles. At a rally at Mościska he said, among other things, that the peasants should serve their country regardless of its government.

Arrested by the Germans in September 1939, Witos firmly refused to take part in the establishment of a collaborationist government. He was imprisoned in Rzeszów and Berlin and then held under house arrest in Zakopane and Wierzchosławice. Toward the end of the occupation Witos went into hiding. The Germans imprisoned his daughter Julia in a concentration camp, but Witos did not yield to Nazi demands and did not agree to any compromise. After Soviet troops entered Lesser Poland in early 1945, the new authorities tried to persuade Witos to join the “national unity” government under the Communist aegis. At the end of March 1945 Witos was forcibly brought to Warsaw and then to Brześć. He was offered the position of prime minister of the “national unity” government, but he rejected it, explaining that he would need permission from the PSL leadership (headed by Stanisław Mikołajczyk) to assume this post. Released from house arrest after one week, Witos returned home severely ill and wrote an appeal to peasants that was a kind of political testament; in it he warned against promoting people with no dignity or conscience to important positions. He supported the PSL headed by Mikołajczyk and became its honorary chairman, despite the fact that his health further deteriorated. From his deathbed in a hospital in Kraków, Witos sent his last appeal; in it he recognized that it was necessary to regulate relations with the Soviet Union but on an equal rights basis. Witos’s funeral in Wierzchosławice turned into a great demonstration of peasant support for the PSL. Witos authored Moje wspomnienia (My memoirs, 3 vols.; 1964–65), an important source for the history of prewar Poland, and Moja tułaczka (My wanderings; 1967). (WR) WOJCIECHOWSKI Stanisław (15 March 1869, Kalisz–9 April 1953, Gołębki, near Warsaw), Polish cooperative and political activist, president of Poland. After graduating from high school in Kalisz in 1888, Wojciechowski studied physics, mathematics, and the natural sciences at Warsaw University. He began his political activities in a secret group of Kalisz youth, and in 1890 he joined the Union of Polish Youth called Zet (Związek Młodzieży Polskiej–Zet). Two years later he joined the leadership of this organization. After being arrested twice by Russian authorities in 1891–92, Wojciechowski emigrated to Switzerland; from there he went to France. In France, he attended the Paris Congress, at which he was elected a member of the leadership of the newly formed Union of Polish Socialists Abroad (Związek Zagraniczny Socjalistów Polskich). Because of his Socialist activities, Wojciechowski was ordered to leave France and went to London. In 1893 he attended the founding congress of the Polish Socialist Party (Polska Partia Socjalistyczna [PPS]) in Wilno (Vilnius), at which he met Józef Piłsudski. An able organizer and conspirator, Wojciechowski repeatedly traveled to Poland illegally. Between 1895 and 1905 he belonged to the top leadership of the PPS and was a co-editor, publisher, and distributor of the newspaper Robotnik. In 1905, after a split in the PPS, Wojciechowski left the party and became involved in the cooperative movement. A year later he returned permanently to Warsaw, where he became director of the Confederation of Cooperative Associations, editor of the periodical Spółem, and co-founder of the Cooperative Society (Towarzystwo Kooperatystów), pioneering the Polish cooperative movement in the Russian sector of partitioned Poland.

After the outbreak of World War I Wojciechowski decided that Germany posed the greatest threat to Poland. He became active in the Central Civic Committee (Centralny Komitet Obywatelski) and in the Polish National Committee (Komitet Narodowy Polski) in Warsaw. When the Germans captured Warsaw in 1915, Wojciechowski left for Russia, where he developed economic programs for the benefit of Poles in Russia. After the fall of tsarism, in August 1917 Wojciechowski was elected president of the Council of the Polish Interparty Union in Moscow (Rada Polskiego Zjednoczenia Międzypartyjnego), which was linked with the Polish National Committee in Paris, and he became involved in forming the Polish Army in Russia. In June 1918 he returned to Warsaw, where he again became engaged in the cooperative movement, organizing a congress of members of cooperative societies in November 1918. In January 1919 Wojciechowski became minister of interior in the government of Ignacy Paderewski. In his political activities, Wojciechowski put special emphasis on security, organizing the state police. He remained minister of interior in the cabinet of Leopold Skulski and held the post until June 1920. After leaving his ministerial post, Wojciechowski was active in the national savings committee, and he lectured at the Warsaw College of Commerce (Wyższa Szkoła Handlowa). In 1921 he joined the Polish Peasant Party–Piast (Polskie Stronnictwo Ludowe–Piast [PSL–Piast]) and became editor of Wola Ludu. In November 1922 Wojciechowski unsuccessfully ran in the elections to the Senate from the Piast lists. On 9 December 1922 the PSL–Piast nominated Wojciechowski as candidate for president, but he lost on the fourth ballot. After the assassination of President Gabriel Narutowicz, Wojciechowski was nominated again, and on 20 December 1922 he was elected president of the Republic of Poland.

The beginning of Wojciechowski's presidency coincided with a time of great economic problems that led to the escalation of social conflicts. After the fall of the cabinet of Wincenty Witos, when it turned out that it was impossible to form a coalition government with the support of a parliamentary majority, in December 1923 Wojciechowski designated Władysław Grabski prime minister of a "cabinet of experts." He consistently supported this government, helping it carry out its reform tasks. After the fall of the Grabski cabinet in November 1925, Wojciechowski appointed Aleksander Skrzyński as prime minister. When the increasingly tense political situation led to the fall of this cabinet as well, Wojciechowski reluctantly charged Witos with the task of forming a new government of a parliamentary majority. On 12 May 1926 Wojciechowski came out against Piłsudski, who was marching on Warsaw at the head of his faithful regiments. Wojciechowski held the now famous talks with Piłsudski on the Poniatowski Bridge, rejecting Piłsudski's conditions. During three successive days of fighting Wojciechowski refused to mediate. After the capture of Warsaw by Piłsudski, Wojciechowski, having withdrawn to Wilanów, decided to end the fighting. At midnight on 14–15 May 1926 he handed in his resignation as president to the speaker of the Assembly, Maciej Rataj, and he retired from political life. Between 1926 and 1939 Wojciechowski was professor at Warsaw Agricultural University (Szkoła Główna Gospodarstwa Wiejskiego), and in 1928–29 he was director of the Co-operative Research Institute. During the Nazi occupation Wojciechowski lived in Warsaw. After the war he settled in Gołębki, near Warsaw. (PU)

WRZASZCZYK Tadeusz (12 September 1932, Stradom), Polish Communist activist. Born into a working-class family, Wrzaszczyk graduated from Warsaw Technical University in 1954 and subsequently worked at the Radio Works in Warsaw. In 1956 he joined the Polish United Workers' Party (Polska Zjednoczona Partia Robotnicza [PUWP]), thanks to which he was promoted to chief engineer of the Żerań Car Factory in 1962 and to managing director of the Automotive Industry Union in 1965. Wrzaszczyk became minister of the engineering industry in December 1970 and a member of the PUWP CC in December 1971. Thanks to his close relations with Prime Minister Piotr Jaroszewicz, he became deputy prime minister and chairman of the Planning Committee of the Council of Ministers in October 1975 and an MP in the Assembly in March 1976. Wrzaszczyk endorsed the disastrous continuation of the economic policy launched in the early 1970s, which was based on an excessive increase in capital investments and consumption combined with an uncoordinated and irrational use of funds. This policy led to the breakdown of supplies to the consumer market in 1976 and a collapse of capital investments and national income in 1979. Dismissed in August 1980 and forced to resign his parliamentary seat four months later, Wrzaszczyk was expelled from the party in April 1981. In February 1984 the Assembly brought him to constitutional accountability before the Tribunal of State, but the case was discontinued under an amnesty in July 1984. (WR)

WYCECH Czesław (20 July 1899, Wilczogęby, near Węgrów–26 May 1977, Warsaw), Polish Peasant Party activist. Born into a peasant family, Wycech graduated from a teacher training college (1918) and from the State Teachers' Institute (1926). In 1919 he began working as a teacher in elementary schools. He joined the Polish Peasant Party–Liberation (Polskie Stronnictwo Ludowe–Wyzwolenie [PSL–Liberation]) in 1918. An activist of the Lublin Union of Peasant Youth, Wycech joined the Peasant Party (Stronnictwo Ludowe [SL]) in 1931. From 1921 he was mostly active in the Polish Teachers' Association (Związek Nauczycielstwa Polskiego [ZNP]), initially in its local units (in Węgrów) and at the regional level (in Lublin). Wycech was aligned with the Society of Democratic Education known as Nowe Tory (New Way), a leftist faction of the ZNP. During World War II, as one of the founders of the Underground Teachers' Organization and director of the Education and Culture Department of the underground Delegation of the Polish Government-in-Exile for the Homeland, Wycech was one of the main founders of an extensive underground teaching network. He was also active in the underground Peasant Party called Roch (Stronnictwo Ludowe–Roch [SL–Roch]). In April 1945 Wycech became chairman of the ZNP. In June 1945, after the coalition Provisional Government of National Unity (Tymczasowy Rząd Jedności Narodowej [TRJN]) was established, he assumed the post of minister of education, becoming one of the three representatives of the Polish Peasant Party (Polskie Stronnictwo Ludowe [PSL]) in the government. He also joined the National Home Council (Krajowa Rada Narodowa [KRN]). In July 1945 Wycech became a member of the PSL Provisional Chief Executive Committee. After the PSL congress in January 1946, he became a member of the Chief Council and the Chief Executive Committee of the PSL.

Wycech was in favor of concessions to the (Communist) Polish Workers' Party (Polska Partia Robotnicza [PPR]). In March 1947, following elections rigged by the Communists, he was expelled from the PSL for causing a split within the party. He then founded the ephemeral Polish Peasant Party–Left (Polskie Stronnictwo Ludowe–Lewica [PSL–Left]). After Stanisław Mikołajczyk fled Poland in October 1947, Wycech became deputy chairman of the PSL Chief Executive Committee and was one of the leaders responsible for subordinating the PSL to the PPR. After the Communist-controlled United Peasant Party (Zjednoczone Stronnictwo Ludowe [ZSL]) was established in 1949, Wycech was one of the top leaders of this Communist satellite. From 1962 to 1971 he was chairman of the ZSL Chief Committee. For a long time he served as an MP in the Assembly (1947–72) and was its speaker (1957–71), which was in conformity with the custom according to which this post was given to a peasant party representative. Wycech authored several books on historical subjects, mainly on the so-called peasant issue in the nineteenth century, including Powstanie chłopskie 1846: Jakub Szela (The peasant uprising of 1846: Jakub Szela; 1955) and Spoleczna gospodarka rolna w polskiej myśli politycznej (Social agricultural economy in Polish political thought; 1963). In 1956 Wycech co-founded the Institute of the History of the Peasant Movement. (AP) WYSPIAŃSKI Stanisław (15 January 1869, Kraków–28 November 1907, Kraków), Polish poet, dramatist, and painter. The son of a sculptor, in 1884–85 and 1887–95 Wyspiański studied at the Kraków's School of Fine Arts under (among others) Jan Matejko. From 1890 to 1894 he was in Paris, where he was greatly impressed by the work of Paul Gauguin and the Nabis and by Japanese wood engraving. From 1898 to 1905 Wyspiański worked as a stage designer and stage manager in Kraków's theaters, and from 1902 on he also lectured as a docent in the Academy of Fine Arts. In 1897 he became a member of the Sztuka (Art) Society of Polish Artists, and in 1902, a member of the Polish Applied Art Society. In his artistic works, Wyspiański mostly used pastels, painting numerous portraits of children, girls, and women, as well as landscapes—for example, Chochoty na Plantach (Straw men in Planty Park; 1898–99). Wyspiański designed and in part created the polychromes and stained glass windows in the Franciscan church in Kraków (1897–1905) and reformed the art of book illustration along art nouveau lines. Wyspiański was a pioneer in modern theater stage design and was the first to stage Adam Mickiewicz's drama Dziady (Forefather's Eve) in 1901.

Wyspiański was the leading Polish turn-of-the-century dramatist. Metaphysical themes and antique inspirations prevail in his early works, such as Meleager (1899; Meleager, 1933) and Protesilas i Laodamia (Protesilas and Laodamia; 1899). In Warszawianka (The girl from Warsaw; 1898) he combined these themes with Polish history, specifically the events of the Polish Uprising of November 1830. In his later dramas, including Wesele (1901; The Wedding, 1990); Wyzwolenie (Liberation; 1903); Bolesław Śmiały (1903); Noc listopadowa (November night; 1904); Akropolis (Acropolis; 1904); and Zygmunt August (Sigismund Augustus; 1907), Wyspiański addressed key issues in the philosophy of history and Polish politics. Wesele—based on the real wedding of the poet Lucjan Rydel to Jadwiga Mikołajczyk, a peasant girl from the village of Bronowice—is often described as the greatest Polish drama of the twentieth century. The wedding party, at which peasants and “refined” guests from the city met, served to show contemporary social relations and to present a symbolic vision of Poland's history. The mocking confrontation between the romantic myth and the immaturity of Polish society, which made it impossible to realize this myth, is an important message of this drama. Many lines and symbols from Wesele (such as the Straw Man, a character in the drama, or the saying, “Boor, you had the horn of gold” [pertaining to Poland’s decline, brought about by the arrogance and shortsightedness of its elites]) became deeply rooted in the twentieth-century imagination and everyday speech of the Poles. In Wyzwolenie Wyspiański contrasted the myths that originated in Polish Messianism with a program of liberating Poland as a “normal” European country. Wyspiański had a hunch that there was a chance for the realization of such a program, but he died prematurely and did not live to see it. (WR)

WYSZYŃSKI Stefan (3 August 1901, Zuzela, near Ostrów Mazowiecka—28 May 1981, Warsaw), cardinal, Primate of Poland. Wyszyński graduated from a theological seminary in Włocławek and was ordained in 1924. He studied sociology and economics at the Catholic University of Lublin, where in 1929 he defended his Ph.D. in canon law. Then he traveled to Western Europe to become acquainted with the development of social Catholicism. Wyszyński was a curate in Przedecz and Włocławek, a lecturer in social economics at a theological seminary, and editor-in-chief of Ateneum Kapłańskie from 1932 to 1939. He was active in the Christian Trade Unions, directed the Christian Workers’ University, and organized the Catholic Union of Working Youth. From 1937 he was a member of the Social Council of the Primate of Poland. By 1939 Wyszyński was the author of over one hundred publications devoted to (among other things) Christian social science. He emphasized the theological character of the social teachings of the Church. He dealt with working-class issues, was involved in the upbringing of youth, and popularized the ideas of Catholic Action. He criticized the ideological background and practices of communism.

In October 1939 Wyszyński escaped arrest by the Gestapo and went into hiding. From 1940, at the request of Rev. Władysław Korniłowicz, he looked after blind children from Laski who had been rehoused on the estates of Kozłówka. From June 1942 he served as chaplain at the Institute for the Blind in Laski, near Warsaw. He delivered secret lectures and remained in contact with the underground. During the Warsaw Uprising Wyszyński was chaplain of the Military District of Żoliborz-Kampinos and of the insurgent hospital in Laski. In 1945 he returned to Włocławek, organized the theological seminary there, and was its rector. On 4 March 1946 Wyszyński was appointed bishop of Lublin by Pope Pius XII and was consecrated on 12 May at Jasna Góra in Częstochowa. After the death of Cardinal August Hlond on 12 November 1948, the Pope named him archbishop metropolitan of Gniezno and Warsaw, thereby the Primate of Poland and the president of the Conference of the Polish Episcopate. Wyszyński’s ingress into Gniezno Cathedral took place on 2 February 1949 and into Warsaw Cathedral on 6 February 1949.

Wyszyński assumed his office at a time of increasing Stalinization in Poland and an intensified struggle against the Church and religion. The signs of the times were the imprisonment of the primates of Hungary (1948) and the Czech Republic (1949). In Poland the authorities began to organize the movement of “priests-patriots” and to reduce Church ownership. Wyszyński strove to maintain the independence of the Church from the government, to delay and reduce the atheistic attacks, and to retain the possibility of ministry. On 14 April 1950 he signed an agreement with the government in which the Episcopate declared its loyalty to the state authorities and its readiness to counteract anti-state manifestations, while the government promised to retain religious instruction in the schools and to ensure the functioning of the Catholic schools, press, and publishing houses and the organization of the ministry and religious pilgrimages and processions.

The authorities frequently violated the concluded agreement. In 1951 Bishop Czesław Kacmarek was arrested, and apostolic administrators of the dioceses in the Western Territories were removed. Priests imposed by the authorities took their places. Wyszyński granted them jurisdiction in order to avoid a schism. In 1952 the authorities removed religion from the schools, liquidated junior theological seminaries, and removed the bishops of Katowice and Kraków from their dioceses. The primate, who was appointed cardinal on 12 January 1953, was not allowed to go to Rome. On 9 February 1953 a decree was passed by which the authorities usurped the right to have the final word on appointments to Church offices; the Conference of the Episcopate, on Wyszyński’s motion, sent a letter to the government on 8 May 1953 in which the Church refused to submit to the decree (non possumus). On 25 September 1953 Wyszyński was arrested and put in Rywałd Prison, then in under house arrest in Stoczek, near Lidzbark Warmiński, then in Prudnik Śląski (from October 1954), and then in Komańcza (from October 1955). It was there that he wrote the text of the Jasna Góra Vows, a program preparing the nation for the Millennium of Christianity in Poland.

One of the most frequently repeated demands during the “thaw” of 1956 was for Wyszyński’s release. After the October 1956 breakthrough and Władysław Gomułka's assumption of the post of first secretary of the CC of the PUPW on 28 October 1956, Wyszyński was released and reinstated in his functions. Wyszyński moderated the mood of agitation, fearing that a social outbreak might provoke a Soviet intervention in Poland as had occurred in Hungary. He concluded the so-called Small Agreement with the government (8 December 1953), which annulled the decree of 9 February 1953—that is, it reinstated religious instruction in the schools, allowed for religious assistance to the sick and to prisoners, allowed displaced nuns to return, and allowed for the appointment of new bishops in the Western Territories by the Pope. In January 1957 the Episcopate called on people to vote in Assembly elections; the primate himself also voted. This was significant support for Gomułka's new team. In May 1957 Wyszyński left for Rome, where he received a cardinal's hat.

From the fall of 1957 relations between Wyszyński and the Communist authorities were full of conflict. The authorities saw the strong position of the Church in society and the immense popularity of the primate as factors limiting their monopoly of power. They reacted with extreme hostility to the Millennium program of Wyszyński, who on 20 June 1957 announced the peregrination of the picture of the Holy Mother of Częstochowa to all parishes, and this was combined with the Jasna Góra Vows of the Nation. In 1958 the Primate's Institute in Jasna Góra was searched, and religion began to be removed from the schools. From 1959 the Church was harassed with high taxes, the drafting of clergymen into the army, and attempts at subordinating theological seminaries to secular jurisdiction. However, the authorities did not violate the bishops' right of assigning Church posts. Wyszyński entered into numerous mediations and talks with Gomułka, but to no greater effect. He set up thousands of ministry centers in special parish centers that were independent of government control.

The most important method of counteracting atheism was the program of the Great Novena of the Millennium. Wyszyński saw the strength of the Church and religion in traditional faith and the customs attached to it. He developed a theology of the nation, pointing to the relationship between the Polish nation and Catholicism. He also strongly emphasized the cult of the Holy Mother. At the Second Vatican Council Wyszyński was regarded as a moderate conservative. He wanted to raise the intellectual standard of the clergy, and the Catholic University of Lublin was under his patronage. However, he found it hard to accept criticism and distrusted new theological trends from the West. He saw them as a threat leading to the disintegration of faith and of the Church. He advocated a cautious introduction of the Vatican Council resolutions in Poland. He did not trust the political organizations of secular Catholics—that is, Pax and the Christian Social Association—but he stayed in touch with the Znak movement and with the Catholic parliamentary group Znak. Despite their differences and periodical tensions, until 1976 Wyszyński encouraged Znak members to participate in the Assembly and to defend the Catholic postulates.

In December 1965 Wyszyński co-authored the letter from the Polish bishops addressed to the German bishops in which the words “We forgive and we ask for forgiveness” were included. As a result, he became the object of violent attacks by Communist propaganda. In 1966, in an atmosphere of sharp confrontation with the authorities, Wyszyński celebrated the Millennium of Christianity in Poland. During the social conflicts of 1968 and 1970 he remained cautious and decided to issue conciliatory statements and to appeal to the authorities to desist from repressive measures.

After Edward Gierek came to power, Wyszyński assumed a positive attitude toward offers of partial normalization, although this did not mean a return to the resolutions of the Small Agreement of 1956. The position of the Church in the 1970s became stabilized as a result of the following: granting the Church the right of ownership of churches, buildings, and land used in the Western Territories (1971); the establishment of new dioceses in the Western Territories by the Vatican (1972); the establishment of diplomatic relations between the Polish People's Republic and the Holy See (1974); and the government's ceasing to attempt to control ministry centers and theological seminaries and relative freedom for the development of the Catholic youth movement (Oases, festivals of religious songs). Wyszyński repeatedly criticized materialism and atheism, especially in school instruction, as well as discrimination against the faithful in their access to public posts. He insisted on a recognition of the legal status of the Church and on its access to the mass media. Wyszyński presented his proposal for a social order—clearly different from the official one—in Kazania Świętokrzeskie (Świętokrzyskie sermons; 1974) and in an Episcopate protest against amendments to the constitution (1975–76).

At a time of mounting economic and social crisis in 1976–80, Wyszyński was an authority recognized by all social forces. In 1976 the authorities expressed a wish that he remain in office, although he was over seventy-five. Centers of emerging opposition recognized him as the highest national moral authority. In the face of mounting tensions Wyszyński maintained the position of a moderator—for example, he requested that the authorities desist from the use of repressive measures after June 1976, lent cautious support for the actions of the Committee for the Defense of Workers (KOR), opposed the persecutions of those who had been previously convicted or had a disobedient civil attitude, and gave people who could not participate in official cultural life an opportunity to lecture in the churches and parish rooms. His prestige in Polish society, as well as abroad, increased even more after the election of Cardinal Karol Wojtyła to the Holy See on 16 October 1978 and after Pope John Paul II visited his homeland in June 1979.

In August 1980 Wyszyński feared bloodshed or even a Soviet intervention. On 26 August he preached a sermon—part of which was shown on television for the first time—appealing to strikers for moderation and maturity; this was seen by many as a lack of clear support for far-reaching political claims. The next day Wyszyński partly revised his stance: the Chief Episcopate Council supported the workers' rights to organize into independent trade unions. Wyszyński established friendly relations with Solidarity, guiding its leaders toward moderation and caution. He appointed Ryszard Kukułowicz his representative and adviser to Solidarity. He appealed to the authorities to respect civil rights, revive social life, and continue dialogue. In February 1981 he was deeply involved in supporting the claims for the legalization of Rural Solidarity. Wyszyński died after a long, serious illness. In 1989 his beatification process began. Wyszyński was the author of many books and collections of sermons, including the following: Nauczanie społeczne 1946–1981 (Social teachings 1946–1981; 1982); Wielka Nowenna Tysiąclecia (The Great Millennium Novenna; 1962); Z rozważań nad kulturą ojczystą (Reflections on national culture; 1979); and the diary Zapiski więzienne (Freedom within: The Prison Notes of Stefan Cardinal Wyszyński, 1983). XHAFERI Arben (24 January 1948, Tetovo), Macedonian politician. Xhaferi holds a degree in philosophy from the University of Belgrade and has for many years worked for Kosovo radio and television in Prishtina. Initially a member of the Party for Democratic Prosperity (Partija za Demokratski Prosperitet/Partia ë Prosperiteti Demokratike [PDP]), Xhaferi was elected to the parliament (Sobranie) of the Republic of Macedonia in 1994. He and his followers then split, forming the PDP–Sh (PDP–Albanian). Xhaferi’s objective has been the recognition of the ethnic Albanians in Macedonia as a constituent people, with representation in the government and state infrastructure comparable to the size of the Albanian population. In 1997 Xhaferi’s group and the People’s Democratic Party merged into the Democratic Party of Albanians (Demokratska Partija na Albancite/Partia Demokratike Sqiptare [DPA]). Outspoken in his demands, Xhaferi has been accused of complicity with the Albanian insurgents of the Kosovo Liberation Army, which fought in Macedonia in 2001. Xhaferi’s party is especially popular in rural areas. Nevertheless, it failed in the September 2002 elections. (DP)

XOXE Koçi (1 May 1911, Negovan, near Flórina, Ottoman Empire [now in Greece]–11 June 1949, Tirana), Albanian Communist activist. Xoxe was born into an Orthodox family from the Gorani ethnic group, which spoke a language closely related to Macedonian. He finished only elementary school and then began working as a sheet-metal worker in Korçë, where in 1933 he established a trade union organization called Puna (Work). Arrested for the first time in 1938, Xoxe was imprisoned in Muhur, near Peshkopi. Along with Enver Hoxha, Xoxe was one of the founders of the Communist Party of Albania (CPA) in 1941. He held a variety of leadership positions in the party. He was a member of the Central Committee (CC) (1941–48), a member of the Politburo (1943–48), and the organizational secretary of the CC (1943–48). From 1944 to 1946 he served as vice-chairman of the Anti-Fascist Council of the National Liberation Front, later the Communist-dominated Democratic Front. Elected to parliament in 1945, Xoxe served as vice-president of its presidium. In January 1945, with the rank of lieutenant general, he presided over the Special People’s Tribunal in Tirana, established for “trying war criminals and enemies of the people.” This tribunal was responsible for many judicial crimes. From March 1946 to October 1948 Xoxe held the portfolio of minister of interior and served as one of the deputy prime ministers. He also controlled the State Audit Commission. He was one of the main founders and then served as the first head of the People’s Defense Department (Divizioni i Mbrojtjes së Popullit), a political police established in May 1945 and later transformed into the State Security Armed Forces (Arma e Sigurimit të Shtetit), commonly known as Sigurimi. Xoxe, who had little education, hated the intelligentsia, even among party members. One of the most influential but also one of the cruelest leaders of the CPA, he was called “the butcher” by some and “the party tank” by others.

Xoxe, who had personal ties with Aleksander Ranković, head of the Yugoslav security apparatus, owed his position in the CPA to Belgrade’s support. He represented a pro-Yugoslav line in the Albanian leadership, ruthlessly eliminating all signs of discontent with such a policy. Among his victims were Sejfulla Malëshova, Nako Spiru, and Liri Belishova. The factional strife within the Albanian party was fueled by Stalin, who—in his attempts to undermine Josip Broz Tito’s position—gave his support both to the pro-Yugoslav faction led by Xoxe and to Hoxha, secretary general of the CPA. At the beginning of 1948 Xoxe had strengthened his position to such an extent that he could attack Hoxha, who had to justify his policies at the Eighth Plenum of the CPA CC in late February and early March. This plenum supported the idea of close cooperation between the Albanian and Yugoslav parties and armies, and a union between them was not ruled out.

After the Information Bureau of the Communist and Workers’ Parties (Cominform) severed its ties with Yugoslavia in June 1948, the roles changed. Xoxe made a visit to southern Albania, explaining the reasons for the current situation and personally attacking Tito. Nevertheless, on 3 October Xoxe was transferred from the ministry of interior to the ministry of industry, and on 7 November he was attacked by the press as a “Trotskyite.” Arrested on 2 December 1948, Xoxe was tried along with a group of his associates. Bedri Spahiu, another leader of the CPA, was the chief prosecutor. During Xoxe’s trial, demonstrations were staged in Tirana, the participants demanding the death sentence for Xoxe. On 10 June 1949 Xoxe was found guilty of Trotskyism and Titoism and sentenced to death. His last words before the execution were, “I am not guilty. Long live the party, the republic, the Soviet Union, and Stalin. Blame for sentencing me to death falls on Bedri Spahiu.” After Xoxe’s death a propaganda campaign tried to convince the public that he had been responsible for all the abuses of the security apparatus. Moscow’s efforts to rehabilitate Xoxe in the second half of the 1950s led to the deterioration of relations between Tirana and Moscow. (TC)

YANOVSKYI Yuri [also spelled Ianovskyi Iurii] (14 August 1902, Mayerove–25 February 1954, Kiev), Ukrainian writer. Between 1922 and 1923 Yanovskyi studied at the Kiev Polytechnic Institute. From 1925 to 1926 he was an artistic editor at the Odessa film studios. In 1927 he moved to Kharkiv and in 1939 to Kiev. In 1922 he made his debut writing in Russian, and in 1924 he began to write in Ukrainian. In 1927 Yanovskyi published the collection of poems Prekrasna Ut (Most beautiful Ut), but he won the widest acclaim as the author of romantic novels and novellas, including Maister korablia (Shipmaster; 1928) and Chotyry shabli (Four swords; 1930), a novel that was banned from distribution; in it Yanovskyi depicted the social upheavals of 1917–19 as a spontaneous uprising of the Ukrainian peasants. In a later novel, Vershnyky (Riders; 1935), which was also devoted to the revolution, Yanovskyi moved away from a romantic style and formal literary avant garde experiments of the 1920s. Because of its language, composition, and richness of metaphors, the novel remains a classic of Ukrainian Soviet literature, and it was translated into several foreign languages. During World War II Yanovskyi was a war correspondent and editor of the periodical Ukrainska literatura, and in 1945 he covered the Nuremberg trials for the Soviet press. In 1947 he published the novel Zhivaya voda (Living water), devoted to the reawakening of social life in the Ukraine after the Nazi occupation. Attacked for propounding nationalism in it, Yanovskyi was forced to rewrite this novel and to republish it in a definitely weaker version, under the title Myr (Peace; 1956). In November 1951 the Plenum of the CC of the Ukrainian party denounced a number of works by Ukrainian writers, including two stories by Yanovskyi. However, he did not abandon his artistic ambitions and went on to write the play Doch prokuratora (The prosecutor's daughter; 1953), which raised the problem of the moral responsibility of parents for the behavior of their children. Yanovskyi's works were reissued in the Ukraine several times—for example, as Zbirka tvoriv (Collected works, 4 vols.; 1931–32) and Tvory (Works, 5 vols.; 1958–59). (TS)

YARESHCHENKO Oleksander (12 September 1890, near Poltava–1938, Far East of the USSR), archbishop of the Ukrainian Autocephalous Orthodox Church. Yareshchenko graduated from the Moscow Theological Academy, earning a Ph.D. in theology, and from the Railroad Institute in St. Petersburg. In 1920–21 he was director of the railroads in the Poltava region. After the occupation of the Ukraine by the Bolsheviks, Metropolitan Vasyl Lypkivskiy ordained Yareshchenko as bishop of Poltava (27 October 1921). Yareshchenko worked in Lubny, where between 1921 and 1923 he established fifty parishes of the Ukrainian Autocephalous Orthodox Church. In 1923 he was appointed archbishop of Kharkiv, vice-president of the Council of the All-Ukrainian Orthodox Church, and a member of the doctrinal commission of this council. A gifted preacher and a courageous critic of the Soviet system, Yareshchenko was one of the first hierarchs of the Ukrainian Autocephalous Orthodox Church arrested by the GPU in 1926. He was held in prisons in Moscow and Tashkent. Released in 1934, Yareshchenko went to Kursk, but soon after that he was imprisoned again and deported to camps in the Far East. The exact circumstances of his death are not known. (WR)

YAVOROV Peyo [originally Kracholov] (1 January 1878, Chirpan–16 October 1914, Sofia), Bulgarian poet. The son of a merchant, already in high school in Plovdiv Yavorov showed literary talent. After graduating, he worked at the Chirpan post office. In 1898 he started publishing in the Modernist periodical Misul, using the pen name “Yavorov” (invented by Pencho Slaveykov) from 1899. In 1903 Yavorov took part in the Illinden Uprising; after its failure he went to Sofia, where he worked in the National Library from 1904. In 1906 he spent a year in France, and in 1909–14 he was literary director of the National Theater in Sofia. With his personal experience and the influence of contemporary artistic trends, the patriotic and social elements present in Yavorov's earlier collection, Stikhotvorenya (Poems; 1901), gave way to hopelessness and despair, apparent in the volumes Bezsynitsi (Sleepless nights; 1907) and Podir senkite na oblatsite (Over the shadows of clouds; 1910), in which his sense of solitude was combined with a sense of the inevitability of suffering and death. Yavorov's works were full of eroticism. The female was for him the personification of a contradiction between the sublime and the demonic. His well-known love affairs with his sister Mina and Lora Karavelova were realizations of the literary fashion of his time and the inspirations for his modernist erotic poetry. Yavorov remembered his struggles in Macedonia in Haydushki kopnenya (Hayduk longings; 1909). At the end of his life he wrote the dramas W polite na Vitosha (At the foot of Mount Vitosha; 1911) and Kogato grym udari (When the thunder strikes; 1912). Yavorov's personal life was tragic. His marriage to Karavelova ended in her suicide after a year. Yavorov attempted suicide himself but failed. As a result, he lost his sight. Accused of Karavelova's death, he finally shot himself. In 1934–36 Yavorov's Sybrani suchinenya (Collected works, 5 vols.) were published. (WR)

YAVORSKYI Matviy (15 November 1885, Korchmin, near Sokal–3 November 1937, Solovets Islands), Ukrainian Marxist historian, victim of communism. In 1910 Yavorskyi graduated in law from the university in Lemberg (Lviv, Lwów), and in 1912 he earned a Ph.D. in political science. During World War I he was an officer in the Austrian Army and later fought in the Ukrainian Galician Army (UGA). After the Ukrainian defeat in the war against Poland, Yavorskyi prepared the transfer of part of the UGA to the Bolshevik side. In April 1920 in Kiev he joined the Communist Party (Bolshevik) of Ukraine (CP[B]U). In 1924–27 Yavorskyi was in charge of the Administration of Scientific Institutions (Uprnauka) in the Commissariat of Education of the Ukrainian SSR. He headed the historical department of the Ukrainian Institute of Marxism-Leninism (VUAMLIN) and subsequently became director of this institute. He lectured on Ukrainian history at institutions of higher education in Kharkiv. In the 1920s Yavorskyi formulated a new, Marxist interpretation of Ukrainian history consistent with the paradigm of the Russian historian Mikhail Pokrovsky. Yavorskyi presented this interpretation in the works Narys istorii Ukrainy (An outline of Ukrainian history, 2 vols.; 1923–24); Korotka istoriia Ukrainy (Short history of Ukraine; 1927); and Istoriia Ukrainy v styslomu narysi (A detailed account of Ukrainian history, 3 vols.; 1928–29). Although Yavorskyi analyzed history from the point of view of the development of Marxist productive forces, on the basis of his findings the Russian and Ukrainian historical processes could be separated, and Russia's backwardness in comparison with the Ukraine up until the beginning of the twentieth century could be demonstrated. In the 1920s, at the time of Ukrainization, Yavorskyi's theory was embraced by the Soviet leaders, who adhered to so-called national communism, and it was used in the ideological struggle against non-Marxist national historiographies, represented in the works of, among others, Mykhailo Hrushevskiyi.

In 1929 Yavorskyi became a full member of the All-Ukrainian Academy of Sciences (VUAN) and was in charge of its first department of history and philosophy. In that year, however, as result of a Stalinist campaign against "nationalist deviation" in the Ukraine, Yavorskyi was officially denounced and dismissed from the VUAMLIN. In February 1930 he was expelled from the party and from the VUAN. Arrested in March 1931 and sentenced to six years' imprisonment in February 1932, Yavorskyi was exiled to the Solovets Islands. Although during his trial he cooperated with the investigators, while serving the sentence, he openly spoke out against the Stalinist administration of justice. On 9 October 1937 the NKVD "troika" found Yavorskyi guilty of conducting "nationalist" activities, and he was executed by a firing squad, along with a group of other prisoners from the Western Ukraine, among them Mykhailo Lozynskiyi. Yavorskyi's works include Narysy z istorii revoliutsiinoi borotby na Ukraini (Essays in the history of revolutionary struggle in the Ukraine, 2 vols.; 1927–28) and Ukraina v epokhu kapitalizmu (Ukraine in the epoch of capitalism, 3 vols.; 1924–25), as well as numerous articles on methodological subjects. YČAS Martynas (13 November 1885, Šimpeliškiai, near Biržai–5 April 1941, Rio de Janeiro), Lithuanian lawyer and politician. Born into a Protestant family, after passing his high school graduation examinations, Yčas studied law at the university in Tomsk, Siberia, receiving a degree in 1911. He subsequently worked as an attorney in Kaunas. Elected a deputy to the fourth Russian State Duma in 1912, Yčas was a member of a faction of the Russian Constitutional Democratic Party. He put forward a proposal for a statute of autonomy for Lithuania. From 1912 to 1914 Yčas edited the periodical Vairas in Kaunas. After the outbreak of World War I, he became chairman of the Lithuanian Central Relief Committee. Before the front line approached, Yčas moved to the interior of Russia, where he continued to carry on the committee's work, among other things using funds provided by an organization established by Grand Duchess Tatyana, the daughter of Tsar Nicholas II. Yčas became vice-chairman of this organization, which helped him to obtain permission to establish two Lithuanian schools in Voronezh. From 1915 to 1918 he edited the weekly Lietuvių Balsas in Petrograd. He also worked for the promotion of the Lithuanian cause abroad. Yčas made visits to Sweden, Switzerland, and the United States, where he sought the support of the Lithuanian émigré community for Lithuania's independence. He briefly served as minister of education in the first Provisional Government after the February 1917 revolution. Arrested after the Bolshevik revolution, he escaped from prison and returned to Lithuania.

In August 1918 Yčas was coopted into the Lithuanian Council (Taryba). In the first Lithuanian government, established on 11 November 1918, he assumed the portfolio of minister of trade and industry, and in the subsequent cabinets he served as minister of finance. He then secured loans from Germany, Great Britain, and the United States. In 1919 Yčas was a member of the Lithuanian delegation to the Paris Peace Conference, at which Lithuania failed to gain the status of a full participant. In 1921 he was a member of an arbitration commission that demarcated the border between Lithuania and Latvia. He was instrumental in the establishment of the Bank of Lithuania and in the introduction of the Lithuanian currency, the litas. Yčas organized many enterprises, including the Nemunas foundry, the Ringuva oil mill, and a textile factory in Panevėžys. He was also a co-founder of the Lithuanian merchant navy. He was repeatedly elected head of the synod of the Evangelical Reformed Church. As a result of his efforts, the Department of Protestant Theology was established at the university in Kaunas. Yčas published his memoirs, Nepriklausomybės kelias (Toward independence, 3 vols.; 1935–36). In 1940 he went to Portugal and thence to Brazil, where he died. His brother, Jonas Yčas (1880–1931), a historian and politician, served as minister of education (1918–19) and worked as a professor at the university in Kaunas. (WR)

YEFREMOV Serhiy (6 October 1876, Palchik, Kiev region–1937 or 1939, Vladimir?), Ukrainian literary critic and historian, victim of Stalinist persecution. Yefremov was born into a clergyman's family and graduated from theological seminaries in Human and Kiev and from the Law School of Kiev University. He wrote for the Hromadska dumka, Rada, Literaturno-Naukovyi Visnyk, and Zapysky

Naukohoivo Tovarystva imieni Shevchenka periodicals. From the beginning of the 1890s Yefremov belonged to the Kiev Narodniks. He was active in the Old Hromada and its editorial initiative, Vik (The century, 1895–1918), contributing to the edition of many works of Ukrainian literature. Yefremov co-founded successive political groups that developed from this society: the All-Ukrainian Non-party Democratic Organization in 1897 and the Ukrainian Democratic Radical Party (1904–5), which advocated the transformation of Russia into a federation of equal nations, the nationalization of the manufacturing industry, and an agrarian reform without compensation to landowners. In 1908 Yefremov joined the Society of Ukrainian Progressives, the group that led the initiatives of the main current of the Ukrainian movement under the Russian government until 1917.

In March 1917 Yefremov became a member of the Ukrainian Central Rada (Council) (UCR) and served as a deputy to President Mykhailo Hrushevskyyi. However, their political paths diverged, and Yefremov chose the centrist direction. He co-established the Ukrainian Party of Socialists-Federalists in 1917. As its representative, he became a member of the so-called Small Rada and took part in negotiations with the Provisional Government in Petrograd on the status of the Ukraine in a future Russian state. He also served as secretary for national minorities in the government of the General Secretariat of the UCR. Yefremov did not leave Kiev after the fall of the UCR in February 1918 and continued to work with representatives of the independent Ukraine orientation, the Directorate of Symon Petlura, until the failure of the Ukrainian question on the international scene in 1923.

Despite Bolshevik attempts to win him over, Yefremov did not assume any political functions in the Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic and concentrated only upon literary theory and scholarly endeavors. His consistent stance got him the title of "the conscience of the Ukraine." In the 1920s Yefremov was president of the Ukrainian Academy of Sciences. In 1924, as a result of the Ukrainization policy of the party, a group of scholars and politicians of the Narodnik orientation, with Hrushevskyyi as leader, returned from exile. The scholarly work of non-Communist scholars became easier then, though it was not free from the personal conflicts between Yefremov and Hrushevskyyi, the two most prominent humanists and Narodniks in the Ukraine of that time. With the increase in Stalinist terror, the USSR security forces prepared the so-called trial of the Union for the Liberation of Ukraine in order to get rid of the non-Bolshevik intelligentsia. Arrested on 2 July 1928, along with a group of co-workers, Yefremov was accused of preparing an armed uprising aimed at the rebuilding of a “bourgeois” Ukraine. Most historians incline toward the opinion that this organization did not exist and that all of the evidence against it was false. Yefremov rejected Stalin’s offer of a pardon, addressed personally to him, at the cost of lending his writing talents to the services of the regime. On 19 April 1930 Yefremov received a death sentence, changed later to ten years of prison. He served the sentence in Yaroslav and (from 1937) in Vladimir, where he probably perished.

Yefremov left many monographs on Ukrainian writers of the nineteenth century, including Spivets borotby i kontrastiv (Songster of struggle and contrasts; 1913); Shevchenko (1914); M. Kotsiubynskyi (1922); Nechuy-Levytskyi, Karpenko-Kary (1924); and Panas Mirny (1928). Yefremov owes his place in the history of Ukrainian culture above all to the two-volume Istoriia ukrainskoho pysmenstva (History of Ukrainian literature; 1910). Aside from the works of Hrushevskyi, this work contained one of the last studies of the nineteenth-century Ukrainian Narodnik movement. Like the Russian Narodniks, Yefremov perceived the historical process as an arena of progress created by sovereign human decisions. He credited the Ukrainian nation with persevering in the fight for freedom and concentrated his attention upon its means of expression: the national language and literature. (TS)

YERMACHENKA Ivan (13 May 1894, Kopychovka, near Borisov–25 February 1970, South River, New Jersey), Belorussian politician. Yermachenka graduated in electrical engineering in Moscow. Mobilized into the Russian Army in 1914, he was taken prisoner of war by the Germans but managed to escape. He fought as a colonel on the side of the Whites during the civil war in Russia. Aide-de-camp to General Pyotr Wrangel, in 1920, along with a remnant of Wrangel’s army, Yermachenka escaped to Istanbul. He founded the Belorussian Committee in Turkey, where in 1921 he became ambassador of the Belorussian People’s Republic (BPR) and consul general in the Balkans. In 1922 Yermachenka moved to Kaunas and was appointed deputy minister for foreign affairs in the BPR émigré government. In 1923 he settled in Prague, where he studied medicine at Charles University and later had his own medical practice. He was also involved in the work of Belorussian émigré organizations. In August 1939, along with Vasil Zakharka, president of the BPR Council, Yermachenka conducted talks with representatives of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the Third Reich concerning cooperation between Belorussia and Nazi Germany in the case of a German-Soviet conflict. From October 1941 Yermachenka lived in German-occupied Minsk. He became head of the Belorussian People’s Mutual Aid Association, which was to serve as a government of the Belorussian state allied with Germany. In April 1943 he was forced by the Nazi security services to resign from his position for exceeding his powers, and he had to go to Prague. In May 1945 Yermachenka went to western Germany and in 1948 to the United States, where he had a medical practice, was active among Belorussian émigré circles, and published in the émigré press. YERMALOVICH Mikalai (29 April 1921, Malyia Navasiolki, near Minsk–4 March 2000, Minsk), Belorussian historian and literary scholar. After graduating from the Pedagogical Institute in Minsk (1947), Yermalovich worked as a lecturer in Belorussian literature at the Teachers’ Institute in Molodechno (1948–55). From 1957 onwards he concentrated on the earliest history of Belorussia, publishing many articles on the political history of the Polotsk Principality and the Novogrudok Duchy. Yermalovich was the originator of the theory that ethnically the Belorussian population was composed largely of Slavicized Balts. According to his theory, ancient Lithuania was located between Novogrudok and Minsk. The Novogrudok Duchy, the first form of Lithuanian statehood, dating back to the eleventh century, was supposed to have been inhabited by a Christianized population representing the Russo-Byzantine culture. Yermalovich presented his theory in three books: Starazhytnaia Belarus: Polatski i novaharodski peryiady (Ancient Belarus: The Polotsk and Novogrudok Period; 1990); Pa sladakh adnaho mita (Following the traces of one myth; 1991); and Starazhytnaia Belarus: Vilenski peryiad (Ancient Belarus: The Vilnius period; 1993). Yermalovich’s thesis challenged the findings of Russian and Lithuanian historiography, which postulated the subjugation of the Belorussian territory by the Balts in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, and it gave rise to a stormy discussion among Belorussian, Russian, and Lithuanian historians. At that time, Yermalovich’s books were the most sought-after literature in Belarus. (EM)

YEZAVITAU Kanstantsin (17 November 1893, Dvinsk–23 May 1946, Minsk), Belorussian politician, journalist, and historian. In 1913 Yezavitau joined the Belorussian Socialist Hromada. In 1916 he graduated from the Teachers' Institute in Vitebsk and the Pavlov Military Academy in St. Petersburg, and then he was sent to the northern front. After the February 1917 revolution, Yezavitau organized the Congress of the Belorussian Veterans of the Northern Front, and in November he became deputy president of the Belorussian Central Military Council. He was arrested by the Bolsheviks for taking part in the work of the First All-Belorussian Congress, but in February 1918 he managed to escape from prison. After the Red Army left Minsk, Yezavitau became commander of the Minsk garrison. He took part in preparations for the declaration of independence of the Belorussian People's Republic (BPR) on 25 March 1918. Yezavitau served as secretary for military affairs with the rank of colonel in the BPR Council, organizing Belorussian units. According to the decision of the Belorussian Council in Vilnius (Wilno), in December 1918 he was appointed commissioner of Białystok and commander of an infantry regiment in Grodno. He initiated publication of the newspaper Bats'kaushchina. In the summer of 1919 the BPR Council appointed Yezavitau head of a military mission to the Lithuanian government and later head of a military mission to Latvia and Estonia. Under Yezavitau's mediation, the corps of Stanislau Bulak-Balakhovich subordinated itself to the BPR Council. In May 1920 the BPR Council promoted Yezavitau to major general.

After the signing of the Treaty of Riga between Poland and Soviet Russia (March 1921), Yezavitau settled in Latvia and took Latvian citizenship. He was involved in organizing cultural and educational activities among the local Belorussians and worked as an inspector of Belorussian schools for the Latvian Ministry of Education. He founded several publishing houses, and he published extensively. He compiled a considerable collection of books, worked on a Belorussian biographical dictionary, and compiled an archive of the Belorussian liberation movement. In 1924 Yezavitau was arrested on charges of scheming to sever the southern districts of Latvia from the country and bring them under Belorussian rule. Released for a lack of evidence after nearly one year of imprisonment, Yezavitau was later arrested on two occasions. After the annexation of Latvia by the USSR in 1940, Yezavitau worked as a teacher and cultural instructor for the board of the Trade Union of Education Workers of the Latvian

SSR. In August 1941, during the German occupation, he became president of the Belorussian Central Committee in Riga. He was mainly involved in organizing Belorussian education in Latvia. In June 1944 he attended the Second All-Belorussian Congress in Minsk. He became a member of the Belorussian Central Council and the chief inspector of the Belorussian Army. In August 1944 he went from Riga to Germany, where in April 1945 he was arrested by the Soviet intelligence services. He was taken to Moscow and later to Minsk. Yezavitau died in prison while his case was being investigated. Tuberculosis was given as the official cause of death. (EM)

YORDANOV Aleksandur (13 February 1952, Varna), Bulgarian politician, literary critic, and journalist. Yordanov graduated in Bulgarian philology from the Higher Pedagogical Institute in Shumen. In 1986 he received a Ph.D. at the Institute of Literature of the Bulgarian Academy of Sciences (BAS) and started working there. In 1990–91 Yordanov was deputy to the Grand National Assembly on behalf of the Union of Democratic Forces (Sayuz na Demokratichnite Sili [UDF]) and spokesman of the UDF parliamentary club. On 14 May 1991, along with thirty other UDF deputies, he left the Assembly in protest against the draft constitution. From October 1991 to December 1994 Yordanov was a UDF deputy again, presiding over its parliamentary club and over the foreign affairs commission of the Assembly. From November 1992 to December 1994 he was speaker of the parliament. From 1990 to 1992 he was editor-in-chief of the newspaper Vek. In 1991–97 Yordanov was deputy chairman of the Radical Democratic Party, and from 1997 he was its chairman. From 1991 he was also deputy head of the UDF National Coordination Council for mediation and for contact with the daily Demokratsia. In 1998 Yordanov became ambassador to Poland. He authored several books and more than two hundred articles, including Lichnosti i idei (Personalities and ideas; 1986); V siankata na dumite (In the shadow of words; 1989); Svoechuzhdiyat modernizym (Familiar-alien modernism, 1993); and Nadezhdata sreshthu bezvremeto (Hope against inactivity; 1993). YOSIF I [originally Lazar Yovchev] (5 May 1840, Kalofer–20 June 1915, Sofia), exarch of Bulgaria. Yosif graduated from the French Catholic high school in Istanbul and later in philosophy (1864–67) and law (1867–70) from the Sorbonne in Paris. After returning home, he joined in the struggle for the independence of the Bulgarian Orthodox Church from the patriarch of Constantinople. He edited the periodicals Chyталishte and Makedonia. Ordained in 1872, Yosif worked as secretary for Exarch Antim I, and from 1876 he was metropolitan of Lovech. After the outbreak of the Russo-Turkish War of 1877, the Turkish government expelled Antim, and Yosif acted on his behalf. He retained the headquarters of the exarchate in Istanbul, taking care of the Bulgarians under the Turkish yoke in Macedonia and Eastern Thrace; in view of the revision of the San Stefano Peace Treaty and the loss of these territories by Bulgaria under the terms of the Berlin Treaty of 1878, Yosif's actions were politically significant. Despite Turkish obstacles, Yosif managed to appoint Bulgarian bishops in Skopje and Ohrid and to establish a network of Bulgarian schools. Thanks to his endeavors, until World War I, about 1,300 schools were established, including high schools and seminaries. In 1893–1912 a Bulgarian theological seminary functioned in Istanbul. Yosif mediated between the sultan and the prince of Bulgaria. After the defeat of Bulgaria in the Second Balkan War in 1913, Yosif decided to return to Bulgaria, but the Bulgarian authorities were not eager to move the seat of the exarchy, hoping for the recovery of Macedonia and Eastern Thrace. In 1994 Yosif's Pisma i dokladi (Writings and lectures) were published. (JW/WDj)

YUGOV Anton (15 August 1904, Karasuli, Macedonia–8 July 1991, Sofia), Bulgarian Communist activist. After World War I, Yugov's family settled in Bulgaria, where he started working in a cigarette factory in Plovdiv in 1919. In 1920 he became active in the trade union movement, and in 1922 he joined a Macedonian leftist organization in Bulgaria. In September 1923 he took part in an unsuccessful Communist uprising in Sofia, although he had joined the Bulgarian Communist Party (BCP) only in 1928. In 1934 Yugov was sent to Moscow for fifteen months; there he underwent training at the Leninist School of the Comintern. After his return to Bulgaria in February 1936, he quickly rose through the party ranks. In 1937 he joined the Politburo of the BCP CC. The BCP was officially active under the name of the Bulgarian Workers' Party, and Yugov was in charge of its trade union department. In 1941, after the occupation of Macedonia by the Bulgarian Army, he supervised the takeover of control over the Macedonian Communists. Arrested in 1942, he escaped from prison and continued party work in the underground.

After the coup of 9 September 1944, Yugov was appointed minister of interior. He organized the People's Militia, and with the help of Soviet advisers, he set up a security apparatus that used cruel terror against all opponents of the system. Yugov was particularly known for his brutality. In 1944–46 over 2,100 Bulgarian political activists were executed. Yugov was directly responsible for staging the trials of prominent politicians of tsarist Bulgaria: 162 people were tried in these trials; 96 of them were sentenced to death and executed by firing squad on 1 and 2 February 1946. In July 1949 Yugov became deputy prime minister. As a Communist who had lived in Bulgaria during the war, Yugov was attacked by Vulko Chervenkov during the trial of Traicho Kostov in 1949. By August 1949 Yugov had already ceased to be minister of interior, and he also left the Politburo. In January 1950 he ceased to be deputy prime minister, but he managed to keep the post of minister of industry. After making a self-criticism, Yugov managed to save his position. In September 1951 he regained his place in the Politburo, and in August 1952 he was again appointed deputy prime minister. In May 1953 he was sent to Plovdiv, where he brutally crushed a strike in the tobacco industry. At the same time, as a "victim" of the Stalinist regime, he supported the release of Kostov's former adherents from prison, which gave him leverage against Chervenkov. After the Sixth Congress of the BCP in March 1954, Yugov was already one of the top party leaders. At that time, following the Soviet example, he helped to introduce "collective leadership." It meant that Chervenkov, who until then had been his rival, remained prime minister but had to yield his post as party leader to Todor Zhivkov.

Yugov was a member of the Bulgarian delegation to the Twentieth Congress of the CPSU in Moscow in February 1956. At a crucial plenum of the CC of the BCP on 2–6 April 1956 a decision was made to remove Chervenkov from the premiership, and on 17 April Yugov was appointed in his place. At that time he played an important role in suppressing the "thaw" tendencies in Bulgarian society and in restoring relations with the Yugoslav party. At the end of the 1950s competition between Yugov and Zhivkov increased. This competition manifested itself in economic policy and in relations with China. While Zhivkov supported the acceleration of industrialization and supported the Kremlin against Beijing, Yugov was more skeptical about the acceleration of capital formation and more cautious about policy toward China. Through a series of government reshuffles, in 1959 Zhivkov managed to weaken Yugov's position. During Nikita Khrushchev's visit to Bulgaria in May 1962, Zhivkov gained support against his rival. Khrushchev publicly backed Zhivkov. After consultations in Moscow, on 4 November of that year the CC plenum decided to remove Yugov from the CC and recommended that he be dismissed as prime minister. The following day, in a speech at the Eighth Congress of the BCP, Zhivkov announced these decisions. Subsequent speakers directed accusations against Yugov, charging him with "anti-party" activities, opposition to economic policy, "dishonesty and arrogance," abuses of power, and the persecution of party activists in the Stalinist years. One of the speakers even accused Yugov of responsibility for the Kostov trial. With Yugov's dismissal, Zhivkov finally consolidated his power over the party. In June 1964 Yugov was also deprived of his parliamentary seat. For many years he remained in the shadows, although he was never held responsible for his activities. After Zhivkov's resignation in November 1989, Yugov was in the limelight again: he received the most prestigious order of the Bulgarian People's Republic. In January 1990, in a decision by the Politburo of the BCP, Yugov was "rehabilitated" as a "victim" of Zhivkov. (WR)

YUKHNOVSKYI Ihor (1 September 1925, Kniahynyn, near Równe [Rivne]), Ukrainian scholar and politician. Born into an intelligentsia family, Yukhnovskiy took part in World War II. In 1951 he graduated in physics from the University of Kiev. In 1954 he defended a Ph.D. dissertation and became an associate professor there. In 1959–69 Yukhnovskiy was the chair of theoretical physics at this university, and in 1965 he received a postdoctoral degree there. In 1969–90 Yukhnovskiy directed the Department of Statistical Physics at the Institute of Theoretical Physics of the Academy of Sciences of the Ukraine in Lviv. From 1990 he directed the Institute of the Physics of Condensed Systems of the National Academy of Sciences of the Ukraine (NASU). In 1990–98 he was a member of the NASU Presidium and chairman of the West Ukrainian NASU Research Center. Yukhnovskiy authored more than four hundred articles. From 1956 to 1990 he was a member of the Communist Party, and in 1964–66 he was a deputy of the Lviv City Council. In 1990 Yukhnovskiy was elected to the Supreme Council of the Ukrainian SSR and was suggested by former dissidents as a candidate for deputy speaker of parliament. Although the Communist majority prevented his election, from this time Yukhnovskiy became an informal leader of the pro-independence opposition (the so-called National Council). After the failure of the Moscow putsch, on 24 August 1991 Yukhnovskiy moved to proclaim the independence of the Ukraine and to confirm this act by a popular referendum. In the presidential elections of 1 December 1991 Yukhnovskiy won only 1.7 percent of the vote. From October 1992 to March 1993 he was deputy prime minister in the government of Leonid Kuchma. Yukhnovskiy took part in a commission preparing the constitution of June 1996. From 1998 to 2002 he was an MP on behalf of the Popular Movement of the Ukraine, and from 2002, of the Our Ukraine bloc of Viktor Yushchenko. A member of many advisory government bodies, Yukhnovskiy was also chairman of the Derzhavnist (Statehood) Research Society and the Ukrainian Veterans' Union. (TS)

YURYNETS Volodymyr (1891, Olesko, near Busko, Galicia—4 October 1937, USSR), Ukrainian Marxist philosopher, publicist, and art critic. After graduating from a gymnasium in Lemberg (Lviv, Lwów), Yurynets studied at the university in Lemberg. In 1910 he began to study in Vienna, where, among other things, he attended lectures by Sigmund Freud. Yurynets continued studies in philosophy, mathematics, and physics in Berlin and Paris. He learned ten foreign languages. During World War I Yurynets was taken prisoner by the Russians. In 1920 he joined the Red Army, where he served as a political commissar, edited front-line newspapers, and fought against Poland. In 1920 he was also admitted to the Communist Party (Bolshevik) of Ukraine (CP[B]U), and in 1924 he graduated from the Institute of Red Professorship in Moscow. Yurynets lectured at the Communist University of Eastern Nations, Moscow University, and other universities. In 1925 he took the chair of sociology at the Ukrainian Institute of Marxism-Leninism in Kharkiv, and he began working in the editorial offices of Bilshovyk Ukrainy (1926–34) and Prapor marksyzmu (1927–33), the organs of the CP(B)U, and in the editorial office of the literary periodical Chervonyi Shliakh. Yurynets published works in dialectics and historical materialism, the history of philosophy and the philosophy of history, sociology, aesthetics, physics, and criticism of Western philosophy and Ukrainian nationalism. While a student in Moscow, he began to study Edmund Husserl's phenomenology, and later he studied Democritus, Immanuel Kant, and Freud. Although in 1929 Yurynets was elected a member of the Ukrainian Academy of Sciences, an increasing number of his works were being banned from distribution. Such was the fate of the following books: Pavlo Tychyna: Sproba krytychnoi analizy (Pavlo Tychyna: An attempt at critical analysis; 1928); Filosofichno-sotsiologichni narysy (Philosophical and sociological sketches; 1930); and the textbook Diialektychnyi materiializm (Dialectical materialism; 1932). Yurynets was accused of yielding to the influences of neo-Kantianism, neo-Hegelianism, and "bourgeois nationalism," and in 1933 he was expelled from the party. Arrested in July 1937, Yurynets was sentenced to death and executed by firing squad. (TS)

YUSHCHENKO Viktor (23 February 1954, Khoruzhivka, Sumy district), Ukrainian economist and politician. In 1975 Yushchenko graduated from the Ternopil Institute of Economics and Finance, and in 1984, from the Ukrainian Institute of Economics and Agricultural Management. He worked as a bookkeeper in a kolkhoz in the Ivano-Frankivsk region. In 1976–85 Yushchenko worked in the State Bank in Ulyanivka (Sumy district). From 1985 he was deputy director of the agricultural credit department of the State Bank of the Ukrainian SSR in Kiev; in 1987 he became head of the department of economic planning in the Agroprom Bank, and in 1990–92 he was deputy director of this bank. After the transformation of this bank into Bank Ukraina in 1992, Yushchenko was its first deputy director. From January 1993 to January 2000 he was chairman of the National Bank of Ukraine. Yushchenko became known as an advocate of economic reforms and enjoyed the support of President Leonid Kuchma. As a Ukrainian representative in international financial institutions (the International Monetary Fund and the European Bank for Reconstruction and Development), Yushchenko contributed to Ukraine's receiving stabilization loans, which made it possible to introduce the Ukrainian currency (hryvna) in 1996. Later he continued his efforts to defend the rate of exchange of the hryvna, a task that was particularly difficult during the financial crisis in Russia in August 1998. Yushchenko was also a member of many government economic, security, and cultural councils and committees.

After his reelection in November 1999, President Kuchma entrusted Yushchenko with the position of prime minister. On 22 December 1999 his government was approved by the Supreme Council by an overwhelming majority of 296 mandates to 12. During Yushchenko's term, the functioning of the government apparatus was improved, while the Ukrainian economy managed to gain more trust among international financial institutions, mostly thanks to a restrictive monetary policy, a liberalization of land sales, and a restructuring of the fuel and power industries. For the first time since independence the gross national product started growing. Liquidating the brokerage of private companies in gas trade operations with Russia, Yushchenko managed to improve the budget situation and, in consequence, to restore the regular payment of wages in the public sector. He gained enormous popularity, which jeopardized the position of President Kuchma. The fall of Yushchenko's government on 29 May 2001 did not damage his ratings. He had to resign under pressure from former Communists and opposition oligarchs. In the elections of March 2002 the center-right bloc Our Ukraine, created by Yushchenko, ran in opposition to President Kuchma and gained 23.6 percent of the vote. Yushchenko won a seat for himself and remained the most popular Ukrainian politician. During the presidential campaign of 2004 he won widespread support, promising a cleanup in public life. In the second round of the election, on 21 November 2004 Yushchenko was declared a loser to the pro-Russian candidate, Viktor Yanukovich. There were obvious traces of election fraud, so this result caused huge demonstrations in support of Yushchenko (the so-called Orange Revolution). A serious constitutional crisis was resolved through international mediation, and on 26 December 2004 Yushchenko won the rerun second round, gaining 52 percent of the vote. On 23 January 2005 he was sworn in as the new president. (TS)

Z

ŻABIŃSKI Andrzej (28 May 1938, Katowice–17 March 1988, Katowice), Polish Communist activist. Żabiński graduated from the Higher School of Social Sciences of the Polish United Workers' Party (PUWP) Central Committee and from Warsaw University. He joined the PUWP in 1956 and started his party career in 1960. He was, among other things, head of the Main Board of the Socialist Youth Association (1967–72) and first secretary of provincial PUWP committees in Opole (1972–80) and Katowice (1980–82). From 1968 to July 1981 Żabiński was a member of the PUWP CC; from August 1980 he was a deputy member of the CC Politburo, and from September 1980 to July 1981 he was a full member. In 1965–85 Żabiński was an MP, and from 1980 to 1982 he was head of the parliamentary commission of national defense. One of the younger party leaders, he advocated a hard line in dealing with Solidarity and the democratic opposition. Żabiński enjoyed the trust of Moscow and was a pretender to the highest ranks in leadership in the case that Stanisław Kania was removed as first secretary of the PUWP. After the introduction of martial law Żabiński advocated a radical line, including the dissolution of the PUWP and the creation of a new, “truly Communist” party. Therefore he was removed from the party leadership by General Wojciech Jaruzelski and sent as a councillor to the embassy in Budapest (1982–87). (AP)

ZABŁOCKI Janusz (18 February 1926, Grodzisk Mazowiecki), Polish politician. During World War II Zabłocki was a member of the Gray Ranks (Szare Szeregi), an underground scouting organization, and a soldier in the Home Army (Armia Krajowa). In 1949 he received a law degree from the Jagiellonian University in Kraków. A member of the PAX association from 1950, Zabłocki contributed to its periodicals, Dziś i Jutro, Słowo Powszechne, and Tygodnik Powszechny. During the “thaw” in 1955 he left the PAX association in protest against the support given by its head, Bolesław Piasecki, to the dogmatic Natolin faction within the Polish United Workers' Party (PUWP). In 1956 Zabłocki co-founded the National Club of Progressive Catholic Intelligentsia and the Club of the Catholic Intelligentsia in Warsaw. At that time he began to work for the monthly Więź, and in 1963–65 he was its correspondent at the Second Vatican Council. Zabłocki was also the founder of the Center of Documentation and Social Studies in Warsaw, which published the monthly Chrześcijanin w świecie from 1969 on. From 1965 to 1985 Zabłocki was an MP in the Assembly. At the end of the 1960s he became a supporter of the PUWP faction led by Mieczysław Moczar, and after Moczar's fall he hoped that the continuing members of this faction, led by Franciszek Szlachcic, would offer lay Catholics a chance to expand their political activities. In 1976 Zabłocki established a separate Polish Club of Catholic Intelligentsia in Warsaw. In 1981 he founded the Polish Catholic Social Union, but it failed to gain the support of wider circles of the Catholic opposition. Zabłocki's presence in the Assembly during martial law in Poland did not help to enhance his credibility among Polish Catholics. In 1986 Zabłocki became a member of a consultative council to the president of the Council of State. In 1988 he was elected chairman of the Christian Democratic Club of Political Thought. After the 1989 Round Table negotiations the club was transformed into the Labor Party, but it failed to play the role of a revived Christian Democratic party. Zabłocki's publications include Kościół i świat współczesny (The Church and the modern world; 1967); Na polskim skrzyżowaniu dróg (At the Polish crossroads; 1972); Tożsamość i siły narodu (The identity and the power of the nation; 1978); Chrześcijańska demokracja w kraju i na emigracji 1947–1970 (Christian Democracy in Poland and in exile 1947–1970; 1999); and Prymas Stefan Wyszyński (Primate Stefan Wyszyński; 2002). ZAHRADNÍČEK Ján (17 January 1905, Mastník, Třebíč district–7 October 1960, Uhřetínov, Žďár-nad-Sázavou district), Czech poet and translator. From 1926 to 1930 Zahradníček studied philosophy at Charles University in Prague, but he never graduated, devoting himself to poetry and journalism. From 1940 to 1948 he edited the Catholic periodical Akord in Brno, and from 1945 to 1949 he was an editor at the Brněnské Tiskárny publishing house. A leading Czech Catholic poet, Zahradníček was initially influenced by symbolism. His first collections of poems—Pokušení smrti (Tempting death; 1930), Návrat (Return; 1931), and Jeřáby (Cranes; 1933)—were imbued with religious symbolism and motifs. Contrary to the trends of that period, in the second half of the 1930s

Zahradniček expressed delight in life and faith in the future, publishing the collections Žíznivé léto (Thirsty summer; 1935) and Pozdravení slunci (Greetings to the sun; 1937). In his two postwar collections, Stará země (Old earth; 1946) and Svatý Václav (Saint Wenceslas; 1946), he critically reviewed the realities of war from a Christian standpoint.

Zahradniček did not accept the Sovietization of Czechoslovakia. In La Saletta (1947), the last volume published during his lifetime, he stressed that only the Christian faith could prevent a world catastrophe. His next collection, Znamení moci (Sign of power; 1950), was banned from printing, and it was not published until 1990. One of the leading representatives of Czech Catholic culture, Zahradniček was arrested in June 1951. After a rigged trial of the “Green International,” he was sentenced to thirteen years’ imprisonment in July 1952. Amnestied in 1960, he was posthumously rehabilitated in 1968. Poems that Zahradniček wrote in prison were published in the volumes Čtyři léta (Four summers; 1969) and Dům strach (House fear; 1981). The prison poetry reflects Zahradniček’s suffering and experiences as a prisoner, but it also shows a strength coming from his Christian faith. Zahradniček authored the collection of essays Oslice Balaamova (Balaam’s ass; 1940). He also translated poems by Rainer Maria Rilke and Friedrich Hölderlin, as well as Thomas Mann’s prose. Together with Otto Babler Zahradniček translated Dante’s The Divine Comedy. (PU)

ZAKHARKA Vasil (1 April 1877, Dobroseltsy, near Volkovysk–14 March 1943, Prague), Belorussian politician. Born into a poor peasant family, Zakharka was orphaned at the age of sixteen. From 1895 to 1898 he worked as a teacher in schools run by the Orthodox Church, supporting his brother and sister. Inducted into the army in 1898, he began a military career that lasted until 1917. After the February 1917 revolution, Zakharka was the main founder of Belorussian military units in the territory of Belorussia. In the summer of 1917 he initiated the organization of a congress of Belorussian soldiers’ delegates, which elected him secretary of the Belorussian Central Military Council (22 October 1917). At that time Zakharka was one of the leaders of the Belorussian Socialist Hromada. At the First All-Belorussian Congress in December 1917 he was elected to its council. In February 1918 Zakharka became one of the top leaders of the People’s Secretariat of Belorussia, which was appointed by the Executive Committee of the All-Belorussian Congress and recognized by Germany as a representation of the Belorussian people. After the independence of the Belorussian National Republic (BNR) was proclaimed in March 1918, Zakharka held various ministerial and diplomatic posts in the BNR. After the Polish-Soviet Treaty of Riga was signed in March 1921, he co-initiated the organization of the First Belorussian National and Political Conference, held in Prague in September 1921, where the situation of Belorussia was recognized as the country’s occupation by its two neighboring states. Zakharka served as minister of finance in the Kaunas-based BNR’s government-in-exile. At the Second Belorussian Conference (in Berlin, October 1925), Zakharka was one of the few émigré politicians to refuse to recognize the government of the Belorussian SSR as a representation of the Belorussian nation. Zakharka did not return to his country and lived in exile in Prague. After the death of Pyotr Kracheuski, Zakharka became chairman of the BNR Council in exile (March 1928). He defended the cause of a free Belorussia. For example, he wrote protests to the League of Nations against the persecution of the Belorussian people. In 1941 Zakharka declined to collaborate with the Germans and refused to pass the symbols of power of the BNR to politicians who did so. (EM)

ZALESKI August (30 September 1883, Warsaw–7 April 1972, London), Polish diplomat, politician, and historian. Zaleski completed university studies in London and then began working in the library and museum of the Krasiński Entail in Warsaw. During World War I he was responsible for propaganda for the Supreme National Committee (Naczelnny Komitet Narodowy [NKN]) from 1915 to 1917, and then he worked as head of a section in the State Department of the Kingdom of Poland. In 1918 Zaleski became head of the Polish mission in Switzerland, in May 1919 Polish delegate to Greece, and in July 1920 envoy to Athens. In January 1921 he began working in the Political Department of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs in Warsaw. In April 1922 he became an envoy to Italy. In February 1926 he returned to the headquarters of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs and began preparing for a new mission in Japan. However, after the coup of May 1926, Zaleski accepted Józef Piłsudski’s offer to join the new government. He became head of a department (15 May 1926) and minister of foreign affairs (25 May). He tried to secure a permanent seat for Poland in the League of Nations Council. In 1927 Poland obtained a “semi-permanent” seat in the council, and Zaleski became Poland’s representative there. On behalf of Poland, Zaleski signed the Briand-Kellogg Pact on the peaceful settlement of international disputes (27 August 1928), the Litvinov Protocol (9 February 1929), and the Soviet-Polish Non-Aggression Pact (25 July 1932). In November 1932 Zaleski left the diplomatic service and handed over his position to Józef Beck. He served as senator on the ticket of the Nonparty Bloc of Cooperation with the Government (Bezpartyjny Blok Współpracy z Rządem [BBWR]) from 1935 to 1938 and chairman of the Supervisory Board of the Commercial Bank (Bank Handlowy) in Warsaw from 1935 to 1939.

After the defeat of Poland in September 1939, Zaleski served as minister of foreign affairs in the government of General Władysław Sikorski from October 1939 to July 1941. An opponent of the agreement with the Soviet Union, he resigned after the Polish-Soviet Treaty of 30 July 1941 was signed. From 1943 to 1945 Zaleski served as head of the Civil Chancellery of Władysław Raczkiewicz, president of the Republic of Poland. After the war, he remained in exile. Since Raczkiewicz picked him as his successor, after Raczkiewicz’s death, Zaleski became president on 9 June 1947. His role as president was diminished because of a conflict with the Polish Socialist Party in exile, whose leader, Tomasz Arciszewski, had been originally designated by Raczkiewicz as the next president. Zaleski assumed that if Poland became independent from the Soviet Union, its security would depend on the establishment of a broader Central European union, to include Ukraine, Belorussia, and the Baltic states. After unification negotiations among the various Polish political émigré groups ended in failure in 1954, the majority of these groups refused to recognize Zaleski as president and subordinated themselves to the Provisional National Unity Council and its collective leadership, the Council of the Three. Although the group of Zaleski’s supporters continued to diminish, Zaleski formally held the post of president of the Republic of Poland in exile until the end of his life. (JS/WR) ZAMBROWSKI Roman (15 July 1909, Warsaw–19 August 1977, Warsaw), Polish Communist activist. Born into a lower-middle-class Jewish family, Zambrowski was a teacher by profession. In 1928 he joined the Communist Party of Poland (Komunistyczna Partia Polski [KPP]). From 1930 to 1938 he was a member and secretary of the Central Committee (CC) of the Communist Union of Polish Youth and represented this union in the Communist Youth International. Zambrowski graduated from the Higher Party School in Moscow. In Poland he was imprisoned several times, including a term in the camp at Bereza Kartuska (1938–39). In September 1939 he found himself in the Soviet territories, where he worked as a teacher (until 1943) and was active in the Central Office of Polish Communists. From the spring of 1943, Zambrowski took part in the formation of Polish military units under Soviet command. As head of the Political and Educational Board of the First Polish Army (March–September 1944), he cooperated with the Soviet security services. After Soviet troops entered Polish territories, Zambrowski became a member of the CC of the Polish Workers’ Party (Polska Partia Robotnicza [PPR]) in August 1944 and subsequently served as head of the PPR CC Organizational Department. He became secretary of the CC in April 1945 and a member of its Politburo in May 1945. Coopted into the National Home Council (Krajowa Rada Narodowa [KRN]), Zambrowski joined its presidium in May 1945. He soon became one of the top-ranking members of the party leadership, where he represented Stalinist orthodoxy. From November 1945 to December 1954 he also served as chairman of the Select Committee to Counteract Embezzlement and Economic Sabotage. The committee had the power to send people to forced labor camps without court procedures. Zambrowski was thus one of those directly responsible for the Stalinist terror. In the summer of 1948 he actively supported a campaign against the “rightist-nationalist deviation” of Władysław Gomułka.

After the (Communist) Polish United Workers’ Party (Polska Zjednoczona Partia Robotnicza [PUWP]) was established in December 1948, Zambrowski became one of its leaders, joining the PUWP CC and its Secretariat and Organizational Bureau. From February 1947 to November 1952 he served as deputy speaker of the Legislative Assembly, first as a representative of the PPR and then of the PUWP. From February 1947 to May 1955 Zambrowski was also a member of the Council of State. His position in the party leadership weakened during the anti-Semitic campaign in the Soviet bloc at the beginning of the 1950s. In February 1954 Zambrowski became chairman of the Committee for Administrative Subdivisions, and in March of that year, at the Second PUWP Congress, he left the Secretariat of the CC. From April 1955 to October 1956 he served as minister of state audits. During the “thaw” Zambrowski abandoned the Stalinist line. At the time of factional strife in 1955–56, he was one of the leaders of the Puławska faction (Puławianie), which called for the democratization of relations within the party and some liberalization of public life. After the death of Bolesław Bierut, Zambrowski was a candidate to succeed him. However, Nikita Khrushchev, who came to the Sixth Plenum of the PUWP CC on 20 March 1956, was against the appointment of a person of Jewish descent and sealed the election of Edward Ochab as first secretary of the PUWP CC. At the Eighth Plenum of the CC in October of that year, Zambrowski again became a member of the Secretariat and played the role of the patron of party “liberals” in the leadership. As the new party leadership (headed by Gomułka) intensified a campaign against revisionism, Zambrowski’s position weakened. At the ideological Thirteenth Plenum of the PUWP CC (4–6 July 1963) he was dropped from the Secretariat and the Politburo and was appointed vice-president of the Supreme Chamber of Control. Zambrowski was the target of official propaganda attacks during the anti-Semitic campaign in the second half of 1967, and particularly in March 1968. Mieczysław Moczar’s supporters groundlessly accused him of instigating the student movement. In April 1968 Zambrowski was expelled from the party, dismissed from the Supreme Chamber of Control, and forced to retire. His son, Antoni, became an activist of the democratic opposition. Zambrowski wrote Dziennik (Diary), issued by the underground publisher of the quarterly Krytyka in 1980. (WR) ZAMENHOF Ludwik (15 December 1859, Białystok–14 April 1917, Warsaw), Polish philologist of Jewish descent, creator of the artificial language of Esperanto. Zamenhof studied medicine and became an ophthalmologist. Influenced by his father, he was interested in languages from childhood. He attempted to write a Yiddish grammar but failed to complete it. In 1878 Zamenhof established the foundations of an artificial international language based on only nine hundred main words and sixteen rules of grammar. He published this work in 1887 as Lingvo In- ternacia (International language) under the pseudonym of Dr. Esperanto. Initially disregarded, the language attracted followers and gained the name of Esperanto. In the course of time its vocabulary was expanded to one hundred thousand words. Zamenhof translated many German literary works and the Bible into Esperanto, trying to prove that despite its simplicity, Esperanto could be used to express complicated material. An anthology of these translations was published as Fundamenta Krestomatio (1904). In 1905 the first international Esperanto Congress was held, and in 1908 the Universal Esperanto Association was created. In his political views Zamenhof was close to the Zionist movement. Monuments were erected to Zamenhof in Wasaw (1928) and Białystok (1934). (WR)

ZAMFIRESCU Duiliu (30 October 1858, Plăinești [Dumbrăveni], Moldavia–3 June 1922, Agapia), Romanian writer and diplomat. Zamfirescu attended high school in Focșani from 1869 to 1873 and in Bucharest from 1874 to 1876. After receiving a law degree from Bucharest University in 1880, he worked as a judge in Hirșova and then as a prosecutor in Tîrgoviște. In 1880 Zamfirescu made his debut as a poet in the periodical Literatorul. In 1881 he moved to Bucharest, where, under the pseudonym of “Don Padil,” he edited the daily România liberă. He published articles in the conservative periodical Convorbiri literare from 1883 to 1885, and in 1883 he joined the Junimea (Youth) Literary Society, which represented the idealistic trend and aestheticism in art. In 1888 Zamfirescu began his diplomatic and political career. He served as attaché and secretary at the Romanian Embassy in Rome (until 1892), Athens (1893), and Brussels (until 1906). He also represented Romania in the Danube Commission. During World War I Zamfirescu lived in Odessa and then in Iași, where in 1918 he edited the daily Îndreptarea and the periodical Îndreptarea literară. In 1918 he joined the conservative People’s Party (Partidul Poporului), led by General Alexandru Averescu. On the ticket of this party, Zamfirescu was an MP and speaker of the lower chamber of parliament from 1920 to 1922 and also briefly served as minister of foreign affairs in 1920.

At the same time Zamfirescu was active on the literary scene, the author of lyric poems, short stories, novels, and plays. In 1883 he published his first volume of poems, Fără titlu (Without a title). Altogether, he published several poetry volumes, written in a romantic and later in a neoclassical style: Alte orizonturi (Other horizons; 1894); Imnuri păgâne (1897; Pagan hymns; 1897); and Pe Marea Neagră (On the Black Sea; 1919). In 1888 Zamfirescu made his debut as the author of short stories, which were written in the spirit of realism. He published Novele (Short stories), Novele romane (Roman short stories; 1896), and Furfantă (1911), whose main characters were often people from the lower strata of society. In 1884 Zamfirescu published his first novel, În fața vieții (In the face of life). He gained the greatest acclaim for the five-part series Comăneșteni (The Comăneșteanu family), which consisted of Viața la țară (Life in the countryside; 1898), Tănase Scatiu (1900), În război (At war; 1902), Îndreptări (Improvements; 1908), and Anna sau ceace nu se poate (Anna, or what cannot be; 1910). From a conservative point of view, using the example of one family, Zamfirescu depicted social transformations in Romania, particularly the end of the era of boyar families and the upward social mobility of those who leased their land and were hated by the peasants. Zamfirescu also wrote several theater dramas: O amică (Girlfriend; 1912), Lumină nouă (New light; 1912), and Voichița (1914). He also translated works by Giosuè Carducci, Théophile Gautier, Victor Hugo, and Giacomo Leopardi. (LW)

ZAMOYSKI Maurycy Klemens (30 July 1871, Warsaw–5 May 1939, Warsaw), Polish aristocrat, politician, entrepreneur, and philanthropist. Zamoyski received a primary education at home and then finished high school in Leszno. He studied at the university in Stuttgart, where he moved in artistic circles, making friends with Wojciech Kossak, Józef Chełmoński, and other painters. After returning from Stuttgart, Zamoyski administered his entail, which he had inherited from his father, Tomasz. In 1898 he became engaged in social and charity work; among other things, he provided funds for the construction of the Zachęta Gallery of Fine Arts in Warsaw, the National Philharmonic, monuments to Frédéric Chopin and Adam Mickiewicz, the Polish Educational Society, and other social and national purposes. He also sponsored historical publishing houses, as well as poorhouses and hospitals for the poor. Linked with Henryk Sienkiewicz and others, Zamoyski was one of the founders of the Central Agricultural Society in 1903 and then served as its chairman. Despite his monarchist and conservative views, Zamoyski worked with Roman Dmowski, the National Democratic leader, from 1901 onwards. Zamoyski sponsored the newspaper Wiadomości Codzienne, which was published by the nationalists and targeted at Polish peasants. He also funded several other periodicals published by the National Democratic Party, which he joined in 1905. In November 1904 Zamoyski co-organized a great patriotic demonstration in Warsaw, and in 1905 he took part in mass religious processions and ceremonies marking the return to the Catholic Church of the Uniates of the Zamość region, whom the tsarist authorities had forced to join the Orthodox Church. In the elections of March 1906 Zamoyski was elected to the first State Duma on the ticket of the National Democratic Party. He continued the policy of loyalty to Russia, in return for which Poland gained concessions in education and the economy.

After the outbreak of World War I, Zamoyski (along with Dmowski and other leading politicians of the National Democratic Party) joined the Polish National Committee (Komitet Narodowy Polski [KNP]) in November 1914. Zamoyski represented the loyalist wing of the KNP. After emigrating to the West in January 1916, Zamoyski revised his attitude toward Russia: he became an advocate of full independence for Poland with an orientation toward the Entente states. Along with Dmowski, Sienkiewicz, Erazm Piltz, and Ignacy Paderewski, Zamoyski was the main spokesman of the Polish cause in the West. He provided substantial funds to support the political, diplomatic, and propaganda work of Polish centers, particularly the KNP in France, England, and Switzerland. He also sponsored military and charity activities. In March 1918 he helped to form the Polish Army in France under the command of General Józef Haller. Zamoyski attended the Paris Peace Conference. In May 1919 he was appointed the first envoy of the Second Republic of Poland to France. As a result of his persistent pressure on the French authorities and public opinion, France agreed to grant military assistance to Poland during the Polish-Soviet war. As collateral for French loans to Poland, Zamoyski pledged his Zamość entail.

Zamoyski lived off and on in France until 1924. He reluctantly agreed to run as a right-wing candidate in the Polish presidential elections. In successive election rounds in the National Assembly he obtained the majority of votes, but in the final round on 9 December 1922 he lost to Gabriel Narutowicz, a left-wing candidate. Two years later Zamoyski accepted an appointment as minister of foreign affairs in the government of Władysław Grabski (January–July 1924). Zamoyski always advocated a Polish-French alliance. He also strove for the establishment of a Polish-Lithuanian union and called for close cooperation with the Baltic states. After resigning, Zamoyski retired from active politics. He served as chairman of the Supreme Council of Landowner Organizations (1925–37) and dealt with the affairs of the Zamoyski family and the administration of his entail. Because of huge debts, which he had incurred to further the national cause, and owing to bad administration, his entail fell into financial trouble and was partly parceled out at the end of the 1930s. After Zamoyski's death, the entail was inherited by his eldest son, Jan. (MC)

ZANUSSI Krzysztof (17 June 1939, Warsaw), Polish film director. Zanussi studied in the Department of Physics of Warsaw University and in the Department of Philosophy of the Jagiellonian University in Kraków, and in 1966 he graduated from the State Theater and Film School of Łódź. He made his debut with a short film in 1958, but Struktura kryształu (The structure of crystals; 1969) was the first film that attracted greater attention to him. Subsequent films—particularly Za ścianą (Behind the wall; 1971); Życie rodzinne (Family life; 1972); Iluminacja (Illumination; 1973); Bilans kwartalny (The quarterly balance; 1975); the highly acclaimed Barwy ochronne (Camouflage; 1976); and Kontrakt (The contract; 1980)—established Zanussi's position as the creator of the “cinema of moral anxiety,” which developed in the 1970s in an atmosphere of opposition to Edward Gierek's rule. Pope John Paul II gave Zanussi his permission to film his biography, Z dalekiego kraju (From a far country; 1980). Zanussi received the Jury Prize for his film Constans (The constant factor) at the Cannes International Film Festival in 1980 and a Special Jury Award for Imperative at the Venice International Film Festival in 1982. During martial law in Poland Zanussi mainly worked abroad, making such films as Le pouvoir du Mal-Paradigme (1983), Rok spokojnego słońca (The year of the quiet sun; 1984), and Wherever You Are (1987). In 1990 he made Życie za życie (Life for life), about the martyr's death of St. Maksymilian Kolbe, and in 1995, Cwał (In full gallop), a semi-autobiographical film about the Stalinist years. Zanussi's films touch upon fundamental existential issues and human attitudes toward danger and death, and they provoke deep moral reflection. Zanussi has worked with major film studios and theaters in Great Britain, Italy, Germany, and Switzerland. From 1971 to 1983 he served as vice-chairman of the Union of Polish Filmmakers. In 1992 he became a professor at the University of Silesia, and in 1997, a member of the Papal Academy of Art and Literature. He has authored the memoirs Pora umierać (Time to die; 1997) and a collection of essays, Między jarmarkiem i salonem (Between a fair and a salon; 1999). (WR)

ZÁPOTOCKÝ Antonín (19 December 1884, Zákolany, near Kladno–13 November 1957, Prague), Communist president of Czechoslovakia. The son of a tailor, Zápotocký was a member of Socialist organizations from his youth, and from 1902 he belonged to the Social Democratic Party. Arrested in 1905 for his participation in an illegal demonstration, after his release he headed the party unit in Kladno. During World War I Zápotocký served in the Austrian Army in Italy, Serbia, and Romania. At the end of 1918 he returned to political activity. Arrested for his participation in organizing strikes, he spent two and a half years in prison, where he acquired revolutionary beliefs. In September 1921 Zápotocký was one of the founders of the Communist Party of Czechoslovakia (CPC) and was in charge of organizing the party in Prague. From 1922 he was secretary of the Central Committee (CC) of the CPC. In 1924 he was elected a deputy member of the Executive Committee of the Communist International. Between 1925 and 1938 Zápotocký sat in parliament. In February 1929 at the Fifth Congress of the party Zápotocký, along with other adherents of Stalin, again joined the Secretariat of the CC, and he became a member of the Politburo. Between 1929 and 1939 he headed the Communist Trade Unions.

After the capture of Prague by the Germans in March 1939, Zápotocký was put in a concentration camp, first in Sachsenhausen and then in Oranienburg. Released in April 1945 by the Soviet troops, he returned to Prague and assumed the leadership of the trade unions, which became important tools in the hands of the Communists in their struggle for power. Zápotocký played a very important role during the coup of February 1948, as he mobilized the “will of the working masses” against democracy. At a trade union congress on 22 February 1948 Zápotocký gave a speech calling for revolution. After the February coup Zápotocký became deputy prime minister, and between 15 June 1948 and 21 March 1953 he was prime minister. As the right hand of Klement Gottwald, he supervised a purge that affected all non-Communist political forces in the country. He was responsible for the Stalinist mass terror and for political show trials. He played an important role in the case of Rudolph Slánský, charging Slánský and his comrades with false evidence. After Gottwald's death, in March 1953 Zápotocký became president of Czechoslovakia, sharing power with the new secretary general of the party, Antonín Novotný, and with Prime Minister Viliam Široký. Zápotocký was a guest at the Twentieth Congress of the CPSU. However, he contributed to an effective inhibition of the "thaw" in Czechoslovakia in 1956. A selection of Zápotocký's publications, titled Antonín Zápotocký: Výbor z díla (Antonín Zápotocký: Selection of works, 3 vols.), appeared in 1984. (WR)

ZAREMBA Zygmunt (28 April 1895, Piotrków Trybunalski–5 October 1967, Sceaux, near Paris), Polish Socialist politician and journalist. In 1912 Zaremba joined the underground Polish Socialist Party (Polska Partia Socjalistyczna [PPS]). In 1915 he began law studies in Kharkiv. In 1917 he organized the Polish Socialist Union (Zjednoczenie Socjalistyczne Polskie) in the Ukraine, which included various movements of Polish Socialists. In 1918 Zaremba returned to Poland. In September 1918 he joined the PPS Central Workers' Committee and later the PPS Central Executive Committee (Centralny Komitet Wykonawczy), where he sat until 1945. An MP in 1922–35, Zaremba was a representative of the PPS left wing, but he opposed cooperation with the Communists. He organized workers' self-government and propaganda activities, edited party periodicals, and authored many articles and brochures. After the coup of May 1926, Zaremba advocated firm opposition to the government. During the Great Depression, he supported a program to implement the struggle for socialism, which he interpreted in a way similar to the Austro-Marxists. He advocated cooperation with the parties of the national minorities and called for a coalition against authoritarianism in Poland and against fascism abroad. Zaremba wanted to establish such a coalition with parties of the democratic intelligentsia and the peasant left. From 1933 to 1939 he created and ran the consortium Group of Periodicals of the PPS, which published a daily, two weeklies, and two monthlies, with a total circulation of over one hundred thousand. He was active in the struggle against anti-Semitism.

In September 1939 Zaremba fought in the defense of Warsaw. He subsequently co-organized the underground Polish Socialist Party–Freedom–Equality–Independence (PPS–Wolność–Równość–Niepodległość [PPS–WRN]) and was a member of the top leadership of the party. He was in charge of the party's publishing houses, and he edited the underground biweekly WRN (1940–44). Zaremba was in favor of creating parliamentary democracy after the war but called for the establishment of a multi-sector economy and the socialization of large industries. He expounded his views in Demokracja społeczna (Social democracy), which was published in the underground in 1944. Zaremba worked closely with General Stefan Grot-Rowecki, the commander of the Union of Armed Struggle of the Home Army. In 1944 he joined the Council of National Unity (Rada Jedności Narodowej). He took part in the Warsaw Uprising and was editor of the daily Robotnik. After the failure of the uprising, Zaremba was active in the underground leadership, which was linked with the Polish government in London. He was against cooperation with the Communists and was alert to the imperialistic plans of the USSR regarding Poland. Zaremba remained in the underground after the Red Army marched into Poland. In the fall of 1945 he worked for establishing the Social Democratic Party in Poland as an alternative to the "revived" PPS, which was under Communist control. As the plan failed and as he was unable to undertake legal publishing activities, he secretly left Poland in March 1946.

Zaremba settled in France, taking part in the activities of the PPS in exile. In 1948–57 and 1959–67 he was president of the Central Council (Rada Centralna) of the PPS. Between 1949 and 1956 he represented the PPS in the interparty bodies of Polish émigrés. In 1948 he organized the International Socialist Bureau, which rallied Socialists from countries beyond the Iron Curtain. In 1949 he became general secretary of the Socialist Union of Central and Eastern Europe, which he represented in the Socialist International from 1950 on. From 1946 to 1959 Zaremba edited the monthly Światło. In 1948–56 he worked with the Polish sections of the Voice of America and Radio Free Europe. After 1956 he hoped for transformations toward political pluralism in the Communist movement, for an increase in an independent workers' movements, and for a chance for the PPS to carry on direct activities in Poland. Zaremba tried to promote such changes in his political journalism and in his books, including Narodziny klasy rządzącej w ZSRR (The birth of the ruling class in the USSR; 1958) and Przemiany w światowym ruchu komunistycznym (Transformations in the world Communist movement; 1965). Zarembo also wrote diaries of his youth and memoirs of the occupation period. (AF)

ZARIŇŠ Kārlis Reinholds (4 December 1879, Ipiķu, Livonia–29 April 1963, London), Latvian diplomat and politician. After graduating from a rural school in 1899, Zariņš went to St. Petersburg, where he completed courses in bookkeeping and foreign languages. During World War I he was active in organizations for aid to Latvian refugees. From 1917 to 1918 he was a member of the Latvian Provisional National Council. He returned to Latvia in September 1918. In December 1918 Zariņš became a member of the Latvian National Council. In January 1919 he attended the Paris Peace Conference as an attaché of the Latvian delegation. From April to September 1919 he served as chargé d'affaires in Stockholm and subsequently headed a diplomatic mission in Poland. In October 1919 he became diplomatic representative to Helsinki (becoming a minister in 1921). In 1923 he was also appointed an envoy to Sweden, Norway, and Denmark, residing in Helsinki. From 1925 to 1930 Zariņš was an envoy to Sweden, Denmark, and Norway, residing in Stockholm. He subsequently served as envoy to Estonia until 1933. From March 1931 to March 1933 he also held the post of minister of foreign affairs. In mid-1933 Zariņš was appointed envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to Great Britain and consul general in London. On 17 May 1940 Zariņš received special authority to head the diplomatic service and represent the state in case the government was unable to exercise its authority. After Latvia was seized by the Red Army and then incorporated into the Soviet Union, the Communist authorities recalled Zariņš in August 1940, but he continued to work in London in accordance with the powers granted to him. He headed the entire diplomatic and consular service of the Latvian state in exile until the end of his life, vigorously promoting the cause of Latvia's independence in the West. Zariņš's publications include Par Latvijas tapšanu: Īsas atmiņas (On the emergence of Latvia: Short Memoirs; 1945). (EJ)

ŽARNOV Andrej [originally František Šubík] (19 November 1903, Kuklov–16 March 1982, Poughkeepsie, New York), Slovak poet, translator, and doctor. Žarnov graduated in medical studies from the University of Bratislava. In 1931–45 he was director of the university's Institute of Pathology; from 1940 he was a professor. From November 1938 he was a member of Hlinka's Slovak People's Party (Hlinková Slovenská Ľudová Strana [HSL'S]) and the Hlinka Guard (Hlinkova garda [HG]). After the proclamation of Slovak independence in March 1939, Žarnov managed the department of health services of the HG High Command, and from 1942, the Department of Health of the Ministry of Interior. He was also a member of the Council of State. In April 1943 Žarnov joined an international commission created by the Nazis to investigate the circumstances of the Katyn Forest massacre of Polish officers by the NKVD. After his return to Slovakia, Žarnov delivered a lecture, "Pravda o Katyńskom Lese" (Truth about the Katyn Forest), whose text was widely distributed. In March 1945 Žarnov fled to Bavaria but was delivered to the new Czechoslovak authorities and tried by the National Court in Bratislava. Among other things, he was accused of taking the part of Slovak authorities and "slandering" the USSR. In December 1947 Žarnov repented and was released. The release was also based on the testimonies of many doctors who owed him their lives during the wartime persecutions. In fear of another arrest, in 1952 Žarnov fled with his family to Austria and then went to the United States, where he worked as a pathologist. He belonged to the College of American Pathologists and the American Medical Association. He was also active in Slovak émigré organizations; for example, he presided over the Association of Slovak Writers and Artists.

Žarnov's first volume of poems, Stráž pri Morave (Guard on the Morava River; 1925), confiscated by the censors, was a manifesto of the young Slovak Catholic intelligentsia. His patriotic works gained popularity among autonomists, who criticized the centralist policies of the Czechoslovak authorities. Of highest renown are Žarnov's lyrics from the volumes Štít (The shield; 1940) and Mŕtvy (The dead; 1941). In exile Žarnov published Preosievač piesku (Sand sifter; 1978), which was a manifestation of his longing for his homeland and a protest against the Warsaw Pact intervention in Czechoslovakia. Žarnov was also known as a translator of classical Polish and English poetry. Among other translations Žarnov published the collection U pol'ských básnikov (At the Polish poets; 1937). (MG)

ZARUSKI Mariusz (31 January 1867, Dumanovo, Podolia–April 1941, Kherson, Soviet Union [now in Ukraine]), Polish general, sailor, mountaineer, and writer. Zaruski was a member of the Sokół (Falcon) Gymnastics Society and the National League (Liga Narodowa). In 1894, because of his patriotic activities, he was sentenced to exile in Arkhangelsk, where he finished a naval school. He subsequently made many arctic voyages, also as a merchant navy captain. Upon his return (1901) to Poland, Zaruski settled in Zakopane. In 1906 he graduated from the Academy of Fine Arts in Kraków. He was one of the pioneers of skiing and mountaineering in Poland. He made numerous first ascents of summits in the Tatras, and in 1909 he established the Tatra Mountains Voluntary Rescue Service, which he headed until 1926. In 1912 Zaruski joined the Riflemen's Association. In August 1914 he became commander of the Zakopane Company in the Uhlan Regiment of the Polish Legions, and from July to November 1917 he served as commander of the entire regiment. In November 1918 he joined the Polish Army. From February 1919 to July 1920 he commanded an Uhlan regiment. In the spring of 1919 he distinguished himself during the Polish campaign leading to the takeover of Wilno (Vilnius). Zaruski served as adjutant general to the head of state, Józef Piłsudski, until 1922 and as adjutant general to President Stanisław Wojciechowski from 1923 to 1926. In 1924 Zaruski was promoted to general. In April 1926 he retired and devoted himself to social work. He was a member of the Council of the Marine and River League, a member of the Maritime and Colonial League (from 1930 on), commodore of the Yacht Club of Poland, president of the National Fleet Committee (1926–32), and captain of the scouting yacht Zawisza Czarna (1934–39), on which several generations of Polish sailors were educated. Arrested by the NKVD in Lwów (Lviv) in October 1939, Zaruski died of cholera in prison. As a sailor and mountaineer, he became a legend for the interwar generation of Polish youth, whose imaginations he excited through his numerous publications on sailing, mountaineering, and equestrianism and through his memoirs, Na morzach dalekich (On the high seas; 1920), Na bezdrożach tatrzańskich (Off the beaten track in the Tatras; 1923), and Wśród wichrów fal (Among whirlwinds of waves; 1935). Zaruski also wrote poems, some of which were published as Sonety morskie; Sonety północne (Sea sonnets; northern sonnets; 1902). (WR)

ZARYTSKYI Oleksy (1913, Bicze, near Brzeżany [now Berezhany]–30 October 1963, Dolinka, near Karaganda, Kazakhstan), Greek Catholic missionary to Siberia, martyr for the faith. The son of a deacon, Zarytskyi entered a seminary in 1931. Ordained into the priesthood in 1936, he worked as a chaplain in the archdiocese of Lwów (Lviv). After the Soviet authorities abolished the Ukrainian Greek Catholic Church in 1946, Zarytskyi did not abandon his pastoral ministry. In 1948 he was arrested and sentenced to ten years' imprisonment. After his release from a forced labor camp, he was forced to settle in Kazakhstan, where he began a pastoral ministry in Karaganda. In 1957 he traveled to the Krasnoyarsk region to meet with Archbishop Josyf Slipyi, who was imprisoned there. Slipyi appointed Zarytskyi apostolic administrator of Kazakhstan and Siberia. Arrested again, Zarytskyi was sentenced to three years' imprisonment. After an early release, he was constantly threatened with arrest. Zarytskyi left Karaganda, and in the following years he made numerous missionary visits to various places, including Kuibyshev (now Samara, Russia), Perm Province, Orenburg, Aktyubinsk (now Aqtobe, Kazakhstan), Kokchetav (now Kokshetau, Kazakhstan), and Tselinograd (now Astana, Kazakhstan). After the KGB discovered his missionary work in 1960 in Orsk, near Orenburg, Zarytskyi traveled without a permanent address, also visiting Tajikistan. Arrested in mid-May 1962 in Karaganda, he was sentenced to two years in a forced labor camp. Zarytskyi died in a forced labor camp near Karaganda. On 27 June 2001 Pope John Paul II beatified him at a solemn Holy Mass in Lviv. (WR)

ZATONSKYI Volodymyr (8 August 1888, Lisets [Lysets], Podolia–29 July 1938, Kiev), Ukrainian Communist activist. In 1912 Zatonskyi graduated from Kiev University and then taught at the Kiev Polytechnic Institute. In early 1917 he joined the Bolshevik party, and in May 1917 he became a member of the presidium of the party's Kiev committee and a member of the Kiev soviet. After the Bolshevik revolution in Petrograd, Zatonskyi became head of a revolutionary committee in Kiev and prepared a takeover of power. From December 1917 to April 1918 he served as commissar of education in the first Bolshevik government of Ukraine; in January 1918, as a plenipotentiary of this government, he was sent to Moscow. After Austrian and German troops occupied central Ukraine, Zatonskyi also headed the Bolshevik Central Executive Committee of Ukraine from late March to mid-April. At a conference in Taganrog in April 1918, Zatonskyi was instrumental in establishing the Communist Party (Bolshevik) of Ukraine (CP[B]U) and became a member of its Central Committee (CC) and its Organizational Bureau. In November 1918 he became a commissar in the Provisional Workers' and Peasants' Government of Ukraine. He supported the idea of a Russian-Ukrainian federation. From July to September 1920, during the invasion of Poland by the Red Army, Zatonskyi also headed the Galician Revolutionary Committee (Galrevkom) in Tarnopol (Ternopil). He endorsed the Bolshevik terror in the occupied territories.

After the Bolsheviks consolidated their rule in Ukraine, Zatonskyi became a commissar of education in the Council of People's Commissars of the Ukrainian SSR in December 1920. From 1923 to 1924 he was a deputy member and in 1924 he became a member of the Politburo of the CP(B)U CC. From 1921 to 1922 he headed the All-Ukrainian Union of Consumer Cooperatives. From 1922 to 1923 he again served as head of the republic's commissariat of education. From 1924 to 1925 he also briefly served as political commissar of the Ukrainian Military District. In 1926 he became editor of the periodical Chervonyi shliakh and then became vice-chairman of the republic's Council of People's Commissars. As the director of the Institute of Soviet Construction (1927–33) and head of the governmental Engineering and Chemical Committee (1928–34), Zatonskyi took part in the preparation and implementation of the First Five-Year Plan, as a result of which, because of the government's policy, millions of Ukrainian people starved to death. In 1933 Zatonskyi again assumed the position of commissar of education, and in 1934 he became a deputy member of the CP(B)U CC in Moscow. Although he was an obedient executor of the current party line, Zatonskyi generally cautiously supported the Ukrainian character of the republic's authorities. In 1926 Zatonskyi published a book on the national issue in Ukraine. In 1929 his memoirs from the revolutionary period appeared. A selection of his speeches was published in 1935. During the Great Purge Zatonskyi was arrested (along with his wife) in November 1937. He was subsequently secretly tried and executed. (WR) ZAWADZKI Aleksander (16 December 1899, Dąbrowa Górnicza, Silesia–7 August 1964, Warsaw), Polish Communist activist. Born into a working-class family, Zawadzki was a miner and steelworker in his youth. In 1918 he volunteered to serve in the Polish Army. He fought against the Ukrainians in Lwów (Lviv) and elsewhere in Eastern Galicia and was decorated with the Cross of Valor for his service during the Polish-Soviet war in 1920. Demobilized in 1921, Zawadzki joined the Union of Communist Youth. In 1923 he became a professional activist in the apparatus of the Communist Workers' Party of Poland (Komunistyczna Partia Robotnicza Polski [KPRP]), which in 1925 changed its name to the Communist Party of Poland (Komunistyczna Partia Polski [KPP]). In 1924 Zawadzki underwent training in a special party school in Moscow and then conducted party work in the Dąbrowa Górnicza mining district and Belorussia. Arrested for the first time in 1925, he was released in 1932. He was later convicted twice on charges that included subversive activities in the army (he served as head of the Central Military Department of the Central Committee [CC] of the KPP). Released from the prison in Brześć (Brest) on the Bug River after the Red Army invaded Poland in September 1939, Zawadzki worked in Soviet trade unions and the administration in Western Belorussia. After Nazi Germany attacked the Soviet Union in June 1941, he was evacuated to the Stalingrad area and then to the Novosibirsk region, where he worked in labor battalions and in a mine.

Zawadzki resumed his party work after joining the Tadeusz Kościuszko Division in September 1943. He was quickly promoted, in part owing to the support of General Karol Świerczewski and Alfred Lampe. In December 1943 he was appointed deputy commander of the corps for political and educational affairs. Zawadzki's promotion was intended to prevent General Zygmunt Berling from pursuing independent policies in the army. From January to July 1944 Zawadzki served as chairman of the Central Office of Polish Communists in the Soviet Union, and in April 1944 he became a colonel and briefly served as a member of the Main Board of the Union of Polish Patriots (Związek Patriotów Polskich [ZPP]). For a short time he served as chief of the Polish Partisan Staff, which was incorporated into the Polish Army. Promoted to brigadier general in July 1944, Zawadzki became a member of the Politburo of the Polish Workers' Party (Polska Partia Robotnicza [PPR]) in August 1944. In January 1945 he was assigned to work in Upper Silesia. Appointed governor of Silesia and Dąbrowa Province in February 1945, Zawadzki implemented a program of social and economic transformation there. He opposed the interwar movement for an autonomous status for the Silesian province and called for a radical solution to the ethnic issue in Upper Silesia. As early as January 1945 he issued a ban on the use of German and ordered that all German traces be removed. His plan, according to which all Germans were to be expelled from Upper Silesia, were in accord with international plans, adopted during the conference of the Big Three in Potsdam.

Zawadzki realized that apart from the Silesians who declared either German or Polish nationality, Upper Silesia was inhabited by many people with indifferent national views, and he tried to implement a Polonization policy toward them. In February 1945 Zawadzki was promoted to major general. Following Jerzy Ziętek's advice, he tried to include the tradition of Silesian anti-German uprisings (1919–21) into the new reality, emphasizing that these were “people’s uprisings.” Zawadzki used prewar cadres to establish the administration and to rebuild industry in Upper Silesia and the Dąbrowa Górnicza mining district. In December 1948, at the congress that established the (Communist) Polish United Workers’ Party (Polska Zjednoczona Partia Robotnicza [PUWP]), Zawadzki called for confrontation with the Catholic Church. In December 1948 he became a member and secretary of the PUWP CC and Politburo and the PUWP CC Organizational Bureau. From January to June 1949 Zawadzki served as deputy prime minister, then president of the Central Council of Trade Unions (Centralna Rada Związków [CRZZ]), and from April 1950 to November 1952 he was again deputy prime minister. During factional strife in 1948–49, Zawadzki supported the group led by Bolesław Bierut against Władysław Gomułka. On 20 November 1952 he became president of the Council of State and held this position until the end of his life. Zawadzki was co-responsible for mass repressions, the policy of the collectivization of agriculture, and the crushing of the opposition during the Stalinist period. In 1956 he supported the dogmatic Natolin faction in the PUWP, but he nevertheless kept all his positions during the Seventh Plenum of the PUWP CC in October of that year. From August to November 1956 and from January 1958 until the end of his life Zawadzki served as president of the All-Polish Committee of the National Unity Front. He was a deputy to the National Home Council (Krajowa Rada Narodowa) and an MP in the Assembly. Before his death, Zawadzki returned to the Catholic Church with the help of a friar who, disguised as a doctor, visited him while he was in a government clinic. (AGr)

ZAWADZKI Tadeusz, pseudonyms “Tadeusz Zieliński” and “Zośka” (24 January 1921, Warsaw,–21 August 1943, Sieczychy, near Wyszaków), legendary commander of the military resistance during the German occupation of Poland. Zawadzki’s father was a chemist and the rector of Warsaw Polytechnic. Zawadzki graduated from Warsaw’s Stefan Batory Gymnasium in the spring of 1939. In the autumn of 1933 he joined the scouts, becoming a scoutmaster in January 1939. From the beginning of the German occupation in the fall of 1939, Zawadzki took part in small sabotage operations—for example, he painted the anchor sign of Fighting Poland on walls. In March 1941, along with his unit, Zawadzki joined the Gray Ranks, an underground successor of the prewar Polish Scouting Association, and he became head of the Mokotów scout troop. After completing an underground training course, Zawadzki was promoted to cadet corporal in January 1943. Because he had many duties in the underground resistance movement, he discontinued his studies at the underground Warsaw Polytechnic. He took part in many military resistance operations, and on 26 March 1943 he commanded the most famous one: near the Arsenal in Warsaw, Zawadzki and his men freed prisoners who were being transported from Pawiak Prison (among them were two friends of Zawadzki’s, the resistance fighters Jan Bytnar [Rudy] and Aleksander Dawidowski [Alek]). He also commanded a prisoner rescue operation near Celestynów (May 1943). Zawadzki was killed during an attack on a Grenzschutz watchtower near Wyszaków. Zawadzki was regarded as an exceptional leader and a person of high moral virtue. He was a model of heroism and devotion to the cause of Poland’s independence for generations of youth. A scout battalion of the Home Army (Armia Krajowa) was named “Zośka” after one of Zawadzki’s pseudonyms. (WR)

ZAWIEYSKI Jerzy [originally Henryk Nowicki] (2 October 1902, Radogoszcz–18 June 1969, Warsaw), Polish Catholic writer and social activist. From 1923 to 1926

Zawieyski studied at a drama school in Kraków, and then he performed at the Reduta Theater. He spent 1929–32 in France, working as a theater instructor among Polish emigrants. After his return to Poland, he performed at the Atheneum Theater, and he was active in the Institute of Folk Theaters. Zawieyski was closely tied with the peasant movement, especially with the Union of Rural Youth of the Republic of Poland–Wici (Związek Młodzieży Wiejskiej RP–Wici). Brought up as a Catholic and prepared to enter a religious order, Zawieyski had lost faith in his youth, but later he repeatedly returned to the faith and finally experienced a religious conversion in 1942. From then on his entire creative work and social activities were religiously motivated. Zawieyski advocated that Catholicism be open to people who doubted and remained outside the Church, as well as to atheists. He stigmatized the ties of Catholicism with nationalism. He was strongly influenced by French Catholic thought. During the war, Zawieyski established close ties with Reverend Stefan Wyszyński, the future primate of Poland. He corresponded with him during Wyszyński's imprisonment. For many years he was associated with the weekly Tygodnik Powszechny.

In 1945–49 and 1956–62 Zawieyski was vice-president of the Polish Writers' Association (Związek Literatów Polskich [ZLP]). At a Szczecin congress of the ZLP in 1949, he was one of the few to come out against Socialist realism, which was being promoted by the authorities. At that time Zawieyski stopped publishing and was destitute. In 1956 he was a co-founder and president of the All-Polish Club of Progressive Catholic Intellectuals, and from 1957 to 1969, he was president of the Club of Catholic Intellectuals (Klub Inteligencji Katolickiej [KIK]) in Warsaw. He was an MP (1957–69) and a member of the Catholic Parliamentary Group Znak (Koło Posłów Katolickich Znak). Between 1957 and 1968 Zawieyski was a member of the State Council, and in 1958–69, a member of the Presidium of the All-Polish Committee of the National Unity Front. After 1956 he held high posts in the Polish People's Republic, a fact that signified a partial normalization in relations between the state and the Church. Zawieyski repeatedly tried to mediate during conflicts between state and Church authorities and he appealed to both sides for moderation. He was in permanent contact with Primate Wyszyński and in frequent touch with Władysław Gomułka. Critical of the program of the Great Novena of the Millennium—especially of the form it took—he was reluctant to endorse great religious demonstrations. However, for the sake of the primate, he avoided public statements on this subject. An advocate of the renewal of the Church initiated by Pope John XXIII and the Second Vatican Council, Zawieyski sought a swift implementation of the council's resolutions in Poland. He was the first lay Catholic from a Communist country received by the Pope in private audience (1962). With the consent of Primate Wyszyński, Zawieyski mediated in the establishment of diplomatic relations between the Polish People's Republic and the Holy See in 1964, but in vain.

In March 1968 Zawieyski co-authored an interpellation of the Catholic Parliamentary Group Znak in defending youth who were beaten by the police during student demonstrations. Because of this, he was personally attacked in the Assembly and through Communist propaganda. On 10 April 1968 in the Assembly he delivered a speech in which he rejected the attacks and slander against Catholic MPs and supported the point of the interpellation. As a result, Zawieyski was dismissed as a member of the State Council, and in 1969 he was removed from the list of candidates to the Assembly. Zawieyski was president of the Society of Friends of the Catholic University of Lublin. Zawieyski wrote such novels as Droga do domu (The way home; 1946) and Konrad nie chce zejść ze sceny (Konrad does not want to leave the stage; 1966); the stories Romans z ojczyzną (Romance with the homeland; 1963); and the drama Dyktator Faust (Dictator Faust; 1934). Zawieyski was also the author of essays, including Droga katechumena (The way of a catechumen); the film script Prawdziwy koniec wielkiej wojny (The real end of the Great War; 1957); and diaries, of which only the fragments were published. ZDZIECHOWSKI Jerzy (27 August 1880, Rozdół [Rozdil], Podolia–25 April 1975, Kraków), Polish politician and economist. From 1916 Zdziechowski was one of the leading National Democratic activists. From 1917 to 1918 he belonged to the Council of the Polish Inter-Party Union, which represented pro-Russian rightist parties that called for independence for Poland. Zdziechowski was involved in organizing an unsuccessful coup d'état on 4–5 January 1919 aimed at overthrowing the government of Jędrzej Moraczewski, but he was not punished for it. From 1922 to 1927 Zdziechowski was an MP on the ticket of the National Popular Union (Związek Ludowo-Narodowy [ZLN]), the largest political party in Poland. From November 1925 to May 1926 he served as minister of the treasury in the cabinets of Aleksander Skrzyński and Wincenty Witos. Zdziechowski's policy led to the stabilization of the Polish złoty. In April 1926 he proposed an economic program that included tax increases (except for the property tax) and monopoly charges, as well as layoffs in the railroad sector. The Polish Socialist Party (Polska Partia Socjalistyczna [PPS]), which opposed this program, withdrew its ministers from Skrzyński's cabinet and brought about its collapse. Zdziechowski subsequently served as an activist and deputy chairman of the Lewiatan, the short name for the Union of Polish Industry, Trade, and Finance. He was one of the MPs who were in opposition to the sanacja regime. After Zdziechowski had demanded budget cuts in the Ministry of Interior, he was beaten in his apartment by unknown assailants on 1 October 1926. From 1926 to 1933 he was a member of the leadership of the Camp of Great Poland (Obóz Wielkiej Polski [OWP]) and worked closely with Roman Dmowski. Zdziechowski authored numerous works in the field of financial policy, and in 1937 he published the study Mit złotej waluty (The myth of gold currency).

From September 1939 Zdziechowski lived in exile in France and then in London. He was aligned with the Polish underground movement linked to the National Party (Stronnictwo Narodowe). In January 1946 he became head of the Paris-based Polish Committee of Wartime Émigrés. From December 1949 to 1954 he was chairman of the Executive Department of the Political Council, which he joined as a nonparty politician. He was a member of the Polish delegation in the Eastern Europe Section of the European Movement. Along with Mieczysław Thugutt, he represented the Political Council in negotiations led by General Kazimierz Sosnkowski on the unification of major émigré political centers. The main negotiations were held in July 1953 but were unsuccessful. In 1954 Zdziechowski became a member of the Provisional National Unity Council, which did not accept August Zaleski as president of the Republic of Poland in exile. After the October 1956 watershed in Poland, Zdziechowski called for some form of agreement with the Soviet Union in exchange for broader political freedoms in Poland and permanent endorsement of the Oder-Neisse border. He publicly addressed this issue in numerous press articles. He also spoke about it at a meeting of the Provisional National Unity Council in London in November 1956. As a result, he was attacked by many émigré politicians. From 1959 on Zdziechowski lived in Paris, where he co-edited Horyzonty. He returned to Poland in 1966. Zdziechowski's publications include Skarb i pieniądze (Treasury and money; 1955). (PK)

ZDZIECHOWSKI Marian (30 April 1861, Novosyelki [Navasjolki], Minsk region–5 October 1938, Wilno [Vilnius]), Polish literary historian, philosopher, and journalist. Zdziechowski was descended from a landed gentry family. In 1883 he received a degree in comparative linguistics from the university in Dorpat (Tartu), where he was influenced by Russian thinkers, including Nikolay Berdyayev and Leo Tolstoy. He subsequently studied in Graz, Zagreb, and Geneva. In 1894 he received the postdoctoral degree from the Jagiellonian University in Kraków. In 1899 he became a professor of world literature there. In 1902 he became a member of the Polish Academy of Arts and Sciences. On his initiative, the Slavic Club in Kraków was established and the periodical Świat Słowiańszczyzny (1905–14) was founded. Zdziechowski propagated knowledge about other Slavic countries in Poland. After Poland regained its independence, he moved to Wilno, where he held the chair of general literature at Stefan Batory University from 1919 to 1931. He served as rector (1925–27) and honorary professor (from 1938 onwards) of this university. After the coup of May 1926, Józef Piłsudski proposed Zdziechowski as a candidate for president of the Republic of Poland, but Zdziechowski refused to run for that office. Zdziechowski's research mainly involved comparative studies of the cultures of the Slavic nations, as well as studies on sociopolitical systems and social philosophy. He believed that his contemporary civilization was in a crisis stemming from extreme rationalism, an uncritical cult of science and progress, and atheistic humanism. He called for moral revival based on Christian values. A liberal conservative in his political views, Zdziechowski opposed socialism and communism, as well as nationalism and fascism, in which he saw signs of the disintegration of European culture. Zdziechowski left a vast literary legacy, including the following: Mesjanisci i słowianofile (Messianists and Slavophiles; 1888); Europa Zachodnia (Western Europe; 1894); Czechy, Rosja i Polska (Bohemia, Russia, and Poland; 1897); Pestis perniciosissima: Rzecz o współczesnych kierunkach myśli katolickiej (Pestis perniciosissima: Modern trends in Catholic thought; 1905); and Pesymizm, romantyzm a podstawy chrześcijaństwa (Pessimism, romanticism, and the foundations of Christianity, 2 vols.; 1914). Some of Zdziechowski's observations—for example, those included in the collection of sketches W obliczu końca (Facing the end; 1937) or Widmo przyszłości (The specter of the future; 1938)—proved to be accurate prophecies. ŻELEŃSKI Tadeusz, pseudonym “Boy” (21 December 1874, Warsaw–3 or 4 July 1941, Lwów [Lviv]), Polish literary critic, writer, and translator. Żeleński was the son of the composer Władysław Żeleński and cousin of the poet Kazimierz Przerwa-Tetmajer. After graduating from a gymnasium in Kraków, he studied medicine at the Jagiellonian University (1892–1900). From 1901 to 1906 he practiced as a doctor. Żeleński was aligned with Kraków’s bohemian circles, and from 1906 onwards he co-authored programs for the Zielony Balonik (Little Green Balloon) cabaret. Mobilized into the Austrian Army in 1915, Żeleński served as a railway doctor until the end of World War I. The author of numerous translations of French literature, he was awarded the Palms of the French Academy in 1914 and the Knight’s Cross of the Legion of Honor in 1922. In 1922 Żeleński settled in Warsaw, where, among other things, he contributed to Wiadomości Literackie, Kurier Poranny, and Ilustrowany Kurier Codzienny. From 1923 to 1924 he was literary director of the Polish Theater. In 1933 he became a member of the Polish Academy of Literature. In 1939 he moved to Lwów, where he was given the chair of the history of French literature at the university. He also contributed to Communist periodicals. After Nazi troops occupied Lwów, he was arrested and executed by a firing squad.

An opponent of traditional moral standards and attitudes and an advocate of the secularization of culture, Żeleński ridiculed clericalism, prudery, and bourgeois conservatism, as well as the decadent posturing of bohemian artists. He wrote popular satirical cabaret pieces that were collected between 1908 and 1917 into eleven publications, of which Słówka (Little words; 1913) became the most famous. Żeleński’s publications include Studia i szkice z literatury francuskiej (Studies and sketches in French literature; 1920); Mózg i płeć (Brain and gender; 3 vols.; 1926–28); Molier (Molière; 1924); and Balzac (Balzac; 1934). A highly regarded theater critic, Żeleński wrote columns published in the collection Flirt z Melpomeną (A flirtation with Melpomene; vols. 1–10, 1920–32; vols. 11–17, 1933–39). Żeleński engaged in campaigns concerning birth control and sex education by writing such works as Dziewice konsystorskie (Consistorial virgins; 1929); Piekiło kobiet (Women’s hell; 1930); and Nasi okupanci (Our occupiers; 1932). He called for the demythologizing of the lives of the luminaries of Polish literature, publishing such pieces as “Ludzie żywi” (Living people; 1929) and “Brazowniczy” (Gilders; 1930). Żeleński authored the memoirs Plotki . . . plotki . . . (Rumors . . . rumors . . . ; 1927) and Znaszli ten kraj? (Do you know this country? 1931). Żeleński’s posthumous publications include Pisma (Writings, 28 vols.; 1956–75); Listy (Letters; 1972); Reflektorem w mrok (Floodlight into the darkness; 1978); and O literaturze niemoralnej (Immoral literature; 1990). ŻELIGOWSKI Lucjan (7 October 1865, Oszmiana–9 July 1947, London), Polish general. The son of a participant in the January 1863 Insurrection, in 1885 Żeligowski joined the Russian Army. In 1888 he graduated from an officer training school in Riga. He took part in the Russo-Japanese War of 1904–5. During World War I he initially fought in the ranks of the Polish Rifle Brigade along with the Russian Army, and in 1917 he took command of a brigade in the First Polish Corps in Russia. In August 1918 Żeligowski began organizing Polish soldiers in Kuban. As head of the Fourth Rifle Division, he managed to get from Kuban to Poland via Odessa and Bessarabia in May 1919. In 1920 he commanded the Operational Group in the region of Minsk. At the beginning of October 1920, in agreement with representatives of the Polish government, Żeligowski simulated a rebellion of the Lithuanian-Belorussian Division, which was subordinate to him. Although on 7 October 1920 the Polish command signed the Suwałki Agreement about the demarcation line, which left Wilno (Vilnius) on the Lithuanian side, two days later Żeligowski’s units entered Vilnius and proclaimed the creation of Central Lithuania. Żeligowski named himself commander-in-chief of the military forces of Central Lithuania. The Polish authorities formally dissociated themselves from this action, but in fact the Polish head of state, Józef Piłsudski, was well aware of it. Moreover, Poland provided military protection for the captured territories. At the end of 1921 Żeligowski handed over power to the Provisional Civil Administration, which in January 1922 held elections for the Vilnius Assembly. The Assembly in turn voted for the incorporation of Central Lithuania into Poland. Despite the fact that the majority of the population of the disputed territory felt Polish, because of the Vilnius action the Lithuanians began to perceive Żeligowski as a symbol of Polish disloyalty.

From 1921 to 1925 Żeligowski was an army inspector. In July 1923 he was promoted to lieutenant general, and between November 1925 and May 1926 he served as minister for military affairs in the cabinet of Aleksander Skrzyński. He appointed adherents of Piłsudski to higher military posts, which made it easier for him to prepare a coup d'état. After the collapse of Skrzyński's government, Żeligowski again assumed the post of army inspector, and after the coup of May 1926, he became head of the Liquidation Committee, whose task was to calm the situation in the army. In August 1927 Żeligowski retired. In 1928 he became president of a chapter of the Order of Polonia Restituta, and in 1929, a member of the Tribunal of State. Żeligowski returned to political life in 1935, becoming an MP representing the Nonparty Bloc of Cooperation with the Government in the Assembly. Until December 1937 he headed the Assembly's Military Committee, but he resigned as a result of a disagreement with the group of Marshal Edward Rydz-Śmigły. In September 1939 he managed to get to the West, where he was a member of the National Council of the Republic of Poland (Rada Narodowa RP) in London; the group was active under the auspices of the Polish government-in-exile. After the war, Żeligowski settled in London. After he died, his body was transported and buried in Poland. General Stanisław Tatar transported 350 kilograms of gold from the National Defense Fund in the plane that flew Żeligowski's body to Poland. Żeligowski authored the memoirs Wojna w roku 1920: Wspomnienia i rozważania (The war in 1920: Memoirs and reflections; 1930). (PU)

ŽEMAITIS Jonas, pseudonym “Vytautas” (1909 Palanga, Russian Empire [now in Lithuania]–26 November 1954, Moscow), leader of the Lithuanian anti-Communist partisan movement. During the interwar period Žemaitis studied at the military academy at Saint-Cyr, near Paris and was promoted to captain of the general staff. After the Soviet Union occupied Lithuania in 1940, he was inducted into the Red Army, but he managed to leave it when Germany invaded Lithuania in June 1941. During the Nazi occupation (1941–44) Žemaitis was active in the underground National Guard (Šaulių Sąjunga). After the Red Army again seized Lithuania in the summer of 1944, Žemaitis continued his underground struggle, trying to centralize various partisan forces. In 1948 he became commander of a partisan force in the Kėstutis region in Western Lithuania, which comprised the territory from Kaunas to Klaipėda. In 1949 he became head of the Movement of Lithuania's Struggle for Freedom (Lietuvos Laisvės Kovu Sąjūdis) and commander-in-chief of its military forces. Despite difficulties linked to the collectivization of agriculture and mass deportations of peasants, who until then had supported the partisans, from late 1951 on Žemaitis directed most partisan activities in the territory of the republic, maintaining contacts with the outside world. Because of illness, in December 1951 he had to withdraw from active struggle. He spent a year and a half in hiding in the Šimkaičiai forests. On 23 May 1953, along with his wife, Žemaitis was captured by the Soviet security services and taken to Moscow, where he was interrogated by Lavrenty Beria. After he refused to cooperate, he was sentenced to death and executed. (WR)

ZEMAN Miloš (28 September 1944, Kolín), Czech economist and politician. In 1969 Zeman graduated from the Prague School of Economics. During the Prague Spring he became a member of the Communist Party of Czechoslovakia (CPC). He also declared his intention of joining the Social Democratic Party, which was undergoing renewal in July 1968, but after the invasion by Warsaw Pact troops, the party was not registered. In 1970 Zeman was expelled from the CPC after he had criticized the so-called normalization. From 1971 to 1984 he worked for Sportpropag, a sports organization, from which he was dismissed for critical remarks on the state of Czechoslovak society. He worked at the Institute of Management Improvement, but in 1989 he was dismissed again. From 1990 to 1993 Zeman was a researcher at the Forecasting Institute of the Czechoslovak Academy of Sciences. In the 1970s and 1980s he contributed to underground publications. During the Velvet Revolution he helped to establish the Civic Forum (Občanské Fórum [OF]), and in the spring of 1990 he was one of the main authors of its economic program. Coopted into the reconstructed parliament in January 1990, Zeman sat in the Chamber of Nations of the Federal Assembly. Reelected to parliament in the first free elections in June 1990, he served as chairman of the parliamentary committee for planning and budget until June 1992. After the breakup of the OF, Zeman became a member of the Civic Movement. In April 1992 he joined the Czechoslovak Social Democratic Party, which was soon renamed the Czech Social Democratic Party (Česká Strana Sociálně Demokratická [ČSSD]), and he became chairman of the ČSSD Prague branch. A deputy to the People's Chamber of the Federal Assembly (June–December 1992), Zeman called for maintaining a federation with Slovakia. Elected chairman of the ČSSD in February 1993, he was reelected at the party congresses in 1995, 1997, and 1999. In April 2001 Zeman resigned his position in favor of Vladimír Špidla.

Zeman was in opposition to the liberal government of the Civic Democratic Party (Občanská Demokratická Strana [ODS]) led by Václav Klaus. Zeman particularly sharply criticized the “coupon privatization” and promoted a “social market economy” based on small and medium-size enterprises. This brought him electoral success in 1996, when the Social Democrats won over 30 percent of the seats, and the ruling coalition lost its majority in parliament. As a result of a political compromise with the ODS, Zeman became speaker of the lower chamber of the Czech parliament, in exchange for which the Social Democrats agreed that the ruling coalition would stay in power. After the collapse of Klaus' government, Zeman succeeded in persuading his party to support Josef Tošovský's cabinet of civil servants in January 1998. Zeman served as speaker of the Chamber of Deputies until the early elections in June 1998, when the Social Democrats defeated the ODS, and, as a result of another “opposition agreement” with their main rival, on 17 July 1998 they formed a minority government headed by Zeman. In exchange for the ODS tolerating a Social Democratic government, members of the party were appointed as speakers of both chambers of parliament, and the ODS retained substantial influence on major decisions. During Zeman's four-year term in office, the country overcame the economic crisis: inflation was curbed and unemployment was kept at a low level. Zeman accelerated negotiations with the European Union, revitalized cooperation with the Visegrád Group, and led the Czech Republic into NATO, despite his party's previously skeptical attitude toward Czech membership. However, Zeman did not succeed in resolving the problems in Czech-German relations (stemming from the deportation of the Sudeten Germans after World War II) or a conflict with Austria over the construction of the Temelín nuclear power plant. While serving as head of the government, Zeman became known for his controversial statements. Thanks to the genuine successes of his government, the Social Democrats—now led by Špidla—won the next elections in June 2002. Zeman, who had resigned as party leader the year before, refused to accept any position in the new government and held to his decision to retire from politics. In the autumn of 2002 Zeman entered the race for president of the Czech Republic. Despite his definite victory in the party primaries, Zeman did not take part in the first, unsuccessful, attempt to elect the head of state. His game led to conflicts within the ČSSD, as a result of which, during the second presidential elections, instead of achieving brilliant success and returning to the limelight as a savior, Zeman suffered a defeat in the first round. ZEMGALS Gustavs (12 August 1871, Džūkstes, Courland–6 January 1939, Riga), president of Latvia. Born into a family of craftsmen, Zemgals finished high school in Riga and then graduated from the School of Law of Moscow University. He subsequently worked as an attorney. While still a student, Zemgals entered politics, joining a Socialist movement called Jaunā Strāva. Inducted into the army as a reserve officer during the Russo-Japanese War of 1904–5, Zemgals fought in battles in the Far East. During the 1905–7 revolution he helped to found the Latvian Democratic Party and edited its newspaper. As mayor of Riga, Zemgals joined the Radical Democratic Party of Latvia. During the German occupation he was active in the Latvian Democratic Bloc. On 17 November 1918 he was elected second deputy chairman of the Latvian Provisional National Council (LPNC). On the following day, in the absence of the chairman, Zemgals chaired a session at which he read the proclamation of Latvia's independence. In December 1918 he was also elected chairman of the Riga Municipal Duma. During the German coup in Liepāja (Libau), Zemgals was in charge of the LPNC's work. In July 1919 he was again elected mayor of Riga and deputy chairman of the LPNC. From 1921 to 1923 he served as minister of war. In 1922 he was elected to parliament on the ticket of the Democratic Center Party. After the death of Janis Čakste, Zemgals became the new president of Latvia on 8 April 1927. At the end of his term (8 April 1930), he refused to run for a second term. He subsequently worked as an attorney in Riga until the end of his life. In 1931 Zemgals was reelected to parliament. In 1933 he became president of the Baltic Union. After his death, Zemgals was buried in Riga. (EJ)

ZENKL Petr (13 June 1884, Tábor–3 November 1975, Raleigh, North Carolina), Czech politician and social activist. After graduating from the Department of Philosophy of the Czech University in Prague, Zenkl taught Czech in high schools in Prague from 1906 to 1918. He also authored Czech textbooks. He was active in the National Socialist Party (from 1913) and in the local government (from 1911). From 1919 to 1922 he served as head of the Karlín district of Prague. From 1918 to 1926 he worked in the Ministry of Social Welfare. He subsequently served as head of the Central Social Welfare Fund until 1939. In 1923 Zenkl became a member of the Prague City Council. From 1937 to 1939 he served as mayor of Prague. He played a major role in the drafting and implementation of many welfare and community projects and was active in many social welfare institutions. In 1932 he initiated a program of public works for the unemployed. As mayor of Prague, Zenkl was instrumental in reforming the entire social welfare system of the city. He briefly served as minister without portfolio (October–November 1938), and then he became minister of social welfare, health, and physical education in Jan Syrový's cabinet of civil servants.

Throughout World War II Zenkl was imprisoned in the Nazi concentration camps of Dachau and Buchenwald. From 1945 to 1948 he served as chairman of the Czechoslovak National Socialist Party, which joined the National Front of Czechs and Slovaks. At that time Zenkl was also a member of the National Assembly, and from 1945 to 1946 he again served as mayor of Prague and head of the Central Social Welfare Fund. Zenkl subsequently became one of the deputies to Prime Minister Klement Gottwald, and in this capacity he became one of the main representatives of the newly formed anti-Communist front. On 20 February 1948, during the Communist coup, Zenkl (along with eleven other ministers) announced to President Edvard Beneš that he was resigning from his position in protest against the activities of the Communists, who sought to take over full control of the state, and against the undemocratic methods they employed. In August 1948 Zenkl emigrated to West Germany, from where he made his way, via London, to the United States. In the United States he served as the leader of the National Socialists in exile until the end of his life. In 1949 he also became chairman of the Council of Free Czechoslovakia. Zenkl published a number of books, including Masarykova Československá republika (Masaryk's Czechoslovak Republic; 1955); Masaryk and the Idea of European and World Federation (1955); The Communist Seizure of Power and the Press 1945–48 (1962); and A History of the Czechoslovak Republic, 1918–1948 (1973). ŽEROMSKI Stefan, pseudonyms “Maurycy Zych” and “Józef Katerla” (14 October 1864, Strawczyn, near Kielce–20 November 1925, Warsaw), Polish writer and journalist. Żeromski came from an impoverished noble family of patriotic traditions. After completing his education at a Kielce high school (1874–86), he began to study at the Veterinary College in Warsaw, but in 1888 he gave up his studies for lack of money. At that time he took part in the activities of secret organizations—for example, the Union of Polish Youth (Związek Młodzieży Polskiej). From 1888 to 1891 Żeromski worked as a resident tutor in noble houses in the Kielce region, Mazovia, Podlasie, and Nałęczów. In 1892 he left for Switzerland, where he worked as an assistant librarian in the Polish National Museum in Rapperswil. During his four-year stay in Switzerland Żeromski acquainted himself with archival materials on the history of Polish nineteenth-century emigration and established contacts with Socialist politicians. From 1897 to 1903 he worked at the Zamoyski Library in Warsaw. He was linked with the Polish Socialist Party (Polska Partia Socialistyczna [PPS]) and with the periodical Głos. As his financial situation improved significantly after 1904, he was able to devote himself exclusively to literary work.

In 1905 Żeromski settled in Nałęczów, where he initiated the establishment of the People's University. Forced to leave the Russian sector of partitioned Poland, in 1908 he moved to Galicia; in 1909 left for Paris, and in 1913 he settled in Zakopane. Żeromski was linked with the independence movement. After the outbreak of World War I, he enlisted in the Polish Legions, but shortly thereafter, because of his negative assessment regarding the policy of the Central Powers, he moved away from the camp of Józef Piłsudski. In the fall of 1918, as president of the so-called Republic of Zakopane, Żeromski participated in the formation of the Polish state authority in Podhale. In 1919 he moved to Warsaw. He was an initiator of the project to establish an academy of literature, a co-founder and president of the Polish Writers' Union in 1920, and founder of the Guardians of Polish Writing and the Polish PEN club in 1924. In 1920 he co-organized the Society of Friends of Pomerania. Żeromski took part in a plebiscite action in Warmia (Ermland) and Mazuria. He was also a war correspondent during the Polish-Soviet war. He immortalized this war—for example, in his famous short story, “Na parafii w Wyszowie” (At the presbytery in Wyszów). In recognition of his merits, in 1924 he received a flat at the Royal Castle in Warsaw.

Żeromski began his literary career writing stories and novels, the first collection of which appeared in 1895. In his writing he raised issues of social injustice, cultural backwardness, and the struggle for justice and progress. Independence issues were also very important in his works. Apart from allusions to social, patriotic, and moral issues, Żeromski wrote impressionistic descriptions of nature and wove in lyrical romantic threads. He combined epic narration with elements of political journalism and erudite reflection. He voiced opinions on all vital social issues and often raised morally sensitive issues. His writing style was full of expression and naturalism. In 1924 Żeromski was a candidate for the Nobel Prize in literature. However, he did not receive it, it is believed, because of the negative reception of his novel Wiatr od morza (Wind from the sea; 1922) in Germany. In 1925 Żeromski was the first winner of the national literary award in Poland. Żeromski's most important works include Szybyłowe prace (Sisyphus labors; 1897); Ludzie bezdomni (Homeless people, 2 vols.; 1900); Popioły (4 vols., 1904; Ashes, 1928); Wierna rzeka (1912; Faithful River, 1943); the scandalous Dzieje grzechu (The story of sin, 2 vols.; 1908); and Przedwiośnie (Springtime; 1925). In Przedwiośnie, Żeromski included many critical remarks on the Polish reality in the first years of independence. (JS)

ZEROV Mykola (26 April 1890, Zinkiv, Poltava Province—9 October 1937, Solovets Islands), Ukrainian poet and literary historian. Zerov studied philology at the university in Kiev. From 1917 to 1920 he edited the literary periodical Knyhar. From 1918 to 1935 he taught the history of Ukrainian literature at Kiev's Institute of Architecture, at a cooperative technical high school, and at Kiev's Institute of People's Education. From 1930 to 1933 he also taught translation theory at the Ukrainian Institute of Language Education. Arrested by the NKVD in April 1935 and falsely accused of spying and directing a “nationalist and terrorist” group, Zerov was sentenced to ten years in Soviet forced labor camps on the Solovets Islands in January 1936. On 9 October 1937, while he was in a camp, the sentence was changed to the death penalty, and Zerov was immediately executed by a firing squad. In his work, as both a poet and a translator, Zerov was influenced by the ideas of neoclassicism and the Parnasian school. The sonnet was his favorite poetic form. Zerov translated many works by classical Roman poets, works by contemporary French authors, and some works by Adam Mickiewicz and Juliusz Słowacki. Zerov's publications include the translation collections Antolohiia rymsskoy poezii (Anthology of Roman poetry; 1920) and Kamena (1924), as well as the critical works Nove ukraiinske pysmenstvo (New Ukrainian literature; 1924); Do dzherel (To the sources; 1926); and Vid Kulisha do Vynnychenka (From Kulish to Vynnychenko; 1928). Zerov's poetry collections Sonnetarium (1948), Catalepton (1952), and Corollarium (1958) were published posthumously. Zerov was formally rehabilitated in 1958. His selected works were published in 1966. The most complete selection of his works appeared in two volumes in 1990. (WR)

ZHECHEV Toncho (6 July 1929, Divyadovo, near Shumen—22 February 2000, Sofia), Bulgarian writer. Zhechev graduated from high school in Shumen and from the Law School of Sofia University, and then he received a Ph.D. in Moscow. He worked for the periodical Septemwri, from which he was fired for “deviation from the party line” in 1967. Zhechev got a job in the Institute of Bulgarian Literature of the Bulgarian Academy of Sciences (IBL BAS), and from 1974 to 1983 he was its director. Among other things, he dealt with historical changes in the Bulgarian national consciousness and the history of the Bulgarian Orthodox Church. In 1975 Zhechev published Byłgarskijat Welikden ili Strastite Byłgarski (Bulgarian Resurrection Day or Bulgarian passions), in which he showed the efficacy of nonviolent tactics in the struggle of the Bulgarian Orthodox Church for independence from the Constantinople patriarchate. As director of the IBL BAS, Zhechev defended scholars attacked by the authorities. He published about seven hundred scholarly works and was recognized in Cambridge's “Men of Achievement.” After 1989 Zhechev again edited Septemwri, changing its title to Letopisy. A keen supporter of Bulgaria's integration with Western security structures, Zhechev also worked to invite Pope John Paul II to Bulgaria, a visit that materialized after his death in May 2002. (WDj)

ZHEKOV Nikola (25 December 1864, Sliven–6 October 1949, Füssen, Germany), Bulgarian general. Zhekov came from a poor family and worked as a shoemaker's apprentice. Later he graduated from high school and from the Military Academy in Sofia. In 1885 he fought in the war against Serbia. Then he studied in Italy, and after returning to Bulgaria, he was commander of a regiment and a division. During the Balkan Wars (1912–13) Zhekov was chief of staff of the Second Army. From August to October 1915 he was minister of war in the government of Vasil Radoslavov. He led the preparations for Bulgaria's entry into war on the side of the Central Powers. When it happened, on 11 October 1915, Zhekov became commander-in-chief of the Bulgarian Army. At the end of 1915 the Bulgarian troops broke through the Serbian defenses and entered Macedonia. Zhekov's demands that the Allied bases in eastern Greece be taken before they became the stepping stones for an Allied counteroffensive were ignored by the German command. In August and September 1916 the Bulgarian Army took the Aegean coast near Kavalla, but the Germans moved some of the Bulgarian troops to the Romanian front. In view of Bulgaria's exhausted economic resources, in the fall of 1917 some of the opposition politicians wanted to attract Zhekov to the idea of a separate peace with the Entente, but he gave them away to the authorities. After the fall of the Radoslavov government in June 1918, Zhekov left for Germany. Meanwhile the Bulgarian army was scattered, and the new government had to accept harsh conditions under the armistice, hardly escaping a bloody revolution. In 1923 Zhekov returned to Bulgaria and tried to defend his wartime position. He was sentenced to a long imprisonment but released after three years owing to an amnesty. In the 1930s Zhekov led a group of extreme pro-German politicians and officers. He hoped to take over power with the help of the Third Reich. In the summer of 1940 he was invited by the Germans to France to visit the battlefields of the Wehrmacht victories. Zhekov received a German pension, but Hitler was reluctant to use him as a tool against Tsar Boris III. After World War II Zhekov stayed in Germany and died there. (WR)

ZHELEV Zhelyu (3 January 1935, Veselinovo, near Shumen), philosopher, sociologist, politician, and president of Bulgaria. In 1958 Zhelev graduated in philosophy from Sofia University and subsequently worked on a doctoral dissertation on the philosophical definitions of matter in the modern natural sciences. Since he dared to criticize Lenin's theory of matter, Zhelev was not allowed to defend his dissertation, lost his job at the university, and in 1965 was expelled from the Bulgarian Communist Party, which he had joined in 1961. Unable to get a job for political reasons, Zhelev moved to the countryside, where he devoted himself to scholarly work and to writing books. It was then that he wrote his most famous book, Fashizmut (Fascism), which was a critical analysis of totalitarian systems, with obvious allusions to Stalinism. Banned from publication by the Communist regime, the book was circulated in manuscript form among Bulgarian intellectuals for many years. In 1982 it finally appeared in print, but the authorities did not allow it to be sold, and after a few days it was withdrawn from the bookstores. In 1974 Zhelev earned a Ph.D. in philosophy for a dissertation on the modal categories of dialectics. From 1975 he was a researcher at the Cultural Research Institute in Sofia, where he headed the Culture and Personality Department between 1977 and 1982. In 1988 he received the postdoctoral degree for a dissertation on the theory of personality.

Zhelev was one of the founders and organizers of the opposition movement in Bulgaria. On 3 November 1988 he co-founded the Club for Support of Glasnost and Perestroika. After the fall of the totalitarian regime of Todor Zhivkov on 10 November 1989, Zhelev co-founded and then became the leader (that is, president of the National Executive Council) of the Union of Democratic Forces (Sayuz na Demokratichnite Sili [UDF]). The UDF, established on 7 December 1989, was a coalition initially formed of nine, and later a dozen or so, Bulgarian opposition parties and organizations. Zhelev headed a delegation of the anti-Communist opposition in the Round Table talks (16 January–15 May 1990), during which the conditions of Bulgaria's transition to a democratic system were agreed upon, including the date of the first free parliamentary elections, which were to be held on 10 and 17 June 1990. In these elections Zhelev was elected to the Grand National Assembly. After the UDF's failure in the elections to the Grand National Assembly, which brought success to the Bulgarian Socialist Party (formerly the Bulgarian Communist Party), the slogan "Your prime minister, our president" appeared among the Bulgarian opposition. On 1 August 1990 the parliament elected Zhelev as the first non-Communist president of Bulgaria. Reelected in January 1992, this time in a general election, Zhelev served until 3 November 1996. During his term in office, he took a moderate line, and, in consequence, he lost the support of part of his electorate, especially the extreme right wing and the anti-Communists. As a result of an anti-presidential campaign, the Bulgarian vice-president, Blaga Dimitrova, resigned. There also occurred incidents involving the burning of copies of Zhelev's book on fascism. In November 1996 Zhelev withdrew from the presidential race after he had lost in the primary elections held by the UDF to Petar Stoyanov, who then became president.

Zhelev published many books and scholarly articles, including the following: Samodeinoto izkustvo v usloviata na NRB (Amateurish art in the People's Republic of Bulgaria; 1976); Fizicheskata kultura i sportut v urbaniziranoto obshtestvo (Physical culture and sports in urbanized society; 1978); Modalnite kategorii (Modal categories; 1979); Fashizmut (Fascism; 1982), which was translated into English, French, Russian, Esperanto, Romanian, Macedonian, and other languages; Chovekut i negovite lichnosti (Man and his personalities; 1992); and Relatsionna teoriia za lichnostta (A relational theory of personality; 1993). ZHIVKOV Todor (7 September 1911, Pravets, near Sofia–9 August 1998, Sofia), Bulgarian Communist leader. Zhivkov came from a poor peasant family. Because of his father's illness, at fourteen he had to start working in a brickyard. In a high school in Okhranie (1926–29) he was introduced to Marxist ideology. Forced to leave the high school for financial reasons, Zhivkov took up work in a printing house in Sofia, at the same time learning printing at a night school, from which he graduated in 1932. In 1930 he joined the Bulgarian Communist Youth League, and in 1932, the Bulgarian Communist Party (BCP). In 1932–41 Zhivkov was a member and secretary of regional committees of the BCP in Sofia. As a "suspicious element," from 1936 to 1937 he did substitute military service building roads. For his Communist activities he was arrested and tortured. After completing his military service, Zhivkov married Dr. Mara Maleeva, with whom he had two children, Ludmila Zhivkova and Vladimir. Later both children held high party and state posts. After the German aggression against the USSR in 1941, Zhivkov, as the secretary of the third Sofia district of the BCP, organized protests against sending Bulgarian troops to the eastern front and against deporting Jews to concentration camps. From 1942 Zhivkov was a member of the Sofia District Committee of the BCP and was responsible for the partisan movement outside the capital. At the end of 1943 he was sent as the plenipotentiary of the District Committee of the BCP to Botevgrad, where he headed the Communist guerrilla movement in the region. Under his leadership the first Sofia partisan brigade, called Chavdar, was created (April 1944); it was commanded by Dobri Dzhurov, later the minister of national defense.

During the coup of 9 September 1944 Zhivkov commanded the operational staff of the insurgent forces in Sofia and the vicinity. After the seizure of power by the Communists the operational staff became the staff of the People's Militia in Sofia and was active under Zhivkov's political leadership until November 1944. From then on Zhivkov quickly rose in the ranks. At the end of 1944 he became secretary of the Sofia Regional Committee of the BCP and was responsible for organizational affairs. At the Eighth Plenum of the Central Committee (CC) in 1945 he was elected a deputy member of the CC, and at the Fifth Congress of the BCP in December 1948 he became a member of the CC. From 1945 Zhivkov was a deputy to eleven consecutive parliaments. In 1948–49 he served as the first secretary of the Sofia City Committee of the BCP, and from 1950 he was the first secretary of the Sofia Regional Committee. In January 1950 he was elected secretary for agitation and propaganda of the CC, and then he was also appointed a deputy member of the Politburo of the CC of the BCP. In July 1951 he became a full member of the Politburo of the CC, joining the top leadership of the party. From 1953 he directed the works of the Secretariat of the CC of the BCP. At the Sixth Congress of the BCP in 1954 Zhivkov was elected the first secretary of the CC of the BCP. He held the post until November 1989 (from 1981 as secretary general). In addition, from November 1962 to June 1971 he was prime minister, and then until November 1989 he was the president of the State Council.

At first Zhivkov did not have full power in the party or in the state. Vulko Chervenkov still remained the most powerful person in the BCP, directing the work of the Politburo in 1954–56. Zhivkov became the leader of the BCP only after a criticism of the cult of personality at the Twentieth Congress of the CPSU and at the April Plenum of the CC of the BCP in 1956. At that time Chervenkov was dismissed as secretary general of the BCP and as prime minister. In consequence Zhivkov assumed the leadership of the Politburo and became an indisputable leader of the BCP. The election of Anton Yugov as prime minister caused the emergence of a de facto second center of power, but it was eliminated in 1962 after Zhivkov's assumption of the post of prime minister.

The April 1956 Plenum of the BCP led to a certain liberalization of political life but did not change the essence of the system; the principles of "democratic centralism" and the leading role of the Communist Party were retained. Zhivkov was partially responsible for the persecution of the opposition in the 1940s and 1950s, and he bore full responsibility for the domestic and foreign policy of Bulgaria between 1962 and 1989, especially for the absolute subordination of the country to the Soviet Union. (In 1963 he even planned for the incorporation of Bulgaria into the USSR.) Zhivkov was also entirely responsible for the participation of Bulgaria in the invasion of Czechoslovakia in 1968, for the persecution of political opponents, and for the so-called revival process, based upon the forced assimilation of the Roma, Pomak, and Turkish populations in Bulgaria. This policy led to the emigration of around 320,000 Bulgarian citizens of Turkish origin to Turkey in 1989.

In the fall of 1989 Zhivkov was removed from power. On 10 November he resigned as secretary general of the CC of the BCP, and on 17 November the National Assembly dismissed him as president of the State Council. Between 11 and 13 December of the same year, the Plenum of the CC of the BCP expelled him from the party for "serious infringements of basic party and moral principles, deep deformations in the party and in society, and major errors in the social and economic development of the country." Along with Zhivkov, many others were expelled from the party, among them his son, Vladimir. In 1990 Zhivkov was arrested, and on 18 January 1994, he was sentenced to seven years of prison for the embezzlement of state funds (giving away flats, cars, and money in the amount of $24 million). Zhivkov served the sentence under house arrest in the villa of his granddaughter near Sofia. On 9 February 1996 the Criminal Chamber of the Supreme Court quashed the sentence of 1994, acquitting Zhivkov of the charges of the misappropriation of public funds. Inquiries against Zhivkov were also conducted in three other cases (an embezzlement case of the Moscow fund, assistance to Communist parties and to developing countries, and the forced assimilation of Turks). However, none of the cases resulted in a trial. In 1997 Zhivkov published Memoari (Memoirs), in which he defended his political line and critically evaluated Mikhail Gorbachev and the Bulgarian politicians who assumed power in 1989. From then Zhivkov's popularity in Bulgarian society grew steadily. Zhivkov intended to return to political life, joining the Bulgarian Socialist Party in March 1998, but a few months later he died. ZHIVKOVA Ludmila (26 July 1942, Sofia–21 July 1981, Sofia), Bulgarian Communist activist, daughter of Todor Zhivkov. In 1965 Zhivkova graduated in history from Sofia University. From 1974 to 1981 she worked at the Institute of Balkan Studies of the Bulgarian Academy of Sciences. In the late 1960s and early 1970s she studied at Oxford, where she worked on her doctoral dissertation, "Anglo-turskite otnosheniia, 1933–1939" (1971; Anglo-Turkish Relations, 1933–1939, 1976). She received a Ph.D. in 1971. Zhivkova's later works, including Kazanlushkata grobnitsa (1974; Tomb in Kazanluk, 1975), were devoted to archaeological discoveries in Bulgaria and to the chapels of Tsar Ivan Aleksandur. She also held prominent party and government positions. She served as deputy chairperson (1971–75) and chairperson (1975–81) of the Committee for Culture and Art, and in 1980 she became head of the Department for Science, Culture, and Art of the Central Committee of the Bulgarian Communist Party (BCP). Zhivkova surrounded herself mostly with party activists who sought foreign contacts, and her strong position as the daughter of the head of the BCP allowed for more open criticism of the pathologies of life in Communist Bulgaria. Her work helped to promote Bulgarian culture abroad. Given a modicum of tolerance, Bulgaria became more open to Western cultural trends and ideas, even though Bulgarian Communist officials did not approve. Many Bulgarian artists and writers for the first time in their lives had an opportunity to travel to the West. Zhivkova was interested in Eastern philosophy; she was a vegetarian and practiced yoga. In her research, she stressed the role of the Thracians and the Proto-Bulgarians in the formation of the Bulgarian nation, and she reduced the importance of the Slavic element to more modest proportions. The Russians did not like that, seeing it as a revival of nationalism. Zhivkova's views on the origins of her nation were reflected in the celebrations of the 1,300th anniversary of the foundation of the Bulgarian state organized by the authorities in late 1981. Zhivkova did not live to see them. The circumstances of her death have not been explained. According to one version, she was murdered by KGB agents, and according to another, she committed suicide. Zhivkova became the object of a kind of cult, and the People's Palace of Culture, built on her initiative in Sofia, was named after her. (AG)

ZHURBA Halyna [originally Halina Dąbrowska] (29 December 1888, Teplyk, near Haysyn, Podolia—9 April 1979, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania), Ukrainian writer. The daughter of a Polish noble and a Polonized Ukrainian mother, Zhurba absorbed the rural Ukrainian culture in her childhood. She published her first collection of stories, Z zhyttia (From life), in Odessa in 1909. She then contributed several stories to the journal Ukrainska khata. In 1912 the tsarist censors confiscated an issue of this journal because it published her story “Koniaka” (The horse). From 1917 to 1919 Zhurba edited the daily Nova Rada in Kiev. In 1919 she published her second collection of short stories, Pokhid zhyttia (The march of life). In 1920 she fled Bolshevik rule to a Polish transition camp in Tarnów and then settled in Zdołbunów (Zdolbuniv), where she lived with her husband, Andriy Nyvynskyi, an activist of the Ukrainian Socialist Radical Party. Zhurba later lived in Lwów and Warsaw. In the 1920s she published her works in Poland, Czechoslovakia, and the Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic. Her most famous novels—Zori svit zapovidaiut (The dawn heralds sunrise; 1933) and Revolutsiia ide (The revolution is coming, 2 vols., 1937–38)—were published in Lwów (Lviv). During the Nazi occupation Zhurba’s sensational novel Doktor Kachioni (1943) was published in Kraków. Before the arrival of the Red Army, Zhurba went to Germany. In 1950 she settled in the United States, where she published an autobiographical account of her childhood, Dalekyi svit (A distant world; 1955). (WR)

ZHYLUNOVICH Zhmitser, pseudonym “Tishka Gartny” (4 November 1887, Kopyl, near Minsk—11 April 1937, Mogilev, Russia [now Mahyliou in Belarus]), Belorussian writer and Communist activist. In 1904 Zhylunovich became a member of the Social Democratic Party. He took part in the revolution of 1905–7. In the spring of 1905 he graduated from a two-year high school in Kopyl, and in 1906 he started working as a tanner. In 1908 he began to write for the periodical Nasha Niva. During his stay in St. Petersburg in 1913 Zhylunovich established close ties with the Bolshevik Pravda editors. He again went to St. Petersburg, where he worked in the Volcano factory. In 1913 the Zahlanie Sontsa i u Nashaie Vakontsa (The sun will shine into our window also) publishing house issued the first collection of Zhylunovich’s poems, Pesni (Songs), written in Belorussian using the Latin alphabet. In March 1917 Zhylunovich entered the Belorussian National Committee, and in June of the same year he became president of the Belorussian Socialist Hromada. On 14 February 1918 he became a member of the Belorussian National Commissariat of the Government of the RSFSR in Moscow as secretary of the commissariat and as the editor of its press organ, Dzannitsa.

In October 1918 Zhylunovich became a member of the Russian Bolshevik party. On 1 January 1919, on the party’s recommendation, he became president of the Provisional Revolutionary Government of Workers and Peasants of the Belorussian Soviet Socialist Republic. In this capacity he sought an agreement with the government of the Belorussian People’s Republic, which opposed the plans of the Bolshevik “internationalists.” At the beginning of February Zhylunovich and his comrades were temporarily arrested, and then he was mobilized into the Red Army, in which he fought against the troops of General Anton Denikin. Zhylunovich served as political commissar in the Fourteenth Army and on the Western Front Staff. In 1920 he joined the Central Executive Committee of the Belorussian SSR. In 1922 he published a collection of poems, Piesni pratsy i zmahannia (Songs of work and struggle). In 1923 the plenum of the party Central Committee decided to award him the title of “National Poet,” but this decision was not implemented. A deputy member of the CC of the Belorussian party in 1927–29, Zhylunovich became a professor at the Belorussian Academy of Sciences in 1928. He was also a member of the Institute of Belorussian Culture, editor-in-chief of the newspaper Savietskaia Belarus and the periodical Polymia, head of the Belorussian State Publishing House, deputy minister of education of the Belorussian SSR, and president as well as a member of the council of the Belorussian Society for Cultural Relations with Foreign Countries. Zhylunovich published a collection of his critical articles, Uzhorki i niziny (Hills and plains; 1928); a collection of prose, Homan Zarnits (1932); and a novel, Pierahudy (1935).

During the suppression of national freedom in Soviet Belorussia, on 16 January 1931 Zhylunovich was expelled from the party, and in March he was sentenced to ten years of labor camp on trumped-up charges of creating the “counterrevolutionary” Belorussian Liberation Union. He was temporarily released but was rearrested on 15 November 1936. Tortured during interrogations, on 7 April 1937 Zhylunovich was taken to a mental hospital in Mogilev, where, according to an official version, he died of gangrene. In fact, he was probably murdered by the NKVD. In 1988 Zhylunovich was rehabilitated. In 1967 his Vershy (Poems) were published, and 1978 saw the publication of Nasutrach sontsu: Vybranyia apaviadanni

(To meet the sun: Selected novels). In 1987–93 four volumes of Zhylunovich's Zbior tvorau (Collected works) were published. (AS/SA)

ZIEJA Jan (1 March 1897, Osse, near Sandomierz–19 October 1991, Warsaw), Polish Catholic priest. Zieja completed a theological seminary in Sandomierz and was ordained in 1919. He studied theology at Warsaw University and in Rome but did not complete his studies. From 1912 Zieja was in the secret scouting and the illegal peasant movements, and he belonged to the National Peasant Union. In 1920 he was a chaplain in the Polish Army. In 1928–32 he was a parish priest of Łohiczyn parish in Polesie, a lecturer at the theological seminary in Pińsk, head of the diocesan Catholic Action, an organizer of charity work, and spokesman for practical ecumenism in relations with the Orthodox faithful and the Jews. After completion of Judaic studies at Warsaw University, Zieja reassumed his priestly activities in Polesie. He was linked with the Peasant Youth Union–Wici of the Republic of Poland. In September 1939 he was a chaplain in the Polish Army and then a chaplain for (among other groups) the underground Gray Ranks (Szare Szeregi) scouting units. Zieja participated in actions to save the Jews. During the Warsaw Uprising he was chaplain of the Baszta regiment. At the end of 1944 Zieja voluntarily went to Germany in order to offer moral support to the Poles who had been deported there for forced labor. From 1945 to 1949 he was a priest in Słupsk, where he organized (among other things) the House for Mother and Child and a people's university. After returning to Warsaw in 1949, from 1950 Zieja was rector of the church of the Visitant Order. In 1953 after a sermon that was a reaction to the arrest of Primate Stefan Wyszyński, the authorities demanded Zieja's removal from Warsaw. Between 1955 and 1959 Zieja was again rector of the Visitant church. He gained great popularity for his courage, rectitude, and literal interpretation of Christ's teachings. In 1960 Zieja's health declined; in 1963 he was released from diocesan service and became occupied with writing. In 1976 Zieja was a co-founder of the Committee for the Defense of Workers (Komitet Obrony Robotników [KOR]). (AF)

ZIELENIEC Josef (28 April 1946, Moscow), Czech economist and politician of Polish descent. A graduate of the Prague School of Economics, from 1973 to 1986 Zieleniec was employed at the Research Institute for Machine Building Technology and Economics in Prague, where he worked on the application of mathematical methods in economics. From 1986 to 1990 he was a researcher at the Institute of Economics of the Czechoslovak Academy of Sciences, and then for two years he directed the Center for Economic Research and Graduate Education (CERGE) at Charles University, Prague, where he was appointed associate professor in 1991. At the beginning of the economic transformation of Czechoslovakia, Zieleniec headed a team that prepared the study Československo na rozcestí: Zpráva o stavu národního hospodářství a možnostech jeho nápravy (Czechoslovakia at a crossroads: Report on the state of the national economy and chances for its improvement; 1990). A co-founder of the Civic Democratic Party (Občanská Demokratická Strana [ODS]) in April 1991, Zieleniec co-authored its program and served as its deputy chairman from November 1991 to October 1997. After the elections of June 1992, Zieleniec became minister of international relations of the Czech Republic. When the breakup of Czechoslovakia proved unavoidable, he played an important role in the negotiation of terms for the dissolution of the federation.

After the independent Czech Republic was established, Zieleniec became its minister of foreign affairs in the government of Václav Klaus in January 1993 and continued to hold this position after the elections of June 1996, when he also assumed the post of deputy prime minister. In June 1996 he also became an MP. Zieleniec pursued a pro-Western foreign policy and played a major role in the process of Czech-German reconciliation. Beginning in 1996 he increasingly opposed the political line and the governing style of Klaus. As a result of friction within his party, Zieleniec resigned his parliamentary seat in August 1997, and at the end of October 1997 he gave up all his governmental and party positions. Shortly after the exposure of a corruption scandal in the ODS, Zieleniec left the party in January 1998. In the spring of 2000 he ran in the elections to the Senate as an independent candidate supported by a center-right coalition of four smaller parties that were against the "opposition agreement" between the two strongest parties, the ODS and the Czech Social Democratic Party. Zieleniec won the elections in the first round, obtaining over 50 percent of the vote. He is a member of the Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, Defense, and Security. Zieleniec published Přemýšlení o svete (Reflections on the world, 1998; co-authored by Libuše Koubská). From July 2004 Zieleniec has been a member of the European Parliament. (PU)

ZIEMBIŃSKI Wojciech (22 March 1925, Gniw–13 January 2001, Warsaw), Polish social and political activist. During the Nazi occupation Ziemiński was active in the pro-independence underground movement. Arrested in July 1942, he was imprisoned in a camp in Karlsruhe and then sent to forced labor in the Rhineland. After World War II, he served in the Polish Armed Forces in the West. In 1947 he returned to Poland. Ziemiński studied law at Nicolaus Copernicus University in Toruń and at Warsaw University. Later he worked as an editor and journalist in the Czytelnik Publishing House, from which he was expelled in 1953 for refusing to commemorate the death of Stalin. He later worked in the Legal Publishing House and on the editorial staffs of Nasza Ojczyzna and Lekkoatletyka, where he was transferred for disciplinary reasons in 1968 for refusing to sign an anti-Zionist manifesto. Ziemiński was a member of the Crooked Circle Club (1955–62), an independent discussion club. He was also active in the Club of the Catholic Intelligentsia (Klub Inteligencji Katolickiej) in Warsaw. Ziemiński brought together pro-independence supporters, establishing a political opposition salon in Warsaw. He was arrested and imprisoned several times (for example, in 1971 and 1979) for organizing demonstrations in Warsaw to mark the Polish Independence Day, 11 November. In the 1970s Ziemiński became secretary of the informal Committee of Senior Officers of the Polish Army, whose members included prewar officers of the Polish Army. In 1975 he signed the “Letter of 59” in protest against proposed amendments to the constitution. From 23 September 1976 to 29 September 1977 he served on the Committee for the Defense of Workers (Komitet Obrony Robotników [KOR]), of which he was one of the founding members. One of the leaders of its right wing, Ziemiński left the KOR, along with Andrzej Czuma and others. On 25 March 1977 he joined the Movement for the Defense of Human and Civil Rights (Ruch Obrony Praw Człowieka i Obywatela [ROPCiO]) and was a member of its presidium. He published articles in underground periodicals and edited the monthly Opinia. In 1979 Ziemiński became head of the Committee for National Self-Determination. He edited Rzeczpospolita, an underground periodical that frequently discussed Poland’s eastern policy and other issues. Ziemiński urged successive U.S. presidents to help improve Poland’s international situation, citing the obligations of the United States as Poland’s World War II ally.

From 1980 to 1981 Ziemiński worked for the defense of political prisoners. Arrested in 1982, during martial law in Poland, Ziemiński was held in prison for seven months. In 1983 he became the leader of the Congress of National Solidarity, which became the Party of Loyalty to Poland (Stronnictwo Wierności Rzeczypospolitej) in 1989. He edited the periodicals of these parties, Solidarność Narodu and Polska Jutra. In June 1988 Ziemiński traveled to Paris for medical treatment and used the occasion to initiate the establishment of the Congress of East Central Europe. In 1989 he opposed the Round Table compromise. From 1995 to 1997 Ziemiński belonged to the right-wing Movement for the Reconstruction of Poland (Ruch Odbudowy Polski). He was a member of the Józef Piłsudski Institute in New York. He was a co-founder and then chairman of the council of the Foundation for the Fallen and Murdered in the East. As a result of his efforts, a monument to the Victims of Soviet Aggression of 17 September 1939 was unveiled in Warsaw in 1995. From 1991 Ziemiński was active in the Katyń Foundation (he was chairman of its council from 1993 to 2000). In 1995 he was one of the founders of the Poland-Chechnya Committee. (PK)

ZIĘTEK Jerzy (10 June 1901, Petersdorf [now Szobiszowice], near Gliwice–20 November 1985, Zabrze), Polish activist in Upper Silesia. Born into the large family of a railway engine driver, Ziętek attended high school in Gleiwitz (Gliwice) but was expelled before his final exams for his activity in a Polish patriotic organization called Filareci. After 1918 he was active in the Polish Plebiscite Commissariat for Gleiwitz County, and he fought in the Third Silesian Uprising (1921). After the division of Upper Silesia, Ziętek, fearing German persecution, moved to Poland. He worked in the local government administration in Tarnowskie Góry. In May 1926 he supported the coup staged by Józef Piłsudski. In 1929 he was appointed administrator of the municipality of Radzionków. In 1930 Ziętek became an MP on the Silesian ticket of the Nonparty Bloc of Cooperation with the Government (Bezpartyjny Blok Współpracy z Rządem [BBWR]). In the summer of 1939 he headed the civil defense of the municipality and tried to eliminate German saboteurs. In September 1939 he went to Lwów (Lviv); the move saved his life because the Gestapo had placed his name on a list of Poles to be executed. In June 1940 the NKVD deported Ziętek to a forced labor camp in Rybinsk and then to one in the Caucasus. Released to join an army formed by the (Communist) Union of Polish Patriots (Związek Patriotów Polskich) in June 1943, Ziętek served in the Second Infantry Division as an officer for educational and political affairs. In January 1945 he participated in the liberation of Warsaw.

In early 1945 Ziętek joined the Upper Silesia Operational Group, which, under the command of General Aleksander Zawadzki, was establishing the government apparatus in the Dąbrowa Górnicza mining district and in the territories of the former Silesian province. In March 1945 Ziętek became provincial vice-governor of Silesia and Dąbrowa Górnicza Province. He was given relatively much independence in administering the province and tried to use local cadres to reestablish the economy and administration. He opposed the plundering of the Red Army and pleaded on behalf of Silesian miners who had been deported to the Soviet Union in the spring of 1945. Ziętek played a major role in resolving the issue of the so-called Volkliste (started in October 1939, a list of ethnic Germans living in Nazi-occupied Poland; as of 1941 the list comprised four categories of people with varying degrees of loyalty to the Third Reich). As a result of Ziętek's efforts, no punishment was to be administered to people in the third and fourth categories, nor to many people in the second category. Ziętek initiated many programs for the regional development of Upper Silesia. In 1952 he supervised the expulsion of Silesian bishops from Katowice. As a result of his efforts, the Cathedral Chapter elected a vicar capitular obedient to the authorities. From 1957 to 1975 Ziętek was an MP. In 1963 he became a member of the Council of State, and in 1964, the president of the Presidium of the Provincial National Council and a member of the Executive of the Provincial Committee of the (Communist) Polish United Workers' Party (Polska Zjednoczona Partia Robotnicza [PUWP]) in Katowice. Ziętek initiated a number of environmental projects, including the construction of a water reservoir in Goczałkowice and a green belt around the Upper Silesian Industrial District, as well as the construction of recreational centers and hospitals for miners. He campaigned for the granting of war veterans' rights to Silesian uprising fighters. After 1970 Ziętek was frequently in conflict with Zdzisław Grudzień, the first secretary of the PUWP Provincial Committee in Katowice, who represented the Communists of the Dąbrowa Górnicza area. From 1973 to 1975 Ziętek served as provincial governor of Katowice, and in April 1980 he became deputy chairman of the Council of State. (AGr)

ŽIVKOVIĆ Petar (23 January 1879, Negotin, Serbia–1947 Paris, France), Serbian general and politician.

Živković graduated from the Military Academy in Belgrade. He was actively involved in staging the coup of May 1903, in which King Alexander Obrenović was assassinated. After the coup, King Peter I Karadjordjević ascended the throne. In response to the establishment of Ujedinjenje ili Smrt (Union or Death, also known as the Black Hand), a secret organization led by Colonel Dragutin "Apis" Dimitrijević, Živković co-founded and headed the so-called White Hand, a group of officers with close ties to the royal court. During World War I Živković commanded a regiment, and in 1917 he became commander of the royal guard. He was one of the organizers of the so-called Salonika Trial, in which Dimitrijević was sentenced to death and then executed in June 1917. Živković played an active role in expelling Black Hand members from the army of the Kingdom of Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes. In 1923 he was promoted to major general. When, following a prolonged crisis of the state, King Alexander I Karadjordjević assumed dictatorial power, he appointed Živković prime minister and minister of interior on 6 January 1929. Promoted to four-star general in 1930, Živković was the main executor of the king's policy. He supervised the 1931 parliamentary elections, in which all candidates ran on one ticket approved by the government. After resigning as prime minister on 3 April 1932, Živković served as minister of military affairs in the cabinets of Nikola Uzunović, Bogoljub Jevtić, and Milan Stojadinović (January 1934–February 1939). In 1936 Živković founded the Yugoslav National Organization (Jugoslovenska Nacionalna Organizacija), but it did not become a mass government party. After the German invasion of Yugoslavia in April 1941, Živković emigrated to Great Britain, where he served as minister without portfolio in the government of Miloš Trifunović (June–August 1943). A firm opponent of communism, Živković supported the activities of Colonel Dragoljub (Draža) Mihailović and his guerrillas in occupied Yugoslavia. In July 1946 Živković was sentenced to death in absentia in the trial of Mihailović. (WR)

ZLENKO Anatoly (2 June 1938, near Kiev), Ukrainian diplomat. After finishing school, Zlenko worked in the coal mining industry in the town of Kadiyivka. From 1962 to 1967 he studied at the university in Kiev and then entered the diplomatic service of the Ukrainian SSR, fully controlled by the Kremlin. In 1967 he became second secretary in the Department of International Organizations of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the Ukrainian SSR. In March 1973 he became a staff member of the UNESCO Secretariat in Paris. In 1979 he was appointed counselor in the Department of International Organizations of the Ukrainian Ministry of Foreign Affairs, and in 1983, permanent representative of the Ukrainian SSR to the UNESCO. In April 1987 he was appointed deputy minister of foreign affairs and in July 1990 minister of foreign affairs of the Ukrainian SSR. After Ukraine regained its independence in 1991, Zlenko reorganized its diplomatic service and established diplomatic relations with most countries of the world. He played an important role in negotiations with Russia on borders; the division of the Black Sea Fleet; and the Soviet nuclear arsenal, which was kept by Russia in exchange for American and Russian security guarantees and American economic assistance to Ukraine. After leaving the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Zlenko served as the permanent representative of Ukraine to the United Nations (October 1994–September 1997). He subsequently became ambassador of Ukraine to Portugal. From October 2000 to September 2003 Zlenko was minister of foreign affairs of Ukraine and a member of the President's Council for the National Security and Defense of Ukraine. (WR) ZNANIECKI Florian (15 January 1882, Świątniki, near Włocławek–23 March 1958, Urbana-Champaign, Illinois), Polish sociologist and philosopher. The son of an estate administrator, Znaniecki was expelled from Warsaw University for taking part in a protest against the restriction of academic freedoms by the Russian authorities. In 1904 he went to Switzerland. He studied in Geneva, Zurich, and Paris and also worked as a librarian at the Polish Museum in Rapperswil. In 1910 he received his postdoctoral degree from the Jagiellonian University. In 1911 Znaniecki published Myśl i rzeczywistość (Thought and reality), and in 1912, Humanizm i poznanie (Humanism and cognition), in which, influenced by Henri Bergson, Wilhelm Dilthey, and American pragmatism, Znaniecki developed his own humanist theory. In 1914 he went to the United States on the invitation of William I. Thomas. From 1917 to 1919 he taught at the University of Chicago. In 1919 he published Cultural Reality in Chicago, which was the crowning achievement of the philosophy of culturalism. In collaboration with Thomas, Znaniecki co-authored the five-volume The Polish Peasant in Europe and America (1918–20), in which the personal documents, letters, and diaries of émigrés were used in an innovative way.

Znaniecki returned to Poland in 1920, by then a world-famous scholar, and took up the chair of Sociology and the Philosophy of Culture at Poznań University. He founded the Polish Sociological Institute (1922) and the periodical Przegląd Socjologiczny (1930). He expounded on the foundations of his theory of humanist sociology in Wstęp do socjologii (Introduction to sociology; 1922). In The Laws of Social Psychology (1925) Znaniecki described regularities in changes in attitudes and values. In his pioneering work, Socjologia wychowania (Sociology of education, 2 vols.; 1928–30), Znaniecki described relations between the social system and personality. From 1931 to 1933 he lectured at Columbia University and conducted research on the sociology of education. After returning to Poland, he published a book based on these lectures, Ludzie terażniejsi i cywilizacja przyszłości (Contemporary people and the civilization of the future; 1934). His two subsequent works, The Method of Sociology (1934) and Social Action (1936), included a criticism of the positivist methodology in sociology and an analysis of social activities based on qualitative studies taking into consideration the so-called humanist factor. In the summer of 1939 Znaniecki resumed lecturing at Columbia University. The outbreak of World War II prevented his return to Poland. From 1940 he worked at the University of Illinois at Urbana-Champaign, where he published The Social Role of the Men of Knowledge (1940), Modern Nationalities (1952), Cultural Sciences (1952), and other books. Znaniecki did not return to Poland because he did not accept the Communist regime imposed on the country after 1944. In recognition of his scholarly position and his influence on American sociology, Znaniecki was elected president of the American Sociological Society in 1952. His work Social Relations and Social Roles was published posthumously in 1965. (WR)

ZOG I [originally Ahmed Zogu] (8 October 1895, Burgayet, Mati–9 April 1961, Paris), king of Albania. Zog was born the son of Xhemal Pasha, head of Zogolli, one of the most powerful Albanian clans. Zog completed a lycée and the Turkish Officers' Academy in Istanbul. During World War I he served in the Austrian Army as colonel honoris causa. In 1920 he became the commander-in-chief of the Albanian Army, and in 1921 he became minister of interior. In November 1921 Zog was commissioned to suppress an insurrection in the north of the country. His armed forces were composed of volunteers who were linked to his clan. His units became the foundation of a gendarmerie and the base of his political power. Declaring himself a supporter of the People's Party, Zog at the same time maintained contacts with leaders of the opposition party, the conservative Progressive Party. After a series of government changes, on 14 December 1921 Zog entered Tirana with his armed units and forced the resignation of the government and the General Council. He appointed Xhafer Ypi the new prime minister. Zog himself remained minister of interior. The opposition was concentrated in the National Assembly, where Bishop Fan Noli, Stevro Vinjay, and Luigj Gurakuqi were especially influential. On 22 March 1922 units of Zog's opponents gained control of the capital but withdrew under pressure from the Western powers.

After the parliament passed the provisional statutes of the state in September 1922, Zog became prime minister, and this intensified the conflict. Now the opposition also demanded the removal of the relics of feudalism from the countryside, dominated by the great landowners. In the elections of December 1923 Zog's adherents won the majority of the vote, but they did not manage to control the disastrous economic situation. On 23 February 1924 Zog was injured in an assassination attempt by a high school student. Since the parliament was dominated by conservative lords, Zog bestowed the premiership on Shefket Vërlaci. Provocations and treacherous assassinations committed on the government's orders inflamed the populist opposition to an insurrection, which in May 1924 spread throughout Tirana. The government fled to Greece and Zog to the Kingdom of Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes. On 16 June 1924 the reformers established a cabinet headed by Noli. Before this government had a chance to implement a reform program, Zog returned with his armed forces from Yugoslavia. After a two-week struggle, on 24 December 1924 he entered the capital and established a dictatorship.

On 6 January 1925 Zog became head of the government and divided the country into ten military zones supervised by clan leaders (bayraktar). Having prepared a reform of the system, on 25 January Zog summoned the Constituent Assembly, which proclaimed a republic and passed a preliminary constitution, on the basis of which on 1 February Zog became president. On 2 March the Assembly passed a new constitution, which declared the state to be a parliamentary republic. However, the president nominated one-third of the MPs and senators, while women, the clergy, and military men became disenfranchised. Zog's power was based upon the commanders-in-chief and clan leaders, especially the great landowners from the south. Zog organized a rally of their representatives in Tirana, where on 25 June 1925 they took an oath of loyalty (besa) in exchange for an acknowledgment of their privileges. Zog's position depended on the strength and loyalty of the gendarmerie, trained by the British general Joselyn Percy. At the same time Zog brutally suppressed the opposition. Most probably on his orders Gurakuqi was murdered in Bari in March 1925 and Bayram bey Curri a month later; Zog's brother-in-law, Ceno bey Kryeziu, was killed in Prague in November 1927. Zog also forced Vërlaci to emigrate.

In June 1928 Zog dissolved the Assembly and called an election. The voting on 17 August 1928 was carried out under the supervision of the army and the police. The new assembly proclaimed Albania a monarchy, and on 1 September 1928 it pronounced Zog the king of Albania. He assumed the title of Zog I. In a proclamation of 5 December 1928 Zog presented himself to the nation as a king-reformer and announced the modernization of the country and its adoption of European standards. In 1929 a civil code came into force and, in 1930, a criminal code. In May 1930 a limited agrarian reform, designed by an Italian expert, Giovanni Lorenzoni, began to be implemented. However, it did not change much in the disproportionate structure of land ownership. Little changed as well with regard to literacy and economic development. Under strict royal rule Albania enjoyed political stability, although opposition was suppressed and reforms were only half measures. In foreign policy Zog sided with Fascist Italy. In 1925 he obtained a loan there, and a year later he signed an Albanian-Italian treaty of friendship and security. In 1927 a twenty-year treaty of mutual aid subordinated the country to Italy. Benito Mussolini made Albania his bridgehead to the Balkans, controlling Albanian finances and the army. Italian influence led to some economic developments in the region of Tirana and Durrës, where the Italians built a port. As king, Zog attempted to exert his authority over the Albanians in Greece and Yugoslavia, which aroused tensions there. In 1938 Zog married a Hungarian princess, Geraldine Apponyi. From this marriage a successor to the throne, his son Leka, was born.

On 7 April 1939 Mussolini ordered the invasion of Albania and the dissolution of Albania's status as a formally independent state. Victor Emmanuel III assumed the throne of Albania, and Zog fled with his family across the mountains to Greece; then, via Romania, Poland, Latvia, and Sweden, he arrived in Great Britain. After the war Zog could not return home, where the influence of his supporters had diminished and the Communists had taken power. He formally abdicated on 2 January 1946. Zog later lived for some time in England and then moved to Cannes, France. (WR)

ZÖLD Sándor (19 May 1913, Nagyvárad [now Oradea, Romania]–20 April 1951, Budapest), Hungarian Communist activist. Zöld's father was a shoemaker and bricklayer. After the 1920 Peace Treaty of Trianon, Zöld's family moved to Hungary. After passing his high school final examinations, Zöld enrolled at the Debrecen University Medical School, from which he received a degree in 1939. In 1932, when Zöld was beginning his studies, Gyula Kállai persuaded him to join the illegal Communist Party. Zöld was also active in legally operating youth organizations. In 1933 he was elected secretary of the István Tisza Circle, which brought together students of Bihar County. In 1937 in Debrecen, on behalf of the Academic Circle, Zöld signed a declaration on joining the March Front, initiated by the so-called peasant writers. In 1942 Zöld became a doctor at a hospital in Berettyóújfalu. After the Arrow Cross Party seized power in October 1944, he went underground for some time.

After the Red Army entered Hungary, Zöld was appointed governor of Bihar County on 18 November 1944. From December 1944 until the end of his life he served as a member of parliament. From 3 December 1944 to 15 July 1945 he was secretary of state for political affairs in the Ministry of Interior in the Provisional National Government. In March 1945 he became head of the administration and economics department of the Central Committee (CC) of the Hungarian Communist Party (HCP). In November 1946 he was transferred to Szeged, where he became secretary of the municipal party committee. At the founding congress of the Hungarian Workers' Party (HWP) in June 1948, Zöld was elected a deputy member of its CC. In September 1949 he became a member of the CC, and in May 1950 he also joined the Politburo. On 30 October 1948 Zöld returned to the Ministry of Interior, becoming secretary of state for administrative affairs. After the resignation of János Kádár, Zöld was appointed minister of interior in late June 1950. In this role, he was responsible for the continuation of the police terror in Hungary. On 19 April 1951, at a meeting of the HWP CC Politburo, the head of the party, Mátyás Rákosi, sharply criticized the functioning of the ministry and condemned Zöld for maintaining friendly contacts with the Communists who had been imprisoned for participating in the March Front. According to official information, Zöld shot and killed his two children, his wife, and his mother, before committing suicide. Probably he did not want to share the fate of László Rajk and Kádár, his immediate predecessors. On the day of his death Zöld was dismissed as minister of interior and expelled from the party. On 1 June 1957 his ashes were solemnly reburied at the Kerepesi Cemetery in Budapest. However, the circumstances of his death have not been fully explained to this day. (JT)

ŽOLGER Ivan (22 October 1867, Devina–16 May 1925, Lassnitzhöhe, Austria), Slovene lawyer and politician. Žolger studied law in Graz and Paris, earning a degree in 1895. In 1900 he received the postdoctoral degree from the University of Vienna. For many years he worked in the Austrian state administration, initially in the town of Pettau (now Ptuj, Slovenia), then in Graz, and from 1902 onwards in the central government administration in Vienna. In 1917 Žolger was granted a noble title. In July 1918 he became minister without portfolio responsible for preparing a constitutional reform of the monarchy. On 27 October 1918, in the face of Austria-Hungary's defeat in World War I, Žolger resigned. After returning to Slovenia, he became chairman of a commission that presented a draft provisional constitution for the Kingdom of Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes (SHS). This draft was adopted in November 1918. Along with the Croat Ante Trumbić and the Serb Nikola Pašić, Žolger represented the SHS at the Paris Peace Conference in 1919. He was also a representative of the SHS at the First Assembly of the League of Nations in Geneva (1920), and he sat on the Permanent Arbitration Tribunal in The Hague. In 1918 Žolger became a professor at the University of Vienna, and in 1919, a professor at the School of Law of the University of Ljubljana. Žolger's publications include Oesterreichisches Verordnungsrecht (Austrian administrative law; 1898); Der Hofstaat des Hauses Österreich (The Court State of the Austrian house; 1917); Les Slovenes (The Slovenes; 1919); and Kršitev mednarodne obveznosti in njena pravna posledica (The violation of international commitments and its legal consequences; 1921–22). ŻÓŁKIEWSKI Stefan (9 December 1911, Warsaw–4 January 1991, Warsaw), Polish Communist activist and literary critic. Born into an intelligentsia family, after graduating from Warsaw University in 1934, Żółkiewski worked as a high school teacher. During the Nazi occupation he was involved in underground teaching. He favored Marxism and the extreme left wing, and in 1942 he joined the Polish Workers' Party (Polska Partia Robotnicza [PPR]). From 1945 to 1948 Żółkiewski was the editor-in-chief of the periodical Kuźnica, which promoted a radical Marxist vision of Polish culture. He became a deputy member of the Central Committee (CC) of the PPR in December 1945 and head of the CC Department of Education and Culture in December 1947. From December 1948 to March 1954 he was a deputy member and then a full member of the CC of the (Communist) Polish United Workers' Party (Polska Zjednoczona Partia Robotnicza [PUWP]), and he became head of the CC Department of Culture. He was also an associate professor at Warsaw University. After earning a doctorate in 1952, Żółkiewski became a professor at Warsaw University in 1954, and he was the founder and director of the Institute of Literary Studies of the Polish Academy of Sciences. In 1950 he published Stare i nowe literaturoznawstwo (Old and new literary studies), which was an exposition of the Stalinist understanding of literature. From 1953 to 1955 Żółkiewski served as academic secretary of the Polish Academy of Sciences and was in charge of party control over this institution. From April 1955 to June 1956 he was head of the PUWP CC Department of Culture and Science. Politically close to the Puławska faction (Puławianie), Żółkiewski advocated a political thaw and a revision of Communist dogma. He expressed his views in Kultura i polityka (Culture and politics; 1958); Perspektywy literatury XX wieku (Prospects of twentieth-century literature; 1960); Zagadnienia stylu (Issues of style; 1965), and other works. From April 1956 to June 1959 Żółkiewski served as minister of higher education. From March 1957 to June 1958 he was editor-in-chief of Polityka and then editor-in-chief of Nowa Kultura and Kultura i Społeczeństwo. From 1960 to 1968 he was secretary of the first Department of Social Sciences of the Polish Academy of Sciences. In March 1968 Żółkiewski stood up in the defense of persecuted students at Warsaw University; as a result, he was dismissed from his position in the Polish Academy of Sciences. Attacked by the propaganda apparatus, he was expelled from the CC at the Thirteenth Plenum of the CC in November 1968. He then retired from politics. However, he continued writing and published scholarly treatises, including Kultura literacka 1918–1932 (Literary culture 1918–1932; 1973); Kultura, socjologia, semiotyka literacka (Literary culture, sociology, and semiotics; 1979); and Cetno i lichy (Trick or treat; 1983). Żółkiewski trained many cultural researchers and literary critics. (WR)

ZSEDÉNYI Béla (5 April 1894, Aknasugatag [now Ocna Șugatag, Romania]–8 February 1955, Budapest), Hungarian politician, victim of communism. Zsedényi's father was a mining engineer. Zsedényi attended a state gymnasium in Nagyszeben (now Sibiu, Romania) and then a Protestant gymnasium in Máramarosziget (now Sighetu Marmăției, Romania). He studied at a Protestant law academy in Máramarosziget but received a degree from Budapest University. During World War I Zsedényi served on the Italian front. After the collapse of the Austro-Hungarian Empire, he became secretary of the municipality of Komárom (now Komarno, Slovakia), situated on the left bank of the Danube River, but he was interned by the Czechoslovak authorities. In 1924 Zsedényi moved to Hungary. In 1925 he became a lecturer at a Protestant law academy in Miskolc, and in 1928 he passed examinations to become an attorney and a judge. After receiving the postdoctoral degree from the University of Pécs, Zsedényi was appointed a full professor in September 1928. He authored many publications on the theory of law and state law. He served as a member of the synod and as the municipal secretary of the superintendency of the Evangelical Reformed Church. In 1929, as a member of the leadership of the minor Independent Democratic Party, Zsedényi was elected to the Miskolc municipal government on a joint ticket with the Hungarian Social Democratic Party. For a short time he shifted to the right wing, supporting Gyula Gömbös and editing the ruling party newspaper, Felsőmagyarország, and then he again joined the liberal opposition. In 1939 Zsedényi took over the editorship of Felsőmagyarországi Reggeli Hírlap, which was regarded as an opposition periodical. In January 1944 he retired and opened his own law practice in Budapest. During the German occupation in 1944 he was in hiding. On 17 October 1944 the members of the Arrow Cross Party interned him in Szilvásvár, from where he escaped after a few weeks.

In December 1944 Zsedényi became a member of the Provisional National Assembly in Debrecen. As a result of an agreement among political parties, he was elected president of the Provisional National Assembly on 21 December. From 26 January to 7 December 1945 he also served as president of the assembly's provisional presiding committee, the National Supreme Council. In November 1945 Zsedényi was elected to the National Assembly. In 1947 he co-founded the Hungarian Independence Party, led by Zoltan Pfeiffer, which was in opposition to the Communists. In the elections in August 1947, Zsedényi was elected to parliament for the third time. On 20 November 1947, like many of his party colleagues, he was illegally deprived of his parliamentary seat. He then resumed working as an attorney. Arrested on trumped-up charges on 24 May 1950, Zsedényi was sentenced to life imprisonment on 10 November of that year. He died in the main prison in Budapest and was secretly buried. In 1963 his trial was repeated, and he was acquitted, but the Communists failed to inform his family about it. It was not until 6 July 1989 that Zsedényi was officially rehabilitated. After his remains were identified, he was solemnly reburied in December 1990. (JT)

ZUCKERMAN Yitzhak [also spelled Yitzhak Cukierman], pseudonym “Antek” (1917, Vilnius–17 June 1981, Lohamei Hagetaot, Israel), activist of the Jewish Zionist left in Poland. Born into a family of merchants and craftsmen, Zuckerman graduated from Tarbut Hebrew High School in Vilnius. From his youth he was linked with the Zionist movement of the Dror-Hehalutz, a youth organization of the Jewish Social Democratic Workers’ Party–Poale Zion. From 1936 he worked in the Dror head office in Warsaw, and in 1938 he became secretary general of this organization.

From the fall of 1939 Zuckerman organized the underground of the Zionist left in the Warsaw Ghetto, representing an anti-German, anti-British, and pro-Soviet stance. Ideologically close to communism, he was in conflict with the Orthodox Jewish leadership, and to some extent he was also in disagreement with Zionists-Revisionists. Zuckerman was one of the first Jewish leaders to call for armed resistance to the Germans, but his arguments were rejected at a meeting of Zionist underground groups in March 1942. However, during the mass deportations of Jews to extermination camps in the summer of 1942, his views gained support. The Jewish left—mainly the Poale Zion and the Bund—reached an agreement and created the Jewish Fighting Organization (Żydowska Organizacja Bojowa [ŻOB]; also known as the Jewish Defense Organization). Zuckerman became one of the three deputy commanders of the ŻOB leader, Mordecai Anielewicz. He was also active in the Jewish National Committee (Żydowski Komitet Narodowy [ŻKN]), which affiliated leftist and Zionist currents. On behalf of the ŻKN, Zuckerman negotiated with various groups of the Polish underground. He also obtained material and training assistance from the Home Army (Armia Krajowa [AK]) and the Communist People’s Guard. On his own, Zuckerman also organized black-market purchases of arms, which he smuggled into the Warsaw Ghetto. He alerted the Polish underground to the situation in the Warsaw Ghetto and appealed for an increase in the supply of weapons for Jewish fighters, for more propaganda, and for increased Allied bombings. Zuckerman’s interventions intensified especially during the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising (19 April–16 May 1943). When the fighting began, Zuckerman was outside the ghetto. At the end of the uprising he returned to the ghetto, and then he led seventy-five ŻOB fighters through the sewers to the territory outside the ghetto. With the help of the Communists, Zuckerman managed to get the whole group to the forests near Wyszaków. After a short stay with the forest partisans, he returned to Warsaw. He remained in hiding, cooperating with the Polish Żegota (Council for Aid to Jews) and providing rescue services. He also provided documents and funds to the Jews in hiding.

After the Red Army entered Poland and the Communists seized power, Zuckerman continued his activities among the Zionist left. With numerous contacts among the Communists, he managed to organize semi-legal transportation for tens of thousands of Jews from Poland to the West. Some Jewish refugees went to Palestine, where in 1947 Zuckerman arrived as well. He fought in Israel’s war for independence and was one of the founders of the Kibbutz Lohamei Hagetaot (Ghetto Fighters). Zuckerman was a prosecution witness in the 1961 trial of Adolf Eichmann in Jerusalem. Zuckerman wrote his memoirs, A Surplus of Memory: Chronicle of the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising (1993). (MC)

ŽUJOVIĆ Sreten (24 June 1899, Mala Vrbica, Serbia–1976, Belgrade), Serbian Communist activist. Žujović was a high school student in Belgrade when World War I broke out. He followed the Serbian Army to France, where he became a soldier and fought on the western front. He returned to Belgrade in 1921 and joined the Communist Party of Yugoslavia (CPY) in 1924. He worked in a bank and was active in the trade union movement. Arrested for his illegal Communist activities, Žujović was sentenced to half a year in prison in March 1930. After his release, he went to the Soviet Union, where he attended the Leninist

School of the Comintern. In December 1934, at the Fourth Conference of the CPY, Žujović became a member of its Central Committee (CC). In 1935 he settled in Vienna, where the CPY had its headquarters. In 1936 he became a member of the CPY CC Politburo. In the second half of 1937 the head of the CPY, Milan Gorkić, was summoned to Moscow and was soon murdered there. Josip Broz Tito became the acting head of the CPY, and Žujović was expelled from its leadership. He returned to Yugoslavia, where, using the pseudonym of “Crni,” he became involved in underground work. From 1939 to 1940 he served as a party instructor in Serbia and Macedonia, and at the Fifth Conference of the CPY in October 1940 he again joined its CC. On 4 July 1941, after Germany attacked the Soviet Union, the CPY leadership decided to take up the struggle against Yugoslavia’s occupiers. Žujović became commander of the Partisan forces in Serbia. Wounded in November 1941, after recovering, he resumed working at the headquarters of the Partisan movement led by Tito. In November 1942 Žujović became minister of transport in the provisional government headed by Tito. At that time he was also promoted to general.

In March 1945 Žujović became minister of finance in Tito’s government. In April 1945 he was a member of the Yugoslav delegation to the founding conference of the United Nations in San Francisco. He was one of the top leaders of the CPY until May 1948, when he called for concessions to Stalin in the latter’s conflict with Tito. Stripped of all his positions, Žujović was arrested and spent over two years in prison, although he had not been convicted. He was accused of being a “slanderer,” an “enemy of the party and the nation,” and even a “henchman of the Ustashe.” After making an extensive self-criticism and condemning Stalin and the Cominform in November 1950, he was released. Žujović worked in an economic research institute and in the administration of the daily Borba until his retirement. (WR)

ŽUKAUSKAS Silvestras (31 December 1860, Poškietėiai-Dovainiškiai, Šiauliai County–26 November 1937, Wilno [Vilnius]), Lithuanian general. Žukauskas began his military career in the tsarist army. After graduating from the Military College in Vilnius (1887), he was stationed in Vilnius and then in Kaunas. He fought in the Russo-

Japanese War of 1904–5. At the beginning of World War I he served as the commander of a regiment. He fought in the battle of the Dubysa River and in the regions of Šiauliai, Radviliškis, and Biržai. Žukauskas was awarded the Golden Sword for his bravery in the defense of Šiauliai. In 1915 he was appointed commander of a brigade and promoted to major general. In 1917 he became commander of a division. After the establishment of an independent Lithuanian state, he returned to Vilnius, but because of illness, he did not assume the post of minister of national defense, which he had been promised.

After his recovery, Žukauskas was appointed chief of staff on 26 April 1919 and commander of the Lithuanian Army on 7 May. As commander of the military forces, he led the counteroffensive of May and August 1919 that drove the Red Army out of Lithuania (the action was facilitated by the fact that the Polish Army had previously captured Vilnius). After an unsuccessful coup attempt by the Polish Military Organization in Kaunas on 28–29 August 1919, Žukauskas’s position weakened because one of his closest associates was arrested and because Žukauskas himself was accused of pro-Polish sympathies. On 7 October 1919 he resigned as commander and then acted as an observer with General Albert Niessel’s mission, which supervised the withdrawal of Pavel Bermond-Avalov’s army from Lithuania. Because of the increasingly low morale and discipline in the Lithuanian military forces, Žukauskas was again appointed commander-in-chief of the army (February 1920), and in a relatively short time he restored order and discipline. As part of the reorganization of the government and the military forces, introduced by a resolution of the Constitutional Assembly, Žukauskas was appointed army inspector on 14 June 1920, and on 6 October 1920 he again became commander of the army. He failed to halt the offensive led by General Lucjan Żeligowski, who seized Vilnius. However, Žukauskas succeeded in stabilizing the front on the Musninkų-Širvintos-Giedraičiai-Dubingiai line. On 7 March 1921 he was again appointed commander-in-chief of the army, but in May 1921 he resigned. He again held this post from May 1923 to January 1928, and then he retired. Žukauskas was awarded the Vytautas Cross and numerous foreign medals and decorations. (AG)

of Natural Sciences of the Jagiellonian University in Kraków. In 1895 he established ties with the Socialist movement. While a student, Żuławski was involved in the activities of the Polish Socialist Party (Polska Partia Socjalistyczna [PPS]) in Tarnów and Borysław. He was an activist in the student organizations Zjednoczenie (Union) (1899–1900) and Ruch (Movement) (1901–3). From 1900 to 1919 Żuławski was a member of the leadership of the Polish Socialist Democratic Party of Galicia and Silesia. He was also active in the trade union movement. From 1905 on he served as head of the Provincial Trade Union Secretariat for Galicia and as a member of the Austrian national trade union leadership. In 1908 he became head of the Health Care Fund in Kraków. From 1907 to 1914 he edited Związkowiec, a press organ of the National Commission of Trade Unions. During World War I he served in the Austrian Army. In 1918 Żuławski was a member of the Polish Liquidation Commission (Polska Komisja Likwidacyjna), as a representative of which he served as head of Chrzanów County. One of the most prominent trade union activists in the Second Republic of Poland, Żuławski strove to unite the Galician trade unions with trade union organizations from other regions of Poland. A member of the Central Commission of Class Trade Unions, the largest national organization of trade unions, Żuławski served as its secretary general from 1922 to 1939. He was also one of the top leaders of the PPS: a member of the PPS Central Executive Committee from 1920 to 1937 and chairman of the PPS Chief Council from 1937 to 1939. He was a member of the governing body of the International Labor Organization. From 1919 to 1935 Żuławski was an MP in the Assembly on the PPS ticket. In 1926 he opposed Józef Piłsudski and later was one of the leading opposition MPs. He was one of the leaders of the so-called Centrolew, a center-left coalition of parties in opposition to the sanacja regime.

After the defeat of Poland in September 1939, Żuławski went underground. He served as chairman of the Polish Socialist Party–Freedom-Equality-Independence (PPS–Wolność-Równość-Niepodległość [PPS–WRN]) in Kraków and took part in the work of the Coordinating Political Committee (Polityczny Komitet Porozumiewawczy) there. In June 1945 in Moscow he attended a conference on the establishment of the Provisional Government of National Unity (Tymczasowy Rząd Jedności Narodowej [TRJN]); the conference ended on 21 June, when an agreement was signed on coopting new members into the Presidium of the National Home Council (Krajowa Rada Narodowa [KRN]) and expanding the membership of the Provisional Government by including, among others, Stanisław Mikołajczyk. At the end of June 1945, as one of the leaders of the underground PPS–WRN, Żuławski (together with Zygmunt Zaremba) entered into the negotiations on merging his party with the so-called licensed PPS (i.e., permitted by the Communist authorities). As the Polish Workers' Party (Polska Partia Robotnicza [PPR]) and the PPS faction approved by the Communists refused to treat the PPS–WRN on an equal-rights basis, Żuławski (along with other activists) established the Organizational Committee of the Polish Social Democratic Party. As a result of protests by the KRN and threats by the Communists, he agreed that PPS–WRN activists could join the PPS individually, hoping to outnumber opponents in the PPS. In January 1946 Żuławski was coopted into the PPS Chief Council, but in August 1946 he resigned. In January 1947 he was elected to the Legislative Assembly. In parliament, he defended the idea of socialism and condemned the abuse of power by the Communists. He declared his willingness to cooperate with the Soviet Union but on an equal-rights basis. After his speech of 20 June 1947, in which he demanded increased spending on social welfare at the expense of funds for security and the army and sharply criticized the government, Żuławski was not allowed to speak again, and his speech was censored in the stenographic record of the Assembly session. ZULFIKARPAŠIĆ Adil-beg (23 December 1921, Foča), Muslim politician from Bosnia. Zulfikarpašić was born into the family of Husein-beg Zulfikarpašić-Čengić, the largest private forest owner in Yugoslavia, whose house was the meeting place of the Muslim elite. Zulfikarpašić became a member of the League of Yugoslav Communist Youth (Savez Komunističke Omladine Jugoslavije [SKOJ]) in 1936 and a member of the Communist Party of Yugoslavia (CPY) in 1939. He finished a school of commerce in Sarajevo and went to university, but in 1941 he discontinued his studies and joined the Partisans, led by Josip Broz Tito. He served at the Partisan headquarters in Bosnia. Arrested in 1942 in Sarajevo, Zulfikarpašić was sentenced to death by the Ustasha regime but was pardoned owing to interventions, and his sentence was commuted to twenty years' imprisonment. He escaped from a prison in Zagreb, and by the end of World War II he was a lieutenant colonel. In 1945 Zulfikarpašić was an assistant to the minister of trade of the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina, administering property abandoned after the war. Outraged by the persecutions unleashed by the new authorities and by their misuse of funds, he fled to Trieste in February 1946, from where he moved to Austria. He studied political science and law in Graz, Vienna, and Freiburg. After graduating in 1954, he worked as a journalist in Switzerland for an émigré periodical of the Croatian Peasant Party. Following an intervention by the Yugoslav authorities, the police banned him from writing and publishing. Zulfikarpašić began to work for an insurance company. He subsequently founded his own company, Adeks Import-Export, and then another one, Stamaco, which he managed until 1987.

In 1960 in Munich Zulfikarpašić co-founded and then served as chairman of the Liberal Democratic Union of Muslim Bosniaks (Liberalni Demokratski Savez Bošnjaka-Muslimana), which called for cooperation with the Serbs and the Croats in Bosnia. He founded the émigré periodical Bosanski pogledi and was its editor-in-chief from 1960 to 1967. He was an activist in the Democratic Alternative (Demokratska Alternativa), a party founded by Yugoslav émigrés in London in 1963 that advocated that Yugoslavia should be maintained as a confederation. In June 1988 Zulfikarpašić established the Bosnian Institute in Zurich, which promoted the culture, literature, language, and history of the Muslims of Bosnia and Herzegovina.

In November 1988 Zulfikarpašić met Alija Izetbegović in Zurich. In 1990 he returned to Bosnia, and on 26 May 1990 he became deputy chairman of the (Muslim) Party of Democratic Action (Stranka Demokratske Akcije [SDA]), which he supported financially. Zulfikarpašić was a member of the SDA's liberal wing. He believed that the Muslims in Bosnia and Herzegovina should be referred to as Bosniaks. In September 1990 the liberal wing members left the SDA, and in October Zulfikarpašić became head of the Muslim Bosniak Organization (Muslimanska Bosnjačka Organizacija [MBO]). This split was caused by a conflict with the extreme wing, led by Izetbegović. Zulfikarpašić accused Izetbegović of subjecting the SDA to clerical influence and of dictatorial inclinations and also criticized him for refusing to expel Salem Šabić, the SDA deputy chairman who had collaborated with the Communist secret police. In July 1991 Zulfikarpašić initiated an agreement with the Serbs, the so-called Belgrade Initiative, under the terms of which Bosnia and Herzegovina was to remain part of Yugoslavia. This agreement was never implemented because of opposition by Izetbegović and the SDA. In the elections of 1990 the MBO won two seats in the parliamentary elections. On 24 May 2001 Zulfikarpašić founded and endowed the Bosnian Institute in Sarajevo, which promoted Bosnian culture. Zulfikarpašić's publications include Zbirka radova (Collection of speeches; 1971); Bosanski pogledi (Bosnian views; 1984); Bosanski Muslimani (Bosnian Muslims; 1986), Povratak u Bosnu (Return to Bosnia; 1990); and Članci i intervjui povodom 70-godisnjice (Articles and interviews on the occasion of my seventieth year; 1991). (JD)

ŽUPANČIČ Oton (23 January 1878, Weinitz [now Vinica, Slovenia]–11 June 1949, Ljubljana), Slovene poet. Župančič was born into a middle-class family. After graduating from high school in Ljubljana, he studied geography and history in Vienna (1896–1900). In 1899 he published the volume of poems Čaša opojnosti (Ecstasy cup), which reveals the influence of the French symbolists and the Viennese modernists. In 1900 he did his military service in Graz and then worked as a teacher. In 1904 he published the volume Čez plan (Across the fields). In 1905 he went to France and Germany, where he worked as a tutor. In 1908 he published Samogovori (Monologues), which is regarded as one of his best poetry volumes. In 1910 Župančič settled in Ljubljana, where he managed a theater from 1910 to 1912 and subsequently worked in the City Archives. From 1914 to 1917 he edited the literary periodicals Slovan and Ljublanski zvon. In 1915 he published Ciciban and Sto ugank (A hundred puzzles), children's books that became very popular with young readers. The year 1919 saw the publication of Mlada pota (Young paths), a selection of poems written between 1897 and 1915. In 1920 the poetry volume V zarje Vidove (Toward St. Vitus's auroras) appeared. By then regarded as one of the greatest Slovene poets, Župančič became director of the Slovene National Theater the same year. He translated many literary classics, including William Shakespeare and Molière. In 1924 he published Veronika Deseniška (Veronica of Desenice), a drama styled on Shakespearean tragedies that stirred up controversy. In 1934 he published Med ostrnicami (Among thistles), a series of poems showing the influence of Charles Baudelaire. In 1939 Župančič was elected to the Slovene Academy of Sciences and Arts. In 1943, during World War II, he became a member of the plenum led by the Communist-dominated Yugoslav National Liberation Front. In 1945 he published the volume Zimzelen pod snegom (A periwinkle under the snow), which included a call for struggle against the occupier: "Veš, poet, svoj dolg?" (Do you know your duty, poet?). After the war, Župančič became a member of the Slovene National Assembly. In 1948 he was awarded an honorary doctorate from the University of Ljubljana. (AO)

ŻYCIŃSKI Józef (1 September 1948, Stara Wieś, near Piotrków Trybunalski), metropolitan archbishop of Lublin, philosopher, and journalist. Życiński was born in the countryside into a socially mixed family. His father worked on the railways. Życiński studied at a seminary in Kraków (1966–72). He took holy orders in May 1972. He worked as a parish curate and then as an assistant dean, associate dean (1982–85), and dean (1988–91) of the Department of Philosophy of the Pontifical Academy of Theology in Kraków, where he earned a doctoral degree in theology in 1976. In 1978 he earned a Ph.D. in philosophy from the Academy of Catholic Theology in Warsaw. He also studied at the Catholic University in Washington, D.C., and at the Catholic University of Louvain, Belgium. In 1980 Życiński received the postdoctoral degree in the philosophy of science. In 1988 he became a full professor of philosophy at the Pontifical Academy of Theology in Kraków. He also holds the chair of Relations between Science and Faith at the Department of Philosophy of the Catholic University of Lublin. Życiński is a member of numerous learned societies in Poland and abroad, including the Evolutionary and Theoretical Biology Committee of the Polish Academy of Sciences, the European Academy of Sciences and Arts in Salzburg, and the Russian Academy of Natural Sciences in Moscow. He has authored dozens of scholarly works in the field of theology, philosophy, and philosophy of science, including the following: Wszczęświat i filozofia (The universe and philosophy; 1980; co-authored by Michał Heller); Język i metoda (Language and method; 1983); Teizm i filozofia analityczna (Theism and analytic philosophy, 2 vols.; 1985–86); W kręgu nauki i wiary (Between religion and science; 1989); and Bóg Abrahama i Whiteheada (The God of Abraham and Whitehead; 1992). In the 1980s Życiński contributed to periodicals in the uncensored press, including the political quarterly Krytyka. His Pisma z kraju Ubu (Letters from the land of Ubu; 1988), in which he described a state controlled by the secret police, were published in this quarterly's Biblioteka series.

On 29 June 1990 Życiński became bishop ordinary of the diocese of Tarnów, and on 14 June 1997, metropolitan archbishop of Lublin. He is, among other things, a member of the Pontifical Council for Culture and a member of the Vatican Congregation for Catholic Education. He is head of the Polish Episcopate's Council for Lay Apostolate and a member of several councils and commissions of the Polish Episcopate, including the Joint Commission of the Polish Episcopate and Government. He is chairman of the Program Council of the Catholic Information Agency. He has always opposed the formal engagement of clergymen in politics, but at the same time he has advocated that the Church should take a stand on important public issues and also that it should disclose its finances. He has called for an investigation and explanation of the crimes of the Communist regime in Poland. At the beginning of the 1990s he strongly protested attempts to legalize abortion in Poland, but at the same time he was against punishing women who had resorted to abortion. As the bishop of the diocese of Tarnów, Życiński was very active in the Polish-Ukrainian (Lemko) dialogue in the territory of this diocese. He returned the Greek Catholic churches to the Lemko community, and in a pastoral letter he condemned Operation Vistula (through which the Ukrainian population from the territories of southeastern Poland was deported in 1947). Życiński has publicly condemned the immoral practices of people who exercised power. He has also protested the abuse of religion, as well as religious intolerance and xenophobia. As a result, he is often attacked by ultra-conservative groups. Życiński has written many essays and columns that generalize the experiences of system transformation. They have been collected in (among other places) the volumes Na Zachód od domu niewoli (West of the house of slavery; 1997); Ziarno samotności (The seed of loneliness; 1997); and Bruderszaft z Kainem (Making friends with Cain; 1998). ZYGELBOIM Shmul Mordechai, pseudonym "Artur" (1895–11 May 1943, London), Jewish Socialist activist in Poland. Zygelboim came from a poor urban family and was one of thirteen siblings. He studied in a heder and on his own. He was a glover by trade. Before World War I Zygelboim joined the Universal Jewish Workers' Association Bund and was active in the Russian partition and later in Poland. From the mid-1920s Zygelboim wrote political articles, and in the 1930s he belonged to the Central Committee of the Bund. In September 1939 he fought in the defense of Warsaw, co-organizing workers' battalions, including about six thousand Jewish soldiers, many Bund members. After the capture of Warsaw by the Germans, Zygelboim was arrested on 28 September and held hostage, along with other well-known politicians—for example, Stefan Starzyński. After his release, he co-organized underground Bund activities. In December 1939 Zygelboim left the General Government on a false passport. Arrested at the Belgian border, he was released thanks to the intervention of the head of the Belgian Socialist Party, Henri Spaak, and continued his trip to Brussels, where he informed the international community about the Nazi persecution of Jews in occupied Poland.

After the capitulation of Belgium in 1940 Zygelboim left for France and in September 1940 for the United States. In New York he worked as a glover and continued his Bund activities. The party recommended him to the National Council of Poland in London. Thus in March 1942 Zygelboim moved to England. He studied secret reports from Poland and was one of the few who realized the mass nature of the massacre of Jews. He warned the West and attempted to influence the Allied governments to counteract the massacre, but in vain. Zygelboim also criticized the Polish government-in-exile for its ineffectiveness in helping the Jews. The Holocaust affected Zygelboim personally because the Germans killed his first wife and son. His second wife and other children also perished. Psychically broken by the news from Poland and by the hopelessness of the situation, after the failure of the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising Zygelboim committed suicide. In a farewell letter he explained the move as a protest against the indifference of the Western governments to the tragedy of the Jews and the insufficient response of the Polish government-in-exile. ŻYMIERSKI Michał [originally Łyżwiński], pseudonym “Rola” (4 September 1890, Kraków–15 October 1989, Warsaw), Polish general. After graduating from high school, Żymierski began to study law at the Jagiellonian University in Kraków in 1910. He then joined a secret organization called Armia Polska (Polish Army) and did one year of military service in Tyrol. During World War I Żymierski served in the Polish Legions as commander of a battalion and later as commander of an infantry regiment. At that time he was regarded as one of the more courageous officers, and in 1915 he briefly headed the secret Polish Military Organization (Polska Organizacja Wojskowa [POW]). In November 1918 he joined the Polish Army. During the Polish-Soviet war Żymierski served as commander of a brigade and then commander of the Second Infantry Division. From 1921 to 1923 he studied at the Ecole Supérieure de Guerre (War College) in Paris and underwent training in the French General Staff. Promoted to general in 1924, Żymierski became deputy chief of the army administration for weaponry in the Ministry of Military Affairs. During the coup of May 1926 he supported the government. After the coup, he was accused of accepting a bribe for buying gas masks from a French supplier, and he was sentenced to several years in prison. In 1931 Żymierski went to France, where he began working with the Communist movement and, in 1932, anian literature and wrote her first stories in Lithuanian, including “Rudens vakaras” (Autumn winter; 1895) and “Piršlybos” (Matchmakers; 1895). Višinskis suggested that she should use the pseudonym “Žemaitė” (Samogitian woman). Žymantienė’s works became classics of Lithuanian realist literature, conspicuously depicting the backwardness and ignorance of the peasants and the injustices of rural life. In her prose, Žymantienė presented the Polish nobility as an alien group that demoralized the peasants. She also described the difficult social situation of women. In 1912 Žymantienė moved to Vilnius, where she contributed to Lietuvos Žinios from 1913 to 1915. After Germany occupied Lithuania, she went to Petrograd and in 1916 to the United States, where she raised funds for Lithuanian war victims. In 1917 she joined the Social Democratic Party. Despite her socially radical and anti-clerical views, Žymantienė opposed Bolshevism. “Marti” (Daughter-in-law) is the best known of her stories. Shortly before her death, Žymantienė returned to Lithuania. A four-volume edition of her stories was published in 1924–31. (WR)

Promoted to general in 1924, Żymierski became deputy chief of the army administration for weaponry in the Ministry of Military Affairs. During the coup of May 1926 he supported the government. After the coup, he was accused of accepting a bribe for buying gas masks from a French supplier, and he was sentenced to several years in prison. In 1931 Żymierski went to France, where he began working with the Communist movement and, in 1932, with the Soviet intelligence services. Records exist of his earnings from that period. Records have been found that show that he was paid by the Soviets for information on Polish officers. In 1938 he returned to Poland and unsuccessfully tried to return to military service.

During the Nazi occupation Żymierski maintained contacts with a Communist group called Hammer and Sickle. In August 1943 he became military adviser to the People's Guard (Gwardia Ludowa [GL]). He took part in the inaugural session of the National Home Council (Krajowa Rada Narodowa [KRN]) on New Year's Eve of 1943–44, and then he was appointed commander-in-chief of the People's Army (Armia Ludowa). As a prewar general, Żymierski was politically attractive to the Communists, but he did not enjoy the trust of the leaders of the Polish Workers' Party (Polska Partia Robotnicza [PPR]). Promoted to lieutenant general in July 1944, Żymierski was a member of a KRN delegation to negotiations held in Moscow with the Soviet government and the Soviet-controlled Union of Polish Patriots (Związek Patriotów Polskich [ZPP]). Żymierski was appointed head of the national defense department of the Polish Committee of National Liberation (Polski Komitet Wyzwolenia Narodowego [PKWN]) and commander-in-chief of the new Polish Army. During the Warsaw Uprising he declared that he would move on the capital and, after liberating it, punish those who had started the uprising. Appointed minister of defense in the provisional government, Żymierski held this post in the Provisional Government of National Unity (Tymczasowy Rząd Jedności Narodowej [TRJN]; June 1945–February 1947) and in the government headed by Józef Cyrankiewicz. On 3 May 1945, by a decision of the KRN, he was made marshal of Poland.

A secret member of the PPR, Żymierski was a puppet in the hands of the Communists and of Soviet advisers and officers, after the end of the war as well. His presence gave credibility to the Communist authorities, and during his numerous inspections of military units, he confirmed soldiers' beliefs that they were serving Poland. After the end of World War II, he was awarded the Order of Victory by the Soviet Union and the Legion of Merit by the United States. As minister of defense, Żymierski complied with all the orders of the PPR and (after December 1948) the Polish United Workers' Party (Polska Zjednoczona Partia Robotnicza [PUWP]). For example, he endorsed the persecution of the Polish pro-independence underground, tolerated the criminal activities of the Main Information Board, and approved almost all death sentences against prewar officers of the Polish Army. Although he loyally followed the directives of the Communists and the Kremlin, at the end of the 1940s Żymierski was no longer needed. On 6 November 1949 he was dismissed "on his own request" to make place for Soviet marshal Konstantin Rokossovsky, who became minister of defense. Żymierski was still a member of the Council of State, but after the arrest of Władysław Gomułka's associates, including Marian Spychalski, dark clouds began to gather over Żymierski at the beginning of the 1950s. After the intelligence services arrested his brother, Stanisław, in late November 1952, an investigation was also instituted against Żymierski. He was dismissed from the Council of State. On 14 March 1953 he was arrested and accused of collaborating with French intelligence. After more than two years of interrogation, he was released on 19 August 1955. In April 1956 the investigation was discontinued. In December 1956 Żymierski was appointed vice-president of the National Bank of Poland. In December 1967 he retired. Often referred to as the patron of the "People's" Polish Army, Żymierski continued to be invited to celebrations organized by the (Communist) Association of Fighters for Freedom and Democracy (Związek Bojowników o Wolność i Demokrację) in the 1970s and 1980s. At the Ninth Extraordinary PUWP Congress in July 1981 Żymierski became a member of the CC and held this position until July 1986, the oldest member of this body ever. (WR)
