Sources: Slovník slovenských spisovateľ'ov (Prague, 1999); Literary zachodniosłowiańskie czasu przełomów 1890–1990, vol. 1 (Katowice, 1994); Pamiatke Jozefa Cígera Hronského (Middletown, Pa., 1960); Jozef M. Rydlo, "Svet na Trasovisku" nell' opera letteraria di J. C. Hronský (Padua, 1971); Jozef M. Rydlo, Jozef Cíger Hronský, 1896–1960: Abbozzo bibliografico (Vatican City, 1973); Alexander Matuška, J. C. Hronský (Bratislava, 1979); Biografické štúdie, vol. 19, 1992; Augustín Mat'ovčík, Jozef Cíger-Hronský: Životná drama (Martin, 1995); Biografické štúdie, vol. 24, 1997.

HROZNÝ Bedřich (6 May 1879, Lysá on the Elbe, near Nymburk—12 December 1952, Prague), Czech orientalist, pioneer of Hittite studies. The son of a Protestant minister, in 1897–1901 Hrozný studied in Vienna, first Protestant theology and then old oriental languages and the ancient history of Asia Minor. In 1901–2 he also studied Assyrian civilization in Berlin and London, and later he worked in the Vienna university library. In 1904–5 he went to explore in the Middle East for the first time. From 1905 he was associate professor, and from 1915 full professor, at the University of Vienna. In 1919 he became full professor at Charles University in Prague, and in 1922 he co-founded the Institute of Oriental Studies in Prague. From 1929 he was editor-in-chief of the periodical Archiv orientální. A member of the Czech Academy of Sciences and Arts and the Czech Royal Research Society, in 1939 and 1945 he was rector of Charles University.

Hrozný made his literary debut with works on ancient Babylon—for instance, Das Getreide im alten Babylonien (Grain in ancient Babylon; 1914). In 1914 he started studying cuneiform texts written in an unknown language. He discovered that it was the Hittite language of the seventeenth–thirteenth centuries B.C. and that it belonged to the Indo-European group. In the course of further research Hrozný managed to decipher the Hittite records and elaborated Hittite grammar and history. His major works of this time included Die Sprache der Hethiter, ihr Bau und Zugehörigkeit zum indogermanischen Sprachstamm

(The Hittite language, its structure and Indo-European nature; 1917); Hethitische Keilschrifttexte aus Boghazköy in Umschrift mit Übersetzung und Kommentar (Hittite cuneiform texts from Boghazköy phonetically recorded with translation and interpretation; 1919); and Základy chetitského jazyka (Foundations of the Hittite language; 1922). During archaeological excavations in 1924–25 Hrozný discovered the old Assyrian city of Kanesh and its archive of Assyrian merchants from the nineteenth century B.C., including about one thousand Cappadocian tablets with the oldest form of Assyrian cuneiform records. He also conducted excavations in Syria and Palestine, where he discovered the first traces of the Amurru culture. In the 1930s Hrozný partially deciphered Hittite hieroglyphs. He gathered his discoveries into two syntheses: Die älteste Geschichte Vorderasiens (The oldest history of Asia Minor; 1940) and Nejstarší dějiny Přední Asie, Indie, a Kréty (The oldest history of Asia Minor, India, and Crete; 1943). (PU)

Sources: ČBS; Lubor Matouš, Bedřich Hrozný: The Life and Work of a Czech Oriental Scholar (Prague, 1949); Lubor Matouš, Stopami zašlých kultur: O práci prof. Bedřicha Hrozného (Prague, 1949); Vojtěch Zamarovský, Za tajemstvím říše Chetitů (Prague, 1961); Jiří Prosecký, Akademik Bedřich Hrozný: Bibliografie 1902–1979 (Prague, 1979).

HRUSHEVSKYI Mykhailo (29 September 1866, Chełm [now in Poland]—25 November 1934, Kislovodsk), prominent Ukrainian historian, academic organizer, and politician. Hrushevskiy was born into the family of a Slavist and pedagogue from the Kiev region. In 1869 the family moved to Transcaucasia, where in 1886 Hrushevskiy graduated from a gymnasium (high school) in Tiflis (Tbilisi, Georgia). From 1886 to 1890 he studied in the Department of Philology and History of Kiev University under the supervision of Volodymyr Antonovych. Hrushevskiy remained at Kiev University, where he wrote and defended his Ph.D. thesis, Ocherk istorii Kievskoi zemli ot smerti Iaroslava do kontsa 14 veka (An outline of the history of the Kievan lands from the death of Yaroslav to the end of the fourteenth century; 1891), and his post-doctoral thesis, Barskoe starostvo: Istoricheskie ocherki (Bar County: A historical survey; 1894). From 1894 to 1913 he held the chair of world history, with special emphasis on the history of Eastern Europe, at the University of Lemberg (Lwów, Lviv). In view of the Polish character of this university, apart from his university work, Hrushevskiy concentrated on developing the Shevchenko Scientific Society (NTSh), and through concerted organizational, fund-raising, and research efforts he successfully promoted its transformation into a genuine Ukrainian academy of sciences. In 1894

Hrushevskyi became director of the Historical-Philosophical Section of the NTSh, and from 1897 to 1913 he was its president. Between 1895 and 1913 he published the bi-monthly Zapysky NTSh. He also initiated, and served as chief editor of two series of NTSh source publications, Zherela do istorii Ukrainy-Rusy (Sources for the study of the history of Ukraine-Rus) and Pam'iatky ukrains'korus'koi movy i literatury (Souvenirs of the Ukrainian-Ruthenian language and literature). In these series he published his collected articles and theses, Rozvidky i materiialy do istorii Ukrainy-Rusy (Studies and materials on the history of Ukraine-Rus, 5 vols.; 1896–1902). He also taught many Ukrainian historians who would later become prominent.

In 1898, along with Ivan Franko, Hrushevskyi began publishing the periodical Literaturno-Naukovyi Visnyk. Until 1914 this periodical was the most important forum for the exchange of views among the Ukrainian cultural and political elite (from 1907 it was published in Kiev). In 1898 in Lviv, Hrushevskyi published the first volume of his opus magnum, Istoriia Ukrainy-Rusy (The history of Ukraine-Rus; 1997). By 1937, ten volumes of this work had been published, covering Ukrainian history from the earliest times to 1658. The series contributed not only to the consolidation of Ukrainian national consciousness, but also to the widespread adoption of the name “Ukraine.” Hrushevskyi offered a new interpretation of the nation’s history and established a paradigm for a separate Ukrainian historical process. This was a challenge to Russian historiography, which depicted the history of the so-called Little Russia from the perspective of the imperialist tsarist state, as a result of which the existence of a Ukrainian nation had not been recognized. In Zvychnaia skhema “ruskoi” istorii i sprava ratsional’noho ukladu istorii shkidnoho Slov’ianstva (A schematic of “Russian” history and the question of a rational system of East Slavonic history, published in Stati po slavianovedeniiu, part 1, 1904) Hrushevskyi rejected the Russian concept of the continuity of the history of Eastern Europe from the ninth to the nineteenth centuries, from Kiev through Vladimir on the Klyazma River to Moscow, in favor of a concept that excluded Russia (Kiev—Halicz-Volhynian Duchy—southern part of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania—the Cossack state—Ukrainian revival of the nineteenth century). Although his interpretation of Ukrainian history, the so-called Narodnik interpretation, had been the subject of criticism and conflicting interpretations for twenty years already, the above-mentioned scheme was accepted by independent twentieth-century Ukrainian historiography as the basic scheme for the periodization of Ukrainian history.

In his later publications, Hrushevskyi put more emphasis upon the history of statehood in Ukraine, yet his “Narodnik” point of view manifested itself in, among other things, the rejection of the so-called Norman theory of the origin of Rus. A concise version of his synthesis was published in 1904 as Ocherk istorii ukrains'koho naroda (An outline of Ukrainian history). A more popular version of the work, titled Iliustrovana istoriia Ukrainy (Illustrated history of Ukraine), was published in 1911. After the 1905 revolution, Hrushevskyi was more and more strongly associated with Ukrainian scholarly and political life in Russia. In 1906 he worked in St. Petersburg and from 1907 in Kiev. His views on the Ukrainian question crystallized as Socialist, democratic, and federalist and found their expression in, among other works, Osvobozhdenie Rossii i ukrainskii vopros (The liberation of Russia and the Ukrainian question; 1907). An active publicist, Hrushevskyi was the founder of the Ukrainian Scientific Society in Kiev (1907) and the Society of Ukrainian Progressives (1908). He emerged as an established leader of the Ukrainian movement already before World War I.

Arrested after the outbreak of World War I, Hrushevskyi was exiled to Simbirsk, then to Kazan, and finally to Moscow, and he remained under police supervision. Released soon after the outbreak of the February 1917 revolution, on 17 March 1917 he was elected president of the Kiev-based Ukrainian Central Rada (UCR), which served as a provisional Ukrainian parliament. Hrushevskyi became one of the leaders of the Ukrainian Party of Socialist Revolutionaries (UPSR), which dominated within the UCR. Immediately after the Bolshevik coup in Petrograd, he supported the proclamation of independence of the Ukrainian People’s Republic (UPR), and on 29 April 1918 the UCR elected him its first president. However, because of the coup staged in Kiev by Hetman Pavlo Skoropadsky and because of the collapse of the UPR, Hrushevskyi’s nomination was only symbolic. During the revolution Hrushevskyi published Vilna Ukraina (Free Ukraine; 1917), Na porozhi novoi Ukrainy: Hadki i mrii (On the threshold of a new Ukraine: Thoughts and dreams; 1918), and other works. In 1919 he emigrated to Vienna, where he sought the support of European countries for the UPR. He was a member of the UPSR Foreign Committee and published the party’s organ, Boritiesia—Poborete! (1920–22). Above all, however, he continued his scholarly work. In 1919 he founded the Ukrainian Sociological Institute in Vienna (which was later moved to Prague). Hrushevskyi’s publications include Pochatky hromadians'tva (henetychna sotsiologhiia) (Origins of society [genetic sociology]; 1921) and Z istorii relihiinoi dumky na Ukraini (On the history of religious thought in Ukraine; 1925). He also began writing another work, Istoriia ukrains'koi literatury (History of Ukrainian literature, 5 vols.; 1922–27). His autobiography, Autobiohrafia, was published posthumously in 1965.

Encouraged by the announcement of the Ukrainization policy of the Ukrainian SSR, in 1924 Hrushevskyy decided to accept an invitation from Kharkiv and returned to the Ukraine, where he continued his scholarly work. Elected a member of the All-Ukrainian Academy of Sciences, he assumed the leadership of an archaeographic commission and held the chair of modern Ukrainian history. He initiated a series of historical and ethnological research projects, published the periodical Ukraina (1924–30), and edited publications by young historians. He established relations with the NTSh in Lwów, paving the way for the transborder unity of Ukrainian scholarly activity. After the Ukrainization policy was abandoned and the Stalinization of science began, Hrushevskyy was accused of nationalism and of defying the Marxist vision of the historical process. In March 1931 he was transferred to Moscow, while the institutions as well as the school of history he had established were abolished. He continued his scholarly work until the end of his life. He died in 1934 in the Caucasus, where he went for medical treatment. He was buried in Kiev. Until the end of the USSR, the Soviet regime continued to combat his scheme of Ukrainian history. Hrushevskyy left over 1,800 publications in the field of history, archaeology, sociology, and ethnology, as well as fairytales, dramas, and stories. (TS)

Sources: Encyclopedia of Ukraine, vol. 2 (Toronto, 1988); MERSH, vol. XIC; Dmytro Doroshenko, Ohliad ukrains'koi istoriografii (Prague, 1923); Iuvilei akademika M. S. Hrushevs'koho 1866–1926 (Kiev, 1927); Ukrains'kyi istoryk, (1966 and 1984, special editions); Lubomyr Vynar, Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi i Naukove Tovarystvo im. Tarasa Shevchenka 1892–1930 (Munich, 1970); Lubomyr Vynarm ed., Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi 1866–1934: Bibliographic Sources (New York, Munich, and Toronto, 1985); T. Prymak, Mykhailo Hrushevsky and the Politics of National Culture (Toronto, 1987); O. Kopilenko, “Ukrains'ka ideia” Mykhaily Hrushevs'koho: Istoriia i suchasnist' (Kiev, 1991); Ruslan I. Pyrik, Zhyttia Mykhailo Hrushevskoho ostannie diiatylyetia, 1924–1934 (Kiev, 1993); Gennadii Strel's'kyi, Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi, ioho spodyvzhnyky i oponenty (Kiev, 1996); I. Hrytsak and I. Dashkevych, eds., Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi i ukrains'ka istorychna nauka (Lviv, 1999).

HRYB Miechyslau (28 September 1938, Saviche, Grodno region), Soviet security officer, Belorussian post-Communist activist. In 1967 Hryb graduated extramurally from the Belorussian State University in Minsk. In 1959–81 he worked in the Vitebsk regional structures of the Ministry of Interior of the Belorussian SSR (BSSR). From 1981 he was head of the Public Order Protection Administration of the Belorussian Ministry of Interior, and from 1985, head of the Administration of Internal Affairs of the Regional Committee in Vitebsk. In 1985 the Vitebsk militia managed to arrest a serial killer of women (forty-three victims), but the success proved to compromise the Soviet judiciary because thirteen innocent people had already been sentenced for these crimes. In 1993 Hryb was promoted to the rank of militia general. From 1990 he was deputy of the BSSR Supreme Council and head of its Commission of National Security, Defense, and Combating Crime. On 28 January 1994, on the initiative of hard-liner deputies of the former Communist nomenklatura, Hryb replaced Stanislau Shushkevich as chairman of the Belorussian Supreme Council, serving as the formal head of state. He was reelected to the Supreme Council in 1995, and he was its chairman until 10 January 1996. From November 1996 Hryb went into opposition to the system created by Alyaksandr Lukashenka. Later he was chairman of the Belorussian Euroatlantic Association, a member of the Belorussian Helsinki Committee, and (from 1999) deputy chairman of the Belorussian Social Democratic party Narodnaya Hramada (National Community). Hryb authored Belarus na shlahkakh nezalezhnasti (Belarus on the roads to independence; 1994). (EM)

Sources: Bielaruskaia entsiklopiiedyia, vol. 5 (Minsk, 1995); Belarus: Entsiklopedychny davednik (Minsk, 1995); Jan Zaprudnik, Historical Dictionary of Belarus (Lanham, Md., 1998); Kto iest kto v Respublike Belarus (Minsk, 1999); David R. Marples, Belarus: A Denationalization of a Nation (Amsterdam, 1999).

HRYHORENKO Petro [also known as Grigorenko] (16 October 1907, Borysivka, Zaporozhye–21 February 1987, New York), Soviet general and dissident of Ukrainian descent. From his youth Hryhorenko was active in the Komsomol, and in 1929–31 he was a member of its Central Committee in the Ukraine. A member of the Communist Party from 1927, in 1929–31 he studied at the Technological Institute in Kharkiv. From 1931 he was in the army, and he graduated from the Kuibyshev Military Engineering Academy. In 1934–37 he served in the Belorussian military district and studied at the Academy of the General Staff; in 1939–43 he served in the Far East. In 1944–45 he fought on the front line and was twice wounded. He ended the war as the chief of staff of a division with the rank of colonel. Awarded the Order of Lenin and other orders, from 1945 to 1961 he lectured at the Frunze Military Academy and from 1959 was chair of one of its departments, with the rank of major general.

At a party conference in 1961, Hryhorenko spoke in favor of free elections, so he was banned from teaching and sent to serve in the Far East. In 1963 he organized the illegal Union of Struggle for the Rebirth of Leninism. He published seven leaflets condemning the Soviet bureaucracy and its policies toward workers. He distributed them in Moscow, Kaluga, and the Leningrad and Middle Asiatic Military Districts. Arrested in 1964, Hryhorenko was sent to the psychiatric ward of the Serbski Institute, where, according to the Soviet practice of that time, he was found mentally ill. In July 1964 the Supreme Court of the USSR sent him to Leningrad for forced psychiatric treatment. A month later he was expelled from the army and demoted. After his release in 1965 Hryhorenko worked as a watchman, guide, and construction worker. He drew closer to the Moscow dissidents and became engaged in the struggle for the rights of deported nationals, mainly the Crimean Tatars.

In the fall of 1967 Hryhorenko wrote a secretly distributed pamphlet, Sokrytye istoricheskoy pravdy: Prestupleniye pered narodom! (Hiding historical truth: Crime against the nation!), in which he accused Stalin for the Red Army defeats in 1941. In 1967–68 he was one of the organizers of a petition campaign in defense of Aleksandr Ginzburg and Yuriy Galanskov; in 1968 he spoke in favor of the Prague Spring and co-authored a letter to members of the Communist Party of Czechoslovakia and the Czechoslovak nation in which he enthusiastically welcomed “socialism with a human face.” At the end of 1968 he wrote an essay on Soviet psychiatric wards that was included in Natalya Gorbanevskaya’s Red Square at Noon (1972). In May 1969, just before another trial of Crimean Tatars in Tashkent, in which he wanted to appear as their defense counsel, Hryhorenko was arrested again. In 1970 he was again sent for forced psychiatric treatment. The academician Andrei Sakharov and the international community spoke in his defense. In 1973 a collection of Hryhorenko’s texts was published as Mysli sumasshedshego (Thoughts of a madman). Released on 24 June 1974, on the eve of Richard Nixon’s visit to the USSR, Hryhorenko spoke in defense of Mustafa Dzhemilev, leader of the Crimean Tatars, and of Sakharov, who was attacked by Soviet propaganda after receiving the Nobel Prize. The Grigorenko Papers, illustrating his case, were published in the United States in 1976. In 1976–77 Hryhorenko was one of the key organizers and activists of the Moscow Helsinki Group. On his initiative a commission was established to examine the use of psychiatry as a tool for political repression. In 1976 Hryhorenko co-founded the Ukrainian Helsinki Group (UHG), and in 1977 he published a booklet, Nashi budni (Our everyday), on the KGB operations against the Helsinki movement. In November 1977 he was allowed to go to the United States for half a year; while there, he was deprived of his Soviet citizenship. He stayed in America, where he was the UHG representative. He finally abandoned communism. In 1981 he published the memoirs W podpole mozžno vstretit tolko krysy (You can only meet rats in the underground; translated as Memoirs, 1982). By virtue of a decree by Russian president Boris Yeltsin, in 1993 Hryhorenko’s military rank was posthumously restored to him. A street in Kiev and several streets in the Crimea bear his name. In 1997 Hryhorenko was posthumously awarded the Ukrainian Order for Bravery. (BB)

Sources: Encyclopedia of Ukraine, vol. 2 (Toronto, 1988); Bohdan Nahaylo, The Ukrainian Resurgence (Toronto, 1999); Ukrainska Hromadska Hrupa spryannia vykonanni Helinskykh uhod (Kharkiv, 2001); Dovidnyk z istoriyi Ukrainy (Kiev, 2001).

HRYHORIIV Matvii Nykyfor (1885, Zastavie, Podolia–27 July 1919, Ukraine), Ukrainian military leader. Hryhoriiv served in the Russian Army and attained the rank of captain. Under the rule of Hetman Pavlo Skoropadsky and later under the rule of the Directorate of the Ukrainian National Republic, he assembled around 6,000–8,000 soldiers under his command in the region of Alexandria and Mykolayiv (also spelled Nikolayev). He recruited his soldiers mainly among anarchists and splinter groups of Socialist revolutionaries, called “Borotbists” after the title of a newspaper. In January 1919 Hryhoriiv rebelled against the Directorate when it forbade his soldiers to fight against the Allied troops that had intervened against the Bolsheviks. He became allied with the Bolshevik government in Kharkiv, and between February and April 1919 his fifteen-thousand-strong troops played a key role in offensives against the Whites and Allied forces in the regions of Mykolayiv, Kherson, and Odessa. In early May 1919 the Bolsheviks ordered Hryhoriiv to lead his troops against the Romanians to support the Hungarian Soviet Republic, but he refused. He proclaimed himself ataman of the Ukraine and organized an anti-Bolshevik uprising in the region of Kherson and Yekaterinoslav. During the revolt his troops committed pogroms against the Jewish population. Since the Red Army managed to crush the revolt, his troops joined forces with the anarchist units of Nestor Makhno. Soon a sharp conflict broke out between Hryhoriiv and Makhno. Hryhoriiv demanded that they support the army of General Anton Denikin against the Bolsheviks. Makhno opposed Hryhoriiv’s plans and ordered that he be shot. (WR)

Sources: Encyclopedia of Ukraine, vol. 2 (Toronto, 1988); Matthew Stachiv and Jaroslav Sztendera, eds., Western Ukraine at the Turning Point of Europe’s History, 1918–1923, vols. 1–2 (New York, 1971); Paul R. Magocsi, A History of Ukraine (Seattle, 1996); Orest Subtelny, Ukraine: A History (Toronto, 2000).

HURBAN VAJANSKÝ Svetozár [originally Svetozár Miloslav Hurban] (16 January 1847, Hlboké–17 August 1916, Turčiansky Svätý Martin [Martin]), Slovak politician, writer, and conservative national ideologist. Hurban Vajanský came from a small-town Protestant family. His father, Pastor Jozef Miloslav Hurban, was one of the most prominent representatives of the Slovak national movement. Hurban Vajanský completed law studies in Bratislava, and in 1878 settled in Turčiansky Svätý Martin. From 1878 he was editor of the newspaper Národné noviny; from 1898 to 1899 and from 1906 to 1916 he was its editor-in-chief. From 1878 to 1880 he also edited the periodical Orol, and from 1881, Slovenské pohľady, of which he became the owner in 1890. He continued to publish it until 1916. Hurban Vajanský was imprisoned several times for his journalism. From the end of the 1870s he was the leading ideologist of the Slovak National Party (Slovenská Národná Strana [SNP]), and he co-formed the so-called Martin center of the national movement. He held high posts in the leadership of the party, but it was his extensive journalistic work that assured his position. His editorials in Národné noviny were regarded as the official line of the SNP.

Hurban Vajanský is regarded as a leading representative of the conservative trend in the Slovak national movement at the turn of the twentieth century. An ardent Russophile, he transferred Russian Pan-Slavic ideas to the Slovak soil. As he believed that ethnic issues in Central Europe would be resolved by Russian intervention, he advocated passive resistance. He feared the political engagement of the masses and assigned the task of preserving the national culture to the intelligentsia, which he regarded as the “nation pars pro toto.” The work Nálady a vyhl'ady (Attitudes and perspectives; 1897) is considered a synthesis of his views. From the launch of the periodical Hlas, edited by Pavol Blaho and Vavro Šrobár in 1897, Hurban Vajanský carried on intense disputes with young Slovak intellectuals who rejected his elitist concept of the nation and his Pan-Slavism. He accused them of destroying the unity of the national movement, as well as cosmopolitanism and yielding to the Czechs. Hurban Vajanský was seen as the most important critic of the idea of the “Czechoslovak nation” and as the main ideological opponent of Tomáš Garrigue Masaryk in Slovakia. He is regarded as a co-founder of modern literary criticism and a precursor of artistic criticism. In 1880 Hurban Vajanský made his debut as a poet with the collection Tatry a more (The Tatras and the sea). In his prose works—for example, the novella Letiace tiene (Passing shadows; 1883) and the novel Suchá ratolest' (Dry shoot; 1884)—he dealt with the concerns of the upper classes, unfolding Utopian visions of the Magyarized nobility of Slovak origins uniting with the nationally conscious intelligentsia. The novel Kotlín

(1901), a polemic with the Hlasists (Hlasisty), gave rise to Slovak modernism. Hurban Vajanský's selected works of literary criticism were published in the volumes State o slovenskej literatúre (Articles on Slovak literature; 1956) and State o svetovej literatúre (Articles on world literature; 1957). (MG)

Sources: Biographisches Lexikon, vol. 2; Reprezentačný biografický lexikón Slovenska (Martin, 1999); Literatúra zachodnoslovenského času prelomových rokov 1890–1990, vol. 1 (Katowice, 1994); Ol'ga Nagyová, Mladý Vajanský ako novinár (Bratislava, 1973); Ján Juríček, Vajanský: Portrét odvážneho (Bratislava, 1988); Ivan Kusý, Zrelý Vajanský (Bratislava, 1992); Zdzisław Niedziela, Słowacja znana i nieznaną: Szkice z dziejów literatury słowackiej (Kraków, 1995); Zdenek Jančí, Svetozár Hurban Vajanský: Kritik výtvarného umenia (Nitra, 1998).

HUSÁK Gustav (10 January 1913, Dúbravka, near Bratislava–18 November 1991, Bratislava), Czechoslovak Communist leader. Born into a peasant family, at sixteen Husák joined the Communist Youth Union in Bratislava. He joined the Slovak branch of the Communist Party of Czechoslovakia (CPC) in 1933 while studying at the Law Department of the university in Bratislava. He co-founded a circle of leftist intellectuals that centered around Vladimír Clementis and the periodical DAV. These intellectuals actively participated in ideological discussions about the future of Slovakia. At that time Husák became known as an opponent of a centralized state model. After the outbreak of World War II, he was in opposition to the government of Reverend Jozef Tiso. In August 1943 Husák joined the Central Committee (CC) of the Communist Party of Slovakia (CPS). Following the guidelines laid down by the leadership of the CPC in Moscow, at that time he insisted on the necessity of creating a broader platform in the struggle against the local regime and Nazi Germany. He took part in signing the so-called Christmas Treaty (concluded on 24 December 1943) and in the establishment of the underground Slovak National Council (SNC). As a representative of the SNC, he established contact with representatives of the military underground who supported Lieutenant Colonel Jan Golian. After the outbreak of the Slovak National Uprising in August 1944, Husák moved to Banská Bystrica, the center of the insurgency, where he became vice-president of the SNC and was in charge of its interior department. After the collapse of the uprising, he became a member of the Presidium of the Board of Commissioners of the SNC in February 1945, and he tried to recruit members of all opposition groups into the SNC. In January 1945, along with a group of Slovak Communists, Husák was in Moscow, where they were presented with a project to establish a new government center in Czechoslovakia. This government center was to include representatives of the government-in-exile and the local Communists. In February 1945 Husák joined the Presidium of the CC of the CPS and, as its interim president, prepared the program for Slovak autonomy within the Czechoslovak state.

After the elections to the National Assembly (May 1946), on 13 August 1946 Husák became president of the Board of Commissioners of the SNC. Among other things, he was in charge of the interior department and of the state security organs. He called for moving the German and Hungarian minorities out of Slovakia and for the radical suppression of Reverend Tiso's lieutenants. His security services prepared a number of actions against the opponents of the Communist regime—for example, against the Slovak Democratic Party—and they launched persecutions against the Catholic Church. After the coup of February 1948, despite Husák's protests, a tight rein was put on the autonomy of the Slovaks and the CPS. Husák's career collapsed in May 1950, when the Ninth Congress of the CPS denounced "Slovak bourgeois nationalism" among party members. In February 1951 Husák and other leading activists were expelled from the party and arrested for so-called nationalist deviation. Despite being tortured during interrogations, Husák refused to testify against the other accused, and he did not confess guilt in the crimes for which he was accused. Sentenced to life imprisonment in April 1954, he was released in 1960 and was fully rehabilitated in 1963. Husák rejected the post of deputy prime minister, which was offered to him, and took up research at the Institute of State and Law of the Slovak Academy of Sciences. In August 1964 he published his memoirs from the period of his underground activity; in them he defended the model and strategy of the CPS. The publication of these memoirs was an important event.

Husák was one of Alexander Dubček's associates when the latter launched his reform program. In April 1968 he became deputy prime minister. After the invasion of Czechoslovakia by Warsaw Pact troops, between 23 and 26 August 1968, along with other party and state leaders, Husák took part in talks in Moscow in which the Czechoslovak delegation accepted the reversal of the Prague Spring reforms. During the talks in Moscow he gained the trust of Leonid Brezhnev. It is believed that during confidential talks Brezhnev promised Husák that Moscow would accept a federal model for the Czechoslovak state. Soon after returning to Czechoslovakia, Husák sharply criticized the Fourteenth Extraordinary Congress of the CPC, the so-called Vysočany Congress, which protested the intervention of Warsaw Pact troops and called for the continuation of reforms. Husák stressed that the Vysočany Congress was not representative because less than 10 percent of the Slovak delegates attended it. At the end of August 1968 Husák became first secretary of the CC of the CPS and a member of the Presidium of the CC of the CPC. In the autumn of 1968 he was appointed head of a government commission that drafted a bill on the Czechoslovak federation, passed on 27 October 1968. However, as a ruler, Husák aimed at maintaining a centralist model of the state.

On 17 April 1969 Dubček had to resign, and Husák succeeded him as first secretary of the CC of the CPC. Using the slogan of "normalization," he brought about the pacification of the reformist forces within the party and in the society at large. On 6 May 1970 he signed an agreement of friendship, cooperation, and mutual assistance with the USSR that sanctioned the "temporary" stationing of Soviet troops on Czechoslovak territory. In May 1971, at a session of the Fourteenth Congress of the CPC, Husák was elected secretary general of the party. The ruling team formed at that time remained virtually unchanged until November 1989. On 29 May 1975 Husák added the post of president to his other titles.

After 1969 Husák carried out a great purge of the CPC that resulted in expelling all party activists who did not accept the policy of total subordination to Moscow. Within a few years the number of party members dropped by over half a million, and around 140,000 people emigrated. People considered enemies of the system were not allowed to practice in their professions. As part of the "normalization" process, a tough struggle was introduced against independent intellectuals and against the structures of the Catholic Church. This struggle involved attempts to recruit the clergy into pro-government organizations and block the appointment of new bishops. Although in the spring of 1969 Husák announced that he would not persecute his political opponents, after the launch of Charter 77, its leading signatories were sentenced in political trials.

The advent of Mikhail Gorbachev in Moscow and the changes he initiated gradually undermined the power of Husák, who was an avowed opponent of glasnost and perestroika. On 17 December 1987 he resigned as secretary general of the CC of the CPC. Until the end he refused to enter into talks with the opposition. After mass demonstrations and strikes, in December 1989 he had to accept the so-called government of national agreement of Marian Čalfa, which consisted of representatives of both the CPC and the opposition. On 10 December 1989 Husák resigned as president of Czechoslovakia and was soon thereafter expelled from the CPC. (AGr)

Sources: Kdo byl kdo v našich dějinách ve 20 století (Prague, 1994); Gordon H. Skilling, Czechoslovakia's Interrupted Revolution (Princeton, 1976); Vladimír V. Kusín, From Dubček to Charter 77:

A Study of "Normalization" in Czechoslovakia 1968–1978 (New York, 1978); Jerzy Tomaszewski, Europa Środkowo-Wschodnia 1944–1968: Powstanie, ewolucja i kryzys realnego socjalizmu (Warsaw, 1992); Jan Pešek, Štátna bezpečnosť na Slovensku 1948–1953 (Bratislava, 1999); Dušan Kováč, Dejiny Slovenska (Prague, 2000); Jan Pešek, Nástroj represie a politickej kontroly: Štátna bezpečnosť na Slovensku 1953–1970 (Bratislava, 2000).

HUSZÁR Károly [originally Schorn] (10 September 1882, Vienna–29 October 1941, Budapest), Hungarian politician. A teacher by training, from 1903 Huszár became actively engaged with Christian Democratic peasant movements and parties. From 1910 to 1918 he represented the Catholic National Party in the parliament. At the same time he was editor-in-chief of its newspaper, Néppárt. During World War I he fought on a number of fronts as a volunteer. Just before the republican coup in November 1918, he was appointed minister of education and denominations. He was arrested in 1919, when the Hungarian Soviet Republic was established. After his release he emigrated to Vienna. In 1919–22 he was a leader of the Christian National Union (Keresztény Nemzeti Egyesülés Partja), a base for all Hungarian governments since the beginning of the 1920s. Huszár belonged to its Christian Social wing. In the cabinet of István Friedrich (August–November 1919) he was again in charge of the Ministry of Education and Denominations. As prime minister (24 November 1919–1 March 1920), Huszár forced the calling of a basically democratic parliamentary election and insisted upon sending a Hungarian delegation to Paris for the peace talks. In the conflict between legalists, who demanded the reinstatement of the former emperor, Charles IV, and the advocates of handing power over to Miklós Horthy, Huszár eventually took sides with the latter. In 1920–28 Huszár was an MP and deputy chairman of the National Assembly; subsequently, he was a senator. From 1928 to 1934 he was president of the National Institute of Social Security. In the last years of his life, he gradually retreated from political life. (MS)

Sources: Ki kicsoda (Budapest, 2001); 20 századi magyar történelem 1900–1994 (Budapest, 1997).

HUZAR Lubomyr (26 February 1933, Lwów [Lviv]), cardinal, head of the Greek Catholic Church. After graduating from the first grade of high school in Lviv, in 1944 Huzar left with his family for Austria and in 1949 for the United States. He graduated from the theological seminary in Stamford, Connecticut, and then he studied philosophy at St. Basil College and theology at the Catholic University in Washington, D.C. In March 1958 he was ordained, and in 1958–59 he taught at the Stamford Theological Seminary and was minister to the Ukrainian Popular Union (Ukraiinskyi Narodnyi Soyuz) and the house of education of the Society of Ukrainian Youth of America (Spilka Ukraiinskoyi Molodi Ameryky) in Hellenville, New York. From 1965 he was parish priest, and in 1967 he graduated with an M.A. in philosophy. To continue theological studies, in 1969 Huzar went to Rome, where in 1972 he received a Ph.D. and entered the Studite Order in Grottaferrata, near Rome. In 1978 Cardinal Yosyp Slipyi appointed him archimandrite (prior) of St. Theodore Monastery, responsible for Studite monasteries outside Ukraine. In 1973–84 Huzar lectured at the Pontifical Urbaniana University in Rome. On 2 April 1977 he was consecrated bishop by Cardinal Slipyi, and in 1984–91 he was vicar general of the Lviv Archdiocese in Rome. In 1993 he returned to the Ukraine. In 1993–94 he lectured at the Holy Spirit Seminary in Lviv, and from April 1996 he was exarch of Kiev and Vyshhorod. In October 1996 Huzar was appointed auxiliary bishop of Lviv. After the death of Cardinal Myroslav Lubachivskyi, on 25 January 2001, the synod of Ukrainian bishops elected Huzar archbishop of Lviv, and on 21 February 2001 Pope John Paul II appointed him cardinal. In June 2001, along with the Roman Catholic archbishop of Lviv, Cardinal Marian Jaworski, Huzar co-organized the Pope's pilgrimage to the Ukraine. Huzar was engaged in the Polish-Ukrainian reconciliation; for instance, he published a special pastoral letter concerning the Polish Youth War Veterans' (Orleța) Cemetery in Lviv in July 2002. (BB)

Sources: "Zhyttiepys novoho Halyskoho Mytropolyta," Postup, 27–28 January 2001; "Kardynał Lwowskiak," Gazeta Wyborcza, 14–15 July 2002; Annuario Pontificio 2001; "Krótki zyciorys Kardynała Lubomyra Huzara," www.opoka.org.pl; www.catholic-hierarchy.org.

HVIEZDOSLAV Pavol [originally Országh] (2 February 1849, Vyšný Kubín–8 November 1921, Dolný Kubín), Slovak poet, writer, and playwright. Born into a landowner's family, Hviezdoslav wrote his first poems in Hungarian and German. During his high school years in Kiežmark (1864–70) he began to write in Slovak. In 1872 he graduated in law in Prešov. From 1875 he worked as a lawyer in Námestovo and then in Dolný Kubín. He made his literary debut with a collection of poems, Básnické prviesenky Jozefa Zbranského (Poetic primroses of Jozef Zbranský; 1868), in which he expressed his attachment to Orava, the spiritual values of the Slovak people, and Slavophilism. In 1871 he published the poem Očim (Stepfather), in which he departed from patriotic feelings toward more universal issues. Later he mainly published in the periodical Slovenské pohľady. Hviezdoslav wrote reflective lyrics, contemplating the world, the individual, and the nation. He glorified nature and human beings in the poem Hájnikova žena (The gamekeeper's wife; 1884–86). He expressed his fears concerning his oppressed nation in the cycle Žalmy a hymny (Psalms and hymns; 1896). He also praised the Oravian landscape, expressing his pantheist beliefs. Hviezdoslav reflected on the forces of nature in the cycle Stesky (Longings; 1903–8). In the eposes Ežo Vlkolinský (1890) and Gabor Vlkolinský (1901) he critically assessed the relationship between landowners and peasants in Slovakia. In 1909 he created his most outstanding drama, Herodes a Herodias (Herod and Herodiad). In the collection Krvavé sonety (1914; Bloody Sonnets, 1950) he considered war atrocities as divine punishment for human sins. His writings reflected Polish-Slovak border disputes over Orava (1919–20), which shook his earlier Polonophilism.

Hviezdoslav is considered the most outstanding Slovak writer of the turn of the twentieth century. His works were both national and universal and show his unique, individual style. He introduced Slovak poetry into European literature. In his program for the creation of Slovak “high culture” an important place was taken by his translations of William Shakespeare, Johann Wolfgang Goethe, Friedrich Schiller, Adam Mickiewicz, Aleksandr Pushkin, Sandor Petófi, and many others. Also Hviezdoslav's own works were translated into many languages. (MG)

Sources: SBS; Slovník slovenských spisovateľ'ov (Prague, 1999); Augustín Matovčík et al., Reprezentačný biografický lexikón Slovenska (Martin, 1999); Pavol Bujnáč, Pavol Országh Hviezdoslav (Liptovský Mikuláš, 1919); Władysław Bobek, “Hviezdoslav: Największy poeta Słowacji,” Kurier Literacko-Naukowy, 1936, no. 42; Stanislav Šmatlák, Hviezdoslav: Básnik národný a svetový (Bratislava, 1969); Augustín Matovčík, Herold svitajúcich časov: Hviezdoslav (Martin, 1988); Augustín Matovčík, Hviezdoslav a rodná Orava (Martin, 1999).

I

IERUNCA Virgil [originally Untaru] (16 August 1920, Lădești), Romanian journalist and émigré activist. In 1939–47 Ierunca edited the Communist periodical România Liberă. In February 1947 he emigrated to France, where he worked with Mircea Eliade on the editorial board of the cultural magazine Luceafărul. Soon after his departure from Romania, Ierunca married Monica Lovinescu. From 1951 to 1974 he edited Romanian broadcasts on French Radio. In 1974–90 he also worked in the Romanian Section of Radio Free Europe, where he, along with his wife, edited the very popular series “Actualitatea Culturală Românească” (Contemporary Romanian culture) and “Povestea vorbeii: Pagini uitate, pagini cenzurate, pagini exilate” (Tales of the word: Forgotten, censored, and exiled pages). Ierunca became the leading personality among the Romanian exiles. He worked with all the major émigré periodicals, including Caiete de Dor and Ființa Românească. In April 1989 he signed an appeal demanding the liberalization of cultural life in Romania. After the fall of the Nicolae Ceaușescu regime, Ierunca retired. (AB)

Sources: Mihai Pellin, Opisul emigrației politice: Destine în 1222 de fișe alcătuite pe bază dosarelor din arhivele Securității (Bucharest, 2002).

IGNAR Stefan (17 February 1908, Bałdrzychów, near Łęczyca–23 January 1992, Warsaw), Polish peasant activist. While a student of philosophy at Poznań University (1927–31), Ignar was active in the Polish Academic Peasant Youth and the Union of Rural Youth (Związek Młodzieży Wiejskiej [ZMW]). From 1937 to 1939 he was a member of the ZMW Main Board. In 1932 he joined the Peasant Party (Stronnictwo Ludowe [SL]), and from 1935 to 1939 he was a member of the SL Chief Council. From 1933 to 1935 he lectured at Orkan Rural University in Gać, near Przeworsk, and later he was a co-founder and editor-in-chief of the bi-weekly Chłopskie Życie Gospodarcze (1935–37). From 1938 to 1939 Ignar was editor-in-chief of the weekly Wici. In 1937 he organized a peasant strike in Łódź Province. During the Nazi occupation he co-formed the underground SL–Roch and the Peasant Battalions (Bataliony Chłopskie [BCh]). In 1940–44 he was president of the Provincial Leadership of the Roch Peasant Movement in Łódź and a member of the Fifth District Command of the BCh.

In 1944 Ignar drew closer to the Polish Workers’ Party

(Polska Partia Robotnicza [PPR]) and the Polish Committee of National Liberation (Polski Komitet Wyzwolenia Narodowego [PKWN]), and as result he broke off with the Central Leadership of the Peasant Movement (Centralne Kierownictwo Ruchu Ludowego [CKRL]). In March 1945 he left the SL–Roch. In 1945 he again joined the Union of Rural Youth of the Republic of Poland–Wici (ZMW RP–Wici); between 1946 and 1947 he was its vice-president, and from 1947 to 1948, president of its Main Board. Ignar substantially contributed to the consolidation of the youth movement under Communist tutelage and to the establishment of the Union of Polish Youth (Związek Młodzieży Polskiej [ZMP]). In 1948–49 he presided over the ZMP Chief Council. In 1947 he joined the SL, which cooperated with the Communists, and from 1948 to 1949 he was a member of the Presidium of the SL Chief Executive Committee. From 1948 to 1950 he presided over the Main Board of the Peasant Mutual Aid Association. He supported forced collectivization. From 1949 to 1989 Ignar was a member of the United Peasant Party (Zjednoczone Stronnictwo Ludowe [ZSL]), serving as vice-president (1949–56) and president (1956–62, 1981) of the ZSL Chief Committee. In 1949–76 Ignar lectured at Warsaw Agricultural University (Szkoła Główna Gospodarstwa Wiejskiego). From 1952 to 1976 he was an MP in the Assembly, and from 1952 to 1956, deputy president of the State Council. He also served as deputy prime minister (October 1956–June 1969). From 1955 to 1957 he was president of the Main Board of the Polish-Soviet Friendship Society. From 1958 to 1983 he was a member of the Presidium of the All-Polish Committee of the National Unity Front. In 1964 he became a professor of economics. He authored numerous propagandist and scholarly publications, such as Sojusz robotniczo-chłopski w świetle niektórych doświadczeń ruchu ludowego (Alliance between peasants and workers in light of some experiences in the peasant movement; 1950); Agraryzm: Społeczno-gospodarczy program burżuazji wiejskiej (Agrarianism: Social and economic program of the rural bourgeoisie; 1956); and Polityka agrarna (Agrarian policy; 1968). (JS)

Sources: Mołdawa; Słownik biograficzny działaczy ruchu ludowego (Warsaw, 1989); Encyklopedia historii Polski: Dzieje polityczne, vol. 1 (Warsaw, 1994); Krystyna Kersten, Narodziny systemu władzy: Polska 1943–1948. (Poznań, 1990); Stanisław Giza, Kalendarz wydarzeń historii ruchu ludowego, 1895–1965. (Warsaw, 1967).

IGNOTUS Pál (1 July 1901, Budapest–1 April 1978, London), Hungarian writer and radical politician. The son of Hugó Veigelsberg Ignotus, the founder and editor-in-chief of Nyugat, a periodical of the Hungarian classical avant garde, in 1923 Ignóty began contributing to the daily Esti Kurír, and later he was editor of this newspaper's foreign column. He wrote literary reviews and political analyses for the daily Magyar Hírlap and published in the periodicals Nyugat, A Toll, Századunk, and Szocializmus. In the discussions between the representatives of the "peasant" and "urban" movements, Ignóty was one of the most radical "urbanists." At the end of 1938, after the passage of the first anti-Jewish law, Ignóty went to England, where he led anti-Nazi propaganda for the BBC. In 1944 he joined the circle of the Hungarian Council in England, led by Mihály Károlyi. After returning to Hungary, Ignóty accepted the post of press attaché in London at the request of the Hungarian Social Democratic Party. He started work in November 1947. Recalled in 1949, despite warnings, Ignóty returned to Hungary because his father was dying. He was arrested and sentenced to long-term imprisonment on trumped-up charges of spying.

At the end of March 1956 Ignóty was released. On 16 September 1956, at a general meeting of the Union of Hungarian Writers, he was elected a member of its presidium. On 1 November 1956, along with eight other writers, Ignóty signed a manifesto denouncing sporadic street lynchings and defending the moral purity of the revolution. After the suppression of the revolution on 4 November, he again left Hungary. Ignóty greatly contributed to the creation of a forum for the literature of Hungarian émigrés. Until 1962 he was editor-in-chief of Irodalmi Újság, a literary periodical published in London, and was in charge of the work of the Union of Hungarian Writers Abroad until its dissolution. In 1964 Ignóty published his prison memoirs, Fogságban (In confinement) and in 1972, Hungary, a short account of its recent history. (JT)

Sources: Magyar Nagylexikon, vol. 9 (Budapest, 1999); A magyar forradalom és szabadságharc enciklopédiája (Budapest, 1999).

IHNATOUSKI Usevalad (19 April 1881, Takary, Kamenets County—4 February 1931, Minsk), Belorussian historian and social and political activist. The son of a teacher, in 1911 Ihnatouski graduated from the University of Dorpat (Tartu). In June 1914 he became a member of the Council of the Belorussian Social Democratic Hramada, and in 1918, a member of the Central Committee (CC) of the Belorussian Party of Socialist Revolutionaries. After the occupation of Belorussia by the Polish Army Ihnatouski founded a Belorussian Communist organization. Admitted to the Russian Communist Party (Bolsheviks) in 1920, he became commissar of education of the Belorussian Soviet Socialist Republic (BSSR). Between 1926 and 1928 he was president of the Institute of Belorussian Culture (Inbelkult). From December 1928 he served as president of the Belorussian Academy of Sciences (BAS) and director of the Institute of History of the BAS. From 1922 to 1930 he was a member of the Central Executive Committee of the BSSR, and in 1924–26, head of the Department of Agitation and Propaganda of the CC of the Communist Party (CP) of Belorussia. He carried out the mission assigned to him by Soviet propaganda, which involved information activities needed to secure the return of Belorussian exiles to the BSSR.

Ihnatouski greatly contributed to the creation of Belorussian higher education and to the revival of Belorussian culture. In 1915 he founded a cultural and political society called Nash Kray (Our Country). In 1919 he published Krotki narys historii Bialorusi (An outline of Belorussian history). The year 1925 saw the publication of a history of Belorussia in the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries; it described the territory, population, economy, and history of the country as seen from the contemporary Soviet perspective and was co-authored by I. Smolich and Arkad Smolich. In 1928 Ihnatouski published 1863 rok na Bialarusi (The year 1863 in Belorussia). When in 1929 the Soviet authorities launched a campaign against Belorussian "nationalism" within the party, Ihnatouski attempted to defend the cultural autonomy of the republic; consequently he became a target of attacks. During a brutal propaganda campaign in 1930 he was accused of "national opportunism." On 30 November 1930 he wrote a letter to the CC of the CP of Belorussia in which he attempted to explain that he was not a "nationalist" but a "true Communist," and he asked for a chance to continue his work in the BAS. However, on 22 January 1931, labeled a "leader of the national democratic counterrevolution" and a "kulak agent," he was expelled from the party and dismissed from the post of director of the BAS. Fearing arrest, Ihnatouski committed suicide. His works were burned -and recycled. (AS/SA)

Sources: Belarus: Entsiklapedychny davednik (Minsk, 1995); Skarynich: Rochnik literaturna-navukovy (Moscow, Minsk, and Smolensk, 1997); Nicholas P. Vakar, Belorussia: The Making of a Nation (Cambridge, Mass., 1956); Vitaut Kipel and Zora Kipel, eds., Byelorussian Statehood (New York, 1988); Rainer Lindner, Historiker und Herrschaft: Nationsbildung und Geschichtspolitik in Weissrussland im 19. und 20. Jahrhundert (Munich, 1999).

ILIESCU Ion (3 March 1930, Oltenița), Romanian Communist activist and post-Communist politician, president of Romania. In the 1940s Iliescu studied in Bucharest. He joined the Communist Party of Romania in 1944. In 1948 he co-founded the Union of High School Student Unions of Romania. In 1955 he graduated in electrical engineering from the Polytechnic Institute in Bucharest and the Power Engineering Institute in Moscow, where he met Mikhail Gorbachev. Upon his return to Romania, Iliescu started working at the Research and Design Institute of Power Engineering in Bucharest, dealing with water power plants and the economy. In 1956 he co-founded the Union of Student Unions of Romania. In the 1960s he represented Romanian students in international student organizations. In 1967 he became first secretary of the Communist Youth Union and minister for youth questions in the government of Ion Maurer, promoting the nationalist line of Nicolae Ceaușescu. In 1968 he became an MP, and in 1971, a member of the Central Committee (CC) of the Romanian Communist Party (RCP). Half a year later he entered into conflict with Ceaușescu because he opposed the so-called cultural revolution. Accused of “intellectual deviation” and deprived of all functions except for his CC membership, Iliescu was sent to Timișoara, where he was party secretary until 1974. In 1974–79 he was party secretary in Iași. Gradually sidelined, in 1979–84 he presided over the National Council of Water Resources, and from 1984 he was director of a technical press. In 1989 he belonged to the group of Communist activists dismissed by Ceaușescu and opposing his policies; they were probably supported by Gorbachev as an alternative leadership for Romania.

After the Timișoara riots, on 22 December 1989 Iliescu took the lead of the Council of the National Salvation Front (Frontul Salvării Naționale [NSF]), which arrested, sentenced to death, and executed Ceaușescu and his wife on 25 December 1989. In February 1990 Iliescu became head of the Provisional Council of National Unity (Consiliul Provizoriu de Uniune Națională), and in May 1990 he was elected president for a two-year term. He relied on the former Communist apparatus and the political police, Securitate, and he slowed down market reforms. In December 1992 he was reelected president, formally resigning from the leadership and membership of the NSF, which, after a split and the departure of its liberal and anti-Communist activists, changed its name to the Democratic National Salvation Front (Frontul Democrat Salvării Naționale) in 1992 and to the Party of Social Democracy in Romania (Partidul Democrației Sociale din România [PSDR]) in 1993. In 1992–96 market reforms were slowly introduced, but Iliescu and the PSDR-based government were reluctant to integrate the country within the European Union and NATO. Until 1995 Iliescu and the PSDR cooperated with the extreme nationalists.

After the lost parliamentary and presidential elections of November and December 1996, Iliescu became chairman of the PSDR and a senator. Owing to popular discontent with the center-right governments, in December 2000 Iliescu again won the presidency. Although in 1999 he and his party had criticized the NATO air raids on Yugoslavia, after the elections Iliescu spoke in favor of Romania's entry into the European Union and NATO. Both Iliescu and his party gradually evolved toward a West European-style social democracy. Iliescu published Probleme globale: Creativitate (Global problems: Creativity; 1990); Revoluție și reformă (Revolution and reform; 1993); România în Europa și în lume (Romania in Europe and in the world; 1994); and Momente de istorie (Historical moments; vol. 1, 1995; vols. 2 and 3, 1996). (LW)

Sources: Dictionar Enciclopedic (Bucharest, 1999); Andrei Codrescu, The Hole in the Flag (New York, 1991); Daniel N. Nelson, ed., Romania after Tyranny (Boulder, Colo., 1992); Personalități politice, publice (Bucharest, 1994); Józef Darski, Rumunia: Historia, współczesność, konflikty narodowe (Warsaw, 1994); Tom Gallagher, Romania after Ceausescu (Edinburgh, 1995); Costin Scorpan, Istoria României: Enciclopedie (Bucharest, 1997); Ion Alexandrescu, Ion Bulei, Ion Mamina, and Ioan Scurtu, Enciclopedia de istorie României (Bucharest, 2000); <http://members.tripod.com>; www.cidob.org/bios; www.rferl.org/nca.

ILLYÉS Gyula (2 November 1902, Felsőrácegrespuszta–15 April 1983, Budapest), Hungarian poet and writer. The son of a peasant who worked as a mechanic on a manor, between 1918 and 1919 Illyés took part in the leftist movement of students and young workers. In the autumn of 1920 he enrolled in the university in Budapest. Fearing arrest, at the end of that year he emigrated to France, where, among other things, he worked in a book bindery, was involved in a trade union movement of Hungarian émigrés, and was active in workers' educational circles. For some time he studied at the Sorbonne. After an amnesty, in 1926 he returned to Hungary and got a clerical job in Budapest. From 1927 he worked in an insurance company, and in 1938 he became an officer in the National Bank of Hungary. Initially, Illyés wrote for Dokumentum and Munka, periodicals founded and edited by Lajos Kassák. He later also published in Nyugat, a periodical of the Hungarian avant garde. Illyés made his literary debut with a volume of poems in 1928. At the beginning of the 1930s he was already a recognized writer and received the Baumgarten Prize for best poet of the year four times. In 1934 Illyés attended a congress of Soviet writers in Moscow, and as a result, he wrote a book about Russia (1934). His best prose works from that period include Puszták népe (People of the Pusztas 1967; 1936) and a collection of essays, Magyarok (The Hungarians; 1938).

In 1937 Illyés was the leading figure of the “peasant writers' movement” and one of the founders of the leftist March Front. Beginning in 1941 he edited the literary weekly Magyar Csillag. After Germany occupied Hungary in March 1944, Illyés went into hiding in the countryside. In 1945 he was elected to the parliament on behalf of the National Peasant Party (NPP), and until 1946 he was one of the NPP leaders. From 1946 to 1949 he edited a literary periodical, Válasz. In 1946 the Hungarian People's Educational Institute was established on his initiative, and Illyés became its first president. In 1945 he became a member of the Hungarian Academy of Sciences but was expelled for political reasons in 1949. He was removed from public life, and his works were not published. It was not until 1954, under the premiership of Imre Nagy, that Illyés became a member of the National Council of the reorganized Hungarian Patriotic Front. In September 1956 he again joined the leadership of the Hungarian Writers' Union (HWU). During the 1956 revolution he took part in the revival of the NPP. On 2 September 1956 the weekly Irodalmi Újság published Egy mondat a zsarnokságról (A sentence about tyranny), a poem Illyés wrote in 1950, which depicted the essence of Stalinism under Mátyás Rákosi. The poem could not be republished officially until 1986. On 10 November 1956, along with Tibor Déry, István Örkény, and others, Illyés asked for political asylum in the Polish Embassy in Budapest. They were given temporary refuge, but a few hours later they all left the embassy building. After the suppression of the revolution Illyés did not write for years.

A 1958 resolution of the CC of the Hungarian Socialist Workers' Party on "peasant writers" also denounced the stance of Illyés. Despite this, however, in 1959 Illyés joined the HWU, which was reorganized after the revolution. In the 1950s and 1960s Illyés enriched Hungarian literature with numerous historical dramas. He was one of the most respected writers of the János Kádár period. The novels Kháron lidikján (1969; Charon's Ferry, 2000) and Ebéd a kastélyban (Dinner at the palace; 1962) are his best works of that period. In the late 1970s and early 1980s Illyés supported the newly formed opposition and regularly stood up in the defense of Hungarians living in neighboring countries. Szellem és erőszak (Spirit and violence), his collected essays on the subject, was banned from publication, allegedly to protect "Hungarian international interests." In 1987 Illyés published Teremteni: Összegyűjtött versek, 1946–1968 (Memoirs and notes, 1946–68). English publications of his works include Selected Poems (1971) and What You Have Almost Forgotten: Selected Poems of Gyula Illyés (1999). (JT)

Sources: Magyar Életrajzi Lexikon, vol. 3 (Budapest, 1994); Magyar Nagylexikon, vol. 9 (Budapest, 1999); Magyarország 1944–1956, CD-ROM (Budapest, 2001); Thomas Kabedebo and Paul Tabori, eds., A Tribute to Gyula Illyés (Washington, D.C., 1968); Paul Ignatus, Hungary (London, 1972); Miklós Béládi, Illyés Gyula (Budapest, 1987); György Litván, ed., Rewolucja węgierska 1956 roku (Warsaw, 1996); Steven Bela Vardy, Historical Dictionary of Hungary (Lanham, Md., 1997).

ILVES Toomas Hendrik (23 December 1953, Stockholm), Estonian politician. Ilves graduated in psychology from Columbia University in New York in 1976, and then he worked in the United States as a teacher of Estonian and English. In 1984–88 he was an analyst in Radio Free Europe (RFE), and from 1988 to 1993 he was head of the RFE Estonian Section. From 1993 he worked in the diplomatic service of Estonia. In 1993–96 Ilves was ambassador to the United States, also accredited in Canada and Mexico. From March 1997 to October 1998 he was minister of foreign affairs, and then he became director of the North Atlantic Institute. He headed Estonian diplomacy again in the government of Mart Laar (March 1999–March 2002). In 1998 he founded the (liberal conservative) Estonian People's Party and won a parliamentary seat on its behalf in the elections of March 1999. After the party's merger with the Party of Moderates, in November 1999 Ilves became deputy chairman of the People's Party Moderates (Rahvaerakond Mõõdukad [PPM]). In view of the shift of the constituency toward the right in 1999–2001, Ilves gained influence in the party, which had been center-left before. He enjoyed high social ratings, and in 2001 he became PPM chairman. As head of diplomacy, he consistently led Estonia toward the European Union and NATO. At the end of his term he managed to draw Estonia closer to these goals, both through the signing of the Baltic Charter by the American, Estonian, Latvian, and Lithuanian presidents, and through American support for the modernization of the Estonian Army. He also attempted to approach some of the former Soviet republics, but he was rather skeptical about a closer relationship with Latvia and Lithuania. His policy toward Russia, which opposed Estonia's entry into NATO, was additionally complicated by his support for the independence of Chechnya. In view of the breakup of the ruling center-right coalition, in January 2002 Ilves resigned from his position and went into the opposition. In June 2004 he was elected a member of the European Parliament. (AG)

Sources: Eesti Entsüklopeedia, vol. 14 (Tallinn, 2000); Eastern Europe and the Commonwealth of Independent States 1999 (London, 1999); Mel Huang, "And the Winner Is . . .," Central European Review, 1999, no. 24; Mel Huang, "Right-Wing Socialists," Central European Review, 1999, no. 37; Mel Huang, "Does Estonia Have a Left?" Central European Review, 2000, no. 13.

IMRÉDY Béla (29 December 1891, Budapest–28 February 1946, Budapest), Hungarian economist and right-wing politician. Imrédy came from a family of German origin that had gained Hungarian nobility. His father was vice-president and deputy director of the National Small Landowners' Credit Office. After earning a doctorate in law in 1913, Imrédy began a career as a government official. From August 1914 he served as a second lieutenant in the reserves and later as first lieutenant. Demobilized in 1918, he passed his exams in finance, and in 1919 he began working in the Ministry of Finance. In 1922 he left the government administration and became secretary of the Union of Savings Associations and Banks. In 1924 he was made secretary general of this union. From 1926 he served as deputy director of the National Bank of Hungary, becoming its director in 1928. As an internationally recognized expert in finance, Imrédy served his country as finance minister in the government of Gyula Gömbös (October 1932–January 1935), which aimed at developing close ties with Hitler. Imrédy was in charge of restructuring the agricultural debt and protecting peasant farms. Between January 1935 and May 1938 he was president of the National Bank of Hungary.

In 1936 Imrédy was elected president of the ruling Party of National Unity (Magyar Egység Pártja). In March 1938 he became minister of the economy without portfolio, a position created especially for him, and he was in charge of the Győr investment program, aimed at an intensive development of the Hungarian Army. The program, initiated under prime minister Kálmán Darányi, had been prepared under Imrédy's leadership. On 13 May 1938 Regent Miklós Horthy appointed Imrédy prime minister. At the beginning of his rule, Imrédy followed the policy laid down by conservative circles. In May 1938 he oversaw the parliament's passage of the first so-called Jewish Law, which restricted the rights of the Hungarian Jews. At the same time, however, he took measures aimed at limiting the activities of the Arrow Cross Party, as well as those of the Social Democratic movement. In the spirit of a peaceful revision of the 1920 Treaty of Trianon, Imrédy sought an agreement with the Little Entente, and at the end of August he rejected a proposal by Hitler that promised the reincorporation of Slovakia into Hungary in exchange for Hungarian involvement in military actions against Czechoslovakia. Following the First Vienna Award (2 November 1938), under which Hungary regained some of the territories it had lost after the Treaty of Trianon, Imrédy developed an uncritical pro-German attitude and dictatorial leanings. In October 1938 he tried to rule by decree, but the Council of Ministers resisted his pressure. At the end of November 1938 over sixty people left his party, and the parliament voted against the prime minister. However, Horthy, who feared the discontent of Germany and the extreme right, again entrusted Imrédy with the mission of forming a government. Imrédy allowed for the creation of the Volksbund, a so-called people's union of Germans in Hungary that sympathized with Hitler, and he began preparing a second anti-Jewish law based upon racial principles. This law was adopted by Imrédy's cabinet in May. In January 1939 Imrédy's government joined the anti-Comintern Pact.

The parliamentary opposition, in the shape of a so-called front for the defense of the constitution, united in an effort to depose Imrédy, and when it was disclosed that one of Imrédy's great-grandmothers was a Jew, he was forced to resign (16 February 1939). Seeking to regain power, he moved closer to the extreme right. In October 1940 Imrédy effected a split in the ruling party, which he represented as a member of parliament, and formed his own Party of Hungarian Renewal (Magyar Megújulás Pártja). This party was more moderate than the Arrow Cross Party but still had a Fascist character. After the occupation of Hungary by the German Army in March 1944, the Germans wanted to make Imrédy prime minister, but Horthy resisted the pressure. From the end of May until August 1944 Imrédy served as minister without portfolio for economic affairs in the pro-German government of General Döme Sztójay. Owing to a conflict with the Hungary-based command of the SS (Schutzstaffeln) over the destination of Jewish property, Imrédy resigned from the government. He finally joined the extreme right-wing National Union of Legislators. In the spring of 1945, following Ferenc Szálasi, Imrédy went to Germany. He was arrested by American authorities and handed over to the Hungarians in October. On 23 November 1945 Imrédy was sentenced to death for war crimes by the People's Tribunal in Budapest, and he was executed. (JT)

Sources: Miklos Horthy, Memoirs (New York, 1954); Az Imrédy-per; a vád, a vallomások és az ítélet (Budapest, 1945); Magyar Nagylexikon, vol. 9 (Budapest, 1999); A magyar forradalom és szabadságharc enciklopédiája (Budapest, 1999).

INCULEȚ Ion (5 April 1884, Rezeni, Bessarabia–15 August 1940, Bucharest), Romanian politician from Bessarabia. In 1902–8 Inculeț studied theology in Kishinev (Chișinău) and mathematics at the university in Yuryev in Russia. He began lecturing in mathematics at the university in St. Petersburg in 1909, becoming privatdozent in 1910. He was active during the February 1917 revolution, joining the Petrograd Soviet of Workers', Peasants', and Soldiers' Deputies, where he worked with Aleksandr Kerensky. Politically he was increasingly drawn to the Socialist revolutionaries. In August 1917, Kerensky sent Inculeț to Bessarabia as a representative of the Provisional Government. After the Bolshevik Revolution, on 4 December 1917, Incuțeț became head of the Bessarabian National Council (Sfatul Țării), which was dominated by Romanians and which sought to separate Bessarabia from Russia and incorporate it into the Old Kingdom of Romania. On 15 December 1917 in Kishinev, the National Council proclaimed the autonomy of the Moldavian province between the Prut and Dniester Rivers within a federal Russia. When the Bolsheviks invaded Kiev in January 1918, Incuțeț called for support from the Romanian Army. The Romanian offensive pushed the Bolsheviks eastward; thus, on 8 February 1918 the council proclaimed an independent Moldavian Republic, and in April of that year, with a majority of Romanian votes, the council voted for union with Romania. This union became possible after Austro-Hungarian troops were pushed out of the greater part of the Old Kingdom. On 9 December 1918 the council finally decided to incorporate Bessarabia into Romania, without granting Bessarabia autonomous rights. From 1918 to 1940 Incuțeț served as a member of parliament in Bucharest. Between April 1918 and February 1919; from September to December 1919; between March and May 1920; and from January 1922 to March 1926 he was minister for Bessarabia in successive Romanian governments. Between June 1926 and November 1928 he was minister of health; from November 1933 to August 1936, minister of interior; and then until November 1937, deputy prime minister. As a member of the Royal Council, Incuțeț had good relations with King Charles II. (FA/WR)

Sources: R. W. Seton-Watson, A History of the Romanians (Hamden, CT, 1963); Șerban N. Ionescu, Who Was Who in Twentieth Century Romania (Boulder, Colo., 1994); Keith Hitchins, Romania 1866–1947 (Oxford, 1994).

INDRA Alois (17 March 1921, Medzev, near Košice–2 August 1990, Prague), Czechoslovak Communist activist. Before the war Indra worked as a railway clerk. In 1937 he joined the Communist Party of Czechoslovakia (CPC), and in the 1950s he was active in the executive of the party in Žilín, which at that time was renamed Gottwaldov. Indra rose to the position of first secretary of the provincial committee. In 1962–63 he headed the State Planning Committee, and from April 1968 he occupied the post of minister of transport. From 1962 to 1989 he was a member of the Central Committee (CC) of the CPC, attaining the highest party posts. From 1964 he was a deputy to the National Assembly. Indra owed his rise mainly to his extremely doctrinal and conservative views, as well as to his support of the Soviet intervention in August 1968. He and several other “hard-core” members of the party executive (e.g., Vasil Bil’ak) submitted a letter to Leonid Brezhnev in which they called for the Soviet intervention in Czechoslovakia. Indra was to be one of the key figures in the “revolutionary government of workers and peasants,” which was to be formed after the invasion of Czechoslovakia by the Warsaw Pact forces. However, President Ludvík Svoboda did not appoint this government. From 23 to 26 August 1968 Indra participated in talks in Moscow, representing an extremely pro-Moscow stance. From 1968 he was secretary of the CC, and from 1971, a member of the Presidium of the CC of the CPC. In 1971–89 he served as president of the Federal Assembly. As a member of the highest party and state authorities, Indra was an avowed supporter of the “normalization” after the Soviet intervention; therefore he also enjoyed the great trust of the Kremlin. He withdrew from political life after being deprived of all his posts at a special plenum of the CC of the CPC that was assembled under the pressure of anti-Communist demonstrations at the end of November 1989. On 17 February 1990 Indra was expelled from the party. (PU)

Sources: ČBS; Kdo byl kdo v našich dějinách ve 20. století, vol. 1 (Prague, 1998); Who’s Who in the Socialist Countries of Europe, vol. 2 (Munich, London, and Paris, 1989); Českoslovenští politici: 1918–1991 (Prague, 1991); Gordon H. Skilling, Czechoslovakia’s Interrupted Revolution (Princeton, 1976); Vladimír V. Kusin, From Dubček to Charter 77: A Study of “Normalization” in Czechoslovakia, 1968–1978 (New York, 1978).

INGR Jan Sergej (2 September 1894, Vlkoš–17 June 1956, Paris), Czech general. Ingr graduated from a high school in Kiev. In 1914 he volunteered for the Austro-Hungarian Army, and in October 1915 he was taken captive by the Russians. In May 1916 he joined a Serbian volunteer division, and in January 1917, the Czechoslovak Legion in Russia. He later traveled via Murmansk to Great Britain and France to join a military unit that was being formed there. As a member of this unit, he took part in the fighting on the western front, and he returned with this unit to Czechoslovakia. In 1919 Ingr participated in the Polish-Czechoslovak conflict in Teschen Silesia and in the struggle against the Hungarian Red Army in Slovakia. After the end of the war he joined the Czechoslovak Army. He took a general staff course in Prague and later completed studies at the Military College in Paris. In 1923 Ingr became chief of the operations unit of the military district command in Prague, and in 1929 he was promoted to a similar position in the General Staff. In 1931 he became commander of a regiment, in 1934 of a brigade, and in 1935 of a division. In 1934 he was promoted to brigadier general and in 1938 to major general. In 1936 he became deputy commander of the Third Corps in Brno, and at the time of mobilization in 1938 he was its commander.

Ingr was against the Munich capitulation, and after the partition of Czechoslovakia he was in charge of the Defense of the Nation, a resistance organization in Moravia. In the summer of 1939 he traveled via Poland to France, where he became a member of the Czechoslovak National Committee and chief of the Military Command, which organized the formation of a Czechoslovak army in France. After the capitulation of France, Ingr managed to get to Great Britain, where between July 1940 and September 1944 he served as defense minister in the Czechoslovak government-in-exile. In September 1944 he became chief of the General Staff, which was also formally in charge of the Czechoslovak units in the USSR. As chief of staff, Ingr got in touch with General Heliodor Piška, head of the military mission in the USSR, in order to establish cooperation between the Red Army and the insurgents in Slovakia. However, the Soviet command allowed the uprising to bleed out. In April 1945, under Soviet pressure, Ingr was dismissed as chief of staff, and a month later, after returning to Prague, he was not allowed to continue serving in the army for political reasons. In October 1947, on the motion of President Edvard Beneš, Ingr was appointed ambassador to Holland. After the coup of February 1948 he resigned his post and remained in exile. He initially lived in Great Britain and later in the United States, where he worked with General František Moravec. (PU)

Sources: ČBS; Svaz československých důstojníků v exilu (Washington, D.C., 1957); Českoslovenští politici: 1918–1991 (Prague, 1991); Kdo byl kdo v našich dějinách ve 20. století, vol. 2 (Prague, 1998); Politická elita meziválečného Československa 1918–1938: Kdo byl kdo za první republiky (Prague, 1998).

IONESCU Eugene [originally Ionescu] (13 November 1909, Slatina–28 March 1994, Paris), French playwright of Romanian descent. Ionescu's mother was a French Jew, and his father was Romanian. He spent his childhood in Paris. In 1922 he went to Romania, where until 1926 he lived with his father, who in the meantime had divorced his mother. From 1926 Ionescu lived with his mother, who moved to Bucharest. In 1928 he graduated from high school in Craiova and made his literary debut as a poet in the daily Bilet de papagal. In 1929–33 he studied Romance languages and literature at the University of Bucharest. From 1930 to 1938 he published vanguard articles and essays with anti-totalitarian overtones in such periodicals as Critică, Universul Literar, Facla, Rampa, Parerile Libere, and Vremea. In 1934 he published a series of provocative articles titled Nu (No), in which he criticized the most outstanding Romanian writers of that time. He worked as a teacher of French in Cernavodă, and then, until 1938, he was a white-collar worker in the Ministry of Education, responsible for foreign relations. In 1938 he received a government scholarship and left for doctoral studies in Paris. In 1939 he returned to Romania and taught French.

In 1942 Ionescu left for France again. He lived in Marseilles and then in Vichy, where in 1943–44 he was the Romanian cultural attaché to the Vichy government. In 1945 he moved to Paris. Initially he earned his living by translating. He was interested in Surrealism, the literature of the absurd, and “anti-prose.” At the end of the 1940s he began to write plays in French, becoming a pioneer of the theater of the absurd. In 1949 he wrote La cantatrice chauve (The Bald Prima-Donna; 1966), and in 1951, La leçon (The lesson), which brought him world fame. The most famous of his plays include the following: Les chaises (1952; Chairs, 1973); Le rhinocéros (1959; Rhinoceros, 1960); La soif et la faim (1966; Hunger and Thirst, 1971); Macbett (1972); L'homme aux valises (1975; Man with Bags, 1977); and Thème et variations; ou, Voyages chez les morts (Theme and variations, or journeys among the dead; 1980). Ionescu rejected the conventions of classical theater and created the theater of the situation, crossing the limits of reality into nightmare. In his plays he opposed totalitarian regimes. At the same time he was convinced of the paradox and absurdity of human existence. He showed how language was used unthinkingly and revealed its secrets. Thence apparently simple things turned out to be complicated and have many meanings. In his works contemporary man was fated to suffer depersonalization and dehumanization. From 1970 Ionescu was a member of the Académie Française. He was awarded the Legion of Honor and many other literary and theater honors. He received a number of honorary doctorates in the United States and Europe. In France he maintained sporadic contacts with Romanian émigrés. His friendship with Mircea Eliade did not survive because of the latter's sympathy for the Fascist Iron Guard. Until 1989 Ionescu's plays were banned by the Communist regime in Romania. Ionescu authored the memoirs Present Past, Past Present (1972). (LW)

Sources: Leonard S. Klein, Encyclopedia of World Literature in the Twentieth Century (New York, 1982); Dictionar Enciclopedic, vol. 3 (Bucharest, 1999); Philippe Sénart, Ionescu (Paris, 1966); Ronald Hayman, Eugene Ionescu (London, 1972); Richard Coe, Eugene Ionescu (Ann Arbor, 1979); Deborah Gaensbauer, Eugene Ionescu (New York, 1996); Harold Bloom, ed., Eugene Ionescu (Philadelphia, 2003); www.imagi-nation.com; www.cpcug.org.

IONESCU Dumitru (Take) (25 October 1858, Ploiești–4 July 1922, Rome), Romanian politician. Ionescu attended Sfântul-Sava High School in Bucharest, later received a bachelor's degree from Bucharest University, and in 1881 earned a Ph.D. in law from the Sorbonne in Paris. Later he worked as a journalist and was a member of the Liberal Party. Elected an MP in 1884, in 1889 he switched over to the Conservative Party and contributed to the periodicals La libert  roumaine and Timpul. Ionescu won recognition as an outstanding lawyer and a gifted speaker; he was called “Guri a de Aur” (the Golden Tongue). From December 1891 to October 1895 Ionescu served as minister of culture, implementing reforms in education. In the government of Gheorghe Grigore Cantacuzino, he played the role of gray eminence, serving as minister of justice from April 1899 to January 1900 and as minister of finance until July 1900. Ionescu struggled with the effects of bad harvests, as well as with the repercussions of the world economic crisis. He again held the post of minister of finance between 1904 and 1907 in the subsequent government of Cantacuzino, which resigned as the result of a peasant uprising in Moldavia. After the government of Dimitrie Sturdza brutally suppressed that uprising, Ionescu left the Conservative Party and on 16 February 1908 founded his own Conservative Democratic Party. In October 1912 he became minister of interior and played an important role in negotiations that led to the Bucharest Peace Treaty, which granted southern Dobruja to Romania.

After the outbreak of World War I Ionescu advocated military neutrality. However, he co-formed National Action (Ac iunea Na ională) and vigorously worked for the incorporation of Transylvania and Bessarabia into Romania. When Romania entered the war on the side of the Entente, Ionescu became aligned with the liberals. In December 1916 he became minister without portfolio, and in July 1917 deputy prime minister, in the government of Ion I.C. Bra ianu, which was evacuated to Ia i. When peace negotiations with the Central Powers began in the spring of 1918, Ionescu resigned and went to Paris, where he edited the periodical La Roumanie and from 3 October 1918 presided over the National Council for Romanian Union (Consiliul Na ional al Unită ii Române) and led a vigorous campaign for the Romanian cause. Thanks to his contacts, during the Paris Peace Conference Ionescu contributed to the promotion of Romanian territorial claims. From June 1920 to December 1921 he served as minister of foreign affairs in the government of General Alexandru Averescu, concluding treaties on mutual assistance with Poland in March 1921, Czechoslovakia in April, and Yugoslavia in June 1921. The treaties with Czechoslovakia and Yugoslavia laid the foundations for the Little Entente. From 17 December 1921 to 19 January 1921 Ionescu served as prime minister and minister of finance, but he resigned after the parliament passed a vote of no confidence. Soon afterwards he died. Ionescu authored, among other works, The Origins of the War; the Testimony of a Witness (1917), Souvenirs (1919), and Some Personal Impressions (1922). (WR) Sources: Biographisches Lexikon, vol. 2; Constantin Xeni, Take Ionescu (1858–1922) (Bucharest, 1933); Marie, Queen of Romania, The Story of My Life, vols. 1–2; (New York, 1934); Henri Prost, Destin de la Roumanie 1918–1954 (Paris, 1954); Vasile Alexandrescu, Romania in World War I (Bucharest, 1985); Mircea Mu at and Ion Ardeleanu, România dupa Marea Unire, vols. 1–2 (Bucharest, 1986); Emile Turdeanu, Modern Romania: The Achievement of National Unity, 1914–1920 (Los Angeles, 1988);  erban N. Ionescu, Who Was Who in Twentieth Century Romania (Boulder, Colo., 1994).

IONESCU NICOLAE (Nae) (16 July 1890, Brăila–15 March 1940, Bucharest), Romanian philosopher and pundit. Ionescu attended Nicolae Bălcescu High School in Brăila. Subsequently, he studied philosophy in Bucharest, Vienna, and Munich, where he received a Ph.D. in 1919. After his return to Romania in 1920 he became a professor, and he lectured in the history of philosophy, logic, and metaphysics at Bucharest University. His right-wing philosophical views quickly extended to politics and religion. In his opinion, the factors that guaranteed the maintenance of the identity, independence, and well-being of Romania were nationalism, monarchy, and Orthodoxy, which he considered the most essential qualities of the “Romanian national spirit.” Ionescu created an intellectual system in which philosophy was not only an act of reason, but also an act of volition and should be lived through and realized in everyday existence, art, and politics. He rejected modernism, popular in the West, advocating instead a return to traditional and specifically Romanian values. In 1924–29 Ionescu co-founded and was editor-in-chief of a radical, right-wing Orthodox magazine, Cuvântul, and from 1929 to 1934 and in 1938 he was its director.

Backing nationalism and authoritarian rule and at the same time opposing parliamentary democracy, Ionescu supported the return to the throne of King Charles II in 1930, hoping that the latter would implement his illiberal ideas. In 1933, however, when the king became close to the liberals, Ionescu turned against him, taking sides with the Fascist Iron Guard (Gărdia de Fier [IG]) and becoming one of its ideologues. In 1933, Ionescu was arrested for a short time and charged with moral co-responsibility for the murder of the liberal prime minister, Ion G. Duca, who was killed by Iron Guard members. In 1938, when the king dissolved all political parties and when bloody persecutions of Iron Guard members and sympathizers began, Ionescu was sent to a labor camp in Miercurea Ciuc. After his release in 1939, he was kept under house arrest. In 1940 he was probably poisoned by a royal agent who was his jailer. As a lecturer and pundit, Ionescu exerted a great influence on the views of Romanian elites in the 1930s. He authored books such as Doctrinile partidelor politice: Sindicalism (Doctrines of political parties: Syndicalism; 1924); Fenomenul Legionar (The phenomenon of the Legion; 1940); and Istoria logiceii (History of logic; 1941). Ionescu's students include Mircea Eliade, Emil Cioran, Constantin Noica, and Mircea Vulcănescu. (LW)

Sources: Dictionar Enciclopedic, vol. 3 (Bucharest, 1999); Vlad Georgescu, Istoria Românilor de la origini pînă în zilele noastre (Oakland, 1984); Dan Ciachir, Gînduri despre Nae Ionescu (Iași, 1994); Józef Darski, Rumunia: Historia, współczesność, konflikty narodowe (Warsaw, 1995); Krzysztof Dach and Tadeusz Dubicki, Żelazny Legion Michała Archanioła (Warsaw, 1996); Isabela Vasiliu-Scrabu, Metafisica lui Nea Ionescu (Slobozia, 2000); www.miscarea-legionara.org; www.bautz.de.

IONESCU-QUINTUS Mircea (18 March 1917, Kherson, Ukraine), Romanian politician. In 1938 Ionescu-Quintus graduated in law from the University of Bucharest. In 1940–87 he worked as a lawyer in Prahova. During World War II he served in the Romanian Army, advancing to the rank of major. In 1945 he joined the National Liberal Party (Partidul Național Liberal [PNL]). After the suppression of all opposition parties, liquidation of the PNL, and arrest or killing of its leaders, Ionescu-Quintus suspended all political activities and worked as a lawyer. After the fall of the Nicolae Ceaușescu regime, in early 1990 Ionescu-Quintus joined the restored PNL. In 1990–92 he was its deputy chairman. He was elected MP on its behalf, and in 1990–91 he was deputy speaker of the Lower Chamber. After the resignation of the government of Petru Roman in October 1991, the PNL entered the new ruling coalition, and Ionescu-Quintus became minister of justice in the government of Theodor Stolojan, holding this position until the parliamentary elections of September 1992. At this time the PNL broke ties with the anti-Communist Democratic Convention of Romania (Convenția Democratică din România [DCR]). In the 1992 elections the PNL failed to win any parliamentary seats. In 1991–93 Ionescu-Quintus lectured in constitutional law at the University of Ploiești. In 1993 he assumed the leadership of the PNL, which drew closer to the DCR and joined it in 1994. In 1996 Ionescu-Quintus ran from the DCR lists and won a senator's mandate. As a part of the DCR, the PNL belonged to the ruling coalition. In 1996–99 Ionescu-Quintus was deputy speaker of the Senate, and in 1999–2000, its speaker. In 1997 he was reelected PNL chairman. In 2000 he was reelected senator on behalf of the PNL, which, correct in predicting the defeat of the DCR, ran alone. In 2001 Ionescu-Quintus retired from leading the PNL and was replaced by Valeriu Stoica. (LW)

Sources: Józef Darski, Rumunia: Historia, współczesność, konflikty narodowe (Warsaw, 1995); Ion Alexandrescu, Ion Bulei, Ion Mamina, and Ioan Scurtu, Enciclopedia de istorie României (Bucharest, 2000); Duncan Light and Daniel Phinnemore, Post-Communist Romania (Palgrave, 2001); www.electionworld.org; www.tripod.com; www.romania-on-line.net; www.cdep.ro.

IONIȚA Ion (14 June 1924, Matasaru–1987? Bucharest), Romanian general. Ionița was a nephew of the Romanian Communist Party (RCP) leader Nicolae Ceaușescu. In 1944, he joined a Communist youth organization, and from 1945 he was a member of the RCP, where he made a quick career owing to his family connections. Consequently, he attended a military high school, and then he graduated from the Romanian Military Academy in Bucharest. After his studies, at the beginning of the 1950s, he became deputy head of the Political Board of the army. Until 1966, he was commander of air force and anti-aircraft units. In 1955–65 he was a deputy member of the Central Committee (CC) of the Romanian Workers' Party. From 1961 to 1984, he was an MP. From 1962 he was deputy minister of defense, and from September 1966 to June 1976, minister of defense. In 1965–69 he was a deputy member of the Executive Committee of the RCP CC, and from 1969 to 1984, a member of the RCP CC. From 19 June 1976 to 21 May 1982 Ionița was deputy prime minister. It was probably then that he began a clandestine collaboration with Moscow-supported, Ceaușescu-opposing groups within the army, security service, and Communist Party. As a consequence, he lost his positions in 1982. In 1983 he established a conspiracy in the Romanian Army, aimed at overthrowing Ceaușescu; several other generals joined the conspiracy. In 1984, he planned to carry out a coup d'état with the help of a motorized military unit and to take control of the television station during Ceaușescu's visit to West Germany. In the same year, two conspiracy members revealed the plans to Securitate, and Ionița was deprived of all his functions except for the military ones. In 1985, Ionița and several other Romanian generals made fresh attempts to reestablish contacts with one another and with envoys of the Soviet military intelligence, GRU. This conspiracy was uncovered too. Most of its members were arrested, and Ionița was murdered in 1987 under unclear circumstances. (LW)

Sources: Who's Who in the Socialist Countries of Europe (Munich, London, and Paris, 1989); Józef Darski, Rumunia: Historia, współczesność, konflikty narodowe (Warsaw, 1995); Ion Alexandrescu, Ion Bulei, Ion Mamina, and Ioan Scurtu, Enciclopedia de istorie României (Bucharest, 2000).

IORGA Nicolae (17 June 1871, Botoșani–28 November 1940, Bucharest), Romanian historian, writer, poet, and politician. Expelled from a gymnasium in Botoșani, Iorga moved to Iași, where he studied history at the university, earning an M.A. degree after only one year of studies. From 1890 to 1892 he studied in Paris, then in Leipzig, where he received a Ph.D. in history (1893). In 1894 he was appointed professor of universal history at the University of Bucharest. In 1890–1900 he belonged to the Social Democratic Party but left it as a result of an ideological evolution. In 1891 he founded the League for the Cultural Unity of All Romanians, which for all Romanians abroad. Iorga was also one of the promoters of the so-called sowers' movement. From 1903 to 1910 he edited Sămănătorul (Sower), a periodical devoted to rural issues. In 1908 he founded a people's university at Văleni de Munte. In 1910 he became a member of the Romanian Academy of Sciences. In the same year, along with Alexandru Cuza, he founded a nationalist party, the National Democratic Party. In 1914 he co-founded the Southeast European Institute (Institutului de Studii Sud-Est Europene), which still exists today. During World War I Iorga led a campaign for the Entente. In 1918 he played a major role in the Grand National Assembly, which voted for the realization of a Greater Romania.

In 1920 Iorga established and directed the Romanian School at Fontenay-aux-Roses in Paris. He also held lectures at the Sorbonne. In 1920 Cuza broke with Iorga to form a Fascist party, the League of National Christian Defense (1923). In 1924 Iorga held the first Byzantine congress. In 1937 he founded the Institute for Byzantine Studies and the Institute of Universal History. In 1925 he joined the National Peasant Party led by Iuliu Maniu, but after one year he left this party to become an independent politician. Iorga supported Charles II, who returned from exile to claim the Romanian throne in 1930. From 18 April 1931 to 6 June 1932 Iorga held the post of prime minister in the government based on his National Democratic Party and the National Agrarian Union of Constantin Argetoianu. In February 1938 he served briefly in the government of Miron Cristea, and between 1938 and 1940 he was the king's adviser. Iorga followed a nationalist doctrine but was against radical methods. His opposition to both the radical left and the radical right led to his assassination by members of the Iron Guard, an ultra-nationalist and Fascist organization.

A prolific writer and publicist, Iorga published over one thousand books and brochures and around twenty-five thousand articles. He published and edited many national periodicals, such as Neamul românesc, Revista istorică, Revue Historique Sud-Est-Européenne, and Floarea darurilor. He also edited many volumes of historical sources. He was against the subordination of history to one philosophical system. His historiography was dominated by a spiritual element. The five-volume Geschichte des Osmanischen Reiches (History of the Ottoman Empire; 1908–13) was his most important work before World War I. Iorga was the author of works of great significance to Romanian history, such as Studii și cercetări cu privire la istoria românilor (Studies and research on the history of Romanians, 41 vols.; 1901–16); Istoria Bisericii românești (History of the Romanian Orthodox Church, 2 vols.; 1930); Istoria armatei românești (History of the Romanian Army, 2 vols.; 1929); and Istoria comerțului românesc (History of Romanian trade, 2 vols.; 1925); Iorga integrated Romanian history with world history. From 1935 to 1939 he published a monumental ten-volume work, Istoria Românilor (Romanian history). An outstanding specialist in universal history, Iorga published, among other works, studies on the Crusades and works about the history of Byzantium and Venice. He also wrote poems, dramas, and memoirs, and he translated American poetry. The author of numerous syntheses on the history of Romanian and Romance literatures—including Istoria literaturii românești contemporane (History of contemporary Romanian literature, 2 vols.; 1934) and Istoria literaturii românești (History of Romanian literature, 3 vols.; 1925–33)—Iorga was also a member of many foreign scholarly societies. (LW)

Sources: Biographisches Lexikon, vol. 2; Dictionar Enciclopedic, vol. 3 (Bucharest, 1999); Barbu Theodorescu, Nicolae Iorga (Bucharest, 1968); Walter Markow, Nicolae Iorga, 1871–1940: Historiker, Literaturhistoriker, Byzantinist (Berlin, 1972); William O. Oldson, The Historical and Nationalist Thought of Nicolae Iorga (New York, 1973); Halina Mirska-Lasota, Mały słownik pisarzy rumuńskich (Warsaw, 1975); Petre Turlea, Nicolae Iorga în viața politică României (Bucharest, 1991); Costin Scorpan, Istoria României: Enciclopedie (Bucharest, 1997); Nicholas Nagy-Talavera, Nicolae Iorga: A Biography (Iași and Portland, Ore., 1998).

ISĂRESCU Mugur (1 August 1949, Drăgășani), Romanian politician and financial expert. In 1971 Isărescu graduated from the Department of International Economics of the Academy of Economic Studies (AES) in Bucharest. In 1971–90 he worked in the Institute of World Economy in Bucharest, and from 1975 to 1990 he lectured in finance, monetary policies, and international economics there. Moreover, in 1980–89 he lectured in these fields at the Foreign Ministry, the Popular University in Bucharest, and the University of Iași. In 1989 Isărescu received a Ph.D. in economics. After the fall of the Nicolae Ceaușescu regime and the takeover by the National Salvation Front (Frontul Salvării Naționale) in December 1989, Isărescu started working in the Foreign Ministry and was sent to the United States. In 1990 he returned to Romania and, thanks to the support of the Petre Roman government, he was elected president of the Romanian National Bank. He held this position until the end of 1999, introducing a banking reform compatible with international standards. In 1991 Isărescu was also vice-president of the World Bank. In 1994–96 he lectured at the Western University in Timișoara and at the AES in Bucharest. From 22 December 1999 to 28 December 2000 he was a non-partisan prime minister on behalf of the center-right Democratic Convention of Romania (Convenția Democratică din România [DCR]), suspending his presidency of the Romanian National Bank. In November 2000 Isărescu ran in the presidential elections as an independent candidate but ended up fourth, with 9.5 percent of the vote, and he returned to the presidency of the central bank. Isărescu authored several books and articles on contemporary Romanian and world economic problems. (LW)

Sources: Dictionar Enciclopedic, vol. 3 (Bucharest, 1999); Ion Alexandrescu, Ion Bulei, Ion Mamina, and Ioan Scurtu, Enciclopedia de istorie României (Bucharest, 2000); Józef Darski, Rumunia: Historia, współczesność, konflikty narodowe (Warsaw, 1995); Tom Gallagher, Romania after Ceaușescu (Edinburgh, 1995); Duncan Light and Daniel Phinnemore, Post-Communist Romania (New York, 2001); www.mugur.isarescu.ro; www.romania-on-line.net.

IVÁN-KOVÁCS László (18 August 1930, Debrecen–30 December 1957, Budapest), one of the leaders of the Hungarian revolution of 1956. Born into a family of clerks, in 1951 Iván-Kovács graduated from an economic high school but failed to gain admission to a law school. He successfully completed two semesters of extramural studies at the Higher School of Economics. In 1951–53 he worked as a civil servant in the army. On 23 October 1956 he took part in a demonstration in front of the Hungarian Radio building. He gained access to weapons and fought against the Soviet troops invading the capital. On 25 October he joined the Corvin Lane insurgents, becoming commander of that largest group of fighters. Iván-Kovács negotiated the conditions of disarmament with the party leadership. On 29 October a delegation of insurgents was received by Imre Nagy, to whom Iván-Kovács presented the demands of the Corvin Lane fighters: the securing of independence for the country, the withdrawal of Soviet troops, abolition of the one-party system, and the creation of a Revolutionary National Guard formed from the insurgents. Although on 1 November he was dismissed as commander, Iván-Kovács remained with the fighters. On 4 November he started a struggle against the Soviet forces, but on that very day he was denounced as a traitor by the Corvin Lane fighters. He was arrested by the insurgents but managed to escape. Holding on to his weapons, he took refuge at his family home in the countryside. In February

1957 he founded an illegal party to defend the ideals of the revolution. Along with his friends, he wrote leaflets and planned to free Pál Maléter, assuming that Maléter was on Hungarian territory. Arrested on 12 March 1957, on 22 August of that year Iván-Kovács was sentenced to death for leading a conspiracy against the “people’s government.” On 27 December 1957 the Supreme Court confirmed the sentence, and three days later he was executed. (JT)

Sources: Magyar Nagylexikon, vol. 10 (Budapest, 2000); Attila Szakolczay, Az 1956-os forradalom és szabadságharc (Budapest, 2001); György Litván, ed., Rewolucja węgierska 1956 roku (Warsaw, 1996).

IVANKA Milan (25 October 1876, Turčianský Sv. Martin–26 August 1950, Bratislava), Slovak politician and journalist. Born into a landowner’s family, Ivanka graduated in law in Budapest. He started his law career in Matuš Dula’s office in his hometown. From 1904 he worked in Trnava. At first, he remained under the influence of the conservative center of the Slovak national movement in Turčianský Sv. Martin, and then he drew closer to the pro-Czech group of the periodical Hlas, and in 1906–14 he edited the periodical Národný hlásnik. In 1907 Ivanka was elected to the Hungarian parliament in Budapest, but in 1909 he was deprived of the mandate and sentenced to one year in prison for “anti-state” proclamations during the electoral campaign. In numerous publications Ivanka criticized the Magyarization policies of the Hungarian government. His best known work was Slováci a Maďari (Slovaks and Hungarians; 1914). During World War I Ivanka cooperated with Milan Hodža. In 1918 he joined the Slovak National Council and headed the department of home affairs in the Ministry for Slovak Administration. In 1918–20 and 1929–34 he sat in the Czechoslovak parliament, where he belonged to the Slovak leaders of the Czechoslovak National Democracy (Československa Národná Demokracia). Ivanka opposed the demands for Slovak autonomy and criticized the People’s Party of Reverend Andrej Hlinka. Ivanka’s booklet, Proti tajnej irredente (Against secret irredentism; 1928), initiated the proceedings that led to the imprisonment of Vojtech Tuča. In 1934 Ivanka gave up his mandate and joined the Agrarian Party. In 1939 he moved to Prague and took part in the Czechoslovak resistance, for which he was imprisoned by the Gestapo in Terezín. After the war he returned to Slovakia, but he retired from politics. (MG)

Sources: SBS; ČBS; Kdo byl kdo v našich dějinách ve 20. století, vol. 1 (Prague, 1998), Politické strany na Slovensku 1860–1989 (Bratislava, 1992); Marián Hronský, Boj o Slovensko a Trianon 1918–1920 (Bratislava, 1998).

IVANOUSKI Vatslau (7 June 1880, Lebiodka, near Shchuchyn–7 December 1943, Minsk), Belorussian social and political activist. Ivanouski was one of the five children of Leonard Iwanowski, the owner of Lebiodka estates. His father was a typical gente Polonus, natione Lituanus (Pole of Lithuanian nationality). In 1891 the family moved to Warsaw to educate the children. Ivanouski attended the Fifth Classical Gymnasium for boys, graduating in 1899. In Warsaw, the Iwanowski brothers chose different national identities. Jerzy, the eldest, chose Polish nationality and in November 1918 became the first Polish minister of trade and industry; Vatslau identified as a Belorussian, while the youngest, Tadeusz, assumed Lithuanian nationality. In 1904 Ivanouski graduated from St. Petersburg Technological Institute and started working there, first as a research and teaching assistant and, after receiving his doctoral degree, as an assistant professor. Along with Alaksander Ulasau and the brothers Anton and Ivan Lutskevich, in 1902 Ivanouski established the Belorussian Revolutionary Party, later the Belorussian Socialist Hromada. In 1903 he began legal and illegal publishing activities in St. Petersburg. Under the title of the “Belorussian People’s Education Group,” he published literature that invoked memories of Belorussian history, traditions, and culture. At that time Ivanouski supported organic work among the peasants and privileged education over politics. In 1906 in St. Petersburg he founded an official publishing house, Zahlanie Sontsa i u Nasha Akontsa (The sun will also shine in our window), which promoted the Belorussian national idea. Ivanouski contributed to the periodical Nasha Niva. In 1912 he made Wilno (Vilnius) the center of Belorussian publishing, establishing there the largest publishing house, which also dealt with the professional distribution of books.

During World War I Ivanouski founded and was the first head of the Belorussian Relief Committee for War Victims. Arrested by the Bolsheviks, he managed to escape and resumed his journalistic activities. After the proclamation of independence by the Council of the Belorussian People’s Republic, Ivanouski became minister of education in the cabinet of Anton Lutskevich. At that time he was in favor of Polish-Belorussian cooperation. He planned the establishment of the Belorussian University in Minsk. He succeeded in establishing the Pedagogical Institute, and from March to October 1920 he was its rector. After the signing of the Treaty of Riga in March 1921, which ended the Polish-Soviet war, Ivanouski withdrew from political life and settled in Warsaw. In the fall of 1922 he became the Chair of Food Fermentation Technology at Warsaw Polytechnic. In 1924 he became associate professor, and in 1935, full professor. In the 1930s he was dean of the Chemistry Department, head of the Military College, and a member of the senate of the Polytechnic.

In September 1939 Ivanouski left for Wilno (Vilnius), which the Soviets soon handed over to the Lithuanian administration. Thanks to his brother Tadeusz, a zoology professor at Kaunas University, Ivanouski was given the Chair of Chemical Technology at Vilnius University. Both brothers hoped that the German-Soviet conflict would debilitate both countries and allow for the establishment of an independent Belorussia in a loose union with Poland. In that spirit, Ivanouski tried to reach an agreement with the intelligence section of the Polish Union of Armed Struggle (Związek Walki Zbrojnej [ZWZ]) but failed to reach a compromise on the issue of the Polish-Belorussian borders. After the Nazi invasion of the USSR in June 1941, Ivanouski waited for a declaration concerning Belorussia. At the beginning of July 1941 the Germans granted permission only for the reactivation of the Belorussian National Committee, and Ivanouski chaired this committee. In December 1941 the Germans named him mayor of Minsk. He followed the program of Wilhelm Kube, general commissioner for the District of Belorussia, who supported Belorussian nationalism. Ivanouski served as president of the Belorussian Trust Council, established in June 1943, which represented the interests of the Belorussian people to the German authorities, and he was also president of the Belorussian Scientific Society. After the assassination of Kube in October 1943, by pointing out the Soviet assassins, Ivanouski managed to convince the Germans not to persecute the Belorussian people. He also went to Berlin to Kube’s funeral. According to the official version, Ivanouski was killed in an assassination arranged by the Soviet underground; this version is more probable than the one stating that the assassination was carried out by supporters of Ivanouski’s political rival, Radaslau Astrouski. (EM)

Sources: Nicholas P. Vakar, Belorussia: The Making of a Nation (Cambridge, Mass., 1956); August Iwański, Sr., Pamiętniki 1832–1876; August Iwański, Jr., Wspomnienia 1881–1939 (Warsaw, 1968); Vitaut Kipel and Zora Kipel, eds., Byelorussian Statehood (New York, 1988); Jerzy Turonek, Białoruś pod okupacją niemiecką (Wrocław, 1989); Jerzy Turonek, Wacław Iwanowski i odrodzenie Białorusi (Warsaw, 1992).

IVANOV Tsveti (24 August 1914, Oriakhovo–23 July 1950, Svishtov), Bulgarian journalist and leftist activist. A member of the Union of Socialist Youth from 1932, Ivanov received a law degree from Sofia University in 1937. He published extensively in the leftist press—for example, in the periodicals Sotsialisticheska Mladezh and Trezva Borba. Between 1940 and 1944 he was editor and publisher of the Khemus Publishing House. After the Communist coup of September 1944 he declared his support for the Bulgarian Social Democratic Workers' Party. As editor-in-chief of the newspapers Literaturen Front and Svoboden Narod, Ivanov criticized Communist methods of governing based on violations of the freedom of speech and the use of force to break up opposition meetings. In June 1946 he questioned the sentencing of Krystio Pastukhov, one of the leaders of the Social Democratic movement, citing examples of blatant violations of the law during Pastukhov's trial; consequently, Ivanov was arrested and accused of "disseminating false information." On 13 August 1946, in a rigged trial in which he defended the freedom of the press, Ivanov was sentenced to one year and seven months in prison, a fine, and the deprivation of his public rights for two years. After serving his sentence, Ivanov was taken to a concentration camp in Belene, where he contracted tetanus. He died in a prison hospital. (AG)

Sources: Entsiklopediya Bulgariya, vol. 3 (Sofia, 1982); Jerzy Jackowicz, Partie opozycyjne w Bułgarii 1944–1948 (Warsaw, 1997).

IWASHKO Volodymyr (28 October 1932, Poltava), Ukrainian Communist activist. After graduating in engineering, from 1956 Ivashko lectured in a mining institute in Kharkiv. A member of the CPSU from 1960, from 1973 he was a professional party worker. In 1978 he became secretary of the Regional Committee in Kharkiv, and in 1980 he worked as a political instructor in Afghanistan. In 1986 he became secretary of the Central Committee (CC) of the Communist Party of Ukraine (CPU). In 1987 he became first secretary of the Dniepropetrovsk Regional Committee, heading the most powerful group of the nomenklatura, connected with the military-industrial complex. In 1986 Ivashko became a deputy member of the CPSU CC and in 1987 a deputy to the Supreme Council of the USSR. From December 1988 he was second secretary of the CPU CC for ideology, becoming, thanks to the support of Mikhail Gorbachev, a potential successor to Volodymyr Shcherbytskyi, a dogmatic member of the old Brezhnevite guard. In view of the establishment of a strong opposition organization—the Ukrainian Popular Movement for Perestroika—on 28 September 1989 the CPU CC Plenum entrusted Ivashko with the post of first secretary.

Initially Ivashko tried to adjust his policies to the growing social aspirations, but he failed to gain the support of the opposition and began to lose the support of the party apparatus, so in November 1989 he returned to a more orthodox rhetoric. After decades of the repression of Ukrainian national culture and as a result of the criminal neglect of the authorities after the Chernobyl disaster, staying in power was too difficult a task for him. In the free elections to the Supreme Council of the Ukrainian SSR in March 1990 Ivashko won in one of the Kiev districts, took the lead of the Communist majority faction For a Sovereign Soviet Ukraine (Za Suverennu Radyansku Ukraïnu), and on 4 June 1990 was elected chairman of the Supreme Council. Nevertheless, he failed to adjust party policies to the changing situation and failed to make consistent personnel changes. Soon, at the Twenty-Eighth CPU Congress in June 1990, Ivashko resigned from the CPU leadership, and at the Twenty-Eighth CPSU Congress on 2 July 1990 he agreed to become Gorbachev's deputy general secretary of the all-Soviet party. On 5 July in Kiev, the pro-independence deputies made the Supreme Council of the Ukrainian SSR prepare a "Declaration of the State Sovereignty of the Ukraine" and demanded a recall of the Ukrainian deputies from the Moscow conference of deputies or, in case they refused, their dismissal. Since the motion was supported by the majority of Communist deputies, Ivashko accepted the ultimatum and resigned from chairing the Ukrainian Supreme Council on 9 July 1990. During the Moscow putsch of August 1991 Ivashko was passive, and his career ended with the dissolution of the CPSU. (TS)

Sources: Alexander Rahr, ed., A Biographical Directory of 100 Leading Soviet Officials (Boulder, Colo., 1990); Kathleen Mihalisko, "Volodymyr Ivashko and Ukraine," Radio Liberty Report on the USSR, 20 July 1990; Taras Kuzio and Andrew Wilson, Ukraine: From Perestroika to Independence (New York, 1994); Bohdan Nahaylo, The Ukrainian Resurgence (Toronto, 1999); V. M. Lytvyn, Ukraïna na mezhi tysiacholit (1991–2000 rr.) (Kiev, 2000).

IWASZKIEWICZ Jarosław, pseudonym "Eleuter" (20 February 1894, Kalnik, Ukraine–2 March 1980, Warsaw), Polish writer and social activist. Iwaszkiewicz was born into an impoverished landowner's family, and his father died while Iwaszkiewicz was still young. In 1902–4 he lived in Warsaw, and then he returned to the Ukraine, where he graduated from high school. In 1912 he enrolled in law and music studies in Kiev. He witnessed the revolution in Kiev, and in 1918 he went to Warsaw, where he made a living by private tutoring. Initially he was connected with the periodical Pro Arte et Studio and took part in the cabaret Pod Picadorem (At Picador's). In 1918 Iwaszkiewicz published his first collection of poems, Oktostychy (Octastichs). Later he drew close to the Expressionist group of the periodical Zdrój, and in 1920 he co-founded the literary group Skamander. In 1923–25 Iwaszkiewicz was secretary to the speaker of the Assembly, Maciej Rataj, and he published a lot in the daily and literary press. In 1925 he went to Paris on a scholarship, where he studied Arabic and Turkish. He was friends with Karol Szymanowski and wrote the libretto for his opera, Król Roger (King Roger; 1926). Thanks to his marriage to Anna Lilpop, the daughter of a rich family, in 1928 Iwaszkiewicz settled in Podkowa Leśna, near Warsaw, in a house called Stawisko. In 1932–35 he was secretary to the Polish legation in Denmark and Belgium, and in the 1930s he traveled a lot in France and southern Italy. He was also active in the International PEN Club. His best known works of that time included Panny z Wilka (Lasses from Wilk; 1933); Brzezina (1933; Birch Grove, 2002); and Młyn nad Utratą (Mill on the Utrata River; 1936).

During the German occupation Iwaszkiewicz lived in Stawisko, which became a shelter for many Polish artists and writers. He also wrote new works, such as Matka Joanna od Aniołów (Mother Joanna of the Angels; 1946). In 1945 he briefly edited the weekly Życie Literackie, and then he was the literary director of the Teatr Polski in Warsaw. In 1945–49 he was chairman of the Trade Union of Polish Writers and a member of the board of the Polish PEN Club. In 1947–48 he edited the weekly Nowiny Literackie. Engaged in the new political system, in 1948 he took an active part in the Congress of Intellectuals in Defense of Peace in Wrocław, and he wrote in the Socialist realist style. From 1952 he was an MP. In 1953 he took part in the public mourning of Stalin. From 1955 until his death he was editor-in-chief of the monthly Twórczość. His best known novel, Sława i chwala (Fame and glory, 3 vols.; 1956–62), covered a wide social panorama of the first half of the twentieth century. From 1959 to his death Iwaszkiewicz was chairman of the Association of Polish Writers. He enjoyed the support of the Communist authorities and, in return, he was always cooperative with them—for instance, he opposed the “Letter of 34,” written by intellectuals against the official cultural policy in 1964. Nevertheless, Iwaszkiewicz’s prose belongs among the best achievements of Polish literature of the twentieth century. Iwaszkiewicz received many national and foreign awards, including the Righteous among the Nations medal of the Yad Vashem Institute in Jerusalem. His ten-volume Dzieła (Works) were published in 1958–59 and his two-volume Dramaty (Dramas) in 1980–84. Iwaszkiewicz also translated from French, Spanish, German, and Russian and translated the works of Søren Kierkegaard. (PK)

Sources: Literatura polska XX w. Przewodnik encyklopedyczny, vol. 1 (Warsaw, 2000); Ryszard Przybylski, Eros i Tanatos: Proza Jarosława Iwaszkiewicza 1916–1938 (Warsaw, 1970); Eugenia Łoch, Pisarstwo Jarosława Iwaszkiewicza wobec tradycji i współczesności (Lublin, 1987); Andrzej Zawada, Jarosław Iwaszkiewicz (Warsaw, 1994); Tadeusz Drewnowski, Próba scalenia: Obiegi-wzorcowe-style (Warsaw, 1997); Jerzy Eisler, List 34 (Warsaw, 1993).

IZETBEGOVIĆ Alija (8 August 1925, Bozanski Samac–19 October 2003, Sarajevo), Bosnian Muslim politician.

Under the German occupation during World War II Izetbegović became active in the movement of Bosnian Muslims, for which he was imprisoned for three years after the war. He graduated in law from Sarajevo University and qualified as a lawyer. In 1970 he published “The Islamic Declaration” in the underground press; in it he called Muslims to a moral revival. In 1982 he published Islam between East and West. In 1983 he was sentenced to fourteen years of prison for anti-state activities, but he was released in November 1988. In May 1990 he was one of the founders of the Party of Democratic Action (Strana Demokratske Akcije), and in October 1990 he was elected the leader of the party. Until 2001 Izetbegović ruled the party in an autocratic way, using radical religious and ethnic rhetoric. From December 1990 he was the president of the Presidency of the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina (serving as the head of state). In June 1991, along with Kiro Gligorov, he proposed a plan for the transformation of the Socialist Federative Republic of Yugoslavia into a looser federation (the so-called plan of asymmetrical federation), but the plan was rejected.

After the proclamation of independence by Slovenia and Croatia on 25 June 1991, Izetbegović decided that Bosnia and Herzegovina could not remain in a Yugoslavia dominated by Serbs. Bosnian Serbs strongly opposed a separation from Yugoslavia, but on 3 March 1992, on behalf of the presidency, Izetbegović nonetheless proclaimed the independence of Bosnia and Herzegovina. He repeatedly expressed his disappointment with the reluctance of the international community to intervene in the face of the escalation of war in Bosnia and Herzegovina, in which the Bosnian Muslims became the main victims of ethnic cleansing. In March 1993 Izetbegović accepted the plan of Cyrus Vance and David Owen, but it was not implemented because the Bosnian Serbs rejected it. Izetbegović was one of the signatories of the peace agreement negotiated in Dayton, Ohio, on 21 November 1995 and signed in Paris on 14 December 1995. By virtue of this agreement Bosnia and Herzegovina formally remained one state composed of two territorial units: the Croat-Muslim Federation and the Bosnian Serb Republic. After the elections of September 1996 Izetbegović again held the post of president of the Presidency of the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina until September 1998, and he remained a member of the presidency until 2000, when he again resumed the position of president for eight months. (AO)

Sources: Noty biograficzne, Redakcja Dokumentacji Prasowej PAP; Laura Silber and Allan Little, The Death of Yugoslavia (London, 1995); Warren Zimmermann, Origins of a Catastrophe (New York and Toronto, 1996); Ante Čuvalo, Historical Dictionary of Bosnia and Herzegovina (Lanham, Md., 1997); Bugajski; www.rulers.org.

J

JAAKSON Ernst (11 August 1905, Riga–4 September 1998, New York), Estonian diplomat and politician. Jaakson studied economics in Riga and law in Tartu. Between 1926 and 1928 he served in the army. From 1928 on he uninterruptedly worked in diplomacy, first in the Information Department of the Estonian Ministry of Foreign Affairs (1928–29) and from 1932 in the General Consulate of Estonia in New York. Jaakson deserves credit for ensuring the continuity of Estonian statehood following the aggression by the USSR in June 1940, the reoccupation of Estonia in 1944, and through more than forty years of Soviet occupation. It was, among other things, thanks to his perseverance that the United States never recognized the annexation of Estonia de jure and that the prewar diplomatic and consular services performed their duties as representatives of a formally recognized state until 1991—that is, until the end of the Soviet occupation of Estonia. In 1965 Jaakson became Estonia’s top-ranking diplomatic representative in the United States, and in that capacity he saw the recovery of Estonian independence. Upon the recognition of Estonian sovereignty by the Western nations in 1991, Jaakson was appointed Estonian ambassador to the United States. He held this position until 1993, when he was formally transferred to the post of consul general in New York. He remained in office until his death. He bequeathed around 500,000 euros to Tartu University. Jaakson left his memoirs, Eestile (For Estonia), and received the highest national medals and awards. (AG)

Sources: Eesti Enstuklopeedia, vol. 14 (Tallinn, 2000); Anne Veliste, Ernst Jaaksonile (Tallinn, 2000); Ernst Jaakson, “Noteworthy Estonians,” <http://www.vm.ee/eng/famous/Jaakson.htm>.

JAAKSON Jüri (16 January 1870, Karuli [later Uue-Võidu], near Viljandi–20 April 1942, Sosva, near Sverdlovsk), Estonian politician and social activist. Jaakson studied law in Dorpat (Tartu) in 1892–96 and worked as a lawyer in Viljandi (1897–1901). Later he moved to Riga, where he ran a law firm until 1914. After the outbreak of World War I, he became a member of the board of the Tallinn City Bank. He was active in various social organizations; for example, he was president of the Viljandi Farmers’ Society and the Koit (Dawn) society. During his stay in Riga Jaakson was president of the Estonian Sobriety Society and also presided over the Imanta Society (1902–5), as well as the Estonian Education and Assistance Society in Riga (1906–14). He also initiated the private Tsar Alexander Estonian School and was president of its Board of Superintendents. In addition, during the war he presided over the Union of Northern Estonian Farmers and the Tallinn Economic Union. After the outbreak of the February 1917 revolution, Jaakson became assistant to the commissar of Estonia Province, and from 1917 to 1918 he was vice-president of the Estonia Province Assembly (Eesti Maanõukogu). In February 1918 he joined the commission that drew up the Estonian declaration of independence. In the Provisional Government he served as general commissioner responsible for taking over property from the German occupation authorities. From 1918 to 1920 Jaakson was minister of justice. A member of the parliament (Riigikogu) for its first four terms and one of the more influential politicians of the national-liberal Estonian People’s Party of Jaan Tõnisson, between 16 December 1924 and 25 November 1925 Jaakson served as head of state (riigivanem, equivalent to president and prime minister). He became head of state after an unsuccessful Communist coup d’état; therefore his was a nonparty government, supported by parties of both the right and the left. Jaakson also had the support of 72 percent of the deputies. Attempts to amend the constitution to strengthen the executive power were thwarted by the Socialist opposition. This conflict was one of the reasons for his government’s resignation.

Until 1940 Jaakson served as president of the Bank of Estonia and was temporarily a member of the National Economic Council (1935–38) and the parliament (1938–40). Unlike Tõnisson, Jaakson was not involved in activities against the dictatorship of Konstantin Päts. As president of the Central Bank, in 1928 Jaakson promoted the introduction of the Estonian national currency, the kroon, and tried to maintain its exchange rate at a stable level of 4 kroon to US$1, guaranteed by reserves of gold and foreign currencies. Under his management, the Central Bank ceased granting loans and concentrated on monetary policy. From 1927 the bank was also formally independent from the government. Jaakson’s efforts greatly contributed to the establishment of a more orderly foreign exchange market and strengthened investors’ trust in Estonia. These policies became one of the main springs of economic growth in the second half of the 1920s. During the Great Depression the bank changed its tactics. With a monopoly on foreign currency exchange for an interim period, it resumed its lending activities, offering cheaper loans than commercial banks and thus boosting economic growth in the second half of the 1930s. After the occupation of Estonia by the Red Army in June 1940, Jaakson was arrested by the NKVD on 14 June 1941, and he was deported to a camp in Sosva, where he was executed by firing squad. (AG)

Sources: Tõnu Parming, The Collapse of Liberal Democracy and the Rise of Authoritarianism in Estonia (London, 1975); Tõnu Tannberg, Matti Laur, Tõnis Lukas, Ain Mäesalu, and Ago Pajur, History of Estonia (Tallinn, 2000); Rein Taagepera, Estonia: Return to Independence (Boulder, Colo., 1993); www.president.ee/eng/riigipead/JuriJaakson.html; www.htg.tartu.ee/eng/index.html; “Strona obchodów 80-lecia niepodległości Estonii,” ew80.www.ee/eng/chronicle/1918.html; “Eesti Pank 1919–1999,” in: Strona Banku Estonii, www.ee/epbe/en/history.html.

JABŁOŃSKI Henryk (27 December 1909, Waliszewo, near Łowicz–27 January 2003, Warsaw), Polish Socialist and Communist activist and historian. Born into a working-class family, after graduating in history from Warsaw University in 1931, Jabłoński started working at this university, and he joined the Polish Socialist Party (Polska Partia Socjalistyczna [PPS]). In 1939 he fought in the September campaign and later served in the Polish Armed Forces (PSZ) in the West. He fought in the battle of Narvik and in France (among other places), after which he returned to Poland in 1945. Initially moderately and later more firmly, Jabłoński was in favor of cooperation with the Communist Polish Workers' Party (Polska Partia Robotnicza [PPR]) within the framework of the Alliance Commission of the Democratic Parties, as well as the struggle against the Polish Peasant Party (PSL). As a representative of the Communist-backed PPS, he became a member of the National Home Council (KRN). In 1946 he was in charge of the PPS Political and Propaganda Department. From 1945 to 1947 he served as president of the Executive board of the Workers' University. From November 1945 to December 1948 he was a member of the PPS Chief Council, and from April 1946 to December 1948, a member of the PPS Central Executive Committee. Jabłoński advocated the merger of the PPS with the PPR. In December 1948 he became a member of the CC of the Polish United Workers' Party (Polska Zjednoczona Partia Robotnicza [PUWP]), and until March 1954 he was a member of the Organizational Bureau of the PUWP CC. In 1947–53 he was deputy minister of education, and as such he implemented a Stalinist program. In 1947 he became professor at the Academy of Political Sciences in Warsaw and in 1950 at Warsaw University. In 1952 he became a member of the Polish Academy of Sciences. From March 1953 to the fall of 1955 he was scientific secretary of the First Department of Social Sciences of the Polish Academy of Sciences and subsequently scientific secretary of the Polish Academy of Sciences until December 1965. Jabłoński authored numerous publications on the Socialist theory of science, the history of the Polish left, and its relations with Vladimir Lenin.

In the mid-1950s Jabłoński was considered a supporter of the Puławska group, and later he supported the ruling team of Władysław Gomułka. In 1965–66 he was minister of higher education, and from 1966 to 1972, minister of education and higher learning. On 4 March 1968, after the first wave of student protests, Jabłoński yielded to the pressure of party authorities and the Ministry of Internal Affairs, and, as minister of education, he made the decision to expel two students, Adam Michnik and Henryk Szlajfer, from Warsaw University. This decision was illegal in light of the regulations then in force, and it greatly increased tensions. When Edward Gierek came to power, Jabłoński became one of the main leaders of the new ruling team. In December 1970 he became a deputy member, and in December 1971 a member, of the PUWP CC Politburo. In March 1972 he assumed the post of president of the Council of State and authorized the disastrous economic policy of the Gierek administration. Between 1976 and 1983 he was president of the All-Polish Committee of the National Unity Front.

A member of parliament in 1947–89, from December 1975 to February 1976 Jabłoński presided over the select committee for drafting amendments to the constitution of the Polish People's Republic. The proposed changes included a provision about the alliance between the Polish People's Republic and the USSR and about the leading role of the PUWP. These proposals caused social protests. In late 1980 Jabłoński spoke aggressively against Solidarity, which was being established at that time. Although at the Ninth Congress of the PUWP in July 1981 Jabłoński resigned from the CC and from its Politburo, in December 1981, as president of the Council of the State, he was instrumental in confirming the decision of General Wojciech Jaruzelski to impose martial law in Poland. In November 1985 Jabłoński resigned as president of the State Council, and he was succeeded by Jaruzelski. At the Tenth Congress of the PUWP in July 1986 Jabłoński returned to the CC of the party and remained a member until the dissolution of the party in January 1990. Between 1983 and 1990 he served as president of the Chief Council of the Association of Fighters for Freedom and Democracy (ZBOWiD). He was loyal to the subsequent rulers of Communist Poland and accepted all subsequent political shifts in the Polish People's Republic. Jabłoński's works include Polityka Polskiej Partii Socjalistycznej w czasie wojny 1914–1918 (Policy of the Polish Socialist Party during the war of 1914–1918; 1958) and Pisma wybrane (Selected writings, 3 vols.; 1985–86). (PK)

Sources: Mołdawa; Słownik polskich polityków XX w. (Warsaw, 1998); Michał Czajka and Marcin Kamler, Leksykon Historii Polski (Warsaw, 1995); Jerzy Eisler, Marzec 1968 (Warsaw, 1991); Włodzimierz Janowski and Aleksander Kocharński, Informator

o strukturze i obsadzie personalnej centralnego aparatu PZPR 1948–1990 (Warsaw, 2000); Jerzy Eisler, Grudzień 1970 (Warsaw, 2000).

JABLONSKIS Jonas, pseudonym “Jonas Rygiškių” (30 December 1860, Kubiliai–23 February 1930, Kaunas), Lithuanian linguist and codifier of the Lithuanian language. After graduating from high school, Jablonskis studied classical languages at Moscow University (1881–85). Because he was a Catholic, after graduating he could not find a job in the schools. He supported himself by giving private lessons and by working as a judicial officer in Marijampole. In 1889 he found a job as a Greek and Latin teacher in Jelgava, Latvia. Because he frequently spent his summer vacations in Lithuania, where he collected linguistic information, the Russian authorities dismissed him from his job in 1896. Jablonskis took up a teaching position in Tallinn while continuing to collect linguistic data and compile a Lithuanian dictionary commissioned by the Russian Academy of Sciences and initiated by Antanas Juška. Expelled from Tallinn in 1901, he continued his work in Pskov. In the same year, he published Lietuviškos kalbos gramatika (Lithuanian grammar). This work, in which he systematized the foundations of the Lithuanian language, was published under the pseudonym “P. Kriaušaitis” in Tilsit (now Sovetsk), Eastern Prussia, because on Russian territory the tsar had imposed a ban on publications in Lithuanian using the Latin alphabet. In 1902 the Russian authorities banned Jablonskis from coming to Lithuania. When both bans were lifted in 1904, he returned to Vilnius and worked in the editorial offices of the periodicals Vilniaus Žinios and Lietuvos Ūkininkas. He also founded the Aušra publishing house. In 1906–8 Jablonskis taught in a pedagogical seminary in Panevėžys; from 1908 to 1912 he taught in Brest-Litovsk and later in Grodno.

After the outbreak of World War I, the Grodno school in which Jablonskis was teaching was evacuated to the interior of Russia. Between 1915 and 1918 he lectured at a gymnasium for Lithuanian refugees in Voronezh. As a result of bad living conditions there, in 1918 he returned to Lithuania almost paralyzed. In 1919 he arrived in Kaunas, and when a university was established there in 1922, he became an honorary professor. Because his health was declining, Jablonskis had to retire in 1926, but he continued his intensive scholarly work until his death. His most important works include Lietuvių kalbos sintaksė (Syntax of the Lithuanian language; 1911); Rašomosios kalbos dalykai (Issues of literary language; 1912); Lietuvių kalbos vadovėlis (Lithuanian language textbook; 1925); and Linksniai ir prielinksniai (Grammatical cases and prepositions; 1929). Thanks to Jablonskis’s excellent linguistic education, his works were rigorous and innovative, as was his theoretical approach. Jablonskis formulated standard modern Lithuanian, enriching literary patterns with the colloquial speech of Lithuanian peasants; standardizing the orthography; removing loan words; and systematizing the grammar, particularly the syntax. A complete edition of his works was published under the title Jablonskio raštai (The works of Jablonskis, 5 vols.; 1932–36). (WR)

Sources: EL, vol. 2; P. Skardžius, “J. Jablonskis ir dabartinė lietuvių bendrinė kalba,” Archivum Philologicum (Kaunas), vol. 6, 1937; J. Palionis, Įžymūs lietuvių kalbininkas Jonas Jablonskis (Vilnius, 1955); Jerzy Ochmański, Litewski ruch narodowo-kulturalny w XIX wieku (Białystok, 1965); Arvydas Vidziūnas, Jono Jablonskis akcentologija (Vilnius, 1997).

JAGIELSKI Mieczysław (12 January 1924, Kolomyia–28 February 1997, Warsaw), Polish Communist activist. Born into a peasant family, Jagielski completed his studies at the Central School of Planning and Statistics and at the Academic Staff Training Institute of the CC of the Polish United Workers’ Party (Polska Zjednoczona Partia Robotnicza [PUWP]) in Warsaw. In 1944 he joined the Fighting Youth Union (Związek Walki Młodych [ZWM]), and in 1946, the Polish Workers’ Party (Polska Partia Robotnicza [PPR]). From December 1948 he belonged to the PUWP. From 1946 to 1950 he worked in the Peasant Mutual Aid Association (Związek Samopomocy Chłopskiej [ZSch]) and later in the Central Administration of State-Owned Farms. In 1952 he started working in the Agricultural Department of the CC of the PUWP and was soon promoted to head of this department. He held this position until 1957. Jagielski initially implemented the party’s policy of the accelerated collectivization of agriculture, but during the “thaw” he did not oppose the dissolution of most agricultural cooperatives in the summer of 1956. In 1957–59 Jagielski was deputy minister of agriculture. In 1959 he became minister of agriculture, implementing quasi-collectivization policies for the development of “agricultural circles.” From March 1954 to March 1959 he was a deputy member of the CC of the PUWP; from March 1959 to July 1981 he was a member of the CC; in 1964–81 he was a deputy member of the Politburo; and in July 1981 he became a member of the Politburo of the CC of the PUWP. In June 1970 Jagielski became deputy prime minister. From 1971 to 1975, as president of the government Planning Commission, he was co-responsible for an increase in investment spending, which led to the waste of enormous resources and the collapse of the economy in the late 1970s. From 1971 to 1981 Jagielski was the permanent representative of Poland to the Council for Mutual Economic Assistance (Comecon) in Moscow. In 1975 he became a professor at the Central School of Planning and Statistics in Warsaw. He authored Niektóre problemy rozwoju rolnictwa w latach 1966–1970 (Some issues in the development of agriculture in the years 1966–70; 1965), O nowej polityce partii na wsi (About the new agricultural policy of the party; 1957), and other works. In 1957–85 he was a member of parliament.

On 21 August 1980 Jagielski was head of a special government commission to negotiate with the Inter-Factory Strike Committee at the Gdańsk shipyard. During the negotiations he held a rather uncompromising stance until the strike at the shipyard turned into a general strike in the Gdańsk area (Triple City). When on 24 August the Fourth Plenum of the CC of the PUPP decided to adopt a political solution to the conflict, Jagielski negotiated in that spirit and brought about an agreement with the Inter-Factory Strike Committee on 31 August. The scene of his signing the agreement with Lech Wałęsa, the president of the Inter-Factory Strike Committee, was immortalized in the world media. Soon afterwards Jagielski was sharply criticized by party hard-liners for his concessions. In July 1981 he resigned as deputy prime minister, and at the end of 1981 he withdrew from political activity. In 1988 he retired. Jagielski was given the Order of the Builder of the People's Poland, the highest state award. (WD)

Sources: Mołdawa; Jean Woodall, ed., Policy and Politics in Contemporary Poland (London, 1982); George Sanford, Polish Communism in Crisis (London, 1983); Timothy Garton Ash, The Polish Revolution: Solidarity (New York, 1985); Słownik biograficzny działaczy polskiego ruchu robotniczego (Warsaw, 1987); Tajne dokumenty Biura Politycznego: PZPR a "Solidarność" 1980–1981 (London, 1992); Lech Wałęsa, Droga nadziei (Kraków, 2000).

JAKEŠ Miloš (12 August 1922, Česká Chalupy), Czech Communist activist. In 1937–50 Jakeš worked in the Bata shoe factory in Žilín. In 1944 he graduated from an industrial electro-technical school. In 1945 he joined the Communist Party of Czechoslovakia (CPC). Initially he was active in the Czechoslovak Youth Union, advancing to the level of its national secretary. In 1955 he left for Moscow, where he studied at the Higher Party School of the CPSU CC for three years. After returning home, he began to advance in the party hierarchy. In 1966 he became deputy minister of interior and a member (and in April 1968 chairman) of the Central Control Commission of the CPC CC. During the Prague Spring of 1968, Jakeš sided with the conservatives, and in this capacity he participated in the Moscow talks of 23–26 August 1968. He fully supported the so-called normalization, as well as purges in the party. In 1977 he became a member and secretary of the CPC CC, and in 1981 he joined the CPC CC Presidium. In 1977–81 Jakeš presided over the CPC CC Commission for Agriculture and Supplies, and from 1981 to 1989, the Commission of the National Economy. After the resignation of Gustav Husák from the post of general secretary of the CPC CC, on 17 December 1987 Jakeš was elected to this position as a compromise candidate, but he was rather a hard-liner. He assumed the leadership under worsening economic conditions and growing social discontent, and he could not cope with the accumulating problems. He tried to maintain the monopoly of CPC power through superficial economic reforms and a tough political line. He had no intellectual skills nor any personal charisma to preserve the Communist power. As a result of the Velvet Revolution, in November 1989 Jakeš was forced to resign from the position of general secretary, and on 5 December 1989 he was expelled from the party. In 1996 he was accused of having betrayed his homeland in 1968, but in September 2002 he was acquitted. Jakeš published the memoirs Dva roky generálním tajemníkem (Two years as general secretary; 1996). (PU)

Sources: ČBS; Kdo byl kdo v našich dějinách ve 20. století, vol. 1 (Prague, 1998); Who's Who in the Socialist Countries of Europe, vol. 2 (Munich, London, and Paris, 1989); Českoslovenští politici: 1918–1991 (Prague, 1991).

JAKOBSON August (2 September 1904, Pärnu–23 May 1963, Tallinn), Estonian writer and Communist activist. In 1922 Jakobson was a co-founder of the Estonian Writers' Union (EWU). In 1926–29 he studied economics, and between 1931 and 1935 he was a medical student. He gained publicity after publishing the grotesque Vaeste-Patuste alev (Village of poor sinners) in 1927. Along with other Socialist writers, Jakobson attempted to found a literary group affiliated with the weekly Kirjanduslik orbiit, of which only a few issues were published. Before the war he gained fame after publishing the series Tuhkur Hobune (1928–33) and a few other novels such as Andruksonide suguvõsa (The Andruksonide Clan; 1934–38). In 1939 he was elected president of the EWU. After the invasion of the Red Army in June 1940 and the incorporation of the Estonian SSR into the USSR, Jakobson became a member of a commission established by the Ministry of Education of the Estonian SSR that prepared an index of books banned from publication. Over 1,500 books, mainly Estonian literature, fell victim to this commission, and twenty authors had all their works banned from publication. At that time Jakobson was a member of the editorial staff of Kommunist, an organ of the Communist Party of Estonia (CPE), and he was also the editor-in-chief of Ilukirjandus ja Kunst, a leading organ of Socialist realism. Jakobson actively helped to suppress the EWU and to transform it into the Estonian Soviet Writers' Union. In his activities, Jakobson was driven by the faith that leftist ideals could be embodied in the Estonian SSR. He was also encouraged by a good financial standing, granted by the Communists to obedient intellectuals.

After June 1941 Jakobson went to the USSR. In 1942 he joined the CPE, and in 1943 along with (among others) Johannes Vares, he co-founded the Writers' Union of the Estonian SSR. After the Red Army again occupied Estonia in 1944, Jakobson was elected president of the Writers' Union of the Estonian SSR and held the position from 1944 to 1946 and from 1950 to 1954. His second nomination to that position especially was proof of the trust the Stalinist leaders placed in him because it came after the Eighth CPE CC Plenum, which was followed by a purge of artists under the slogan of "eliminating bourgeois nationalism." Between 1950 and 1958 Jakobson was president of the Presidium of the Supreme Soviet of the Estonian SSR; in 1951–58 he was a member of the CC of the CPE; and from 1947 to 1963 he was a member of the Supreme Soviet of the USSR. Jakobson subordinated his writing to the requirements of the propaganda for a "struggle for peace" and the "doctrine of Socialist realism." He was the author of Elu tsitadellis (Life in a citadel; 1946), a model Socialist realist novel for which he received the Stalin Prize. After Stalin's death, Jakobson's influence began to diminish. In 1954 he resigned as president of the Writers' Union of the Estonian SSR, and in 1958 he was replaced as president of the Supreme Soviet of the Estonian SSR by Johan Eichweld, a man brought up in the USSR. (AG)

Sources: Bolshaia Sovetskaia Entsiklopediia, vol. 30 (Moscow, 1978); Eesti Entsiklopeedia, vol. 14 (Tallinn, 2000); P. Järv, August Jakobson (Tallinn, 1972); Toivo V. Raun, Estonia and the Estonians (Stanford, 1987); Romualdas J. Misiunas and Rein Taagepera, The Baltic States: Years of Dependence, 1940–1990 (Berkeley, 1993); "Estonian Cultural History Short Overview," Estonian Literary Magazine, 1996, no. 2; <http://www.okupatsioon.ee/english/overviews/index.html>.

JAKOPIĆ Rihard (12 April 1869, Ljubljana–21 April 1943, Ljubljana), Slovene painter. Jakopić graduated from a high school in Ljubljana. Then he studied painting in Vienna (1887–89), Munich (1889–90), and Prague (1903–4). In Munich he met Anton Ažbė, with whom he founded a painting school. In 1904–6 he exhibited in Vienna, Belgrade, Berlin, London, and Sofia, along with other Slovene Impressionists, such as Ivan Grohar, Matija Jama, and Matej Sternen. In 1900 he co-founded the Slovene Society of Arts (Slovensko Umetniško Društvo), and he became its secretary. In 1900 he also organized the first art exhibition in Ljubljana, and in 1907 he founded the Slovene School of Impressionist Drawing and Painting. In 1909 he financed the first art gallery in Ljubljana, known as the Jakopićev Paviljon. This building lasted until 1962, when it was torn down. In 1938 Jakopić became a member of the Slovene Academy of Science and Arts. A special award in his name (Jakopićeva Nagrada) for outstanding artistic achievements was initiated in 1969. Jakopić left about 1,200 paintings and 650 drawings, as well as several articles on art. He is considered an Impressionist, although he evolved toward Post-Impressionism and Symbolism and (after World War I) toward Expressionism. His best known works include the following: Alkoholik (The alcoholic; 1901); Breze (Birch trees; 1902); Med gabri (Between hornbeams; 1904); Sestrici (Sisters; 1912); Spomini (Memoirs; 1912); Sava (The Sava River; 1912); and Slepec (The blind man; 1926). Rihard Jakopić v besedi (Conversations with Rihard Jakopić; 1947) was published posthumously. (AO)

Sources: Enciklopedija Slovenije, vol. 4 (Ljubljana, 1990); Enciklopedija Jugoslavije, vol. 4 (Zagreb, 1961); Anton Podbevšek, Rihard Jakopić (Ljubljana, 1983); L'impressionisme et la peinture de plein air (Paris, 1992).

JAKOVA Tuk (26 April 1914, Shkodër–26 August 1959, Tirana), Albanian Communist activist. Jakova was born into a Catholic family from the northern Albanian ethnic group of Gegs. After attending primary school in Shkodër, he completed two grades of a gymnasium but discontinued his education because of financial problems. It was probably during his military service that Jakova came into contact with the Communist movement. After doing his military service, he worked as a carpenter in a firm that made furniture. At the end of the 1930s he was one of the founders of a Communist group in Shkodër. In January 1939 he was arrested and sentenced to six years. Released in April 1939, he fled to Yugoslavia but returned to his country after a few months. He was a member of the Communist Party of Albania (CPA) from the time the party was founded. In June 1942 he formed one of the first partisan units. Tried in absentia on two occasions, in 1942 Jakova was sentenced to death. He served as a member of the General Staff of the National Liberation Army, a member of the General Council of the National Liberation Front, and political commissar of the First Partisan Brigade.

When in February 1945 a central organization of trade unions was established at a congress of workers' delegates, Jakova assumed its leadership and continued at its helm until 1947. Among the CPA leaders, he was one of the few representatives of the northern part of Albania. He was frequently assigned crucial missions, such as negotiations with the Catholic Church or with representatives of Western countries. In August 1946 he conducted talks with U.S. State Department representatives on the recognition of the new Albanian government by Washington. In 1946 Jakova submitted Albania's request for admission to the United Nations to the UN Security Council. From February to October 1947 he was ambassador to Yugoslavia, accredited also to Hungary. In 1945–55 he was a deputy to the People's Assembly, and between January and March 1946, president of the parliament. In September 1948 Jakova supported Enver Hoxha against Koçi Xoxe, and he joined the Politburo of the CC. Soon afterwards he was promoted to second secretary of the CC of the Albanian Labor Party (ALP), and on 28 November 1948 he became deputy prime minister. In 1950–54 he headed the ministry of industry and the ministry of finance.

In February 1951 Jakova was expelled from the Politburo for his protests against the terror that Hoxha wanted to unleash after a bomb exploded in the building of the Soviet legation in Tirana. At the Second Congress of the ALP in late March and early April 1952 Hoxha attacked Jakova for "opportunism" and for "defying party orders concerning religious issues." Jakova did a self-criticism, and therefore he was not expelled from the CC. After Stalin's death in 1953, Jakova began to advocate the rehabilitation of Xoxe, whose liquidation he had helped to bring about. In July 1953 he resigned as deputy prime minister but returned to that post one year later. He was finally dismissed on 24 June 1955 on charges of revisionism and pro-Yugoslav activities. After the Twentieth Congress of the CPSU, demands for Jakova's rehabilitation were voiced at ALP conferences in April 1956, including a national conference, but in vain. Through repression, Hoxha broke down the opposition within the CC of the ALP that had allegedly been instigated by Jakova. During a wave of persecutions in 1957 Jakova was arrested and sentenced to twenty years' imprisonment. He served his sentence in Vlorë and Zvernec, and in 1958 he was transferred to Tirana, where he died in a prison hospital. In 1999 his letters to his wife from prison were published. (TC)

Sources: Bashkimi, 22 November 1945; Stavro Skendi, Albania (New York, 1956); William E. Griffith, Albania and the Sino-Soviet Rift (Cambridge, Mass., 1963); Henry Hamm, Albania: China's Beachhead in Europe (London, 1963); Arshi Pipa, Albanian Stalinism: Ideo-Political Aspects (New York, 1990); Mita Jakova and Tuk Jakova, Leterkëmbim dhimbshem 1957–1959 (Tirana, 1999).

JAKUBISKO Juraj (30 April 1938, Kojšov, near Spišská Nová Ves), Slovak film director. In 1966 Jakubisko graduated from the Film and Television Department of the Theater and Music Academy in Prague. During his studies he had already attracted attention, winning awards at the short-feature film festivals in Mannheim, Oberhausen, and Bergamo. He made his feature film debut with Kristove roky (Christ's years; 1967), in which he dealt with the complicated relationship between Czechs and Slovaks. Then he directed the experimental movies Zbehovia a pútníci (Refugees and pilgrims; 1968), Vtáčkovia, siroty a blázni (Birds, orphans, and clowns; 1969), and Dovidenia v pekle priatelí (See you in hell, friends; 1970); these were banned in Czechoslovakia during the "normalization" after the suppression of the Prague Spring. Forced into silence for years, in 1983 Jakubisko directed his best film, Tisícročná včela (The thousand-year-old bee), based on the novel by Petr Jaroš; in it folk naturalism was combined with mystic poetry, and it was interpreted as a symbol of the Slovak experience and an homage to the common people. The influence of his experimental style can also be seen in Jakubisko's later films, such as Perinbaba (1985); Sedím na konári a je mi dobre (I sit on a branch and I feel fine; 1989); Lepšie byť bohatý a zdravý ako chudobný a chorý (It is better to be rich and healthy than poor and sick; 1992); and Nejasná zpráva o konci sveta (Unclear report of the end of the world; 1997). Jakubisko's films were presented at many international festivals and won him several awards. Since the breakup of Czechoslovakia, Jakubisko has lived in Prague, where, with his wife, he runs a Film Studio, J&J Jakubisko Film. (PU)

Sources: ČBS: Kdo byl kdo v našich dějinách ve 20. století, vol. 1 (Prague, 1998); Jan Jaroš, Juraj Jakubisko (Prague, 1989); Jerzy Płażewski, Historia filmu 1895–2000 (Warsaw, 2001); Jean Loup Passek, ed., Dictionnaire du cinéma (Paris, 1991); www.jakubisko.cz.

JAŁBRZYKOWSKI Romuald (7 February 1876 Łętowo-Dąb, near Łomża–19 April 1955, Białystok), Polish Roman Catholic archbishop of Wilno (Vilnius). Jałbrzykowski graduated from high school in Łomża, from the theological seminary in Sejny (1898), and from the Theological Academy in St. Petersburg in 1902. Ordained in March 1901, he taught at the Sejny seminary, and from 1910 he was canon of the cathedral chapter in Sejny. Evacuated to Mohylev in 1915, from 1916 he lived in Minsk, where he worked in the Polish Relief Society for the Victims of War. In 1917 he returned to Sejny, where he became vicar general of this part of the Sejny diocese, which was incorporated into Poland. On 28 July 1918 Jałbrzykowski was consecrated auxiliary bishop of the Sejny diocese, and on 14 December 1915 he became ordinary bishop of the newly created Łomża diocese. On 24 June 1926 he was appointed the first archbishop metropolitan of the Wilno (Vilnius) archdiocese. Close to the National Democracy and supported by the Polish majority of this diocese, Jałbrzykowski was not popular among the Lithuanian minority. After the Vilnius region was incorporated into Lithuania in October 1939, despite Lithuanian pressure, he did not resign, but after the Soviet invasion of June 1940 he was expelled from office and put under house arrest. In 1942–44 Jałbrzykowski was imprisoned by the Germans. In 1945 he left for Białystok in Poland; from there he administered the Polish part of the Wilno archbishopric until his death. (WR) Sources: PSB, vol. 10; Encyklopedia historii Drugiej Rzeczypospolitej (Warsaw, 1999); Piotr Łossowski, Litwa a sprawy polskie 1939–1940 (Warsaw, 1982); Jan Żaryn, Stolica Apostolska wobec Polski i Polaków w latach 1944–1958 (Warsaw, 1998).

JANÁČEK Leoš (3 July 1854, Hukvaldy, Moravia–12 August 1928, Ostrava, Czechoslovakia), Czech composer. At eleven Janáček entered a music school at the Augustinian monastery in Brno. From 1869 to 1874 he attended a teacher training institute, and in 1880 he earned the title of music teacher at the Prague Organ School. In 1879 he entered the Leipzig Conservatory and in 1880 moved to study in Vienna, but he never completed his studies. In 1881 in Brno, Janáček founded the Society for the Promotion of Church Music in Moravia, under whose auspices an organ school was established. He directed this school until 1919. From 1886 to 1902 he also worked as a voice teacher at a high school. He was active as a conductor, choirmaster, organizer of musical life (for example, in the Beseda choral society in Brno), and a critic and theoretician of music. In 1886 Janáček entered into a collaboration with František Bartoš, who encouraged his interest in Moravian folk songs. This interest resulted in the works Národní písně moravské (Moravian folk songs, 1901; co-authored with Bartoš) and Moravské písně milostné (Moravian love songs, 1930; co-authored with Pavel Vaša). An outstanding authority on Moravian folk music, in 1919 Janáček became president of the Brno branch of the State Institute of Folk Songs. After 1904 he devoted himself to composing and gave up most other occupations. In 1909–11 he was president of the Club of the Friends of Art in Brno. After the Organ School was transformed into a conservatory in 1919, Janáček became a professor and lectured there until 1925. In 1925 he was named an honorary doctor of Masaryk University in Brno. In 1912 he became a member of the Czech Academy of Sciences and Arts, and in 1927, a member of the Prussian Academy of Arts.

Janáček's first works show the distinct influence of other composers, mainly Antonín Dvořák, Bedřich Smetana, Richard Strauss, and Richard Wagner. In 1888 he turned to Moravian folk music and later to Czech and Slovak folk music. Lašské tance (Lachian dances; 1889–90) is the first notable work of that period. He enriched the harmonic structure of this work while preserving the folk rhythms and melodic schemes. Její pastorkyňa (Jenůfa; 1904), the first Moravian national opera, is the most important work of his folk music period. In this opera, Janáček employed vocal exclamations and his own “speech melody” concept, bringing out the poetic charm of folk language and folk music. The topics of his operas were often inspired by Russian literature, on the wave of Slavophilism popular in Bohemia. Works arising from that inspiration include the operas Kát'a Kabanová (1921) and Z mrtvého domu (From the house of the dead; 1930), as well as instrumental works such as Piano Trio (1908), First String Quartet, and Taras Bulba (1921). Janáček increasingly used autobiographical motifs in his works—for instance, in the opera Osud (Fate, 1903–6; premiere in 1958). In his later instrumental music he also employed Impressionistic techniques. The works written toward the end of his life, Concertino (1925) and Sinfonietta (1926), represent a modern approach to form and tone color. Janáček left nine operas, four cantatas, four choral works, five symphonic works, the ballet Rákós Rákoczy (1891), and many chamber and piano works. (PU)

Sources: ČBS; Max Brod, Leoš Janáček: Život a dílo (Prague, 1924); Hans Hollander, Leoš Janáček (London, 1963); Erik Chrisholm, The Operas of Leoš Janáček (Oxford, 1971); Bohumír Štědroň, Leoš Janáček: K jeho lidskému a uměleckému profilu (Brno, 1976); Michael Ewans, Janáček's Tragic Operas (London, 1977); William D. Curtis, Leoš Janáček (Utica, N.Y., 1978); Milan Šolc and Jarmil Burghauser, Leoš Janáček: Souborné kritické vydání (Prague, 1979); Kurt Honolka, Leoš Janáček: Sein Leben, sein Werk, seine Zeit (Stuttgart, 1982); Bohumír Štědroň, ed., Leoš Janáček: Vzpomínky, dokumenty, korespondence a studie (Prague, 1986); Paul Wingfield, ed., Janáček Studies (Cambridge, 1999); Meinhard Sarembe, Leoš Janáček: Zeit-Leben-Werk-Wirkung (Kassel, 2001); Mirka Zemanová, Janáček (Boston, 2002).

JANCSÓ Miklós (27 September 1921, Vác), Hungarian film director. After graduating from the Law Department of the university in Kolozsvár (Cluj) in 1944, Jancsó served in the army and was taken POW by the Soviets. After his release and return home, he graduated from the Higher Theater and Film School in Budapest (1950). At the same time he was active in Communist youth organizations. In the 1950s he mostly directed documentaries and propaganda newsreels. After 1956 he dealt with cartoon films and in the 1960s with feature films. All together he directed more than twenty films. His films were full of subtle dramaturgy and generalized national and universal experience. He created a unique film narrative. Applying long shots, he showed his characters in a crowd or against the background of a wide outdoor panorama. Jancsó also directed stage plays, adapting several classical works of Hungarian and foreign literature. His most outstanding movies included moral and philosophical analyses of human behavior in breakthrough moments of Hungarian history from the Spring of Nations to the Hungarian Soviet Republic: Szegénylegények (The desperate; 1965); Csillogások, katonák (Stars on caps; 1967); Csend és kiáltás (Silence and scream; 1968); Még kér a nép (The red psalm; 1972), an award winner at the Cannes Festival; Szerelmem, Elektra (Electra, my love; 1974); Magyar rapszódia (Hungarian rhapsody; 1978); and Jézus Krisztus horoszkópja (The horoscope of Jesus Christ; 1988). Jancsó received special awards for his overall work at Cannes (1979) and Venice (1987). (MS)

Sources: International Dictionary of Films and Filmmakers, vol. 2 (Chicago and London, 1991); Miklós Jancsó: Seminarium filmowe (Wrocław, 1979); Jozsef Marx, Jancsó Miklós két és több élete (Budapest, 2000); Ki kicsoda 2002 (Budapest, 2001).

JANKOWSKI Jan Stanisław, pseudonyms “Doktór” and “Soból” (6 May 1882, Krassowo Wielkie, Wysokie Mazowieckie County–13 March 1953, USSR), Polish Christian Democratic politician, delegate of the Polish Government-in-Exile for the Homeland. Jankowski came from a landowning family and graduated from high school in Piotrków Trybunalski in 1900. He studied physics, mathematics, and chemistry in Warsaw. After a school strike in 1905 he went to study in Prague, where he received a diploma as a chemical engineer in 1906. In 1912 he also completed an agricultural college at the Jagiellonian University in Kraków. In 1901 he joined the Union of Polish Youth called Zet. In 1906 he co-organized the National Workers’ Union (Narodowy Związek Robotniczy [NZR]), and in 1908 he became a member of the NZR Main Board. In 1912–13 he represented the NZR in the Provisional Commission of Confederated Independence Parties, and, from 1915, in the Chief Committee of the United Independence Parties. Between September and December 1915 Jankowski served in the First Regiment of the Polish Legions, and later he became a member of the Central National Committee in German-occupied Warsaw. Beginning in 1917 he administered estates in the former Kingdom of Poland. In April 1920 he became head of the Main Land Office. In May 1920 he co-founded the National Workers’ Party (Narodowa Partia Robotnicza [NPR]), formed from the NZR. Between March and May 1921, as a representative of his party, Jankowski was minister of labor and social welfare. In February 1925 he was deputy minister of labor and social welfare, and between April and May 1926 he was again minister. From September 1920 to May 1923 he was NPR president and then vice-president until 1933. In 1928–35 he was an MP, and from 1926 to 1936 he was vice-president of the Polish Trade Union (Zjednoczenie Zawodowe Polskie [ZPP]). In 1937 he joined the Labor Party (Stronnictwo Pracy [SP]), which was formed by the merging of the NPR and the Christian Democratic Party.

During the Nazi occupation Jankowski formally worked for the City Board and in various social welfare institutions. At the same time, from the beginning of the German occupation, he was active in the SP underground structures. In 1941 he became director of the Department of Labor and Social Welfare of the Delegation of the Polish Government-in-Exile for the Homeland, and in 1943 he was appointed to a three-member advisory committee to Julian Kulski, the administrator of Warsaw. Jankowski was also active in the Information and Propaganda Bureau of the Home Army Headquarters. In December 1942 he became a deputy to Jan Piekalkiewicz, the delegate of the Polish Government-in-Exile for the Homeland. Following Piekalkiewicz’s arrest on 19 February 1943, Jankowski replaced him as delegate, and his nomination was confirmed by President Władysław Raczkiewicz in April 1943. On 22 May 1943 Jankowski was also nominated deputy premier of the Polish government in London. As such, from May 1944 he was in charge of the National Council of Ministers (Krajowa Rada Ministrów [KRM]). On 25–26 July 1944 the Polish government-in-exile authorized Jankowski to “make all decisions necessitated by the pace of the Soviet offensive” and to “announce the uprising at a time of your choosing.” Jankowski made that dramatic decision on 31 July, following consultations with the Home Army command. During the uprising he was in the capital, and after its failure he was secretly taken to Pruszków, where he continued his underground work. Jankowski was arrested by the NKVD on the night of 27–28 March 1945, when he was supposed to have talks with General Ivan Serov. In the Trial of the Sixteen, on 21 June 1945 Jankowski was sentenced to eight years for alleged “hostile activities” in the rear of the Red Army. According to the Soviet Red Cross, he died in prison. (WR)

Sources: Kunert, vol. 1; T. Monasterska, Narodowy Związek Robotniczy 1905–1920 (Warsaw, 1973); Bohdan Kroll, Opieka i samopomoc społeczna w Warszawie 1939–1944 (Warsaw, 1977); Henryk Przybylski, Chrześcijańska Demokracja i Narodowa Partia Robotnicza w latach 1926–1937 (Warsaw, 1980); W. Ciechowski, “Jan Stanisław Jankowski,” Ład, 1984, no. 10; Waldemar Grabowski, Delegatura Rządu Rzeczypospolitej Polskiej na Kraj (Warsaw, 1995); Andrzej K. Kunert and Eugeniusz Piontek, Proces moskiewski przywódców polskiego państwa podziemnego (Warsaw, 2000).

JÁNOSI Ferenc (13 January 1916, Sárospatak–2 September 1968, Budapest), Hungarian priest and politician. After theological studies in Sárospatak, where he was ordained a Calvinist pastor, Jánosi studied theology at the university in Wittenberg (1937–38) and graduated in Hungarian, Latin, and Greek pedagogy from the university in Debrecen in 1941. He also received a Ph.D. there. During World War II he worked as a chaplain in the army and was taken POW by the Soviets. He undertook propaganda activities among Hungarians POWs, editing the Red Army periodical Új Szó (1944). In 1944 he married Erzsébet Nagy, daughter of Imre Nagy. In December 1944 he co-organized the Provisional National Government, obedient to the Kremlin. In 1944–51 Jánosi worked in the Ministry of Defense, advancing to the rank of general and later becoming secretary of state in the Ministry of Culture. From 1954 he was general secretary of the National Council of the Patriotic People's Front, and in 1955–57, director of the Sándor Petőfi Literary Museum. During the 1956 revolution Jánosi stood by Nagy. Interned and tried along with him in 1958, he was sentenced to eight years in prison. Released in 1960 through an amnesty for political prisoners, he worked as a planning officer in a food processing plant in Budapest and later as archivist of Pest County. In 1963 Jánosi co-founded the so-called movement of local chronicle writers. (MS)

Sources: Magyar Nagylexikon, vol. 10 (Budapest, 2000); Judit Ember, Menedékhely—1956 (Budapest, 1989); In memoriam Nagy Imre (Budapest, 1989); György Litván and Janós M. Bak, eds., Die ungarische Revolution 1956 (Vienna, 1994).

JANOŮŠEK Karel (30 October 1893, Přerov–27 October 1971, Prague), Czech air force general. After graduating from high school, Janoušek worked as a clerk. Sent to the Russian front in 1914, he was taken prisoner and subsequently joined the Czechoslovak Legion. As a soldier of the Czechoslovak Legion, he took part in many battles, including the battle of Zborov, and he fought in Siberia. After returning to Czechoslovakia in 1920, he entered the Military College in Prague as an auditor, and in 1923 he finished his studies. Later he served as a general staff officer in the land command operations unit in Prague. Janoušek greatly contributed to the development of the Czechoslovak air force, and in 1934–39 he was commander of the air force in Bohemia. In 1937 he was promoted to major general (in British English: air vice-marshal). In June 1939 he began underground activities, but in November of that year he emigrated to France and became chief of the Third (air force) Department of the Czechoslovak military command. After the fall of France Janoušek was active in Great Britain, where he served as commander of the Czechoslovak air force. In 1940 he became air marshal of the Czechoslovak Air Force in Britain and air vice-marshal in the Royal Air Force. After the war Janoušek served for three years as deputy chief of the general staff for special tasks, and later he served for a short time as inspector-general of anti-aircraft defense. After the Communist coup of February 1948 he was dismissed from the army. During an attempt to emigrate in April 1948, provoked by an agent of the special services, Janoušek was arrested and sentenced to nineteen years' imprisonment. Two years later his sentence was increased to life imprisonment. Amnestied in 1960, he was rehabilitated in 1968. In 1990 he was reinstated to the rank of lieutenant general, and one year later he was posthumously promoted to general. (PU)

Sources: ČBS; Kdo byl kdo v našich dějinách ve 20. století, vol. 1 (Prague, 1998); Z. Vališ, Generál Karel Janoušek (Prague, 1997); John O. Crane and Sylvia Crane, Czechoslovakia: Anvil of the Cold War (New York, 1982).

JANOWICZ Sokrat (4 September 1936, Krynki), Belorussian writer and social activist in Poland. In 1955 Janowicz graduated from an electro-technical school in Białystok. From 1956 he worked on the editorial board of the weekly Niva, edited in Belorussian. In 1973 he graduated in Polish studies from Warsaw University. He was active in the Belorussian Social and Cultural Society. In 1970 he was expelled from the (Communist) Polish United Workers' Party for "anti-Sovietism and Belorussian nationalism." During martial law Janowicz edited the uncensored Belorussian press. In 1988 he co-founded an unregistered Belorussian club, and in 1989 he ran in the elections to the Senate, but he lost. In 1990–92 he presided over the Belorussian Democratic Union (Białoruskie Zjednoczenie Demokratyczne), the only party representing national minorities in Poland. In 1994 he withdrew from political activity. In 1997 Janowicz founded a society called Willa Sokrates, and later he organized literary meetings of writers, translators, and literary critics from Poland, Belarus, and other countries. He made his literary debut in Niva in 1956. In 1969 he published his first collection of short stories, Zahony (Field patches). His short literary pieces were sort of philosophical treatises by the heroes he found in his social environment. In 1979 Janowicz published the novel Ściana (The wall), and in 1981, Samasiey (Self-seeding), but he gained the widest renown for his social and political journalism, which is represented by the historical essay Białoruś, Białoruś (Belarus, Belarus; 1987) and the volume Dolina pełna losu (The fateful valley; 1993). (EM)

Sources: Bielaruskiya pismienniki (1917–1990): Davednik (Minsk, 1994); Bielaruskiya pismienniki: Biblijahraficzny slownik, vol. 6 (Minsk, 1995).

JANŠA Janez (17 September 1958, Ljubljana), Slovene politician. Janša graduated in military studies in Ljubljana, and then he joined the League of Communists of Slovenia. He taught at a high school and was a consultant to the republican defense secretariat in Ljubljana. He was also active in the League of Communist Youth of Slovenia. In 1986 he organized a conference on the security of the Slovene republic. His criticism of the condition of the Yugoslav People's Army (YPA) led to his expulsion from the Communist Party. Janša worked in a private computer company, and he continued to write critical articles on the YPA—for instance, in the periodical Mladina. In July 1988 he was temporarily arrested for possessing a classified document. His case catalyzed the movement for Slovene independence. In the summer of 1989 Janša co-founded the Slovenian Democratic Union (Slovenske Demokratične Zveze). After the elections of April 1990 Janša became minister of defense in the government of Lojze Peterle. During the ten-day war with the YPA (27 June–6 July 1991) Janša worked out a plan for national defense through guerrilla operations, and he played an important role in stabilizing the independence of Slovenia.

Janša continued as minister of defense in the government of Janez Drnovšek. He created serious controversy by publishing his memoirs, Premiki: Nastajanje in obramba slovenske države 1988–1992 (Memoirs: Emergence and defense of Slovene statehood, 1988–1992; 1992). From 1993 he chaired the Social Democratic Party of Slovenia (Socialdemokratska Stranka Slovenije [SPS]). In 1993 he entered into conflict with President Milan Kučan, who feared his strong position. Janša, on the other hand, suspected Kučan of having been at least partly responsible for Janša's imprisonment in 1988. In July 1993 arms and munitions destined for Bosnia were found in the Maribor airport; they violated the international embargo. Janša was accused of engineering the operation. Information about his involvement came from the Ministry of Interior, which was a counterpart to military intelligence. It was thought that this was the ministry's revenge for Janša's having revealed information on the military's secret handling of gambling profits. For his part Janša accused Kučan of organizing illegal arms dealings, but the president denied these accusations. In March 1994 Janša was forced to resign, and the SPS joined the opposition. In the elections of November 1996 the SPS won 18 percent of the mandates, and Janša won a seat for himself. He was one of the leaders of the opposition. In May 2000 he regained the portfolio of defense minister in the government of Andrej Bajuk. In the elections of October 2000 the SPS won almost 16 percent of the mandates but was in opposition to the subsequent government of Drnovšek, and in November 2000 Janša resigned from chairing the SPS. (WR) Sources: Slovenski kdo je kdo (Ljubljana, 1999); Leopoldina Plut-Progelj and Carole Rogel, Historical Dictionary of Slovenia (Lanham, Md., 1996); Jill Benderly and Evan Kraft, eds., Independent Slovenia: Origins, Movements, Prospects (London, 1994); James Gow and Cathie Carmichael, Slovenia and the Slovenes (London, 2000); Bugajski; www.sds.si.

JAROSS Andor (23 May 1896, Komáromcsehi–11 April 1946, Budapest), Hungarian politician from Slovakia. Jaross was an activist of Hungary's ruling Party of Unity in the region of Feldivék, which was incorporated into Hungary under the First Vienna Award in November 1938. At that time, he became minister for the regained territories in the government of Béla Imrédy. In 1939, along with Imrédy, Jaross switched over to the Party of Hungarian Life, founded by Pál Teleki. In October 1940 Jaross was one of the founders of the extreme right-wing Party of Hungarian Renewal (Magyar Megújulás Pártja). An aggressive and brutal anti-Semite, when Germany occupied Hungary in March 1944, Jaross became minister of interior in the government of General Döme Sztójay. In that role, he concentrated the Jewish population into ghettos and subsequently began deporting Jews to extermination camps. In August 1944 Regent Miklós Horthy dismissed Jaross when he realized what he was doing, but under Ferenc Szálasi, Jaross again became a member of the government and continued the extermination of Hungarian Jews. Captured after the war and tried in Budapest, Jaross was sentenced to death and executed. (WR) Sources: Philip Rees, Biographical Dictionary of the Extreme Right since 1890 (New York, 1990); C. A. Macartney, October Fifteenth: A History of Modern Hungary, vols. 1–2 (Edinburgh, 1957–61); M. Lacko, Arrow Cross Men, 1935–1944 (Budapest, 1969).

JAROSZEWICZ Piotr (8 October 1909, Nieśwież–1 September 1992, Anin, near Warsaw), Polish Communist activist. Brought up in a teachers' family, Jaroszewicz graduated from the Free Polish University. Before the war he directed a primary school near Garwolin. During the war he was in the USSR; in 1943 he joined the Polish units that were being formed by General Zygmunt Berling. In 1944 Jaroszewicz joined the Polish Workers' Party (Polska Partia Robotnicza [PPR]), and in 1948 he became a member of the Polish United Workers' Party (Polska Zjednoczona Partia Robotnicza [PUWP]). In 1944–45 Jaroszewicz served as deputy commander of the First Polish Army for political and educational affairs, and from 1945 to 1946 he was deputy chief of the Main Political and Educational Board of the Soviet-controlled

Polish Army. From 1946 to 1950 he served as deputy minister of national defense and as chief quartermaster of the Polish Army. In 1947 he became a deputy member of the CC of the PPR. From December 1948 to February 1980 he was a member of the CC of the PUWP, and in 1964 he became a deputy member of its Politburo. In 1950 he was appointed deputy president of the State Committee for Economic Planning. From 1954 to 1955 he was minister of mining, and from 1955 to 1956, minister of coal mining. He subsequently assumed the post of permanent Polish representative to the Council for Mutual Economic Assistance (Comecon), and he held this post until 1970. From 1958 to 1970 Jaroszewicz was president of the Committee for Economic Cooperation of the Council of Ministers. Between November 1952 and December 1970 he also held the post of deputy prime minister. Owing to his special loyalty to the Kremlin, he managed to keep senior posts despite leadership reshuffles. From 1972 to 1980 Jaroszewicz was one of the leaders of the Association of Fighters for Freedom and Democracy (ZBOWiD). From 1947 to 1980 he was an MP.

After the fall of Władysław Gomułka, Jaroszewicz joined the Politburo and became head of the government on 23 December 1970. One of the architects of the economic policy of Edward Gierek, Jaroszewicz believed that a modernization of the economy, the introduction of new technologies, and an inflow of investments would afford an additional chance to discreetly expand military potential. On that issue, he followed the Moscow party line, and he promoted only those sectors of the economy that were important to the Kremlin. At the Seventh Congress of the PUWP (8–12 December 1975) Jaroszewicz read the program paper, “The Main Principles of the Social and Economic Development of Poland between 1976 and 1980.” His loyalty to the USSR was often cited as a source of contention during intra-party strife.

In 1976–77, the practice of settling accounts with Comecon countries via the so-called transfer ruble, which was disadvantageous to Poland, led to a deep economic crisis that was compounded by irresponsible investment policies. A proposal to raise prices, presented by Jaroszewicz in the Assembly on 24 June 1976 and approved by top party leaders, was the direct cause of strikes, which were brutally suppressed in Radom and Ursus. As a result of the crisis, Jaroszewicz was subjected to severe criticism for economic failures in the decade 1970–80. At the Eighth Congress of the PUWP (11–15 February 1980) Jaroszewicz was made a scapegoat, failed to get to the CC, and was removed from the post of prime minister. In December 1980 he was forced to resign his parliamentary seat and was subsequently expelled from the PUWP. After martial law was imposed, he was briefly interned, for show, by the regime of General Wojciech Jaruzelski. In 1984, by decision of the Assembly, Jaroszewicz was brought before the Tribunal of State, but after a few months the proceedings against him were discontinued. In 1991 Jaroszewicz published an extended interview, Przerywam milczenie (I break the silence). Jaroszewicz and his wife, Alicja Solska, who was a journalist for Trybuna Ludu, were murdered in unexplained circumstances. (PK)

Sources: Mołdawa; Słownik polityków polskich XX w. (Poznań, 1998); Zbigniew Błażyński, Towarzysze zeznają. Z tajnych archiwów Komitetu Centralnego (London, 1987); Andrzej Albert [Wojciech Roszkowski], Najnowsza historia Polski 1914–1993, vol. 2 (Warsaw, 1995); Kto jest kim w Polsce (Warsaw, 1985).

JARUZELSKI Wojciech (6 July 1923, Kurów, near Puławy), Polish general, Communist activist, and politician. Born into an impoverished family of landed gentry with patriotic traditions, from 1933 Jaruzelski studied in a high school run by the Marian Order in Warsaw. After the outbreak of the war in September 1939 his parents sought shelter in Lithuania; from there they were deported by the Soviets to Siberia in June 1941. Jaruzelski’s father perished in the Gulag, while Jaruzelski and his mother were forced to settle in Turachak, in the Altai region, where he worked at felling trees and did other hard labor. In 1943 Jaruzelski joined the Polish Army formed under Soviet control; he graduated from officer training school in Ryazan, and he fought with the First Army all up until its final operations on the Oder and Elbe. After the war Jaruzelski remained in the army, supporting the new Communist power. He took part in operations against the Polish pro-independence fighters and against the Ukrainian Insurgent Army near Hrubieszów. In 1947 he joined the (Communist) Polish Workers’ Party, and from December 1948 he was a member of the Polish United Workers’ Party (Polska Zjednoczona Partia Robotnicza [PUWP]), which, along with his work for the military intelligence, helped him toward a brilliant career in the (Communist) Polish Army (Wojsko Polskie [WP]). In 1953 he was promoted to the rank of colonel.

In 1955 Jaruzelski graduated with distinction from the Higher School of Infantry (HSI) and from the Academy of the General Staff. In July 1956 he became the youngest WP brigadier general. In 1947–57 Jaruzelski lectured at the HSI and was head of the Administration of Military Academies and deputy head of the Chief Administration of Combat Training, enjoying a solid reputation and the trust of the Soviet command in Poland. In October 1956 he appealed to the Soviet generals to stay in WP and two of them with Polish roots—Jerzy Bordziłowski and Józef Urbanowicz—stayed and helped Jaruzelski in his career. From 1957 Jaruzelski commanded the Twelfth Mechanized Division in Szczecin, and from June 1960 he was chief of the WP Main Political Administration. In October 1960 he was promoted to general of division, and in 1961 he became an MP. From 1962 he was deputy minister of defense, and from 1964, a member of the PUWP Central Committee (CC). Clever, effective, and totally loyal to the party leadership, Jaruzelski advanced steadily. In February 1965 he became chief of the General Staff. He took part in the purge of officers of Jewish descent that was carried out in the 1960s by military counterintelligence. On 11 April 1968 he became minister of defense and supervised the Polish participation in the Warsaw Pact invasion of Czechoslovakia in August 1968. In October 1968 he was promoted to the rank of general of arms. In December 1970 he implemented the decision of the PUWP head, Władysław Gomułka, to use guns against striking workers on the Polish Baltic Coast. As a result, several dozen people were killed. After the toppling of Gomułka, on 19 December 1970 Jaruzelski suspended his orders. The next day, when Edward Gierek became the new party first secretary, Jaruzelski was promoted to deputy member of the PUWP CC Politburo.

In the new ruling team Jaruzelski played a rather independent role, supporting Gierek against Mieczysław Moczar in the summer of 1971. At the Sixth PUWP Congress in December 1971 Jaruzelski became a member of the Politburo. From 1972 he was deputy chairman of the war veterans' Union of Fighters for Freedom and Democracy, and in October 1973 he became the first general of the army. In the late 1970s he worked with Stanisław Kania, responsible in the PUWP leadership for the apparatus of coercion, including the army. Both Jaruzelski and Kania remained passive during the summer 1980 strikes. When at the Sixth PUWP CC Plenum on 6 September 1980 Kania became the new first secretary, Jaruzelski's position was enhanced because the army played an important role in the political game between Solidarity, expressing the aspirations of Polish society, and the Kremlin. On 22 October 1980 Jaruzelski ordered a special task force of the General Staff under General Florian Siwicki to elaborate a plan for the introduction of martial law. In early December 1980 Jaruzelski received signals from Moscow that a massive Soviet invasion of Poland was likely. During a summit meeting of the Warsaw Pact countries in Moscow on 5 December 1980, Jaruzelski presented an outline plan for the suppression of Solidarity by Polish forces. When the pressure on Poland intensified again, on 11 February 1981 Jaruzelski became prime minister. He appealed for ninety days of peace and quiet.

Jaruzelski's appeal hung in the air in mid-March 1981, when, during the Soyuz 81 maneuver of the Warsaw Pact in Poland, a militia unit seriously beat three Solidarity activists in Bydgoszcz. During the crisis that followed, Jaruzelski accused Solidarity of provocation and delayed an investigation into the affair. After the so-called Warsaw agreement of 30 March saved Poland from a general strike and unforeseeable consequences, on 3 April Jaruzelski was summoned to Brest-Litovsk, along with Kania, where they both managed to convince the KGB chief, Yuri Andropov, and defense minister, Dmitri Ustinov, that a suppression of Solidarity through martial law was possible. In the summer of 1981 the economic and social situation turned even worse, and Jaruzelski's government could do nothing to improve it. At an extraordinary PUWP congress in July, Jaruzelski was one of the key players, stabilizing the party apparatus, and on 14 August he reported to the Kremlin on the state of preparations for the anti-Solidarity action. While Kania tended to delay the action, Jaruzelski succumbed to the Kremlin's blackmail and was more eager to start it. At the Fourth PUWP CC Plenum on 17 October 1981 Jaruzelski became the party's new first secretary.

Having concentrated all the reins of power in his hands, on 13 December 1981, ignoring binding legislation, Jaruzelski introduced martial law and took the lead of the unconstitutional Military Council of National Salvation (Wojskowa Rada Ocalenia Narodowego). This decision has become the subject of heated debates. According to current evidence, a Soviet invasion could not have been dismissed, but it was rather unlikely in the fall of 1981. Jaruzelski suppressed Solidarity and saved the power of the party nomenklatura, putting the blame for the crisis on Solidarity. He bears responsibility for the use of force and for the victims of the martial law. Although from February 1981 to January 1986 Jaruzelski was head of the Commission for Economic Reform and he temporarily stopped the economic decline, he failed to introduce the necessary systemic reforms and relied on conservative activists, the military, and the security police. Leading the party, he maneuvered between its extreme pro-Muscovite faction and the moderates. From November 1983, when he ceased to be minister of defense, to December 1990, he chaired the Committee of National Defense and was commander-in-chief of the army. On 13 November 1985 he resigned from chairing the Council of Ministers and assumed the post of chairman of the Council of State.

From the mid-1980s the economic and social situation began to worsen again, but the Communist authorities, led by Jaruzelski, reacted slowly and inconsistently. An illusory economic reform and an alleged political opening could not prevent the decline of the economy and of social morale. The country was facing collapse. After the failure of a referendum on reform in November 1987 and in view of the Soviet perestroika, Jaruzelski started preparations for sharing responsibility, but not power, with the democratic opposition. The summer strikes of 1988 attested to the inadequacy of this policy, so at the Tenth PUWP CC Plenum in December 1988 and January 1989, Jaruzelski decided to start the Round Table Talks with Solidarity and convinced the rest of the leadership to accept this decision. He did not take part in these talks, and he did not run in the partly free elections of 4 June 1989. He also hesitated to run for president, but finally, on 19 July 1989, he was elected to this post by the National Assembly by a margin of one vote. As a result he gave up the position of PUWP first secretary. Despite some hesitation, Jaruzelski approved of the formation of the Tadeusz Mazowiecki government in early September 1989. In view of the fall of Communist regimes in East Central Europe in late 1989, the dissolution of the PUWP in January 1990, and the decline of the Soviet empire, Jaruzelski cared only about the safe retreat of the party nomenklatura. Under pressure from the new political elites he agreed to early presidential elections in the fall of 1990, declined to run, and retired. Jaruzelski made great and rather successful efforts to present himself as the savior of the nation from a Soviet invasion. In 1992 he published his memoirs, Stan wojenny: Dlaczego . . . (Martial Law: Why . . .). Owing to the complicated social and political situation after the collapse of Communist power, Jaruzelski avoided responsibility before the Tribunal of State for the imposition of martial law. The trial concerning his responsibility for the 1970 Baltic Coast massacre, delayed for years, did not start until 2001, and there is not a great chance that it will be concluded in the near future. (PK/WR)

Sources: Mołdawa; Wielka encyklopedia PWN, vol. 12 (Warsaw, 2002); Michael Checinski, Poland, Communism, Nationalism, Anti-Semitism (New York, 1982); Andrzej Albert [Wojciech Roszkowski], Najnowsza historia Polski 1914–1993, vol. 2 (Warsaw, 1995); Vladimir Bukovski, Judgement in Moscow (Paris, 1995); Jan Skórzyński, Ugoda i rewolucja: Władza i opozycja 1985–1989 (Warsaw, 1995); Anton Palinka, Jaruzelski oder die Politik des kleineren Übels (Frankfurt am Main, 1996); O stanie wojennym w sejmowej Komisji Odpowiedzialności Konstytucyjnej (Warsaw, 1997); Christopher Andrew and Vasili Mitrokhin, The Sword and the Shield: The Mitrokhin Archive and the Secret History of the KGB (New York, 1999); Jerzy Eisler, Grudzień 1970 (Warsaw, 2000); Lech Kowalski, Generał ze skazą (Warsaw, 2001); Antoni Dudek, Pierwsze lata III Rzeczypospolitej 1989–2001 (Kraków, 2002); Andrzej Paczkowski, Droga do “mniejszego zła” (Kraków, 2002).

JASIENICA Paweł [originally Lech Beynar] (10 November 1909, Symbirsk, Russia–19 August 1970, Warsaw), Polish writer. Jasienica was born into an intelligentsia family that returned to Poland from Russia in 1920; after high school in Grodno (Hrodna) he graduated in history from Stefan Bathory University in Wilno (Vilnius) in 1932. In 1934–37 he taught in a Grodno high school, and then he worked for the Polish Radio station in Wilno. He fought in the September 1939 campaign and was taken POW by the Germans. After escaping, from 1941 Jasienica was active in the Union of Armed Struggle (Związek Walki Zbrojnej [ZWZ]), and from 1942, in the Home Army (Armia Krajowa [AK]) in (among other places) the village called Jasienica (thence his pen name). From 1944 Jasienica edited an underground periodical, Pobudka, of the Bureau of Information and Propaganda of the Wilno AK district. In July 1944 he took part in the Wilno operations of the AK; then, along with AK troops that had avoided being shattered by the NKVD, he continued fighting in the unit of Major Zygmunt Szyndzielarz (pseudonym “Łupaszka”) and was his aide-de-camp and later his deputy commander. After the dissolution of the “Łupaszka” unit, in September 1944 Jasienica settled in Kraków. After the war he wrote for various periodicals, and from 1946 he belonged to the editorial board of the weekly Tygodnik Powszechny. Arrested in July 1948 in connection with an investigation concerning the Wilno AK, he was released after the intervention of Bolesław Piasecki.

From 1950 Jasienica lived in Warsaw, publishing in Życie Warszawy, Nowa Kultura, Po prostu, Twórczość, and Przegląd Kulturalny. In 1951 he joined the Association of Polish Writers (Związek Literatów Polskich [ZLP]), and in 1959–62 he was deputy chairman of its Main Board. After 1956 he belonged to the Club of the Crooked Circle (Klub Krzywego Koła), a discussion group, and just before its dissolution in 1962 he was its chairman. From 1961 he belonged to the Polish PEN Club, and in 1966–70 he was its deputy chairman. Jasienica authored extremely popular syntheses of the early history of Poland: Polska Piastów (Poland under the Piasts; 1960); Polska Jagiellonów (Poland under the Jagiellons; 1963); and Rzeczpospolita Obojga Narodów (The Commonwealth of Two Nations, 3 vols.; 1967–72). In 1964 Jasienica signed the “Letter of 34,” written by intellectuals against the abuses of censorship. In March 1968 he supported protesting students, which resulted in a furious propaganda attack against him. Jasienica was condemned at mass rallies in Białystok and Katowice, where his role during World War II was totally distorted. On 19 March 1968 Władysław Gomułka publicly insinuated that Jasienica had cooperated with the Communist security apparatus. The authorities demanded his expulsion from the ZLP and banned the publication of his works. Nevertheless, later Jasienica’s works became classics of Polish historical literature. Some of his works—such as Rozważania o wojnie domowej (Reflections on the civil war; 1978)—were later published in the underground press. In 1986 his Pamiętnik (Diary) was published secretly. In 1980 the ZLP Congress resolved to clear Jasienica of the 1968 slander. (PK)

Sources: Wielka Encyklopedia PWN, vol. 12 (Warsaw, 2002); Literatura polska XX w. Przewodnik encyklopedyczny (Warsaw, 2000); Bernard Wiaderny, Paweł Jasienica. Fragment biografii (Warsaw, 1991); Jerzy Eisler, List 34 (Warsaw, 1993); Współcześni polscy pisarze i badacze literatury: Słownik bibliograficzny (Warsaw, 1994); Tadeusz Drewnowski, Próba scalenia: Obiegi-wzorzystyle (Warsaw, 1997).

JASIUKOWICZ Stanisław (8 December 1882, St. Petersburg—after September 1946, USSR), Polish politician. The son of a Polish entrepreneur in Russia, after graduating from a gymnasium in Yekaterinoslav (now Dniepropetrovsk), Jasiukowicz studied at the Technological Institute in St. Petersburg and at the university in Munich, where in 1911 he received a Ph.D. in economics. After returning to Poland, he settled in Chodów, his father's estate near Kutno. He later went to the Canary Islands for treatment of a lung disease. While a student in St. Petersburg, he joined the Union of Polish Youth, Zet, and in 1911, the National Democratic Party (Stronictwo Narodowo-Demokratyczne [SND]). In 1917 he joined the National League and financed some of its political initiatives. In 1920 he became an MP on behalf of the National Democrats and was reelected in 1923, each time filling a vacant seat. At the same time he ran his family estate in Chodów. Jasiukowicz was elected from the lists of the National Party (Stronictwo Narodowe [SN]) in the elections of 1928, 1930, and 1935. In 1928 he became a member of the SN Main Board and Political Committee, and in February 1935, a member of the SN Chief Committee, as well as one of the party's three vice-presidents and head of its Financial Department.

After the defeat of Poland in September 1939, Jasiukowicz took part in a meeting of the SN Chief Committee on 13 October 1939, when a decision was made to continue the party's activities in the underground. In March 1940, after the confiscation of his estate, which was now within the territory of the Third Reich, Jasiukowicz left for Warsaw and joined the advisory group to the commander-in-chief of the Union of Armed Struggle (Związek Walki Zbrojnej [ZWZ]), later the Home Army (Armia Krajowa [AK]). Between January and April 1942 he was jailed by the Gestapo. Released, he became vice-president of the SN. From June to December 1943 he served as party president, and after the leadership of the SN was taken over by Aleksander Zwierzyński, Jasiukowicz again became party vice-president. In May 1943 he was appointed Deputy Delegate of the Polish Government-in-Exile for the Homeland (Delegat Rządu RP na Kraj). At that time, he used the pseudonyms “Kucieński” and “Opolski.” When the Home Council of Ministers (Krajowa Rada Ministrów), headed by the Delegate of the Government-in-Exile, was established (3 May 1944), Jasiukowicz was made one of its three member-ministers, along with Adam Bień from the Peasant Party and Antoni Pajdak from the Polish Socialist party Freedom-Equality-Independence. During the Warsaw Uprising Jasiukowicz performed his duties in the Śródmieście district in the city center, and after the failure of the uprising he left the capital along with the civilian population. He continued his activities in Kraków, Piotrków Trybunalski, and Pruszków. Arrested by the NKVD on 28 March 1945 in Pruszków, he was taken to Moscow and imprisoned in the Lubyanka Prison. Tried in the Trial of Sixteen, he was sentenced to five years' imprisonment on 21 June. He served his sentence in the Lubyanka Prison. Jasiukowicz was last heard from in a letter to his son in September 1946. The circumstances of his death are unknown. (WR)

Sources: Kunert, vol. 3; PSB, vol. 11; Proces szesnastu: Dokumenty NKWD (Warsaw, 1995); Waldemar Grabowski, Delegatura Rządu Rzeczypospolitej Polskiej na Kraj (Warsaw, 1995); Andrzej Chmielarz, Andrzej K. Kunert, and Eugeniusz Piontek, Proces moskiewski przywódców polskiego państwa podziemnego (Warsaw, 2000).

JASZCZUK Bolesław (25 October 1913, Warsaw—1 January 1990, Warsaw), Polish Communist activist. Jaszczuk came from a family of the urban intelligentsia. In 1939 he graduated in electrical engineering from the Warsaw Polytechnic College. While a student, he became affiliated with the Communist youth movement. From 1939 to 1941 he worked as a teacher and electrician in Białystok and Warsaw. In 1942 he joined the Polish Workers' Party (Polska Partia Robotnicza [PPR]). Between 1943 and 1945 he was a prisoner in the Mauthausen-Gusen concentration camp. After the war he held numerous positions in the PPR and later in the Polish United Workers' Party (Polska Zjednoczona Partia Robotnicza [PUWP]). From 1945 to 1947 he was in charge of the Economic Department and subsequently served as secretary for economic affairs of the Warsaw Committee of the PPR. From the founding of the PUWP in December 1948 until March 1959 Jaszczuk was a deputy member and subsequently a member of its Central Committee. On 21 November 1964 he became a deputy member of the Politburo, and from 16 November 1968 to 20 December 1970 he was a member of the Politburo.

Between 1948 and 1949 Jaszczuk was deputy mayor of Warsaw; in 1948–50 he was provincial governor (wojewoda) in Dąbrowa Górnicza Silesia; from 1950 to 1952 he was president of the Presidium of the Provincial National Council in Katowice; from February 1952 to July 1956 he was minister of power engineering; from July 1956 to February 1957 he was minister of the machine industry and was subsequently vice-president of the Planning Commission of the Council of Ministers between March 1957 and November 1959. From 1959 to 1963 he served as ambassador to Moscow. After his return Jaszczuk became economic secretary of the PUWP CC. Regarded as one of the closest associates of Władysław Gomułka, he was responsible for the economic policy of the 1960s, which was bringing increasingly worse results. In 1970 Jaszczuk co-authored an economic reform based on the so-called material interest incentive system and was in charge of its implementation. This reform involved a reduction of the bureaucracy and the introduction of a more rational cost accounting system, and it tied pay raises to increased labor productivity. In practice, though, it meant an increase in the prices of food and manufactured goods. Food price increases in December 1970 led to worker riots on the Baltic Coast and massive bloodshed. As a result, Gomułka, along with other top party officials, had to step down. At the Seventh CC Plenum on 20 December 1970, Jaszczuk was expelled from the Politburo and the CC Secretariat and, on 7 February 1971, from the CC and the party. Between January 1957 and February 1961 and from April 1965 to February 1972 Jaszczuk served as an MP. (PK)

Sources: Mołdawa; Włodzimierz Janowski and Aleksander Kochański, Informator o strukturze i obsadzie personalnej centralnego aparatu PZPR 1948–1990 (Warsaw, 2000); Andrzej Albert [Wojciech Roszkowski], Najnowsza historia Polski 1914–1993, vol. 2 (Warsaw, 1995); Jerzy Eisler, Grudzień 1970 (Warsaw, 2000).

JÁSZI Oszkár (2 March 1875, Nagykároly–13 February 1957, Oberlin, Ohio), Hungarian politician. Born into an intellectual family of Jewish origins from Transylvania, Jászi studied law at the university in Budapest (1892–96) and subsequently in France and England. After graduating, he worked as a clerk in the Ministry of Agriculture (1898–1906). In 1899 he was one of the founders of the periodical Huszadik Század, and between 1906 and 1919 he was editor-in-chief of this periodical. He published extensively, speaking out against the dominant position of the landed aristocracy, clericalism, and ethnic oppression. He also called for universal suffrage and civil liberties. He was secretary general of the Social Sciences Association (1907–18) and director of the Free School of Social Sciences, which conducted free courses for workers. In 1911 he became a private professor of constitutional studies at the university in Kolozsvár (now Cluj). In 1914 he was the founder and president of the All-National Bourgeois Radical Party.

One of the leading figures of the republican revolution of October 1918 in Hungary, Jászi was a member of the Hungarian National Council (Magyar Nemzeti Tanács), and from October 1918 to January 1919 he was minister without portfolio responsible for ethnic issues in the government of Mihály Károlyi. He also directed the Council for Foreign Affairs. In November 1918 Jászi took part in cease-fire negotiations in Belgrade, and later he became chairman of the Hungarian delegation sent for similar talks with Romania in Arad (now Oradea). When Károlyi resigned as prime minister to assume the post of provisional president in January 1919, Jászi also gave up his position and became a sociology professor at the university in Budapest. After the Hungarian Soviet Republic (HSR) was proclaimed in March 1919, he left his country in May of that year. Between 1919 and 1925 he lived in Vienna as one of the leaders of the Hungarians in exile. As editor-in-chief of the periodical Bécsi Magyar Újság, Jászi firmly condemned the “White Terror” in Hungary, which was conducted with the consent of Miklós Horthy against HSR activists, yet he equally strongly criticized the Communists.

Between 1923 and 1924 Jászi was invited to the United States for a series of lectures. In 1925 he settled in the United States for good and became a sociology professor at Oberlin College near Cleveland, Ohio. During World War II he was president of the Democratic Union of Hungarians in the United States. In 1947 he made a short visit to Hungary. In 1991 his ashes were brought to Budapest.

Jászi was instrumental in legitimizing the modern social sciences, particularly sociology, in Hungary. He was the leading theoretician of the radical faction of bourgeois liberalism. A scholar and a politician, he considered the democratization of Hungary his main task. He was deeply involved in ethnic issues. His concept of cooperation among the Danube nations became very influential. Jászi was the author of a proposal to resolve Hungary’s ethnic problems along the lines of the Swiss model, on the basis of liberal and democratic principles. His publications include Revolution and Counterrevolution in Hungary (1924) and a well-known book, The Dissolution of the Habsburg Monarchy (1929). Much of his legacy is kept in the Library of Congress in Washington, D.C. (JT)

Sources: Nagy Képes Milleniumi Arcképcsarnok (Budapest, 1999); Magyar Nagylexikon, vol. 10 (Budapest, 2000); Magyarország 1944–1956, CD-ROM (Budapest, 2001); Paul Ignatus, Hungary (London, 1972); Nicholas Horthy, Memoirs (Paris, 1954); C. A. Macartney, October Fifteenth: A History of Modern Hungary, vols. 1–2 (Edinburgh, 1957–61); Steven Bela Vardy, Historical Dictionary of Hungary (Lanham, Md., 1997); Jászi Oszkar hazatérése (Budapest, 1996); János Pelle, Jászi Oszkar: Életrajze, észme—és kortörténeti esszé (Budapest, 2001).

JAWOROWSKI Rajmund, pseudonyms “Włodzimierz,” “Antoni,” and others (31 August 1885, Birzhula, Ukraine—24 April 1941, Warsaw), Polish Socialist activist. Jaworowski joined the Polish Socialist Party (Polska Partia Socjalistyczna [PPS]) in 1904. He was active in its Military Organization (Organizacja Bojowa), producing bombs and running military training in the Congress Kingdom of Poland. In 1906 he became aligned with the PPS–Revolutionary Faction, and in 1918–19 he was a member of its Central Workers’ Committee. Between 1907 and 1909 he was in exile in Siberia but escaped and managed to get to Galicia. In 1909 he joined the Union of Active Struggle (Związek Walki Czynnej [ZWC]). In 1914 he worked for the Commission of Confederated Independence Parties. In 1914–18 he was a member of the Polish Legions and co-organized the Polish Military Organization in the Congress Kingdom of Poland. From 1918 to 1928 Jaworowski served as president of the Warsaw District Workers’ Committee of the PPS. In 1920 he volunteered for the Polish Army, and from 1920 to 1921 he was a member of the Polish delegation for negotiations with Soviet Russia in Riga. Between 1922 and 1930 he was an MP on behalf of the PPS. After the murder of President Gabriel Narutowicz in December 1922, Jaworowski began organizing a leftist coup to remove the nationalist right from power. During the coup of May 1926, he supported Józef Piłsudski and co-organized the general strike of railwaymen. In 1921–28 he was a member of the PPS Chief Council, and from 1926 to 1928, deputy chairman of the PPS Central Executive Committee. In October 1928 he effected a split in the PPS by organizing the pro-Piłsudski PPS–Former Revolutionary Faction and becoming leader of its Central Executive Committee. In 1919–27 Jaworowski was vice-president, and from 1927 to 1931 president, of the Warsaw City Council. Between 1931 and 1939 he served as president of the Central Association of Class Trade Unions (later the Central Organization of Class Trade Unions), which was linked with this party. However, as a result of the split within the party that he himself had caused, Jaworowski lost his former political influence. During the Nazi occupation in 1939 Jaworowski joined the underground Service for the Victory of Poland and later the Union of Armed Struggle. (JS)

Sources: PSB, vol. 11; Encyklopedia historii Drugiej Rzeczypospolitej (Warsaw, 1999); Encyklopedia historii Polski: Dzieje polityczne, vol. 1 (Warsaw, 1994).

JAWORSKI Marian (21 August 1926, Lwów [Lviv]), Roman Catholic archbishop of Lviv, philosopher, and theologian. As did most Poles, Jaworski left Lwów when the Red Army took over the city in 1944. He graduated from a theological seminary in Kalwaria Zebrzydowska, near Kraków, and in June 1950 he was ordained. Then he worked as a vicar in Basznia Dolna and Poronin, and in 1956–58 he was chaplain of the archbishop of Kraków, Eugeniusz Baziak. At the time he became friends with Reverend Karol Wojtyła, later Pope John Paul II. From 1967 he taught at the Pontifical Theological Academy in Kraków; from 1973 to 1982 he was its dean, and in 1982–83, its rector. From 1970 Jaworski was secretary of the Commission for Catholic Doctrine of the Polish Episcopate, and from 1973, secretary of its Research Council. On 21 May 1984 he was consecrated auxiliary bishop of the Lviv archdiocese, acting in Lubaczów, on a piece of its territory situated within Poland. From 16 January 1991 Jaworski was archbishop of Lviv, and from 1998, cardinal, initially in pectore and from 21 February 2001, overt. He established close contacts with the Lviv hierarchy of the Greek Catholic Church, and with its archbishop of Lviv, Lubomyr Husar, Jaworski co-organized the pilgrimage of John Paul II to the Ukraine in June 2001. Jaworski authored Religijne poznanie Boga wedlug Romano Guardiniego (The religious cognition of God according to Romano Guardini; 1967); Zwycięzcy dam spożyć owoc z drzewa życia (I will give the winner the fruit of the tree of life to eat; 1987); and Metafizyka (Metaphysics; 1998). (WR) Sources: Wielka encyklopedia PWN, vol. 12 (Warsaw, 2002); George Weigel, Witness to Hope (New York, 1999); www.catholic-hierarchy.org.

JĘDRYCHOWSKI Stefan (19 May 1910, Warsaw—26 May 1996, Warsaw), Polish Communist activist. After graduating from a high school in Wilno (Vilnius) in 1928, Jędrzychowski took up law studies at Stefan Batory University in Wilno, graduating in 1932. While a student, he belonged to the Union of Polish Democratic Youth and the Youth Legion, which supported the Józef Piłsudski government. In 1932 he joined the editorial committee of the periodical Żagary, a supplement to the conservative daily Słowo. In the same year, however, he was drawn to the radical left. In 1935 he was imprisoned for several months for his participation in an illegal group led by Henryk Dembiński that attracted young pro-Communists. Arrested again in 1937 for his journalism in Po prostu and Karta, after his release in August 1939 Jędrzychowski received a Ph.D. in law for the treatise Bankructwo państwowe i pożyczka przymusowa. Patologia kredytu w okresie powszechnego kryzysu kapitalizmu (State bankruptcy and compulsory loans: The pathology of credit during the general crisis of capitalism).

After the German invasion of Poland in September 1939, Jędrzychowski organized a workers' militia in Wilno. Since he was a well-known leftist activist, after the Red Army entered Vilnius, he was elected to the People's Assembly and later to the Supreme Soviet of the Lithuanian SSR. Until December 1940, he worked in the editorial offices of Prawda Wileńska. After Germany attacked the USSR in June 1941, Jędrzychowski traveled to the Soviet interior and began contributing to the Communist periodical Nowe Widnokreghi. He was one of the founders and leaders of the Union of Polish Patriots (Związek Patriotów Polskich [ZPP]), which was inspired by Stalin. Co-founder of the Tadeusz Kościuszko First Division, in 1944 Jędrzychowski joined the Polish Workers' Party (Polska Partia Robotnicza [PPR]). Beginning with the First Congress of the PPR in December 1945 until 1975, he was a member of its Central Committee (CC), and after December 1948 he was a member of the CC of the Polish United Workers' Party (Polska Zjednoczona Partia Robotnicza [PUWP]). Jędrzychowski actively participated in the Stalinization of Poland by, among other things, helping to eliminate party members who were accused of so-called rightist-nationalist deviation. From July to October 1956 he was a deputy member, and from October 1956 a member, of the PUWP CC Politburo. From July 1944 to February 1972 he was a deputy to the National Home Council (KRN) and subsequently an MP in the Legislative Assembly and in the Assembly of the Polish People's Republic. He also held many government and party posts. At the beginning of 1945 Jędrzychowski was a representative of the Provisional Government to France; from June 1945 to February 1947 he was minister of shipping and foreign trade; from December 1947 to April 1948 he was head of the Economic Department of the PPR CC; from April 1948 to April 1949 he was vice-president of the Central Planning Office; and subsequently he was deputy chairman of the State Committee for Economic Planning until December 1951.

Jędrzychowski was co-responsible for the preparation and implementation of the Six-Year Plan (1950–55) and the successive Five-Year Plans. From December 1951 to October 1956 he was deputy prime minister, from July to December 1956 he was chairman of the State Committee for Economic Planning, and from December 1956 to December 1968 he was chairman of the Planning Commission of the Council of Ministers. In March 1968 he dismissed people of Jewish origin from this commission. From December 1968 to December 1971 he served as minister of foreign affairs. After the events of December 1970 Jędrzychowski, who was seen as a close associate of Władysław Gomułka, gradually withdrew from the political scene. In December 1971 he left the Politburo but continued to serve as finance minister until November 1974. As a result of a conflict with Prime Minister Piotr Jaroszewicz, Jędrzychowski was dismissed from the government. Between January 1975 and February 1978 he was ambassador to Hungary, and subsequently he retired. After 1989 he spoke publicly against the transformation of the system. His psychological portrait was depicted in Zniewolony Umysł (The captive mind), by Czesław Miłosz, who had been his friend in Wilno. (WD)

Sources: Mołdawa; Nicholas Bethell, Gomułka: His Poland, His Communism (London, 1969); Andrzej Albert [Wojciech Roszkowski], Najnowsza historia Polski 1914–1993, vols. 1–2 (Warsaw, 1993); Jerzy Eisler, Marzec 1968 (Warsaw, 1991); Włodzimierz Janowski and Aleksander Kocharński, Informator o strukturze i obsadzie personalnej centralnego aparatu PZPR 1948–1990 (Warsaw, 2000); Jerzy Eisler, Grudzień 1970 (Warsaw, 2000).

JĘDRZEJEWICZ Janusz (21 June 1885, Spichintsy, near Kiev–16 March 1951, London), Polish politician. The son of a chemist employed as a deputy director of a sugar refinery in the Ukraine, Jędrzejewicz was the brother of Wacław Jędrzejewicz. While still at school, he was involved in pro-independence youth organizations, and in 1904 he joined the Polish Socialist Party (PPS). He studied mathematics and chemistry in Kraków and Paris. In 1914 he became active in the Polish Military Organization (Polska Organizacja Wojskowa [POW]), and between 1915 and 1916 he served in the Polish Legions. A close associate of Józef Piłsudski, in 1917 Jędrzejewicz started working in the Military Commission of the Provisional Council of State, and in the summer of that year he began publishing the periodical Rzqd i wojsko. He was also a member of the Convention of Organization A (Konwent Organizacji A), a conspiratorial group of trusted activists of parties that supported Piłsudski. This group led the pro-independence camp at the time when Piłsudski was interned. Jędrzejewicz published numerous articles and brochures, such as Józef Piłsudski (1918), that supported the tactics of the pro-independence left.

In the fall of 1918 Jędrzejewicz joined the Polish Army and fought in the Polish-Bolshevik war. He retired from the army in 1923 and started working as a teacher. In 1926 he founded the monthly Wiedza i Życie. A member of the National Grand Lodge, after the coup of May 1926 he worked in the chancellery of the prime minister, where he was in charge of education and the school system. In the 1928 elections Jędrzejewicz ran successfully as a candidate of the Nonparty Bloc of Cooperation with the Government (BBWR), and between 1930 and 1935 he was vice-president of the BBWR. In 1929 he founded the educational organization Zrąb. He was also interested in eastern policy. In 1930 he co-founded the Eastern Institute in Wilno (Vilnius) and lectured in its School of Political Sciences. He was a supporter of the Promethean idea that stipulated the liberation of the nations in the USSR's sphere of influence from the Kremlin's domination. Between August 1931 and February 1934 Jędrzejewicz was minister of religious affairs and public education. At that time he authorized a 1932 law on the school system and a 1933 law on state academic schools. These laws were called the "Jędrzejewicz Reform" of the Polish school system. A uniform system of elementary schools, gymnasiums (high schools), comprehensive high schools, and vocational schools was introduced. Relations between the administration and state institutions of higher education were regulated. The Jędrzejewicz Reform caused much controversy, but it also won many supporters and is looked upon favorably today. Promoting a model of upbringing in the national spirit typical of the sanacja (moral and political cleansing) regime, Jędrzejewicz focused on the development of youth organizations supporting the government system after the May coup. Accordingly, he co-founded the Advance Guard (Straż Przednia), which targeted high school students, and the Youth Legion, which targeted older students.

On 11 May 1933 Jędrzejewicz assumed the post of prime minister. It was during his term in office that a new constitutional bill was pushed through the Assembly in violation of parliamentary procedures and that the Polish-German non-aggression declaration of January 1934 was signed. Jędrzejewicz resigned on 14 May 1934. After Piłsudski's death, he supported Walery Sławek, but both men gradually lost power in the sanacja circles. In 1935–38 Jędrzejewicz served as a senator. In 1937 he did not support the establishment of the pro-totalitarian Camp of National Unity (Obóz Zjednoczenia Narodowego [OZN]). In September 1939 he went to Romania and then to Palestine, trying to consolidate sanacja circles, which were blamed for the September 1939 defeat. In the fall of 1947 he settled in London. Jędrzejewicz wrote his memoirs, W służbie idei: Fragmenty pamiętnika i pism (In service to the idea: Fragments of memoirs and of writings; 1972). (WR)

Sources: PSB, vol. 11; Encyklopedia historii Drugiej Rzeczypospolitej (Warsaw, 1999); Władysław Pobóg-Malinowski, Najnowsza historia polityczna Polski, vol. 2 (London, 1983); Władysław T. Kulesza, Koncepcje ideowo-polityczne obozu rządzącego w Polsce w latach 1926–1935 (Wrocław, 1985); Tomasz Nałęcz, "Janusz Jędrzejewicz, premier Rzeczypospolitej 10 V 1933–13 V 1934," in Andrzej Chojnowski and Piotr Wróbel, eds., Prezydenci i premierzy Drugiej Rzeczypospolitej (Wrocław, 1992).

JĘDRZEJEWICZ Waclaw (21 January 1893, Spichintsy, near Kiev–30 November 1993, Cheshire, Connecticut), Polish politician. The son of a chemist employed as a deputy director of a sugar refinery in the Ukraine, Jędrzejewicz was the brother of Janusz Jędrzejewicz. He studied in Kraków, where he joined the Union of Polish Youth, Zet, and the Rifle Association. In August 1914 he was one of the co-founders of the Polish Military Organization (Polska Organizacja Wojskowa [POW]), and he became a member of the POW High Command. In 1915 he served in the Polish Legions, but in March 1916 he again devoted himself to work in the POW. In July 1917 he refused to swear allegiance to the emperors of Germany and Austria-Hungary, and he was arrested. Released from prison in September 1918, Jędrzejewicz became head of the personnel department of the POW High Command. After the Polish Army was formed in November of that year, he started working in the Second Department of the General Staff. He was a negotiator and co-signatory of the Polish-Ukrainian agreement of 24 April 1920 and a military adviser at the peace negotiations with Soviet Russia in Riga. Between 1925 and 1928 Jędrzejewicz served as military attaché to Tokyo; therefore he did not personally take part in the May coup of 1926. However, he was a close associate of Józef Piłsudski. In 1928 Jędrzejewicz became director of the Administrative Department, and in 1931 director of the Consular Department, of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. In September 1933 he was made deputy minister of the treasury in the government of his brother, Janusz. In February 1934 he succeeded his brother as minister of religious affairs and public education and held this position in the cabinets of Leon Kozłowski and Walery Sławek until October 1935. After Piłsudski's death, Jędrzejewicz gradually withdrew from public life.

In September 1939 Jędrzejewicz took part in shipping the treasury of the National Defense Fund out of Poland. In March 1941 he settled in the United States. In June 1942 he took an active part in the establishment of the National Committee of Americans of Polish Origin and subsequently in the establishment of the Józef Piłsudski Institute in New York. From 1943 to 1948 he served as president of this institute. He devoted himself to research, compiling and editing documentation on the sanacja government and Piłsudski's life. He wrote Poland in the British Parliament (3 vols.; 1946–62); the detailed Kronika życia Józefa Piłsudskiego 1867–1935 (Chronicle of Józef Piłsudski's life 1867–1935; 1977); the biography Józef Piłsudski 1867–1935: Życiorys (Józef Piłsudski, 1867–1935: A biography; 1982); and other works. (WR) Sources: Encyklopedia historii Drugiej Rzeczypospolitej (Warsaw, 1999); Władysław Pobóg-Malinowski, Najnowsza historia polityczna Polski, vol. 2 (London, 1983); Władysław T. Kulesza, Koncepcje ideowo-polityczne obozu rządzącego w Polsce w latach 1926–1935 (Wrocław, 1985).

JEFTIĆ Bogoljub (24 December 1886, Kragujevac–7 June 1960, Paris), Serb politician. In his youth Jeftić was allied with the Radical Party. In 1926 he became an envoy to Tirana. When King Alexander I took power in 1929, he was made a court minister. In 1931 he was one of the founders of the ruling Yugoslav National Party (YNP), which became the only legal political party after other political parties and associations were declared illegal. The YNP worked for the centralization of the state. In July 1932 Jeftić became minister of foreign affairs and held this position for two and a half years in four successive cabinets. At that time, the main aims of Yugoslavia's foreign policy were to strengthen relations with France and Britain and develop cooperation within the Little Entente and the so-called Little Balkan Entente. In February 1934 the Balkan Pact was signed with Turkey, Greece, and Romania, and relations with Bulgaria improved. This effectively thwarted Italian plans to establish a regional coalition against Yugoslavia. Jeftić played a major role in securing those agreements.

Jeftić was a witness to the Ustaša attempt on the life of King Alexander on 9 October 1934 in Marseilles. He recalled that the last words of the dying king were an order addressed to his entourage to “take care of my Yugoslavia.” On 19 December 1934 Jeftić was assigned the mission of forming a new government. Talks on forming a government of national unity, conducted with political parties that lacked representation in the parliament dominated by the supporters of the assassinated king, reached a deadlock because Jeftić did not want to abandon a unitary and centrist line in the domestic policy dominated by the Serbs. His resistance became one of the factors that led to the unification of a divided non-parliamentary opposition under the leadership of the Radical Party and the Slovene People's Party. The elections of May 1935, held in an atmosphere of terror and marked by “miracles at the ballot box,” directly impinged on the political and moral standing of the prime minister; finally, as a result of an increase in social support for the opposition, Jeftić was forced to resign on 24 June 1935. He resigned under pressure from a coalition formed by Milan Stojadinović. When Stojadinović dissolved the ruling party, Jeftić, along with Petar Živković, revived the YNP in June 1936. After the parliamentary elections of December 1938 this party joined the opposition led by the Croat leader Vladko Maček.

After the coup staged by General Dušan Simović on 27 March 1941, provoked by the concessions made to the Third Reich and Italy, Jeftić again joined the government and assumed the portfolio of minister of transportation. After the German aggression in April 1941, he went to Great Britain, where he served as a member of successive Yugoslav governments-in-exile. From September 1943 to July 1944 he was ambassador of the royal government to London. He was dismissed from this position as a result of an agreement between Josip Broz Tito and the Yugoslav government-in-exile. Jeftić did not return to Yugoslavia. In 1946 he became a member of the émigré Yugoslav National Council in London. (AG)

Sources: Biographisches Lexikon, vol. 2; Osteuropa-Handbuch: Jugoslawien (Cologne and Graz, 1954); Jacob B. Hoptner, Yugoslavia in Crisis, 1934–1941 (New York, 1962); Ljubo Boban, Sporazum Cvetković-Maček (Belgrade, 1965); Johann Wuescht, Jugoslawien und das Dritte Reich (Stuttgart, 1969); Waclaw Felczak and Tadeusz Wasilewski, Historia Jugosławii (Wrocław, 1985); Michał J. Zacharias, Jugosławia w polityce Wielkiej Brytanii 1940–1945 (Wrocław, 1987).

Jeglić Anton Bonaventura (29 May 1850, Begunje na Gorenjskem–2 July 1937, Stična), Slovene Catholic bishop. After attending a theological seminary in Ljubljana, Jeglič completed theological studies in Vienna in 1876, and he was ordained in 1879. He subsequently lectured in history, canon law, and church doctrine at a theological seminary and at the Theological Department of the University of Ljubljana. In 1882 he became a canon in Sarajevo, and in February 1898 he was consecrated bishop of Ljubljana. From the end of the nineteenth century, Jeglič had a major influence in shaping Slovene social Catholicism. An opponent of modernism, he ordered most copies of Erotika, by Ivan Cankar, to be bought up and burned. He was one of the spiritual animators of the Catholic National Party (Katoliška Narodna Stranka) and (from 1905) the Slovene People's Party (Slovenska Ljudska Stranka [SLS]). He worked closely with Ivan Šušteršič, the leader of the SLS. A promoter of Catholic education, Jeglič brought about the establishment of a Catholic gymnasium in Ljubljana in 1905. In opposition to Sokol (Falcon), a liberal gymnastic society, he supported Orel (Eagle), a similar conservative organization. In 1916 he backed the left wing of the Slovene national Catholic movement led by Janez Krek, and he supported Krek's work in the agricultural cooperative movement. Jeglič supported the May Declaration of 1917 and activities aimed at the establishment of a Slovene state, but at the end of 1918 he accepted the incorporation of Slovenia into the Kingdom of Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes. He repeatedly defended the rights of the Slovenes in Austria and Italy. Jeglič's views were influenced by the philosophy of Aleš Ušeničnik, but he supported various factions within the Catholic people's movement. In May 1930 Jeglič retired and in 1932 settled in a monastery in Stična. (WR)

Sources: Slovenski biografski leksikon, vol. 3 (Ljubljana, 1928); Enciklopedija Slovenije, vol. 2 (Ljubljana, 1990); Joza Jagodić, Nadžkof Jeglič (Celovec, 1952); J. Prunk, “Škof Jeglič—politik,” Kronika, 1971, no. 19; Edo Sukulj, ed. Jegličev simpozij v Rimu (Celje, 1991); Leopoldina Plut-Pregelj and Carole Rogel, Historical Dictionary of Slovenia (Lanham, Md., 1996).

JEHLIČKA František, pseudonyms “Margin” and “Pater Salezius” (24 January 1879, Kúty, Slovakia–3 January 1939, Vienna), Slovak priest, politician, and philosopher. Jehlička completed theological studies in Vienna, where in 1902 he was ordained and in 1905 he successfully defended his doctoral thesis. At that time he worked with Father Ferdinand Juriga in organizing the political movement of the Slovak Catholics. One of the leading representatives of Slovak conservative thought, in the treatise Novoveká filozofia a Slováci (Modern philosophy and the Slovaks; 1903) Jehlička condemned empiricism and rationalism, arguing against, among other things, the liberal movement of the Hlasists. In 1906 he was elected to the Hungarian parliament from the lists of the independent Slovak faction of the Hungarian Catholic People’s Party and in 1913 from the lists of the Slovak People’s Party (Slovenská ľudová strana [SLS]). However, soon afterwards he distanced himself from Slovak national claims, resigned his parliamentary seat, and pursued an academic career. In 1907 he began lecturing in theology at the university in Budapest, where he was promoted to associate professor in 1910.

After Czechoslovakia was created, Jehlička returned to Slovakia and declared his loyalty to the new state. He took a seat in parliament in Prague and was appointed administrator of the university in Bratislava. An associate of Reverend Andrej Hlinka, he helped to revive the SLS. On Jehlička’s initiative, Hlinka went to the Paris Peace Conference. Jehlička also prepared a memorandum that the Slovak delegation submitted to the representatives of the victorious powers in September 1919. In this memorandum, the Slovaks demanded autonomy and a plebiscite on Slovak national status. Seeing that all these actions were unsuccessful, Jehlička began to call for the reincorporation of Slovakia into Hungary. In Budapest, he founded the Party of Hungarian-Slovak Friendship (Magyarbarát Tót Párt) and prepared a plan for Slovak autonomy within the Hungarian state. This plan was approved by the Hungarian government in January 1921. In 1920 Jehlička became professor of theology at Warsaw University. In agreement with the Hungarian authorities, in May 1920 he established the Slovak National Council in Warsaw, and he began forming the Hungarian-Slovak Legion. He also worked with Polish intelligence. In Kraków, he published the periodical Slovák, in which he called for a union of the Polish and Slovak states in September 1920 and continued to uphold this view thereafter. Jehlička helped to prepare a military action in Slovakia and established a center for anti-Czech propaganda in Cieszyn. His actions failed to win support in Slovakia and were condemned by the SLS leadership. Nonetheless, by using his contacts in Catholic circles, he continued to agitate against the Czechoslovak state. In 1933 he was one of the founders of the Slovak Council in Geneva, which frequently submitted manifestos on the Slovak cause to the League of Nations. From 1933 on, Jehlička stayed in close touch with the Italian authorities, the Sudeten Germans, and German intelligence. He was the author of numerous political brochures, including Quo vadis, the Slovak Nation? (1935). (MG)

Sources: SBS; Konštantín Čulen, “Dr. Rudolf František Jehlička,” in Literárny almanach Slovák v Amerike (Middletown, Pa., 1957); Juraj Kramer, Iredenta a separatizmus v slovenskej politike (Bratislava, 1957); Vladimír Bakoš, Kapitoly s dejín slovenského myslenia (Bratislava, 1995); Marián Hronský, Boj o Slovensko a Trianon 1918–1920 (Bratislava, 1998); Béla Angyal, “Magyar szervezetek és mozgalmak Csehszlovákiában 1918–1921,” Fórum Társadalomtudományi Szemle, 2000, no. 1.

JELAVIĆ Ante (21 August 1963, Podprolog, Croatia), Croatian politician from Bosnia-Herzegovina (BH). An officer of the Yugoslav People’s Army, in the early 1990s Jelavić joined the Bosnian Croatian militia. During the war in Bosnia he advanced to the position of chief of logistics of Croatian units. In 1996 he became minister of defense of the Muslim-Croat Federation, one of the two parts constituting Bosnia-Herzegovina, and from 1998 he was a member of the Presidium of the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina—that is, the collective head of state—on behalf of the Croatian Democratic Union (Hrvatska Demokratska Zajednica [HDZ]). Although Croatian president Franjo Tuđman declared his support for another candidate, Jelavić managed to win nonetheless. From 15 June 1999 to 14 February 2000 Jelavić presided over the BH Presidium. He strove to maintain strong links with Croatia and opposed the liquidation of Herceg-Bosnia, thought to be a Croatian state within Bosnia-Herzegovina, on the basis of the Washington Agreement of March 1994 and the Dayton Agreement of November 1995. As long as Tuđman was in power, Zagreb supported the separatism of Bosnian Croats, but the new Croat president, Stipe Mešić, announced in 2000 that he would withhold financial support for Herceg-Bosnia and would give up plans of dividing BH between Serbia and Croatia. Jelavić’s position was weakened by changes in the electoral law before the elections of November 2000; these led to the loss of power by the HDZ in BH. In March 2001 Jelavić declared that the Croats would leave the Muslim-Croat Federation and demanded an amendment of the electoral law. A separate Bosnian Croat government was created in Mostar. As a result, the international mediator for Bosnian civil reconstruction, Wolfgang Petritsch, responsible for the implementation of the Dayton Agreement, removed Jelavić from the BH Presidium on 7 March 2001. In May 2002 Jelavić resigned from leading the HDZ in BH. (WR/AO)

Sources: Bugajski; www.rulers.org; www.ohr.int; www.rferl.org.

JIČÍNSKÝ Zdeněk (26 February 1929, Ostřešany, Pardubice district), Czech lawyer and politician. After graduating in law from Charles University in Prague in 1952, Jičínský worked as an assistant professor at this university. In 1951 he joined the Communist Party of Czechoslovakia (CPC), and from 1954 to 1964 he worked as a lecturer at the party school of the party's Central Committee. Between 1959 and 1960 he sat on a committee responsible for drafting a new constitution that contributed greatly to the federalization of the state. In 1964 he became a docent (associate professor) and in 1969 a professor at the Law Department of Charles University. Jičínský was an advocate of the democratization of the country. From 1968 to 1969 he was a deputy to the Czech National Council and deputy chairman and then chairman of its national law committee. In 1969 he also became a deputy to the Chamber of Nations of the Federal Assembly. In November 1969, during the so-called normalization period, he was deprived of both parliamentary seats. Expelled from the CPC and dismissed from the university in 1970, he worked as a lawyer in an insurance society. After signing Charter 77 in 1977, Jičínský was dismissed from work, and for two years he could not find a job. In 1979–89 he worked as a lawyer in the Mototechna Prague firm, and he published abroad as well as in the underground press in Czechoslovakia.

In November and December 1989, as one of the leaders of the Civic Forum (Občanské Fórum [OF]), Jičínský represented the opposition during negotiations with the Communist authorities. From the end of 1989 to the end of 1992 he was a deputy to the Chamber of Nations of the Federal Assembly, and until June 1992 he was deputy chairman of the Federal Assembly. Until 1991 he represented the Civic Forum, and after its breakup, the Civic Movement (Občanské Hnutí [OH]). From the spring of 1992 on he was a representative of the Czechoslovak Social Democracy (Československá Sociální Demokracie), renamed the Czech Social Democratic Party (Česká Strana Sociálně Demokratická) in 1993. Jičínský called for the recognition of the legal continuity of Czechoslovakia and advocated the maintenance of the common state of Czechs and Slovaks. In June 1996 he became a member of the Chamber of Deputies in the Czech parliament, in which he sat until June 2002, and deputy chairman of its Constitutional Law Committee. He was the author and co-author of such works as Ústava ČSSR (The constitution of the CSSR; 1961; co-authored with Pavel Levit); Vznik České národní rady v době Pražského jara 1968 a její působení do podzimu 1969 (The establishment of the Czech National Council during the Prague Spring of 1968 and its activity until the autumn of 1969; Cologne, 1984; Prague, 1990); Československý parlament v polistopadovém vývoji (The Czechoslovak parliament during the post-November period; 1993); and Problémy české politiky (Issues of Czech policy; 1993). (PU)

Sources: ČBS; Kdo je kdo v České Republice na přelomu 20. století (Prague, 1998); Českoslovenští politici: 1918–1991 (Prague, 1991); Kdo byl kdo v našich dějinách ve 20. století, vol. 1 (Prague, 1998); Eric Stein, Czecho/Slovakia: Ethnic Conflict, Constitutional Fissure, Negotiated Breakup (Ann Arbor, 1997); Jan Rychlík, Rozpad Československa: Česko-slovenské vztahy 1989–1992 (Bratislava, 2002).

JODKO-NARKIEWICZ Witold, pseudonyms “Aleksander Wroński,” “Jowisz,” “Judym,” and others (29 April 1864, Warsaw–22 October 1924, Warsaw), Polish politician and Socialist journalist. In 1884 Jodko-Narkiewicz joined the International Social Revolutionary Party Proletariat (First Proletariat), and later he was active in the Social Revolutionary Party Proletariat (Second Proletariat). From 1885 to 1898 he was in exile. He studied medicine in Dorpat (Tartu), Würzburg, and Paris. In 1892, as a representative of the Second Proletariat, he co-organized the Paris congress of Polish Socialists, and he was the secretary of this congress. Thus he became co-founder of the Union of Polish Socialists Abroad (Związek Zagraniczny Socjalistów Polskich [ZZSP]). From 1894 to 1897 he was a member of the Board of the ZZSP and the Polish Socialist Party (Polska Partia Socjalistyczna [PPS]), and in 1902 he became a member of the PPS Central Workers' Committee. A close associate of Józef Piłsudski, Jodko-Narkiewicz was considered a theoretician of socialism. From 1893 to 1897 and in 1905 he edited the periodical Przedświt. After the split in the Socialist movement in 1906, he was a member of the PPS–Revolutionary Faction. He helped organize pro-independence organizations in Galicia. In 1912 he was a co-founder of the Commission of Confederated Independence Parties, and he served as its secretary until 1914. In 1914 he co-founded and was the leader of the Polish National Organization (Polska Organizacja Narodowa [PON]). From 1915 to 1916 he was a member of the Central National Committee (Centralny Komitet Narodowy [CKN]). He called for an alliance with the Central Powers. In 1918–19 Jodko-Narkiewicz served as deputy minister for foreign affairs. From 1919 to 1921 he served as ambassador to Turkey, and from 1921 to 1923, as ambassador to Latvia. In the spring of 1922 he represented Poland in negotiations among the representatives of the Baltic states in Riga. He was the author of program brochures and articles on the political system and the international position of Poland. (JS)

Sources: PSB, vol. 11; Słownik polityków polskich XX wieku (Poznań, 1998); Encyklopedia Historii Polski: Dzieje polityczne, vol. 1 (Warsaw, 1994); Jerzy Holzer, Polska Paria Socjalistyczna w latach 1917–1919 (Warsaw, 1962); Wacław Jędrzejewicz, Kronika życia Józefa Piłsudskiego 1867–1935 (London, 1986).

JOHN PAUL II [originally Karol Wojtyła] (18 May 1920, Wadowice–2 April 2005, Rome), Polish Pope. John Paul's mother died while he was young, and he soon lost his older brother. He was brought up by a pious father, a retired lieutenant of the Polish Army, in humble material conditions. In 1938 he graduated from high school in Wadowice. He started Polish studies at the Jagiellonian University (Uniwersytet Jagielloński [UJ]) in Kraków. After the German invasion of Poland in 1939 he had to interrupt his studies, and he worked as a blue-collar laborer in the Solvay chemical factory and in a quarry near Kraków. In October 1942, after his father's death, John Paul started theological studies at the clandestine UJ Theological Department and at a secret theological seminary. At the same time he performed in the clandestine Rhapsodical Theater (Teatr Rapsodyczny). In March 1946 he published a collection of poems, Pieśń o Bogu ukrytym (Hymn of the hidden God). In August 1946 he graduated, and on 1 November 1946 he was ordained. Inspired by Cardinal Adam Sapieha, in 1946–48 John Paul continued his studies at the Pontifical Angelicum University in Rome, where he received a Ph.D. Upon his return to Poland, he started to work as a vicar in a rural parish in Niegowici (1948–51), studying and lecturing at the UJ and the Catholic University of Lublin (Katolicki Uniwersytet Lubelski [KUL]), where in 1951 he received a Ph.D. and in 1953 a postdoctoral degree (habilitacja) in moral theology. He taught social ethics at the Theological Seminary in Kraków and (from 1954) philosophy at the KUL. Until 1953 and after 1956 he also published in the Kraków Catholic weekly, Tygodnik Powszechny.

On 4 July 1958 John Paul was consecrated as bishop of Kraków. He faced a serious challenge when the Communist authorities removed religious instruction from the schools, which was in contradiction to the church-state agreement of 1956, and he also had to cope with obstacles that arose during the construction of a church in Nowa Huta. Believers in this new industrial town demanded a Catholic church and, facing official obstructions, demonstrated in defense of the cross in 1960. Thanks to John Paul's skillful diplomacy, the Nowa Huta church was finally erected. In 1960 John Paul published Miłość i odpowiedzialność (Love and Responsibility, 1981) on Catholic sexual morality, of which Pope Paul VI availed himself while preparing his encyclical Humanum vitae. Also in 1960 he published the drama Przed sklepem jubilerza (In front of the jeweller's store). On 16 June 1962 John Paul was elected vicar of the Kraków chapter. The Polish Communist authorities agreed that he would succeed Archbishop Eugeniusz Baziak as metropolitan of Kraków, counting on the possibility of winning him over against Primate Stefan Wyszyński. On 30 December 1963 he was appointed archbishop metropolitan of Kraków. Soon he totally frustrated the hopes of the Communists.

A member of the preparatory commission of the Second Vatican Council in 1962–65, John Paul took an active part in the council, and he greatly contributed to its debates on religious freedom. After his work on the council he co-authored letters inviting bishops from many countries to the celebrations of the Millennium of Polish Christianity; among these was a letter to the German bishops that had the famous phrase “we forgive and ask forgiveness.” On 29 May 1967 Pope Paul VI appointed him cardinal. In 1969 John Paul published Osoba i czyn (The acting person), in which he stressed the particular dignity of the human being. From 1971 he was a member of the Council of the Secretariat of the Synod of Bishops, and he became known for his work in other Roman Curia congregations. On the invitation of Pope Paul VI, in 1976 he led the Vatican Lenten retreat. He visited the United States twice, and in September 1978, along with a delegation of the Polish Episcopate, he toured West Germany, receiving an enthusiastic welcome.

On 16 October 1978 John Paul was elected pope. He adopted the name John Paul II in reference to the tradition of his two great predecessors, John XXIII and Paul VI. His election was a world sensation since he was the first non-Italian to become the head of the Catholic Church in 455 years and since he came for a Communist country, where, despite thirty-five years of official struggle against religion, the Catholic Church and faith had remained alive among the majority of the population. This election changed Poland, where John Paul became not only a religious leader, but also a national hero. The election of a Polish Pope drew the world's attention to the political nature of the divisions in Europe and to its actual unity.

From the very beginning John Paul II attracted attention by his new style, enormous energy, and spiritual personality. Everywhere he went he drew the enthusiasm of the crowd. In a short time he published the encyclicals Redemptor hominis (1979) and Laborem Exercens (1981), which provided for the theological foundations of his pontificate. His new style included numerous pilgrimages. By the twenty-fifth anniversary of his pontificate he had paid more than one hundred visits to most countries of the world. In 1979 he went to Mexico, Poland, Ireland, the United States, and Turkey; in 1980, to several African countries, Germany, France, and Brazil; and in 1981, to Pakistan, the Philippines, and Japan. Everywhere he was welcomed by huge crowds. His visit to Poland in June 1979 played an enormous role in the awakening of the civil society in his homeland. His activities raised a lot of anxiety in the Kremlin. During a meeting of Soviet bloc party secretaries in Berlin on 3–5 June 1979 plans were prepared to oppose his mission. The local pro-Soviet press brutally attacked him. His theology of labor and the peaceful method of achieving social goals that he advocated substantially contributed to the formation of Solidarity after the summer 1980 strikes on the Polish Baltic Coast. When in December 1980 the Kremlin made preparations to invade Poland, John Paul planned to come to his homeland. It may be assumed that the attempt on his life made in Rome by the Turkish terrorist Mehmet Ali Agca on 13 May 1981 was no accident. There are hints indicating that the attempt was prepared by the Bulgarian special services in cooperation with the KGB, but the case remains unsolved.

After convalescence, John Paul II resumed his pilgrimages. In 1982 he went to Africa, Fatima (Portugal), Great Britain, Argentina, Brazil, and Spain, and he paid a visit to the International Labour Organization headquarters in Geneva, Switzerland. In 1983 he visited Central America, the Caribbean islands, and Poland. His homilies to the Poles kept up their determination during the period of martial law. In January 1984 the Holy See restored diplomatic relations with the United States, severed in 1867. In May 1984 John Paul went on another trip to Asia and the Pacific, meeting President Ronald Reagan in Alaska. He paid special attention to Third World countries and the threats of spreading violence resulting from the so-called theology of liberation, particularly popular in Latin America. In September 1984 a special instruction of the Congregation for the Doctrine of Faith was published on the matter. Supporting efforts at liberation from economic, political, cultural, social, and racial discrimination, the instruction criticized the theology of liberation for accepting the principle of the class struggle and the use of violence.

The Pope met all kinds of political leaders, even those who openly violated principles advocated by the Church and even suppressed religion. For instance, in February 1985 he met the Soviet foreign minister, Andrei Gromyko. In August 1985 he went to Africa, where he appealed for a dialogue with Islam. In 1986 he visited India (where he met Mother Teresa), East Asia, Australia, and New Zealand. In December 1987 he received the Patriarch of Constantinople, Dimitrios II, in the Vatican and signed with him a declaration of hope for the development of a dialogue and rapprochement between the Catholic and Orthodox Churches.

Apart from enthusiasm, his mission raised objections. In Latin America and the Philippines, a part of the clergy did not abandon the theology of liberation. Many believers, including many priests in the United States and Western Europe, criticized his negative attitude toward abortion and the acceptance of women into the priesthood. Radical theologians even questioned the right of the Pope to state what was within the limits of Catholic doctrine and what was not. An extraordinary Synod of Bishops in Rome in November and December 1985 defined the limits of political engagement by the clergy; stressed the importance of women in Church life and the substantial meaning of the protection of the fetus; and condemned the consumerist way of life, race discrimination, and violations of human rights. Defined as a social “liberal” and a doctrinal “conservative,” the Pope was convinced that the protection of human dignity and the necessary modernization of Church activity did not imply a democratic debate over Catholic doctrine. In 1987 he published another social encyclical, Sollicitudo rei socialis. He supported the development of religious movements, but he opposed integrism, which rejected the accomplishments of the Second Vatican Council. When in late June 1988 the integrist leader, Archbishop Marcel Levebvre, consecrated four bishops without consent of the Holy See, he was excommunicated; this started the first twentieth-century schism in Catholicism.

John Paul II greatly contributed to the relatively peaceful fall of the Communist system in the Soviet bloc. This was also stressed by Mikhail Gorbachev, whom the Pope met on 1 December 1989. After 1989 the Pope normalized the legal and organizational standing of the Catholic Church in the Soviet Union and the East European countries. He also visited most of the former Communist countries. Apart from Poland, he visited Czechoslovakia in 1990; Hungary in 1991 and 1996; Albania, Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania in 1993; Croatia in 1994 and 2003; the Czech Republic and Slovakia in 1995; Slovenia in 1996; Bosnia and Herzegovina in 1997; Romania in 1999; Ukraine, Armenia, and Kazakhstan in 2001; and Bulgaria in 2002. He also went to Cuba in 1998. Thanks to the mediation of the Vatican and local churches, peaceful transitions from dictatorship to democracy were made possible in the Philippines, Nicaragua, and some African countries. The Pope also took an active part in negotiating a border agreement between Chile and Argentina.

Inspired by the Second Vatican Council's stance toward non-Christian religions, John Paul II was particularly active in the process of reconciliation between the Catholic Church and Jews, and he made several breakthrough steps in this direction. In April 1986 he was the first pope to pay a visit to the Rome synagogue. He established relations between the Holy See and the state of Israel. On 30 December 1993 the first agreement between them was signed in Jerusalem. On 17 March 1994 the Israeli prime minister paid an official visit to the Vatican, and on 15 June 1994 diplomatic relations were established between the two states. On 25 October 1994 the Vatican also established official relations with the Palestinian Liberation Organization. In view of the spread of militant Islam, the Pope decided to go to Sudan in February 1993, where he defended Christian rights, which had been violated by the bloody repression of the local fundamentalist regime.

The pontificate of John Paul II gave the Catholic Church a new dynamism, but the challenges to Catholicism remained. Scandals involving priests and even bishops and the erosion of religious belief required not only words, but also deeds. For instance, the Pope suspended French bishop Jacques Gaillot for supporting ideas contrary to Catholic doctrine. Despite the tensions and problems within the U.S. Catholic community, he consistently opposed abortion, homosexuality, and women's entry into the priesthood. During a visit to the United States in August 1993 he strongly criticized the "civilization of death" that accepted abortion and euthanasia. At the same time, opposing the ordination of women, he stressed the unique dignity of women. During his visit to South Africa in September 1995 he said that women were more sensitive to peace and justice since they were closer to the mystique of life. On the occasion of a UN conference in Beijing in the summer of 1995, he published a letter apologizing for centuries of the unequal treatment of women and for the sins of "those sons of the Church" who bore responsibility for this. He always stressed the role of family and motherhood in diminishing the crisis of human civilization. In 1986 in Rome he initiated Catholic youth meetings, held every year or every other year in various countries all over the world.

In 1991 John Paul II published the encyclical Centesimus Annus to commemorate the centenary of the Rerum Novarum encyclical of Pope Leo XIII. In November and December 1991 he organized the Synod of European Bishops, which launched a new evangelization of the Old Continents. In November 1992 in Rome a new catechism was announced, and in October 1993 the encyclical Veritatis Splendor was published. Although many Catholics failed to follow his teachings, his popularity was enormous. In 1994 Time magazine announced that John Paul was Man of the Year. In June 1994 he called on all Catholics to do self-examinations and demanded repentance for intolerance and violence. In 1994 his book, Przekroczyć próg nadziei (Crossing the Threshold of Hope; 1994), became a worldwide best seller. In March 1995 he announced the encyclical Evangelium vitae in defense of life against the "culture of death," and in May 1995 another encyclical, Ut unum sint, on a possible unity among Christians. On the occasion of fifty years of his priesthood in 1996, he announced his memoirs, Dar i tajemnica (Gift and Mystery; 1996). The theological culmination of his pontificate was the encyclical Fides et ratio (1998), in which he stated that in its departure from faith, European culture was also departing from reason and that it was essential to combine faith and reason.

John Paul II told the world what he thought necessary, disregarding hasty, everyday opinions. He opposed both the Iraqi invasion of Kuwait in 1990 and the military operations against Iraq in 1991 and 2003. He also criticized the UN action in Somalia. He tried to create a basis for the solution of political problems by formulating a moral diagnosis. For instance, during the religious celebrations on the five hundredth anniversary of Columbus's landing in America in October 1992, he stressed the importance of the Christianization of the new continent, but he criticized the crimes committed by the colonizers, including priests. He did not conceal truth, even if it was troublesome for the Church. In October 1992 he rehabilitated Galileo, calling the Inquisition verdict of 1632 a "painful misunderstanding." As a scholar, he cared for the development of contacts between the Church and academia.

John Paul II canonized and beatified more than one thousand people, more than any other pope in history. Thus he showed his contemporaries the examples of faith, heroism, and even martyrdom in the defense of faith. He introduced the one-billion-man Catholic community into the new millennium through the celebration of the Jubilee Year 2000. In the spring of 2000 he visited the Holy Land, praying at Mount Sinai and at the Tomb of Christ in Jerusalem. During the Jubilee Year he led the Church in self-examination, apologizing to other communities—for instance, the Jewish community—for sins committed in the name of the Church, and he encouraged personal self-examinations of this kind. Fighting Parkinson's disease, he relentlessly continued his mission. He often appealed to his audience to "be not afraid!" and he posed fundamental questions vital for any human being: “What should we do?” and “How do we recognize good and evil?” John Paul’s death and funeral witnessed an unprecedented mass grievance all over the world, especially in Poland and Italy. (WR)

Sources: Habemus papam (Kraków, 1978); Claire Sterling, The Time of the Assassins (New York, 1983); Paul Henze, Plot to Kill the Pope (New York, 1983); André Frossard, “Be Not Afraid!” (New York, 1984); Rocco Buttiglione, Karol Wojtyła: The Thought of the Man Who Became Pope John Paul II (Grand Rapids, Mich., 1997); J. N. D. Kelly, The Oxford Dictionary of Popes (Oxford, 1986); John Moody, Pope John Paul II (New York, 1997); Mieczysław Maliński, Przewodnik po życiu Karola Wojtyły (Kraków, 1997); Avery Dulles, SJ, The Splendor of Faith: The Theological Vision of Pope John Paul II (New York, 1999); George Weigel, Witness to Hope (New York, 1999); Luigi Accatolli, Man of the Millennium: John Paul II (Boston, 2000).

JOVANOVIĆ Dragoljub (6 April 1895, Pirot–1977), Yugoslav Peasant Party politician and sociologist of Serb descent. During World War I Jovanović served in the Serbian Army. At the end of the war he started studies in Paris and received a Ph.D. there. Later he worked as a professor of sociology at the University of Belgrade. In the 1920s he belonged to the opposition against the royal dictatorship and Serbian nationalist parties. In an article published in 1928 he accused the Belgrade press of sowing a nationalist psychosis that led to the assassination of Stjepan Radić and other MPs. Accused of anti-state activities, Jovanović spent a year under house arrest. He supported the idea of a federal Yugoslavia. In the 1930s he worked with the leader of the Croatian Peasant Party, Vlatko Maček, and he co-organized the Peasant Democratic Coalition. He published a lot on various issues of the Yugoslav countryside. During World War II, he favored the cooperation of federalist organizations with the Communists. Although he spent the war years in Belgrade, he was included in the Anti-Fascist Council of the National Liberation of Yugoslavia—that is, the Communist quasi-parliament. After the war he remained an MP. When in July 1946 he criticized the plans for collectivization and an excessive dependence on the USSR, he was deprived of his mandate, arrested, and sentenced to nine years in prison in September 1947. While in prison, Jovanović recorded his reflections on scraps of toilet paper, and after many years he edited them into two volumes of short essays about persons whom he had met and who had since died: Ljudi, ljudi: Medaljony 56 umrilih savremenika (People, people: Locketts of 56 deceased contemporaries; 1973) and Ljudi, ljudi: Medaljony 46 umrilih savremenika (1975; People, people: Locketts of 46 deceased contemporaries). Disappointed with communism, Jovanović remained true to the idea of a federal Yugoslavia, although in the census of 1971 he declared himself to be a Serb. He authored Le rendement optimum du travail ouvrier (Optimum productivity of the labor force; 1923); Les effets économiques et sociaux de la guerre en Serbie (The economic and social consequences of the war in Serbia; 1930); and Agrarna politika (Agrarian policy; 1930). (WR) Sources: Enciklopedija Jugoslavije, vol. 4 (Zagreb, 1960); Richard Frucht, ed., Encyclopedia of Eastern Europe (New York and London, 2000); Hugh Seton-Watson, The East European Revolution (London, 1956); Dragoljub Jovanović—sloboda od straha: Izabrane političke rasprave (Belgrade, 1991).

JOVANOVIĆ Slobodan (21 November 1869, Novi Sad–12 December 1958, London), Yugoslav historian and politician of Serb nationality. In 1890 Jovanović graduated in law from Geneva University. In 1897 he started working in the Serbian Ministry of Foreign Affairs, but he soon devoted himself to a scholarly career. In 1905 he became a professor of history at the University of Belgrade. He was one of the leading experts on Serbian history of the nineteenth century. He also dealt with the history of the state and law and European political thought. For some time he was the president of the University of Belgrade. In the 1930s he anxiously observed the pro-German course of the autocratic government headed by Regent Paul Karadjordjević. Jovanović supported the coup d’état of 27 March 1941 and became deputy prime minister in the government of Dušan Simović. At the end of March he visited Berlin and Rome but failed to reduce the hostility of Germany and Italy toward the new authorities of the state. When the Third Reich subjugated Yugoslavia in April 1941, Jovanović, along with the government, left for England.

On 12 January 1942 King Peter II appointed Jovanović prime minister of the government-in-exile. As a scholar of international reputation, Jovanović was supposed to raise the prestige of the government-in-exile and to mitigate the Serb-Croat conflict. This mission failed in the face of the increasingly strong position of the Communist guerrillas and Josip Broz Tito in occupied Yugoslavia. Jovanović’s talks with the ambassador of the USSR in London, Alexander Bogomolov, in May 1942, did not bring any results except for the Kremlin’s false assurances of non-interference in the domestic affairs of Yugoslavia. On 28 June 1943 Jovanović resigned his post in favor of Božidar Purić, who also failed to change the course of events. After the war Jovanović remained in England. The hostility of the Communists reached him even there. In June 1946 in Belgrade, he was tried in absentia in the trial of Draža Mihailović and was sentenced to sixteen years of hard labor. Jovanović was politically active in exile—for example, he directed the Yugoslav National Committee in England. In 1993 Slobodan Jovanovic u emigraciji: Razgovori i zapisi (Slobodan Jovanovic in exile: Talks and writings) was published in Belgrade. (WR) Sources: Enciklopedja Jugoslavije, vol. 4 (Zagreb, 1960); Biographisches Lexikon, vol. 2; K. Fotitch, The War We Lost (New York, 1948); Kosta Pavlović, Razgovori sa Slobodanom Jovanovićem 1941–1945 (Windsor, 1969); Michał Jerzy Zacharias, Jugosławia w polityce Wielkiej Brytanii 1940–1945 (Wrocław, 1985); Aleksandar Pavkovic, Slobodan Jovanovic: An Unsentimental Approach to Politics (Boulder, Colo., 1993); Vladan Mihajlović, Slobodan Jovanović i građanska država (Belgrade, 1996).

JOVANOVIĆ Vladislav (9 June 1933, Zitni Potok), Serb Communist activist and diplomat. Jovanović's parents were teachers. In 1951 he graduated from high school and then from law studies in Belgrade. In 1957 he started a diplomatic career. From 1960 to 1964 he worked in the Yugoslav Embassy in Brussels, and from 1964, in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs in Belgrade. In 1967–71 he served in the embassy in Turkey, then again in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs in Belgrade. From 1975 to 1979 he was councillor of the embassy in London, from 1980 he headed the Department of Western Europe, and in 1985–89 he was ambassador to Turkey. From 1991 to 1993, with a short break in 1992, Jovanović was foreign minister of the Serb republic. In July 1992 he became foreign minister of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (FRY), but he resigned in September 1992 in protest against the policies of the Milan Panić government, which he found contrary to Serbian interest. From March 1993 he was FRY foreign minister again. In accordance with the policy of Slobodan Milošević, Jovanović tried to make the Bosnian Serbs agree to the Cyrus Vance and David Owen plan, but in vain. In August 1995 he resigned, and in September 1995 he took the lead of the FRY mission to the United Nations. In December 1995 before the UN Security Council he protested the accusations leveled against the Bosnian Serbs for the Srebrenica massacre of July 1995. His argument that the Muslim victims had been killed in fraternal fighting among themselves was perceived as cynical and absurd. Jovanović defended Milošević's policy during the Kosovo crisis in 1999, appealing for termination of the NATO air raids on the FRY. (AO)

Sources: David Owen, Balkan Odyssey (New York, 1995); Željko E. Šuster, Historical Dictionary of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Lanham, Md., 1999); www.rferl.org; www.mfa.gov.yu/history/Ministri/VJovanovic_s.html.

JOVANOVIĆ Živadin (14 November 1938, Oparić), Yugoslav Communist activist of Serb nationality. Jovanović graduated from high school in Jagodina and in law from the University of Belgrade in 1961. For many years he worked in the diplomatic service—as adviser to the Presidium of the Serb republic (1970–74) and councillor at the Yugoslav Embassy in Kenya (1974–78). He was also undersecretary of the Presidium of the Socialist Federative Republic of Yugoslavia (1984–88), and he headed the diplomatic mission to Angola (1988–93). In 1994–97 he was deputy minister of foreign affairs of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (FRY). Then he was deputy chairman of the Socialist Party of Serbia (SPS), headed by Slobodan Milošević. In September 1997 he was elected deputy to the National Assembly of Serbia. In January 1998 the FRY prime minister, Radoje Kantić, appointed Jovanović foreign minister. He served in this capacity during the aggravation of the Albanian-Serb relationship in Kosovo. After the failure of the Kosovo peace talks, on 24 March 1999 NATO began air raids on targets in the FRY. Jovanović remained foreign minister until 17 October 2000, when the Democratic Opposition of Serbia took over power. After Milošević was handed over to The Hague International Criminal Tribunal for Former Yugoslavia in June 2001, Jovanović acted as the SPS chairman, and in December 2001 he passed his duties on to Mirko Marjanović. (AO)

Sources: www.mfa.gov.yu/history/Ministri/ZJovanovic_s.html.

JÓZEWSKI Henryk, pseudonyms “Przemysław,” “Niemirówicz,” and “Olgierd” (6 August 1892, Kiev–23 April 1981, Warsaw), Polish politician. Józewski studied mathematics at the university in Kiev, where he became associated with Polish pro-independence organizations. Drawn to the PPS–Revolutionary Faction, during World War I he co-organized the Polish Military Organization (Polska Organizacja Wojskowa [POW]) in the east. Following a reorganization of the POW, he became a senior staff member of the Second Department of the General Staff of the Polish Army in 1919. He directed Area Three of the Intelligence Office, where he was in charge of active intelligence work. He played a role in the establishment of the Polish Partisan Unit, one of whose functions was to serve as a platform for Polish-Ukrainian military cooperation against the Red Army. Wanted by the Soviet Cheka from the end of 1919, Józewski was summoned to Warsaw. Józef Piłsudski delegated him as a representative of Poland to the government of the Ukrainian People's Republic, where he served as deputy minister of interior. From 1922 on he lived in Volhynia, where he painted as an amateur.

After the coup of May 1926, which Józewski had helped to prepare, from August 1926 to June 1928 he was a member of the staff of the Office of the Prime Minister, and he was head of this office for some time. He combined the work of minister of military affairs and minister of interior. On 30 June 1928 he became the provincial governor (wojewoda) of Volhynia. A promoter of cooperation between the Poles and the Ukrainians in Volhynia, from December 1929 to June 1930 he served as minister of interior, trying to regulate relations between the state and the Orthodox Church. Subsequently, he again became the provincial governor of Volhynia. He believed that the Ukrainian nationalists from Galicia posed a threat to the integrity of Poland and to Polish-Ukrainian cooperation in Volhynia. He was in favor of maintaining the so-called Sokal border, a special administrative frontier that was intended to isolate Volhynia from the influence of Ukrainians from Galicia. At the same time he supported, and even initiated, the development of Ukrainian economic, political, and social organizations that favored cooperation with Poland. He supported parceling farmland out to Ukrainians but at the same time protected Polish military settlements and worked to effectively abolish Ukrainian schools. Nevertheless, he was able to win the support of many Ukrainian intellectuals.

After Piłsudski's death, under pressure from Polish and Ukrainian nationalist circles, Józewski was dismissed from his position in April 1938, and he became the provincial governor of Łódź. After the outbreak of World War II, he moved the office of the provincial governor of Łódź to Volhynia. In the autumn of 1939 Józewski became active in the Service for the Victory of Poland (SZP) and in the Union of Armed Struggle (ZWZ) in Warsaw. Because of objections to his sanacja past, he was dismissed as commander of the ZWZ Warsaw City District. He established the elitist Grupa Olgierda (Olgierd's Group), which published the periodicals Polska Walczy and Ziemia Wschodnie Rzeczypospolitej. Wounded in an assassination attempt, Józewski was less active in underground activities after 1943. He continued underground work until 1945, leading the Polish Democratic Party, an organization of little importance. He worked with the Delegation of Armed Forces for the Homeland (Delegatura Sił Zbrojnych na Kraj) from May to August 1945 and with the Freedom and Independence association (Zrzeszenie Wolność i Niezawisłość [WiN]). He remained in hiding until 1953, when he was arrested. Sentenced to life imprisonment in September 1954, he was released on the wave of the "thaw" in 1956. Until the end of his life he kept busy mainly with painting. Józewski was the author of the memoirs Zamiast pamiętnika (Instead of a memoir), published in Zeszyty Historyczne (1982–83). (PK)

Sources: Kunert, vol. 1; Słownik Polityków Polskich XX w. (Poznań, 1998); Stefan Korboński, Polskie państwo podziemne (Paris, 1975); Iwo Werschler, Z dziejów obozu belwederskiego: Tadeusz Hołówko-życie i działalność (Warsaw, 1984); J. Kęsik, Zaufany komendant: Biografia polityczna Jana Henryka Józewskiego 1892–1981 (Wrocław, 1995).

JÓZSEF Attila (11 April 1905, Budapest–3 December 1937, Balatonszárszó), Hungarian poet. The son of a washerwoman and a soap maker who deserted the family in 1908, József was placed with a foster family for two years in 1910. He later lived alternately in harsh poverty with his family and in various institutions. While in primary school, he made a living as a laborer. After his mother's death in 1919, his brother-in-law took care of him. In 1920 József attended a lower theological seminary of the Salesian order for a short time. From 1920 to 1922 he studied at a gymnasium in Makó, but he had to leave this school following an attempt at suicide. He went to Budapest, where he continued his education, earning a living by giving private lessons. At the same time he wrote poems. One year after the publication of the first volume of his poetry, Szépség koldusa (Beggar of beauty; 1922), his poems began to be published in Nyugat, the most prestigious literary periodical at that time. In 1924 József began to study Hungarian language and literature, as well as Romance language and literature, at the university in Szeged, but he had to discontinue his studies because of a scandal that erupted when the local press published his poems, which were seen as blasphemous and nihilistic. He spent the following academic year at the university in Vienna, where he became friends with almost all of the pro-Communist Hungarian émigrés. In 1926–27 József studied at the Sorbonne and became fascinated with the French avant garde and with Marxism-Leninism. After returning to Hungary, he studied at the university in Budapest, but because of financial problems and a conflict with the authorities of this university, he was unable to complete his studies. In 1928, following a nervous breakdown, he went to a sanatorium.

In 1930 József became active in the then illegal Hungarian Communist Party (HCP), writing and editing leaflets, manifestos, and articles. In 1931 he published Döntsd a tőkét, ne siránkozz! (Do not lament, overthrow the capital!), a volume of poetry that was confiscated by the police because in it József called for the establishment of a dictatorship of the proletariat in Hungary. One year later he was brought to trial, accused of public incitement to class hatred. As a result of sectarian conflicts within the party and because of his own temporary mental disturbance, József broke off organizational ties with the HCP in 1934. One year later he left Judit Szántó, his life companion, whom he had met in the party in 1930. From 1935 on, his periods of intense work were interrupted by increasingly frequent periods in institutions for the mentally ill. In December 1937 József committed suicide by throwing himself under a train. József was one of the greatest Hungarian lyric poets of the first half of the twentieth century. He introduced European avant-garde ideas into Hungarian poetry. A committed poet, he often directly or indirectly referred to a Stalinist version of Marxism-Leninism. He used very rich language and a variety of verse forms, which gave his poems an immense esthetic and emotional charge. He was also the author of poems devoted to his mother, which were full of tenderness and subtle lyricism; these are some of the most beautiful poems in Hungarian literature. After World War II, József's poetry was widely exploited to serve the needs of Communist propaganda in Hungary. (MS)

Sources: Biographisches Lexikon, vol. 2; Laszlo Balogh, József Attila (Budapest, 1970); "Miért fáj ma is": Az ismeretlen József Attila (Budapest, 1992); A Dunánál: Tanulmányok József Attiláról (Budapest, 1995); Steven Bela Vardy, Historical Dictionary of Hungary (Lanham, Md., 1997); Jolán József, József Attila élete (Budapest, 1999).

JÓZWIAK Franciszek, pseudonym "Witold" (20 October 1895, Huta Baranowska, near Puławy—23 October 1966, Warsaw), Polish Communist activist. Józwiak came from a peasant family and completed primary school. During World War I he fought in the Polish Legions, and from 1921 he was in the Polish Communist Workers' Party. He spent 1929–30 in Moscow, where he started working for the Comintern. He was imprisoned for his Communist activities in Poland between 1931–36 and 1937–39. After the outbreak of war in September 1939 Józwiak went to the Soviet-occupied territories, where in 1941 he joined the All-Union Communist Party (Bolshevik). From June 1941 he was in the Soviet guerrilla movement in the rear of the German front. In March 1942 he came to Warsaw and became a member of the CC of the Polish Workers' Party (Polska Partia Robotnicza [PPR]). After Marceli Nowotko was killed, in January 1943 Józwiak joined the Secretariat of the CC, the three-member leadership of the party. From August 1942 he served as chief of staff of the People's Guard, and from January to July 1944, of the People's Army (Armia Ludowa). He was closely connected with Bolesław Bierut.

In October 1944 Józwiak became commander-in-chief of the Civil Militia (Milicja Obywatelska), and from March 1945 to March 1949 he was undersecretary of state in the Ministry of Public Security (Ministerstwo Bezpieczeństwa Publicznego [MBP]). From 1944 he was brigadier general; in April 1946 he was nominated general of division. Józwiak was among the main organizers of the Communist terror. At a plenum in August 1948 he sharply attacked Władysław Gomułka for "rightist-nationalist deviation," and he joined the Politburo of the CC of the PPR. From December 1948 Józwiak was a member of the Politburo of the CC of the Polish United Workers' Party (Polska Zjednoczona Partia Robotnicza [PUWP]). In March 1949 he left the MO (Milicja obywatelska) and the MBP to chair the Supreme Chamber of Control, and he became a member of the Council of State. His departure from the MBP came as a result of his conflict with the head of the MBP, Stanisław Radkiewicz, who proved to be stronger. From April 1949 to January 1955 Józwiak also presided over the Party Central Control Commission. From September 1949 to December 1956 he was president of the Association of Fighters for Freedom and Democracy. For some period of time he was married to Helena Wolińska, head of a department in the Supreme Military Prosecutor's Office. During the "thaw" Józwiak belonged to the Natolin faction of hard-liners. In April 1955 he was named deputy prime minister. At the Eighth Plenum of the CC of the PUWP in October 1956 Józwiak defended Marshal Konstantin Rokossovski and was dropped from the central party leadership. On 24 October 1956 he was dismissed as deputy premier. At the Third Congress of the PUWP in March 1959 he was also ousted from the CC. To the end of his life Józwiak remained a Stalinist, which manifested itself in (among other things) his support of the Chinese orthodoxy. (WR)

Sources: Moldawa; Z. Jakubowski, Franciszek Józwiak "Witold" (Warsaw, 1974); Marek Łatyński, Nie paść na kolana (London, n.d.); Krystyna Kersten, Narodziny systemu władzy: Polska 1943–1948 (Poznań, 1990); Władysław Gomułka, Pamiętniki, vol. 2 (Warsaw, 1994); Tajne oblicze GL-AL. I PPR. Dokumenty, vol. 1 (Warsaw, 1997).

JURCZYK Marian (16 October 1935, Karczewice, near Częstochowa), Polish trade union activist. Jurczyk graduated from an economic high school. From 1954 he worked in the Szczecin shipyard as a blue-collar laborer. He took part in the strike of December 1970. In August 1980 he was elected chairman of the Strike Committee of the shipyard and of the Inter-Factory Strike Committee in Szczecin. On 30 August 1980 he signed the Szczecin agreement with representatives of the Communist authorities. In 1980–81 Jurczyk chaired the Inter-Factory Workers' Commission of Solidarity in Szczecin and the West Pomeranian Regional Board of the union. Thought to be a radical, at the First Solidarity Congress in September 1981 Jurczyk was elected to its National Commission, but he lost the election for union chairman to Lech Wałęsa. On 13 December 1981 Jurczyk was interned, and in 1982 he was arrested. Amnestied in 1984, until 1986 he worked as head of the Szczecin shipyard warehouse. From 1986 on an invalid pension, Jurczyk took part in underground Solidarity activities in Szczecin, opposing Wałęsa and his tactics. From 1987 he was one of the leaders of the Working Group, demanding a convention of the Solidarity National Commission elected in 1981. He opposed the Round Table Agreement and attacked the government of Tadeusz Mazowiecki and later President Wałęsa. In 1990 he co-organized and until 1994 he presided over the National Coordination Commission, and from 1996 he presided over the National Commission of the Solidarity 80 trade union. From 1997 Jurczyk was an independent senator, and in 1998–2001 he was mayor of Szczecin on behalf of the Independent Social Movement in coalition with the post-Communists. Jurczyk was accused of having cooperated with the Communist security services. He explained that his cooperation was the result of blackmail and that it ended with the death of two members of his family. In March 2000 he gave up his senator's mandate. In December 2002 the Supreme Court relieved him of the “lustration lie,” arguing that he had done no damage. From November 2002 Jurczyk was mayor of Szczecin, again in cooperation with the post-Communists. (WR)

Sources: Kto jest kim w Polsce (Warsaw, 2001); Jerzy Holzer, “Solidarność” (Warsaw, 1983); Małgorzata Szejnert and Tomasz Zalewski, Szczecin, grudzień, sierpień, grudzień (London, 1986); Jerzy Holzer and Krzysztof Leski, “Solidarność” w podziemiu (Łódź, 1990).

JURIGA Ferdinand (12 October 1874, Gbely–23 November 1950, Bratislava), Slovak Catholic priest and politician. Juriga studied theology in Esztergom and Vienna. In 1898 he took holy orders. In 1905 he became a parish priest in Vajnory. When in 1905 the Catholic People's Party (Katolikus Néppárt [CPP]) of Ferenc Zichy joined the ruling coalition and abandoned its demands for the mitigation of ethnic policy, Juriga, along with Reverend Andrej Hlinka, František Jehlička, František Skýčak, and other Slovak activists, announced the establishment of the Slovak People's Party (Slovenská Ľudová Strana [SPP]), a local faction of the CCP. Juriga became very popular as a people's judge and an uncompromising critic of Magyarization and corruption in state offices. In 1906 in Stúpava, near Bratislava, he was elected an MP from the SPP lists. In 1907 he was sentenced to a two-year imprisonment for “anti-state” publications. In 1910, as a representative of the Catholic wing of the Slovak National Party (SNP), he won a seat in parliament. After conflicts with the Protestant leadership of the SNP in 1913, along with Hlinka, Juriga brought about the foundation of an independent SPP. During World War I Juriga was the only Slovak member of the Hungarian parliament. On 19 October 1918, in the Hungarian parliament, he demanded on behalf of the newly established Slovak National Council (Slovenská Národná Rada [SNR]) the right of self-determination for the Slovak nation. One of the organizers of the SNR assembly in Turčiansky Svätý Martin (today Martin), Juriga was co-author and signatory of the declaration of 30 October 1918, which called for the creation of a common state of Czechs and Slovaks. In 1918–29 Juriga sat in the parliament in Prague. As a result of a conflict with Hlinka, he left the SPP before the elections of 1929. Juriga formed his own party but failed to win a seat in parliament, and he withdrew from politics. (MG)

Sources: SBS; Augustín Mat'ovčík et al., Reprezentačný biografický lexikón Slovenska (Martin, 1999); Muži deklarácie (Martin, 1991); Politické strany na Slovensku (Bratislava, 1992); Marián Hronský, Bojo Slovensko a Trianon 1918–1920 (Bratislava, 1998).

JUSTINIAN [originally Ioan Marina] (22 February 1901, Suești, near Râmnicu Vâlcea–26 March 1977, Bucharest), Patriarch of the Romanian Orthodox Church. After completing a theological seminary in Râmnicu, Justinian took holy orders in 1924. He studied theology at the university in Budapest and in 1929 earned a bachelor's degree. He later taught at a theological seminary in Râmnicu. As a widower, he entered a monastery in Cetatua, near Iași, taking the name Justinian. In August 1944 for a short time he gave shelter in the parsonage to Gheorghe Gheorgiu-Dej, the future leader of the Communists. In 1945 Justinian was consecrated bishop and was appointed curate to the Moldavian metropolitan in Iași. In 1947 he became the metropolitan of Moldavia, and on 24 May 1948, Patriarch of the Romanian Orthodox Church. Justinian's career was supported by such people as Ana Pauker, who was responsible for the religious policy of the Communist Party. Justinian recognized the subordination of Church structures to the state and tolerated the policy of clergy recruitment by the Securitate, the secret political police. A new Church statute, prepared under Justinian's supervision, was approved by the Synod of the Orthodox Church in 1948 and by the Ministry for Religious Affairs in 1949. Justinian supported the pro-government Union of Democratic Priests, led by Father Ion Burducea, a former member of the Iron Guard who represented Communists as the minister for religious affairs. In the 1930s and 1940s Justinian combated the Orthodox Church's support for the authoritarian government of Marshal Ion Antonescu, but he tolerated the fact that clergymen formerly linked with the Iron Guard were members of the Church's ruling body. Justinian was an uncompromising opponent of the Uniate Church and supported activities aimed at its abolishment. He took part in an attack against the Greek Catholic clergy, accepting the unlawful and cruel persecutions of Greek Catholic clergymen. Justinian often visited Greek Catholic bishops in prison and unsuccessfully tried to persuade them to join the Orthodox Church. He ordered a takeover of the Uniate churches. The Orthodox monasteries were used by the authorities to intern Uniate hierarchs.

At the same time, Justinian implemented a reform of the system and a reorganization of the Orthodox Church and its pastoral work. He attempted to modernize the organization of the Orthodox Church. He was committed to revitalizing the priests' pastoral work, promoted education, and founded charities. His work brought him recognition, especially in the provinces. He reformed theological studies, founded a publishing house, set up museums, and collected Church archives. He also managed to maintain ties with the Romanian mission in Jerusalem and with the Romanian mission in Detroit. The latter mission was elevated to the rank of archbishopric of America, with the status of an autonomous church. Justinian established a Romanian diocese of Central and Western Europe for émigrés. In the 1960s, when Romania began to emphasize greater independence from the USSR, he supported Romanian theologians' studies in the West and took an active part in the ecumenical movement. In 1961, on his initiative, the Romanian Orthodox Church joined the Ecumenical Council of Churches and the Conference of European Churches. In 1962 Justinian sent an observer to the Second Ecumenical Council, and in 1967 he established an official relationship with the Catholic Church. (AGr)

Sources: Encyklopedia katolicka, vol. 8 (Lublin, 2000); Die Rumänische Orthodoxe Kirche (Bucharest, 1962); E. Ch. Suttner, Beiträge zur Kirchengeschichte der Rumänen (Vienna, 1978); Bohdan Cywiński, Ogniem próbowane: Z dziejów najnowszych Kościoła katolickiego w Europie Środkowo-Wschodniej (Lublin, 1990); Dennis Deletant, Communist Terror in Romania: Gheorghiu-Dej and the Police State, 1948–1965 (New York, 1999).

K

KABAKCHIEV Khristo (2 January 1878, Galati–6 October 1940, Moscow), Bulgarian Communist activist. After graduating from high school, Kabakchiev studied in Bulgaria and Switzerland. From 1897 he belonged to the Bulgarian Social Democratic Party, and in 1903 he supported its Bolshevik faction, Tesnyaki. From 1905 he was a member of its Central Committee. In 1908 he was elected MP to the National Assembly. When in April 1919 the Bulgarian Communist Party was created, Kabakchiev joined its Central Committee (CC). In 1920 he was the party's delegate to the Second Congress of the Communist International. In January 1923 he became the organizational secretary of the CC of the party, directing the preparations for a coup that began in September of that year. After the failure of the coup, Kabakchiev was sentenced to twelve and a half years of prison. Released under the amnesty of 1926, he left for the USSR, where he assumed the post of member of the Executive Committee of the Comintern, a position that until then he had held in absentia. In 1928 he was removed from the party executive and from the International; he then worked at the Comintern school and at the Marx-Engels-Lenin Institute. At that time Kabakchiev was a member of the All-Union Communist Party (Bolsheviks). He was arrested during the great purge in 1937. Released the next year in a bad state of health, he died soon afterwards. (WR)

Sources: Lazitch; Who Was Who in the USSR (Metuchen, N.J., 1972).

KÄBIN Johannes (24 September 1905, Kalvi–26 October 1999, Tallinn), Soviet Communist activist of Estonian origin. Käbin was born into a peasant family that in 1910 had left for Russia and had been Russified, becoming, as it was called in Estonia, “Yestonians.” Until the 1950s he used the Russian version of his name, Ivan Kebin. From 1923 to 1925 he was a seasonal laborer. After graduating from the Leningrad party school in 1926, Käbin became a member of the All-Union Communist Party (Bolsheviks) in 1927. In 1927–31 he was head of the soviet in Susanino in the region of Gatchina. From 1931 he worked as a party instructor in Leningrad, and from 1935 to 1936, after completing a course in Marxism-Leninism, he became head of propaganda and agitation in the Omsk district in Siberia. In 1936–38 Käbin studied in Moscow at the Institute of Red Professorship, from which he did not graduate. Later, he was a party instructor at the Gubkin Institute, and in 1938–41, thus during the first Soviet occupation of Estonia, he served as head of the Propaganda and Agitation Department of the Central Committee (CC) of the Communist Party of Estonia (Bolsheviks) (CPE[B]).

From 1941 Käbin was a member of the CC of the CPE(B), responsible for training party cadres in the territory of the USSR, and he was also the head of the Party History Institute of the CPE(B). Between 1944 and 1947 he was deputy secretary of the CC for propaganda and agitation affairs, and from 1948, secretary and member of the Politburo of the CC of the CPE(B). On the wave of purges connected with accusations against those who had underestimated “bourgeois nationalism,” directed against the previous leadership of the party with Nikolai Karotamm at its head, in 1950 Käbin became first secretary of the CC of the CPE(B) and a member of the CC of the CPSU. He came to the post of head of the Estonian party as an ardent Stalinist functionary and a Russifier. However, he was a skillful tactician, which allowed him to survive de-Stalinization, change political course, and, thanks to good relations with Nikita Khrushchev, improve the supply of goods in the Estonian SSR. After 1956 Käbin returned to the Estonian version of his surname and even tried to improve his Estonian, although his language gaffes were proverbial in the Estonian SSR. In the 1960s and 1970s he tolerated the cultural identity of the republic and gave up his efforts to impose Socialist realism. By 1978 his policy was no longer approved of by the Kremlin. Käbin resigned from his post of first secretary of the CC and became president of the Presidium of the Supreme Council of the Estonian SSR and deputy president of the Presidium of the Supreme Council of the USSR. This was a typical “blow to the leadership” because at the same time Karl Vaino, an ardent Russifier, was made head of the Estonian party. In 1983 Käbin finally retired and was succeeded as president of the Presidium of the Supreme Council by Arnold Rüütel. He also resigned from the Politburo of the CC of the CPE. Käbin continued to hold a seat in the CC of the CPE until 1986, and later he left even this position. (AG/WR)

Sources: Who's Who in the Socialist Countries of Europe (Munich, London, and Paris, 1989); Romualdas Misunas and Rein Taagepera, The Baltic States: The Years of Dependence, 1940–1970 (Berkeley, 1993); Rein Taagepera, Estonia: Return to Independence (Boulder, Colo., 1993); Valdemar Pinn, Kes oli Nikolai Karotamm? (N.p., 1996); <http://www.sada.ee/inimesed.php>; P. Ernits, “Kebba Jürri võrsed,” Luup, 1998, no. 4.

KACZMAREK Czesław (16 April 1895, Lisewo Małe, near Sierpc–26 August 1963, Lublin), Polish bishop. The son of a peasant, after graduating from a training college in 1914, Kaczmarek taught in Tłuchów. In 1916 he enrolled in a theological seminary in Płock. He volunteered to fight in the Polish-Soviet war in 1920. In August 1922 he was ordained. Later he continued his studies at the University of Lille, France, where he received a Ph.D. in 1927. Until 1928 he worked as a minister of Polish parishes in France. After returning to Poland, he was secretary general of the Union of Catholic Youth in Płock, organizing retreats and courses for the local youth. From 1932 he was director of the Institute of Catholic Action in Płock, and he founded a few periodicals promoting Catholic social teachings. He also founded the so-called evening universities aiming at the religious instruction of adults. On 24 May 1938 Kaczmarek was appointed bishop of Kielce. He founded the Institute of Higher Religious Culture in Kielce, and he reactivated Catholic Action activities and the Jedność Press. He was thought to be close to the National Democracy. From September 1939 to May 1940 Kaczmarek published three Episcopal letters encouraging believers to respect the regulations of the German occupants; this resulted in some criticism from the pro-independence activists in the underground. At the same time he ran an underground theological seminary and aided more than two hundred priests from outside his diocese. Moreover, he delegated chaplains to guerrilla units and supported secret education.

After the war Kaczmarek organized the reconstruction of devastated churches and the distribution of material aid for the victims of the war through Caritas. In 1946 Communist propaganda accused him of co-responsibility in the Kielce pogrom of Jews, although in practice he had had no chance to act and had been isolated by the Communist security officers. Kaczmarek was critical of the agreement that Primate Stefan Wyszyński reached with authorities on 14 April 1950. He protested the involvement of the clergy in the Communist-sponsored movement of “patriotic priests.” Arrested on 20 January 1951, during a long investigation, Kaczmarek was interrogated personally by Józef Różański and was repeatedly tortured, so he confessed to having headed an “anti-state and anti-people’s center.” He was the only member of the Polish Episcopate to undergo a show trial; on 22 September 1953 he was sentenced to twelve years in prison. In May 1956, owing to ailing health, he was moved to the Rywałd Królewski Monastery, which he left without permission and went to Warsaw. On 28 December 1956 the Supreme Military Court lifted his sentence, and in 1957 the Supreme Military Prosecutor discontinued the case “for lack of proof.” In April 1957 Kaczmarek returned to the Kielce diocese and implemented the Great Novena before the Millennium of Polish Christianity. He dismissed “patriotic priests,” so he was attacked again by propaganda. In a homily delivered in February 1959 he defended Christians persecuted in Red China, so the Communist authorities tried to ban his activities as ordinary bishop. Supported by a personal letter from Pope John XXIII, Kaczmarek stayed in Kielce and continued his mission despite obstacles and harassment. In November 1990 the Prosecutor General fully rehabilitated him and other priests sentenced with him in 1953. (AGr)

Sources: Encyklopedia Katolicka, vol. 8 (Lublin, 2000); Leksykon duchowieństwa represjonowanego w PRL w latach 1945–1989, vol. 1 (Warsaw, 2002); Andrzej Micewski, Kardynał Wyszyński: Prymas i mąż stanu (Paris, 1982); Jan Śledzianowski, Ksiądz Czesław Kaczmarek biskup kielecki 1895–1963 (Kielce, 1991); Jan Żaryn, Kościół a władza w Polsce (1945–1950) (Warsaw, 1997).

KACZOROWSKI Ryszard (26 November 1919, Białystok), Polish politician. Kaczorowski graduated from a trade school in Białystok. From his youth he was active in scouting. In August 1939 he was deputy commander of the Scouting Emergence in Białystok, and under the Soviet occupation he became deputy commander of the Białystok troop, included in the Gray Ranks (underground scouting) in November 1939. In June 1940 he became commander of the Gray Ranks troop and liaison officer between this organization and the commander of the Union of Armed Struggle in Białystok. Arrested by the NKVD in July 1940 and held in the Białystok and Minsk prisons, in February 1941 Kaczorowski was sentenced to death by the Supreme Court of the Belorussian SSR. In May 1941 this sentence was commuted to ten years of labor camp in Kolyma. Released from camp after the conclusion of the Polish-Soviet agreement of July 1941, in March 1942 Kaczorowski joined the Polish Army formed by General Władysław Anders. Evacuated from the USSR, he fought with the Second Polish Corps in Italy, which was at the battle of Monte Cassino in May 1944.

After the war Kaczorowski lived in Great Britain. In 1947 he graduated from high school and in 1949 from the School of Foreign Trade in London. Until 1986 he worked as a bookkeeper in industry. From 1949 he belonged to the Headquarters of Scouting in exile; in 1955–67 he was Head of the Scouts, and from 1967, president of the Polish Scouting Association in exile. He commanded Polish World Scouting congresses in Monte Cassino in 1969 and Belgium in 1982. Kaczorowski belonged to the leadership of the Association of Polish War Veterans (Stowarzyszenie Polskich Kombatantów), the Federation of Poles in Great Britain, Polish Social and Cultural Center, Polish School Matrix, Institute of Polish Catholic Action, and Coordination Council of the Polonia of the Free World. In March 1986 he was included in the National Council of the Polish Republic and the Polish Government-in-Exile. In 1986–89 he was minister of homeland affairs in the government of Edward Szczepanik, maintaining wide contacts in Poland. In accord with the constitution of April 1935, in January 1988 President Kazimierz Sabbat designated Kaczorowski as his successor. After Sabbat's death, on 19 July 1989 Kaczorowski assumed the duties of Polish president in exile. On 22 December 1990 at Warsaw Castle, he symbolically passed his insignia to the first freely elected president of Poland, Lech Wałęsa. Kaczorowski continued to live in London, taking an active part in the social life of Poland and British Polonia and enjoying the authority of a politician who combined the traditions of the Second and Third Polish Republics. (JS)

Sources: Władze Rzeczypospolitej Polskiej na Uchodźstwie (London, 1990); Polonia: Słownik biograficzny (Warsaw, 2000); Adam Dobroński, Ostatni Prezydent II Rzeczypospolitej Ryszard Kaczorowski: Osiem wieczorów z prezydentem (Białystok, 1999); Rafał Habielski, Życie społeczne i kulturalne emigracji (Warsaw, 1999); Ryszard Kaczorowski doctor honoris causa Uniwersytetu w Białymstoku (Białystok, 1999).

KACZYŃSKI Jarosław (18 June 1949, Warsaw), Polish lawyer and politician, twin brother of Lech Kaczyński. In 1971 Kaczyński graduated in law from the University of Warsaw, in 1976 he received a Ph.D. in law, and from 1977 he worked at the University of Warsaw campus in Białystok. In 1976 he sent out a personal letter protesting the amendment of the constitution, and then he worked with the Committee for the Defense of Workers and its Intervention Bureau in particular. He contributed to the uncensored monthly Głos, and in 1980–81 he headed the law section of the Center for Social Research of Solidarity's Mazowsze Regional Board. After the introduction of martial law in December 1981, from 1982 Kaczyński was active in the underground structures of Solidarity and the Polish Helsinki Committee. He became a close aide of Lech Wałęsa, heading the social and political administration of the Provisional Coordination Commission of Solidarity from 1986. In 1987–89 he was one of the secretaries of Solidarity's National Executive Commission, and from 1988 to 1991 he was a member of the Civic Committee of the Solidarity Chairman. He took part in the Round Table Talks (February–April 1989).

In June 1989 Kaczyński was elected to the Senate, and in August 1989 he played an important role in the creation of a coalition of the Civic Parliamentary Club (Obywatelski Klub Parlamentarny [OKP]), the United Peasant Party, and the Democratic Party; it led to the formation of the Tadeusz Mazowiecki government. From October 1989 to December 1990 he was editor-in-chief of the weekly Tygodnik Solidarność. In 1990 he headed an OKP faction opposing the club's leadership and supporting Wałęsa in a conflict with Mazowiecki (the so-called war at the top). In May 1990 he co-founded the Center Alliance (Porozumienie Centrum [PC]) and became its chairman. From December 1990 to November 1991 he was chief of the Chancellery of President Wałęsa. He entered into conflict with the president over the role of former Communist activists in Wałęsa's camp, and from early 1992 he became his keen opponent. From May 1993 Kaczyński headed the PC parliamentary club. After the party was defeated in the elections of September 1993, he remained its chairman. He advocated de-communization and scrutiny of former security collaborators. He referred to national and Catholic values and supported Polish integration with NATO and the European Union. From 1996 he was active in Solidarity Electoral Action (Akcja Wyborcza Solidarność), but in the elections of September 1997 he won a seat on behalf of the Movement for the Reconstruction of Poland, and then he was an independent MP. Kaczyński authored a few books and co-authored Lewy czerwcowy (The left-handed blow in June; 1993), an anti-Wałęsa pamphlet. From early 2001 he was chief aide to his brother Lech, with whom he created the Law and Justice party (Prawo i Sprawiedliwość [PiS]). In the elections of September 2001 the party gained 9.5 percent of the vote, and Kaczyński won a seat. From October 2002 he was the PiS chairman. After the party won the election of September 2005 he did not assume the position of prime minister but rather focused on chairing the party.

Sources: Nasi w Sejmie i Senacie (Warsaw, 1990); Teresa Torafińska, My (Warsaw, 1994); Jan Skórzyński, Uгода i rewolucja: Władza i opozycja 1985–1989 (Warsaw, 1995); Janusz A. Majcherek, Pierwsza dekada III Rzeczypospolitej 1989–1999 (Warsaw, 1999); Wojciech Roszkowski, Historia Polski 1914–2000 (Warsaw, 2001); Antoni Dudek, Pierwsze lata III Rzeczypospolitej 1989–2001 (Kraków, 2002).

KACZYŃSKI Lech (18 June 1949, Warsaw), Polish lawyer and politician, twin brother of Jarosław Kaczyński. Kaczyński graduated in law from the University of Warsaw in 1971. He received a Ph.D. in 1980 and a postdoctoral degree (habilitacja) in 1990. He worked at the Academy of Catholic Theology in Warsaw (as of 1999, the Cardinal Stefan Wyszyński University) and the University of Gdańsk. From 1977 he worked with the Committee for the Defense of Workers, and from 1978, with the Free Trade Unions in Gdańsk. In August 1980 he was one of the advisers of the Inter-Factory Strike Committee and later of the Inter-Factory Founding Committee and the Solidarity Regional Board in Gdańsk. In 1981 he headed the Center for Social and Professional Studies of Solidarity's National Commission and was a delegate to the First Solidarity Congress in Gdańsk. Interned on 13 December 1981 and released in October 1982, Kaczyński was active in the Solidarity underground structures, working closely with Lech Wałęsa. From January 1986 he represented the Gdańsk region in the Solidarity Provisional Coordination Commission; he was its secretary and later the secretary of the National Executive Commission. From 1988 to 1991 he belonged to the Civic Committee of the Chairman of Solidarity. He took part in the Round Table Talks (February–April 1989).

In 1989–90 Kaczyński was a member of the Presidium of Solidarity's National Executive Commission, and from May 1990 to March 1991 he was first deputy chairman of the union. In June 1989 he was elected to the Senate, where he belonged to a group that questioned the policy of the leadership of the Civic Parliamentary Club during the so-called war at the top between Wałęsa and Prime Minister Tadeusz Mazowiecki. In 1991 Kaczyński was elected to the Lower House (Sejm) on behalf of the Center Alliance (Porozumienie Centrum). From March to October 1991 he was minister of state for national security in the Office of President Wałęsa. He left this position disagreeing with Wałęsa's personnel policy. In 1991–92 Kaczyński chaired the parliamentary commission of administration and home affairs. From February 1992 to May 1995 he was chairman of the Supreme Chamber of Control. In September 1995 he was registered as a presidential candidate, but he withdrew in October. In June 2000 he became minister of justice in the government of Jerzy Buzek, gaining huge popularity thanks to his determination to combat corruption and inefficiency in the judiciary. He was recalled from this position in July 2001. From March 2001 he was the leader of the Law and Justice party (Prawo i Sprawiedliwość). In the elections of September 2001 his party gained 9.5 percent of the votes, and Kaczyński won a seat, becoming one of the leaders of the parliamentary opposition. In the direct elections of October 2002 he was elected president of Warsaw. In the first round of presidential election, on 9 October 2005, he came in second after Donald Tusk, but two weeks later he won the presidency with 54 percent of the vote.

Sources: Nasi w Sejmie i Senacie (Warsaw, 1990); Jan Skórzyński, Ugoda i rewolucja: Władza i opozycja 1985–1989 (Warsaw, 1995); Janusz A. Majcherek, Pierwsza dekada III Rzeczypospolitej 1989–1999 (Warsaw, 1999); Wojciech Roszkowski, Historia Polski 1914–2000 (Warsaw, 2001); Antoni Dudek, Pierwsze lata III Rzeczypospolitej 1989–2001 (Kraków, 2002).

KACZYŃSKI Zygmunt (15 October 1894, Kaczyń, near Łomża–13 May 1953, Warsaw), Polish priest and politician. After graduating from a seminary in Warsaw, in 1914

Kaczyński began to study at the Theological Academy in St. Petersburg, where he received the degree of candidate in canon law. Ordained in 1917, he returned to Poland and assumed the post of secretary general of the Association of Christian Workers. In January 1919 he was elected to the Constituent Assembly as a representative of the National Popular Union (Związek Ludowo-Narodowy [ZLN]), but he soon founded the Christian National Workers' Club. In 1920, during the Polish-Soviet war, he served as a chaplain in the Polish Army. In the elections of 1922, he ran successfully as a Christian Democratic Party candidate. He was the editor of Pracownik Polski and Rzeczpospolita. In 1922 Kaczyński was appointed papal chamberlain and was honored with the Pro Ecclesia et Pontifice award. In 1923 he visited Polish parishes in the United States. In 1928 he withdrew from active political life and assumed the post of director of the Catholic Press Agency. He often criticized the Socialist left and Communist infiltration into the Polish Teachers' Union (ZNP). In Christian Democratic circles, he represented a faction that was critical of the sanacja regime. In 1937 he was one of the organizers of the Front Morges, and he supported the union of Christian Democratic parties within the Labor Party (Stronictwo Pracy [SP]).

After the German invasion of Poland in September 1939, Kaczyński made his way to France via Hungary. In France he worked in the administration of the Polish government-in-exile. He also represented the SP in the National Council of the Republic of Poland, an advisory organ to the president and the government. In 1942 he accompanied Prime Minister Władysław Sikorski during his visit to the United States. After Sikorski's death, Kaczyński assumed the post of minister of religious affairs and public education in the government of Stanisław Mikołajczyk. In November 1944 he resigned, but he continued to support Mikołajczyk in his efforts to reach a compromise with the USSR. When the Provisional Government of National Unity was established in June 1945, Kaczyński decided to return to Poland, and, along with Karol Popiel, he started to revive the SP in Poland. However, the Communists quickly got control of this party. In October 1945 Kaczyński became the priest of All Saints Parish in Warsaw and was one of the co-founders of Tygodnik Warszawski, a weekly that drew on the social teachings of the Church and opposed communism. However, this weekly was abolished, and in April 1949 Kaczyński was arrested and sentenced to ten years' imprisonment for "anti-state activities." He died in Mokotów Prison in Warsaw. (WR) Sources: PSB, vol. 11; Józef Haller, Pamiętniki (London, 1964); Nauka Polska na Obczyźnie, 1955, no. 1; Karol Popiel, Na mogiłach przyjaciel (London, 1966).

KÁDÁR János [originally Csermanek] (26 October 1912, Fiume [Rijeka]–6 July 1989, Budapest), Hungarian Communist leader. Kádár was the son of a maidservant who, forced by circumstances of poverty, gave him up temporarily to foster parents in Kapoly, Somogy County. In 1918 he went to live in Budapest. After graduating from a vocational school, Kádár became an apprentice to a mechanic and repaired typewriters. At the age of seventeen he joined a group of trade union youth activists in the district of Vasas. In 1931, under the pseudonym of János Barna, Kádár joined the illegal Communist Union of Young Workers (CUYW) and the Communist Party. The same year he was arrested but was released for lack of evidence. From the spring of 1932 he was a member of the North District Committee of the CUYW, and a year later he was secretary of its Central Committee (CC). In 1933 he was again arrested and sentenced to two years of prison; there he met many Communists, among others Mátyás Rákosi. At the end of 1933, because of his “cowardly” behavior at the police station when he was arrested, Kádár was expelled from the CUYW. After being released from prison, he worked as a part-time laborer; then at the party’s command, he joined the Social Democrats, becoming head of their youth structure in 1940.

In the spring of 1941 Kádár joined the Budapest Committee of the Hungarian Communist Party (HCP). From May 1942 he was a member of the CC; from December of the same year he was secretary of the CC, and from February 1943, its executive secretary. At that time he was given a new organizational pseudonym, János Kádár. After the reform of the Communist International in 1943, the illegal secretariat headed by Kádár decided to dissolve the party. In June 1943 he co-organized the Peace Party, a cover for the Communist Party. In April 1944 he was sent to Yugoslavia to establish contacts with the Hungarian Communist activists there. Arrested at the border by the Hungarian authorities but unrecognized, he was accused of desertion from the Hungarian Army and received a two-year prison sentence.

In November 1944 Kádár escaped from prison and returned to Budapest. In January 1945 his post of secretary general was taken over by Ernő Gerő, who gave Kádár a party reprimand for the dissolution of the Communist Party. In April 1945 Kádár was elected secretary of the CC of the HCP, secretary of the Budapest Committee of the party, and head of the cadres department of the CC. In May of the same year he joined the then created Politburo. From 1946 Kádár was deputy secretary general of the HCP and later of the Hungarian Workers’ Party (HWP). In 1948–50 he was minister of the interior. Despite his close relations with László Rajk, in 1949 Kádár played an important role in preparing and conducting Rajk’s trial. He was also responsible for the sentences that were pronounced in other show trials—for example, against Cardinal Jozsef Mindszenty, the Social Democrats, and high-ranking military and economic activists. From May 1950 he was head of the Department of Party and Mass Organizations of the CC, and in June of the same year he was resigned from the post of minister.

In the spring of 1951 Kádár was arrested by the Office of State Protection (Államvédelmi Hatóság [ÁVH]), and at the May meeting of the CC of the HWP, he was fired from all his party posts. In December 1952 the Supreme Court sentenced him to life imprisonment. Released and rehabilitated in July 1954, he became secretary of the party’s committee in the Thirteenth District of Budapest, and from September 1955 he was first secretary of the HWP organization in Pest County. At the plenum of the CC of the HWP in July 1956, at which Gerő was appointed first secretary of the party in place of Rákosi, Kádár was again elected a member of the CC and the Politburo and also deputy secretary of the CC.

On 25 October 1956, during the revolution, Kádár was elected, in place of Gerő, to the post of first secretary of the CC of the HWP. At a meeting of the CC on 26 October he became a member of the Directorate formed in place of the Politburo, and two days later he became president of the Presidium of the HWP, which was in deep crisis. On 30 October he was appointed minister without portfolio in the government of Imre Nagy, and the next day he joined the executive committee preparing the founding congress of the party, under the new name of the Hungarian Socialist Workers’ Party (Magyar Szocialista Munkáspárt [HSWP]). On 1 November, in a radio speech, Kádár talked about the “praiseworthy people’s uprising, which overthrew the rule of Rákosi” and announced that the newly created HSWP, of which he became chairman, would, above all, defend the sovereignty and national honor of Hungary. At the time his speech was broadcast, Kádár was already outside the country. Along with Ferenc Münnich he secretly went to Moscow. Between 2 and 4 November Kádár took part in meetings of the Presidium of the CC of the CPSU, at which the Soviet leadership appointed him head of the new puppet government created in Moscow. On 3 November Kádár was appointed minister without portfolio in the transformed Hungarian coalition government of Nagy since no one in Budapest knew where he was or what he was doing. On 4 November Kádár informed Hungarians in a radio announcement that the “Hungarian Revolutionary Government of Workers and Peasants” had been formed. He justified the creation of this government by saying that it was necessary to put an end to the “rowdy excesses of counterrevolutionaries.” On 7 November Soviet troops escorted Kádár to Budapest, and the president of the Presidential Council, István Dobi, officially appointed him president of the Council of Ministers.

From February 1957 Kádár was a member of the Politburo and first secretary of the CC of the HSWP, and between 1985 and 1989 he was general secretary of the party. He concentrated all the power in his hands. Thus he was primarily responsible for conducting the persecutions that followed the suppression of the revolution—for example, the execution of Imre Nagy and his associates. On 28 January 1958 he resigned as prime minister, but from 13 September 1961 to 30 June 1965 he again held the premiership. His name is associated with a period referred to as “goulash communism” (1965–85), during which Kádár bought the peace and passivity of society at the price of a pro-consumer economic policy. As a result of the country’s huge debt, Kádár’s Hungary appeared to be the second “happiest barrack” in the Communist camp, trailing only the Polish People’s Republic. Despite this, at turning points, Kádár did not hesitate to support the orthodox line of the Kremlin. For example, in 1968 he sent Hungarian troops to Czechoslovakia.

In the autumn of 1986, during Kádár’s visit to Moscow, Mikhail Gorbachev gave him to understand that he expected reforms or a resignation from him, but Kádár objected. At a state party conference that was convened in May 1988 because of a deepening political-economic crisis in the country and Kádár’s resistance to reforms, a new post was created for him: president of the HSWP. However, he was removed from the Politburo. The actual leadership was taken over by the new general secretary of the party, Károly Grósz. At a meeting of the CC of the HSWP in April 1989 Kádár was removed from the party presidency and from the CC on account of his ill health. In his last public speech, showing a sense of guilt and seeking to justify himself at the same time, Kádár, in a vague way, awkwardly attempted to account for his past. The end of his life coincided with the collapse of the system that he had headed. Kádár died on the day that the Supreme Court posthumously rehabilitated Imre Nagy and his associates, clearing them of false charges. In 1989 Kádár’s memoirs were published titled Végakarát (The testament). (JT)

Sources: A magyar forradalom és szabadságharc enciklopédiája, CD-ROM (Budapest, 1999); Nagy Képes Milleniumi Arcképcsarnok (Budapest, 1999); Magyar Nagylexikon, vol. 10 (Budapest, 2000); William Showcross, Crime and Compromise: Janos Kadar and the Politics of Hungary since the Revolution (New York, 1974); Bennet Kovrig, Communism in Hungary from Kun to Kádár (Stanford, 1979); Miklós Molnár, From Béla Kun to János Kádár: Seventy Years of Hungarian Communism (New York, 1990).

KADARE Ismail (28 January 1936, Gjirokaster), Albanian writer. In the late 1950s Kadare studied at the University of Tirana and then at the Maksim Gorky Literary Institute in Moscow. He returned to Albania in 1960, when Albanian-Soviet relations had dramatically worsened. After publishing a few volumes of poetry, in 1961 he was accepted into the Albanian Union of Writers. His earliest collections include Ëndërrimet (Dreams; 1957); Shekulli im (My century; 1961); and the most valued, Përse mendohen këto male (What do these mountains think about? 1964). Kadare won international recognition with his novels, several of which were translated into English, such as Gjenerali i ushtrisë së vdekur (1964; General of the Dead Army, 1971); Dasma (1968; Wedding, 1968), in which he showed the emancipation of women in postwar Albania; and Kështjella (1970; The Castle, 1980), about the Albanian national movement in the times of Skander bey. In his Autobiografi e popullit në vargje (1971; Autobiography of People in Verse, 1987) Kadare turned to folk poetry and legends. Political purges among intellectuals made him write the “politically correct” novels Nëntori i një kryeqyteti (November in the capital; 1973) and Dimri i madh (Great winter; 1977) about Albania’s breakaway from the Soviet bloc and Enver Hoxha’s role in this process.

From the 1970s Kadare dominated Albanian literature. Many of his novels and short stories, such as Gjakftohësia (Blood for blood; 1980); Koha e shkrimeve (The age of writing; 1986); and especially Nëpunësi I pallati të ëndrrave (1981; Palace of Dreams, 1993), referred to Albanian history under Turkish rule. His historical novel, Ura mi tri harqe (1978; Three-Arched Bridge, 1993), reaching back to the mythical beginnings of Albanian history, was enthusiastically welcomed by critics. In 1988 he published the monumental volume Koncert në fund të dimrit (Concert, 1994), situated at the time when Albania broke off relations with China (1978). Kadare hardly fit into the Communist cultural patterns, but he was officially tolerated because of his international renown. He even had some access to the inner circles of power. In 1990, he received permission to leave for medical treatment in France, where he gave a number of interviews, appealing for Western aid to the Albanian nation striving toward democratization. In 1997 Kadare published his collective works in Albanian and French. In 1995 he published Albanian Spring: The Anatomy of Tyranny. Kadare’s works stimulate reflection on the political involvement of the individual and show the threats to which a man is exposed when facing tyranny, officially sanctioned crime, and political taboos. (WD)

Sources: Wielka encyklopedia PWN, vol. 13 (Warsaw, 2003); Raymond Hutchings, Historical Dictionary of Albania (Lanham, Md., 1996); Tefik Çaušhi, Universi letrar i Kadarese (N.p., 1993); Fabien Terpan, Ismail Kadare (Paris, 1992); Robert Elsie, "Modern Albanian Literature," in Franz-Lothar Altmann, ed., Albanien in Umbruch (Munich, 1990); www.britannica.com/bcom/eb/article/0/0/.

KAFKA Franz (3 July 1883, Prague–3 June 1923, Kierling, near Vienna), German-language writer of Jewish origin who was linked with Prague. Brought up in the Jewish community in Prague, Kafka studied law at Prague's German university. Initially loosely associated with Jewish traditions, he later became interested in Zionism and Hasidism. Kafka's tyrannical father, as well as his proneness to migraines and sleeplessness, had an overwhelming influence on his psyche. Moreover, at the end of World War I, Kafka was a witness to the growing wave of anti-Semitism. In 1917 he contracted tuberculosis and spent the rest of his life in sanatoriums in Austria. Kafka never married, but two women played an important roles in his life: Milena Jesenska, a journalist, and Dora Dymant, a Polish Jewess who took care of him at the end of his life. During his lifetime Kafka published only a few works, including Das Urteil (The judgment; 1916); Die Verwandlung (Metamorphosis; 1916); and In der Strafkolonie (In the penal colony; 1919). Kafka left most of his works with Max Brod, his friend and future biographer. When he was dying, Kafka asked Brod to destroy his works. Brod disregarded his instructions and published them in order: Der Prozess (The trial; 1925), Das Schloss (The castle; 1926), and Amerika (America; 1927). Brod also published Kafka's collected works as The Diaries 1910–1923, Letters to Milena, and Letters to Felice.

Soon after his death, Kafka became famous throughout the world, and literary critics recognized him as one of the most outstanding and original writers of the twentieth century. His writing is not easy to interpret. His characters are embroiled in tragic quests for identity and in hopeless attempts to understand their dependence on the omnipresent hierarchical structure of power. For example, the protagonist of The Trial, Joseph K., fails to understand what he has been accused of; nor does he perceive the true nature of the court that tries him. Some interpreters see in Kafka's works a psychological reflection of his life situation, while others consider the alienation of his characters a symbolic representation of modern anti-Semitism or the fate of man in a world without religion. Kafka's visions anticipated twentieth-century totalitarianism, which placed millions of people in "Kafkaesque" situations, in an absurd and at the same time tragic enslavement by anonymous institutions and irrational ideologies. The nations of the Soviet bloc, which were not only ruled by totalitarian Communist parties, but were also deprived of sovereignty and still forced to describe their positions in terms of freedom and independence, constitute a particular example of such entanglements. Therefore, in countries like Communist Czechoslovakia, the publication of Kafka's works was prohibited for many years. The most complete edition of his works was published in Frankfurt am Main as Gesam-meltwerke (9 vols., 1951–58). (WR)

Sources: Encyclopedia Judaica, vol. 10 (Jerusalem, 1971); Max Brod, Franz Kafka als Weg weisende Gestalt (St. Gallen, 1951); Max Brod, Franz Kafka: A Biography (New York, 1960); Roman Karst, Drogi samotności: Rzecz o Franzu Kafce (Warsaw, 1960); Charles Osborne, Kafka (Edinburgh, 1967); Erich Heller, Kafka (London, 1974); Ronald Hayman, Kafka: A Biography of Kafka (London, 1981); Peter U. Beicken, Franz Kafka: Leben und Werk (Stuttgart, 1986); Thomas Anz, Franz Kafka (Munich, 1989); František Kautman, Franz Kafka (Prague, 1992); Jeremy Adler, Franz Kafka (Woodstock, N.Y., 2002).

KAGANOVICH Lazar (22 November 1893, Kabany, near Kiev–25 July 1991, Moscow), Soviet Communist activist, executor of Stalin's policies in the Ukraine. Born into a poor Jewish family, Kaganovich left school early to begin an apprenticeship as a shoemaker. In 1911 he joined the Bolshevik party. After the outbreak of the revolution, he was elected a delegate to the Third All-Russian Congress of Soviets (December 1917). He owed his rise to the top of the government to Stalin, who, after becoming secretary general of the Central Committee (CC) of the Russian Communist Party (Bolsheviks) (RCP[B]) in 1921, entrusted Kaganovich with personnel policy in the CC. Kaganovich's loyalty to Stalin, shaped at that time, never wavered. Stalin used him in his policy toward the Ukraine mainly because Kaganovich was one of the few party leaders who spoke fluent Ukrainian. The aim of Kaganovich's first mission to the Ukraine was to accelerate the Ukrainization process. Such a line was considered urgent in Moscow because of the rapid revival of Ukrainian culture that had been instigated by the non-Bolshevik intelligentsia, whose outstanding representatives (among them Mykhailo Hrushevsky) had returned from exile. In April 1925 Kaganovich became the first secretary of the CC of the Communist Party (Bolshevik) of the Ukraine (CP[B]U) and accelerated the Ukrainization process, though under the party's control, in the administration, the army, and the trade union movement.

In the spring of 1926 the Ukrainization process began to slow down. Stalin decided to decelerate it in order to gain support among the Russians in the Ukraine who did not want to be forced to learn a "peasant" language and might have turned to the Trotskyist opposition. This was in keeping with Stalin's previous decisions since the removal the year before of Emmanuel Kviring, Kaganovich's predecessor as head of the CP(B)U, had also been motivated by the need to fight Trotsky's influence. Kviring, an ethnic German, was known as a supporter of Russian dominance over Ukrainian culture and a representative of the eastern, Russian-speaking part of the Ukraine. Kaganovich accused Olexander Shumsky, commissar of education and a supporter of intensive Ukrainization, of nationalist deviation in the CP(B)U and then removed him from office. This case was also affected by a personal conflict, as Shumsky had previously put pressure on Stalin to oust Kaganovich from the party leadership. Subsequently Kaganovich conducted a purge of the leadership of the Communist Party of Western Ukraine, the majority of which supported Shumsky. Under Kaganovich's rule in the Ukraine, a campaign of accusations was launched against the writer Mykola Khvylovy. Kaganovich was ordered back from the Ukraine in 1928, after fulfilling all his tasks. The local Bolsheviks again assumed leadership positions. Stalin once more needed the support of Ukrainian activists, this time against the Bukharinist opposition among leaders of the All-Union Communist Party (Bolsheviks). Kaganovich returned to Moscow and was reinstated as a member of the Secretariat of the CC.

In the first half of the 1930s Kaganovich performed many important tasks, including that of supervising the collectivization of agriculture in the Ukraine. The Ukraine failed to produce enough grain to fulfill an overestimated plan of grain supplies, and mass famine began in the autumn of 1932. At that point Kaganovich, along with Vyacheslav Molotov, headed a special committee that, by a ruthless confiscation of grain, virtually deprived the country of food and increased the extent of the catastrophe. Thus, both Kaganovich and Molotov were responsible for the starvation of millions of Ukrainians. Later, Kaganovich was in charge of the great reconstruction of Moscow (including the construction of the first subway), as well as the administration of the industrial and raw material departments. He was also one of the chief executors of the "Great Purge" in the Ukraine at the end of the 1930s.

In the late 1940s, when the Ukraine was exhausted by war and failed to fulfill the grain quota in 1946, Kaganovich was again appointed first secretary of the CC of the CP(B)U (March–December 1947), and his actions brought results comparable to those of the 1930s. Later, as an anti-Semitic campaign grew during the last years of Stalin's rule, Kaganovich's position within the Politburo clearly weakened. After Stalin's death, especially after the Twentieth CPSU Congress, his position was endangered by de-Stalinization. In June 1957, together with other

Stalinists, such as Molotov and Georgy Malenkov, Kaganovich attempted to depose Nikita Khrushchev, secretary general of the CPSU CC. The attempt failed, and the group members (labeled as "anti-party") were ousted from the Politburo and from the CC. In 1961 Kaganovich retired, and his name disappeared from encyclopedias of Soviet history for a long time. The year 1996 saw the publication of his Pamiatnye zapiski rabocheho kommunisto-bolsheviko, profsoiuznogo, partiinogo i sovetko-gosudarstvennogo rabotnika (Notes by a Communist-Bolshevik activist and trade union, party, and Soviet government worker). (TS)

Sources: MERSH, vol. 16; Roy Medvedev, Ludzie Stalina (Warsaw, 1989); Encyclopedia of Ukraine, vol. 2 (Toronto, 1988); Jeanne Vronskaya and Vladimir Chuguev, The Biographical Dictionary of the Former Soviet Union: Prominent People in All Fields from 1917 to the Present (London, 1992); Archie Brown, Michael Koser, and Gerald Smith, eds., The Cambridge Encyclopedia of Russia and the Former Soviet Union (Cambridge and New York, 1994).

KAIRYS Steponas (20 December 1878, Užnevėžiai, near Ukmergė–16 December 1964, New York), Lithuanian Socialist politician. While a student at a gymnasium in Šiauliai, Kairys protested that Catholic students were being forced to take part in Orthodox services, and because of this, he was expelled from school in 1897. After passing his high school final exams, he studied at the Technological Institute in St. Petersburg, where he was twice suspended for taking part in political demonstrations. In 1900 he joined the Lithuanian Social Democratic Party (LSDP) and favored the independence of this party from the Russian Social Democratic Party. The following year he became a member of the Central Committee (CC) of the LSDP. During the sessions of the Grand Lithuanian Assembly in 1905, he was elected a member of its five-member presidium. Elected to the Russian State Duma from the lists of the Lithuanian Social Democrats in 1907, Kairys served as secretary of the seven-member parliamentary representation of the LSDP. At that time he was in favor of the federation of an independent Lithuania with Poland, Belarus, and Latvia. In 1908–11 he worked on the construction of railway bridges in the region of Samara and Kursk. He subsequently worked in the Vilnius (Wilno) sewage department. As a representative of the LSDP, he attended congresses of the Russian Social Democrats in London and congresses of the Polish Social Democrats in Kraków.

After the Germans occupied Vilnius in 1915, Kairys became more involved in the cause of Lithuanian independence. When on 18 September 1917 the Germans agreed to the establishment of the Lithuanian Council (Lietuvos Tarybe), he became its vice-president. In protest against the conciliatory attitude of the majority of this council, he resigned at the end of January 1918, but he joined it again after its members agreed to abandon all constraints regarding the sovereignty of a future Lithuanian state. On 16 February 1918 Kairys was one of the signatories of the Lithuanian independence declaration. He again withdrew from the Lithuanian Council (which in July of that year changed its name to State Council) when, under German pressure, its members accepted Wilhelm von Urach, Duke of Württemberg, as the future king of Lithuania. After Lithuania regained its independence, Kairys worked in the Ministry of Industry and Trade. Between April and October 1919 he was minister of supplies. From 1923 to 1938 he headed the Kaunas sewage department and served as consultant for sewage projects in other Lithuanian cities. In 1920 he became an MP as a representative of the LSDP. Elected again in 1923 and in 1926, he served as president of the party and of its parliamentary representation. After the elections of May 1926, Kairys became deputy speaker of the parliament. Following the nationalist coup d'état of December 1926, he joined the opposition, but in 1936–37 he repeatedly rejected Communist offers to establish a common people's front. In 1923 he began lecturing at Kaunas University, where he received a professorship in 1939. In 1939 he published Miestu kanalizacija (The city sewage system).

During the first Soviet occupation (1940–41), Kairys avoided deportation. Between 1941 and 1943 he was the dean of the Engineering Department of Kaunas University. From the end of 1943, he served as president of the Supreme Committee for the Liberation of Lithuania (Vyriausias Lietuvos Islaisvinimo Komitetas [VLIK]), which called for a struggle against the USSR and against communism. In April 1944 most VLIK leaders were arrested by the Gestapo. Kairys tried to leave for Sweden under the name Juozas Kaminskas, but he was arrested by the Germans and imprisoned in Libau (Liepāja). Unrecognized and released during the evacuation of the town, he left for Germany before the Red Army entered Lithuania. In Germany, he revived the activities of the VLIK and took the leadership of the Social Democratic Party in exile. In 1952 he went to the United States, where he was less active owing to ill health. In 1957 he published his famous memoirs, Lietuva budo (Lithuania was awakening), and in 1964, its second volume, Tau, Lietuva (For you, Lithuania). (WR)

Sources: EL, vol. 3; L. Sabaliūnas, "Social Democracy in Tsarist Lithuania," Slavic Review, 1972, no. 2; Jerzy Ochmański, Historia Litwy (Wrocław, 1967); Constantine R. Jurgela, Lithuania: The Outpost of Freedom (St. Petersburg, Fla., 1976); Vladas Krivickas, "The Programs of the Lithuanian Social Democratic Party 1896–1931,"

Journal of Baltic Studies, 1980, no. 2; Alfonsas Eidintas and Vytautas Žalys, Lithuania in European Politics: The Years of the First Republic, 1918–1940 (New York, 1997).

KAJKA Michał (27 September 1858, Skomack Wielki, near Ełk–5 September 1940, Orzysz), Polish poet and Masurian activist. Born into a peasant family, Kajka completed a few grades of a rural elementary school in the village of Rostki and continued his learning through self-education. He started to work at fourteen, often as a farmhand. In 1875 he also took up carpentry and brick-laying. At seventeen he began writing poems. From 1883 on he lived permanently in the village of Ogródek, near Ełk. In 1884 he began publishing in the Masurian press (for example, in Mazur, Nowiny Śląskie, Gazeta Ludowa, Gazeta Olsztyńska, Mazurski Przyjaciel Ludu, Życie Młodzieży, and Kalendarz dla Mazurów). He was very active in Masurian social-political and cultural life. In 1890 in Ogródek, he founded a secret library of the Society of Peasant Libraries, and in 1896 he was a co-founder of the Masurian Peasant Party in Ełk. For defending Polish national identity in Masuria, Kajka incurred persecution by the German authorities. In 1920, during a plebiscite in Warmia and Masuria, he was a champion of Polish interests. He co-organized the Masurian Union, and in 1923 he became its president. He took part in the work of the Union of Poles in Eastern Prussia, the Union of Polish School Societies, and the Masurian Mutual Aid Association. He attended congresses of Polish organizations and associations. He wrote a great deal about injustices to peasants and discrimination against the Poles in Masuria. Kajka withdrew from active social work in 1933 because of his advanced age and because of an increasingly difficult political situation in Masuria after the Nazi takeover of power, but he continued to write. His writing, influenced by religious books, classics of Polish literature, and the tradition of peasant writing, praised the beauty of nature and referred to current issues. He was also the author of many religious songs. Kajka is regarded as the most outstanding Masurian peasant poet. Various efforts were made to perpetuate his memory—for instance, in 1946 the village of Buchwald in Ostróda County was renamed Kajkowo. The following collections of Kajka's poems were published: Pieśni mazurskie (Masurian songs; 1927); Wybór wierszy (Selection of poems; 1954); Zebrałem snop plonu (I have gathered a sheaf of crops; 1958); Wiersze wybrane (Selected poems; 1958); and Z duchowej mej niwy (From my spiritual soil; 1982). (JS)

Sources: PSB, vol. 11; Słownik biograficzny działaczy ruchu ludowego (Warsaw, 1989); Witold Piechocki, Michał Kajka (Warsaw, 1958); Melchior Wańkowicz, Na tropach smętki. (Warsaw, 1958); Władysław Chojnacki, Sylwetki mazurskie: Szkice z dziejów Pomorza (Warsaw, 1961); Jerzy Oleksiński, Bard ziemi mazurskiej (Warsaw, 1972); Janusz Jasiński, Michał Kajka, 1858–1940: Droga do Polski (Suwałki, 1990); Zbigniew Chojnowski, Michał Kajka: Poeta mazurski (Olsztyn, 1992).

KĄKOL Kazimierz (22 November 1920, Warsaw), Polish Communist activist. The son of a railway worker, during the German occupation (1939–45) Kąkol belonged to the pro-independence Home Army and worked in secret education organizations. He graduated from the University of Łódź, and in 1949 he received a Ph.D. in economics. From 1957 he was a member of the (Communist) Polish United Workers' Party (PUWP), gradually advancing in its hierarchy. From December 1971 to February 1980 he was a deputy member of the PUWP Central Committee, and from February 1980 to July 1981 he belonged to the PUWP Central Control Commission. From 1957 he was editor-in-chief of the bi-weekly Prawo i Życie, and from 1968 he directed the School of Journalism at Warsaw University. From 1974 he was a professor, and in 1973–74, director of the Institute of Journalism of Warsaw University. Politically Kąkol was connected with Mieczysław Moczar. In 1968 he orchestrated an anti-Zionist campaign in which his Prawo i Życie played an important role. Kąkol was active in the propaganda campaign against the Prague Spring and for the Warsaw Pact intervention in Czechoslovakia, including the participation of Polish troops in this operation. From May 1974 to April 1980 he was minister/head of the Office for Religious Affairs (Urząd do Spraw Wyznań). The Communist authorities hoped Kąkol would improve their relationship with the Holy See behind the back of the Polish Episcopate and Primate Stefan Wyszyński after foreign minister Stefan Olszowski was received by Pope Paul VI on 12 November 1973. These hopes soon proved to be vain. In 1985–89 Kąkol headed the Main Commission of Investigation of Hitlerite Crimes in Poland, and in 1983–89 he belonged to the Socioeconomic Council of the parliament. (PK)

Sources: Popularna Encyklopedia Powszechna, vol. 9 (Kraków, 1996); Mołdawa; Andrzej Micewski, Współrzędzić czy nie klamać (Paris, 1978); Jerzy Eisler, Marzec 1968 (Warsaw, 1991).

KAKOWSKI Aleksander (5 February 1862, Dębiny, near Przasnysz–30 December 1938, Warsaw), Polish archbishop and cardinal. Kakowski successfully passed his high school final exams in Pułtusk and later graduated from a theological seminary in Warsaw. He studied at the Roman Catholic Theological Academy in St. Petersburg and then at the Gregorian University in Rome, where in 1885 he received a Ph.D. in canon law. On 30 May 1885 he took holy orders. In 1887 he began lecturing at a seminary in Warsaw, and later he was a secretary of the bishop's court. In 1901 he became a canon of the Warsaw chapter. Because of Kakowski's moderate political stance, the Holy See was able to get the Russian authorities to accept his nomination to the post of archbishop of Warsaw. On 22 June 1913 he was consecrated in St. Petersburg, and on 14 September he made a ceremonious entry into Warsaw Cathedral. Thereafter, he used the title of Primate of the Kingdom of Poland until the end of his life. After the Germans entered Warsaw in 1915, Kakowski forbade his subordinate priests to become involved in political activities, but when new Polish institutions began to be organized, he allowed the clergymen to participate in charity and mutual aid organizations. Kakowski was indirectly linked with the pro-Russian Inter-Party Political Circle, and he had reservations about the Act of 5 November 1916, which was issued by the emperors of Germany and Austria-Hungary. After the February 1917 revolution, on 16 April 1917 Kakowski issued a pastoral letter written in a spirit of cooperation with the German authorities. He was instrumental in the establishment of the People's Union (Zjednoczenie Ludowe [ZL]), which was a conservative Catholic party.

On 12 October 1917 Kakowski became a member of the Regency Council, a provisional Polish government in the former Kingdom of Poland. The Regency Council was subordinate to the Central Powers. In November 1918 Kakowski opposed the transfer of power to Józef Piłsudski, as he thought that the Regency Council should delegate the power to a parliament chosen through general elections. On 15 December 1919 Kakowski was appointed cardinal. He was a member of the Vatican Congregation of Sacraments, Propaganda of Faith, and Seminaries and Universities. In July 1920 he was the co-author of a pastoral letter calling for the defense of Poland against the Bolshevik invasion. He was instrumental in the signing of the concordat of 10 February 1925. An efficient organizer, Kakowski summoned an archdiocesan synod in 1922 and a synod of Polish bishops in 1936. He was a co-founder of Catholic Action and initiated the establishment of the diocese of Łódź. He was also a co-founder of the Theological Department at Warsaw University, and in 1937 he was a co-founder of the Institute of Higher Religious Culture in Warsaw. Kakowski left extensive memoirs, Z niewoli do niepodległości (From slavery to independence; 2000). (WR) Sources: PSB, vol. 11; Encyklopedia historii Drugiej Rzeczypospolitej (Warsaw, 1999); Ks. Stefan Wyszyński, "Kardynał Kakowski," Ateneum Kapłańskie, 1939, nos. 163–165; Władysław Pobóg-Malinowski, Najnowsza historia polityczna Polski, vol. 2 (London, 1983).

KALANTA Romas (1953–14 May 1972, Kaunas), Lithuanian student who set himself on fire. While attending an evening high school, Kalanta under pressure enrolled in the Komsomol. In protest against the violation of Lithuanian national and religious freedoms by the Kremlin, on Sunday, 14 May 1972, in the square in front of the theater in Kaunas, where in 1940 the People's Assembly had voted for the incorporation of Lithuania into the USSR, Kalanta doused himself with gasoline, set himself ablaze, and soon thereafter died of burns. This case became very famous throughout the capital. Fearing an outbreak of demonstrations, on 18 May the authorities ordered that his funeral be two hours earlier than planned. However, thousands of Lithuanians displayed their patriotic feelings, chanting "Freedom for Lithuania!" Two people were killed, and many were injured and arrested by consolidated KGB forces during the suppression of two-day demonstrations. The authorities attempted to prove that Kalanta had been unstable and had acted under the influence of drugs. Few people were convinced by such claims, especially since on 29 May another student set himself on fire in Varėna and on 3 June a similar act was committed by a worker from Kaunas. In October 1972 eight people were given sentences ranging from one to three years in prison for participating in the May demonstrations. The memory of Kalanta's tragic gesture to a considerable extent shaped the consciousness of the Lithuanian opposition. (WR) Sources: EL, vol. 3; Saulius Sužiedelis, Historical Dictionary of Lithuania (Lanham, Md., 1997); "Romas Kalanta," Kultura, 1972, nos. 7/8; Romuald J. Misiunas and Rein Taagepera, The Baltic States: Years of Dependence, 1940–1990 (Berkeley, 1993).

KALCHENKO Nikifor (9 February 1906, Koshmanivka, near Poltava–14 May 1989, Kiev), Soviet Communist activist in the Ukraine. The son of a peasant, from 1921 to 1924 Kalchenko studied at a horticultural school and in 1925–28 at the Agricultural Institute in Poltava. In 1932 he joined the Communist Party. An active implementer of the policy of collectivization in agriculture, in 1928–38 he worked as an agronomist, kolkhoz director, and head of department in the administration of the Kharkiv district. Between 1938 and 1941 he headed an executive committee of the district soviet of Workers' Deputies in Odessa. In 1938–40 he was a deputy member, and from 1940 to 1976 a member, of the Central Committee (CC) of the party in the Ukraine. From 1954 to 1976 he was a member of the Politburo of the CC of the Communist Party of Ukraine. From 1952 to 1956 and from 1966 to 1976 he was also a deputy member, and from 1956 to 1966 a member, of the CC of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union (CPSU). In 1941–46 Kalchenko belonged to the Military Council of the Red Army and to the Military Council of the First Ukrainian Front. He rose to the rank of lieutenant general. In 1946 he became minister of technology, in 1947 minister of state farms (sovkhozy), and in 1950–52 minister of agriculture of the Ukrainian SSR. In 1952–54 he was first vice-president of the Council of Ministers of the Ukrainian SSR; from 1954 to 1961 he was head of the government of the Soviet Ukraine, and in 1961–76 he was deputy prime minister of the Ukrainian SSR. For many years Kalchenko also served as deputy to the Supreme Soviet of the Ukrainian SSR and deputy to the Supreme Soviet of the USSR. The peak of his career coincided with the rule of Nikita Khrushchev. Along with Oleksy Kyrychenko, Kalchenko took part in the Ukrainization of the cadres of the Ukrainian SSR following the Twentieth Congress of the CPSU. Like Kyrychenko, however, in 1961 Kalchenko fell victim to Khrushchev's reshuffling of the party and government leadership. (TS)

Sources: Ukrains'ka Radians'ka Entsyklopediia, vol. 6 (Kiev, 1961); Borys Levytsky, Politics and Society in Soviet Ukraine, 1953–1980 (Edmonton, 1984).

KALECKI Michał (22 June 1899, Łódź–27 April 1970, Warsaw), Polish economist. The son of a small merchant of Jewish origin, after graduating from a gymnasium in Łódź, Kalecki studied at Warsaw Technical University. He interrupted his studies when he was drafted into the army in June 1919. After returning from the front in the Polish-Bolshevik war, Kalecki continued his studies at the Technical University in Gdańsk, where he received a half-diploma (i.e., he completed two years of studies) in 1923. Between 1923 and 1929 he did odd jobs and subsequently worked at the Institute for Economic Research. In the periodicals he edited, including Prace and Koniunktura Gospodarcza, he published a number of important studies on price, income, and consumption indexes, as well as indexes of "investment movements." Along with Ludwik Landau, Kalecki also published pioneering works on social income in Poland between 1929 and 1933. In October 1933, at a conference in Holland, he read the paper "Macro-Dynamic Theory of Business Cycles," which included elements of the theory of saving, investment, and employment. At that time he also published Essays in the Theory of Economic Fluctuations in London. Kalecki contributed to Przegląd Gospodarczy and Polska Gospodarcza, where in 1935 he published the article "Istota poprawy koniunkturalnej" (The essence of cyclical economic upswings), which later came to be cited as the introduction to the modern theory of employment. In the same year Kalecki published Próba teorii koniunktury (An attempt at a theory of business cycles), which was considered a pioneering contribution to the theory of the cycle. This study was later compared to contemporary works by John Maynard Keynes. In 1936 Kalecki received a stipend from the Rockefeller Foundation that enabled him to continue his research in Sweden and England, where he studied Keynes's theory. Keynes was unenthusiastic about Kalecki's works, yet he helped him find employment in Cambridge. In 1937 Kalecki published A Theory of Business Cycles.

During World War II, Kalecki conducted research at Oxford on the war economy. After a short stay in Poland in 1946, in the following eight years he worked in the economic department of the Secretariat of the United Nations. In 1954 he returned to Poland and worked as a state planner. In 1955 and 1956 he served as an adviser to Deputy Prime Minister Hilary Minc. After October 1956 Kalecki was appointed a professor and vice-president of the government Economic Council. From 1957 to 1964 he worked in the Planning Commission. At that time he drafted a prospective plan for 1961–75, but this plan was not implemented. From 1957 to 1961 Kalecki was an economic adviser to the governments of Israel, India, and Cuba. In 1961 he began lecturing at the Central School of Planning and Statistics (Szkoła Główna Planowania i Statystyki [SGPiS]), and in 1966 he became a full member of the Polish Academy of Sciences. Kalecki believed that economic development was determined by technological progress. He created a theory of the planned economy that was presented in Zarys teorii wzrostu gospodarki socjalistycznej (An outline of the theory of growth in a Socialist economy; 1963). During the "March events" of 1968, on the wave of an anti-Semitic campaign, Kalecki was attacked by party zealots in the SGPiS and was relegated to a minor post; therefore, he gave up work at this school. In 1969 he worked as a lecturer in Cambridge. He died soon after returning to Poland. Six volumes of his Dzieła (Works) were published in 1979–87, and an eight-volume edition, Collected Works of Michael Kalecki, edited by Jerzy Osiatyński, was published between 1990 and 1997. (WR)

Sources: The International Who Is Who 1963–1964 (London, 1963); George R. Feiwel The Intellectual Capital of Michal Kalecki (Knoxville, Tenn., 1975); Malcolm C. Sawyer, The Economics of Michal Kalecki (Armonk, N.Y., 1985); Krzysztof Leowski, "Michal Kalecki," Poczet wybitnych profesorów SGH-SGPiS (Warsaw, 1986); Jerzy Osiatyński, Michal Kalecki on a Socialist Economy (New York, 1988); Mario Sebastiani, Kalecki's Relevance Today (New York, 1989); Mark Blang, ed., Michal Kalecki (1899–1970) (Aldershot, 1992).

KALFOV Khristo (16 October 1883, Kalofer–1 February 1945, Sofia), Bulgarian politician. After graduating from the Military Academy in Sofia (1903) and the Military Academy in Turin (1907–11), Kalfov returned to Bulgaria and served in an artillery regiment (1911–12). He participated in the Balkan Wars (1921–13) as an officer for special tasks to the commander-in-chief. He later served in the bodyguard of Tsar Ferdinand I. From 1914 to 1917 he was the martial arts instructor of Prince Boris, and when Boris became king, Kalfov became his aide-de-camp (1918–22). After resigning from service at the tsar's court and retiring from the army with the rank of colonel in September 1922, Kalfov was one of the organizers of the coup of 9 June 1923. During the premiership of Aleksandur Tsankov, between June 1923 and January 1926 Kalfov served as minister of foreign and religious affairs and was responsible for various tasks, including the drafting of a treaty of friendship with Turkey (1925) and a protocol with Greece on respecting the rights of minorities. He was a Bulgarian representative at two sessions of the Council of the League of Nations in Geneva. In 1923–26 Kalfov served as secretary of the Democratic Alliance, and after the split within this party in 1932, he joined the National Social Movement (NSM) of Tsankov, becoming a member of the central leadership of the NSM. In 1934 he left the NSM and supported the regime of Tsar Boris III. In 1936 Kalfov made an unsuccessful attempt at establishing a Fascist state social party. He was a deputy to the National Assembly from 1927 to 1934 and from 1940 to 1944 and served as its speaker during the second term. After 9 September 1944 Kalfov was arrested and sentenced by the so-called people's court to death and confiscation of property for his activities in parliament between 1940 and 1944. The sentence was carried out immediately. Kalfov was rehabilitated by a decision of the Supreme Court in April 1996. (JJ)

Sources: Entsiklopediya: Bylgariya, vol. 3 (Sofia, 1982); Sbornik na obiknoveno narodno sybranie (Sofia, 1940); Tasho Tashev, Ministrite na Bylgariya 1879–1999: Entsiklopedichen spravochnik (Sofia, 1999); Angel Tsurakov, Entsiklopediya Pravitelstvata na Bylgariya: Khronologiia na politicheskiia zhivot 1879–2001 (Sofia, 2001).

KÁLLAI Gyula (1 June 1910, Berettyóújfalu–12 March 1996, Budapest), Hungarian Communist activist. The son of a shoemaker, Kállai graduated from high school in 1930, and then he studied at the universities in Budapest and Debrecen. He joined the Hungarian Communist Party (HCP) in 1931 and was one of the organizers of the March Front, for which he was expelled from the university in 1937. He then started working as a journalist in Debrecen. Between 1939 and 1944 he worked for the Social Democratic daily newspaper Népszava. He co-organized a demonstration on 15 March 1942 at which people protested Hungary's participation in the war. Arrested in July 1942, Kállai was released in November for lack of evidence. In September 1944 he took part in the founding meeting of the Central Committee (CC) of the illegal Communist Party. As a representative of the party, he participated in the work of the Executive Committee of the Hungarian National Independence Front.

In 1945 Kállai became a member of the CC of the HCP and then of the Hungarian Workers' Party, as well as head of the Propaganda Department of the CC. From July 1945 he was political secretary of state to the Presidium of the Council of Ministers, and between November 1945 and May 1946 he was political secretary of state for information. In 1946–49 Kállai headed the party's Press Department, then the Department for Intellectuals, and finally the Department for Cultural Policy. Between 1948 and 1949 he was head of the Office of the President of the Republic of Hungary. In June 1949 he was appointed minister of foreign affairs. In April 1951 he was arrested on false charges, dismissed from all his posts, and sentenced to life imprisonment in a secret trial. Released in July 1954, he became head of the publishing section at the Ministry of People's Education. Between February 1955 and the end of October 1956 he was deputy minister of people's education. In July 1956 he was again elected a member of the CC, becoming head of the Science and Culture Department of the CC.

At the CC Plenum on 24 October 1956 Kállai was elected a member of the Politburo and secretary of the CC. During the revolution he remained in hiding in the flat of one of his friends. Between 1956 and 1989 he was a member of the CC and of the Politburo of the Hungarian Socialist Workers' Party (HSWP). From February 1957 he held the post of secretary of the CC, and until 1975 he was head of the Science and Culture Department of the CC of the HSWP. At a meeting of the HSWP in January 1957 Kállai gave an account of talks that had been conducted by the Imre Nagy group in Romania, and he suggested taking the group to court. From May 1957 Kállai was minister of culture. In 1957, in his book A magyarországi ellenforradalom a marxizmus-leninizmus fényében (Counterrevolution in Hungary in the light of Marxism-Leninism), Kállai presented a "scientific" evaluation of the revolution. In 1958–89 he was president of the State Council of the Patriotic People's Front. Between 1960 and 1965 he was first deputy premier and deputy premier. From 30 June 1965 to 14 April 1967 he held the post of premier, and between 1967 and 1971 he was president of the parliament. From 1967 he was a member of the Presidential Council of the Hungarian People's Republic. In 1945–51 and 1958–90 he was an MP. Kállai's memoirs, Megkésett börtönnapló (Late journal from prison), appeared in 1987. (JT)

Sources: Bennet Kovrig, Communism in Hungary from Kun to Kádár (Stanford, 1979); Miklós Molnár, From Béla Kun to János Kádár: Seventy Years of Hungarian Communism (New York, 1990); Magyar Nagylexikon, vol. 10 (Budapest, 2000); A magyar forradalom és szabadságharc enciklopédiája, CD-ROM (Budapest, 1999).

KALLAS Siim (2 October 1948, Tallinn), Estonian politician. After graduating in banking and finance from the University of Tartu, Kallas worked in the Ministry of Finance of the Estonian SSR, and in 1979–86 he was director of the Central Administration of Savings Banks. In 1987–89 he was deputy editor-in-chief of the party newspaper, Rahva Hääl. Kallas became popular when he published, with Edgar Savisaar, a program of economic reforms that included the autonomy of the Estonian economy, the introduction of a national currency and budget, and the development of trade based on a market economy. Despite the negative reaction of the Communist authorities, the wide social support for the program became an inspiration for the "Principles of an Independent Estonian Economy," adopted in 1989. In 1989–91 Kallas was chairman of the Central Council of Trade Unions and deputy to the Supreme Council of the Estonian SSR. After Estonia regained independence in 1991, Kallas took a decisive turn to the right. From 1991 to 1994 he chaired the Bank of Estonia, becoming known for his consistent support for the privatization of the whole economy. He resigned in a cloud of scandal because he was accused of the embezzlement of US$10 million. Although he was cleared of this accusation in 2000, the Supreme Court sent the case back for further examination. The whole affair became the core of attacks on the center-right government and on Kallas himself. On the eve of the parliamentary elections of September 1995, Kallas founded the Estonian Reform Party (Eesti Reformierakond [ERP]), and he became its chairman. From 1995 he sat in the parliament.

From October 1995 to November 1996 Kallas was foreign minister in the government of Tiit Vähi. The fall of that government caused the reformers to move into the opposition. Kallas returned to power as a result of the March 1999 elections, when his party entered a coalition with other center and right-wing parties and joined the government of Mart Laar; Kallas became minister of finance and continued market reforms. Perceived as an advocate of monetarism, Kallas consistently supported wide privatization, including that of the railways and the health service. Although prospects for entering the European Union (whose program is much more socially oriented than the ERP would like), eased Kallas's pronouncements on privatization, Kallas tried to complete the changes in ownership. In 2002 the ruling coalition broke up. On 28 January 2002 Kallas entered into a coalition with the Estonian Center Party and created a new government under his leadership. As result of the March 2003 elections, on 10 April 2003 Kallas resigned from the position of prime minister. In December 2004 he was nominated European commissioner for administrative affairs, audits, and anti-fraud and vice-president of the European Commission. (AG)

Sources: Eesti Enstuklopeedia, vol. 14 (Tallinn, 2000); Matti Laur, Tõnis Lukas, Ain Mäesalu, Ago Pajur, and Tõnu Tannberg, History of Estonia (Tallinn, 2000); Mel Huang, "Does Estonia Have a Left?" Central European Review, 2000, no. 13; Mel Huang, "The News from Estonia: All Important News since 1 April 2000," Central European Review, 2000, no. 14; eng.reform.ee/cv_siimkallas.html.

KÁLLAY Miklós (23 January 1887, Nyíregyháza–14 January 1967, New York), Hungarian politician. Born into an aristocratic family, after attending school in Geneva and Munich, Kállay received a Ph. D. in law in Budapest in 1910. In 1920–22 he was head of a county and then of Szabolcs Province in eastern Hungary. From 1929 he was secretary of state in the Ministry of Trade, from 1931 an MP, and from 1937 a senator. From October 1932 to January 1935 Kállay was minister of agriculture in the government of Gyula Gömbös, from which he resigned in protest against the authoritarian inclinations of the prime minister. For some time Kállay was head of the National Land Drainage Administration. On 9 March 1942 Regent Miklós Horthy invited him to become prime minister, and until mid-1943 Kállay combined this position with the office of foreign minister. In domestic affairs Kállay tried—with some success—to reduce the influence of extreme parties (the Arrow Cross Fascists and the Communists) and to minimize the impact of war on the Hungarian economy. His basic foreign policy goal was to extricate the country from war without jeopardizing it with a German or Soviet occupation. As a result of the Big Three's policies, and of Stalin in particular, this strategy ultimately failed. When Germany occupied Hungary, on 22 March 1944 Kállay was dismissed. He initially hid from the Arrow Cross people in the Turkish Embassy. After leaving it, he was arrested and imprisoned in the German concentration camps of Mauthausen and Dachau. After World War II Kállay lived in Italy, and from 1951, in the United States. He was active in the pro-independence organizations of Hungarian émigrés and wrote articles. In 1954 Kállay published his memoirs in New York, Hungarian Premier: A Personal Account of a Nation's Struggle in the Second World War. (MS)

Sources: Biographisches Lexikon, vol. 2; György Ránki, Emlékiratok és valóság (Budapest, 1964); 20 századi magyar történelem, 1900–1994 (Budapest, 1977); John F. Montgomery, Hungary: The Unwilling Satellite (New York, 1947); Nicholas Horthy, Memoirs (New York, 1954); Paul Igotus, Hungary (London, 1972); Steven Bela Vardy, Historical Dictionary of Hungary (Lanham, Md., 1997); Magyar életrajzi lexikon, CD-ROM 2000.

KALNBĒRZINŠ Jānis (17 September 1893, Katlakana–4 February 1986, Riga), Latvian Communist activist. In 1908 Kalnbērziņš began to work as a laborer in the Riga port. In 1914 he joined the Bolshevik party and was sent to work in Lithuania. From 1918 to 1922 he served as a volunteer in the Red Army. Later, he attended the Communist University of Western Nations, and in 1925–28 he worked in the Communist underground in Latvia. He subsequently went to study at the Institute of Red Professorship in Moscow. After completing his studies in 1933, Kalnbērziņš worked in the party apparatus. In 1931 he joined the Central Committee (CC) of the Communist Party of Latvia (CPL). In 1936 he returned to Latvia, where he led the Communist underground in Riga. In 1939 he was imprisoned by the Latvian authorities, but when the Red Army marched into Latvia in June 1940 he was released and officially appointed first secretary of the CC of the CPL. At that time, along with the special emissary of the Kremlin, Andrey Vyshinsky, and NKVD functionaries, Kalnbērziņš organized the Communist takeover of power in Latvia, the incorporation of the republic into the Soviet Union, and the arrests and deportation of Latvian people. Thousands of Latvians lost their lives as a result of these actions. After the German invasion in June 1941, Kalnbērziņš went to the Soviet interior, where he became a member of the Military Council of the Northwestern Front. In 1941–52 he was a deputy member of the CC of the All-Union Communist Party (Bolsheviks). He subsequently became a member of the CC, and in 1957–61 he served as a deputy member of the Presidium of the CC. In 1945 Kalnbērziņš returned to Latvia as first secretary of the CC of the Latvian Communist Party (Bolsheviks) and directed a mostly Russian party apparatus. He supervised the second stage of the Sovietization of Latvia, which involved the arrests and deportation of all non-Communist activists, the collectivization of agriculture, and the deportation of peasants. These actions led to thousands more victims. A vicious Russifier of Latvia, in 1951 Kalnbērziņš published a work about a decade of Soviet rule. In this work, he maintained that from its beginning the Latvian nation had developed nothing but gratitude for its contacts with Russia.

The "thaw" and the de-Stalinization movement between 1953 and 1956 changed political conditions in Latvia. Since the Russians constituted the majority of party members in Latvia, changes in the Kremlin resulted in a greater openness of the Kremlin authorities toward the Latvians, whose cooperation they wanted to secure. The Latvianization of the party increased during the first years of Nikita Khrushchev's rule, but since the Kremlin decided that this process had gone too far, in 1959 a purge of the Latvian party leadership was launched. Kalnbērziņš was dismissed as first secretary. Although he personally was not accused of anything, Arvids Pelše, who succeeded him, pointed out his "deficiencies in working with the youth in the spirit of a proper internationalism." Kalnbērziņš was transferred to the post of president of the Supreme Soviet of the Latvian SSR and in 1960 to the post of vice-president of the Supreme Soviet of the USSR. In 1970 he retired but continued to serve as deputy to the Supreme Soviet of the USSR until 1974. (EJ/WR)

Sources: Prominent Personalities in the USSR (Metuchen, N.J., 1968); Great Soviet Encyclopedia, vol. 11; Archie Brown, ed., The Soviet Union: A Biographical Dictionary (New York, 1990); Romuald J. Misunas and Rein Taagepera, The Baltic States: The Years of Dependence, 1940–1970 (Berkeley, 1993); Andrejs Plakans, Historical Dictionary of Latvia (Lanham, Md., 1997).

KALNIŅŠ Bruno (7 May 1899, Tukums, Courland–26 March 1990, Stockholm), Latvian Socialist politician. The son of Pauls Kalniņš, he went to high school in Dubulti, and in 1913 he joined the Social Democratic Workers' Party of Latvia (SDWPL). In 1916 he graduated from high school in Helsingfors (Helsinki). In 1916–17 he studied law at the University of Petrograd. In 1917 he was elected to the Executive Committee of the Riga Council (Soviet) of Workers' and Peasants' Delegates. In 1918–34 he was a member of the SDWPL Central Committee (CC), and from 1918 to 1926 he was its secretary. A member of the Latvian National Council that proclaimed Latvia's independence on 18 November 1918, in 1919 Kalniņš volunteered to fight in defense of the country, and until 1921 he presided over the Central Bureau of Trade Unions. In 1921–34 he chaired the Socialist youth paramilitary organization, the Workers' Sporting Union (Strādnieku Sporta Savienība), later called the Sports and Workers' Guard (Strādnieku Sports un Sargs). A deputy to the Constituent Assembly (1920–22) and subsequent terms of the parliament and the editor of several Socialist periodicals, during the coup of 15 May 1934 Kalniņš was arrested and in 1935 sentenced to four years in prison. Thanks to the intervention of the Scandinavian Social Democrats, he was released in November 1936. In 1937 he left for Finland, where he was press attaché of the Spanish Republican representation. A member of the Foreign Committee of the Socialist Workers' and Peasants' Party of Latvia, which was banned at home, in November 1939 he was deprived of Latvian citizenship.

After the Soviet invasion of Latvia in June 1940, Kalniņš returned home and applied to the Communist Party of Latvia, but in vain. From July to October 1940 he was a political adviser in the reorganized Latvian Army, trying to protect officers from repression. After Latvia was incorporated into the USSR, he worked as an associate professor at Riga University. Arrested by the Germans in July 1941 but released thanks to the guarantees of some Latvian officers, he resumed his SDWPL activities. In 1943 Kalniņš co-founded and became deputy chairman of the Central Council of Latvia, aiming at independence from Germany and the USSR. He was arrested in July 1944 and sent to the Stuthoff concentration camp.

After his release from camp in 1945, Kalniņš went to Sweden, where he lectured and worked as a librarian at the Slavic Institute of the University of Stockholm in 1945–70. In 1956 he received a Ph.D. From 1960 to 1970 he also lectured at the Higher Military Academy. In 1945 he co-founded the Social Democratic Club of Latvians in Sweden, and later he became chairman of the SDWPL Foreign Committee. In 1947–86 he represented Latvia in the Union of East European Socialists in London; from 1961 to 1986 he was the union's president and representative in the Socialist International (SI). From 1983 he was the SI's honorary president. Kalniņš authored several works, including: Sociāldemokrātijas militārpolitika (The military policy of Social Democracy; 1928); Der sowjetische Propagandastaat (The Soviet propaganda state; 1950); Latvijas Sociāldemokrātijas piecdesmit gadi (Fifty years of Latvian Social Democracy; 1956); Revolūcija vai evolūcija Padomju Savienībā (Revolution or evolution in the Soviet Union; 1957); Die Staatsgründung Lettlands (The foundation of the Latvian state; 1971); Sociāldemokrātu kustība Latvijā (1972; The Social Democratic Movement in Latvia, 1977); and the memoirs Vēl cīņa nav galā . . . 1899–1920 (The struggle is not yet over . . . 1899–1920; 1983). (EJ)

Sources: Edgars Andersons, Latvijas Bruņotie spēki un to priekšvēsture (Toronto, 1983); Latviešu nacionālā pretestības kustība 1943–1945 (Upsala, 1994); Leonards Lapiņš, Latvijas Universitātes Tautsaimniecības un tiesību zinātņu fakultātes Tiesību zinātņu nodaļas absolventu dzīves un darba gaitas (1919–1944) (Rīga, 1999); Aivars Stranga, LSDSP un 1934. gada 15. maija valsts apvērsums: Demokrātijas likteņi Latvijā (Rīga, 1998); Ādolfš Šilde, Latvijas vēsture 1914–1940: Valsts tapšana un suverēnā valsts (Stockholm, 1976); Baiba Vitoliņa, "Dažas liecības par Bruno Kalniņa darbību 1940–1944. gadā," Latvijas Vēsture: Jaunie un Jaunākie Laiki, 2001, nos. 1–3; Andrejs Plakans, Historical Dictionary of Latvia (Lanham, Md., 1997).

KALNIŅŠ Pauls (3 March 1872, Vilces district, Courland–26 August 1945, Lustenau, Austria), Latvian Socialist politician. Born into a peasant family, Kalniņš completed a gymnasium in Libau (Liepāja) in 1892, and in 1898 he graduated from the Medical School of the university in Dorpat (Tartu). In 1897 he spent a few months in jail for taking part in a movement known as the “New Current.” In 1898 he began working as a doctor in Tukums. In 1899 he was expelled from Courland for his political activities, and he went to work as a doctor in Žagare, Lithuania. In 1901 he returned to Latvia and began working in Mitau (Jelgava), where, along with his wife Klara, he organized and led a group of Latvian Social Democrats in Courland. In 1903, threatened with arrest, Kalniņš was forced to emigrate to Switzerland, where he worked as an assistant at a clinic in Zurich and was active among Latvian and Russian Socialists. From November 1905 to January 1906 he took part in the revolution in Latvia and organized Socialist activities in Libau. After the failure of the revolution Kalniņš emigrated again but returned to Latvia in December 1906. From 1907 to 1909 he was a member of the editorial staff of the newspaper Cīņa, an organ of the illegal Latvian Social Democratic Party (LSDP), and he also worked as a doctor in Riga. In 1914 he was mobilized into the Russian Army as a military doctor. After the February 1917 revolution, in August 1917 Kalniņš was elected as a deputy to the municipal Duma (legislative assembly) in Riga. In 1918 he again took up LSDP activities. On 17 November 1918 he was elected a member of the Latvian National Council. Between March and July 1919 he was a special envoy of Latvia to Germany. From 1920 to 1921 he was deputy mayor of Riga. In 1920 he was elected deputy to the Constitutional Assembly, in 1922 he became a member of the parliament (Saeima), and in 1925 he was elected its president. After a coup d'état staged by Kārlis Ulmanis in May 1934, Kalniņš was interned for a few months. After his release, he resumed his medical practice in Riga. He avoided deportation by the Soviets in 1940–41. In 1943 he was one of the founders of the Central Council of Latvia under the auspices of the Third Reich. At the end of the war Kalniņš managed to get to Austria via Germany. He died while waiting for permission to enter Switzerland. (EJ)

Sources: Latvijas darbinieku galerija (Riga, 1928); Latvijas vadošie darbinieki (Riga, 1935); Ēriks Jēkabsons, “Paulam Kalniņam,” Latvijas Ārsts, 1997, no. 3; Andrejs Plakans, Historical Dictionary of Latvia (Lanham, Md., 1997).

KALVODA Jan (30 October 1953, Prague), Czech lawyer and politician. In 1978 Kalvoda graduated in law from Charles University in Prague. Then he began to practice law; in 1983–90 he practiced in Rokycany. In November 1989 he was a co-founder of the local Civic Forum (Občanské Fórum [OF]) organization. In February 1990, as a result of the reconstruction of the parliament, Kalvoda became a member of the Czech National Council. In the first free parliamentary elections of June 1990 he won a seat on behalf of the OF, and in January 1991 he became deputy speaker of the Czech parliament. After the breakup of the OF in the spring of 1991, he joined the Civic Democratic Alliance (Občanská Demokratická Aliance [ODA]); in it he soon advanced, pushing its founders, from the circle of former dissidents, into the shadows. In March 1992 Kalvoda became the ODA chairman, and in June 1992 he was reelected to the Czech parliament, in which he sat until 1996. From July 1992 to July 1996 he was deputy prime minister of the Czech Republic and head of the office for legislation and public administration in the government of Václav Klaus. In Klaus's next cabinet, Kalvoda was deputy prime minister and minister of justice. In December 1996 he resigned from the government and in early 1997 from his party position, in connection with a groundless use of scholarly titles. In June 1997 he opened his own law office in Prague and retired from political life. In 1998 Kalvoda left the ODA. (PU)

Sources: ČBS; Kdo byl kdo v našich dějinách ve 20. století, vol. 1 (Prague, 1998); Jan Rychlík, Rozpad Československa: Česko-slovenské vztahy 1989–1992 (Bratislava, 2002); Eric Stein, Czecho/Slovakia; Ethnic Conflict, Constitutional Fissure, Negotiated Breakup (Ann Arbor, 1997)

KALYNETS Ihor (9 July 1939, Chodorów [Khodoriv], near Lwów [Lviv]), Ukrainian poet and dissident. Brought up in a pro-independence tradition, in 1961 Kalynets graduated in philology from the University of Lviv. In 1961–72 he worked in the Lviv archive. His first volume of poems, Ekskursiya (Excursion), was banned by Soviet censorship, and the second, Vohon Kupala (Kupala's fire; 1966), was the only one published officially in the USSR. Kalynets distributed his works through the uncensored press, so from 1965 he was under constant KGB surveillance. The ban of his next volume meant the permanent loss of publishing opportunities. Kalynets published the volume in Belgium, and the subsequent one—Pidsumovuyuchi movchannia (Summing up silence; 1971)—in Munich, Germany. His wife, also a poet, was arrested in January 1972 for her contacts with the Western media and with the human rights movement, and Kalynets was arrested in August 1972. Both were sentenced to six years of labor camp and three years of forced settlement. Kalynets served in the Kuchino camp near Perm. In the camp he went on a hunger strike to protest the ban on seeing his mother and his newly born daughter. His subsequent volumes—Koronuvannia opudala (Coronation of the scarecrow; 1972) and Spohady pro svit (Memoirs of the world; 1973)—were published in the West. In 1975 Kalynets became a member of the International PEN club, and in 1977 he received the Ivan Franko Award in Chicago. He spent the forced settlement years along with his family near Chyta in Siberia.

In 1981 Kalynets returned to Lviv, where he worked in the library of the Academy of Sciences of the Ukrainian SSR from 1983 to 1990. From 1987 he, along with his wife, was active in the renaissance of the social and cultural life in Lviv. He edited the periodical Yevshan-Zilla (1990–92), co-founded the Taras Shevchenko Society of Ukrainian Language, and organized actions to commemorate the victims of Stalinist terror. In 1990 he was elected deputy to the Lviv regional council. Poems that Kalynets had written before his arrest were collected in the volume Probudzheni muza (The awakened muse; 1991), and those created while he was in captivity, in Nevolnycha muza (The enslaved Muse; 1991). In 1997 Kalynets published a full collection of his poetry as Slovo tryvayu (Lasting word). In 1991 Kalynets was given the Vasyl Stus Award and in 1992 the Taras Shevchenko State Award. All together he published seventeen volumes of poetry and a lyrical novel, Molimos zoryam dalnym (Let us pray to distant stars; 1994). His poetry was translated into many languages. (TS)

Sources: Visnyk represiy v Ukraini (New York, 1980, 1982); Heorhiy Kasyanov, Nezhodni: Ukrainiska intelihentsiya v rusi oporu 1960–80 rokiv (Kiev, 1995); Anatoliy Rusnachenko, Natsionalno-vyzvolnyi rukh v Ukraini (Kiev, 1998).

KAMIŃSKI Aleksander, pseudonyms “Dąbrowski,” “Juliusz Górecki,” and others (28 January 1903, Warsaw–15 March 1978, Warsaw), Polish scouting activist. In 1917–19 Kamiński organized Polish scouting in Uman, Russia. After returning to Poland in February 1921, he was an instructor of the Polish Scouting Association (Związek Harcerstwa Polskiego [ZHP]), and he directed schools for instructors in Nierodzim and Górki Wielkie. He was the founder of the Polish wolf cub movement for children aged 9–11 and the organizer of this movement on a national scale. In September 1939 Kamiński fought in the defense of Warsaw, and in October of that year he joined the Service for the Victory of Poland (Służba Zwycięstwu Polsce [SZP]), which was the central underground military organization. He subsequently became a member of the Union of Armed Struggle (Związek Walki Zbrojnej [ZWZ]) and in 1942, a member of the Home Army (Armia Krajowa). From November 1939 to October 1944 Kamiński edited Biuletyn Informacyjny, the most important underground military periodical, whose circulation reached 50,000. He was a member of the Polish Home Army Main Headquarters Information and Propaganda Bureau, and in 1941–44, he was head of the Information and Propaganda Bureau of the Warsaw District of the Home Army. In October 1939 he joined the headquarters of the Szare Szeregi (Gray Ranks), an underground scouting organization. In 1941 he became a consultant to the Chief of the Scouts. In 1940 Kamiński began working with the Jewish resistance in the Warsaw Ghetto. After the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising (April–May 1943) he delivered false documents to fighters in the Jewish Defense Organization (Żydowska Organizacja Bojowa [ŻOB]) who survived the uprising.

In 1945–50 Kamiński worked in the Department of Social Pedagogy of Łódź University. In 1947 he earned a Ph.D. After he was expelled from Łódź University for political reasons in 1950, he did research on the history of the Saduvian tribe. In 1958 he resumed his work at Łódź University. In 1962 he earned his postdoctoral degree and became professor and head of the Department of Social Pedagogy. From 1946 to 1947 Kamiński was vice-president of the Polish Scouting Association, which was disbanded in 1949. After the revival of this organization, he served as its president from December 1956 to April 1958. Kamiński authored around six hundred articles and a dozen or so books, including Antek Cwaniak (1932); Andrzej Małkowski (1934); Książka wodza zuchów (The book of the Wolf Cub scout leader; 1935); and Wielka gra (The great game; 1942). His novels—Kamienie na szaniec (Stones for the rampart; 1943) and Zośka i Parasol (1957), which documented the military actions of the Gray Ranks—won him the greatest acclaim. Kamiński’s most important research works are Prehistoria polskich związków młodzieży (Prehistory of Polish youth unions; 1959); Polskie związki młodzieży 1804–1831 (Polish youth associations 1804–1831; 1963); Polskie związki młodzieży 1831–1848 (Polish youth associations 1831–1848; 1968); Jaćwierz (Saduvians; 1963); and Funkcje pedagogiki społecznej (Tasks of social pedagogy; 1972). (TS)

Sources: Nowa encyklopedia powszechna PWN, vol. 3 (Warsaw, 1995); Kunert, vol. 2; Władysław Bartoszewski, “Z kart wojennej służby Aleksandra Kamińskiego,” Tygodnik Powszechny, 1978, nos. 18–19; Andrzej Janowski, Być dzielnym i umieć się różnić: Szkice o Aleksandrze Kamińskim (Warsaw, 1992).

KANDYBA Ivan (7 June 1930, Stulno, near Włodawa), Ukrainian lawyer, dissident, and nationalist politician. Kandyba’s family was resettled to the Ukrainian SSR on the basis of an agreement on a population exchange between Poland and the USSR in 1945. In 1953 he graduated in law from the University of Lviv, and then he worked as a notary, judge, and lawyer in Glinyany, near Lviv. In 1959–60, along with Levko Lukyanenko, he founded the illegal (Marxist) Ukrainian Workers' and Peasants' Union (Ukraińska Robotnicho-Selanska Spilka), which aimed at the secession of the Ukraine from the USSR on the basis of a constitutional referendum and the right of self-determination of nations. Arrested along with seven other people in January 1961, Kandyba was sentenced to fifteen years of labor camp for "betraying the homeland." While serving in Mordovia and near Perm, owing to his protests about living conditions in the camp, he received an additional sentence of one year in 1962 and three years in 1967. In July 1969, along with Lukyanenko and Mykhailo Horyn, Kandyba passed a letter to the UN Committee of Human Rights concerning the genocide of political prisoners in the Soviet Union. Released in January 1976, he was not allowed to return to Lviv, so he settled in nearby Pustomyty, where he worked as an electrician and doorkeeper. In 1976 he co-founded the Ukrainian Helsinki Group (UHG); therefore he was under constant KGB surveillance. In 1978–80 he was refused permission several times to reunite with his family in the United States. He was arrested again in March 1981 as the last remaining UHG member in the Ukraine. In July 1981 Kandyba was sentenced to ten years of labor camp and five years of forced settlement. He served in the Kuchino camp, and in 1988 he was moved to Perm. Released in September 1988, in April 1990 he co-founded and became head of the organization State Independence for Ukraine, and he edited its organ, Neskorena natsiia. In November 1992 Kandyba became a member of the Organization of Ukrainian Nationalists (OUN) in exile, and then he legalized this organization in the Ukraine. In May 1993 he became deputy chairman, and in January 1996 chairman, of the OUN. His headquarters are in Lviv. (TS)

Sources: Encyclopedia of Ukraine, vol. 2 (Toronto, 1988); Ukraińska Helsińska Hrupa 1978–1982: Dokumenty i materiyaly (Toronto and Baltimore, 1983); Ludmila Aleksieyeva, Istoriia inakomyshliia v SSSR (Vilnius and Moscow, 1992); Heorhiy Kasyanov, Nezhodni: Ukraińska intelihentsiia v rusi oporu 1960–80 rokiv (Kiev, 1995); Anatoliy Rusnachenko, Natsionalno-vyzvolnyi rukh v Ukraini (Kiev, 1998).

KANDYBA Oleh, pseudonym "Olzhych" (8 July 1907, Zhytomyr–9 June 1944, Sachsenhausen), Ukrainian politician, archaeologist, and poet. In 1923 Kandyba went into exile in Prague, where in 1929 he completed archaeological studies at Charles University and then received a doctorate. He worked in the Czech National Museum, and in the 1930s he made several research journeys to Western Europe and the Balkans. He published extensively, including Shipenitz: Kunst und Geräte neolithischen Dorfes (Shipenyts: Art and tools of a Neolithic village; 1937). In 1938 he lectured at Harvard University and helped organize the Ukrainian Scientific Institute in St. Paul, Minnesota. In 1929 Kandyba became aligned with the Organization of Ukrainian Nationalists (OUN) and headed its cultural and educational departments. After a split within the OUN in 1940, he supported Andriy Melnyk. On Melnyk's orders, in post-Munich Czechoslovakia Kandyba represented the OUN leadership to Subcarpathian Ruthenia, and from 1938 to 1939 he participated in the establishment of the Carpathian Sich, which was the embryo of the Ukrainian military force. Kandyba was a member of Melnyk's "derivative group," the members of which established the Ukrainian National Council in the summer of 1941, shortly after the German troops entered Kiev. Kandyba worked for the revival of social and cultural life in the capital and was particularly successful in activating the nationalists. He helped to edit the newspaper Ukrains'ke Slovo and the periodicals Rozbudova natsii and Ukrains'kyi visnyk. When the German authorities tightened their control, Kandyba went underground and led the conspiratorial activities of the Melnyk faction in Lwów (Lviv). Arrested in May 1944, Kandyba was later killed in a concentration camp. Ukrainian history and the Ukraine's right to independence was the main subject of Kandyba's poetry. He avoided lyricism, glorified action, and praised the sense of duty. Two volumes, Rin' (Gravel; 1935) and Vezhi (Towers; 1940), were published in his lifetime, while four other volumes were published posthumously: Pidzamche (Castle grounds; 1946); Poezii (Poems; 1956); Velychnist' (Majesty; 1969); and Neznanemu boiakovi: Zapovidane zhivim (To the unknown soldier: Handed down to the living; 1994). Under the pseudonym "K. Kostiantyn," Kandyba also wrote satirical poems. A complete edition of his works was published in 1991 in Prešov, Slovakia. In 1996, a documentary was filmed about him in the Ukraine. (TS)

Sources: Encyclopedia of Ukraine, vol. 3 (Toronto, 1993); Ryszard Torzecki, Polacy i Ukraińcy: Sprawa ukraińska w czasie II wojny światowej na terenie II Rzeczypospolitej (Warsaw, 1993).

KANIA Stanisław (8 March 1927, Wrocanka, near Jasło), Polish Communist activist. Born into a peasant family, in 1945 Kania joined the (Communist) Polish Workers' Party, and from December 1948 he was a member of the Polish United Workers' Party (Polska Zjednoczona Partia Robotnicza [PUWP]). He graduated from the Higher School of Social Sciences of the PUWP Central Committee (CC). From 1952 to 1956 he worked in the apparatus of the Polish Youth Union, and then he advanced in the PUWP apparatus. In 1958 he became head of the Department of Agriculture of the PUWP Warsaw Provincial Committee, and from 1962 to 1968 he was secretary of this committee. From June 1964 he was a deputy member, and from November 1968 a member, of the PUWP CC. In December 1968 Kania assumed the position of head of the PUWP CC Administration Department, gaining a wide range of powers and supervising the party's personnel policy, the army, and special services. He was also responsible for the party policy toward the Catholic Church. As head of the CC Administrative Department, Kania communicated directly with the administration of the CC of the Soviet party and the KGB in Moscow.

During the crisis of party leadership in December 1970, resulting from the Baltic Coast workers' riots, Kania supported the election of Edward Gierek to the position of first secretary, so at the Ninth CC Plenum in April 1971 he was promoted to CC secretary. In late May 1971, when Mieczysław Moczar tried to organize his followers in Olstyn, Kania helped Gierek organize a counteraction and dismiss Moczar from the top party leadership at the Tenth CC Plenum in June 1971. In December 1971 Kania became a deputy member, and in December 1975 a member, of the Politburo, joining the inner circle of Communist power. From 1972 he was an MP. In June 1974 he helped Gierek dismiss another rival, Franciszek Szlachcic. In the 1970s Kania supervised the Ministry of Interior operations against the Catholic Church and the emerging democratic opposition. Among other things, he unsuccessfully tried to divide and rule the Episcopate of Poland by instigating a rivalry between Cardinal Karol Wojtyła (later Pope John Paul II) and Primate Stefan Wyszyński. In view of détente and Gierek's policy of seeking Western credits, political repression, for which Kania was responsible, was not so drastic as in earlier decades, but it was sometimes very painful.

When in July 1980 workers' strikes began to spread throughout Poland as a result of price increases, Kania, along with General Wojciech Jaruzelski, was responsible for the so-called repressive ministries. It is not clear why all through the summer of 1980 they failed to try to prevent the spread of strikes while Gierek was on holiday in Russia. In August 1980 Kania took the lead of the party crisis task force. The moment the Gdańsk strike turned into a general strike, directed by the Inter-Factory Strike Committee (Międzyzakładowy Komitet Strajkowy [MKS]) and led by Lech Wałęsa, Kania decided to support a political solution to the conflict and an agreement with the MKS. At the Sixth CC Plenum on the night of 5–6 September 1980, Kania became the new PUWP first secretary. After the formation of Solidarity, he initially represented a moderate line, going back and forth between the reformers ready to compromise with Solidarity and the hard-liners who favored confrontation, as well as between most of the Polish society, which supported Solidarity, and the Kremlin, which constantly threatened military intervention. On 5 December 1980 in Moscow, Kania had to explain why "counterrevolution" was being tolerated in Poland, but the Kremlin leaders gave him more time to figure out how to cope with Solidarity.

Kania faced a similar crisis in March 1981, when during the Soyuz 81 Warsaw Pact maneuver three Solidarity activists were beaten by the militia in Bydgoszcz. The union threatened a general strike, and the maneuver could have changed into an intervention. At the last minute an agreement was reached with Solidarity. On 3 April 1981 Kania and General Jaruzelski, who in the meantime had become prime minister, met with Leonid Brezhnev and other top Kremlin leaders in Brest-Litovsk and probably agreed to introduce martial law in Poland. During the campaign before the Ninth PUWP Extraordinary Congress, Kania was strongly attacked by the hard-liners. The congress, which took place in July 1981, strengthened his position, but the worsening economic situation, the increasing social conflicts, and the impossibility of reaching an agreement with Solidarity and the Kremlin at the same time led Kania's dilatory tactics into a dead end. In mid-August 1981 Kania and Jaruzelski spoke with Brezhnev again. The latter probably came to the conclusion that only Jaruzelski had guaranteed the suppression of Solidarity by using the Polish forces. At the Fourth CC Plenum on 16–18 October 1981 Kania resigned as leader of the PUWP. Jaruzelski became the new first secretary, and on 13 December 1981 he introduced martial law.

Kania found himself in the shadows. From May 1982 to November 1985 he was a member of the Council of State; from January 1981 to July 1983 he belonged to the Presidium of the All-Polish Committee of the National Unity Front; and from November 1985 to June 1989 he presided over the parliamentary commission of self-government. After 1989 he retired from politics. Kania authored the memoirs Zatrzymać konfrontację (Stop the confrontation; 1991), in which he presented the events of 1980–81 in a different way than General Jaruzelski. (WR) Sources: Mołdawa; Andrzej Micewski, Współrzędzić czy nie klamać (Paris, 1978); Timothy Garton Ash, The Polish Revolution: "Solidarity" (New York, 1983); Zbigniew Błazyński, Towarzysze zeznają: Dekada Gierka 1970–1980 w tzw. Komisji Grabskiego (London, 1987); Andrzej Albert [Wojciech Roszkowski], Najnowsza historia Polski 1914–1993, vols. 1–2 (Warsaw, 1993); Jacek Wegner, Sternicy: Od Nowotki do Rakowskiego (Kraków, 1997); Włodzimierz Janowski and Aleksander Kochoński, Informator o strukturze i obsadzie personalnej centralnego aparatu PZPR 1948–1990 (Warsaw, 2000); Jerzy Eisler, Grudzień 1970 (Warsaw, 2000).

KANTOR Tadeusz (6 April 1915, Wielopole, near Kraków–8 December 1990, Kraków), Polish artist of Jewish origin. In 1939 Kantor graduated from the Academy of Fine Arts in Kraków. During the German occupation he organized underground exhibitions and an underground Independent Theater. After the war, he founded the Group of Young Artists (1945). Kantor's work was influenced by surrealism, constructivism, expressionism, and futurism. In 1947 he was in Paris. After returning to Poland in 1948, he initiated an exhibition of Polish modern art. In 1956 along with Maria Jarema, he founded the avant-garde theater, known as the Cricot 2 Theater. In all genres of art, Kantor strove to express reality by reducing it to simple things. In Poland his work was a precursor of the Informel Theater, the assemblage, the happening (Cricotage, 1965; Panoramic Sea Happening, 1967). Kantor gained international recognition at the Cricot 2 Theater as the creator of performances based not only on the works of Witkacy (Stanisław Ignacy Witkiewicz)—W małym dworku (Country house; 1961), Wariat i zakonnica (The madman and the Nun; 1963)—but also on his own scripts: Umarła klasa (The dead class; 1975); Wielopole, Wielopole (1980); Niech szczerzą artyści (Let the artists perish; 1985); and Nigdy tu już nie powrócę (I shall never come back here; 1988). In these plays, in an original and impressive way, Kantor expressed his anxiety about the modern degradation of human life. His publications include a manifesto, Teatr Śmierci (The theater of death; 1975); Metamorphosis (1982); and the collection Wielopole, Wielopole (1984). (WR) Sources: Nowa encyklopedia powszechna PWN, vol. 3 (Warsaw, 1995); The Dictionary of Art, vol. 17 (London, 1996); Wiesław Borowski, Tadeusz Kantor (Warsaw, 1982); Klaus Dermutz, Totes Leben: Zur Anthropologie und Theologie von Tadeusz Kantors Teater des Todes und der Liebe (Graz, 1994); Krzysztof Miklaszewski, Encounters with Tadeusz Kantor (London, 2002).

KAPETANOVIĆ Izudin (1 September 1953, Tuzla), Bosnian politician and engineer. Kapetanović graduated from the Department of Electrical Technology of the University of Sarajevo in 1976 and received a second degree in power-plant engineering there in 1985. He also completed doctoral studies in numerical calculus in the electromagnetic field at the Technische Hochschule Ilmenau in Germany (1985–86), and he specialized in this field. Kapetanović received a Ph.D. in electrical engineering at the University of Tuzla (1988), where he worked, advancing from assistant professor to full professor. There he was deputy dean (1986–88) and dean (1988–98) of the Department of Electrical and Machine Technology and then rector from November 2000. From 1997 he also lectured in the Department of Traffic and Communications at the University of Sarajevo. Kapetanović authored about eighty scholarly works, including three books. In 1996–99 he was director of the Elektrodistribucija Power Plant in Tuzla. From 31 January to 18 December 1996 he was prime minister of Bosnia-Herzegovina. During his term, normal living conditions were restored in a country ravaged by war—among them, water, electricity, and heating supplies. Kapetanović was minister of power engineering, mining, and industry from December 1996 to March 1998; one of the leaders of the Party of Democratic Action (Strana Demokratske Akcije) of Alija Izetbegović; a member of the leadership of the Association of Bosnian Intellectuals; and founder and director of the Institute of Electrical Current–Energoinvenst in Sarajevo (1998–2000). (JD)

Sources: Ko je ko u Bosnjaka: Vijeće Kongresa Bosnjackih Intelektualaca (Sarajevo, 2000).

KAPLIŃSKI Jaan (22 January 1941, Tartu), Estonian poet. Kapliński's father, Jerzy Kapliński, was a lecturer of Polish at the University of Tartu who stimulated Estonian-Polish cultural links, and his mother, Nora Raudsepp-Kapliński, was a ballet dancer. His father was arrested by the NKVD in 1941, and he perished in the Gulag. Kapliński studied Romance languages and mathematical linguistics at the University of Tartu, as well as sociology and ecology. From 1968 he belonged to the Union of Estonian Writers. In 1965–72 he worked at Tartu University, and in 1974–80, in the Tallinn Botanical Garden. At the turn of the 1970s, in connection with the intensified Russification policies of the Communist authorities, Kapliński became a leader of the intellectual opposition. On his initiative, in October 1980 a group of forty intellectuals sent an open letter to the party authorities of the Soviet Union and the Estonian SSR demanding the discontinuation of the Russification policies. The authorities answered with repression. In the late 1980s Kapliński worked as a journalist; taking advantage of perestroika, he traveled to the West, promoting the restitution of Estonian statehood. After Estonia regained independence in 1991, Kapliński was elected to the parliament (Riigikogu) and was a deputy on behalf of the Estonian Center Party (1992–95). He was connected with the leftist faction of the party, led by Edgar Savisaar. Before the end of his term he gave up his mandate and returned to literary work.

Kapliński authored several volumes of poems, mostly in Estonian, such as Tolmust ja värvidest (Dust and colors; 1967) and Valge joon Võrumaa kohale (White line over Voru; 1972), but also in English: The Same Sea in Us All (1985), Wandering Border (1987), I Am the Spring in Tartu and Other Poems Written in English (1991), and Through the Forest (1996). He also wrote in Swedish and Finnish. The trauma of World War II and his problems with self-identity—Kapliński said if it were not for his father's arrest, he could have returned to Poland—as well as existential problems with the Soviet reality, led Kapliński to Buddhism. He experimented in his writing, adapting typically East Asian forms of literature to the Estonian language. His radical message, including Taoist motifs and an ecological sensitivity—combined, for instance, in the volume See ja teine (This and the other; 1996)—brought him renown in the West, while Western consumerism became a frequent topic of his poems and essays. (AG)

Sources: Eesti Entsuklopeedia, vol. 14 (Tallinn, 2000); Piotr Lossowski, Stosunki polsko-estońskie 1918–1939 (Gdańsk, 1992); Tõnu Tannberg, Matti Laur, Tõnis Lukas, Ain Mäesalu, and Ago Pajur, History of Estonia (Tallinn, 2000); www.mv.helsinki.fi/helsinkiforum/english/people/kapliński.html; jaan.kapliński.com/life/memories.html; www.einst.ee/literary/spring98/06transc.htm.

KAPO Hysni (4 March 1915, Terbaç, near Vlorë–23 September 1979, Paris), Albanian Communist activist. Kapo came from a Muslim family. After completing a school of commerce in Vlorë, he worked as a bookseller and a male nurse at a hospital in Vlorë between 1936 and 1940. In the Communist movement, he became aligned with a splinter group of the “young” that broke away from a group from Korçë. A member of the Communist Party of Albania (CPA) from the party's foundation in 1941, Kapo was the leader of a party organization in Vlorë. He is credited with having founded, in 1941, one of the first partisan units linked with the Communists. He was a staff member of the National Liberation Army (NLA) and a member of the General Council of the National Liberation Front. In 1943 he became a political commissar in the Fifth Brigade of the NLA. Official historiography credits him with having played an important role in the battle of Drashovicë against the Germans (15 September 1943). In practice, Kapo distinguished himself in combating the units of non-Communist resistance, particularly the units of the National Front (Balli Kombëtar). Along with Shefqet Peçi, he commanded a unit that was responsible for bloody pacification campaigns carried out as a part of “purge actions” in the northern part of the country.

In 1944 Kapo became the NLA inspector general, with the rank of colonel. As a member of a special Communist court that punished “war criminals and enemies of the people” after the war, he was responsible for many judicial crimes. From July 1945 to February 1947 he served as ambassador to Belgrade. In 1945 he became a deputy to the parliament. From 1945 to 1947 he served as minister of foreign affairs and was a member of the Albanian delegation to the Paris Peace Conference in 1946. In 1946 he became a member of the Politburo of the CPA CC, and in 1948, a member of the Albanian Labor Party (ALP). Until the time

Albania broke off relations with the USSR, Kapo served as president of the Albanian-Soviet Friendship Society. In 1949 he was promoted to general. From July 1950 to June 1958 he was deputy prime minister, and from September 1951 to July 1954, minister of agriculture. A close associate of Enver Hoxha, Kapo showed the greatest skill in adjusting to changes in Hoxha's policy. Hoxha, referring to the pseudonym that Kapo used during the occupation, called him “Besniku i Partisë” (Faithful to the Party). In 1948 Kapo was in favor of breaking off relations with Yugoslavia, and in June 1960 he was an ALP delegate to a congress of the Romanian party in Bucharest, where it came to an open conflict with the Soviet leadership. Kapo was also sent to Moscow in November of that year for negotiations with Nikita Khrushchev, as a result of which the ALP broke off relations with the Kremlin. In 1980 Kapo's house in Terbaç was turned into a museum. A monument to Kapo was built in Vlorë. In 1991 this monument was destroyed. Kapo received many honors, including the Order of Hero of Socialist Work (1965). Between 1980 and 1983 his Vepra të zgjedhura (Selected works, 5 vols.) were published. Kapo's wife, Vito Kondi, was a deputy member (1952–61) and a member (1962–91) of the ALP CC. (TC)

Sources: Bashkimi, 22 November 1945; Fjalor Enciklopedik Shqiptar (Tirana, 1985); Raymond Hutchings, Historical Dictionary of Albania (Lanham, Md., 1996); William E. Griffith, Albania and the Sino-Soviet Rift (Cambridge, 1963); Arshi Pipa, Albanian Stalinism (Boulder, Colo., 1990); Klaus-Detlev Grothusen, ed., Albanien (Göttingen, 1993).

KAPSUKAS-MICKEVIČIUS Vincas [originally Mickevičius] (7 April 1880, Būdviečiai, near Vilkaviškis–17 February 1935, Moscow), Lithuanian Communist activist. Born into a family of rich peasants, Kapsukas-Mickevičius completed high school in Marijampolė in 1897, and then his parents enrolled him in a theological seminary in Sejny. Expelled in 1898 for protesting against the tsarist government in Lithuania, from 1902 to 1904 he studied sociology and economics in Bern, Switzerland, where he wrote under the pseudonym “Kapsukas” for underground Lithuanian periodicals published in East Prussia. He initially favored the liberal-democratic line of the periodicals Ūkininkas and Varpas. For some time, he worked on the editorial staff of the latter periodical in Tilsit (Sovetsk). Under the influence of Russian Marxists, he lost interest in the cause of Lithuanian independence and gave priority to world revolution. In 1904 he founded a Socialist youth organization, Dragas (Comrade), which merged with the Lithuanian Social Democratic Party the following year. He became a member of its Central Committee (CC). He failed to persuade Social Democratic leaders to cooperate with the Bolsheviks. In 1907–13 he served a prison sentence, and subsequently he was exiled to Siberia. At the end of 1913 he escaped, and after long travel he reached the United States in 1916. There he published Socialist newspapers in Philadelphia, and he even gained the support of the Lithuanian Socialists in the United States for the Bolshevik cause.

After the February 1917 revolution, Kapsukas-Mickevičius returned to Russia, where he co-established the Central Office of the Lithuanian Section in the Bolshevik party. After the October Revolution, he became commissar for the treasury, and on 8 December 1917 he was appointed commissar for Lithuanian affairs in Stalin's Commissariat of Nationalities. He disbanded Lithuanian mutual aid committees because they favored the cause of Lithuanian independence. After Bolshevik troops captured Dvinsk (Daugavpils), on 8 December 1918 Kapsukas-Mickevičius announced the establishment of the Provisional Government of Workers and Peasants, and he became its head. A few days later he proclaimed the foundation of the Lithuanian Soviet Republic. On 5 January 1919 the government moved to Vilnius (Wilno), which was occupied by the Red Army. When on 16 January a decision was made to establish the Lithuanian-Belorussian SSR, Kapsukas-Mickevičius became head of its Council of People's Commissars. He was in charge of establishing the Bolshevik administration, and he led the revolutionary terror. When the Polish troops marched into Vilnius in April 1919, he withdrew to Smolensk, where he published the Bolshevik newspaper Zvezda. In July 1920 he returned to Vilnius with the new offensive of the Red Army. He remained in Vilnius after the Red Army withdrew, and he edited Pochodnia, a legal trade union newspaper. In the summer of 1921 he left for Moscow, where he joined the CC of the Communist Party of Lithuania (CPL). He wrote numerous articles and brochures that promoted communism, but the CPL managed to attract only around one thousand members, and the majority of them were non-Lithuanians. In 1926 he joined the Executive Committee of the Communist International. Kapsukas-Mickevičius died of natural causes. In 1955 the Communist authorities renamed the city of Marijampolė and Vilnius University after him. The former names were restored when Lithuania regained independence in 1991. Between 1960 and 1966 eight volumes of his propaganda writings were published. (WR)

Sources: EL, vol. 3; MERSH, vol. 15; Saulius Sužiedelis, Historical Dictionary of Lithuania (Lanham, Md., 1997); Mykolas Biržiška, Lietuvių tautos keliu, vols. 1–2 (Los Angeles, 1952–53); Alfred E. Senn, The Emergence of Modern Lithuania (New York, 1959); Jerzy Ochmański, Historia Litwy (Wrocław, 1967); Henryk Wisner, Litwa dzieje państwa i narodu (Warsaw, 1999).

KAPUŚCIŃSKI Ryszard (4 March 1932, Pińsk), Polish journalist and writer. In 1955 Kapuściński graduated in history from Warsaw University. He worked for the daily Sztandar Młodych (1950–56), the weeklies Polityka (1957–61) and Kultura (1974–81), and the monthly Kontynenty (1973), publishing correspondence from various countries affected by military conflicts and undergoing political change. He published Chrystus z karabinem na ramieniu (Christ with a carbine on his shoulders; 1975); Jeszcze jeden dzień życia (1976; Another Day of Life, 1986); Cesarz (1978; Emperor, 1984), in which he presented the ambience and lifestyle of the Ethiopian court (allusions to the Communist reality were traced in this book); and Wojna futbolowa (1978; Soccer War, 1990), on the war between Honduras and El Salvador. Apart from serving as Polish Press Agency correspondent (1962–72), Kapuściński lectured in many countries—for instance, as visiting professor in universities in Bangalore (India), Caracas (Venezuela), and Philadelphia (United States), as well as a Fellow at St. Anthony's College in Oxford (1986). In 1981–85 he was deputy chairman of Poland 2000, a forecasting committee of the Polish Academy of Sciences. He was also a member of many Polish and international organizations, such as the Polish Sociological Society, the European Academy of Science and Arts, the International Parliament of Writers, and the International PEN Club. He received many Polish, German, Italian, and American awards. His books—such as Szachinszach (1982; Shah of Shahs, 1985); Lapidarium (1990); Imperium (1993; English translation, 1994), on the collapse of the Soviet Union; and Heban (Ebony; 1998), on the disaster of civilization in Africa—were translated into more than a dozen languages, making him one of the most popular Polish writers. (WR) Sources: Nowa encyklopedia powszechna PWN, vol. 3 (Warsaw, 1995); Kto jest kim w Polsce (Warsaw, 2001); Kazimierz Wolny, O twórczości Ryszarda Kapuścińskiego (Rzeszów, 1998); Zbigniew Bauer, Antymedialny reportaż Ryszarda Kapuścińskiego (Warsaw, 2001).

KARADŽIĆ Radovan (19 June 1945, Petnjica), Serb nationalist politician, war criminal. Born in a Montenegrin village, in 1960 Karadžić moved to Sarajevo, where he graduated from a medical high school and the Medical Academy. He specialized in psychiatry. His hobby was poetry, and he published several volumes. In 1967 he met Dobrica Ćosić, a nationalist writer who encouraged him to become active in politics. In 1968 Karadžić made a passionate speech to students from the roof of a university building in Sarajevo. For many years he worked in psychiatric wards and hospitals, developing his skills, and he also worked in the United States. He worked for a soccer club in Sarajevo, and in 1983–84, for the Belgrade soccer team Crvena Zvezda. In 1985 Karadžić spent eleven months in prison, accused of fraud. In 1990 he co-founded the Serbian Democratic Party in Bosnia-Herzegovina (SDP BH), and he became its leader. When in 1992 the Bosnian Serbs proclaimed the independence of the Bosnian Serb Republic, Karadžić became its first president. In cooperation with Slobodan Milošević and Ratko Mladić, he started the construction of an “ethnically clean” Serbian state in Bosnia that could be united with Serbia and other former Yugoslav territories inhabited by Serbs. Milošević supported Karadžić all the way until under Western pressure, he closed the border between Serbia and Bosnia-Herzegovina.

In 1995 Karadžić was twice accused of genocide and crimes against humanity by the International Criminal Tribunal for Former Yugoslavia (ICTY) in The Hague. Along with General Mladić, he was blamed for the siege of Sarajevo (April 1992–May 1995); the murder of about six thousand Muslims from Srebrenica (July 1995); rapes; the detention of thousands of Bosnian Muslims and Croats in concentration camps; and the use of UN peace-keeping forces as human shields against NATO air raids (May–June 1995). Initially Karadžić took part in peace talks, but after he was accused of war crimes, it was Milošević and not Karadžić who represented Bosnian Serbs during the talks in Dayton, Ohio. One of the stipulations of the Dayton agreement was that Karadžić had to retire from politics. Under pressure from Milošević and Bosnian Serb leaders, on 16 June 1996 it was announced that Karadžić would no longer hold the offices of president of the Bosnian Serb Republic and leader of the SDP BH and that he would withdraw from politics. This decision was a prerequisite for the international community to supervise elections in Bosnia-Herzegovina in September 1996. Despite his resignation, Karadžić maintained authority and influence among Bosnian Serbs. From time to time he went into hiding, and despite the ICTY indictment, he has not been arrested. In 2001 his popular autobiography was published under the title Radovan i Serbia (Radovan and Serbia). (AO)

Sources: Lenard J. Cohen, The Disintegration of Yugoslavia (Boulder, Colo., 1993); Edgar O’Ballance, Civil War in Bosnia, 1992–94 (New York, 1995); David Owen, Balkan Odyssey (New York, 1995); Laura Silber and Allan Little, The Death of Yugoslavia (London, 1995); Warren Zimmermann, Origins of a Catastrophe (New York and Toronto, 1996); Richard Holbrooke, To End a War (New York, 1998); International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia, www.un.org/icty/indictment.

KARASZEWICZ-TOKARZEWSKI Michał, pseudonyms “Stolarski,” “Torwid,” “Stawski,” and “Doktor”

(5 January 1893, Lemberg [Lwów, Lviv]–22 May 1964, Casablanca), Polish general. After graduating from a high school in Drohobych, Karaszewicz-Tokarzewski studied law and medicine at the Jagiellonian University in Kraków. He was a member of the Polish Socialist Party (Polska Partia Socjalistyczna [PPS]). Inducted into the Austrian Army, he graduated from a reserve officers’ school in Vienna. In 1912 he joined the Rifle Association, under whose auspices he completed a secondary and an academic officers’ school. He was also a member of the Union of Active Struggle (Związek Walki Czynnej [ZWC]). In August 1914 he joined the Polish Legions, where he rose to the rank of commander of an infantry regiment. He fought in many battles, including those of Anielino and Laski. After the oath crisis, Karaszewicz-Tokarzewski served in the Austrian Army from December 1917 to May 1918 and subsequently in the Polish Military Organization (Polska Organizacja Wojskowa [POW]), where he held various posts, such as POW commandant in Lublin. Until October 1918 he was a POW representative to European Russia, the Ukraine, the French Military Mission in Moscow, and the Polish Military Committee in Moscow.

From November 1918 Karaszewicz-Tokarzewski served in the Polish Army. He founded the Fifth Infantry Regiment in Kraków and was its commander in the battle of Lwów and other battles. In March 1919 he became commander of the First Infantry Brigade. Later, he held various positions, including deputy general inspector of the infantry and deputy head of the Infantry Department of the Ministry of Military Affairs. In May 1921 Karaszewicz-Tokarzewski took command of the First Lithuanian-Belorussian Division (the future Nineteenth Infantry Division in Vilnius). In August 1924 he was promoted to brigadier general. In March 1927 he became head of the Personnel Office of the Ministry of Military Affairs, and in March 1929, commander of the Twenty-Fifth Infantry Division in Kalisz. Between 1932 and 1936 he was commander of Corps Area Three in Grodno, then commander of Corps Area Six in Lwów, and in 1938 he became commander of Corps Area Eight in Toruń. In 1924 he joined the Polish Theosophical Society and the National Grand Lodge–Tomasz Zan; in 1925 he joined the Liberal Catholic Church.

During the September campaign of 1939, Karaszewicz-Tokarzewski commanded the Operation Group of the Pomorze Army in the battle of the Bzura River. Until 19 September, as deputy commander of the Warszawa (Warsaw Army), he fought in the defense of Warsaw. He initiated the establishment of an underground resistance command center authorized by Marshal Edward Rydz-Śmigły. From 27 September to 13 November 1939

Karaszewicz-Tokarzewski served as commander of the Service for the Victory of Poland (Służba Zwycięstwu Polsce [SZP]). He co-founded the Chief Council, which was to take political command of the SZP, but because he was too closely linked with the sanacja circles, Prime Minister Władysław Sikorski dismissed him as the SZP commander. In November 1939 Karaszewicz-Tokarzewski became commander of the Lwów area of the Union of Armed Struggle (Związek Walki Zbrojnej [ZWZ]). Arrested by the NKVD on 6–7 March 1940 while crossing the Soviet-German border, he was held in a Soviet prison until August 1941, and then he was released under the Sikorski-Mayski Agreement. In August 1941 he became commander of the Sixth Infantry Division of the Polish Army in the USSR, and in January 1943 he was appointed major general. In March 1943 he became deputy commander of the Polish Army in the East, led by General Władysław Anders, and in December 1944, commander of the Third Corps in the Middle East. From August 1946 to December 1946 he served as commander of the Second Corps, and later he was in the Polish Resettlement Corps (Polski Korpus Przysposobienia i Rozmieszczenia). After the war, Karaszewicz-Tokarzewski settled in London, where he worked in a factory. In August 1954 he became general inspector of the armed forces in exile. In March 1964, shortly before his death, he was promoted to lieutenant general. He was active in the leadership of several Masonic lodges in London, including Le Droit Humain, the International Concord Lodge, and the Egyptian Rite of Ancient Mysteries. In September 1992 the urn with Karaszewicz-Tokarzewski's ashes was brought to the Powązki Cemetery in Warsaw. (JS)

Sources: Kto był kim w Drugiej Rzeczypospolitej (Warsaw, 1994); Encyklopedia Historii Polski: Dzieje polityczne, vol. 2 (Warsaw, 1995); Zbigniew Mierziński, Generałowie II Rzeczypospolitej, vol. 1 (Warsaw, 1990); Stefan Korboński, Polskie Państwo Podziemne (Paris, 1975); T. Kryśka-Karski and S. Żurkowski, Generałowie Polski Niepodległej. (London, 1976); Władysław Pobóg-Malinowski, Najnowsza historia polityczna Polski 1864–1945, vol. 3 (London, 1986); Ludwik Hass, Masoneria polska XX wieku (Warsaw, 1996).

KARATKEVICH Uladzimir (26 November 1930, Orsha–25 July 1984, Minsk), Belorussian writer and poet. From 1951 to 1954 Karatkevich studied in the Philological Department of Kiev University, and in 1954–58 he worked as a teacher in the Ukraine and Belorussia. He made his literary debut in 1955. His collections of poetry are Matchina dusha (Mother's soul; 1958); Vyachernia vetrazi (Evening sails; 1960); Maia Iliada (My Iliad; 1969) and Byu. Ios'ts.' Budu (I am. I was. I shall be; 1986), a work published after his death. As a prose writer, Karatkevich was inspired mainly by historical motifs. He placed the characters of his novels in the midst of major historical events, binding their fate with that of Belorussia. He created a Belorussian historical mythology modeled on that of Henryk Sienkiewicz, whose historical mythology pervaded the historical consciousness of the Poles. Karatkevich planned to write a trilogy about the January 1863 Insurrection but completed only the first part, Kalasy pad serpom tvaim (Grain under your sickle; 1962). His novel Zbroja (Armor), written in 1964 and published in 1981, was also devoted to the January insurrection. Kastus Kalinouski, a novel written in 1963, was not published until 1978. The novel Khrystos pryzamliusia u Harodni (Christ stopped in Grodno; 1972) was devoted to the epoch of King Sigismund I Jagiellon. The novel Dzikaie palavanie karala Stakha (King Stakh's wild hunt), which was reissued many times, was devoted to the clash of cultures and ethical systems in Belorussia at the turn of the nineteenth century. Karatkevich's publications also include the novel Chorny zamak Alshanski (Black Olszany Castle; 1979) and a drama about Josaphat Kunciewicz, Zvany Vitsiebska (The bells of Vitebsk; 1974). (EM)

Sources: V. Tichina, Mahchymasti realizmu (Minsk, 1982); Adam Maldzis, Zhyttsio i uzniasienne Uladzimira Karatkievicha (Minsk, 1990); A. Rusetski, Uladzimir Karatkievich: praz historyiu u suchasnasts (Minsk, 1991); Jan Zaprudnik, Historical Dictionary of Belarus (Lanham, Md., 1998).

KARAVANSKYI Svyatoslav (24 December 1920, Odessa), Ukrainian poet and dissident. At the end of World War II, in 1945 Karavanskyi was sentenced to twenty-five years in a forced labor camp for taking part in the struggle for Ukrainian independence. After seventeen years in the camps of Kolyma, Magadan, and Mordovia, he was amnestied in 1962 and returned to Odessa, where he reunited with his wife, Nina Strokata-Karavanska. He published poems and articles, referring to the Stalinist repression. In 1965 Karavanskyi was arrested again and sentenced to five years in prison. He served in Volodymir Prison and other places. Still in prison, he joined the Ukrainian Helsinki Group; in November 1979 he was released on condition that he emigrate. Along with his wife, he settled in the United States, where he published a number of volumes of poetry and translations, including Sutyhka z tayfunom (Encounter with a typhoon; 1980); Moje remeslo (My handicraft; 1981); Yaryna z horodu Khomy Chereshni (Vegetables from the Khoma Chereshna Garden; 1981); and Humorystychnyi samvydav (A satirical uncensored publication; 1982). (WR) Sources: Encyclopedia of Ukraine, vol. 2 (Toronto, 1988); S. P. de Boer, E. J. Driessen, and H. L. Verhaar, eds., Biographical Dictionary of Dissidents in the Soviet Union (The Hague, 1982).

KARAVELOV Petko (24 March 1843, Koprivshitsa–24 January 1903, Sofia), Bulgarian politician. Karavelov was the brother of the writer Luben Karavelov. From 1860 he lived in Moscow, where he graduated from high school and where he studied at the Historical-Philological and Law Departments of the Moscow State University. After returning home in 1878, he entered the public scene, and for twenty-five years he was active in Bulgarian political life. In 1879 he became an MP on behalf of the Liberal Party, which he chaired from 1879 to 1883. Later he was the leader of the faction of extreme liberals. In 1894 he founded the Democratic Party and was its leader. From December 1880 to May 1881 and from July 1884 to August 1886 he was prime minister, and in the first government he was also minister of finance. During Karavelov's second term as head of government, in 1885 the Bulgarian Principality merged with East Rumelia and won the war against Serbia. Karavelov opposed the deposition of Prince Battenberg, and in August 1886 he assumed the duties of the regent for a few days. After Prince Ferdinand ascended the throne and after Stefan Stambolov introduced his dictatorship (1887–94), Karavelov found himself in opposition to the new regime. Arrested and sentenced to long-term imprisonment, he was released after the fall of Stambolov. After the failure of the government of General Racho Petrov, which bloodily suppressed a peasant rebellion, from 5 March 1901 to 4 January 1902 Karavelov he was prime minister again, but internal friction in the ruling elite caused him to resign. One of his daughters, Lora, married the poet Peyo Yavorov. (JW)

Sources: Entsiklopediya Bulgariya, vol. 3 (Sofia, 1982); Angel Tsurakov, Pravitelstvata na Bulgariya, chast II, 1879–1913 (Sofia, 1996); Milen Kumanov and Tanya Nikolova, Politicheski partii, organizatsii i dvizheniya v Bulgariya i tekhnite lideri (Sofia, 1999).

KARDELJ Edvard (27 January 1910, Ljubljana–10 February 1979, Ljubljana), Communist activist of Slovene nationality. Born into a working-class family, Kardelj graduated from a teachers' college in Ljubljana. In 1926 he joined the outlawed League of Communist Youth, and in 1929, the Communist Party of Yugoslavia (CPY). Arrested in 1930, he spent two years in prison. From 1932 to 1934 he organized a CPY section in Slovenia. He published a great deal in the spirit of orthodox Stalinist communism. For example, in 1934, under the pseudonym "Tone Brodar," he published Fašizem (Fascism). In 1934 Kardelj traveled via Czechoslovakia to the Soviet Union, where, under the pseudonym "Birk," he received intelligence training at the Leninist School of the Comintern. In January 1937 he returned to Yugoslavia, and in April of that year he attended the founding congress of the Communist Party of Slovenia in Čebinje. In 1939, under the pseudonym "Sperans," he published Razvoj slovenskego narodnega vprašanja (The development of the Slovene national question), in which he emphasized the separate national identity of the Slovenes. He also published under the pseudonym "Jože Beve," and he was arrested several times. He rose through the party ranks, becoming a member of the CPY Central Committee (CC) and Politburo in 1940.

After the fall and partition of Yugoslavia in April 1941, Kardelj, along with other Communists, adopted a wait-and-see attitude. When the Nazis invaded the USSR in June of that year, he helped to organize Communist underground activities in Slovenia and Croatia, and he joined the Partisans led by Josip Broz Tito. At that time Kardelj was leader of the Slovene party, and he participated in the work of Tito's staff. On 29 November 1943 Kardelj became deputy prime minister in Tito's provisional government and retained this post after March 1945, when he also became the minister responsible for drafting a new constitution. Kardelj was also head of the Party Central Control Commission. Like Tito, Kardelj for a while favored a Balkan federation based on Yugoslav-Bulgarian integration. In 1946 he became head of the Yugoslav delegation to the Paris Peace Conference. Along with Milovan Djilas, he represented the CPY at the founding congress of the Information Bureau of the Communist and Workers' Parties (Cominform) at Szklarska Poreba in September 1947. He was also a Yugoslav delegate at the sessions of the UN General Assembly in 1945 and 1948–51. After the Cominform denounced Tito at the Fifth Congress of the CPY in July 1948, Kardelj firmly supported the party leader and his political line, and he also joined the Politburo and Secretariat of the CPY CC. From 1948 to 1953 Kardelj served as minister of foreign affairs. From 1963 to 1967 he was president of the federal National Assembly. He supported not only Tito's political line, but also such systemic changes as the decollectivization of agriculture and the economic system of workers' self-management. One of the major theoreticians of Socialist self-management, Kardelj was a co-author of the constitutions of 1953, 1963, and 1974. He published many works in this field. He was also the author of The Communist Party of Yugoslavia in the Struggle for the New Yugoslavia's People's Authority and for Socialism (1948), The Way of New Yugoslavia (1949), Socialism and War (1960), and other works. In 1979 his Izbor iz dela (Selected works, 7 vols.) was published. (WR)

Sources: Enciklopedija Slovenije, vol. 5 (Ljubljana, 1991); Lazitch; Leopoldina Plut-Progelj and Carole Rogel, Historical Dictionary of Slovenia (Lanham, Md., 1996); Adam Ulam, Titoism and the Cominform (Westport, Conn., 1952); Milovan Djilas, Memoirs of a Revolutionary (New York, 1973); Dennison Rusinow, The Yugoslav Experiment, 1948–1974 (Berkeley, 1977); Duncan Wilson, Tito's Yugoslavia (Cambridge, 1979); Š. Bulovec, Bibliografija Edvarda Kardelja (Ljubljana, 1980); Sabrina P. Ramet, Nationalism and Federalism in Yugoslavia, 1962–1991 (Bloomington, 1992); John Lampe, Yugoslavia as History (Cambridge, 1996).

KAREVIČIUS Pranciskus (30 September 1861, Graš-iunai, near Kretinga–30 May 1945, Marijampolė), Lithuanian bishop. In 1886 Karevičius completed his studies at the Theological Academy in St. Petersburg, and in May 1886 he was ordained a priest. He lectured at the same academy for two years and then worked in a Catholic parish in Samara. In 1892 he began working in St. Catherine Parish in St. Petersburg. He served as the parish priest of that parish from 1908 on, defending the rights of Lithuanians and Latvians to use their native languages in church services. On 27 February 1914 Karevičius was appointed bishop of Samogitia. With his ingress into Kaunas Cathedral, the Lithuanization of the Samogitia diocese began. This led to protests by the local Poles. After the outbreak of World War I, the Russian authorities made it impossible for Karevičius to continue his work; therefore, he moved to Panevėžys, but when the Germans occupied Lithuania, he returned to Kaunas in August 1915. In 1917–18 Karevičius supported the Lithuanian Council in its efforts to gain independence for Lithuania. He administered the oath of allegiance to the first units of the Lithuanian Army, and he attended the opening ceremonies of the Constituent Assembly in May 1920. In April 1926, following the reorganization of the church in Lithuania, the diocese of Samogitia ceased to exist, and the majority of its territory was incorporated into the archdiocese of Kaunas. Karevičius retired and resided in the monastery in Marijampolė. He also entered the Marian order, which was revived by Archbishop Jurgis Matulaitis-Matulevičius. Karevičius died soon after the Red Army again occupied Lithuania. (WR)

Sources: EL, vol. 3; Alfred E. Senn, The Emergence of Modern Lithuania (New York, 1959).

KARMASIN Franz (2 September 1901, Olomouc–25 June 1970, Steinbach, Federal Republic of Germany), German politician active in Slovakia. After graduating from high school in Olomouc, Karmasin completed agricultural studies at a German polytechnic in Český Tešín. He then began working with German political organizations, becoming a member of a student organization called Freinschar Arndt. After receiving a diploma in engineering, Karmasin worked for a short time as a clerk in Moravia, but soon the German organization Kameradschaftsbund sent him to Slovakia, where he became active in the Spiš German Party (Zipser Deutsche Partei [ZdP]). However, he soon left this organization. In 1927 he became secretary of the German Cultural Union (Deutsche Kulturverband), an organization operating throughout Slovakia, and he founded the Carpathian German Party (Karpatische Deutsche Partei [KdP]). After Hitler's rise to power in Germany in 1933, the KdP became the Slovak branch of the Sudeten German Party (Sudetendeutsche Partei [SdP]) of Konrad Henlein. The two parties submitted a joint list of candidates for the parliamentary elections of 1935, in which Karmasin obtained a seat in the Czechoslovak parliament. Two years later he became Henlein's deputy in Slovakia.

After the Czechoslovak authorities banned KdP activities in September 1938, Karmasin founded the German Party (Deutsche Partei [DP]), which became possible when Slovak autonomy was declared. He established his party along the lines of the Nazi party. In the Slovak autonomous government (1938–39) Karmasin served as secretary for the German minority. In February 1939, along with Vojtech Tuka, Karmasin was received by Hitler, to whom both declared their readiness to proclaim Slovak independence under the auspices of the Third Reich. On 14 March 1939 Karmasin organized anti-Czech actions and helped to provide arms for Hlinka's Guards (Hlinkova Garda [HG]). Also, on behalf of the German minority, he demanded the separation of Slovakia, in line with the strategic interests of the Third Reich. An established leader of the German minority, Karmasin sat in the Slovak parliament during World War II. He supported the pro-German orientation of the Slovak government and organized the recruitment of Slovak Germans into the SS units. During the Slovak National Uprising, Karmasin established Homeland Defense (Heimatschutz), a military organization that fought against the insurgents and took part in the persecution of the civil population. In April 1945, along with members of the Slovak government, Karmasin fled to Austria, where he remained in hiding under the name Franz Dibak. In June 1948 the National Court in Bratislava sentenced him to death in absentia, but in 1949 he managed to escape to the Federal Republic of Germany, whose authorities refused to extradite him. (PU)

Sources: Kdo byl kdo v našich dějinách ve 20. století, vol. 1 (Prague, 1998); Politická elita meziválečného Československa 1918–1938: Kdo byl kdo za první republiky (Prague, 1998); Kto bol kto za I. ČSR (Bratislava, 1993); Jerzy Tomaszewski, Czechosłowacja (Warsaw, 1997); SBS, vol. 3; Dušan Kovač, Dejiny Slovenska (Bratislava, 1998).

KÁROLYI Gyula (7 May 1871, Nyírbakta–23 April 1947, Budapest), Hungarian politician, count, cousin of Mihály

Károlyi. After graduating in law from the universities in Budapest, Berlin, and Bonn, Károlyi managed his landed estate in Arad (Oradea) Province in Transylvania. In 1905–18 he was a member of the Upper House. He took part in the so-called national opposition to the Géza Fejérváry government (1905–6). From 1906 to 1910, during the rule of the “national coalition,” Károlyi was governor of Arad city and province and a member of the opposition Constitutional Party (1913–18). During World War I he volunteered to fight on the Russian front. After the breakup of the Habsburg monarchy he withdrew to his estate. During the Hungarian Soviet Republic (HSR), from 5 May 1919, Károlyi headed a counter-government in Arad, then in Romania. The Romanian authorities inactivated this government and interned several of its members, including Károlyi, for two weeks. On 30 May 1919 Károlyi reconstructed his government in Szeged, occupied by the French troops. Into his government he invited Miklós Horthy, who became minister of national defense and head of the new Hungarian Army. Since the French found this cabinet “too reactionary,” they insisted on its transformation and opposed its activities against the HSR government in Budapest, so on 12 July 1919 Károlyi resigned.

In the 1920s Károlyi lived on his estates within Trianon Hungary. In 1927 he became a member of the reconstructed Upper House, and in 1928–30 he held a prestigious position in the crown guard. In December 1930 he became foreign minister, and on 24 August 1931, during the worst of the Great Depression, as a trusted aide to Horthy, Károlyi assumed the position of prime minister. Despite foreign exchange controls, reductions in budgetary spending, and tax increases, Károlyi’s government failed to overcome the depression, and it aggravated social discontent. After the Biatorbágy railway bridge was blown up in September 1931 and twenty-two people were killed, Károlyi introduced a state of emergency, believing that this was an act of Communist terrorism. In fact the perpetrator turned out to be a rightist extremist. After the execution of two Communist activists, Károlyi’s government found itself under strong pressure, not only from the opposition, but also from the leadership of the ruling Unity Party of István Bethlen. On 1 October 1932 Károlyi resigned, gave up his parliamentary mandate, and retired from political life. During World War II Károlyi belonged to the inner circle of Horthy advisers, supporting a separate peace treaty with the Western Allies and the cautious attempts of the Miklós Kállay government to leave the alliance with Germany. (JT)

Sources: Magyar Életrajzi Lexikon, vol. 1 (Budapest, 1967); Magyar Nagylexikon, vol. 10 (Budapest, 2000); Oszkar Jaszi, Revolution and Counterrevolution in Hungary (London, 1924); C.

A. Macartney, October Fifteenth: A History of Modern Hungary, vols. 1–2 (Edinburgh, 1957–61); Rudolf L. Tótkés, Bela Kun and the Hungarian Soviet Republic (New York, 1967); Paul Ignatus, Hungary (London, 1972); Steven Bela Vardy, Historical Dictionary of Hungary (Lanham, Md., 1997).

KÁROLYI Mihály (4 March 1875, Budapest–19 March 1955, Vence, France), count, Hungarian statesman. A member of an aristocratic family with a proud history, Károlyi was the son of Gyula and Georgina Károlyi, Gyula’s cousin. After graduating from a private high school, Károlyi studied law at the university in Budapest from 1893 to 1899. Initially, he was a member of the ruling Liberal Party (Szabadelvű Párt), but he soon clashed with István Tisza, who was prime minister and leader of the party; shortly before the elections of 1905 Károlyi joined the Party of Independence and 1848 (Függetlenségi és 48-as Párt), an opposition party that drew on the tradition of the Hungarian revolution of 1848–49. In 1909–12 Károlyi served as president of the All-National Hungarian Economic Union, which attracted the great landowners. From 1905 to 1906 and from 1910 to 1918 he was a member of parliament. When Tisza, the speaker of the parliament, overcame the opposition’s filibustering (June 1912), Károlyi became his implacable enemy. Károlyi represented opposition views particularly in international affairs, as he proposed a pro-Entente orientation instead of an alliance with Germany. Since he called for universal suffrage and cared about social issues, he stood out among his contemporary politicians of aristocratic origin.

Following a merger between the two factions of the independence movement, in 1913, Károlyi became leader of the Party of Independence and 1848, whose program called for the transformation of the Habsburg monarchy into a personal union. Although Károlyi was against World War I, in 1915 he served at the front for a short time. However, in December of that year in parliament, he insisted on the conclusion of peace. Since his party supported the war, in 1916, along with his followers, Károlyi founded the Independence Party of ’48. In respect to the war and social issues, Károlyi’s views became close to those of the Social Democrats and the bourgeois radicals. In 1917 Károlyi became president of the Suffrage Bloc, which called for universal suffrage and the secret ballot, and he urged the conclusion of peace without territorial annexations. At the beginning of 1918 Károlyi was accused of treason and collaboration with the enemy, but after the monarchy’s defeat, he became a leading figure of the republican revolution. On 24 October 1918 Károlyi was elected president of the Hungarian National Council (Magyar Nemzeti Tanács), which consisted mainly of Social Democrats and liberal radicals. On 31 October he was appointed prime minister and minister of foreign affairs, and on 25 November, minister of finance; from 12 to 29 December he served as minister of national defense. Assuming the office, Károlyi took an oath to “Hungary and the Hungarian nation” instead of to the king. Károlyi initiated peace negotiations with the Entente, as a result of which on 13 November he signed a cease-fire in Belgrade.

On 16 November 1918 Hungary was proclaimed an independent republic. Both as its prime minister and as president (from 11 January 1919) Károlyi failed to consolidate the country, whose economy was in ruins and whose society was in a state of turmoil. The country was surrounded by succession states that wanted to gain as much of the territory of the former monarchy as possible, including territories that were historically Hungarian. Because of this, Károlyi was sharply attacked both by the left and by the right. In February 1919, to mark the symbolic launch of an agrarian reform, Károlyi parceled out his own estate in Kápolna. His foreign policy suffered a defeat. On 20 March 1919 Károlyi received a note from French general Fernand Vix in which the administration and the remnants of the Hungarian Army were ordered to leave much of the territory of the Great Hungarian Plain under threat of a resumption of warfare. Károlyi dismissed the government and entrusted the mission of forming a new cabinet to the Social Democrats, who reached an agreement with the Communists and established the Ruling Revolutionary Council. On 21 March the council proclaimed the Hungarian Soviet Republic (HSR) and dismissed Károlyi from office.

In July 1919 Károlyi went to Czechoslovakia. He later lived in Italy, Yugoslavia, and London, and in 1925 he settled in Paris. He was an avowed opponent of the regime of Regent Miklós Horthy. In 1922 in Munich Károlyi published his memoirs, which appeared also in English as Fighting the World: The Struggle for Peace (1925). Tried in absentia in 1923 in Budapest, Károlyi was sentenced for “treason” and deprived of his property. In exile, he became a supporter of communism and the USSR. In 1931 he visited the Soviet Union. In 1938 he moved to London, where he was active in the Movement for New Democratic Hungary. This movement was established to work against Nazism. Károlyi also served as president of the Hungarian Council in England. At the end of the war, he cherished the hope that he would play an important role in Hungarian politics, but he had to be satisfied with an act of parliament proclaiming his historical merits, passed after the proclamation of the Hungarian Republic in February 1946, and a parliamentary seat given to him as a nonparty candidate. In that same year Károlyi returned to Hungary, where he was greeted with ceremony and received the Grand Cross of the Order of Merit of the Hungarian Republic, the most prestigious Hungarian award. The sentences he had been given in the trial of 1923 were quashed. In July 1947 Károlyi was appointed Hungary’s ambassador to Paris, but the day after the arrest of László Rajk in June 1949, he resigned and went into exile for the second time. He attempted to mobilize international public opinion against the organizers of Rajk’s show trial. At the end of his life Károlyi wrote an autobiography that was published in 1956 as Faith without Illusion. In 1962 his ashes were returned to Hungary and buried with ceremony in Budapest. (JT)

Sources: Biographisches Lexikon, vol. 3; Steven Bela Vardy, Historical Dictionary of Hungary (Lanham, Md., 1997); Nagy Képes Milleniumi Arcképcsarnok (Budapest, 1999); Magyar Nagylexikon, vol. 10 (Budapest, 2000); Magyarország 1944–1956, CD-ROM (Budapest, 2001); Oszkar Jaszi, Revolution and Counterrevolution in Hungary (London, 1924); C. A. Macartney, October Fifteenth: A History of Modern Hungary, vols. 1–2 (Edinburgh, 1957–61); Catherine Andrassy Karolyi, A Life Together (London, 1966); Rudolf L. Tótkés, Bela Kun and the Hungarian Soviet Republic (New York, 1967); Tibor Hajdu, Károlyi Mihály: Politikai életrajz (Budapest, 1978); Holger Fischer, Oszkar Jaszi und Mihály Károlyi (Munich, 1978).

KAROTAMM Nikolai (23 October 1901, Pärnu–26 September 1969, Moscow), Estonian Communist activist. The son of a carpenter, after the Bolshevik revolution Karotamm went to Russia. He studied in the Communist School for Western National Minorities in Leningrad. In 1928 he joined the Communist Party. He later worked in the Communist underground in Estonia and organized a party unit in Tallinn. In 1930 he again went to the USSR, where in 1933 he began lecturing and publishing in Moscow. Between 1935 and 1936 he worked in the Comintern, and from 1938 to 1940 he ran a technical school in Leningrad. After the incorporation of Estonia into the USSR in 1940, he became party secretary in Tartu and second secretary of the CC of the CP of Estonia. In June 1941 he took part in organizing the deportation of around ten thousand Estonians far into the interior of the USSR.

During the German-Soviet war Karotamm was chief of the Estonian staff of the Partisan Movement. When the Red Army again occupied Estonia, he was made first secretary of the CC of the Estonian Communist Party (Bolsheviks) in September 1944. He supervised the deportations of 1945. In 1948 Karotamm announced the collectivization of Estonian agriculture. Although it seems that he attempted to limit the extent and speed of collectivization, in January 1949 he informed Stalin that he was ready to “get rid of the kulaks as a class” through deportation. This action began on 23 March 1949. Deportation orders for about twenty-one thousand families were signed by Karotamm himself. In a short period about eighty thousand people were deported to Kazakhstan and to the Novosibirsk oblast (province). Because of the conditions under which the deportations were carried out, there was a high mortality rate among the deportees; thus the action can be described as planned genocide. As a result of a purge of the Estonian party leadership, in March 1950 Karotamm was dismissed from his post for “errors of rightist opportunism.” He worked in the Academy of Sciences of the CPSU CC and at the Institute for Economic Sciences of the USSR Academy of Sciences. In 1966 he received the title of professor. His publications include a Russian–Estonian dictionary (1944); Ekonomicheskaia effektivnost kapitalnykh vlozhenii (The economic effectiveness of capital investments; 1957); and K istorii ucheniia o sotsialisticheskom selskom khoziaistve (From the history of studies of the Socialist agricultural farm; 1959). In 1964 Karotamm received a Ph.D. in economics. (WR)

Sources: MERSH, vol. 16; Eesti NSV Kolhoosnikute Kongress Ist (Tallinn, 1948); Rein Taagepera, “Soviet Collectivization of Estonian Agriculture: The Deportation Phase,” Soviet Studies, 1980, no. 3; Romuald J. Misiunas and Rein Taagepera, The Baltic States: Years of Dependence, 1940–1980 (Berkeley, 1983); Voldemar Pinn, Kes oli Nikolai Karotamm? vols. 1–2 (Uppsala, 1996–97); www.sada.ee/php/query.

KARPENKA Henadz (17 September 1949, Minsk–6 April 1999, Minsk), Belarusian scientist and political activist. After graduating from the Belorussian Pedagogical Institute in 1972, Karpenka worked at the Institute of Nuclear Energy of the Academy of Sciences of the Belorussian SSR. In 1983–90 he was the director of the Powder Metallurgy Enterprise in Molodechno. From 1991 to 1994 he served as president of the Municipal Executive Committee in Molodechno; thus he was head of the local administration. In 1990 he earned a Ph.D. in metallurgical sciences and became a corresponding member of the National Academy of Sciences of Belorussia. He authored over one hundred publications in the field of metallurgy. In 1990–96 Karpenka was deputy to the Supreme Soviet of the Belorussian SSR, and in 1996 he became its vice-president. In November 1993 he disclosed a letter from Eduard Shirkovsky, head of the Belorussian KGB, and Vladimir Yegorov, minister of interior, to Stanislau Shushkevich, president of the Supreme Soviet, in which they criticized the reforms of the Belorussian state. After the election of Alyaksandr Lukashenka as president in July 1994, Karpenka joined the firm opposition to Lukashenka’s government. When Lukashenka established his own parliament, Karpenka remained a member of the Supreme Soviet, which was not recognized by Lukashenka, and he became a determined opponent of the regime.

In January 1997 he was elected president of the National Economic Council, which, along with other organizations independent from Lukashenka, became the foundation of a shadow cabinet. A co-founder of the United Civic Party, in December 1997 Karpenka became head of the National Executive Committee of the opposition. He died suddenly of a heart attack. (EM)

Sources: Jan Zaprudnik, Historical Dictionary of Belarus (Lanham, Md., 1998); David R. Marples, Belarus: A Denationalized Nation (Amsterdam, 1999); Kto est kto v Respublike Bielarus (Minsk, 1999).

KARPIŃSKI Stanisław (23 October 1870, Raducz–24 December 1943, Warsaw), Polish banker and politician. The son of a landowner, Karpiński graduated from the Leopold Kronenberg School of Commerce in Warsaw and from the Department of Economics of Leipzig University. In 1893 he started working in the Commercial Bank (Bank Handlowy) in Warsaw. In 1909 he was a co-founder of the Bank of Cooperative Societies (Bank Towarzystw Spółdzielczych), and then he served as the managing director of this bank from 1910 to 1918 and from 1919 to 1924. After the outbreak of World War I, Karpiński became more active in politics, and he assumed the post of treasurer of the Central Civic Committee. He gave many public lectures and published extensively on economic topics. In 1918 he became involved in preparing the principles of the financial system of the future Poland. In Projekt ustawy Banku Polskiego w związku ze sprawą waluty (The Bank of Poland bill and the currency issue; 1918) Karpiński advocated that the future Polish currency be based on the currencies of the partitioning powers. In November 1918, on behalf of the Polish state, he became head of the board of the Polish National Loan Association (Polska Krajowa Kasa Pożyczkowa), which had until then served as the bank of issue for the Kingdom of Poland under German occupation. In April 1919 Karpiński became minister of the treasury. Faced with the difficulty of increasing revenues and unable to stop inflation because of increased budgetary spending, he resigned in July 1919. A senator from the lists of the National Popular Union (Związek Ludowo-Narodowy [ZLN]) in 1922–27, he took part in the work of the Senate’s Treasury and Budget Commission.

Karpiński participated in consultations with former treasury ministers and President Stanisław Wojciechowski to work out a program for strengthening the treasury. Only Karpiński supported the proposals of Władysław Grabski; therefore, when Grabski became prime minister, he appointed Karpiński president of the Organization Committee of the new Bank of Poland in January 1924 and chairman of the bank on 29 April of that year. For half a year Karpiński worked closely with Grabski, but in November 1925 he refused any further stock market interventions to maintain the Polish zloty, which was threatened by a growing “second inflation.” This led to the resignation of Grabski, who later sharply criticized Karpiński for his decision. In May 1927 Karpiński explained the reasons for his decision in a special open letter. He was against allowing foreign capital into the central bank, and he defended the independence of the Bank of Poland from the government. This, in turn, led to a conflict with the sanacja government because Józef Piłsudski wanted to subordinate the central bank to the executive power. Thus, when in 1929 Karpiński’s five-year term ended, its extension was not even contemplated. Karpiński retired from public life. In 1931 he published Pamiętnik dziesięciolecia 1915–1924 (Memoirs of the decade 1915–1924). (WR)

Sources: PSB, vol. 12; Encyklopedia historii Drugiej Rzeczypospolitej (Warsaw, 1999); Jerzy Tomaszewski, Stabilizacja waluty w Polsce (Warsaw, 1961); Zygmunt Karpiński, O Wielkopolsce, złocie i dalekich podróżach (Warsaw, 1971); Feliks Młynarski, Wspomnienia (Warsaw, 1971).

KARSKI Jan [originally Koziulewski] (24 April 1914, Łódź–13 July 2000, Washington, D.C.), courier of the Polish underground during World War II, political scientist. After completing law and diplomatic studies at Jan Kazimierz University in Lwów (Lviv), Karski began working at the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. He fought in the September campaign in 1939. Captured and placed in a Soviet prison, he managed to escape from a transport to the East. He got to Warsaw, where he joined the Polish anti-Nazi underground. He was also active in the Front for the Rebirth of Poland (Front Odrodzenia Polski), which was a Catholic underground organization, and the Information Bureau of the Home Army High Command. Arrested by the Gestapo and tortured, Karski tried to commit suicide because he feared that he might reveal secret information to the Germans, but he was saved. He was soon sprung by Home Army soldiers. After recuperating, he resumed his underground work. In August 1942 in the Warsaw Ghetto, he met Leon Feiner, an activist and representative of the Bund to the Home Delegation of the Polish Government-in-Exile (Delegatura Rządu na Kraj). Feiner asked Karski to relay the Jewish demands to the leaders of the Big Three. These demands included a declaration that preventing the Holocaust would be one of the aims of the war against the Third Reich. As a representative of the Home Delegation, Karski went to Great Britain and the United States to report on the extermination of Jews and to present Jewish demands to the Allied leaders. At the beginning of 1943

he was received by British foreign secretary Anthony Eden, President Franklin D. Roosevelt, U.S. secretary of state Cordell Hull, and leaders of American Jews, but Karski failed to make them believe the shocking reports about the Holocaust or to convince them to take action in defense of European Jews. After the war, Karski remained in the United States, where in 1952 he began lecturing in international relations and in the theory of communism at Georgetown University in Washington, D.C. His publications include The Story of the Secret State (1944), and The Great Powers and Poland 1919–1945: From Versailles to Yalta (1985). (WR) Sources: Jan Nowak Jeziorański, Kurier z Warszawy (Kraków, 1993); New York Times, 15 July 2000; Gwiazda Polarna, 19 July 2000; Tadeusz Zachurski, “Świadek Jan Karski (1914–2000),” Wprost, 23 July 2000.

KARVAŠ Imrich (25 February 1903, Levice-Kalinčiakovo–22 February 1981, Bratislava), Slovak lawyer and economist. In 1925 Karvaš graduated in law from Komenský University in Bratislava, where he became a docent (associate professor) in 1930 and a university professor in 1940. He mainly dealt with economic law, both in teaching and in his practice. From 1926 to 1930 Karvaš was secretary of the Chamber of Commerce and Industry in Bratislava; from 1930 to 1933 he was secretary of the Union of Slovak Banks; from 1932 to 1938 he was general secretary of the National Economic Institute of Slovakia and Carpathian Ruthenia; and from 1936 to 1938 he was vice-president of the Export Institute in Prague. In 1938 he served for a short time as minister without portfolio and later as minister of industry, trade, and craft in the government of General Jan Syrový. After the establishment of the Slovak state in March 1939, Karvaš became chairman of the Slovak National Bank. In 1942 he was also appointed chairman of the Supreme Office for Supplies. In 1940 he established the School of Economics in Bratislava. He worked with the Slovak resistance and maintained contacts with the group led by Vavro Šrobár and the Slovak National Council. Karvaš ordered that a part of the treasury of the Slovak National Bank be transferred from Bratislava to Banská Bystrica so that the insurgents could use it. Following the disclosure of his contacts with the resistance in September 1944, Karvaš spent the rest of the war in Nazi concentration camps.

After returning home, Karvaš served as dean of the School of Law at the university in Bratislava from 1947 to 1948 and as government adviser for the reconstruction of Slovakia from 1945 to 1948. After the Communist coup of February 1948, he refused to cooperate with the regime. Accused of high treason in 1949, he was sentenced to two years' imprisonment and the forfeiture of property. After one year he was released but was forced to leave Bratislava in 1953. In 1958 Karvaš was arrested again and sentenced to seventeen years in prison for espionage and high treason. Released under amnesty in 1960, he was rehabilitated by court order in 1969. In his scholarly views, Karvaš was a follower of the teleological school of Karel Engliš and was the main ideologist of Slovak regionalism. He advocated the economic development of Slovakia as a separate territorial entity and called for the improvement of Slovakia's position in the Czechoslovak state. In 1926 he was a co-founder of Hospodárske rozhl'ady, the first Slovak economic periodical, and in 1939 he became its editor-in-chief. Karvaš was the author of such works as Hospodárska štatistika Slovenska (Economic statistics of Slovakia; 1928); Štátne príjmy a konjunktúra (State revenues and economic growth; 1931); Kartely a konjunktúra (The influence of cartels on economic prosperity; 1932); Čas v hospodárskej teórii (Time in the theory of economics; 1938); and Základy hospodárskej vedy (The basics of economic science, 2 vols.; 1947). (PU)

Sources: ČBS; Politická elita meziválečného Československa 1918–1938: Kdo byl kdo za první republiky (Prague, 1998); SBS, vol. 3 (Martin, 1989); Reprezentačný biografický lexikón Slovenska (Martin, 1999); Stanislav J. Kirschbaum, A History of Slovakia (London, 1995); Peter A. Toma and Dušan Kovač, Slovakia from Samo to Dzurinda (Stanford, 2001); Rudolf Chmel, ed., Kwestia slowacka w XX wieku (Gliwice, 2002); http://www.muzeumsnp.sk/karvas_s.htm.

KAŠPAR Karel (16 May 1870, Mirošov, near Roky-cany–21 April 1941, Prague), Czech cardinal, Primate of Bohemia. After studying theology and philosophy in Rome in 1888–93, Kašpar was ordained a priest. In 1896–98 he continued his education, studying law at the Pontifical Institute of St. Apollinaris (now known as the Pontifical Lateran University). At that time he wrote the famous work Církevní zákonodárství v náboženských kongregacích (Church legislation in religious congregations, 2 vols.; 1903–4). After returning to Bohemia, Kašpar lectured at a theological seminary in Prague, and from 1907 to 1920 he was a canon of the Prague metropolitan chapter. In 1920 he was consecrated bishop, and the following year he was appointed diocesan bishop of Hradec Kralové. In 1926 he attended the Eucharistic Congress in the United States, and in 1930 he traveled to Palestine and Egypt, as a result of which he wrote Po stopach božského Spasitele v Egyptě a Svaté zemi (Tracing the Holy Savior in Egypt and the Holy Land; 1931). Kašpar's moderation and diplomatic talents helped to improve relations between the Czechoslovak state and the Catholic Church. In 1931 he was appointed archbishop of Prague and Primate of Bohemia, and in 1935 he was made a cardinal; domestically this was seen as the Holy See's recognition of Czechoslovakia. During the Sudeten crisis of 1938 Kašpar called for a peaceful settlement of the conflict. His efforts included meeting with the British mediator, Lord Walter Runciman. Following the partition of Czechoslovakia in 1938 and 1939, Kašpar tried to raise the spirits of the Czech people, and he supported efforts aimed at the sovereignty of Czechoslovakia. (WR)

Sources: ČBS; Josef Tomeš et al., Česky Biografický Slovník XX. století (Prague, 1999); Charles Roux, Huit ans au Vatican (Paris, 1947).

KASPRZYCKI Tadeusz (16 January 1891, Warsaw–4 December 1978, Montreal), Polish general. In 1910 Kasprzycki began studies in the social sciences, natural sciences, and law at the Sorbonne and at the School of Social Sciences in Paris. In 1911 he joined the Union of Active Struggle (Związek Walki Czynnej [ZWC]). He was commander of a ZWC unit in Paris and commander of ZWC units in the district of Switzerland and southern France. In 1912 he switched to studying in Geneva, where he founded a Riflemen's Association. He also organized a riflemen's movement in the Russian sector of partitioned Poland. In 1913 Kasprzycki completed an officers' summer school run by the Riflemen's Association. In July 1914 he served as commander of an officers' summer school in Oleandry, near Kraków. Closely connected with Józef Piłsudski, in August 1914 Kasprzycki became commander of the First Cadre Company of the First Brigade of the Polish Legions. His company was involved in an unsuccessful attempt to instigate an anti-Russian uprising in the Kingdom of Poland. In September 1915 Kasprzycki was transferred to work in the Polish Military Organization (Polska Organizacja Wojskowa [POW]). He served as POW commander in Warsaw and Lublin. In 1917 he founded the Union of Polish Military Organizations. From January to July 1917 he acted as head of the general and organizational section of the Military Commission of the Provisional Council of State. He co-founded the Convention of Organization A (Konwent Organizacji A), a group that led the independence movement. From 1918 he served in the Polish Army.

After Piłsudski returned from Magdeburg to Warsaw in November 1918, Kasprzycki became his aide-de-camp. From the beginning of December 1918 to November 1919, as a lieutenant colonel, he served as chief of the general aide-de-camp section of the Head of State and Commander-in-Chief. In 1921 he graduated from the Military College and from the Diplomatic Department of the École des Sciences Politiques in Paris. Upon his return he was promoted to colonel. From March 1922 Kasprzycki held various posts in the General Staff; in 1926 he became head of the Office of the Supreme Council of War; and in July 1927 he became head of the Second Department of the General Staff (intelligence). From 1927 to 1931 Kasprzycki served as commander of the Nineteenth Infantry Division. He was a Polish delegate to the disarmament conference and to the Preparatory Consultative Commission of the League of Nations. In 1929 he was promoted to brigadier general. In July 1934 he was appointed deputy minister for military affairs, and after Piłsudski's death, he became minister for military affairs in October 1935. In 1936 he was promoted to major general. In September 1939 Kasprzycki left Poland with the government and traveled via Romania, Turkey, and France to Great Britain. He co-founded the Polish University in Exile. He was a member of the Józef Piłsudski Institute and other organizations. In 1954 he settled in Canada. In exile, he did not take part in active politics. Kasprzycki was the author of Kartki z dziennika oficera I Brygady (Pages from the diary of an officer of the First Brigade; 1934). (JS)

Sources: Kto był kim w Drugiej Rzeczypospolitej (Warsaw, 1994); Tomasz Nałęcz, Polska Organizacja Wojskowa 1914–1918 (Warsaw, 1984); Piotr Stawecki, Słownik biograficzny generałów Wojska Polskiego, 1918–1939 (Warsaw, 1994); Encyklopedia historii Drugiej Rzeczypospolitej (Warsaw, 1999); Zbigniew Mierzwiński, Generałowie II Rzeczypospolitej (Warsaw, 1995); Tadeusz Kryskarski and Stanisław Żurkowski, Generałowie Polski Niepodległej (London, 1976); “Śp. generał Tadeusz Kasprzycki,” Niepodległość, 1980, vol. 13.

KASSÁK Lajos (21 March 1887, Érsekújvár [now in Slovakia]–22 July 1967, Budapest), Hungarian poet and writer. Kassák's father, who was of Slovak origin, worked as a drugstore assistant, and his mother was a washerwoman. Having dropped out of secondary school, Kassák became an apprentice locksmith and worked as a blue-collar laborer. He was active in the trade union movement and in the Social Democratic Party. He organized strikes, and because of this he was often dismissed from work. An autodidact, Kassák became interested in poetry. He published his first piece of work in 1905. In 1909, without money, he set off on foot to Paris. On the way he did many odd jobs. In 1910 he was deported from Paris by the Hungarian legation. These experiences shaped his avant-garde understanding of esthetics, as well as his program for an artistic revolution. In 1915 Kassák published the first volume of his poems and founded a periodical, Tett. In 1916 he began editing the periodical Ma. Under the Hungarian Soviet Republic (HSR) in 1919 Kassák was a member of the leadership of the writers' directorate. However, because he criticized the regime and its cultural policy, the government suspended Ma. After the collapse of the HSR in August 1919 Kassák was arrested. Released in 1920, he left for Vienna, where he again edited Ma. This journal soon gained international fame. Kassák's poems reveal the influences of futurism, and his paintings reflect the influences of constructivism and cubism. In 1926 Kassák returned to Hungary; edited the periodicals Dokumentum and Munka; and published his autobiography, Egy ember élete (A man's life). He also wrote for the Social Democratic daily, Népszava, and for the periodical Szocializmus. In 1940 he was sentenced to two months' imprisonment.

In 1946 Kassák became vice-president of the Hungarian Arts Council. As a prominent artist, on his sixtieth birthday he was given a pension and a house in Budapest. In 1947 he became president of the Arts Commission of the Hungarian Social Democratic Party (HSDP). In January 1948, as a party representative, he became an MP, replacing a person who had been forced to resign. In 1948 Kassák joined the Hungarian Workers' Party (HWP), which was a Communist party. In 1949 Kassák fell into disfavor, and his works ceased to be published. At a party meeting of the Hungarian Writers' Union in September 1953, Kassák criticized the HWP cultural policy, and as a result he was expelled from the party. In 1956 he resumed his artistic work. At a general meeting of the Writers' Union in September of that year he was elected to its Presidium. In 1965 Kassák received the Kossuth Award. The Kassák Lajos Museum in Budapest is in charge of his literary and artistic legacy. (JT)

Sources: Lajos Kassak Retrospective Exhibition, April–May 1984 (New York, 1984); A magyar forradalom és szabadságharc enciklopédiája (Budapest, 1999); Magyar Nagylexikon, vol. 10 (Budapest, 2000).

KAVAN Jan (17 October 1946, London), Czech journalist and politician. Kavan is the son of an Englishwoman and a Czech diplomat who was imprisoned in 1952–55 in connection with the case of Rudolf Slansky. In 1964–68 he studied in the Department of Education and Journalism of Charles University in Prague, contributing to the periodicals Mladá fronta, Student, and My. In 1966–68 he edited the periodical Universita Karlova. Kavan was active in the student opposition, and in 1968–69 he was a member of the Presidium of the Union of Higher School Students. In January 1969 he co-organized the funeral of Jan Palach. Expelled from the university, Kavan emigrated to Great Britain, where he studied at St. Anthony College in Oxford, the London School of Economics and Political Science (1970–74), and Reading University. He wrote for British and American newspapers (The Times, The Observer, the New York Times, and New Statesman), and he was active in the leftist student movement. In 1974–90 Kavan directed the Palach Press Agency; from 1982 to 1989 he was deputy director of the Jan Palach Information and Research Trust; and from 1985 to 1990 he was deputy editor-in-chief of the East European Reporter and vice-president of the East European Cultural Foundation. From 1982 to 1990 he was a member of the British Labour Party. Kavan maintained contacts with the Czechoslovak opposition, operating a channel through which émigré publications and duplication equipment could enter his homeland. In 1979 he was deprived of Czechoslovak citizenship.

On 25 November 1989 Kavan returned to Prague and joined the Coordination Center of the Civic Forum (Občanské Fórum [OF]). From June 1990 to June 1992 he was an MP to the Chamber of the People of the Federal Assembly and a member of its foreign affairs commission. In the spring of 1991, to explain the events of 17 November 1989, the commission accused Kavan of cooperation with the Communist security service, but in 1996 he was cleared of these charges. In 1992–93 Kavan lectured at American universities, and upon his return to the Czech Republic in 1993 he joined the Czech Social Democratic Party (Česká Strana Sociálně Demokratická [ČSSD]) and chaired its foreign affairs department. In November 1996 he was elected to the Senate, and after the electoral victory of the Social Democrats in July 1998 he became minister of foreign affairs in the government of Miloš Zeman. From 10 December 1999 Kavan was also deputy prime minister. His major achievement was the accession of the Czech Republic to NATO on 12 March 1999. Kavan also initiated a renewal of cooperation within the Višegrad Group (Czech Republic, Hungary, Poland, and Slovakia), neglected by the previous government of Václav Klaus. After a repeat victory of the Social Democrats in the elections of June 2002, Kavan won a parliamentary seat and belonged to the foreign affairs commission, but he did not stay in the government. In the summer of 2002 Kavan was accused of shielding the corruption of his subordinate, Karel Srba, who was also suspected of ordering a political murder. (PU)

Sources: ČBS; Kdo je kdo v České Republice na přelomu 20. století (Prague, 1998); “Co wiedział Jan Kavan,” Rzeczpospolita, 24 July 2002; www.vlada.cz/1250/vlada/vlada_clenove.htm.

KAVČIĆ Stane (30 October 1919, Ljubljana–27 March 1987, Ljubljana), Slovene Communist activist. Kavčič joined the Communist Party in July 1941. During the war he served as, among other things, secretary of a party district committee in Vrhnika. He underwent training in the USSR. After the war, he became secretary of the Central Committee (CC) of the Communist Party of Slovenia (1945–49). Subsequently, he held the position of vice-president of the Presidium of the People’s Assembly of the People’s Republic of Slovenia (1949–50) and vice-president of the Executive Committee, which served as the government of the Socialist Republic of Slovenia (1951–56). Secretary of the chief committee of the Socialist Union of the Working People of Slovenia (1956–58) and president of the Council of Slovenian Trade Unions (1958–63), Kavčič headed the commission for ideological affairs of the CC of the League of Communists of Slovenia (1963–66) and the government of the federal Republic of Slovenia (1967–72). He was a member of the Executive Committee of the League of Communists of Yugoslavia (LCY) in 1966 and a member of the Presidium of the LCY in 1969–72. He also belonged to the CC of the League of Communists of Slovenia (1967–69).

In the 1960s and 1970s Kavčič favored an export-oriented, liberal, and decentralized economy. He strove to develop cooperation between Slovenia and its Western neighbors. His views, which were considered insufficiently class-conscious and Yugoslav, led to a conflict with some of the Slovene and Yugoslav leaders. After the so-called Croat spring of 1971, the Presidium of the LCY decided that the “Croat spring” had been initiated by people with pro-Western views, as well as nationalists and extreme liberals. In the face of a change of policy and the consolidation of the leading role of the party, Kavčič was dismissed as president of the government of the Slovene Republic. He also resigned from the Presidium of the LCY and then retired. He had to withdraw from politics and public life. Kavčič wrote Samoupravljanje (Self-management, 4 vols.; 1964–67). His Dnevnik in spomini (Diary and memoirs; 1988) was published posthumously. (AO)

Sources: Enciklopedija Slovenije, vol. 5 (Ljubljana, 1991); Wiesław Walkiewicz, Jugostawia (Warsaw, 2000); Who’s Who in the Socialist Countries of Europe, vol. 2 (Munich, London, and Paris, 1989); Sabrina P. Ramet, Nationalism and Federalism in Yugoslavia, 1962–1991 (Bloomington, 1992); Leopoldina Plut-Pregelj and Carole Rogel, Historical Dictionary of Slovenia (Lanham, Md., 1996).

KAZASOV Dimo (5 October 1886, Trjavna–28 July 1980, Sofia), Bulgarian writer and politician. The son of a teacher, after graduating from a gymnasium in Ruse in 1907, Kazasov also worked as a teacher. In 1918 he completed law studies at Sofia University. In his youth he was aligned with the Narodnik movement and later with the Social Democratic movement. In 1895 he joined the trade union movement, and from 1910 to 1919 he served as president of the Bulgarian Teachers’ Union. Shortly after the war, Kazasov became an MP on behalf of the Social Democratic Party. In 1919–20, along with the Communists, he organized strikes of transportation workers that were crushed by the government. Later, he conspired against the government of Aleksandur Stambolyski. After the overthrow of Stambolyski in June 1923, Kazasov assumed the portfolio of minister of post and communication in the cabinet of Aleksandur Tsankov. In this role, he helped to suppress a revolutionary Communist uprising in September 1923. However, in February 1924 he left the government and joined the opposition. In 1924–28 Kazasov served as president of the Bulgarian Journalists' Union, and he published a great deal. In 1927 he was a co-founder of the Zveno group, which advocated the establishment of an authoritarian state. The Zveno group maintained close contacts with other influential organizations such as the Military League. In May 1934 the groups linked to Zveno and the Military League staged a coup d'état. At this point, Kazasov left Zveno and joined the National Social Movement (NSM) led by Tsankov. After Tsar Boris III dismissed the government of Kimon Georgiev in January 1935, Kazasov became Bulgaria's ambassador to Yugoslavia. After returning to Bulgaria in 1936, he again drifted to the left. At that time he published Dneshna Yugoslaviia (Today's Yugoslavia; 1938) and other works. In 1940 he opposed the anti-Jewish legislation that was being passed. He served as chairman of the Committee for Victims of Political Persecution. In 1943 he joined the Communist-led underground Fatherland Front. After the coup of 9 September 1944, Kazasov worked with the Communists. In the government of Kimon Georgiev, he served as minister of propaganda (September 1944–September 1945), and from September 1945 to December 1947 he held the post of minister for information and arts. From 1950 to 1958 he was head of the publishing operations of the government. Until the end of his life Kazasov wrote and published memoirs and comments on the recent history of Bulgaria. In 1987 his memoirs, Iskri ot burni godini (Sparks of the turbulent years), were published. (JJ/MC)

Sources: Biographisches Lexikon, vol. 2; Entsiklopediya Bulgariya, vol. 3 (Sofia, 1982); Vicki Tamir, Bulgaria and Her Jews: The History of a Dubious Symbiosis (New York, 1979); Robert J. McIntyre, Bulgaria: Politics, Economics and Society (London and New York, 1988); Boika Vasileva, Evreite v Bylgaria, 1944–1952 (Sofia, 1992); Tzvetan Todorov, ed., The Fragility of Goodness: Why Bulgaria's Jews Survived the Holocaust (London, 1999).

KAZLOUSKI Pavel (9 March 1942, Vaukaunia, near Pruzhany–2000?), Belorussian Soviet general. Kazlouski graduated from the School of Commanders in Tashkent in 1965, from the Frunze Military Academy in 1974, and from the General Staff Academy in 1987. He did military service in Central Asia, Transcaucasia, and the North Caucasian District. In 1989 he became commander of the Twenty-eighth Army, which was headquartered in Grodno. In 1991 he became chief of staff and deputy commander of the Belorussian Military District. Despite the fact that in August 1991 he supported the Moscow coup staged by Gennady Yanayev, which nearly cost him expulsion from the army, Kazlouski retained his position and served as minister of national defense of the Republic of Belarus from 1991 to 1994. He opposed the Beloruthenization and de-Sovietization of the military. At that time he planned to negotiate concessions from the West in exchange for Belarus' giving up nuclear weapons. In 1996 he joined the opposition against Alyaksandr Lukashenka. Kazlouski disappeared without a trace, kidnapped by "unknown assailants" in a street in Minsk. (EM)

Sources: Entsyklopedyia historii Belarusi, vol. 4 (Minsk, 1997); Jan Zaprudnik, Belarus: At a Crossroads in History (Boulder, Colo., 1993); Jan Zaprudnik, Historical Dictionary of Belarus (Lanham, Md., 1998).

KEBICH Vyacheslau (10 June 1936, Koniuszewszczyzna), Belorussian Communist and post-Communist activist. Kebich graduated from the Belorussian Polytechnic Institute in 1958 and the Higher Party School in Minsk in 1984. He worked as an engineer in the Minsk Factory of Automation of Factories, and from 1973 he was director of the Minsk Factory of Machine Tools. In 1980–85 Kebich started working in the party apparatus. He was secretary of the Minsk Regional Committee of the Communist Party of Belorussia (CPB) and head of the Department of Industry of its Central Committee (CC). In 1985 he became deputy prime minister of the Belorussian SSR (BSSR) and head of its Planning Commission. In 1986–91 he was a member of the CPB CC, and in 1990–91 he belonged to the CC of the CPSU. In April 1990 Kebich became prime minister of the BSSR. After the proclamation of independence of the republic on 25 July 1991, in November 1991 Kebich signed a statement from the government of the "Republic of Belarus" that the Soviet "super empire" had collapsed. On 8 December 1991, Kebich and the chairman of the BSSR Supreme Council, Stanislau Shushkevich, were the Belorussian signatories of the agreement with the Ukraine and Russia dissolving the Soviet Union. Initially Kebich supported a market orientation in the country's internal transformation and favored seeking economic and political links with the West, but in view of a worsening financial situation and a dramatic decline in economic activity, in 1993 he decided to reorient Belorussian policy toward Russia. Kebich ruled by means of his "power party." He was the actual head of state and a favorite in the presidential elections of July 1994. Nevertheless, he lost to Alyaksandr Lukashenka, who outdid him with demagogic and populist slogans, especially on the theme of combating corruption. After his resignation from the government on 21 July 1994, Kebich was chairman of the Belorussian Trade and Finance Association, and from 1996 he was an MP. (EM)

Sources: Kto iest kto v Respublike Belarus (Minsk, 1999); Bielaruskaiya entsyklapiiedyia, vol. 8 (Minsk, 1999); Jan Zaprudnik, Belarus: At a Crossroads in History (Boulder, Colo., 1993); Siergiej Owsiannik and Jelena Strielkova, Władza a społeczeństwo: Białoruś 1991–1998 (Warsaw, 1998); David R. Marples, Belarus: A Denationalized Nation (Amsterdam, 1999).

KELAM Tunne (10 July 1936, Taheva), Estonian politician. Kelam graduated in history from the University of Tartu in 1959, following which he worked in the Main Historical Archives of the Estonian SSR. In 1965–75 he worked for the Estonian Encyclopedia Press (Eesti Nõukogude Entsüklopeedia) and the Valgus Press. From the end of the 1960s he was active in the human rights movement, and in the early 1970s he organized an independent philosophical seminar. Kelam planned to send a memorandum to the United Nations and its general secretary, Kurt Waldheim, demanding the restitution of Estonian independence based on the 1920 borders. The authors of the memorandum were discovered by the KGB in 1975, and it led to several arrests. Kelam avoided imprisonment but was fired from his job, and in 1980–88 he worked on a state farm (sovkhoz) in Ranna.

In January 1988 Kelam co-founded the Estonian National Independence Party (Eesti Rahvusliku Sõltumatuse Partei [ERSP]), whose program included demands for wider autonomy and, later, the restitution of Estonian independence. The party recognized the Estonian SSR as a product of Soviet occupation and acknowledged Estonian citizenship only for those who had had it in 1940, as well as their descendants. The ERSP did not admit Communist Party members. The ERSP demanded a stop to the immigration that was aimed at the Russification of Estonia, an explanation of the “blank spots” in recent history, and an improvement in the quality of the natural environment. Because of his criticism of the Popular Front of Estonia, which supported perestroika, Kelam was perceived at home and abroad as a “rightist extremist.” Nevertheless, his efforts to create civic committees as alternative administrative structures and the registration of people entitled to Estonian citizenship according to the above-mentioned criterion, which started in February 1989, ended in success. In February 1990 the pro-independence parties held elections to the Estonian Congress, which was meant as an alternative to the Supreme Council of the Estonian SSR. Kelam became the chairman of the congress but entered into a complicated game, recognizing the Supreme Council as a provisional authority acting under the congress’ supervision until the complete restitution of independence. Kelam deemed the steps taken by the Supreme Council chairman, Arnold Rüütel, and Prime Minister Edgar Savisaar as too conciliatory to the Kremlin, so he tried to remove them from power but failed. He then returned to the idea of cooperation with the Supreme Council; after the failure of the Moscow putsch in August 1991, both bodies delegated their representatives to the Constituent Assembly (Põhiseaduse Assamblee).

Kelam and his party were defeated in the first parliamentary elections after Estonia regained independence, in September 1992, gaining only 7 percent of the vote. Fragmentation in the parliament allowed Kelam to win the position of deputy speaker. In the government of Mart Laar the ERSP won four ministerial portfolios. Later the anti-Communist rhetoric of the ERSP softened, and after the resignation of its defense minister the party faced a crisis. Some of its activists vetoed the election of Kelam as chairman, accusing him of a departure from the original program—for instance, by his giving up de-Communization and tolerating non-citizens in high administrative positions and in the police in particular. Before the elections of 1995 Kelam entered into a coalition with the Pro Patria Union (Isamaaliit) of Laar, but the coalition won only 8 percent of the vote. As a result, Kelam resigned as the ERSP leader. He retained only the position of deputy speaker of parliament. In 1996 he ran in the presidential elections but lost. (AG)

Sources: Eesti entsüklopeedia, vol. 14 (Tallinn, 2000); Rein Taagepera, Estonia: Return to Independence (Boulder, Colo., 1993); Eastern Europe and the Commonwealth of Independent States, 1999 (London, 1999); republika.pl/darski1/kraje/estonia/chronb.htm; www.riigikogu.ee/parliament.html.

KËLCYRA Ali bey [originally Klisura Ali] (28 May 1891, Këlcyrë–24 September 1963, Rome), Albanian politician and lawyer. Këlcyra studied in Istanbul and earned a Ph.D. in law in Rome in 1919. In May 1920 he was one of the organizers of an action that aimed at pushing the Italians out of the Tepelene area. He served as an MP from 1921 to 1924. A gifted speaker who often resorted to demagoguery, he was considered an opponent of aristocratic rule and a supporter of democratization. Këlcyra belonged to a group that initiated the revolution of 1924. After the failure of the revolution, he left Albania and co-founded the National Union (Bashkimi Kombëtar). At that time, he mainly lived in Paris. Këlcyra returned to Albania in the 1930s. He belonged to a group of politicians with whom the Italians conducted exploratory talks before their 1939 aggression. In November 1942 Këlcyra was one of the founders of the National Front (Balli Kombëtar), an underground organization that was in competition with the Communist National Liberation Front. Këlcyra's reputation suffered as a result of his involvement with the Albanian administration, which collaborated with the Italians, and also because he had signed an agreement with General Lorenzo Dalmazzo, commander of the Italian Ninth Army (the so-called Dalmazzo-Këlcyra agreement) that was a kind of non-aggression pact that gave the Italians a free hand in operations against the Communists in the southern part of the country. (Some historians deny the existence of this agreement.) On 23 October 1944 Këlcyra was evacuated on a fishing boat from Shkodër to Brindisi. In exile, he was active in the revived National Front. In 1950 he brought about a crisis in this organization, and he was accused by some of its leaders of crypto-communism. The splinter groups established the Albanian Democratic Union. In 1953 Këlcyra became a member of the Radio Free Europe Committee, and he worked in the Albanian section. (TC)

Sources: Biographisches Lexikon, vol. 2; Ekrem Bey Vlora, Lebenserinnerungen, vols. 1–2 (Munich, 1968–73); William Bland and Ian Price, A Tangled Web: A History of Anglo-American Relations with Albania (1912–1955) (London, 1986); Michael Schmidt-Neke, Entstehung und Ausbau der Königsdiktatur in Albanien (1912–1939), Regierungsbildungen, Herrschaftsweisen und Machteliten in Einen Jungen Balkanstaat (Munich, 1987); Sejfi Vllamasi, Ballafaqime politike në Shqipëri (1897–1942) (Tirana, 1995).

KELMENDI Ali (3 November 1900, Pejë [Peć]–11 February 1939, Paris), Albanian Communist activist. Born into the family of an agricultural worker, Kelmendi attended an Albanian school in Pejë. In 1920 he joined a Socialist group that was active in Pejë. After the elections to the parliament of the Kingdom of Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes, in which he failed to obtain a seat, in July 1921 Kelmendi illegally crossed the border and arrived in Shkodër. In 1922 he was one of the co-organizers of the radical youth union called Bashkimi (Union), and he served as commander of the gendarmerie headquarters in Krumë. Kelmendi became politically involved in the support of Fan Noli and Bajram Curri. During the revolution of 1924 he fought against the local gendarmerie commander, who did not subordinate himself to the revolutionary government. After the collapse of the revolution Kelmendi went to Bari and from there a few months later to Vienna, where he joined a leftist organization, the National Revolutionary Committee (Komiteti Nacional Revolucionar [KONARE]). In June 1925 he arrived in Pejë to acquaint himself with the situation of the Albanians in Kosovo, but because he was kept under police surveillance, after a few months he returned to Vienna. In October 1925 the KONARE leadership selected Kelmendi as one of the fourteen activists who went for training to the USSR, where, in the “villa of Prince Yusupov” and in other places in Leningrad, they underwent special training. Trained in border control, under the name of “Rezinov” Kelmendi served as a trainee in Odessa and then worked as a blue-collar laborer in Leningrad, where he simultaneously continued his education at a Comintern school.

As a Comintern envoy, Kelmendi returned to Albania in 1930. He set off to establish the first Albanian Communist group. Despite persistent agitation in Tirana, Elbasa, Kruji, and Vlorë, he failed to unite several fractious groups into one uniform party. In 1932–35 Kelmendi was arrested and imprisoned several times. Released, he went to Turkey to establish cooperation with the local Communist activists. In June 1936 he illegally arrived in Albania for the last time, but after three days he was arrested and expelled without the right to return. After a short stay in Paris, Kelmendi returned to Moscow and worked for a few months in the Balkan section of the Comintern. Because of the ongoing war in Spain, he was sent to France, where he established recruitment centers and tried to convince the Albanians who lived in France to fight on the side of the Spanish republican government. Under the pseudonym “Çuni,” he also wrote articles for the leftist press. Suffering from tuberculosis, Kelmendi died as a result of complications after a lung operation. The view promoted by Communist propaganda—that is, that Kelmendi met Enver Hoxha in Albania and recognized Hoxha as his successor—remains unconfirmed. (TC)

Sources: Biographisches Lexikon, vol. 2; Fjalor Enciklopedik Shqiptar (Tirana, 1985); Ali Kelmendi: Militant i shquar i levizjes komuniste shqiptarë (Tirana, 1960); Kersta Aleksić, Ali Kelmendi (Prishtina, 1970); Reginald Hibbert, Albania's National Liberation Struggle: The Bitter Victory (London and New York, 1991).

KEMALI Ismail Vlorë bey (16 January 1844, Valona [Vlorë]–24 January 1919, Perugia), head of the first government of Albania. A descendant of a powerful Albanian family and the grandson of one of the leaders of the 1829 insurrection, Kemali was the son of Mahmud bey Vlorë. He graduated from Zosima Gymnasium in Ioánnina, where he mastered French, Greek, Turkish, and Italian. He later studied law and worked in the Turkish administration in northern Greece and Bulgaria thanks to the support of his uncle, Midhat Pasha, governor of the Danube vilayet (province). In 1869 Kemali became sanjak-bey (bey of the district) of Southern Dobruja and head of the international Danubian commission. At that time he traveled to France, England, and Italy, becoming acquainted with the European political elite. After Murad V ascended the throne in 1876, Midhat Pasha planned to establish a united Albanian vilayet with Kemali as governor. However, Midhat Pasha fell into disfavor, and the plan was abandoned. In 1884 Kemali became sanjak-bey of Bolu, and in 1890 he was appointed the governor of Beirut. In his activities and writings at that time, he showed pro-British sympathies and a dislike of the Central Powers. At that time he founded the periodical Mecrayi Efkâr, which was devoted to the reform of the Ottoman Empire.

Seeing that hopes for autonomy of the united Albanian territories within the Ottoman Empire were unrealistic, in 1900 Kemali gave up work in the administration but continued as leader of the Albanian faction in the Turkish parliament. Over the following years he maintained intensive contacts with Greek and British authorities. In 1902 he attended the Young Turk Congress in Paris. Under the threat of an Albanian armed rebellion, in July 1908 Sultan Abdülhamid granted a constitution to Albania. When the Young Turks overthrew the sultan, this decision was annulled, as a result of which the public mood in the country worsened. Kemali entered the new parliament, where he was a member of the opposition. In April 1909 he took part in an unsuccessful coup attempt against the Young Turks; consequently he had to flee to Athens. After reaching a compromise with the government, he returned to Istanbul, where he founded Ahrar, a liberal party that called for the decentralization of the empire and its component parts, including Albania.

The dissolution of the parliament in Istanbul in January 1912 and the brutality of the police in the territories inhabited by the Albanians led to an Albanian insurrection in the mountains of Gjakova under the leadership of Hasan Prishtina (April 1912). However, the other Balkan states did not want a united Albania and felt threatened after the insurgents captured Skopje and marched on Salonika. In the First Balkan War, Turkey surrendered to Serbia and Greece, whose troops invaded Albanian territories from the south and north. The only option left for the Albanians was full independence. Kemali traveled to Budapest and Vienna, promoting this idea. He realized that because the Entente favored Greece and Serbia, only Austria-Hungary might support this idea and that it was necessary to create faits accomplis. On 28 November 1912 the Albanian National Assembly met in Vlorë. During the assembly, eighty-three delegates proclaimed the creation of an independent Albanian state and declared its neutrality in the ongoing conflict. Kemali gave the main speech and became head of the provisional Albanian government.

The situation of this government was very difficult because it controlled only a small part of the Albanian-inhabited territory, which the Greeks and Serbs wanted to divide between themselves, while Durrës and Tirana were governed by Essad Pasha Toptani, who wanted to become the governor of Albania. The Great Powers supported a united Albania under Turkish supremacy. In April 1913 Kemali unsuccessfully attempted to gain support in Rome, Vienna, Paris, and London, but the decisions made at a London conference of the Great Powers in July 1913 were unfavorable for him. The Great Powers did not recognize his government. Albania gained the status of an autonomous state under international control with a territory reduced so much that half of the Albanian-speaking population was left outside its borders. The lost territories included northern Macedonia and Kosovo, which were given to Serbia, and southern Macedonia, which was given to Greece. Essad Pasha recognized Kemali's government, becoming its minister of interior. However, he soon started a rebellion against Kemali. When in January 1914 Essad's supporters threatened Vlorë, Kemali dissolved his powerless government, left the city, and went to Nicaea (Izник). Meanwhile, the Great Powers agreed on the candidacy of Wilhelm von Wied as Prince of Albania. Thereafter, Kemali did not play any major political role. In 1918–19 he dictated his memoirs, which were published in 1921 as The Memoirs of Ismail Kemali Bey. (WR)

Sources: Biographisches Lexikon, vol. 4; Adalbert Gottfried, Das Problem der Albanischen Unabhängigkeit in den Jahren 1908–1914 (Vienna, 1970); John Swire, Albania: The Rise of a Kingdom (New York, 1971); Stefanaq Pollo and Arben Puto, The History of Albania from Its Origins to the Present Day (London, 1981); Jerzy Hauziński and Jan Leśny, Historia Albanii (Wrocław, 1992); Miranda Vickers, The Albanians: A Modern History (London, 1995).

ЌENIŃŠ Atis (28 July 1874, Grenču, Courland–9 March 1961, Riga), Latvian poet and politician. Born into the family of a servant, Ķeniņš finished a teacher training college in Irlava in 1894 and subsequently worked as a teacher in Courland (Jelgava and Līvberze). At that time he began writing poems. He also translated stage plays. Between 1897 and 1900 he worked as the director of a rural school. In 1900 he settled in Riga, where he founded a private school of commerce in 1904, transformed into a Realgymnasium (science-oriented high school) for boys in 1907. Ķeniņš took part in the 1905 revolution, and later emigrated to Finland. During World War I he was active in Latvian charity and social organizations in Moscow. In 1918 he graduated in law from Moscow University. He was one of the founders of the Latvian National Democratic Party. At the end of 1918 Ķeniņš returned to Latvia, and as a member of the Latvian Provisional National Council, he took part in the proclamation of Latvia's independence. In November 1919 he was appointed head of the diplomatic mission in Poland. Because of his firm position on some of the contentious issues, he was in disfavor with the Polish authorities. Recalled de facto in December 1920 and formally in April 1921, he worked as a lawyer in Riga. From 1931 to 1933 he served as minister of education and justice. After the Soviet invasion, in July 1940 he attempted to prepare and put forward an alternative list for the parliamentary “elections” held under the control of USSR representatives. Arrested in 1941, Kēniņš was deported to Kazakhstan, where he worked as a teacher. After the war he returned to Latvia and started working at a college, but in 1951 he was again deported to Kazakhstan. Allowed to return in 1955, he lived in Riga until the end of his life. (EJ)

Sources: Latvijas darbinieku galerija (Riga, 1928); Jēkabs Ligoṭu, “Gara cīnītāja un dzejnieka Ata Kēniņa 60 gadu šūpla svētkos,” Piesauļe, 1934, no. 7; Latvijas vadošie darbinieki (Riga, 1935); Es viņu pazīstu (Riga, 1939); Kēniņš A. Mājup: Dzeja un piemiņa (Riga, 1999).

KĒPA Józef (18 May 1928, Rzeczyca, near Rawa Mazowiecka), Polish Communist activist. From August 1945 Kępa was active in the (Communist) Union of Youth Struggle in Łódź. In 1950–54 he worked in the administration of the (Communist) Polish Youth Union. From 1954 to 1958 he was an assistant in the Institute of Social Sciences of the Central Committee (CC) of the Polish United Workers’ Party (PUWP). In 1958 he graduated in history from this school, and then he worked at various posts in the PUWP apparatus. In 1959–60 Kępa was secretary of the PUWP Warsaw-Mokotów Quarter Committee; from 1960 to 1961 he headed the Department of Education and Science of the PUWP Warsaw Committee, and from 1961 he was its secretary. From December 1967 to December 1976 he was first secretary of the PUWP Warsaw Committee. From 1966 he was identified as a member of the Mieczysław Moczar faction. At a session of the Warsaw PUWP activists on 11 March 1968 Kępa called for a struggle against “revisionism,” “cosmopolitanism,” and “Zionism.” He was one of the main engineers of the party’s anti-Semitic campaign, which led to the firing of hundreds of people from their jobs. They were then deprived of Polish citizenship and forced to emigrate. At the Fifth PUWP Congress in November 1968 Kępa became a member of its CC. Despite a political counteroffensive by Władysław Gomułka, in 1968–70 Kępa strengthened his position in the party. In December 1970 he became a deputy member, and in December 1975 a member, of the party Politburo. He continued in this capacity until the Eighth PUWP Congress in February 1980. After the June 1976 workers’ riots Kępa opposed Edward Gierek. At closed meetings of the party leadership he criticized Gierek’s economic and social policy from a dogmatic point of view, Gierek’s domestic policy (in Kępa’s view it was too liberal), and the opening to the West. In particular Kępa advocated a repressive policy toward the democratic opposition. From December 1976 to February 1979 Kępa was deputy prime minister, and from February 1979 to July 1981 he was minister of administration, local economy, and environmental protection. In 1969–80 he was an MP. Paradoxically he was dismissed along with the Gierek team in 1980. After the introduction of martial law in December 1981 Kępa tried to return to the party leadership, but in vain. (WD)

Sources: Mołdawa; Andrzej Albert [Wojciech Roszkowski], Najnowsza historia Polski 1918–1980, vol. 2 (Warsaw 1995); Jerzy Eisler, Marzec 1968 (Warsaw, 1991); Krzysztof Lesiakowski, Mieczysław Moczar “Mietek”: Biografia polityczna (Warsaw, 1998); Włodzimierz Janowski and Aleksander Kochański, Informator o strukturze i obsadzie personalnej centralnego aparatu PZPR 1948–1990 (Warsaw, 2000); Jerzy Eisler, Grudzień 1970 (Warsaw, 2000).

KERESZTES-FISCHER Ferenc [until 1929 Fischer] (18 February 1881, Pécs–3 March 1948, Vöcklabruck, Austria), Hungarian politician. After graduating and receiving a Ph.D. in administration from the Department of Law of the University of Budapest, Keresztes-Fischer worked as a lawyer in Pécs and was a legal counselor of the local savings bank. During World War I he served as an officer in the reserves. After the breakup of the Habsburg monarchy, in October 1918 Keresztes-Fischer returned to Pécs, where he was temporarily arrested by the Serb authorities. After their withdrawal and after the stabilization of the regency system, from October 1921 he was governor of Baranya Province and of the city of Pécs and from December 1925 also of Somogy Province. From August 1931 he was minister of interior in the governments of Gyula Károlyi and Gyula Gömbös. He reorganized the ministry, modernizing its operations. In January 1935 he left the government in protest against the radical rightist policies of Gömbös. In consequence, following István Bethlen, he also left the ruling Unity Party, on behalf of which he had been MP from 1932. From January 1936 to May 1938 Keresztes-Fischer chaired the Center of Financial Institutions, and in 1936–39 he was a senator. From May 1938 to March 1944 he was minister of interior again. In 1939–44 he was an MP on behalf of the ruling party. He strongly criticized both extreme movements—the (Fascist) Arrow Cross and the Communist Party—and suppressed their activities by means of the political police. (After September 1939 the Ministry of Interior included a special Tenth Department for the problems of war refugees, including the Poles, whose head was József Antall.) After the resignation of László Bárdossy, from 7 to 9 March 1942 Keresztes-Fischer was acting prime minister. He belonged to the pro-English group of Bethlen and Prime Minister Miklós Kállay. In August 1943 he joined the inner circle of advisers of Regent Miklós Horthy. After the German occupation of Hungary in March 1944, Keresztes-Fischer was arrested by the Gestapo and sent to a concentration camp in Germany. One of the streets in Warsaw, Poland, was named after him to commemorate his assistance to the Polish wartime refugees. (JT)

Sources: Magyar Életrajzi Lexikon, vol. 1 (Budapest, 1967); Magyar Nagylexikon, vol. 10 (Budapest, 2000); Artúr Benisch, Vármegyei határkigazítások: Keresztes-Fischer Ferenc (Budapest, 1938); John F. Montgomery, Hungary: The Unwilling Satellite (New York, 1947); Paul Ignotus, Hungary (London, 1972).

KERTÉSZ Imre (9 November 1929, Budapest), Hungarian writer. Because of his Jewish descent, in 1944 Kertész was sent to the German nazi concentration camp in Auschwitz and then to Buchenwald. After World War II he returned to Hungary, where, after graduating from high school (1948), he worked as a journalist until 1951 and then in the Press Department of the Ministry of Metallurgy and Industrial Machinery and as a blue-collar laborer. From 1953 Kertész made his living by writing and translating. The main topic of his works is the Holocaust. From the notes that he took in the 1950s, in 1960–73 Kertész wrote the novel Sorstalanság (1975; Fateless, 1992), an autobiographical story of a boy in a concentration camp who describes the horrible reality in simple words. Kertész's subsequent novels—A kudarc (Failure; 1988) and Kaddis a meg nem született gyermekért (1990; Kaddish for a Child Not Born, 1997)—completed a trilogy of the “fateless people,” full of original reflections on an individual's fate, totalitarianism, and references to the twentieth-century history of Central Europe. In 1992 Kertész's Gályanapló (Galley diary), a diary in fictional form, was published, covering the years 1961–1991. Kertész also wrote several short stories and essays, such as A holokaust mint kultúra (Holocaust as culture; 1993), and he translated the works of many German philosophers and writers. Kertész received many Hungarian awards, including the Kossuth State Award (1997), and in 2002 he was the first Hungarian to receive the Nobel Prize for Literature. (MS)

Sources: Wielka encyklopedia PWN, vol. 13 (Warsaw, 2003); Új magyar irodalmi lexikon (Budapest, 2000); György Spiró, “Non habent sua fata: A Sorstalanság-újraolvasva,” Élet és Irodalom, 1983, no. 30; <http://culturelover.com/imrekertes.html>.

KÉTHLY Anna (16 November 1889, Budapest–7 September, 1976 Blankenberge, Belgium), Hungarian politician. Born into a large working-class family, Kéthly began working as a young girl to earn money for her education. After becoming a qualified typist and bookkeeper, from 1907 she worked as a clerk. In 1913 she joined the trade union of private clerks, serving as its vice-president from 1920 on, secretary general from 1939 to March 1944, and honorary president from 1945 on. In 1917 Kéthly joined the Hungarian Social Democratic Party (Magyarországi Szociáldemokrata Párt [HSDP]). In December 1919 she was elected a member of the HSDP Central Women's Organizational Committee and soon afterwards was appointed its secretary. In 1920 Kéthly became a contributor to the periodical Nómunkás, and in 1926–38 she worked as its editor and publisher. Kéthly was the second woman in Hungarian history to serve as a member of parliament (1922–39), and for a long time she was the only female MP. Elected as a member of the leadership of the HSDP in 1922, between 1943 and 1944 she conducted talks with politicians of other orientations on the possibility of Hungary's withdrawal from the war. When Germany occupied Hungary, she joined the underground resistance movement in March 1944.

After the end of World War II, Kéthly became a member of the HSDP Political Bureau. A member of parliament between April 1945 and April 1948, she served as head of the HSDP parliamentary representation and as deputy speaker of the parliament from November 1945 to February 1948. In the party, she was responsible for foreign relations and for women's issues. Although she was a proponent of a moderate line, she firmly called for the independence of the HSDP and was against the “unification” of the Hungarian Communist Party and the HSDP under Communist leadership. In February 1948, on the initiative of a group that supported the Communists, Kéthly was expelled from the party leadership, and at a party congress in March she was expelled from the party. Deprived of her parliamentary seat, she was held under house arrest for two years. Arrested in June 1950, she was sentenced to life imprisonment for “espionage” and “anti-state activities” in January 1954. Pardoned under international pressure in November 1954, she was kept under constant police surveillance.

In April 1956 Kéthly refused to ask for a new trial and to take up a position in the Patriotic People's Front. After the outbreak of the 1956 revolution, she was one of the initiators of the reorganization of the HSDP, and on 31 October she was elected as party president. On 1 November she went to a congress of the Socialist International in Vienna. The following day, in her absence, the government of Imre Nagy delegated her to the UN General Assembly, and on 3 November she was appointed minister of state in Nagy's coalition government. Because of the second Soviet intervention, Kéthly could not return to Budapest; therefore she flew to New York to attend the UN General Assembly session on the situation in Hungary. In January 1957 she was elected president of the Hungarian Revolutionary Council, which was established at that time in Strasbourg and which consisted of representatives of the democratic parties that had taken part in the revolution and other prominent people who had been forced to emigrate. Kéthly settled in Brussels. From 1957 to December 1963 she was the editor-in-chief of the newspaper Népszava, which was published in London, and from 1970 to 1973 she worked as an editor of the periodical Szociáldemokrata Szemle. Kéthly was the Hungarian representative in the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions, a member of the HSDP leadership in exile (in 1958 becoming president of the HSDP), and a member of the Socialist International. In 1962, in her absence, the Supreme Court in Budapest quashed the sentence Kéthly had been given in the trial of 1954 but simultaneously sentenced her to four years' imprisonment for "anti-state" activities during the 1956 events. In October 1990 Kéthly's ashes were brought to Hungary and buried in a Budapest cemetery, in the same section as the remains of the participants of the 1956 revolution who had been convicted or executed. In 1994 the Supreme Court fully rehabilitated Kéthly and quashed the sentence she had received in the trial of 1962. (JT)

Sources: Nagy Képes Milleniumi Arcképcsarnok (Budapest, 1999); Magyar Nagylexikon, vol. 10 (Budapest, 2000); Magyarország 1944–1956, CD-ROM (Budapest, 2001); Méray Tibor, Thirteen Days That Shook the Kremlin (New York, 1959); Bennet Kovrig, Communism in Hungary from Kun to Kadar (Stanford, 1979); Hans-Detlev Grothusen, ed., Ungarn (Göttingen, 1987); György Litván, ed., Rewolucja węgierska 1956 roku (Warsaw, 1996).

KHADYKA Yuriy (23 June 1938, Minsk), Belorussian scholar and politician. Khadyka graduated in physics from the Belorussian State University in 1960, and then he worked in the Institute of Physics of the Belorussian Academy of Sciences (BAS). He went through all the levels of the professorial career, from assistant to full professor. He was head of a laboratory dealing with space early-warning systems aimed at the prevention of rocket attacks. He also headed a section of the Soviet Academy of Sciences, developing optical and electronic intelligence devices. At the end of the 1960s Khadyka created a Belorussian art seminar attached to the BAS. Ten years later, along with his aides, he established the Museum of Old Belorussian Art. He authored about 150 publications in physics and about 30 in the history of old Belorussian art. In 1988 Khadyka joined the democratic movement. In 1989 he was elected deputy chairman of the Belorussian National Front (BNF), and after Zyanon Paznyak emigrated, he became the BNF's chief spokesman. After the takeover of power by Alyaksandr Lukashenka, Khadyka was arrested several times (for instance, in 1996) for taking part in opposition demonstrations. (EM)

Sources: A. Ulitsyonak, Inshadumtsy (Minsk, 1991); Jan Zaprudnik, Historical Dictionary of Belarus (Lanham, Md., 1998); Kto jest kim na Białorusi (Białystok, 2000).

KHIRA Oleksandr (17 January 1897, Vilkhivtsi, Subcarpathian Ruthenia–26 May 1983, Karaganda, Kazakhstan), bishop of the underground Ukrainian Greek Catholic Church in the USSR. Khira studied theology at the seminary in Uzhhorod (Užhorod) but completed his studies in Budapest in 1920. From 1924 he worked as a lecturer in canon law, in the history of the church, and in moral and pastoral theology at Uzhhorod Seminary. He also founded the Subcarpathian movement of the Apostolate of Suffering. Appointed papal chamberlain in 1934, Khira made missionary visits to the Ukrainian communities in France and Belgium. In 1934 he became rector of Uzhhorod Seminary, but in March 1939 he was dismissed from his post after Subcarpathia was incorporated into Hungary. In 1943 he was appointed prelate and in 1944 vicar general of the Mukachevo eparchy. Secretly consecrated by Bishop Theodore Romzha in 1945, Khira avoided the first wave of arrests of the Uniate hierarchy after Subcarpathia was incorporated into the Ukrainian SSR, but on 10 February 1949 he was imprisoned by Soviet security functionaries and was sentenced in Kiev to twenty-five years of labor camp. He was held in camps near Irkutsk, Kemerovo, and Omsk and had to work in coal mines (among other places). Released and rehabilitated on 6 September 1956, Khira returned to his native village, where he resumed his duties as priest and bishop of Mukachevo. On 17 January 1957 Khira was deported to forced labor in Kazakhstan. After many years of carrying on his pastoral work secretly, in 1978 he managed to obtain permission to officially conduct Catholic activities. He was deeply committed to his work; as a result of his efforts, for example, a church was built in Karaganda. (WR)

Sources: "Smert vладыky movchaznoy Tserkvy," Ukrainiski Visti (Edmonton), 10 August 1983; Martirologia ukraińskikh tserkov u chetyriokh tomakh, vol. 2 (Toronto, 1985); Encyclopedia of Ukraine, vol. 2 (Toronto, 1988); Bohdan R. Bociurkiw, The Ukrainian Greek-Catholic Church and the Soviet State (1939–1950) (Edmonton, 1996).

KHMARA Stepan (12 October 1937, Bobyatyn, near Sokal), Ukrainian dissident and politician. The son of a peasant, Khmara initially worked as a driver, first in the Ukraine, and then in Kazakhstan (1955–59). In 1964 he graduated in dentistry in Lviv, and he worked as a dentist in Girnuk, near Sokal. Engaged in the distribution of uncensored samizdat publications, after the arrest of Vyacheslav Chornovil, the editor-in-chief of Ukrainskyi visnyk, in 1972 Khmara managed to publish another issue of the periodical, which included, among other things, his own article (signed “Maksym Sahaydak”), “Etnotsyd Ukrainitsiv v SSSR” (The ethnocide of Ukrainians in the USSR). Despite police surveillance and terror, in 1975 Khmara prepared another issue, in which he published the article “Holos iz pekla” (A voice from hell), criticizing Western policies toward the Soviet Union. Arrested on 31 March 1980, in December of that year Khmara was sentenced to seven years of labor camp, five years of forced settlement, and the confiscation of property. He spent his prison years in the Perm camps. Since he continued to demand respect for human rights, he spent almost a year in a dark cell. Against his will, in February 1987 he was pardoned.

In 1988–89 Khmara was still frequently arrested for short periods of time. In July 1988 he joined the Executive Committee of the Ukrainian Helsinki Group (UHG), and he took part in a meeting in Lviv of national and democratic representatives of the Soviet nations. From May to October 1989, as a member of the Committee for the Defense of the Ukrainian Greek Catholic Church, Khmara organized a hunger strike in Moscow, demanding the legalization of this church. Elected to the Ukrainian Supreme Council in 1990, he demanded a declaration of state sovereignty for the Ukraine. He took part in a student strike in Kiev in October 1990, supporting the students with a thirteen-day hunger strike. Provoked by a militia colonel, Khmara was accused of assault and deprived of immunity by a Communist majority of the Supreme Council. After his arrest in December 1990, he went on hunger strikes twice. Signatures appealing for his release were gathered in neighboring countries. Released under the pressure of democratic forces, Khmara became deputy chairman of the Ukrainian Republican Party (UPR, successor of the UHG). In May and June 1992 he led a group of his followers out of the UPR and founded the Ukrainian Conservative Republican Party (Ukrainska Konservatyvna Respublikanska Partiya). Reelected to the Supreme Council in 1994, Khmara demanded the confiscation of Communist Party property, as well as the de-Communization of the administration and judiciary. Khmara’s program includes element of populism, anti-Semitism, zealous anti-communism, and Russophobia. (TS)

Sources: Encyclopedia of Ukraine, vol. 2 (Toronto, 1988); Zakordonne Predstavnytstvo Ukrainiskoi Helsinki Hrupy, Visnyk represiy v Ukraini (New York, 1980–84); Heorhij Kasyanov, Nezhodni: Ukrainiska intelihentsiya v rusi oporu 1960–80 rokiv (Kiev, 1995); Anatoliy Rusnachenko, Natsionalno-vyzvolnyi rukh v Ukraini (Kiev, 1998); Bohdan Nahaylo, The Ukrainian Resurgence (Toronto, 1999).

KHOMYSHYN Hryhoriy (25 March 1867, Hadynkivtsi, near Tarnopol [Ternopil]–28 December 1945, Kiev), Greek Catholic bishop, martyr for the faith. After graduating from a seminary, in November 1893 Khomyshyn was ordained a priest. He continued his studies in Vienna, graduating in 1899. In 1902 he was appointed rector of the Lwów (Lviv) seminary, and in 1904, bishop of Stanisławów (now Ivano-Frankivsk). During the Russian occupation of Eastern Galicia, between September 1914 and June 1915 Khomyshyn remained in Vienna. As an advocate of bringing the Greek rite closer to the Latin rite, in 1916 he unsuccessfully attempted to introduce the Gregorian calendar, which caused protests from the clergy of the diocese. Despite his sympathy for the Ukrainian pro-independence movement, along with Archbishop Andrey Sheptytsky Khomyshyn opposed the priority of politics in pastoral work. Khomyshyn was known as an energetic organizer of social and charity work. He also cared for callings to the priesthood. In 1921 he introduced the requirement of celibacy of priests and founded the Saint Josaphat Society of Unmarried Priests. In the 1930s he opposed the politicization of priests and was against radical nationalism, as well as communism. He sympathized with the moderate Catholic national movement. In the autumn of 1939 Khomyshyn was temporarily arrested by the NKVD but was soon released. In June 1941, before its withdrawal from Stanisławów, the NKVD attempted to poison him. During the German occupation Khomyshyn maintained political neutrality. After the invasion of the Red Army, in October 1944 he signed a pastoral letter condemning fratricidal fighting and urging an end to violence and bloodshed. Arrested again on 11 April 1945 by the NKVD, Khomyshyn was transported to a prison in Lviv and then to Lukianivka Prison in Kiev. Despite his advanced age, he was subjected to a brutal interrogation, as a result of which he died. On 27 June 2001 Pope John Paul II beatified Khomyshyn at a solemn Holy Mass in Lviv. (WR) Sources: Encyclopedia of Ukraine, vol. 1 (Toronto, 1984); Bohdan R. Bociurkiw, The Ukrainian Greek-Catholic Church and the Soviet State (1939–1950) (Edmonton, 1996); Bohdan Vivchar, “Povermenia,” Tserkovni visnyk (Chicago), 17 March 1996; Osservatore Romano (weekly edition in English), 2001, nos. 25 and 27.

KHRUSHCHEV Nikita (17 April 1894, Kalinovka, Kursk Province–11 September, 1971 Moscow), Soviet leader and head of the Communist Party in the Ukraine (1938–49). Khrushchev was born into a poor peasant family and finished a few grades of primary school. In 1909–17 he worked as a miner in the Donetsk region. In 1918 he joined the Bolshevik party, and from 1919 he served in the Red Army. After the termination of the civil war he advanced in the party ranks in the Ukraine thanks to his close links with Stalin. From 1929 he formally studied at the Industrial Academy but was rather involved in the local party committee work. In 1930 he was sent by Stalin to supervise the collectivization of agriculture in the Ukraine, which resulted in the starvation and death of millions of Ukrainians. In 1931 Khrushchev became party secretary in one of the Moscow quarters and in January 1932 second party secretary of the Moscow city party organization. In 1934 he became a member of the Central Committee (CC) of the All-Union Communist Party (Bolsheviks) and then secretary of the Moscow organization of the party. In this capacity he played a key role in the purge that followed the assassination of Sergey Kirov in December 1934.

After a series of bloody purges in the Ukrainian party leadership, in January 1938 Khrushchev was appointed first secretary of the CC of the Communist Party (Bolsheviks) of Ukraine. From 1939 he was also a member of the Politburo of the All-Union party. He was responsible for the introduction of Russian as the language of instruction in Ukrainian schools at all levels, as well as for the last stage of the Great Purge of Nikolay Yezhov. As a result, he was responsible for the deaths of thousands of Ukrainians. After 17 September 1939 Khrushchev supervised the incorporation of the Southeast Borderland of Poland (Eastern Galicia and Volhynia) into the Ukrainian SSR, as well as the arrest and deportation of the inhabitants of this territory, mostly Poles. In the summer of 1940 he supervised a similar takeover in North Bukovina, detached from Romania and incorporated into the Ukrainian SSR. During World War II Khrushchev represented Stalin in various political missions and organized Soviet guerrillas in the Ukraine. After the war he mostly dealt with the reconstruction of the Ukrainian economy and with combating Ukrainian independent guerrillas. He ruthlessly destroyed the kulaks and the national elites of the newly acquired territories. Those who fell victim to his activities were mainly Poles from the Home Army, falsely accused of cooperation with the Third Reich; fighters of the Ukrainian Insurgent Army; and independent artists, such as Maksym Rylskyi and Volodymyr Sosyura. Khrushchev failed to rapidly reconstruct Ukrainian agriculture. In March 1947 he was recalled from the party position, but he was appointed prime minister of the Ukrainian SSR. In December 1947 he resumed the Ukrainian party leadership and held it until December 1949, when he again became secretary of the All-Union party CC and first secretary of the Moscow committee.

Despite his failures Khrushchev was recognized as an “expert” in agriculture. He advocated the concentration of kolkhozes and the creation of agricultural towns (agrogorod). During the Nineteenth Congress in October 1952 Stalin entrusted Khrushchev with the recording of amendments in the party statute; these changed the name of the party to the Communist Party of the Soviet Union (CPSU). After Stalin’s death, on 14 March 1953 Khrushchev became CC secretary, and after Lavrenty Beria was removed from the ruling troika in June and executed in December 1953, Khrushchev joined the collective leadership of the party in his place. In September 1953 he became first secretary of the CPSU CC. In January 1955 he removed Georgy Malenkov from the position of prime minister, and it was taken over by Khrushchev’s protégé, Nikolay Bulganin. In an attempt to win over the party apparatus, at the end of the Twentieth Congress of the CPSU in February 1956, Khrushchev made the famous “secret speech,” in which he condemned the “personality cult” of Stalin and physical liquidation as a method of personnel changes. When his opponents joined hands and tried to remove him, in June 1957 Khrushchev counterattacked, defeating Malenkov, Vyacheslav Molotov, and Lazar Kaganovich. In March 1958 he removed Bulganin and took over the position of prime minister of the USSR.

In foreign policy Khrushchev continued imperial policies, stressing either “international détente” (1954–55) or contradictions between “socialism” and “capitalism.” He eased Soviet–Yugoslav relations, and in May 1955 he came in a mission of reconciliation to Belgrade. In October 1956 he accepted Władysław Gomułka as the new Polish party leader, but he almost immediately ordered a brutal intervention in Hungary, where the situation had slipped out of the hands of the Communist leadership. From early 1957 he carried out a successful global offensive, consolidating the Soviet bloc and gaining new footholds in the Third World. This was made possible by huge armaments spending and by the successes of Soviet technology, such as the launch of the first intercontinental ballistic missile and the first satellite in 1957. In the late 1950s Khrushchev introduced a school reform consisting in the removal of local languages from the basic curricula. He openly argued that instruction in these languages was not necessary from the point of view of science and technology. After a temporary “thaw” in 1962 Khrushchev strengthened the reins of censorship, especially in Ukraine. Those who fell victim to his hostility to “formalism” and “modernism” were, among others, representatives of the generation of the 1960s (shestidesiatniki), such as Ivan Dziuba, Yevhen Sverstiuk, and Ivan Svitlychnyi.

At the turn of the 1960s Khrushchev’s policies led to a new split in the world Communist movement, this time between the CPSU and the Chinese party. In 1958 and 1961 he demanded the withdrawal of Western powers from West Berlin, while he included East Berlin in the Communist-controlled German Democratic Republic. This led the world to the edge of nuclear war, just as did Khrushchev's irresponsible policy in Cuba, where he placed Soviet rockets in October 1962. During the Twenty-second CPSU Congress in October 1961 Khrushchev announced that communism would be realized in the USSR by 1980. He strengthened the reform process within the party and criticized Stalin again, but the new "thaw" was short-lived. Without de-collectivization Khrushchev failed to modernize agriculture. He was consistent only in his anti-religious policies. Inefficiency in the economy and extravagant imperialist steps led to his fall. On 13 October 1964 the Presidium of the CPSU CC deprived him of the position of first secretary and excluded him from all party bodies. Khrushchev retired unharmed. In the 1970s his memoirs, Khrushchev Remembers (1970) and The Last Testament (1974), were published in the West. At the end of the 1990s his granddaughter was granted American citizenship. (WR)

Sources: MERSH, vol. 16; Encyclopedia of Ukraine, vol. 2 (Toronto, 1988); Viktor Alexandrov, Khrushchev of the Ukraine: A Biography (London, 1957); Horvath G. Paloczi, Khrushchev: The Making of a Dictator (Boston, 1960); Hryhory Kostyuk, Stalinist Rule in the Ukraine (New York, 1960); Khrushchev's Crimes in Ukraine (London, 1962); Wolfgang Leonard, Nikita Sergejewitsch Chruschtschow: Aufstieg und Fall eines Sowjetführers (Lucerne, 1965); Edward Crankshaw, Khrushchev: A Career (New York, 1966); William Hyland, The Fall of Khrushchev (New York, 1968); Roy A. Medvedev, Khrushchev: The Years in Power (New York, 1976); David R. Marples, Stalinism in Ukraine in the 1940s (London, 1992).

KHUIEN-HÉDERVÁRY Károlyi [originally Khuen] (23 May 1849, Gräfenberg–16 February 1918, Budapest), Hungarian politician. Khuen-Héderváry graduated in law from universities in Pressburg (Pozsonyi, Bratislava) and Zagreb, and then he worked in the judiciary of Sirmien Province. In 1874 he adopted the second part of his name in accord with the last will of Count Héder Viczay von Vicza und Hédervár, and he inherited the latter's huge landed estate in Slavonia. In 1875 he was elected to the Hungarian parliament for the first time. In 1883 he was appointed ban (governor) of Croatia, where the Magyarization policies of his predecessor, Koloman Tisza, had led to great social tension. Khuen-Héderváry made use of the poor rootedness of Croatian political parties and conflicts between Slavonian Croats and Serbs, he managed to gain the majority for his line in the Croatian Assembly (Sabor), and he legalized his absolutist rule.

As a result he managed to continue a hardly softened Magyarization policy for about twenty years. In the course of the crisis connected with demands for a wider autonomy for the Hungarian Army, from 27 June to 3 November 1903 Khuen-Héderváry was prime minister, and in 1904–5, a "personal royal minister" in the government of István Tisza. He again held the position of prime minister from 17 January 1910 to 22 April 1912. In February 1910 Khuen-Héderváry co-founded and then until his death he chaired the (Conservative) National Labor Party (Nemzeti Munkapárt), which won the elections of June 1910, allowing for the continuation of Tisza's policy until World War I. (WR) Sources: Biographisches Lexikon, vol. 2; Magyar Életrajzi Lexikon, vol. 1 (Budapest, 1967); Martin Polić, Ban Dragutin grof Khuen-Héderváry i njegovo doba (Zagreb, 1901); Robert W. Seton-Watson, Corruption and Reform in Hungary (London, 1911); Josip Horvath, Politička povijest Hrvatska (Zagreb, 1936); Jerzy Kochanowski, Węgry (Warsaw, 1997).

KHVYLOVY Mykola [originally Fitolov] (14 December 1893, Trostianets, Kharkiv Province–13 May 1933, Kharkiv), Ukrainian poet and writer, Communist, symbol of the so-called Executed Renaissance (those representatives of the Ukrainian cultural renaissance that were mostly executed by Stalin). Born into a family of village teachers, Khvylovy completed only five grades of a gymnasium, but thanks to the help of his relatives, he gained a good knowledge of both Ukrainian and world literature. From 1916 to 1917 he fought on the eastern front. Later, he was active in an insurgent movement that was of an anti-hetman, anti-Denikin, and later anti-Petlura character. In 1919 he joined the Communist Party (Bolshevik) of Ukraine (CP[B]U). In 1921 he settled permanently in Kharkiv. Khvylovy began his literary activities around 1913, writing poetry that with his full creative maturity gave way to novels and stories. His poems—which were included in the collections Molodist (Youth; 1921), Dosvitni symfonii (Symphonies of the dawn; 1922), and Stari poezii (Old poetry; 1931)—had features characteristic of symbolism and futurism. Khvylovy was a eulogist of industrialization and urbanization and their historic instrument, the proletariat. It was his prose that won him popularity and critical recognition. His subsequent works—including the collections Syni etiudy (Blue études; 1922); Osin' (The autumn; 1924); the novel Ya (Me; 1924); and the stories "Sanatoriina zona" (The sanatorium zone; 1924) and "Valdshnepy" (Wild ducks; 1925)—show an evolution of topics and means of description. That evolution, consistent with the official Soviet critique, had its political consequences, and the edition of the second part of "Wild Ducks" was confiscated.

From the pathos of the revolution and the expressionistic style of his novels, Khvylovy gradually moved toward a deeper psychological analysis and a more realistic description of the life of the Ukrainian intelligentsia in the post-revolutionary period. His literary career gained a political character, as he became involved in creative societies in the Ukraine and in the so-called literary discussion between 1925 and 1928. In 1923 he co-founded Hart, a group of proletarian writers; along with its equivalent addressed to peasants, Hart was meant to give a mass character to Ukrainian literature. However, in October 1925 Khvylovy founded his own Free Academy of Proletarian Literature (Vaplite). In his struggle for the quality of art, he gained the support of a group of Ukrainian non-Communist writers, the so-called neo-classicals. As a Communist, though, Khvylovy tried to change their literary activities to make them truly proletarian. At the peak period of the struggle within the CPU(B) leadership for the direction of Ukrainization (1925–26), Khvylovy published three series of polemic articles in which he presented his own concepts, formed under the influence of Oswald Spengler, among others. In Kamo hriadeshy? (Quo vadis? 1925); Dumky proty techii (Thoughts against the stream; 1926); and Apolohety pysaryzmu (Apologists of hack writing; 1926), he outlined the contrast between European culture and the provincialism of Ukrainian culture, which was expressed in the symbolic formula of a society called Prosvita (Education).

The idea of increasing the cultural distance between Ukraine and Russia (expressed in the famous slogan Het' vid Moskvy [Out of Moscow]) and seeking rapprochement with Europe led Khvylovy to emphasize the political independence of Ukraine. That concept also included the idea of an “Asian Renaissance” in which Ukraine would play a special role. Struggling against the manifestations of Russian imperialism, Khvylovy saw the exhaustion of the “cultural-historical cycle” in Western Europe. Therefore, he thought that the revolutionary nations of Eastern Europe and the nations of Asia might give Western Europe a renewed spirit. Ukrainian literature, as a promoter of the new literary style, the “romanticism of vitalism,” was to be in the avant garde of that process. The last of Khvylovy’s polemic works, Ukraina chy Malorosiiia? (Ukraine or Little Russia?), was banned from publication by the authorities. With Stalin’s personal involvement, the Vaplite was liquidated, and its members, including Khvylovy, were forced to do self-criticism. Khvylovy spent the winter of 1928 in Berlin and Vienna. He could have stayed abroad but returned to the USSR and attempted to accept the limitations placed on his creative work. He continued editing Literaturnyi iarmarok (1930) and Politfront (1930–31) but under the party’s dictation. His attempts at adjustment proved to be a failure. Khvylovy’s suicide in 1933 was a form of protest against the enormity of persecution and the extent of the famine in the Ukraine under the government of Pavlo Postyshev. Khvylovy’s works were published as Tvory v piatokh tomakh (Works in five volumes; 1978–86). (TS)

Sources: Encyclopedia of Ukraine, vol. 1 (Toronto, 1984); George Luckyj, Literary Politics in the Soviet Ukraine 1917–1934 (New York, 1956); Yuri Lavrynenko, ed., Rozstrilane vidrodzhennia: Antolohiia 1917–1933 (Paris, 1959); Yuri Lutskiy, ed., Vaplitanskyi zbirnyk (Edmonton and Toronto, 1977); James Mace, Communism and the Dilemmas of National Liberation: National Communism in Soviet Ukraine 1918–1933 (Cambridge, 1983).

KIDRIĆ Boris (10 April 1912, Vienna–11 April 1953, Belgrade), Yugoslav Communist activist of Serb nationality. In 1927 Kidrić became active in the Communist movement, for which he was imprisoned in Maribor between 1927 and 1928. Released, he began to study in the Chemistry Department of the University of Ljubljana. Arrested again in 1933, he spent several months in prison. In May 1935 he became the secretary of the Central Committee (CC) of the League of Yugoslav Communist Youth (Savez Komunističke Omladine Jugoslavije [SKOJ]), and in September he attended a congress of the Communist Youth International in Moscow. After returning to Vienna, in May 1936 Kidrić was arrested and spent one year in prison. In 1938, on the orders of Josip Broz Tito, he went to Paris, where he conducted activities among students from Yugoslavia. He returned to Yugoslavia in the autumn of 1939.

A member of the CC of the Communist Party of Yugoslavia from September 1940 on, Kidrić put forward a proposal for cooperation among Slovene anti-Fascist parties within the framework of the Anti-Imperialistic Front (renamed the Liberation Front later), and he joined its Executive Committee. Elected to the Presidium of the Anti-Fascist Council for the National Liberation of Yugoslavia (Antifašističko Veće Narodnog Oslobođenja [AVNOJ]), in May 1945 Kidrić became head of the Slovene government, and in December of that year, the political secretary of the CC of the Communist Party of Slovenia. In July 1946 he became minister of industry in the government of the Federal People’s Republic of Yugoslavia. Appointed president of the Economic Council later on, Kidrić called for a decentralized model of the economy, as he considered the system of central planning less effective. Kidrić contributed to the introduction of the self-management system for companies and associations in 1950, which limited the role of the state in the economy. Elected to the Communist Party of Yugoslavia (CPY) Politburo at the Fifth CPY Congress in 1948, he was reelected at the Sixth CPY Congress in 1952, when the CPY changed its name to the League of Communists of Yugoslavia. Kidrič authored numerous works on the political economy of socialism; these were published as Sabrana dela (Collected works, 7 vols.; 1985). (AO)

Sources: Enciklopedija Jugoslavije, vol. 5 (Zagreb, 1962); Enciklopedija Slovenije, vol. 5 (Ljubljana, 1991); Janko Prunk, Boris Kidrič (Ljubljana, 1984); Lev Modič, Boris Kidrič (Ljubljana, 1986); Ivo Banac, With Stalin against Tito (Ithaca, N.Y., 1988); Wiesław Walkiewicz, Jugostawia (Warsaw, 2000); James Gow and Cathie Carmichael, Slovenia and the Slovenians (London, 2000).

KIERNIK Władysław (27 July 1879, Bochnia–23 August 1971, Warsaw), Polish Peasant Party politician and lawyer. In 1902 Kiernik graduated in law from the Jagiellonian University in Kraków and earned a Ph.D. there in 1903. He subsequently ran a law practice in Bochnia. While in high school, he was active in secret pro-independence organizations. In 1903 he joined the Polish Peasant Party (Polskie Stronnictwo Ludowe [PSL]). He participated in the activities of the People's School Society, serving as a member of its Main Board in 1906–21. He also sat on the Chief Council of the Union of Agricultural Associations. After the outbreak of World War I in 1914 Kiernik organized the county National Committee in Bochnia. He served as military commissioner of the Polish Legions in Bochnia County. As the commissioner of the Polish Liquidation Commission (Polska Komisja Likwidacyjna) for Bochnia, in October 1918 he helped to abolish Austrian authority and subsequently became head (starosta) of Bochnia County.

From 1913 Kiernik was a leading activist of the Polish Peasant Party–Piast (PSL–Piast). From 1921 to 1931 he was a member of its Chief Council, from 1925 to 1931 a member of the party's Main Board, and from 1930 to 1931 its vice-president. In 1919–33 he was a PSL–Piast MP, from 1919 to 1927 a member of the presidium of the party's parliamentary representation, and in 1922–23 vice-president of the party. Kiernik was responsible for agricultural reforms, the development of cooperatives and rural self-government, the organization of administration, and the promotion of education. Kiernik was a close associate of Wincenty Witos. In 1920, during the Polish-Soviet war, he was a member of the State Defense Council. He belonged to the Polish delegation to the peace negotiations in Minsk and Riga. In 1921–22 he was president of the Main Land Office. As minister of interior in the government of Witos from May to December 1923, Kiernik was responsible for the use of the army against demonstrators in several towns in Lesser Poland, as a result of which many people were wounded or killed. From November 1925 to May 1926 he served as minister of agriculture and state property. In 1924–25 he was editor-in-chief of the weekly Piast. After the coup of May 1926, he was in the opposition to the sanacja regime. In 1929 he was one of the leaders of the so-called Centrolew, a center-left coalition that was established to restore democracy. He also co-organized the Congress for the Defense of the Law and Freedom of the People in Kraków in 1930. Arrested for two months in September 1930, in 1932 Kiernik was sentenced in the Brześć trial to two and a half years in prison. In 1931 he co-founded the Peasant Party (Stronnictwo Ludowe [SL]) and co-authored its program. Until 1939 he served as a member of the SL Chief Council and vice-president of the SL Chief Executive Committee. To avoid serving his sentence, he emigrated to Czechoslovakia, where he lived from 1933 to 1939. After the German invasion of Czechoslovakia, he returned to Poland, where he was imprisoned for several weeks.

During World War II Kiernik belonged to the leadership of the Peasant Party–Roch (SL–Roch) in Kraków. Arrested by the Gestapo in July 1940, he was held in prison for half a year. After the war, he became vice-president of the Chief Executive Committee of the Polish Peasant Party (PSL), led by Stanisław Mikołajczyk, and in January 1946 he became president of its Chief Council. In June 1945 he attended a Moscow conference that led to the establishment of the Provisional Government of National Unity (Tymczasowy Rząd Jedności Narodowej). From July 1945 to February 1947 he served as minister of public administration. Kiernik was more submissive to the Communists than Mikołajczyk, supporting their plan to establish the Bloc of Democratic Parties, which the PSL did not join. From 1945 to 1947 Kiernik was a deputy to the National Home Council (Krajowa Rada Narodowa). In January 1947 he became MP. After Mikołajczyk fled the country, Kiernik continued cooperation with the Polish United Workers' Party (Polska Zjednoczona Partia Robotnicza [PUWP]). In November 1949 he joined the Chief Council of the United Peasant Party (Zjednoczone Stronnictwo Ludowe [ZSL]) and served as deputy chairman of its Chief Audit Committee. He belonged to the Polish delegation to UN sessions in London (1946) and New York (1956). From 1956 to 1966 Kiernik served as vice-president of the Polonia Society. He also sat on the governing bodies of many window-dressing community organizations sponsored by the Communists. (JS)

Sources: Słownik Biograficzny Działaczy Ruchu Ludowego (Warsaw, 1989); Encyklopedia historii Drugiej Rzeczypospolitej (Warsaw, 1999); Encyklopedia Historii Polski: Dzieje polityczne, vol. 1 (Warsaw, 1994); Roman Buczek, Stronnictwo Ludowe w latach 1939–1945 (London, 1975); Krystyna Kersten, Narodziny systemu władzy: Polska 1943–1948 (Poznań, 1990); Stanisław Łach, Polskie Stronnictwo Ludowe w latach 1945–1947 (Gdańsk, 1995).

KIEŚLÓWSKI Krzysztof (27 June 1941, Warsaw–13 March 1996, Warsaw), Polish film director. Kieślowski lost his father early. In 1968 he graduated from the Direction Department of the Higher State Film, Television, and Theater School in Łódź. He made his television film debut with Zdjęcie (Photograph; 1968). Initially Kieślowski directed documentaries, of which Byłem żołnierzem (I was a soldier; 1970) and Siedem kobiet w różnym wieku (Seven women in various ages; 1978) became classic works of Polish documentary film. Kieślowski worked in the Documentary Film Studio in Warsaw, taking up topics hardly acceptable to the Communist authorities—for instance, Z miasta Łodzi (From the city of Łódź, 1969) and Robotnicy 71 (Workers 71; 1972, co-director). His early films were severely censored. In 1973 he directed his first feature film, Przejście podziemne (Underpass). From 1974 he belonged to the film group Tor, later a film studio. Kieślowski is considered one of the leaders of the “cinema of moral concern.” His subsequent films—Personnel (Personnel; 1975), Spokój (Quiet; 1976), and Amator (Amateur; 1979)—belonged to this trend. He presented the complicated and mendacious lives of people under totalitarian rule, which forced them to make dramatic moral choices.

In the 1980s Kieślowski more often reflected on human fate and existential problems. Discouraged by politics, he less often referred to social problems. He won fame with his television series Dekalog (The Decalogue; 1989), which referred to universal problems but was set against the dull background of the Polish reality of the late 1980s. Kieślowski found himself among the elite of European cinema with his Podwójne życie Weroniki (The double life of Veronique; 1991), and his position was sealed with the trilogy Trzy kolory: Niebieski (Three colors: Blue; 1993), Trzy kolory: Białe (Three colors: White; 1994), and Trzy kolory: Czerwony (Three colors: Red; 1994), alluding to the French flag. The last received three Oscar nominations. Kieślowski worked with the director of photography Piotr Sobociński and the screenplay writer, lawyer, and politician Krzysztof Piesiewicz. Kieślowski lectured at the film and theater school in Katowice, as well as in Germany, Switzerland, and Finland. He won the Gold Lion in Venice and the Silver Bear in Berlin. He also authored the book Decalogue (1989). (PK)

Sources: Kto jest kim w Polsce 1984: Informator biograficzny (Warsaw, 1984); International Dictionary of Films and Filmmakers, vol. 2 (Chicago and London, 1991); Phil Cavendish, “Kieślowski’s Decalogue,” Sight and Sound, Summer 1990; Rzeczpospolita, 14 March 1996.

KIIIVIT Jaan (27 February 1906, Pahuvere–3 August 1971, Tallinn), Estonian Lutheran clergyman. After graduating in theology from Tartu University in 1932, Kiivit worked as a pastor in the region of Viru-Jaagupi. In 1940 he additionally became head of the Lutheran Church in the district of Virumaa. On the wave of nominations of clergy people who were loyal to the Communist regime, in 1946 Kiivit resigned his position to become an assessor in the consistory. In 1948 he was promoted to head of the Estonian Evangelical Lutheran Church (EELC) in Tallinn, and on 2 February 1949 he was appointed acting bishop of the EELC. This nomination, made a day before the mass deportation of Estonians far into the interior of the USSR, was a turning point in the relations between the state and the Lutheran Church. Kiivit took the place of August Pähn, who, although registered as an NKVD agent, maintained some semblance of the Church’s independence from the state. The elevation of Kiivit to head of the EELC was directly linked to his being recognized as more loyal than his predecessor, who was arrested and deported to Siberia. Documents found after 1991 indicate that at least several years prior to becoming head of the EELC, Kiivit was registered as an NKVD agent under the pseudonym “Yuri I.” Upon the appointment of a new head of the Church, the membership of the consistory was also changed through the recruitment of people who were more submissive to the Communists than the previous members. On 23 October 1949 Kiivit was appointed archbishop of the EELC; it was a new position in the Church’s practice, because until then bishop was the highest Church dignitary. This peculiar promotion was instigated by the authorities, the objective being to raise the prestige of the Church dominated by Communist agents.

With the nomination of Kiivit, the struggle against religion reached a new stage. As a result of the deportations of 1949, Church attendance dropped, and Church documents and sermons adopted some of the terms of Communist propaganda. EELC dignitaries attended state ceremonies, and lower-ranking clergy were forced to promote loyalty to the atheist state. The clergymen also supported the USSR “peace” propaganda abroad. Stalin’s death in 1953 brought a temporary liberalization of religious policy in the USSR, but these changes had little influence on Kiivit’s attitude. He traveled abroad, advertising the alleged religious freedom in the Soviet Union; took part in the “struggle for peace”; and probably collected information for the KGB about the work of other Protestant churches. The atheist campaign led by the authorities after 1959 resulted in a decrease in public interest in the affairs of the EELC, and the number of the faithful dropped within a few years to 10 percent. When Kiivit was retiring as archbishop in 1967, the churches stood empty, and religion had been relegated from the consciousness of most Estonians. Kiivit’s son, Jaan Kiivit, Jr., who became the archbishop of the EELC in 1994, attempted to regain the public trust, yet it is estimated that merely 15 percent of Estonians belong to the Lutheran Church. (AG)

Sources: Eesti Nõukogude Entsüklopeedia, vol. 4 (Tallinn, 1989); Tõnu Parming and Elmar Järvesöö, A Case Study of a Soviet Republic: The Estonian SRR (Boulder, Colo., 1978); Indrek Jürjo, Pagulus ja Nõukogude Eesti: Vaateid KGB, EKP ja VEKSA arhiividokumentide põhjal (Tallinn, 1996); Riho Altnurme, "Religion in Estonia," in "Okupatsioon Museum," <http://www.okupatsioon.ee/english/overviews>; <http://www.eelk.ee/~eelk109/kogodus>; <http://www.ekspress.ee/Arhiiv/Vanad/1997/02/areen/raamat1>.

KILAR Wojciech (17 July 1932, Lwów [Lviv]), Polish composer. In 1955 Kilar graduated from the Higher State Musical School in Katowice, and in 1959–60 he continued his studies with Bolesław Wóytowicz and Nadia Boulanger in Paris. Initially he composed under the influence of the classical composers of twentieth-century music, such as Igor Stravinsky and Béla Bartók. He was also inspired by jazz. Many of Kilar's works were presented for the first time during the International Festivals of Contemporary Music known as "Warsaw Autumn." Kilar made his debut in 1955 with Mała uwertura (Small overture); then he composed his first and second symphonies (1955–56), Riff 62 (1962), Generique (1963), and Diphtongos (1964). Later he developed his own style, combining experimental harmony and sound with elements of folklore. This style was best represented in his Krzesany (1974), Kościelec 1909 (1976), and Orawa (Orava; 1986). In the 1980s and 1990s Kilar's increasingly sophisticated compositions included more and more mystical elements. He did not conceal the Christian inspiration of such works as Angelus (1984) and Missa pro pace (2000). He also wrote music for about 150 films, including Dracula, by Francis F. Coppola; Pan Tadeusz, by Andrzej Wajda; and Pianist, by Roman Polański. Since 1979 Kilar has been vice-president of the Union of Polish Composers. He received many awards, including that of the American Association of Composers (1993) and the (Polish) Grand Award of the Cultural Foundation (2001). (WR) Sources: Kto jest kim w Polsce (Warsaw, 2001); Cieszę się życiem: Rozmowy z Wojciechem Kilarem (Kraków, 1997).

KINGISEPP Viktor (12 March 1888, Kaarma-Suure, Saaremaa—4 May 1922, Tallinn), Estonian Bolshevik activist. At the age of seventeen, Kingisepp took part in the 1905 revolution. In 1906–11 he studied law at the university in St. Petersburg, where in 1917 he passed his final exams. From 1906, as a member of the Bolshevik faction of the Russian Social Democratic Party, he was active in Tallinn and St. Petersburg. A co-founder of the Bolshevik newspaper Kiir, he also published in Pravda. From 1914 to 1916 Kingisepp was active in the region of Tver and Kazan. After the overthrow of tsarism, he returned to Petrograd, but in June 1917 he was again sent to Tallinn, where he was to establish a Bolshevik organization. In October 1917 he became vice-president of the Estonian Military and Revolutionary Committee and helped to organize the Red Guard. A coup that began a few days after the Bolshevik revolution in Petrograd led to a brief takeover of power by the Bolsheviks in Estonia. Kingisepp was responsible for expropriations; depriving the higher social classes of the protection of the law; terror against opponents; desecration of the churches; persecution of the clergy; and forcible suppression of the authorities that enjoyed public support, including in particular the Estonian National Council (Maapäev) (27 November 1917). The German offensive of February 1918 removed the Bolsheviks.

In the spring of 1918 Kingisepp returned to Moscow, where he joined the Cheka and worked in the Supreme Military Tribunal. As an investigator, he took part in the trials of leftist Socialist revolutionaries and in the also in case of Bruce Lockhart (a British diplomat tried by the Soviets for espionage). In November 1918 Kingisepp managed to illegally get to Estonian territory, where he supported the Bolshevik troops in the war against the emerging state. He was responsible for an attempt to stir up a rebellion in Tallinn in December 1918 that was suppressed by the government, and for the bloody pacification of a revolt in Saaremaa in February 1919. Kingisepp represented Moscow's interests at the First and Second Congresses of the Communist Party of Estonia (CPE), where he was elected a member of the Central Committee and the Politburo of the Party. Despite this, in the Tartu Peace Treaty of 2 February 1920, Soviet Russia recognized Estonia's sovereignty. However, Kingisepp's work had some influence on Estonian workers, nearly 10 percent of whom supported the Communists, owing to postwar difficulties. Arrested by the police on 3 May 1922, Kingisepp was tried under martial law regulations by a court martial and was executed by firing squad the following day. His body was burned at an unknown place to prevent the spread of a cult centered around him, but a cult developed nonetheless. Owing to the circumstances of his death, Kingisepp's story was widely exploited by Soviet propaganda at the time of the Soviet occupation of Estonia. The town of Kuressaare was renamed Kingisepp after him. Moreover, he was the hero of stories for the youth, and a great number of squares, streets, and institutions were named after him. After 1991 his cult ended. (AG)

Sources: Eesti Entsüklopeedia, vol. 14 (Tallinn, 2000); Bolshaia Sovetskaia Entsiklopediia, vol. 12 (Moscow, 1973); Rolf Parve, Põranda all: Lugasid ja laaste Viktor Kingisepp (Tallinn, 1967); Matti Laur, Tõnis Lukas, Ain Mäesalu, Ago Pajur, and Tõnu Tanberg, History of Estonia (Tallinn, 2000); Rein Taagepera, Estonia: Return to Independence (Boulder, Colo., 1993).

KINIORSKI Marian (1 December 1868, Pokrzywnica, near Sandomierz–23 May 1943, Warsaw), Polish national politician. Kiniorski came from a landowning family. Expelled from a gymnasium for his patriotic attitude about Poland, he passed his high school final exams in 1888 in Vyazma, Smolensk Province. He subsequently studied in the National Agricultural School in Dublany, near Kraków. At that time he was a member of the first group of the Union of Polish Youth called Zet and headed an organization called Bratnia Pomoc (Fraternal Help). Along with dozens of other students, he left Fraternal Help after a conflict with the authorities of the university. Kiniorski farmed on his family estate, and in 1892 he joined the Polish League (Liga Polska). In 1899, after a two-year course of studies, he graduated from the École des Sciences Politiques in Paris. At that time he became friends with Władysław Reymont and Zenon Przesmycki (Miriam). After graduation, he bought an estate in Suchodziebie, near Kutno. Apart from his farming activities, he worked in the National Education Society (Towarzystwo Oświaty Narodowej [TON]), a secret organization that he supported financially. From 1901 to 1903 he was editor-in-chief of Ekonomista. Kiniorski was one of the co-founders of National Democracy (Narodowa Demokracja [ND]) in the Congress Kingdom of Poland. In 1906, as a representative of the ND, he was a deputy to the first Russian State Duma, and from 1912 to 1914, a deputy to the fourth Duma. In 1912 he became a member of the Chief Council of the ND, and in 1907, the vice-president of the Central Agricultural Society (Centralne Towarzystwo Rolnicze [CTR]). Kiniorski published extensively in the agricultural press. For example, in 1911, under the pseudonym “Rusticus,” he published Listy z dworu wiejskiego (Letters from a country manor). During World War I, he was the secretary of the Inter-Party Political Circle (Międzypartyjne Koło Polityczne), an organization with a pro-Russian and pro-coalition orientation. In March 1918 he became president of the CTR. When Poland regained independence, Kiniorski was active in the Union of Landowners (Związek Ziemian), and in 1920 he was one of the founders of the Union of Polish Agricultural Organizations. From 1922 to 1928 he held a senatorial seat; therefore, in 1923 he resigned as leader of the CTR. A firm opponent of the sanacja regime, in 1930 he withdrew from politics and devoted himself to the administration of his estate. After the Germans captured central Poland in 1939, they removed him from his farm. Kiniorski moved to Warsaw, where he died. His publications include W służbie ziemi (In the service of the land; 1929). (WR) Sources: PSB, vol. 12; Kazimierz Konarski, Dalekie i bliskie: Wspomnienia szczęśliwego człowieka (Wrocław, 1965); Roman Wapiński, Narodowa Demokracja 1893–1939 (Wrocław, 1980); Czesław Brzoza and Kamil Stepan, Posłowie polscy w parlamencie rosyjskim 1906–1917 (Warsaw, 2001).

KIOSEIVANOV Georgi (19 January 1884, Peštera–27 July 1960, La Tour de Peilz, Switzerland), Bulgarian politician. After completing law studies and earning a doctorate at the Sorbonne, Kioseivanov returned to Bulgaria, where he started working in the Ministry for Foreign Affairs. Until 1923 he mostly served in diplomatic missions in such cities as Rome, Istanbul, and Berlin, where he held the post of chargé d'affaires. He was later appointed Bulgarian minister to Bucharest, Athens, and Belgrade. Kioseivanov belonged to a group of nonparty professional diplomats and ardent supporters of Tsar Boris III, who, after assuming authoritarian power in January 1935, installed Kioseivanov as head of his chancellery. In April 1935 he became minister of foreign affairs, and on 23 September 1935 he was appointed prime minister, while keeping the foreign affairs portfolio.

Kioseivanov's main task was to stabilize the new system of government. He suppressed opposition in the army by instituting legal proceedings against officers who held opposition views and disbanding all organizations of career officers. In 1936 he reshuffled the cabinet by recruiting some ministers from the extreme right; this caused protests and led to another reconstruction of the cabinet. Political parties were abolished, and an authoritarian constitution, which greatly increased the tsar's powers, was introduced. However, Kioseivanov failed to completely crush the opposition, which all together received about 40 percent of the mandates in the elections of March 1938. In foreign policy, he attempted to strengthen relations with Yugoslavia (treaty of friendship of 24 January 1937) and Greece (Salonika convention of 31 March 1938). His government unsuccessfully attempted to bring about Romania's peaceful withdrawal from the disputed area of Southern Dobrudja. Kioseivanov led a complicated game with Germany, which was putting pressure on Bulgaria. He saw the Third Reich as a possible source of weapons for the Bulgarian Army; this led to a secret agreement in March 1938 on the supply of German arms; Kioseivanov also hoped Germany could be used to exert pressure on Romania. However, he rejected German demands that Bulgaria join the Axis. After the outbreak of World War II, Bulgaria declared neutrality on 24 October 1939. Kioseivanov tried to prevent Bulgaria from entering the war. This policy led to a divergence of opinions with the tsar, who dismissed Kioseivanov on 16 February 1940 and sent him to the embassy in Switzerland. In 1943 Kioseivanov realized that in the face of the possible defeat of Germany, Bulgaria should seek guarantees for its borders with the Allies; therefore, he entered into negotiations with the Office of Strategic Services (OSS) resident, Allen Dulles, but he abandoned these contacts owing to German pressure. After the coup of 9 September 1944 in Sofia, Kioseivanov was dismissed from his post. Fearing for his life, he remained in the West. Until 1951 he lived in Geneva and then in Madrid, where he contacted Tsarina Joanna and Tsar Simeon II. In 1956 Kioseivanov returned to Switzerland, where he died. (AG)

Sources: Biographisches Lexikon, vol. 2; Marshall Lee Miller, Bulgaria during the Second World War (Stanford, 1975); Stefane Groueff, Crown of Thorns: The Reign of King Boris III of Bulgaria, 1918–1943 (Lanham, Md., 1987); Tadeusz Wasilewski, Historia Bulgarii (Wrocław, 1988); Raymond Detrez, Historical Dictionary of Bulgaria (Lanham, Md., 1997); Tasho Tashev, Ministrice na Bulgariya 1879–1999: Entsiklopedichen spravochnik (Sofia, 1999).

KIRÁLY Béla (14 April 1912, Kaposvár), Hungarian officer, politician, and historian. The son of a head of a railway station, after high school Király enrolled in the Ludovika Military Academy in Budapest. From 1935 to 1940 he served in the army, and in 1942 he graduated with distinction from the Military Academy of the General Staff. From December 1942 he worked in the Ministry of National Defense. In the summer of 1943 he was sent to the eastern front. After the Arrow Cross takeover in October 1944, Király stayed in the army, and in March 1945 he volunteered to defend the town of Kőszeg in western Hungary against the Red Army. Nevertheless, he soon passed over to the Russian side. Treated as a prisoner of war, he escaped from a transport into Russia. After returning home in the summer of 1945, he joined the Hungarian Communist Party (HCP), and in early 1946 he became lieutenant colonel and chief of staff of a division in the town of Pápa. From 1947 Király headed the Training Department of the Ministry of Defense. From 1948 he was a deputy commander and in 1949–50 a commander of infantry. From September 1950 he commanded the Military Academy in Budapest. He was promoted to brigadier general and organized military parades in Budapest. In the summer of 1951 Király was arrested and in January 1952 sentenced to death for “anti-state activities” and “plotting against the power of the people.” The sentence was then commuted to life in prison.

In September 1956 Király was released, and he joined the followers of Imre Nagy. On 31 October he was rehabilitated by the Supreme Court. During the revolution he became chairman of the Revolutionary Committee of National Defense, coordinating the command of the Hungarian Army, the Revolutionary Defense Committee, and the operations of the Revolutionary National Guard (RNG). On 31 October Király was appointed RNG commander in chief and military commander of Budapest. In compliance with the instructions of Imre Nagy, on 4 November Király ordered his troops not to resist the Soviet Army. He himself, however, took up the struggle against the Soviets, commanding a few units until he finally crossed the Austrian border in late November 1956. In January 1957 Király was elected deputy chairman of the Hungarian Revolutionary Council in Strasbourg, France; it included leaders of the revolution who had been forced to leave the country. Later Király settled in the United States, where he organized the Hungarian Committee and belonged to several Hungarian émigré organizations.

In 1966 Király retired from political life and started a scholarly career. In 1957 he graduated in history from Columbia University; in 1962 he received a Ph.D.; and in 1963–83 he lectured at Brooklyn College and the City University of New York, where he became professor of military science. In 1994 Király received honorary doctorates from both universities. The state of Kentucky appointed him colonel, while the state of Maryland and the city of Baton Rouge, Louisiana, granted him honorary citizenship. On 16 June 1989 Király spoke in Budapest during the solemn funeral of Imre Nagy and his aides. After the fall of communism, Király recovered his Hungarian citizenship, and in 1990 he was promoted to retired general of arms. In 1990–94 he was an MP on behalf of the Alliance of Free Democrats. Király edited a number of books on the 1956 revolution and the history of communism in East Central Europe. His memoirs, Honvédségből Néphadsereg (From the Honved Army to the People’s Army), were published in the West in 1986 and in Hungary in 1989. In 2001 Király published The Basic History of Modern Hungary, 1867–1999. (JT)

Sources: A magyar forradalom és szabadságharc enciklopédiája, CD-ROM (Budapest, 1999); Magyar Nagylexikon, vol. 11 (Budapest, 2000); Paul Ignotus, Hungary (London, 1972); Society in Change: Studies in Honor of Béla Király (Boulder, Colo., 1983); Ki kicsoda 2000 (Budapest, 2001); György Litván, ed., Revolucja węgierska 1956 roku (Warsaw, 1996).

KIRÁLY Karoly (26 September, 1930 Târnâveni), Hungarian Communist activist and dissident in Romania. Király graduated from the Academy of Economic Sciences in Bucharest and the Ștefan Gheorghiu Higher Party School. He started his career in the early 1950s in the apparatus of the Romanian Workers' Party (as of 1965, the Romanian Communist Party [RCP]) in Transylvania. Among other things, he was first secretary of the RCP organization in the Covașna region, where the share of Hungarians reached 86 percent. From 1970 Király was a deputy member of the Politburo of the RCP Executive Committee. He was also deputy chairman of the Council of the Hungarian Working People. Known as an organizer of hunting and partying for RCP officials in the Transylvanian forests, in 1972 Király radically changed his stance, protesting before the top RCP leadership against the discrimination of the Hungarian minority. He criticized the reduction of Hungarian instruction in schools; the numerus clausus principle in university, government, and party admittance; and the elimination of the use of bilingual geographical names. He also criticized the Nicolae Ceaușescu regime. Called to Bucharest in 1974, he talked with Prime Minister Ilie Verdeț, reiterating his protests. He also passed open letters to the West. In February 1978 Király was arrested and exposed to radioactivity, following which he was interned in the Caransebeș prison. Released in October 1978, he continued dissident activities and was kept under surveillance by the political police, the Securitate. In 1985, along with other opposition activists, Király signed a declaration in defense of Hungarian minority rights in Romania. After the revolution of December 1989 Király was co-founder of the Democratic Alliance of Hungarians in Romania (DAHR) and deputy chairman of the Council of the National Salvation Front. In the elections of May 1990 he was elected to the Senate on behalf of the DAHR and sat in the Upper House until the end of the term in May 1992. (ASK) Sources: Relatara Karoly Király (N.p., 1998); Dennis Deletant, Ceaușescu and the Securitate: Coercion and Dissent in Romania, 1965–1989 (New York, 1995); Ion M. Pacepa, Red Horizons (New York, 1987); George Schöpflin and Henry Poulton, Romania's Ethnic Hungarians (London, 1990).

KIRCHENŠTEINS Augusts (18 September 1872, Waldenberg [Mazcalaca]–3 September 1963, Riga), Latvian microbiologist and political activist. Kirchenšteins came from a peasant family and completed veterinary studies in Dorpat (Tartu). He took part in the revolution of 1905 and then emigrated. From 1907 to 1908 he studied in Zurich, then worked in Switzerland and in Serbia. In 1914–17 he served in the Serbian Army as a doctor. In 1917 he returned to Latvia, and in 1919 he created the veterinary department at the University of Riga. Between June and October 1919 he was the head of the Veterinary Inspectors' Office of the Latvian Army. From 1923 he was a professor, and he worked on vaccines against tuberculosis. As president of the Society of Latvian-Soviet Friendship, Kirchenšteins was a frequent guest at the embassy of the USSR in Riga, and he established close contacts with the representatives of the Kremlin.

After the Soviet invasion on 18 June 1940, a special Soviet envoy, Andrei Vyshinsky, submitted to President Kārlis Ulmanis a list of new government members, with Kirchenšteins as prime minister. After the list had been signed, Kirchenšteins assumed power, and Ulmanis was soon arrested. On 6 July 1940 Kirchenšteins announced elections to the new National Assembly, stressing that previous governments had not guaranteed friendly relations with the USSR and that his cabinet would implement the resolutions of the agreements between the two states. He also stated that “the presence of the Red Army serves the defense of freedom and the preservation of statehood.” Vyshinsky also publicly supported the idea of a “free Latvia.” The electoral law, however, was illegally changed so that only candidates approved by the Communists could run for seats. “The elections” of 14–15 July 1940 obviously brought success to the Communist list. On 18 July the New Assembly passed the incorporation of Latvia into the USSR as a Soviet republic, and Kirchenšteins became president of Latvia's Supreme Council. On 25 July 1940 he recalled Latvia's diplomatic representatives from abroad, but the great majority of them ignored this demand and refused to return home. In the new constitution the principle of the “dictatorship of the proletariat” was introduced. Kirchenšteins signed arrest and deportation orders for the Latvian national elite, actions that followed in 1940–41. After the German aggression in June 1941 Kirchenšteins took refuge in Moscow, where he assumed the post of vice-president of the Supreme Council of the USSR. He returned to Riga with the Red Army. Between 1944 and 1952 he again presided over the Supreme Council of the Latvian SSR and signed a great many deportation orders of Latvians in 1944 and 1949. After that he returned to his scientific work as the director of the Institute of Microbiology of the Latvian Academy of Sciences. Kirchenšteins published around eight hundred scientific works. He received many awards, including that of Hero of Socialist Work. (WR)

Sources: Alfred Bilmanis, A History of Latvia (Princeton, 1951); Albert N. Tarulis, Soviet Policy toward the Baltic States (Notre Dame, Ind., 1959); Who Was Who in the USSR (Metuchen, N.J., 1972).

KIRIL, Prince of Preslav (5 November 1895, Sofia–2 February 1946, Sofia), younger brother of Tsar Boris III, regent of Bulgaria. Kiril was the son of Ferdinand. As his older brother, Boris, was to succeed to the throne, he was not involved in politics. He liked to surround himself with expensive women. During his stay in Vienna at the end of World War I, he accumulated debts that caused great trouble for the royal family. Although it was common knowledge that Kiril was not interested in public life, this did not hinder the court camarilla from appointing him general. After Boris died, in August 1943 Prime Minister Bogdan Filov used his influence to get Kiril elected as one of the regents, against the terms of the constitution, which stipulated that only a person known for his public activity might become regent. On 8 September 1943 the National Assembly elected Kiril, along with Filov and General Nikola Mihov, to the Regency Council, which was to exercise power on behalf of Simeon, who was under age. As Kiril continued to show little interest in state affairs, the other two regents coordinated those affairs themselves, presenting them to Kiril in ready form; therefore his rather moderate attitude toward cooperation with the Germans was of no great importance. When on 9 September 1944 the Communist uprising in Sofia led to the overthrow of the rule of the regents, Kiril was arrested, and along with about a hundred associates he was sentenced to death and executed. In fact, the verdict was dictated by Georgi Dimitrov from Moscow. (WR) Sources: Entsiklopediya Bulgariya, vol. 3; M. L. Miller, Bulgaria during the Second World War (Stanford, 1975); Hans-Joachim Hoppe, Bulgarien–Hitlers eigenwilliger Verbündeter (Stuttgart, 1979); Stéphane Groueff, Crown of Thorns (Lanham, Md., 1987); Jerzy Jackowicz, Partie opozycyjne w Bułgarii 1944–1948 (Warsaw, 1997).

KIRYL [originally Konstantin Konstantinov] (3 January 1901, Sofia–7 February 1971, Sofia), patriarch of the Bulgarian Orthodox Church, historian, and theologian. After graduating from the theological seminary in Sofia in 1920, Kiryl studied theology in Belgorod and Cernaui (Chernivtsi) (1920–25) and philosophy in Berlin (1928–30). In 1923 he was ordained, and in 1927 he received a Ph.D. in theology. He taught in the Sofia seminary. He was also secretary of Rila Monastery and chief secretary of the synod. In 1938 Kiryl was elected metropolitan of Plovdiv, and he was one of the key organizers of the Bulgarian Orthodox Church's pronouncements against anti-Jewish legislation. Starting with a memorandum on 15 November 1940 through protests in 1943, the Bulgarian Synod (thanks to Kiril, among others) appealed to Tsar Boris III and state authorities in defense of the Bulgarian Jews, remembering Christ's command to love one's brother. On 10 March 1943 Kiryl stated in Plovdiv that he would leave with the 1,500 Jews who had been arrested, and his declaration prevented their deportation. After the coup of 9 November 1944 Kiryl was arrested and brutally interrogated. Later Communist tactics minimized the moral influence of the church and reduced it to a pure decoration, so Kiryl was released. In the summer of 1948 he took part in an Orthodox conference in Moscow chaired by the patriarch of Moscow. On 10 May 1953 the Bulgarian church recovered its own patriarchy, lost under the Turkish occupation in 1393, and the national council elected Kiryl patriarch. Swathed in the appearance of splendor, the Bulgarian Orthodox Church lost real independence and moral authority. Kiryl authored a number of works on the history of the Bulgarian church and received honorary doctorates from theological academies in Sofia, Moscow, and Leningrad. In 2001 the Yad Vashem Institute in Jerusalem posthumously awarded him the title of Righteous among the Nations. (WDj)

Sources: Entsiklopediya Bulgariya, vol. 2 (Sofia, 1978); Bulgariya 20. vek. Almanakh (Sofia, 1999); Kiryl Patriarkh Bulgarski: Jubileyna nauchna sesiya (Plovdiv, 2001).

KIŠ Danilo (2 February 1935, Subotica–15 October 1989, Paris), Yugoslav writer. Kiš was born into a Hungarian Jewish family from Bačka. During the war, he witnessed pogroms against Jews, and his father perished in the Auschwitz death camp in Oświęcim. He was sixteen when his mother died, causing another shock. Kiš passed his high school graduation exams in Cetinje, and in 1958 he completed philosophical studies in Belgrade, specializing in world literature. After doing his military service (1961–62), he published his first two novels: Mansarda and Psalam 44 (Psalm 44; 1962). He worked as a teacher of the Serbo-Croatian language in Strasbourg (1962–64) and Bordeaux (1974–76). Kiš spent the last years of his life in Paris. He wrote in Serbian. In his writings, which reveal postmodernist features, he included conspicuously autobiographical motifs, depicting the fate of a Jewish child and his father, who becomes an almost mythical figure. Kiš's literary works include the novels Bašta, pepeo (1965; Garden, Ashes, 1975) and Peščanik (1972; Hourglass, 1990); the collections of essays Poetika I and Poetika II (1972); stories devoted to the victims of Stalinism: Grobnica za Borisa Davidoviča (1976; Tomb for Boris Davidovich, 1978) and Enciklopedija mrtvih (1987; Encyclopedia of the Dead, 1989); a collection of sketches, Čas anatomije (The anatomy lesson; 1978); and numerous translations of French, Russian, and Hungarian poetry. Kiš received many Yugoslav and foreign awards, including awards from France. (WR)

Sources: Nova encyklopedia powszechna PWN, vol. 3 (Warsaw, 1995); Jovan DeliĆ, Književni pogledi Danila Kiša (Belgrade, 1995); Susan Sontag, ed., Homo poeticus: Essays and Interviews with Danilo Kiš (New York, 1995); Mihailo Pantić, Kiš (Novi Sad, 1998); Krzysztof Varga, “Szalona jasność umysłu,” Gazeta Wyborcza, 16–17 October 1999; www.kis.org.yu.

KIS János (17 September, 1943 Budapest), Hungarian dissident and politician. A graduate in philosophy from Eötvös Lóránd University in Budapest in 1967, in 1967–73 Kis worked in the Institute of Philosophy of the Hungarian Academy of Sciences, from which he was expelled for his political views. His publications were banned. From the early 1970s, he was active in the democratic opposition. He signed its most important pronouncements and documents; in 1981–89 he edited the leading Hungarian periodical of the uncensored press, Beszélő; and from 1989 to 1991 he presided over its program council. Kis was a founding member of the Alliance of Free Democrats (Szabad Demokraták Szövetsége [AFD]), and until 1999 he belonged to its National Council. As the leading leftist and later liberal intellectual, Kis exercised a strong influence on AFD circles, whose stance evolved from anti-communism to cooperation with the Communists after 1989; in 1994–98 and from 2002 the AFD entered into the ruling coalition with the Communists. Gradually withdrawing from a direct engagement in politics, Kis remained active in public life, frequently appearing in the media and speaking on contemporary domestic and foreign policy issues. In the fall of 2002 he left the AFD in protest against its unconditional support for Prime Minister Péter Medgyessy, accused of cooperation with the former Communist secret services. Kis authored Hogyan lehetséges kritikai gazdaságtan? (Is critical economics possible? 1973); Vannak-e emberi jogaink? (Are we entitled to human rights? 1986); Politics in Hungary: For a Democratic Alternative (1989); and Az állam semlegessége (Neutrality of the state; 1997). (AH)

Sources: Ki kicsoda 2002 (Budapest, 2001); Magyar Nalexikon (Budapest, 2000).

KISIELEWSKI Stefan (7 March 1911, Warsaw–27 September 1991, Warsaw), Polish writer, composer, and music critic. The son of Zygmunt Kisielewski, a writer and Socialist activist, in 1937 Kisielewski graduated from the Warsaw Conservatory. He also studied in the Department of Humanities at Warsaw University. While a student, he made his literary debut in the magazine Bunt Młodych, edited by Jerzy Giedroyc, and he became a regular contributor to the magazine and to its successor, Polityka (from 1935). Kisielewski took part in the September campaign of 1939, and during the Nazi occupation he was active in the cultural underground—for example, in a unit of the Delegation of the Polish Government-in-Exile for the Homeland, which was preparing the reactivation of Polish Radio. He fought in the Warsaw Uprising in the ranks of the Home Army.

In 1945 Kisielewski began to work with the Kraków weekly Tygodnik Powszechny, in which he criticized romantic attitudes and the armed struggle against the new government. Under the pseudonym of “Kisiel” he also published popular columns. After the Pax Association took over the weekly in 1953, Kisielewski stopped contributing to Tygodnik Powszechny. Between 1945 and 1949 Kisielewski was a professor at the Higher School of Music in Kraków; in 1945–46 and 1956–59 he was the editor of the magazine Ruch Muzyczny; and between 1956 and 1961 he served as president of the Polish Composers’ Union. He composed several symphonies and many other musical works. In 1956–57 Kisielewski was the co-author of the concept of “neopositivism,” which recognized the necessity of respecting the political and geopolitical realities of the Polish People’s Republic but did not accept the ideological principles of socialism. Such a concept of realism was a starting point for postulating a gradual liberalization of the system, as well as the extension of human rights. After October 1956 Kisielewski returned to the revived Tygodnik Powszechny, where he wrote a popular series of feature articles—for example, Łopata do głowy (Explaining in the simplest terms), Gwoździe w mózgu (Nails in the brain), and, in 1976–81, Wołanie na puszczy (A cry in the desert).

As a journalist and an MP on behalf of the parliamentary group Znak (1957–65), Kisielewski urged the rationalization of the economy; a lifting of restrictions on the development of the small private sector; an extension of the freedom of speech; limitations on the powers of censorship; and a facilitation of contacts with the West. He made similar proposals as a member of the executive of the Polish Writers’ Union. In 1964 he signed the “Letter of 34” against the excessive interference of censorship. These deeds made Kisielewski a target of attacks by Communist authorities. On 29 February 1968, at the General Assembly of the Warsaw branch of the Polish Writers’ Union, Kisielewski made a famous speech on the “dictatorship of blockheads” in Polish culture. In the weeks that followed he became one of the main objects of an aggressive propaganda campaign. He was also beaten by “unknown perpetrators” and was temporarily banned from publishing.

Between 1967 and 1976 at the Paris-based Literary Institute (Instytut Literacki) Kisielewski, under the pseudonym of “Tomasz Staliński,” published five popular novels devoted to the realities of the Polish People’s Republic, among them Cienie w pieczarze (Shadows in the cavern; 1971), Romans zimowy (Winter romance; 1972), and Śledztwo (Investigation; 1974). His commentaries and feature articles, banned by censorship in Tygodnik Powszechny, ran periodically in the magazine Kultura. In 1975–76 Kisielewski participated in a protest campaign against amendments to the constitution. From 1976 he worked with the Committee for the Defense of Workers (Komitet Obrony Robotników [KOR]) and later with the Committee for Social Self-Defense KOR and with the uncensored press, where he published political brochures, such as Na czym polega socjalizm? (What does socialism consist of?) and Czy istnieje walka o świat? (Is there a struggle for the world?). Kisielewski advocated that the opposition seek an agreement with Moscow, leaving out the authorities of the Polish People's Republic. He regarded the bankruptcy of the Socialist economic system as irreparable, and, especially after 1981, he advocated a shift toward a market economy and economic liberalism. In the late 1980s he established ties with a group that created the Movement of Real Politics (Ruch Polityki Realnej) in 1987 and later the Union of Real Politics (Unia Polityki Realnej), of which he was an honorary president. In 1990 he supported the candidacy of Lech Wałęsa for president, which led to his parting with Tygodnik Powszechny. He moved his feature articles to the weekly Wprost. Kisielewski also authored numerous essays and feature articles; a novel, Sprzysiężenie (Conspiracy; 1949); works published under his real name or under pseudonyms; a volume of sketches about composers, Gwiazdozbiór muzyczny (Musical constellation; 1958); and Dzienniki (Diaries), published in 1996. (AF)

Sources: Opozycja w PRL: Słownik biograficzny 1956–89 (Warsaw, 2000); Literatura polska: Przewodnik encyklopedyczny (Warsaw, 1984), vol. 1; Marta Fik, Kultura polska po Jalcie: Kronika lat 1944–1981 (London, 1989); Jerzy Eisler, Marzec 1968 (Warsaw, 1991); Andrzej Friszke, Opozycja polityczna w PRL 1945–1980 (London, 1994).

KISS János (24 March 1883, Erdőszentgyörgy [Sângeorgiu de Pădure, Romania]–8 December 1944, Budapest), Hungarian general. Born into a Szekler soldier's family in Transylvania, Kiss graduated from a cadet school in Nagyszeben (Sibiu) in 1902. He fought in World War I, and then he served in the Hungarian Army. In 1929 he was promoted to the rank of colonel. He commanded the Fifth Honved Regiment (1928–32) and the First Bicycle Brigade, and he was instructor of sports in Baranya Province (1933–36). In 1936 he was promoted to general and assigned to the High Command of the Hungarian Army. In 1938, as general of division, he became inspector of infantry of the High Command. In 1939, in protest against the High Command's pro-German line, he retired. Kiss was a close friend of Endre Bajcsy-Zsilinszky. In the spring of 1944 he worked out a strategic plan according to which the Hungarian Army would withdraw to the Balkans and join the Yugoslav guerrillas. When the Arrow Cross Party seized power in October 1944, Kiss became commander of the Hungarian National Insurgent and Liberation Committee. He elaborated a plan for an uprising in Budapest, but before it could be implemented, Arrow Cross learned about the committee and arrested Kiss and his aides on 22 November 1944. After two weeks of cruel interrogations, a military tribunal of the Arrow Cross government sentenced Kiss to death, and he was soon executed. In March 1945 he was posthumously promoted to the rank of general of arms. (JT)

Sources: Magyar Életrajzi Lexikon, vol. 1 (Budapest, 1967); Magyar Nagylexikon, vol. 11 (Budapest, 2000); Sándor Kiss, Emlékeim Kiss János altábornagyról (Budapest, 1979).

KISTIAKOVSKYI Bohdan (4 November 1868, Kiev–16 April 1920, Yekaterinodar [now Krasnodar] on the Kuban River), Ukrainian sociologist and philosopher of law. Kistiakovskiy was a nephew of the historian Volodymyr Antonovych and the son of Oleksander Kistiakovskiy, a professor of law and president of the Law Society in Kiev. Kistiakovskiy declared himself a Ukrainian already in his youth, although he did not learn to speak Ukrainian until he was an adult. He advocated that the Ukraine remain in a union with Russia. During his law studies in Kiev (1888–90), Kharkiv (1890), and Dorpat (Tartu, 1890–92), he was active in Marxist and national groups. Imprisoned from 1892 to 1893, he was kept under police surveillance until 1895 for spreading revolutionary ideas. He continued his studies in Berlin, Paris, and Strasbourg, where he earned a doctorate in theoretical sociology for his work Gesellschaft und Einzelwesen: Eine methodologische Untersuchung (1899). At that time Kistiakovskiy was already being influenced by Ferdinand Tönnies, Georg Simmel, formal sociology, and the neo-Kantians. He himself exerted influence on such scientists as Georg Jellinek, Max Weber, and Hans Kelsen. Persecuted in Russia (his wife was exiled for taking part in the national movement), Kistiakovskiy returned to Germany. He cooperated with Russian liberal circles in exile, co-edited Osvobozhdenie (1902–5), and became a member of the Russian Constitutional Democratic Party (the so-called Kadets). He also stayed in touch with Galician radicals, including Ivan Franko.

Kistiakovskiy returned to Russia after the tsar's manifesto of October 1905. He lectured at the Institute of Trade and, from 1909 on, also at Moscow University. In 1909 he published Stranitsy proshlogo: K istorii konstitutsion- nogo dvizheniia v Rossii (Pages from the past: From the history of the constitutional movement in Russia). In 1911 he resigned in protest against the conservative policy of tsarism and became a teacher of the philosophy of law and political science at Demidov High School. From 1907 to 1910 he edited Kriticheskoe obozrenie, a periodical that published translations of works by Western authors, and from 1912 to 1917 he was editor-in-chief of Pravovoi Vestnik. In 1916 he published Sotsialnye nauki i pravo (Social sciences and law), which was considered his life's work. He also wrote for the Moscow periodical Ukrainskaia zhizn (1912–17). Disappointed with the Kadets's approach to the Ukrainian cause, in 1917 Kistiakovskiy returned to Kiev, where he took up the chair of law at the university. Under the government of Hetman Pavlo Skoropadskiy, he became a member of the Senate and the Administrative Court and helped to draft a law on citizenship and a statute on the Ukrainian Academy of Sciences. In 1919 he became a member of the Ukrainian Academy of Sciences, where he held the chairs of law and sociology. His article about Russian "legal nihilism," which was published in the famous collection Vekhi (Landmarks; 1909), became the subject of a national debate. (TS)

Sources: Encyclopaedia of Social Sciences, vol. 8 (New York, 1932); A. Vucinich, Social Thought in Tsarist Russia: The Quest for a General Science of Society, 1861–1917 (Chicago and London, 1976); Andrzej Walicki, Filozofia prawa rosyjskiego liberalizmu (Warsaw, 1995); S. Heuman, Kistiakovskiy: The Struggle for National and Constitutional Rights in the Last Years of Tsarism (Cambridge, Mass., 1998).

KISZCZAK Czesław (19 October 1925, Roczyny, near Bielsko), Polish Communist activist and general. Born into a peasant family, during World War II Kiszczak was active in the Communist underground. From 1945 he served in the Communist Polish Army, working in intelligence and counterintelligence. Among other things, he supervised the return of Polish officers from Great Britain to Poland after the war. In 1945 he joined the (Communist) Polish Workers' Party, and he attended the central party school. From December 1948 he was a member of the Polish United Workers' Party (Polska Zjednoczona Partia Robotnicza [PUWP]). In 1957 Kiszczak graduated from the Academy of the General Staff. In 1972–79 he was deputy chief of the General Staff and the head of military intelligence. In 1970 he was active in a special task force connected with the workers' riots on the Baltic Coast. From 1973 he was a brigadier general, and from 1979, general of division. In 1979–81 he was chief of the Military Internal Service (Wojskowa Służba Wewnętrzna), or counterintelligence; in 1983 he was promoted to the rank of general of arms. At the same time he advanced in the party structures. In February 1980 Kiszczak became a deputy member, and in July 1981 a member, of the PUWP Central Committee (CC); in February 1982 he became a deputy member, and in July 1986 a member, of the Politburo. Thanks to the support of General Wojciech Jaruzelski, in July 1981 Kiszczak became minister of interior, replacing Mirosław Milewski, with whom he was in conflict. This nomination strengthened Jaruzelski's control of the security apparatus. In 1985–89 Kiszczak was also an MP.

Kiszczak was one of the key architects of martial law, introduced on 13 December 1981, and a member of the non-constitutional Military Council of National Salvation. As minister of interior, at the beginning of the period of martial law, he instructed the lower levels of command to use firearms; this led to the shooting to death of several striking miners of the Wujek coal mine on 16 December 1981. Kiszczak also directed the repression of the Solidarity leadership and other participants of the protests. In 1983–89 Kiszczak chaired the government Committee for the Respect of Law, Public Order, and Social Discipline, and after the abolishment of martial law he retained special authority to use coercion. As a result of new strikes, in August and September 1988 Kiszczak was empowered by Jaruzelski to start negotiations with the Solidarity leadership. On 31 August 1988 he met with Lech Wałęsa. One of the initiators of the Round Table Talks and co-chairman of the party and government delegation to the talks (February–April 1989), despite the PUWP defeat in the parliamentary elections of June 1989, on 2 August 1989 Kiszczak became prime minister. His attempts to create a government failed. In September 1989 he assumed the position of deputy prime minister and minister of interior in the government of Tadeusz Mazowiecki. In this capacity he slowed down the personnel shifts in his ministry. During his term a significant amount of crucial PUWP and security apparatus evidence was destroyed or taken over by private hands. Kiszczak left the government in July 1990. In 1997 he was tried before the Tribunal of State for allowing the duty-free import of alcohol, but he was acquitted. Kiszczak's trial concerning his responsibility for the shooting of the Wujek miners ended in March 2004 with a suspended sentence of two years in prison, but he appealed. (PK)

Sources: Mołdawa; Słownik polityków polskich XX wieku (Poznań, 1998); Witold Bereś and Jerzy Skoczylas, Generał Kiszczak mówi . . . Prawie wszystko (Warsaw, 1991); Generał Pawłow, Byłem rezydentem KGB w Polsce (Warsaw, 1994); Jan Skórzyński, Ugoda i rewolucja: Władza i opozycja 1985–89 (Warsaw, 1995).

KITZBERG August (8 January 1856, Põlde, near Laatre–10 October 1927, Tartu), Estonian writer and dramatist. Born into a poor peasant family, Kitzberg could not attend school because of a lack of finances, and he became an autodidact. Initially he worked as a municipal clerk, and in 1894 he took up a job with a bank in Dvinsk (now Daugavpils). From 1901 to 1904 he headed the sales department of the newspaper Postimees, and from 1904 to 1920 he worked in a mortgage bank in Dorpat. In 1920 he retired. Although he began writing in the 1870s, his literary career developed slowly. He gained some popularity after writing the novel Maimu (1889). He also wrote novels for the daily or weekly press, and a collection of these novels was published in 1915. Initially Kitzberg's writing was imbued with optimism, while social criticism was reduced to a humorous element—for instance, in Punga Maart a Uba Kaarel (Wise Martin and Dumb Charles; 1894); Pila-Peteri Testament (The testament of Pila-Peteri; 1897); and Rädsep Óhk (Tailor Óhk; 1903). Under the influence of realist writers, particularly Eduard Vilde, Kitzberg's social criticism became sharper. His collaboration with Vanemuine, the first professional theater in Estonia, was a turning point in his career; there he finally found a place where his plays were staged, and he developed a friendship with Karl Menning, the theater director, who became his patron. Kitzberg became the most prominent Estonian dramatist of the turn of the century, and his plays were also staged abroad—for example, in Hungary and Italy. In the drama Kauka jumal (1906; In the gale of winds; 1906), Kitzberg condemned social inequities and exonerated the poor, even if they fought for their rights by means of revolution. In the drama Libahunt (Werewolf; 1912) he depicted the reactions of a rural community to new social phenomena. The emancipation-seeking heroine comes into conflict with people around her; consequently she becomes the victim of a plot, and she is ousted from the village. She lives the life of a savage in the woods, and one day she is shot by her former fiancé, who, mistaking her for a wild animal, kills her out of fear. (AG)

Sources: Kto est kto v kulture Estonii: Izobrazitelnie isskustva, literatura, teatr; muzika, kino (Avenaris, 1996); Eesti Entsüklopeedia, vol. 14 (Tallinn, 2000); mapage.nooos.fr/estonie/Kitzberg.html; www.miksike.ee/lisakogud/kirjandus/kitzberg.htm.

KLAUS Václav (19 June 1941, Prague), Czech economist and politician, president of the Czech Republic. In 1963 Klaus graduated in foreign trade from the Higher School of Economics in Prague, and then he worked in the Institute of Economics of the Czechoslovak Academy of Sciences (CAS). He went to Italy (1966) and the United States (1969) for additional training. In the 1960s he published articles criticizing the economic system, and in 1968 he became head of the economic section of Lidové noviny. After the suppression of the Prague Spring, Klaus was forced to leave the Institute of Economics in 1969. For fifteen years he worked in the central bank, and in 1987–89, in the Forecasting Institute of the CAS. In the 1970s and 1980s he mostly dealt with macroeconomics, monetary policy, and comparative economic systems. He published both in official periodicals and in the uncensored press, as well as abroad. He attracted a group of economists who developed monetarist views.

In November 1989 Klaus was one of the founders of the Civic Forum (Občanské Fórum [OF]), and he took part in talks between the opposition and the Communist authorities. In the government of Marian Čalfa, Klaus was minister of finance from December 1989. He retained this position after the first free elections of June 1990, and from 3 October 1991 he was simultaneously deputy prime minister. In October 1990 he became head of the OF, and after its split in April 1991 he became chairman of the (conservative-liberal) Civic Democratic Party (Občanská Demokratická Strana [ODS]). From June 1990 he was a deputy to the Chamber of the People of the Federal Assembly. After the elections of June 1992, when the breakup of Czechoslovakia became inevitable, Klaus resigned from the federal government and assumed the position of prime minister of the Czech Republic, which he held until 2 January 1998. Klaus was the chief architect of transformation to a market economy. He opposed the “third way” of Valtr Komárek, as well as the “non-political politics” of Václav Havel, which resulted in his conflicts with many politicians. He authored and implemented a controversial plan of coupon privatization. He helped both republics rejoin the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank, but his reforms were a source of frustration and protests, especially in Slovakia, which was an additional reason for the breakup of the federation. After the 1992 elections, as the ODS chairman, Klaus took part in talks on the dissolution of the federation with Vladimír Mečiar's Movement for a Democratic Slovakia, which won in Slovakia. As the Czech prime minister, Klaus was not in favor of the Slovak “brake” on market reforms but supported an efficient separation and regulation of Czech-Slovak relations.

After the Czech Republic became independent, Klaus continued the market and democratic reforms. He supported privatization, although he opposed the restitution of nationalized property, especially that of the Catholic Church. He was skeptical about prospects for Central European cooperation and slowed down cooperation within the Višegrad Group (the Czech Republic, Hungary, Poland, and Slovakia). Initially he was also not enthusiastic about European integration. After the 1996 elections the ODS retained its position as the strongest Czech party, but a coalition with the Christian and Democratic Union–Czechoslovak People’s Party (Křesťanská a Demokratická Unie–Československa Strana Lidová [KDU–ČSL]) and the Civic Democratic Alliance (Občanská Demokratická Aliance [ODA]) did not constitute a majority in the parliament. Klaus’s new government faced a deteriorating economic and social situation and tensions within the coalition. The latter was also a result of Klaus’s political style because he seemed convinced of his infallibility. In November 1997 a scandal broke out connected with irregularities in ODS financing; it led to the collapse of Klaus’s government on 30 November 1997 and the departure of many disappointed activists from his party. Notwithstanding, Klaus managed to keep his position as ODS chairman and led the party to unexpected success in the early elections of June 1998. The ODS came in second after the Social Democrats. In view of the Social Democrats’ inability to create a majority coalition, Klaus made an “opposition agreement” with them, providing for the formation of a minority Social Democratic government, the election of speakers of both houses from the ODS, and consultation on major government policies with the ODS.

On 17 July 1998 Klaus assumed the position of speaker in the parliament. Despite various challenges, the “opposition agreement” survived a full term of parliament, and Klaus was its speaker until the June 2002 elections. Since he was not a coalition member, he could criticize government policies while maintaining some influence over them. Contrary to widespread expectations, the ODS was defeated in 2002, and the Social Democrats entered into a new coalition with the KDU–ČSL and the Freedom Union, thereby discontinuing the “opposition agreement.” Klaus and the ODS were forced into the opposition. Klaus declared that he would not run for the ODS chairmanship in the next election, and during the party congress in December 2002 he became its honorary chairman. Despite an unfavorable parliamentary configuration, Klaus attracted a number of leftist votes, and, after several rounds, he was finally elected president on 28 February 2003. (PU)

Sources: ČBS; Českoslovenští politici: 1918–1991 (Prague, 1991); Kdo byl kdo v našich dějinách ve 20. století, vol. 1 (Prague, 1998); Jan Rychlík, Rozpad Československa: Česko-slovenské vztahy 1989–1992 (Bratislava, 2002); Eric Stein, Czecho/Slovakia: Ethnic Conflict, Constitutional Fissure, Negotiated Breakup (Ann Arbor, 1997); Oldřich Dědek et al., Ekonomické aspekty zániku Československa (Prague, 1997); www.ods.cz; wtd.vlada.cz/scripts/detail.php?id=457; www.klaus.cz.

KLAUSON Valter (20 December 1913, Tolmachov, near St. Petersburg–5 December 1988, Tallinn), Estonian Communist activist. The son of a laborer, Klauson was brought up in the USSR. In 1933 he finished a technical high school and subsequently worked as head of a technical department, taking part in the construction of roads, bridges, and railway lines. After the outbreak of the German-Soviet war in June 1941, he was inducted into the Red Army. He initially commanded a company and later a battalion. In 1943 he joined the Communist Party. After Soviet troops captured Estonia, Klauson went there as one of the “Yestonians” (Estonians who had been Russified in the USSR), and from 1944 to 1953 he held executive positions in the Administration of Roads of the Estonian SSR. In 1953–54 he served as minister of transport and roads of the Estonian SSR. In 1954 he became first deputy prime minister, and from October 1961 to January 1984 he served as prime minister of the Estonian SSR. In 1965 he graduated from a party university of the Central Committee (CC) of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union (CPSU). He was also a member of the USSR Supreme Soviet (1958–74), the CPSU CC (1961–86), and the Politburo of the Communist Party of Estonia (CPE) CC (1956–84). Klauson’s career was closely linked with that of Johannes Käbin, first secretary of the CPE CC, as Klauson was one of his most trusted associates. Consequently, Klauson was to a great extent responsible for the persecutions in the 1960s and 1970s, but at the same time he helped to make living conditions in Estonia slightly better than in other Soviet republics. The dismissal of Käbin and the takeover of power by Karl Vaino, who was even more dogmatic, initially did not result in the dismissal of Klauson, who undoubtedly bears partial responsibility for the Russification policy during the early 1980s. Klauson was finally dismissed as prime minister in 1984, simultaneously losing his position in the ECP CC Politburo, which meant the end of his career. (AG)

Sources: Bolshaia Sovetskaia Entsiklopediia, vol. 12 (Moscow, 1973); Eesti Enstuklopedia, vol. 14 (Tallinn, 2000); Toivo V. Raun, Estonia and the Estonians (Stanford, 1987); Tõnu Tannberg, Matti Laur, Tõnis Lukas, Ain Mäesalu, and Ago Pajur, History of Estonia (Tallinn, 2000).

KLEBELSBERG Kunó (13 November 1875, Magyarpécska [now in Romania]–11 October 1932, Budapest), Hungarian politician, count. After completing law studies at the university in Budapest in 1898, Klebelsberg worked in the Office of the Council of Ministers. He subsequently served as head of a department (1898–1910) and judge in the Administrative Court. During the second government of István Tisza (1913–17), he was secretary of state for administrative affairs in the Ministry for Religious Affairs and National Education (January 1914–March 1917) and secretary of state for political affairs in the Office of the Council of Ministers (March–June 1917). From 1917 to 1918 he was an MP on behalf of the majority National Labor Party of Tisza. In February 1919, along with Count István Bethlen, Klebelsberg founded the rightist anti-revolutionary Party of National Unity. Under the Hungarian Soviet Republic he went into hiding in the countryside. In 1920–31 he was again an MP, representing the ruling United Party (Egységes Párt) from 1922 on. In the government of Bethlen, Klebelsberg assumed the portfolio of minister of interior (December 1921–June 1922) and subsequently served as minister of education and religious affairs until August 1931.

Klebelsberg thought that the development of culture was the basis for the development of Hungary. His conservative reforms, based on so-called neo-nationalism, aimed at creating a strong and well-educated middle class. Under a law enacted in 1926, he implemented a policy that led within three years to the construction of nearly 6,000 modern classrooms in rural elementary schools and over 2,000 dwellings for teachers. A network of agricultural schools was established, 1,500 rural libraries and an equal number of school libraries were founded, and 500 kindergartens were organized. Illiteracy was greatly reduced. A network of real schools (emphasizing practical education) was established, secondary schools for girls were founded, more modern teaching aids were introduced, and an institutional system of higher education and research was set up. Klebelsberg attached great importance to the reorganization of the universities transferred from territories lost by Hungary. The university in Bratislava was moved to Pécs, and the university in Cluj was relocated to Szeged. The university in Debrecen was also developed. Klebelsberg also brought about the establishment of a network of Hungarian foreign institutes, the so-called Collegium Hungaricum (in 1924 in Vienna and Berlin; in 1927 in Rome, Paris, and Zurich), and with the help of the National Scholarship Council, established in 1927, he organized and expanded a system of academic scholarships. In 1922 Klebelsberg became a member of the Hungarian Academy of Sciences, and as president of the Hungarian Historical Society (1917–32), he initiated the publication of a series of source documents for the study of recent Hungarian history: Fontes Historiae Hungaricae Aevi Recentoris. Klebelsberg's publications include Neónacionalizmus (Neo-nationalism; 1928); Beszédei, cikkei, törvényjavaslatai, 1916–1926 (Speeches, studies, and parliamentary bills, 1916–1926; 1927); and Világváltságban (In a Global Crisis; 1931). His Tudomány, kultúra, politika (Science, culture, politics) was published in 1990. (JT)

Sources: Biographisches Lexikon, vol. 2; Nagy Képes Milleniumi Arcképcsarnok (Budapest, 1999); Magyar Nagylexikon, vol. 11 (Budapest, 2000); József Huszti, Gróf Klebelsberg Kunó életműve (Budapest, 1942); C. A. Macartney, October Fifteenth: A History of Modern Hungary, vols. 1–2 (Edinburgh, 1957–61); William M. Batkay, Authoritarian Politics in a Transitional State: Istvan Bethlen and the United Party in Hungary, 1919–1926 (Boulder, Colo., 1982); Gróf Klebelsberg Kunó emlékezete (Szeged, 1995); Steven Bela Vardy, Historical Dictionary of Hungary (Lanham, Md., 1997).

KLEEBERG Franciszek (1 February 1888, Tarnopol [Ternopil]–5 April 1941, Weisser Hirsch, Germany), Polish general. Kleeberg finished a military Realschule in Hranice, passed his high school final exams in Vienna, and graduated from the Military Technical Academy in Mödling. In 1908 he became a professional officer in the Austrian artillery. In 1913 he began studying at the Military College in Vienna, but his studies were interrupted by the outbreak of World War I. From August 1914 to May 1915 he held various staff positions on the Russian front, and later he was assigned to the Polish Legions. Initially he served as staff officer of the Second Brigade of the Polish Legions; until May 1916 he was deputy chief of staff of the Legions' headquarters, and later he joined the staff of the Third Brigade. From February to July 1917 Kleeberg was deputy commander of the First Artillery Regiment of the Legions and subsequently served in the Polish Military Force (Polska Siła Zbrojna), which was subordinated to the German occupation authorities but remained under the auspices of the Provisional Council of State. In December 1917 Kleeberg became commander of an artillery training course in Garwolin, and in April 1918 he was again called up to staff service in the Austrian Army.

In November 1918 Kleeberg began serving in the Polish Army with the rank of lieutenant colonel. Until March 1919 he was chief of staff of the Wschód (East) Command during fighting against the Ukrainians in East Galicia. He subsequently worked in the Ministry for Military Affairs and served as head of the First Department of the General Staff. From July to October 1920, during the Polish-Soviet war, he was chief of staff of the First Army and the Operational Group. Later, he served as chief of staff of the General District Headquarters and chief of staff of the Corps Area Headquarters in Poznań. From October 1922 to May 1924 he was in command of the Fourteenth Infantry Division in Poznań. In 1925 he completed a course at the Military College in Paris. From November 1925 to March 1927 he was the academic director at the Military College in Warsaw, and afterwards he assumed command of the Twenty-ninth Infantry Division in Grodno. In 1928 he was promoted to the rank of general, and in 1934 he became commander of Corps Area Three in Grodno. In 1936 he was transferred to the post of commander of Corps Area Nine in Brześć on the Bug River. In September 1939 Kleeberg organized and then took command of the Polesie Operational Group, which fought against Soviet and German troops and then, marching to relieve Warsaw, took part in the last battles of the September campaign near Kock and Wola Gułowska (2–5 October 1939). The Polesie Group capitulated on 6 October. Kleeberg was taken prisoner by the Germans and held as a POW in harsh conditions in the fortress of Königstein. He died in a military hospital near Dresden. In 1943 he was posthumously promoted to major general. After the war, his body was brought to Poland and buried at the military cemetery in Kock. Kleeberg's works include O organizacji artylerii (On the organization of artillery, 3 vols.; 1920) and Organizacja obrony państwa (The organization of national defense, 7 vols.; 1922). (JS)

Sources: PSB, vol. 12; T. Kryśka-Karski and S. Żurkowski, Generałowie Polski Niepodległej (London, 1976); Feliks Przyłubski, Opowieść o generale Kleebergu: Wrzesień–październik 1939 (Warsaw, 1989); Zbigniew Mierzwiński, Generałowie II Rzeczypospolitej (Warsaw, 1990); Piotr Stawecki, Słownik biograficzny generałów Wojska Polskiego 1918–1939 (Warsaw, 1994); Encyklopedia Historii Polski: Dzieje polityczne, vol. 1 (Warsaw, 1994).

KLEPACZ Michał (23 July 1893, Wola, near Warsaw–27 January 1967, Łódź), Polish Roman Catholic bishop. After graduating from a high school in Warsaw, in 1910 Klepacz entered the theological seminary in Kielce. In 1915–18 he studied at the Petrograd Theological Academy, where he was ordained in June 1916. After returning home, he became general secretary of the Catholic Youth Union of the Kielce diocese. After the establishment of the Catholic University of Lublin (Katolicki Uniwersytet Lubelski [KUL]) in 1918, Klepacz graduated from this university. From 1919 he taught dogmatics and the history of philosophy at the theological seminary in Kielce. He was co-founder of the Society of the Catholic School. In 1932 he received a Ph.D. in theology at the KUL. From 1937 he was professor of philosophy at the Department of Theology of the University of Wilno (Vilnius), and after it was closed at the end of 1939, he worked at the theological seminary and the secret Department of Theology in Wilno. On 3 March 1942, along with other professors and alumni of the seminary, Klepacz was arrested by the Germans and later sent to labor camps in Kaunas and Prowieniszki (Prowenischken).

After his release at the end of 1944, Klepacz returned to Wilno and taught in the local seminary. In 1945 Archbishop Romuald Jałbrzykowski sent him to Białystok in Poland, with the mission of organizing the seminary that was to be moved from Wilno. On 20 December 1946 Klepacz was appointed bishop of Łódź, and he was consecrated on 13 April 1947. In 1949–56 he belonged to the Joint Commission of the Government and Episcopate. After Primate Stefan Wyszyński was arrested on 28 September 1953, Klepacz became the only candidate to preside over the Conference of the Polish Episcopate who was acceptable to the Communist Party, so he was elected by the bishops. In an extremely difficult situation, he endorsed the official communiqués distancing the Episcopate from Primate Wyszyński. Klepacz tried to protect the Church from further attacks but had to accept increased interference from the Communist Party and the security apparatus in church life. He maintained good relations with Bolesław Piasecki and accepted the activities of his PAX Association against the unity of the Church. Notwithstanding, he maintained contact with the imprisoned Primate Wyszyński, and he strove to liberate him. On 26 August 1956 in Częstochowa, Klepacz read the Jasna Góra Vows of the Nation. After Wyszyński was freed, in the fall of 1956 Klepacz took part in talks with the government; these led to the signing of the so-called little agreement of 8 December 1956 on church-state relations. In 1958 Klepacz organized the synod of the Łódź diocese. He was active in the proceedings of the Second Vatican Council. Klepacz authored many works in theology, philosophy, and pedagogy, as well as numerous sermons and pastoral letters. (AGr)

Sources: Słownik Polskich Teologów Katolickich 1918–1981 (Warsaw, 1983); Encyklopedia Katolicka, vol. 9 (Lublin, 2002); Andrzej Micewski, Kardynał Wyszyński: Prymas i mąż stanu (Paris, 1982); Antoni Dudek, Państwo i Kościół w Polsce w latach 1945–1970 (Kraków, 1995); Jan Żaryn, Stolica Apostolska wobec Polski i Polaków w latach 1944–1958 (Warsaw, 1998); Andrzej Grajewski, Wygnanie: Diecezja katowicka w latach stalinowskich (Katowice, 2002).

KLISZKO Zenon (8 December 1908, Łódź–4 September 1989, Warsaw), Polish Communist activist. Born into a working-class family, Kliszko graduated in law from Warsaw University and began working for the leftist press, joining the illegal Communist Party of Poland (Komunistyczna Partia Polski [KPP]) in 1931. After September 1939 he worked in the Soviet-occupied territories in Białystok and Lwów. In 1941 he arrived in Warsaw and joined the Polish Workers' Party (Polska Partia Robotnicza [PPR]) at the beginning of 1942. He fought in the Warsaw Uprising. A close associate of Władysław Gomułka, in August 1944 Kliszko became a member of the Central Committee (CC); in October of that year he became head of the CC Cadres Department, and in April 1945, secretary of the PPR CC. He was instrumental in organizing the PPR apparatus. Linked with the "home" faction of the PPR leadership, he closely followed the PPR policy aimed at gaining total power. In 1944–47 Kliszko was a deputy to the National Home Council (KRN) and then an MP in the Legislative Assembly. In 1945–48 he served as president of the PPR parliamentary representation. In October 1947 he was head of a special commission to investigate the “escape of Stanisław Mikołajczyk and his associates.” When in August 1948 the “internationalists” attacked Gomułka’s position and engineered his dismissal from the party leadership, Kliszko dissociated himself from his patron but did not avoid falling into disfavor. In September 1948 he was dismissed from his position in the PPR apparatus and was demoted to deputy member of the CC. At the December 1948 congress at which the Polish United Workers’ Party (Polska Zjednoczona Partia Robotnicza [PUWP]) was founded, Kliszko was elected deputy member of the PUWP CC and undersecretary of state in the Ministry of Justice. On 13 November 1949, at the Third Plenum of the PUWP CC, he was dismissed from all his posts, arrested, and submitted to a harsh investigation.

Kliszko was released during the “thaw,” and, together with Gomułka, he returned to politics. In August 1956 he was reelected deputy minister of justice. After the elections of January 1957, he assumed the post of deputy speaker of the Assembly, joining the Secretariat in May 1957 and the Politburo of the PUWP CC in March 1959. Kliszko’s responsibilities included controlling the United Peasant Party (Zjednoczone Stronnictwo Ludowe [ZSL]) and the Democratic Party (Stronnictwo Demokratyczne [SD]). He was also responsible for relations with the Episcopate. He was in charge of the CC Agricultural Department and the PUWP parliamentary representation. In February 1960, Kliszko left the Agricultural Department and assumed control of the CC Foreign Department and Cadres Department and also took charge of parliamentary issues. In this last capacity, he was a particularly bothersome supervisor of the Catholic parliamentary group Znak. In 1963 Kliszko also became chairman of the PUWP CC Ideological Commission. He was known as a narrow-minded dogmatist in such areas as the struggle against the Catholic Church and independent culture.

When strikes erupted in northern Poland, Kliszko was sent there by Gomułka as his special representative. Along with Ignacy Loga-Sowiński and General Grzegorz Korczyński, he arrived in Gdańsk on the evening of 14 December 1970 to monitor events. As he saw that the authorities were losing control of the situation, the following day, with Gomułka’s consent, Kliszko ordered the army and the Citizens’ Militia (Milicja Obywatelska) to “pacify” Gdańsk. Without coordinating his actions with Stanisław Kociołek, who had called on the workers in Gdynia to resume work on 17 December, Kliszko made the decision to crush the protests by force, in Gdynia as well. This decision led to dozens of deaths. As one of the closest aides to Gomułka, Kliszko bore some of the responsibility for the bloodshed in northern Poland; thus on 20 December 1970 at the Seventh CC Plenum he was expelled from the CC Secretariat and Politburo, and in February 1971 at the Eighth Plenum he was also expelled from the CC. A party commission headed by Władysław Kruczek was to investigate the responsibility of the Gomułka administration for the tragedy in northern Poland, but it failed to reach any conclusions. Kliszko retired and was never held responsible for his decisions. (WR) Sources: Mołdawa; Słownik polityków polskich XX wieku (Poznań, 1998); Nicholas Bethell, Gomułka: His Poland, His Communism (London, 1969); Andrzej Micewski, Współrzędzić czy nie kłamać (Paris, 1978); Jan Nowak, Polska z oddali (London, 1988); Tajne dokumenty państwo-Kościół 1960–1980 (London, 1996); Krzysztof Lesiakowski, Mieczysław Moczar “Mietek”: Biografia polityczna (Warsaw, 1998); Włodzimierz Janowski and Aleksander Kochański, Informator o strukturze i obsadzie personalnej centralnego aparatu PZPR 1948–1990 (Warsaw, 2000); Jerzy Eisler, Grudzień 1970 (Warsaw, 2000).

KLJUSEV Nikola (2 October 1927, Shtip), Macedonian politician. In 1953 Kljusev graduated in economics from the University of Belgrade, and in 1964 he received a Ph.D. He worked as an assistant professor at the Institute of Macedonian Industrial Research (1953–59) and the Institute of Economics (1960–67). From 1968 he was a lecturer, and from 1972 a professor, in the Department of Economics of Ss. Cyril and Methodius University in Skopje. In 1988 he was elected a member of the Macedonian Academy of Sciences and Arts, in which he presided over the Council of Demographic Research and directed studies in economic theory and policy. After the elections of November and December 1990, as a follower of the Internal Macedonian Revolutionary Organization–Democratic Party for Macedonian National Unity (Vnatrešno-Makedonska Revolucionerna Organizacija–Demokratska Partija za Makedonsko Edinstvo [IMRO–DPMNU]), on 17 January 1991 Kljusev became a nonparty prime minister of a government of experts that led Macedonia to independence. He organized a referendum on secession from the Yugoslav federation and the formation of a sovereign state (8 September 1991). He also carried out a monetary reform and brought about the withdrawal of the Yugoslav People’s Army from Macedonia. In view of Greek protests, Kljusev failed to gain recognition for the name of the new state by the European Union. In this connection, after a non-confidence vote on 7 July 1992, he resigned. He joined the IMRO–DPMNU and was elected chairman of its Supreme Council in September 1997. In the government of Ljubcho Georgievski Kljusev assumed the position of minister of defense (November 1998–October 2000), advocating Macedonia's entry into NATO, the deployment of NATO troops in Macedonia, and military cooperation with Albania, as well as a treaty on Kosovo between Macedonia and Albania. Kljusev authored Koristenje na proizvodnite kapaciteti vo industrijata na SV Makedonija (The utilization of Macedonian industrial capacity; 1967) and Efektivnost na investicite vo industrijata na SR Makedonija (The productivity of industrial investments in Macedonia; 1969), and he co-authored Ekonomske funkcije federacije (Economic functions of the federation; 1970), Antiteza (Anti-thesis; 1994), and Pogledi i promeni (Views and changes; 1995). (JD)

Sources: Europa Środkowo-Wschodnia 1992 (Warsaw, 1994); Valentina Georgieva and Sasha Konechni, Historical Dictionary of the Republic of Macedonia (Lanham, Md., 1998); Irena Stawowy-Kawka, Historia Macedonii (Wrocław, 2000); Bugajski.

KLOFAČ Václav (21 September 1868, Havlíčkův Brod–10 July 1942, Prague), Czech journalist and politician, leader of the National Socialist Party. Klofač became active in politics in the 1890s as a student of philosophy. Between 1890 and 1899 he worked in the editorial offices of Národní Listy. At first he worked with the radical wing of the Young Czech Party, and in 1897 he co-founded the National Social Party (Strana Národné Sociální). In 1907 he was one of the founders and the first editor-in-chief of České slovo, a press organ of the National Socialist Party. From 1901 Klofač sat in the Viennese parliament. He was an opponent of the Austro-Hungarian Empire and a proponent of Slavic cooperation. From this position, in 1908 he protested the annexation of Bosnia and Herzegovina, and he also developed contacts with Russian, Serbian, Croatian, and Slovenian politicians. Because of his convictions Klofač was imprisoned after the outbreak of World War I. He was the last Czech politician released in July 1917. Soon after he became deputy president of the association of Czech members in parliament, and from July 1918 he was deputy president of the Czechoslovak National Council (Národní Výbor Československý). At the end of October 1918 Klofač was a member of the Czech delegation at the Geneva negotiations on creating the first Czechoslovak government. In 1918–20 he served as defense minister in the first two cabinets. The post involved serious challenges, such as the introduction of state authority in the territory of Czechoslovakia and the defense of the borders of the newly created state. Klofač also joined the Revolutionary National Assembly (Revoluční Národní Shromáždění). Then, until the outbreak of World War II he was senator and deputy president of the Senate, and between February and November 1926, president of the Senate. Despite the attempts by Jiří Stříbrný to take over power in the 1920s, for almost the entire interwar period Klofač headed the Czechoslovak National Socialist Party (Československá Strana Národně Socialistická). (PU)

Sources: ČBS; Kto bol kto za I. ČSR (Bratislava, 1993); B. Šantrůček, Václav Klofač: Pohledy do života a díla (Prague, 1928); Kdo byl kdo v našich dějinách ve 20. století, vol. 1 (Prague, 1998); Politická elita meziválečného Československa 1918–1938: Kdo byl kdo za první republiky (Prague, 1998).

KMET'KO Karol (12 December 1875, Veľké Držkovce–22 Decembe, 1948 Nitra), Slovak Catholic bishop and social activist. Kmet'ko graduated in theology in Budapest and earned a Ph.D. in 1906. In addition to his pastoral service, he was devoted to educational and cultural work among peasants, founding cooperatives and mutual aid associations. He was a member of the St. Adalbert Society and the Slovak Museum Association. During World War I he was kept under police surveillance. In October 1918 he became a member of the Slovak National Council (Slovenská Národná Rada [SNR]). Kmet'ko was one of the signatories of the Martin Declaration of 30 October 1918, in which the SNR called for the creation of a common state of Czechs and Slovaks. From 1918 to 1922 he sat in the parliament in Prague, where he opposed the parceling out of the Church's estate and the nationalization of Catholic schools. In 1920 he became one of the first Slovak bishops in Czechoslovakia. As diocesan bishop of the diocese of Nitra, he resigned his parliamentary seat in 1922. He was friends with Reverend Andrej Hlinka, but he criticized Hlinka's choice of associates, and unlike Hlinka, he called for cooperation with members of the People's Party, led by Reverend Jan Šramek. In 1921 Kmet'ko became president of the Catholic School Council, helping to develop Church-run education. He supported missionary work and the development of monasteries. After the establishment of the Slovak Republic in March 1939, Kmet'ko supported the political ambitions of Reverend Jozef Tiso, but in 1941 he condemned the racist legislation. He opposed the persecution of Jews, particularly at the time of the deportation of Jews to German concentration camps in 1942. In 1944 Kmet'ko was appointed titular archbishop. After the restitution of Czechoslovakia, he served as chairman of the Conference of Slovak Bishops, enjoying great social respect. He protested the dissolution of Catholic organizations and the restriction of religious freedom. (MG)

Sources: Augustín Mat'ovčík et al., Reprezentačný biografický lexikón Slovenska (Martin, 1999); Lexikón katolíckych kňazských osobností Slovenska (Bratislava, 2000); J. E. Dr. Karol Kmet'ko 25 rokov biskupom v Nitre (Trnava, 1946); Martha Kristina Kona and Viliam Kona, eds., Arcibiskup Dr. Karol Kmet'ko (Cambridge, Ont., 1989); Bohdan Cywiński, Ogniem próbowane, vol. 2 (Rome, 1990).

KŇAŽKO Milan (28 August 1945, Horné Plachtince, Veľký Krtíš district), Slovak actor and politician. In 1968 Kňažko graduated from the Higher School of Musical Arts in Bratislava, following which he studied in a theater school in Nancy, France. He worked as an actor in the Theater on the Promenade in 1970–71, in the New Stage Theater in 1971–85, and in the Slovak National Stage in Bratislava in 1985–90. From 1967 to 1989 he belonged to the Party of Slovak Renaissance (Strana Slovenskej Obrody), a Communist satellite. In November 1989 he co-founded the Civic Forum (Občanské Fórum) in Prague, and then he returned to Bratislava, where he joined the Public against Violence (Verejnost' Proti Nasiliu [VPN]) and its Coordination Committee. Kňažko took part in talks with the authorities that resulted in the formation of the government of Marian Čalfa. From January to June 1990 he was an adviser to President Václav Hável, and from June 1990 to June 1992 he was a deputy to the Chamber of the People of the Federal Assembly. In the spring of 1991 Kňažko left the VPN and co-founded the Movement for a Democratic Slovakia (Hnutie za Demokratické Slovensko [HZDS]). From September 1990 to May 1991 he was the first minister of international relations of the Slovak Republic. Owing to an unclear division of authority, he often entered into conflict with the foreign minister of Czechoslovakia, Jiří Dienstbier. Deputy chairman of the HZDS from June 1991 to March 1993, in June 1992 Kňažko was elected to the Slovak National Council (renamed the National Council of the Slovak Republic after the breakup of the federation), and he remained Slovak minister of international relations.

After the breakup of the federation, from January 1993 Kňažko was the first foreign minister of Slovakia, but in March 1993 he entered into conflict with the HZDS leader, Vladimír Mečiar. He left the party and co-founded the Democratic Alliance (DA), following a more liberal political line and opposing Mečiar. After another group of activists left the HZDS and formed the Union for a Democratic Slovakia, the DA joined it. In April 1994 Kňažko became the union's deputy chairman and an MP. When a group of secessionists from the Slovak National Party joined, his party adopted the name of Democratic Union (Demokratická Únia [DU]). To prevent another HZDS victory, in 1997 the DU joined the Slovak Democratic Coalition (Slovenská Demokratická Koalícia [SDK]). In the elections of September 1998 the HZDS won one mandate more than the SDK, but Mečiar, lacking allies, could not form a new government. Under these circumstances, the SDK and other anti-Mečiar factions formed a coalition. In the government of Mikulaš Dzurinda, based on this coalition, Kňažko became minister of culture in October

1998. He favored changing the SDK into one party, so when in 2000 Prime Minister Dzurinda established the Slovak Democratic and Christian Union (Slovenská Demokratická Kresťanská Únie [SDKÚ]), Kňažko joined it and became its deputy chairman for media and cultural affairs. (PU)

Sources: ČBS; Kdo byl kdo v našich dějinách ve 20. století, vol. 1 (Prague, 1998); Jan Rychlík, Rozpad Československa: Česko-slovenské vztahy 1989–1992 (Bratislava, 2002); Eric Stein, Czecho/Slovakia: Ethnic Conflict, Constitutional Fissure, Negotiated Breakup (Ann Arbor, 1997); www.sdkuonline.sk/podpreds4.php3.

KÖBLÖS Elek, pseudonym “Bădulescu” (17 April 1887, Dumbravioara, Mureș–November or December 1937, Moscow), Romanian Communist activist. Köblös was born into a Jewish family in Transylvania, where he worked as a woodcutter and was active in the trade unions. At the end of World War I he joined a Hungarian Socialist revolutionary organization that pursued both social and national aims. After the incorporation of Transylvania into Romania, Köblös supported the Hungarian Soviet Republic (HSR), and in October 1920 he took part in a general strike attempt that was suppressed by the government. In May 1921 he represented Transylvanian Communists at the founding congress of the Communist Party of Romania (CPR). At the Second Congress of the CPR he became a member of the Central Committee (CC) and subsequently a member of the Politburo of the party, where he was in charge of the trade union section. Köblös supported the Comintern's policy aimed at partitioning Romania and establishing a separate Transylvanian statehood. Consequently, in the spring of 1924 the Communist International entrusted him with the leadership of the Romanian party. In May and June 1924 he attended the Fifth Congress of the Comintern, where he consolidated his position; following that, at the Third Congress of the CPR in August 1924 in Vienna he gave the main speech and was elected secretary general of the party. After the CPR was declared illegal in April 1924, Köblös unsuccessfully attempted to use the legal Peasants' and Workers' Bloc as a front. Fearing arrest, in the autumn of 1925 he left for the Soviet Union. He directed party activities from Moscow and Vienna. He was arrested by Czechoslovak authorities while attempting to return to Romania but was allowed to return to the Soviet Union. Attacked at the Fourth Congress of the CPR in Kharkiv in June 1928 for following a “Trotskyist political line,” Köblös was dismissed from his position, although he had performed a self-criticism, and the leadership of the party was assumed by Vitali Holostenko, a Ukrainian. In December 1929 Köblös was also denounced by the CC of the All-Union Communist Party (Bolsheviks) and by the Comintern, and then he was completely removed from political life. Arrested by the NKVD in 1937, he was sentenced to death and executed. (WR) Sources: Lazitch; Florin Constantiniu, ed., O ancheta stalinista 1937–1938: Lichidarea lui Marcel Pauker (Bucharest, 1995); Dennis Deletant, Communist Terror in Romania: Gheorghiu-Dej and the Police State, 1948–1965 (New York, 1999).

KOBYLYANSKA Olha (27 November 1863, Gura Humorului–21 March 1942, Chernivtsi [Cernăuți, Czernowitz]), Ukrainian writer linked with Bukovina. Born into the large family of an Austrian clerk, Kobylanska finished only four grades of a German elementary school, but she later gained knowledge of the Ukrainian and European literary culture by studying on her own. In 1891 she settled permanently in Czernowitz. She wrote her first works in German, but after 1891 she wrote only in Ukrainian. Her writing was much influenced by Ukrainian writers of the turn of the century, such as Lesya Ukrainka, Ivan Franko, and Mykhailo Kotsiubynsky. Contacts with Galician circles, as well as her own experience, led to Kobylanska's involvement in the Ukrainian women's movement, evidence of which appeared in her early works. In the novels Liudyna (A person; 1891) and Tsarivna (The princess; 1894) and in the stories Vin i vona (He and she; 1892), Impromptu phantasie (1895), and Valse melancholique (1898), Kobylanska presented poor young women who opposed the provincial middle-class communities that condemned them to social isolation. Many of these characters had the features of a spiritual aristocratism, inspired by the work of Friedrich Nietzsche. Kobylanska's stories written in 1914–18 had anti-war overtones. The workings of the forces of nature and passions, which direct human fate, are presented in such novels as Zemlia (Land; 1902) and V nediliu rano zillia kopala (She was gathering herbs on Sunday morning; 1909). The main characters in these novels are Bukovinian peasants and workers. Kobylanska addressed issues of social service in the novels Nioba (1905); Cherez kladku (Across the bridge; 1912); and her last great work, Apostol cherni (Apostle of the Black, 2 vols.; 1936).

Because Kobylanska was an avowed social activist and a democrat, during the so-called Ukrainization period her work aroused interest in the Soviet Union, where nine volumes of her works were published between 1927 and 1929; the year 1928 saw official celebrations of forty years of her creative work. The authorities of the Ukrainian SSR gave her material assistance but failed to encourage her to come to the Ukraine. When in August 1940 the Soviet authorities arrived in Bukovina, Kobylanska became a member of the Union of Ukrainian Writers, and her image was exploited to serve the needs of unification propaganda.

Kobylanska died after the return of the Romanian authorities to Bukovina. (TS)

Sources: O. Makovei, "Olha Kobylanska," Literaturno-Naukovyi Vistnyk, 1902, no. 12; L. Kohut, ed., Olha Kobylanska: Almanakh u pamyatku ii soroklitnoy pismennytskoy diialnosti (1887–1927) (Chernivtsi, 1928); L. Luka, O. Kobylanska i F. Nichshe (Lviv, 1928); O. Kushch, Olha Kobylanska: Bibliohrafichnyi pokazhchychik (Kiev, 1960); N. Tomashuk, Olha Kobylanska (Kiev, 1969); V. Vozniuk, Pro Olhu Kobylansku (Kiev, 1983).

KOC Adam, pseudonyms "Witold" and "Szlachetny" (31 August 1891, Suwałki–3 February 1969, New York), Polish officer and politician. In 1909 Koc joined the Union of Active Struggle, organized by Józef Piłsudski, and then he belonged to the Riflemen's Union and commanded its Warsaw district. After the outbreak of World War I, he organized the Polish Military Organization and was its Warsaw commander. In 1915 he got through to the Polish Legions, where he became an officer of the First Brigade. In 1917–18 he led diversionary maneuvers during the German occupation, and in November 1918 he commanded the disarmament of German troops. After the war Koc stayed in the Polish Army, and in 1919 he graduated from the School of the General Staff; then he worked in its Second Department (intelligence and counterintelligence). Later he was chief of propaganda in the High Command, and he organized and commanded the 201st Regiment of the Polish Army. From July to December 1920 he commanded a volunteer division in the Polish-Soviet war. From 1921 he worked in Inspectorate No. 2 of the army; in 1924–26 he was chief of the Department of Non-Catholic Denominations in the Ministry of Military Affairs; and from 1926 to 1928 he was chief of staff of the District Corps Command in Lwów (Lviv).

In 1928 Koc retired with the rank of colonel and became an MP on behalf of the sanacja Nonparty Bloc of Cooperation with the Government. He also headed its parliamentary club. In 1929–30 he was editor-in-chief of the pro-government weekly Głos Prawdy and the daily Gazeta Polska. In 1930 he became undersecretary of state in the Ministry of the Treasury; in 1932 he became a member and from 1936 he was chairman of the board of the Bank of Poland (Bank Polski). In 1936 Koc began to organize a new government party, the Camp of National Unity (Obóz Zjednoczenia Narodowego [OZN]). In February 1937 he became its head, and he announced the "OZN Declaration," which included authoritarian and nationalist elements and with which he wanted to attract the younger generation of radical nationalists. In June 1937 Koc organized the Union of Young Poland and took its lead. This union failed, and Koc got himself into trouble with the Piłsudski old guard, so in December 1937 he was dismissed from the OZN leadership.

In 1938 he became a senator of behalf of the OZN. After the outbreak of World War II he left for France, where from October to December 1939 he was minister of treasury in the government-in-exile of General Władysław Sikorski. In 1940 Koc settled in New York, where he was active in the sanacja émigré community. (PU)

Sources: Kto był kim w Drugiej Rzeczypospolitej (Warsaw, 1994); Encyklopedia historii Drugiej Rzeczypospolitej (Warsaw, 1999); Tadeusz Katelbach, “‘Szlachetny’ (Wspomnienie o Adamie Kocu),” Zeszyty Historyczne, 1969, no. 16; Edward D. Wynot, Polish Politics in Transition: The Camp of National Unity and the Struggle for Power, 1925–1939 (Athens, Ga., 1974); Jacek Majchrowski, Silni-zwarci-gotowi: Myśl polityczna Obozu Zjednoczenia Narodowego (Warsaw, 1985).

KOCBEK Edvard (27 September 1904, Videm, Gornja Radgona–3 November 1981, Ljubljana), Slovene writer, poet, and politician. During the interwar period, Kocbek belonged to the supporters of Slovene Christian socialism and worked as the editor of the periodical Križ. He also wrote for the periodicals Ogenj and Dom in svet. Because he criticized clericalism and the Slovene church’s support for General Francisco Franco in Spain, he came into conflict with the conservative faction of the Slovene Catholic peasant party. During World War II Kocbek supported the partisans of Josip Broz Tito. After the war he held various positions in the apparatus of power in Belgrade and Ljubljana. However, he did not accept the ideological mentality of Communists and consequently came into conflict with them as well. Forced to take compulsory retirement in 1952, he withdrew from political life and took up writing and translating. Kocbek published his first poems as early as the 1920s. At that time he wrote under the influence of expressionism and symbolism, reflecting on the condition of man and his place in society. In 1964 his collection Groza received the France Prešeren Literary Award. At that time he also wrote diaries and literary sketches. In 1975 in the periodical Zaliv, published in Trieste, Kocbek criticized the massacre of members of the Home Guard (domobranci) committed by the Communists after the war; consequently he fell into disfavor. In 1977 he published his famous novels, Žerjavica (Embers) and Nevesta v črnem (The bride in black). Highly acclaimed as well were the collection of novels Strah in pogum (Fear and courage; 1951); the diaries Tovarišja (Comrades; 1949) and Listina (Document; 1967); and the collection of essays Svoboda in nujnost (Freedom and necessity; 1974). Kocbek also translated works by Honoré de Balzac, Guy de Maupassant, and Antoine de Saint-Exupéry. (WR)

Sources: Enciklopedia Slovenije, vol. 5 (Ljubljana, 1991); Mały słownik pisarzy zachodnio-słowiańskich i południowo-słowiańskich (Warsaw, 1973); S. Hribar, Edvard Kocbek in križansko gibanje (Maribor, 1990); Jill Benderly and Evan Kraft, eds., Independent Slovenia: Origins, Movements, Prospects (London, 1994); Leopoldina Plut-Progelj and Carole Rogel, Historical Dictionary of Slovenia (Lanham, Md., 1996); James Gow and Cathie Carmichael, Slovenia and the Slovenes (London, 2000).

KOCIOŁEK Stanisław (3 May 1933, Warsaw), Polish Communist activist. Born into an intelligentsia family, in 1951–52 Kociołek was a schoolmaster in Piotrków, Ława County. In 1957 he graduated from Warsaw University. From 1953 he belonged to the (Communist) Polish United Workers’ Party (Polska Zjednoczona Partia Robotnicza PUWPJ). In 1956–58 he was first secretary of the PUWP committee at Warsaw University, from 1958 to 1960 he was first secretary of the Warsaw Committee of the Union of Socialist Youth, and in 1963–64 he was first secretary of the Downtown Warsaw PUWP Committee. Promoted by Władysław Gomułka, in 1964 Kociołek became first secretary of the Warsaw City PUWP Committee. He was considered a hard-liner. For instance, he was active in the attacks on intellectuals demanding a freedom of speech. From 1967 to 1970 he was first secretary of the Gdańsk Provincial PUWP Committee; from June to November 1964 he was a deputy member, and from November 1964 to December 1971 a member, of the PUWP Central Committee (CC). From November 1968 to March 1971 he was a member of the Politburo, and in 1970–71 he was secretary of the PUWP CC. In 1965–72 he was an MP. In April 1968 he made a speech in the parliament brutally attacking deputies from the Catholic club Znak (Sign) who had spoken in defense of the writers and students slandered after the March 1968 events.

From 30 June to 23 December 1970 Kociołek was deputy prime minister. In this capacity he went to the Baltic Triple City (Gdańsk-Sopot-Gdynia) to control the operations against the striking workers. On 15 December, in a television speech, he justified the police crackdown in Gdańsk, and the next day, without coordinating his move with another top party leader, Zenon Kliszko, he called on the Gdynia workers to go back to work on 17 December. While on the way, the workers were shot at, and several dozen people were killed. Kociołek was one of the leaders of a movement aimed at dismissing Gomułka. In this respect he was thought to have cooperated with Mieczysław Moczar. On 19 March 1971 Kociołek left the Politburo, and from June 1971 to August 1978 he was ambassador to Belgium and Luxembourg. From September 1978 to March 1980 he chaired the board of the Central Administration of Labor Cooperatives, and from June to November 1980 he was ambassador to Tunisia. During a counteroffensive of hard-liners, in November 1980

Kociołek again became first secretary of the Warsaw City PUWP Committee, advocating a crackdown on Solidarity, especially in the fall of 1981. After the introduction of martial law in December 1981 he strove to intensify the repression against Solidarity and democratic opposition leaders. Dismissed by General Wojciech Jaruzelski, from mid-1982 to the end of 1985 Kociołek was ambassador to the USSR and later editor-in-chief of the periodical Polish Perspectives. After 1989 an investigation was started concerning his responsibility for the 1970 Gdynia massacre. Kociołek became one of the main defendants in a trial that began in September 2001. (PK)

Sources: Mołdawa; Andrzej Albert [Wojciech Roszkowski], Najnowsza historia Polski 1914–1993, vols. 1–2 (Warsaw, 1993); Popularna Encyklopedia Powszechna, vol. 9 (Kraków, 1996); Krzysztof Lesiakowski, Mieczysław Moczar “Mietek”: Biografia polityczna (Warsaw, 1998); Włodzimierz Janowski and Aleksander Kochański, Informator o strukturze i obsadzie personalnej centralnego aparatu PZPR 1948–1990 (Warsaw, 2000); Jerzy Eisler, Grudzień 1970 (Warsaw, 2000).

KODÁLY Zoltán (16 December 1882, Kecskemét–6 March 1967, Budapest), one of the two most outstanding Hungarian composers and ethnographers of the twentieth century (the other one being Béla Bartók). In 1900 Kodály began to study both at the Budapest Academy of Music and at the Humanities Faculty of Budapest University. In 1904 he received a diploma in composition, and in 1906, a Ph.D. in Hungarian and German philology. In 1905 he toured Hungary in his first quest for folk song sources and later continued his research with Bartók. From 1907 to 1940 Kodály lectured at the Budapest Academy of Music, becoming a full professor in 1912. In December 1918 he became deputy director of this academy. Along with Bartók and Ernő Dohnányi, he was elected to the music directorate of the People’s Commissariat of Education in the government of the Hungarian Soviet Republic. In the autumn of 1919, because of his role in the revolution, disciplinary proceedings were instituted against him, and in September 1921 he was forced to take a compulsory leave.

The works that Kodály composed in the 1920s brought him acclaim throughout the world. At that time he also began to work in the field of musical pedagogy. He developed a method—named the Kodály method—of teaching music to children and adolescents. From the 1930s, Kodály sympathized with the movement of peasant writers and supported the leftist March Front, which strove to develop the Hungarian countryside and which was proscribed by the authorities in 1938, after two years of existence. In 1938, along with many other public figures and representatives of the intelligentsia, Kodály protested the first anti-Jewish law. In March 1942 he signed an anti-war and anti-German manifesto issued by the Committee for Historical Memory. In 1944 he went into hiding from the Germans. A prominent representative of intellectual life, in November 1945 Kodály became an MP. In 1945 he became director of the Budapest Academy of Music, and from 1946 to 1949 he served as president of the Hungarian Academy of Sciences. In 1951 he became head of the Musicology Committee of the Academy of Sciences and was in charge of a folk music research group.

As a person with close links to the National Peasant Party (which was revived under the name of Petőfi Party), during the 1956 revolution Kodály was put forward as a candidate for the position of chairman of a provisional organ that served as the head of state. On 21 November 1956 he became president of the Revolutionary Committee of Hungarian Intellectuals, whose activities were suspended a month later. Kodály was awarded the Kossuth Prize (1948, 1952, 1957) and granted honorary doctorates at Oxford University (1960) and Humboldt University in Berlin (1964). His work contributed greatly to the revival of musical culture in Hungary and to the consolidation of national cultural values. Kodály’s most famous works include editions of folk songs, the opera Háry János, and the Psalmus Hungaricus (1923), written to celebrate the fiftieth anniversary of the union of Buda and Pest, as well as Te Deum (1936), Missa Brevis (1943–44), and some chamber works. (JT)

Sources: A magyar forradalom és szabadságharc enciklopédiája (Budapest, 1999); Magyar Nagylexikon, vol. 11 (Budapest, 2000); Kodály Centenary 1982, Sound Recording, Fuga (Finland), 1960; Katinka S. Daniel, Kodály Approach: Method Book (Champaign, Ill., 1979); Lois Choksy, The Kodály Context: Creating Environment for Musical Learning (Englewood Cliffs, N.J., 1981).

KOFLER Remus (1902–17 April 1954, Bucharest), Romanian Communist activist. In the early 1940s Kofler was deputy leader of the Romanian Communist Party (RCP). During the Ion Antonescu dictatorship he was at large, maintaining contacts with a group of younger activists, headed by Gheorghe Gheorghiu-Dej, who were detained or interned by the regime. Kofler took part in the preparations for the coup of 23 August 1944, which removed Antonescu from power. After the Communist takeover in early 1945, Kofler was dismissed from the party leadership, and on 13 December 1949 he was arrested. The prosecution wanted to prove that he took part in a plot against “the power of the people,” allegedly led by Iuliu Maniu. As a result of torture, Kofler confessed that he had cooperated with the Antonescu police. There were attempts to prove that he was also responsible for “anti-party” and “anti-state” activities in connection with the trial of Laszló Rajk in Hungary and Traycho Kostov in Bulgaria. Ultimately Kofler was accused of high treason and cooperation with “Fascist” police and British intelligence. In mid-April 1954 the Communist Party Politburo decided to close the case in which he was tried along with Lucrețiu Pătrășcanu and his aides. Kofler was sentenced to death and almost immediately executed. (ASK)

Sources: Lavinia Betea, “‘Recunoștiința’ partidului pentru cei care l-au subvenționat,” Magazin Istoric, 1997, no. 7; Dennis Deletant, Communist Terror in Romania: Gheorghiu-Dej and the Police State, 1948–1965 (New York, 1999).

KOKALARI Musine (25 October 1917, Adana, Turkey–13 August 1983, Rreshen), Albanian writer, democratic activist, and political prisoner. The daughter of a lawyer, Kokalari first went to school in Gjirokastër and then attended Naim Frashëri High School in Tirana. Between 1937 and 1941 she studied literature in Rome, where she earned a doctorate. After returning to Albania, she was affiliated with pro-Western intellectual circles, and she also wrote for the illegal political press. After Italy capitulated in September 1943 and the politicians who had been previously interned returned to Albania, Kokalari helped to establish the Social Democratic Party, which was joined by leftist activists from the National Front (Balli Kombëtar) and by some of the former activists of the Communist Party of Albania. Kokalari was also in charge of Zeri i Lirisë, an organ of the party. An attempt to form a military unit in the region of Vlorë ended in the arrest and execution of most party leaders by the Gestapo. Kokalari avoided arrest but was forced to abandon her political activities. In November 1944 her two brothers were executed by firing squad without trial. She was arrested on 16 November 1944 but was released after seventeen days.

In 1945 Kokalari refused to join the Communist-dominated Union of Albanian Writers. She got in touch with democratic and anti-Communist circles and with representatives of the British mission. In March 1945, along with Gjergji Kokoshi and Suad Asllani, she founded an anti-Communist group that entered into cooperation with similar groups led by Sami Çeribashi and Qenan Dibra. Their work resulted in a memorandum on the situation in Albania that was presented to diplomatic missions based in Tirana. On Kokalari’s initiative, on 6 November 1945 the Democratic Union (Bashkimi Demokratik) was established in Tirana. This organization issued a memorandum that demanded that Western countries intervene and help to create an appropriate political atmosphere before the elections that were to be held on 2 December 1945. Kokalari’s contacts with the English prompted her arrest (23 January 1946). On 2 July of that year she was sentenced to twenty years in prison. She initially served her sentence in a prison attached to an iron ore mine in Burrell, and in 1952 she was transferred to one of the penal institutions in Tirana. Released in 1961, she was interned in Rreshen, where she had limited freedom of movement and worked on the land and on construction sites. Kokalari’s publications include a collection of stories, Siç më thotë nëna plakë (Like my old mother told me; 1941), in which she depicted folk customs and traditions. (TC)

Sources: Eglantina Mandia, Sonata e hënës: Rrefim për nje jete (Tirana, 1995); Agim Musta, Mandelët e Shqipërisë (Tirana, n.d.); Pepa Pjeter, Dosja e diktaturës (Tirana, 1995); Musine Kokalari, Si lindi Partia Social Demokrate: Artikuj, shkrime, esse, kujtime (Tirana, 2000).

KOŁAKOWSKI Leszek (23 October 1927, Radom), Polish philosopher. Kołakowski graduated in philosophy from Warsaw University (1950); in 1953 he received a Ph.D. and in 1956 a postdoctoral degree (habilitacja); in 1964 he became a professor. He worked as an assistant professor at Łódź University (1947–49) and Warsaw University (1949–51). In 1952–54 he worked at the Institute of Social Sciences of the Central Committee (CC) of the Polish United Workers’ Party (Polska Zjednoczona Partia Robotnicza [PUWP]), and from 1952 to 1968 he was at Warsaw University, where he was chair of History of Modern Philosophy (1959–68). In 1946–48 Kołakowski belonged to the (Communist) Polish Workers’ Party, and from December 1948 he belonged to the PUWP. Initially he was a spokesman of vulgar Marxism, active on the “ideological front.” He contributed to party periodicals, such as Kuźnica and Nowe Drogi, and he fiercely criticized Christian philosophy, the Catholic Church, and religion—for instance, in the collection Szkice o filozofii katolickiej (Essays on Catholic philosophy; 1955). From 1956 Kołakowski sympathized with the so-called revisionism, opposing Marxism as an institutional doctrine but still supporting Marxism as an intellectual offer capable of change. He treated the concept of socialism as a utopia that should be approached with the awareness that there was no guarantee of its implementation. He stressed the necessity of analyzing all dogmas and allegedly absolute truths—for instance, in Kapłan i Błazen (Chaplain and clown; 1959). Kołakowski strove toward a humanist Marxism, based on the autonomy of the human being and his/her responsibility. In philosophical treatises, popular essays, and plays, he gradually evolved from criticism to a dialogue with Catholic philosophy. In 1957 Kołakowski was attacked by Władysław Gomułka, and in 1966 he was expelled from the PUWP for criticizing its political line; this led to the resignation from the party of several outstanding writers. In March 1968 Kołakowski was recognized as one of the main ideologues and protectors of the student movement, for which he was deprived of his position as chair and expelled from Warsaw University.

From November 1968 Kołakowski lectured in Montreal and Berkeley and, from 1970, at Oxford. He published in outstanding Western and émigré periodicals, such as Kultura and Aneks. Some of his articles—such as “Tezy o nadziei i beznadziejności” (Theses of hope and hopelessness; 1971)—were significant for the formation of the democratic opposition in Poland. In 1976–79 Kołakowski published his opus magnum, Główne nurty marksizmu (Main Currents of Marxism, 1978), in which he critically assessed Marxist philosophy; it was translated into many languages. In the 1970s and 1980s he mainly searched for the permanent foundation of culture and civilization; ultimately he found it in religion (Jeśli Boga nie ma, 1988; Religion: If There Is No God, 1982). A member of the scholarly academies of many countries and a winner of many prestigious awards, in 1976–77 Kołakowski worked with the Committee for the Defense of Workers in Poland, and he contributed to its popularity in the West. Until 1980 and again in 1982–87 his publications, or even quotations from them, were banned in Poland. Kołakowski also authored, among other things, the following: Trzyńście bajek z królestwa Lailonii dla dużych i małych (1963; Tales from the Kingdom of Lailonia, 1989); Klucz niebieski (1964; Key to Heaven, 1972); Rozmowy z diabłem (Conversations with the devil; 1965); Obecność mitu (1972; Presence of Myth, 1989); Czy diabeł może być zbawiony (Can the devil be saved? 1982); Metaphysical Horror (1988); Pochwała niekonsekwencji (Eulogy of inconsistency, 3 vols.; 1989); and Mini wykłady o maxi sprawach (Mini-lectures on maxi-problems; 1997). Kołakowski's works are translated into most Western languages. In November 2003 he was selected by the Library of Congress for its first John W. Kluge Prize for Lifetime Achievement in Humanities and Social Sciences.

Sources: Nowa encyklopedia powszechna PWN, vol. 3 (Warsaw, 1995); Opozycja w PRL: Słownik biograficzny 1956–89, vol. 1 (Warsaw, 2000); Gesine Schwan, Leszek Kołakowski: Eine marxistische Philosophie der Freiheit (Stuttgart, 1971); Mariola Flis, Leszek Kołakowski: Teoretyk kultury europejskiej (Kraków, 1992); Maria Kaczmarek, Leszek Kołakowski: Bibliografia podmiotowo-przedmiotowa (Radom, 1994); Jan Andrzej Kłoczowski, Więcej niż mit: Leszka Kołakowskiego spory o religię (Kraków, 1994); Christian Heidrich, Leszek Kołakowski: Zwischen Skepsis und Mystik (Frankfurt, 1995); Stanley Pierson, Leaving Marxism (Stanford, 2001).

KOLAROV Vasil (16 July 1877, Shumen–23 January 1950, Sofia), Bulgarian Communist leader. The son of a shoemaker, after high school Kolarov studied law at Geneva University. In 1897 he joined the Bulgarian Social Democratic Party, and in 1903 he supported its Bolshevik faction, the Tesnyaki. Between 1904 and 1912 he headed the party organization in Plovdiv. From 1905 he sat on the Central Committee of the party, and from 1913 he sat in parliament. Kolarov attended conferences of the Socialist International in Stuttgart (1907) and Copenhagen (1910). At a conference in Zimmerwald he did not support the Leninist faction. In April 1919, when the Communist Party of Bulgaria was created, Kolarov became secretary of its CC. From then on, he frequently went to Russia. In 1920 he was the Bulgarian delegate to the Second Congress of the Communist International, and in 1921 he presided over its Third Congress. At the Fourth Congress in 1923 Kolarov joined the Executive Committee, Presidium, and Secretariat of the Comintern. At the beginning of 1923, as the Comintern's representative, he made a journey to France, Czechoslovakia, Germany, and Norway. At the end of June 1923 he returned to Bulgaria. Temporarily arrested, after his release he became head of a revolutionary committee that attempted to assume power during a coup in September 1923. After the failure of the action, Kolarov fled to Yugoslavia and then, via Austria, reached the USSR, where he stayed for the next twenty-two years, assuming Soviet citizenship. As a member of the Comintern leadership, Kolarov closely cooperated with its leader, his compatriot Georgi Dimitrov, and he loyally supported the Stalinist line. In 1928–29 he headed the Balkan Secretariat of the Comintern. Along with Dimitrov, he headed a group of Bulgarian Communists in the USSR. He went on special missions to various countries of Western Europe and to Mongolia. From 1928 to 1939 he was president of Peasant International. In May 1943 he signed an act dissolving the Comintern but continued to work in its apparatus, which was transferred to a special department of the CC of the All-Union Communist Party (Bolsheviks).

Kolarov returned to Bulgaria in September 1945, assuming the post of deputy president of the Fatherland Front. After the abolition of the monarchy, between 15 September 1946 and 9 December 1947 he was provisional president of the Bulgarian People's Republic, and between 21 November 1946 and 9 December 1947 he served as president of the Communist-dominated National Assembly. Kolarov authorized a brutal crackdown on the Peasant Party, ignoring the letters sent to him by Nikola Petkov, who was sentenced to death. On 11 December 1947 he became deputy prime minister and foreign minister. After the death of Georgi Dimitrov, on 20 July 1949 Kolarov assumed the post of head of government. In this role, he supervised the case of Traicho Kostov, who was sentenced to death and executed in December 1949. Kolarov died while serving as prime minister. (WR)

Sources: Lazitch; V pamet na Vasil Kolarov (Sofia, 1951); Joseph Rothschild, The Communist Party of Bulgaria (New York, 1959); Nevena Krumova, Prez buri: Iz zivota na Vasil Kolarov (Sofia, 1964); Paulina Edreva, Vasil Kolarov (Sofia, 1972); Jerzy Jackowicz, Partie opozycyjne w Bułgarii 1944–1948 (Warsaw, 1997).

KOLAS Yakub [originally Kanstantsin Mitskevich] (3 November 1882, Akinchitse, near Stoubtsy–13 August 1956, Minsk), Belorussian poet, writer, and journalist. The son of a forester, Kolas completed a teacher training college in Niasvizh in 1902. Between 1902 and 1906 he worked as a teacher. Banned from practicing his profession for taking part in an illegal congress of Belorussian teachers, in 1906–7 he worked in private schools and on the editorial staff of Nasha Niva, a weekly that initiated the development of Belorussian intellectual life. In September 1908 the court in Vilnius (Wilno) sentenced Kolas to three years in prison for breaking the ban that forbade him to work as a teacher and for spreading revolutionary propaganda. In 1915 he was mobilized into the army. After finishing a school for non-commissioned officers in a reserve regiment in Perm, in the summer of 1917 he was sent to the Romanian front with the rank of second lieutenant. Demobilized in the autumn of 1917, he went to live with his family in Kursk Province. From 1918 to 1920 Kolas worked as a teacher. In 1921 he returned to Minsk, where he found a job with the scientific and terminological commission of the Commissariat of Education. He taught classes at teacher training institutions in Slutsk, at a pedagogical technical high school in Minsk, and at the Belorussian State University. In 1928 he became a professor of the Academy of Sciences of the Belorussian SSR, and a year later, vice-chairman of the academy. Kolas held leadership positions in the Union of Soviet Writers. During the war he went to Klyazma and then to Tashkent. He was involved with journalism as well as radio and press propaganda. In the autumn of 1944 he returned to Minsk. A member of the Central Committee of the Communist Party of Belorussia, he served as deputy to the Supreme Soviet of the Soviet Union and the Supreme Soviet of the Belorussian SSR.

Kolas was one of the fathers of the modern literary Belorussian language. He published his first poems in the newspaper Nasha Dolia in 1906. The subsequent collections of his poetry—Pesni Zhal'by (Songs Complaints; 1910), Niomanau dar (Gift from the Neman; 1913), and Toŭ stae palena (Stout logs; 1913)—depicted the spiritual life of peasants and carried the message that a beautiful, just, and affluent Belorussia would be reborn thanks to Belorussian peasants. In the poems Kolas wrote at the beginning of the 1920s, particularly in the volume Vodhulle (In general; 1922), he attempted to define the life philosophy of the Belorussian people as compared with that of their neighbors. In the poem Novaia ziamlia (New land; 1923) he painted a fairytale picture of the Belorussian nature. In the trilogy Na rastanniakh (At the Crossroads; 1921–54) he wrote about the dilemmas of the Belorussian intelligentsia. Kolas returned to the recent history of Belorussia in the novels Na prastorakh zhytstsia (On life's expanses; 1926), Adshchapenets (Renegade; 1932), and Dryhva (The swamp; 1934) and in the poems Sud u lese (Trial in the forest; 1943) and Adplata (The payment; 1944). (EM)

Sources: Wielka Encyklopedia Powszechna, vol. 5 (Warsaw, 1965); Anton Adamowicz, Iakub Kolas u supratsive savetyzatsii (Munich, 1955); Nicholas P. Vakar, Belorussia: The Making of a Nation (Cambridge, Mass., 1956); M. Muszynski, Jakub Kolas: Letapis zhytstsia i tvorchastsi (Minsk, 1982); V. Zhuraulou, Iakub Kolas i paetyka belaruskaha ramana (Minsk, 1991); Jan Zaprudnik, Historical Dictionary of Belarus (Lanham, Md., 1998); Rainer Lindner, Historiker und Herrschaft: Nationsbildung und Geschichtspolitik in Weissrussland im 19 und 20. Jahrhundert (Munich, 1999).

KOLBE Maksymilian Maria [originally Rajmund] (7 January 1894, Zduńska Wola–14 August 1941, Oświęcim), martyr, saint of the Roman Catholic Church. The son of a weaver of German descent, Kolbe entered the novitiate in 1910 and made his first vows in Lemberg (Lviv, Lwów) in 1911. After passing his high school graduation exams in 1912, he studied philosophy at the Pontifical Gregorian University in Rome, and in November 1914 he took his final vows in the Franciscan order. In 1915 he earned a Ph.D. in philosophy. In the winter of 1917–18 he developed tuberculosis, from which he suffered until the end of his life. In April 1918 he was ordained a priest. After earning a Ph.D. in theology in July 1919, he returned to Poland. He taught Church history at a seminary in Kraków, and in January 1922 he began editing the periodical Rycerz Niepokalanej, initially in Grodno and from 1927 in Niepokalanów (Mary Immaculate's Place), a friary near Teresin, not far from Warsaw. In January 1930 Kolbe went to China, but since his mission was unsuccessful, in May 1930 he settled in Nagasaki, Japan, where he taught philosophy at a theological seminary and edited Rycerz Niepokalanej in Japanese. In 1936 he returned to Poland in very poor health. He worked in Niepokalanów, where he edited Mały Dziennik (circulation of 150,000), a daily that attacked leftist and liberal parties and represented anti-Semitic views. At the end of September 1939 Kolbe was detained by the Germans but was then released. He refused to sign the Deutshce Volksliste (German Folk List—a Nazi register of people in Nazi occupied territories of Poland, divided into four categories according to their loyalty to the German nation) and continued to provide shelter to people who were displaced from northern Poland, including many Jews. Arrested in February 1941, he was sent to the concentration camp of Auschwitz, near Oświęcim (prisoner number 16670) in May 1941. During the selection of prisoners condemned to death, Kolbe volunteered his life in the place of Franciszek Gajowniczek, a forester who had a wife and children. Condemned to death in a starvation bunker, after two weeks of suffering Kolbe was killed by an SS man by an injection of carbolic acid. Beatified in 1963, Kolbe was canonized in 1982 by Pope John Paul II. Kolbe's selected writings were published in 1982 under the title Mysli i rozważania (Thoughts and considerations). (WR)

Sources: PSB, vol. 13; Maria Winowska, Death Camp Proved Him Right (Kenosha, Wisc., 1971); Mary Craig, Blessed Maximilian Kolbe OFM Conv. Priest Hero of a Death Camp (London, 1973); Diana Dewar, Saint of Auschwitz (San Francisco, 1982); Leon Dyczewski, Święty Maksymilian Kolbe (Warsaw, 1984); Kinga Strzelecka, Maksymilian Maria Kolbe (Kraków, 1982); Ozaki Tomei, Nagasaki no Korube Shinpu (Tokyo, 1983); Francis M. Kalvelage, ed., Kolbe: Saint of the Immaculata (New Bedford, Mass., 2001).

KOLIQUI Ernest (20 May 1903, Shkodër–15 February 1974, Rome), Albanian writer, linguist, and politician. The brother of Mikel Koliqi, Koliqi completed literary studies in Padua. He was one of the founders of Ora e Maleve, a political and cultural periodical, well known in Shkoder, that attracted radical politicians led by Luigji Gurakuqi. In 1924 Koliqi supported the revolution led by Fan Noli and began working in the central administration. After the revolution, he went into political exile in Italy, where he completed his studies and then took the chair of Albanian language and literature at the University of Rome. After the Italian invasion of Albania in April 1939, he was one of the few widely respected people who joined the collaborationist government, in which he headed the ministry of education until December 1941. This decision harmed his reputation and led to accusations that he had been paid by the Italian authorities. In 1940 Koliqi began editing the periodical Shkëndija. In July 1939, on the orders of the Italian foreign minister, Galeazzo Ciano, he drafted a propaganda proposal of the "Albanian irredenta" that was to promote the liberation of Albanian territories that were part of Yugoslavia. During the Italian occupation, Kolbe directed the Institute of Albanian Studies, attracting the top specialists. After the war he emigrated to Italy, where he brought together a group of pro-Italian politicians with whom he founded the Independent National Bloc (Blloku Kombëtar Independent) in 1946. In 1957 he began editing the periodical Shejzat in Rome. He published numerous literary and critical works, including Kushtrimi i Skenderbegut (Skanderbeg's appeal; 1924); Hija e Malevë (Shadows of the mountains; 1928); Gjurmata e Stinve (Traces of the summer; 1933); Tregtar flamujsh (Trader of flags; 1935); and Symfonija e Shqyptarëve (1941; Symphony of eagles, 1972). As a translator, Koliqi introduced Albanians to the outstanding works of Italian poetry. (TC)

Sources: Stavro Skendi, Albania (New York, 1956); Galeazzo Ciano, Pamietniki 1939–1943 (Warsaw, 1991); Anton Nikë Berisha, Ernest Koliqi: Poet i prozator (Tirana, 1997); Bernd Fischer, Albania at War, 1939–1945 (London, 1999); Malish Shestani, Ernest Koliqi ne mendimin e bashkekohësve dhe studjuesve (Tirana, 2000).

KOLIQUI Mikel (29 September 1902, Shkodër–28 January 1997, Shkodër), Albanian Catholic cardinal, prisoner of conscience. The brother of Ernest Koliqi, Koliqi attended a Jesuit college in Shkodër and subsequently completed technical studies in Italy. While in Italy, he undertook philosophical and theological studies in Milan. In May 1931 he took holy orders. After returning to Albania, he worked in the parish of Shkodër as a curate, parish priest, and finally vicar general of the archdiocese of Shkodër. He published journalistic commentaries and edited the periodical Kumbona e së diellës. He simultaneously directed a religious music group. Arrested in February 1945, on the first wave of Communist persecutions of the Church in Shkodër, Koliqi was sentenced to four years in prison. Released, he was soon arrested again and sentenced to a forty-four-year imprisonment. All together, he spent thirty-eight years in prisons and camps in Lushnjë, Kuç, Kurveleshë, and Gjazë. In 1986 he was released under an amnesty. Koliqi was the oldest of the priests who had survived the period of religious persecution. He resumed his liturgical work, assuming the duties of parish priest in Shkodër. He also revived the weekly Kumbona e së diellës. On 31 January 1992 he became a prelate. After Pope John Paul II visited Albania in 1993, in recognition of Koliqi's unbroken faith, on 26 September 1994, the Pope elevated him to cardinal. He was the first Albanian cardinal. However, because of his age, Koliqi did not join the College of Cardinals. Koliqi composed scores for three musical melodramas: Rozafa; Rrethimi i Shkodres (Around Shkodër); and Ruba e Kuqe (Red scarf). He received prestigious national awards and was honored with the title of Pishtar i Demokracise (Martyr for the Faith), conferred by parliament. (TC)

Sources: Martirizimi i Kishes Katolike Shqiptare (Shkodër, 1993); Didier Rance, Albanie: Ils ont voulu tuer Dieu. La persécution contre l'Église catholique (1944–1991) (Paris, 1996); Acta Apostolicae Sedis, 1997, no. 3; Annuario Pontificio, 1997; Robert Royal, The Catholic Martyrs of the Twentieth Century (New York, 2000).

KOLISHEVSKI Lazar (12 February 1914, Sveti Nikola, Serbia [now in Macedonia]–6 July 2000, Skopje), Macedonian Communist activist. Brought up in an orphanage, in 1932 Kolishevski graduated from a trade school in Kragujevac and worked as a metalworker. He joined the illegal Communist Party in 1935. He attended the University of Belgrade and worked as party secretary in Kragujevac and Smederevo Palanka before World War II. The leader of the Communist Party in Macedonia, in October 1941 Kolishevski was posted to Skopje by the Yugoslav Communist Party (YCP) Central Committee (CC) to combat the influence of the competing Bulgarian Communist Party, which had approved the incorporation of Macedonia into Bulgaria. Kolishevski overshadowed his Bulgarian rivals when the Regional Committee of which he was head issued an order to promulgate an armed uprising against the Bulgarian Army. He was arrested by the Bulgarian police and was sentenced to death for treason. He remained in prison in Pleven, Bulgaria, until 1944; his sentence was commuted to life. In 1943, he was elected (in absentia) to the Anti-Fascist Council for the National Liberation of Yugoslavia (Antifašističko Vijeće Narodnog Oslobođenja Jugoslavije [AVNOJ]) and in 1944 to the Anti-Fascist Assembly for the National Liberation of Macedonia. In 1943 he was also elected (in absentia) chair of the CC of the LCY in Macedonia. Kolishevski held that post until 1963. After the capitulation of Bulgaria, upon his release from prison, Kolishevski was involved in negotiations in 1944 in Bulgaria intended to lead to the amalgamation of Pirin Macedonia with the Yugoslav Macedonian Republic. Later, in 1947, at a Lake Bled conference, he doggedly demanded the union, but in vain.

In early 1945 Kolishevski became the Yugoslav Socialist Republic of Macedonia's first prime minister. He was elected a candidate member of the Politburo of the LCY in 1948 at the Fifth Party Congress. He was elected a member of the LCY CC's Executive Committee and a member of the presidency at the Sixth and Seventh Congresses. In 1953, Kolishevski became the president of the Assembly of the Peoples' Republic of Macedonia. He served as a deputy to both the national and Macedonian assemblies from 1945 to 1972. In 1946, he was one of only two Macedonians on the Presidium of the National Constituent Assembly. In 1958, he was the only Macedonian on the Party Executive Committee. Kolishevski was pro-Belgrade. He set the tone and made the rules for Macedonia's revisionist history. In Aspekti na makedonskoto prašanje (1962; Aspects of the Macedonian Question, 1980) he sought to ensure that Macedonia's history reflected little Bulgarian influence, while he sought to maximize that of Serbia. He advocated the preservation of the separation of nationalities. Kolishevski received the Great Star of Yugoslavia, the Partisan 1941 Medal, and other decorations. In May 1980, he was the first president of the new rotating presidency of Yugoslavia. (DP)

Sources: Enciklopedija Jugoslavije, vol. 5 (Zagreb, 1962); Valentina Georgieva and Sasha Konechni, Historical Dictionary of the Republic of Macedonia (Lanham, Md., 1998); Stephen E. Palmer, Jr. and Robert R. King, Yugoslav Communism and the Macedonian Question (Hamden, Conn., 1971); Stoyan Pribichevich, Macedonia: Its People and History (University Park, Pa. and London, 1982); www.rulers.org.

KOŁODZIEJSKI Henryk (12 May 1884, Warsaw–18 April 1953, Warsaw), Polish economist and social activist. During the 1905 revolution Kołodziejski was a member of the Military Revolutionary Committee of the Social Democracy of the Kingdom of Poland and Lithuania. Arrested and sent to the Russo-Japanese front, he escaped and returned to the Kingdom of Poland. Arrested for the second time, after six months he again escaped from the Warsaw Citadel and went to Galicia. In 1907 Kołodziejski graduated from the Jagiellonian University in Kraków, and in 1912 he earned a doctorate there. In 1914 he was interned in Vienna. In 1915 he began working in the Public Library in Warsaw. In 1918 he became a member of the Grand East of France Masonic Lodge, and in 1920, a member of the Poles United Grand National Lodge in Warsaw. In 1920 he served in the Polish Army. He subsequently founded and became the director of the Assembly Library. In this role he was able to take part in many backstage negotiations and political activities, becoming one of the best-informed people in Poland. In 1926 Kołodziejski was a co-founder and member of the Main Board of the Union of Polish Socialist Intellectuals and a co-initiator and member of the Survey Committee for the Investigation of the Conditions and Costs of Production and Exchange. In 1931–39 he was a member of the Scientific Council of the Institute for Social Affairs. During the Nazi occupation Kołodziejski lived in Warsaw, and, as a member of the Cooperative Committee, he worked with the Delegation of the Polish Government-in-Exile for the Homeland. At the beginning of 1945 he took part in consultations on the establishment of the Provisional Government of National Unity. By gaining, in a rather enigmatic way, the trust of Bolesław Bierut, Kołodziejski became a member of the National Home Council (KRN), and in January 1947 he successfully ran for a seat in the Legislative Assembly as a nonparty candidate. From February 1947 to March 1949 he served as president of the Supreme Chamber of Control, and from February 1947 until his death he was a member of the State Council. In 1949 he became head of the Supreme Cooperative Council, which authorized the collectivization of agriculture. His publications include Wnioski z kryzysu (Conclusions from the crisis; 1932), Automatyzm czy gospodarka planowa (Automatism or planned economy; 1933), and Z zagadnień bezrobocia (Some unemployment issues; 1938). (WR)

Sources: PSB, vol. 13; Mołdawa; Stanisław Łoza, Czy wiesz kto to jest (Warsaw, 1938); Ludwik Hass, Masoneria polska XX wieku (Warsaw, 1996).

KOMÁREK Valtr (10 August 1930, Hodonín), Czech economist and political activist. In 1954 Komárek graduated from the Moscow State Economic Institute and from the Higher Economic School in Prague, where in 1962 he became an associate professor and (in 1990) full professor. In 1946–90 he was a member of the Communist Party of Czechoslovakia (CPC). In 1954–58, 1960–64, and 1967–68 he worked in the State Planning Commission, and between 1964 and 1967 he was an adviser to the Cuban minister of industry. In 1968–70 Komárek was general secretary of the Economic Council of the Czechoslovak government and a member of the commission for economic policy of the CPC Central Committee's Presidium. Expelled from the council because of its activity during the Prague Spring of 1968, Komárek became an adviser to the government and to the chairman of the Federal Price Administration. From 1978 to 1984 he worked in the Institute of Economics of the Czechoslovak Academy of Sciences. Later he co-founded and until 1992 chaired the Forecasting Institute of the academy.

In the late 1980s Komárek was a representative of the reform faction in the CPC, especially favoring economic reform. After the Velvet Revolution he entered into cooperation with the Civic Forum (Občanské Fórum [OF]), and in December 1989 he became deputy prime minister and chairman of the Economic Council in the government of Marian Čalfa. In January 1990 Komárek left the CPC and joined the OF. After the OF split, from 1991 to 1993 he belonged to Czechoslovak Social Democracy (Československá Sociální Demokracie [ČSD]). From 1990 to 1992 he was a deputy to the Chamber of the People of the Federal Assembly; from June 1992 he chaired its foreign affairs commission, and before the elections of June 1992 he was the head of the ČSD electoral committee. During the first stage of systemic transformation Komárek gained a reputation as a key critic of the policies of Václav Klaus. He opted for a more gradual economic transformation and a more developed social welfare policy. For these reasons after the 1990 elections he stayed out of the second Čalfa government, dominated by liberals. In 1993, after the breakup of Czechoslovakia, which he thought a major mistake, Komárek retired from political life. He authored Inovace a intenzifikace v hospodářství (Innovation and intensification in the economy; 1986); Souhrnné prognózy vývoje československé společnosti a ekonomiky do roku 2010 (General forecast of the development of the Czechoslovak society and economy until 2010; 1988 [co-author]); Ohrožena revoluce (Revolution in danger; 1991); and Mé pády a vzestupy (My falls and rises; 1992). (PU)

Sources: ČBS; Kdo byl kdo v našich dějinách ve 20. století, vol. 1 (Prague, 1998); Kdo je kdo v České Republice na přelomu 20. století (Prague, 1998).

KOMINEK Bolesław (23 December 1903, Radlin–10 March 1974, Wrocław), Polish cardinal, archbishop of Wrocław. The son of an Upper Silesian miner, Kominek completed secondary school in Rybnik and then began theological studies at the Jagiellonian University in Kraków. After his ordination in 1927, he left for Paris, where he graduated from the Institut Catholique. In 1931 he gained a doctorate in philosophy and in Catholic social science. From 1930 to 1931 he was curate in Dębnie, near Katowice, and from 1931 to 1939, he was a diocesan secretary for Catholic Action in Upper Silesia. During the German occupation Kominek worked in the Katowice curia and secretly helped prisoners in Nazi concentration camps. In September 1945 Primate August Hlond appointed him the apostolic administrator of Opole. Kominek greatly contributed to the stabilization of the Polish community in the Opole region and to the rebuilding of dozens of churches. He set up the Holy Cross Publishing House in Opole. On 28 January 1951 Kominek was forced by the Communist authorities to leave his office. From 1951 to 1953 he worked in the Kraków curia and lectured in sociology at the theological department of the Jagiellonian University. Kominek was consecrated bishop on 10 October 1954, but only in December 1956, in the wake of Władysław Gomułka's temporary liberalization, he was able to become the first Polish bishop of Wrocław.

In March 1962 Pope John XXIII named Kominek archbishop, and in June of the same year he became the metropolitan of Wrocław. Although the Polish authorities at first refused to give him a passport, he later took an active part in the Second Vatican Council. At the end of the council he was an initiator and main author of the famous letter addressed to the German bishops, in which the words “we forgive and ask for forgiveness” appear. In November 1965 censorship blocked his article “Dialog z Niemcami” (Dialogue with the Germans) in Tygodnik Powszechny, in which he explained to Polish Catholics the meaning of this letter. Kominek was one of the main targets of the Communist propaganda campaign unleashed against the Polish bishops. In 1968 the authorities initiated the construction of a monument to John XXIII in Wrocław. This was a propaganda ploy created to give political credibility to the pro-Communist Catholics of the PAX Association and to cause a split among the clergy. Kominek called the action a ruse and proposed that the collected funds be spent on the construction of a church commemorating the work of the deceased pope. In February 1973 Kominek was named cardinal. For many years he presided over the Pastoral Commission of the Polish Episcopate and over a special commission for the western dioceses. He was vice-president of the Council of European Episcopal Conferences. Kominek was buried in Wrocław Cathedral. His memoirs, W służbie Ziemi Zachodnich (In the service of the Western Territories), were published posthumously in 1977. (WR) Sources: Tygodnik Powszechny, 1974, no. 11; Verbum Crucis—Dei Virtus: Księga pamiątkowa w hołdzie kardynałowi Bolesławowi Kominkowi (Wrocław, 1974); Rudolf Buchała, “W służbie narodowi. Kard. Bolesław Kominek (1903–1974),” Chrześcijanin w świecie, 1980, no. 89; Antoni Dudek, Państwo i Kościół w Polsce 1945–1970 (Kraków, 1995).

KOMOROWSKI Tadeusz, pseudonyms “Bór,” “Korczak,” “Lawina,” and “Znicz” (1 June 1895, Chorobów, Eastern Galicia–24 August 1966, London), Polish general and politician. Komorowski came from a family of landowners. After graduating from a military academy in Vienna, in 1913–18 he was a professional soldier in the Austrian cavalry. In November 1918, along with his squadron, he arrived in Dębica, where the Second Polish Regiment of Legionary Uhlans was being organized. After the war he served in the Prince Józef Poniatowski Eighth Uhlans Regiment in Kraków. From August 1920 he commanded the Twelfth Uhlans Regiment. Komorowski practiced the art of equitation professionally. In 1925 he was appointed commanding officer of the School for Regular Non-Commissioned Cavalry Officers in Jaworowo. In 1928 he became commander of the Ninth Regiment of Little Poland Uhlans in Trembowla. During the Olympic Games in Berlin (1936), Komorowski led the team competing in the three-day equestrian event, and his team won the silver medal. In 1938 he was transferred to Grudziądz, to the post of commanding officer of the Cavalry Training Center (CTC).

At the end of August 1939, after the CTC was dissolved, Komorowski was transferred to a reserve center in Garwolin. He fought in the September campaign until 23 September 1939. He managed to escape captivity, getting to Kraków, where he participated in the creation of underground structures. Komorowski co-organized and commanded the Military Organization of Kraków, which in January 1940 joined the Union of Armed Struggle (Związek Walki Zbrojnej [ZWZ]). From 1940 to 1941 he was commander of the Kraków-Silesian region of the ZWZ. Between July 1941 and July 1943 he was deputy commander-in-chief of the ZWZ and deputy commander of the Home Army (Armia Krajowa [AK]). After the arrest of General Stefan Grot-Rowecki by the Germans, Komorowski became commander-in-chief of the Home Army, with the rank of brigadier general. He held the post between 17 July 1943 and 2 October 1944, being the commander of the Armed Forces in the Homeland. At the end of July 1944, along with the government’s delegate for the homeland, Jan Stanisław Jankowski, and with the AK Warsaw command, Komorowski made a decision to start the Warsaw Uprising on 1 August, and he led it. After signing the capitulation on 2 October 1944, Komorowski was taken captive by the Germans. During the fighting in Warsaw, on 30 September 1944, Komorowski had been appointed commander-in-chief of the Polish Armed Forces. He rejected the German proposal to take part in anti-Soviet sabotage in return for his release.

At the end of the war Komorowski was delivered to Switzerland; from there he went to London. He assumed the duties of the commander-in-chief on 28 May 1945 and held the post until 8 November 1946. After the war he remained in exile in London. He held various posts among the Polish émigrés. From July 1947 to April 1949 he served as prime minister of the Polish government-in-exile; in 1949–54 he was a member of the Political Council, and from 1956, a member of the Council of the Three; he was a co-founder (1947) and president of the Chief Council of the Home Army Circle and president of the Council of the Polish Underground Movement Study Trust (Studium Polski Podziemnej). Among other works Komorowski wrote The Secret Army (1950; Armia Podziemna, 1951), which was translated into Polish, French, and Spanish. Komorowski repeatedly wrote about his decision to start the fighting in Warsaw—for example, in Biuletyn Informacyjny Koła AK (Informational bulletin of the Home Army Circle; 1947) and Dziennik Polski (Polish daily; 1954 and 1964). (JS)

Sources: Kunert, vol. 2; Tadeusz Pelczyński, “Generał Bór-Komorowski żołnierz i obywatel,” Dziennik Polski i Dziennik Żołnierza, 1966, no. 210; Marek Ney-Krwawicz, Komendanci Armii Krajowej (Warsaw, 1992); Henryk Piotr Kosk, Generalicja polska: Popularny słownik biograficzny, vol. 1 (Pruszków, 1998); Juliusz L. Englert, Generał Bór-Komorowski (London, 1994); Andrzej K. Kunert, ed., Generał Tadeusz Bór-Komorowski w relacjach i dokumentach (Warsaw, 2001).

KONDRATIUK Yuriy (21 June 1897, Poltava–1941 or 1942, near Kozielsk), Ukrainian engineer, pioneer in rocketry. After studying at the St. Petersburg Polytechnic Institute, Kondratiuk worked in various plants in the Ukraine, Russia, the Caucasus, and Siberia. In 1919 he published Tem, kto budet chitat, chtoby stroit (To those who will read in order to build), and in 1929, Zavoevanie mezhplanetnykh prostranstv (The conquest of interplanetary space). In the latter work he presented equations for rocket motion, calculated optimal flight trajectories, explained the theory of multi-stage rockets, and proposed the use of new rocket fuels. In a visionary way, Kondratiuk described the functioning of space stations, supply crafts, and planetary landing modules, as well as the use of gravitational fields of celestial bodies for spacecraft acceleration and deceleration. In 1933 he became head of a task force at the Energy Engineering Research Institute in Kharkiv, which designed one of the largest wind power plants in the world. Kondratiuk died during World War II in unclear circumstances. The results of his work are still used in space flights. One of the craters on the Moon has been named after Kondratiuk. (WR)

Sources: Encyclopedia of Ukraine, vol. 2 (Toronto, 1988).

KONESKI Blazhe (19 December 1921, Nebregovo, near Prilep–7 December 1993, Skopje), Macedonian poet and linguist. After graduating from high school in Kragujevac, Koneski studied philology at Ss. Cyril and Methodius University in Skopje and at the universities in Belgrade and Sofia. He became a professor at Skopje University and was its rector from 1958 to 1960. He was editor of the periodicals Nov den and Makedonski jazik. The first president of the Macedonian Academy of Arts and Sciences, Koneski was a corresponding member of the Yugoslav Academy of Sciences, as well as the Serbian and Slovene academies. He was head of the Cultural Department of the Ministry for Education of the Macedonian republic, and he presided over a committee that codified Macedonian vocabulary and grammar in Gramatika na makedonskijot literaturni jazik (Grammar of the literary Macedonian language, 2 vols.; 1952–52). Koneski edited Macedonia's first dictionary of Macedonian, Rečnik na makedonski jazik (1965). He received honorary doctorates from the University of Chicago and the Jagiellonian University of Kraków. He was also a poet, writer, and translator, translating the works of Heinrich Heine and William Shakespeare into Macedonian. Koneski's works were also translated into many languages, including English, Polish, and Russian. Among other works, he wrote the following: Zemljata i ljubovta (Land and love; 1948); Lingvistika (Linguistics; 1948); Pesni (Songs; 1953); collection of short stories Lozje (Vineyard; 1955); Istorija na Makedonskijat jazik (History of the Macedonian language; 1965); and Towards the Macedonian Renaissance (1961). (DP)

Sources: Enciklopedija Jugoslavije, vol. 5 (Zagreb, 1962); Mały słownik pisarzy zachodnio-słowiańskich i południowo-słowiańskich (Warsaw, 1973); "Blaze Koneski," in Mine Holton and Graham W. Reid, eds., Reading the Ashes: An Anthology of the Poetry of Modern Macedonia (Pittsburgh, 1977).

KONIK Konstantin (31 December 1873, Dorpat–3 August 1936, Tartu), Estonian doctor and politician. In 1899 Konik graduated from Dorpat (Tartu) University and began his medical practice. In 1908 he received a doctorate degree. In 1913–15 he published some articles in Trevis, the first professional medical periodical in the Estonian language. After the February 1917 revolution, Konik became a member of the Provincial Government. On 19 February 1918, along with Konstantin Päts and Jüri Vilms, he made up the three-member Estonian Salvation Committee (Eestimaa Päästmises Komitee), the highest state authority appointed by the Estonian National Council (Maapäev). Konik represented the Estonian Labor Party. In 1918–20 he served as head of the Health Care Department of the Estonian Provisional Government. From 1920 to 1931 he was a professor of surgery and dean of the Tartu University Medical School. Apart from teaching classes, which were popular with students, Konik managed to provide the university hospital with heliotherapy, X-rays, and other equipment. His work earned him great respect, and in the late 1920s, he returned to politics. He won a seat in the parliamentary elections, and from May to October 1928, he served as minister of education and social welfare in the government of Jaan Tõnisson. Konik later returned to the university, where he worked until his death. (AG)

Sources: Eesti Entsüklopeedia, vol. 14 (Tallinn, 2000); Georg von Rauch, The Baltic States: The Years of Independence, 1917–1940 (Berkeley, 1970); "Strona szpitala klinicznego Uniwersytetu w Tartu," <http://www.cut.ee/index.php?1,2,2>; "Strona Ministerstwa Spraw Socjalnych Republiki Estonii," www.sm.ee/gopr030/Web/gpweb.nsf/pages/sotsiaalministeerium0003.

KONITZA Faik, pseudonym "Trank Spiro bey" (15 March 1876, Konicë–14 December 1942, Boston), Albanian diplomat, writer, and translator. Born into an aristocratic family, Konitza initially attended St. Francis Xavier Jesuit College in Shkodër. In 1886 he went to Istanbul, where he attended the Galatasaray Gymnasium. He studied in France (Grenoble, Dijon, Paris); Sweden (Uppsala); and the United States. In 1895 he received a diploma in Romance philology in Dijon. Konitza was a co-founder and editor of Albania (1896–1909), one of the most important opinion-making publications of the Albanian émigrés and regarded as the first modern Albanian-language periodical. Initially, this periodical was published in Brussels and then in London. In Albania Konitza promoted autonomy for the Albanian territories under the rule of Austria-Hungary. His great knowledge and erudition impressed Guillaume Apollinaire, whom he befriended in 1903 and who called Konitza “the Voltaire of the Balkans.” In 1909 Konitza assumed the editorship of Dielli, a periodical published in Boston, and in 1911, the editorship of Trumbeta e Krujës, a periodical published in St. Louis. He was also chief editor of seven other periodicals that were published by the Albanian diaspora. Konitza published his articles in 130 periodicals, which appeared in nine different languages. The aim of a great majority of the articles was to publicize the Albanian cause in Europe. In 1912 in the United States Konitza became secretary of a literary society called Vatra. In 1913 he was a delegate of this society to conferences in London and Trieste. At that time he abandoned pro-Habsburg ideas in favor of Albanian independence. In 1914 he served for a short time as consul general of the government of Essad Pasha Toptani to Washington.

During World War I Konitza was initially in Austria and then in Switzerland, from where he criticized the Balkan policy of the Central Powers. After the war he returned to the United States. In 1924 he was elected a member of the Albanian parliament. When Ahmed Zogu took over power, Konitza became Albanian ambassador to the United States in May 1926. In 1929 he visited Albania for the last time and then left the diplomatic service, criticizing the policy of King Zog I. Until his death Konitza was the most influential figure in the Albanian diaspora in the United States, remaining independent despite pressure from King Zog, who sought political support in the United States. The Communist authorities refused permission for Konitza’s body to be brought back to Albania; therefore, he was buried in Boston. His works, denounced during the Communist era, were finally published in Albania in 1992. Konitza wrote, among other things, Jeta e Skënderbeut (The life of Skanderbeg; 1912); Doktor Gjëlpera zbulon rrenjet e drames së Mamurrasit (Dr. Gjëlpera reveals the lies behind the events in Mamurrasit; 1924); Ne hijen e hurmavë (In the shadow of date palms; 1926); and Si m’u duk Shqipëria (My perception of Albania; 1929). (TC)

Sources: Biographisches Lexikon, vol. 2; Stavro Skendi, Albania (New York, 1956); Fjalori Enciklopedik Shqiptar (Tirana, 1985); Stuart E. Mann, Albanian Literature (London, 1955); Giuseppe Schiro, Storia della letteratura albanese (Milan, 1959); Federata Panshqiptare e Amerikes VATRA, Faik Konitza 1876–1976 (New York, 1976); Namik Ressuli, Albanian Literature (Boston, 1987); Fevziu Blendi, Histori e shtypit shqiptar 1848–1996 (Tirana, 1996).

KONOVALETS Yevhen (14 June 1891, Zashkov, near Lemberg [Lwów, Lviv]–23 May 1938, Rotterdam), Ukrainian officer and nationalist politician. The son of a teacher, Konovalets completed a gymnasium in Lemberg. During his law studies at the University of Lemberg he was a secretary of the Prosvita Society. He co-organized an educational association of students whose members traveled around to villages and presented scholarly papers to village people. In 1910, in the “case of the 101 students,” Konovalets was tried for activities aimed at the establishment of a Ukrainian university in Lemberg. He was a political representative for youth in the Central Committee of the Ukrainian National Democratic Party. During World War I he served as a warrant officer in the Austro-Hungarian Army. Taken captive in the battle of Makivka in 1915, he was held in a prisoner of war camp in Tsaritsyn (now Volgograd), where, along with Andrii Melnyk, Roman Sushko, and others, he formed a group of Ukrainian prisoners of war. After his release from the camp in 1917, Konovalets went to Kiev, where he organized a brigade of Sich Riflemen, the best unit of the Ukrainian Army between 1918 and 1919. He suppressed the Bolshevik uprising in Kiev and was commander in the battle against the forces of Mikhail Muravyov. After the signing of the Brest-Litovsk peace treaty (March 1918), Konovalets took part in the counterattack on Kiev. He expanded his unit to regiment level, but after Hetman Pavlo Skoropadskyi came to power, the Germans disarmed his regiment. Avoiding political conflicts, he later revived his unit in Belaya Tserkov, where he formed troops faithful to the hetman.

On 16 November 1918, after Skoropadsky signed a federal treaty with Russia, Konovalets joined an uprising against the hetman, declaring his support for the Ukrainian National Republic (UNR). He expanded his Sich Riflemen first to division and then to corps level. He fought on the side of the UNR until the end of 1919. In December 1919 he was interned briefly by the Poles in Łuck (Lutsk). In the spring of 1920 he went abroad. On Symon Petlyura’s recommendation Konovalets attempted to organize a reserve army composed of Ukrainian soldiers interned in Czechoslovakia and Ukrainians who had been captured by the Italians. However, Prime Minister Yevhen Petrushevych did not support him, so his mission ended in failure. He returned to Lwów in the summer of 1921 and was a co-organizer of Yurko Tyutyunnyk’s expedition to the USSR. In 1920 he joined a group of officers who founded the Ukrainian Military Organization (UVO) in Prague. He reorganized the UVO by creating its modern general headquarters.

At the end of November 1922 Konovalets left Poland. He lived in Berlin until 1929, then in Geneva (1929–36) and Rome (1936–38). He consolidated the UVO structures and established relations with political circles in Germany, Great Britain, Lithuania, Spain, Italy, and other countries. For a time he enjoyed the friendly neutrality of the Czechoslovak authorities and received subventions from Germany and Lithuania. He organized a political information service and established Ukrainian offices in various countries. The UVO used terror on a large scale; its victims were not only Poles, but compromise-minded Ukrainians as well. Konovalts laid the foundations for the consolidation of Ukrainian nationalists, which took place in 1929 in Vienna, where the Organization of Ukrainian Nationalists (OUN) was formed. By means of an armed struggle against Poland and the USSR, the OUN attempted to create Ukrainian statehood in the territories populated by Ukrainians. During his frequent visits abroad, Konovalts contributed to the formation of OUN branches in the United States, Canada, France, Belgium, and other countries. At the League of Nations he submitted many protests, such as those against Polish pacifications in Volhynia in 1930, in an attempt to internationalize the Ukrainian cause. He headed the activities of the Ukrainian underground in Poland and organized the sabotage and assassinations of the representatives of Polish authorities. In the 1930s the OUN won the support of young Ukrainians in Poland. Konovalts also tried to establish an underground network in the USSR. He met with Hitler twice to negotiate the training of Ukrainian soldiers in the Third Reich. In 1938 Konovalts was killed by an NKVD agent Pavel Sudoplatov, who won his trust and then planted a bomb in a box of chocolates that he handed Konovalts. (GM)

Sources: Encyclopedia of Ukraine, vol. 2 (Toronto, 1988); Matthew Stachiv and Jaroslav Sztendera, eds., Western Ukraine at the Turning Point of Europe's History, 1918–1923, vols. 1–2 (New York, 1971); Ievhen Konovalts ta joho doba (Munich, 1974); Ryszard Torzecki, Kwestia ukraińska w Polsce w latach 1923–1929 (Kraków, 1989); Ryszard Torzecki, Polacy i Ukraińcy. Sprawa ukraińska w czasie II wojny światowej na terenie II Rzeczypospolitej (Warsaw, 1993); Stepan Ripetskyi, Ukrains'ke Sichove Striletsvo (Lviv, 1995); Pavel Sudoplatov, Spetsoperatsii. Lubianka i Kreml 1930–1950 gody (Moscow, 1997).

KONRÁD György (2 April 1933, Debrecen), Hungarian writer. Born into a rich family of Jewish descent from northeastern Hungary, in 1944 Konrád hid with his family in Budapest. In 1951–56 he studied Hungarian language and literature at the University of Budapest, and during the 1956 revolution he belonged to a university unit of the National Guard. For this reason he later faced problems with finding a job. From 1959 to 1965 he worked in an educational institution, and in 1965–1973 he worked as a sociologist at the Institute of Planning and Architectural Studies. From 1960 he worked in the Helikon Press. Konrád made his literary debut in the 1960s, publishing popular articles about the leaders of French existentialism and the nouveau roman. Struggling with censorship, he also wrote sociological works, of which the best known were studies of hooliganism and lifestyles in the large housing quarters. He presented a literary version of these studies in the novel A látogató (The guest; 1969), which raised heated debates in the media.

In the 1970s Konrád developed an interest in the links between communism and intellectuals, and he presented his assessment in the novel A városalapító (1977; The City Builder, 1977) and in the study (with Iván Szelényi) Az étrelmiség útja az osztályhatalomhoz (The road of the intelligentsia to class rule; 1978). As a result of constant police repression and censorship, from the late 1970s Konrád mostly published abroad and in the uncensored press, becoming one of the best-known Hungarian author in the West. He wrote The Case Worker (1974); Der Komplize (The accomplice; 1980); Antipolitik (Anti-politics; 1985); and Die Melankolie des Wiedersgeburts (The melancholy of rebirth; 1992). After the fall of Communist rule, Konrád became involved in political life, serving as an adviser to the Alliance of Free Democrats and initiating the leftist Democratic Charter (Demokratikus Charta). In 1990–93 he was chairman of the International PEN Club, and from 1997 he was chairman of the Academy of Arts in Berlin. (MS)

Sources: Magyar alakok (Budapest, 1994); Új magyar irodalmi lexikon (Budapest, 1994); György Konrad: Eine Stimme aus Mitteleuropa (Rehburg and Loccum, 1996); Ki kicsoda 2002 (Budapest, 2001).

KONSTANTINOVA Elka (25 May 1932, Sofia), Bulgarian historian of literature and politician. The daughter of an activist of the Radical Democratic Party (RDP), Konstantinova studied at the University of Sofia, and then she worked at the Institute of Literature of the Bulgarian Academy of Sciences (BAS), publishing biographical essays and theoretical works on science fiction. In 1978–83 she taught the Bulgarian language at the Jagiellonian University in Kraków, Poland, where she became fascinated with Solidarity. In 1988 she joined the Club for the Support of Glasnost and Perestroika, led by Zhelyu Zhelev. In December 1989 Konstantinova restored the RDP and took its lead. On behalf of this party she became a member of the National Coordination Council of the Union of Democratic Forces (UDF). After the split of the UDF in the spring of 1991, she joined the Right Bloc, which demanded the full elimination of Communist influence, the nationalization of Bulgarian Communist Party property, and an immediate dissolution of the Grand National Assembly (GNA). In view of the resistance of the UDF leadership, Konstantinova, along with thirty-nine other deputies, left the GNA. Demanding early elections, Konstantinova opposed the passage of a new constitution by a parliament dominated by the post-Communists. When the GNA passed a law stipulating that deputies who did not sign the constitution would lose their mandates, Konstantinova and several other people started a hunger strike. She demanded the dismissal of UDF activists who insisted that the constitution be passed by a GNA elected in 1990. She succeeded, and the UDF ran in the elections of October 1991 as a rightist organization. Konstantinova won a mandate and became minister of culture in the new government of Filip Dimitrov. After a few months she resigned, protesting the reduction of budgetary spending on culture. As a result of conflicts within the RDP, in 1993 Konstantinova was dismissed from its leadership. Two months before the 1994 elections she left the RDP and joined the Popular Union (Naroden Sayuz), but she was sidelined. From 1999 Konstantinova headed the BAS modern Bulgarian literature section. (AG)

Sources: Jerzy Jackowicz, Bułgaria od rządów komunistycznych do demokracji parlamentarnej 1988–1991 (Warsaw, 1992); Raymond Detrez, Historical Dictionary of Bulgaria (Lanham, Md., 1997); www.cit.bg/rrech/e.konstantinova.htm; www.omda.bg/engl/news/party/sds_engl.htm; www.ilit.bas.bg/en/sections/novalit.htm.

KONTIĆ Radoje (31 May 1937, Nikšić, Montenegro), Montenegrin Communist and post-Communist activist. In 1956 Kontić joined the League of Communists of Yugoslavia (LCY). After graduating from Belgrade University in 1961, he became director of the Boris Kidrič Steelworks in the town of Nikšić. In 1974 he became a member of the LCY Central Committee, and in 1978–82 and 1986–89 he was minister without portfolio in the federal government. From 1982 through 1986 Kontić was deputy prime minister and (in 1989–91) prime minister of the Montenegrin republic. In June 1991 he was among the LCY activists in Montenegro who changed the name of the party into the Democratic Party of Socialists (Demokratska Partija Socijalista). In July 1992 Kontić became deputy prime minister in the federal government of Milan Panić. On 29 December 1992 the federal parliament dismissed Panić and appointed Kontić as acting prime minister. From December 1992 to February 1993 he was also minister of defense. On 3 March 1993 the federal parliament elected Kontić prime minister. Kontić repeatedly appealed to the United Nations for the abolishment of sanctions against the new Yugoslav federation, arguing that the perception of Yugoslavia as aggressor in Bosnia-Herzegovina was groundless. After the parliamentary elections of November 1996, Kontić continued as head of the federal government created in March 1997. He attempted to stay neutral in the conflict between the presidents of Serbia and Montenegro—Slobodan Milošević and Milo Đukanović.

This conflict intensified after the presidential elections in Montenegro in October 1997, in which Momir Bulatović, supported by Milošević, lost to Đukanović. On 18 May 1998 the federal parliament recalled Kontić from the position of prime minister. The official reason was his delay of economic reforms. Kontić was replaced by Bulatović, but the decision of the federal parliament was opposed by the Montenegrin parliament. (AO)

Sources: Polish Press Agency, Biographical Notes, Press Documentation, 1998; Who's Who in the Socialist Countries of Europe (Munich, London, and Paris, 1989); Bugajski.

KOPÁCSI Sándor (5 March 1922, Miskolc–2 March 2001, Toronto), one of the leaders of the 1956 revolution in Hungary. The son of a laborer and activist in the Hungarian Social Democratic Party (HSDP), at the age of fifteen Kopácsi took part in a leaflet action against the Arrow Cross Party, and he was shot in the leg. He finished a basic vocational school and worked as a turner during the war. After the Germans occupied Hungary in March 1944, he joined the anti-Nazi resistance movement, and his family provided shelter for Jewish people who were in hiding. After the war, Kopácsi joined the Hungarian Communist Party (HCP) and the new police force. After graduating from a police officers' school in 1949, he was transferred to the department of public security at the headquarters of the HCP in Budapest. Sent to a two-year course at the Higher Party School in the autumn of 1949, he was subsequently appointed head of the party apparatus of the police. In 1952 he became chief of the Budapest police, and in 1953, a member of parliament.

After the Twentieth CPSU Congress, at an open party meeting of the police Kopácsi spoke out against Mátyás Rákosi, head of the party. Influenced by the events of June 1956 in Poznań, Poland, Kopácsi, like some of his colleagues, said at a meeting of army and police officers that he would not “shoot at people.” On 23 October 1956 he ordered the police to return to the barracks, and he entered into talks with the insurgents. On 31 October he joined the provisional leadership of the Hungarian Socialist Workers' Party (HSWP) and became a member of the Revolutionary Defense Committee. He gained the trust of the insurgents, and on 3 November he was elected deputy commander of the Revolutionary National Guard. On 5 November, after the second Soviet intervention, Kopácsi was arrested by General Ivan Serov, head of the KGB. On 15 June 1958, in the trial of Imre Nagy and his associates, Kopácsi was sentenced to life imprisonment. Released under an amnesty in 1963, he worked as a turner in a telephone factory until 1965, later becoming a technical clerk. In 1969 he was allowed to finish his studies, but after receiving a degree in law, he did not get a job that was appropriate for his level of education. In 1975 he emigrated to Canada. In 1987 he retired. In 1989 Kopácsi, along with his deceased parents, was honored with the title of Righteous among Nations by the Yad Vashem Institute in Jerusalem. In the same year he returned to Hungary, where he was rehabilitated. In 1990 his officer's rank was restored to him, and he was promoted to brigadier general. Kopácsi published an autobiographical novel, Életfogytiglan (Life sentence), which came out in English as In the Name of the Working Class: The Inside Story of the Hungarian Revolution (1987). (JT)

Sources: A magyar forradalom és szabadságharc enciklopédiája, CD-ROM (Budapest, 1999); Magyar Nagylexikon, vol. 11 (Budapest, 2000); Ki kicsoda 2000 (Budapest, 2001); Paul Ignotus, Hungary (London, 1972); György Litván, ed., Rewolucja węgierska 1956 roku (Warsaw, 1996).

KOPAŃSKI Stanisław (19 May 1895, St. Petersburg—23 March 1976, London), Polish general and engineer. Conscripted into the Russian Army in 1915, Kopański gave up his technical studies in St. Petersburg and graduated from the Mikhailov Artillery School. He served in the mounted artillery, and during World War I he fought on the German front. After the February 1917 revolution, he served in the First Polish Corps in Russia between 1917 and 1918. In November 1918 he joined the Polish Army. With the First Mounted Artillery Division, he fought in the battles of Lwów (Lviv) and Wilno (Vilnius), where in 1919 he lost an eye. During the Polish-Soviet war in 1920 he fought with General Juliusz Rómmel's Mounted Division. In 1923–24 Kopański completed engineering studies in Warsaw, and in 1924–27 he was the academic director of an officer cadet school and held the rank of major. In 1929 he graduated from the Military College in Paris. After returning to Poland, he began serving in the Third Department of the General Staff in 1934. From 1935 to 1936 he was deputy armor commander in the Ministry of Military Affairs, and from 1937 to 1938 he was commander of the first motorized artillery regiment. In 1938–39 Kopański completed a course at the Military Studies Center, rising to the rank of colonel. From March to September 1939 he was head of the Third (Operational) Department of the Staff of the Commander-in-Chief.

After the September 1939 defeat, Kopański made his way, via Romania, to France, where he became the armor commander in the High Command. At the beginning of 1940 he was sent to Syria to form the Polish Independent Carpathian Rifle Brigade, and he was promoted to general. He was in command of this brigade until 1942. From 1942 to 1943 he commanded the Third Carpathian Rifle Division.

He led the African campaign of this division, which fought at Tobruk, Gazala, and in the Libyan desert. In July 1943 Kopański became chief of staff of the commander-in-chief. In 1944 he was promoted to major general. After the death of General Władysław Sikorski, he became a leading figure of the Polish Armed Forces in the West. In September 1946 he was appointed inspector general of the Polish Adjustment and Resettlement Corps (Polski Korpus Przysposobienia i Rozmieszczenia), and he continued to hold this position until 1949. After the demobilization, Kopański remained in Great Britain. He organized assistance for the Polish servicemen who had fought in the West. In 1946 the authorities of the Polish People's Republic stripped him of Polish citizenship. From 1970 to 1972 Kopański was a member of the Council of Three (Rada Trzech), which served as a collective head of state in exile. He was also active in war veterans' organizations. He published Wspomnienia wojenne, 1939–1945 (War memoirs, 1939–45; 1961) and Moja służba w Wojsku Polskim, 1917–1939 (My service in the Polish Army, 1917–39; 1965). (JS)

Sources: Tadeusz Kryśka-Karski and Stanisław Żurkowski, Generałowie Polski Niepodległej. (London, 1976); Józef Garliński, Polska w drugiej wojnie światowej (London, 1982); Henryk Piotr Kosk, Generalicja polska: Popularny słownik biograficzny, vol. 1 (Pruszków, 1998); Zbigniew Mierzwiński, Generałowie II Rzeczypospolitej, vol. 1 (Warsaw, 1990); Jan Nowak Jeziorański, Kurier z Warszawy (Kraków, 1993); Encyklopedia Historii Polski: Dzieje polityczne, vol. 1 (Warsaw, 1994); Krzysztof Dybciak and Zdzisław Kudelski, eds., Leksykon kultury polskiej poza krajem od roku 1939 (Lublin, 2000).

KOPECKÝ Václav (27 August 1897, Kosmonosy, district of Mladá Boleslav—5 August 1961, Prague), Czech Communist activist and journalist. Kopecký studied at Charles University in Prague but never graduated. Until 1924 he worked as a government official. In 1919 he was one of the founders of the Marxist Association (Marxistické Sdružení), an organization of leftist intellectuals, and in 1921 he was a co-founder of the Communist Party of Czechoslovakia (CPC). Kopecký was a member of a faction led by Klement Gottwald that subordinated all its activities to the Stalinist version of internationalist communism. In the mid-1920s he became an editor of Communist newspapers, initially Dělnický deník in Ostrava and, from 1928 on, Rude Právo. From 1929 to 1938 he was a member of the Central Committee (CC) and a deputy to the National Assembly, and from 1931 to 1938 he was a member of the Politburo of the CC of the CPC. From the time he joined the leadership of the party, Kopecký eagerly complied with Kremlin directives and informed the Soviet authorities about the situation within the CPC and in the country at large. He spent the World War II period in Moscow, where, as a member of the leadership of the party abroad, he helped to shape Gottwald's policies. In December 1943 Kopecký took part in negotiations with Edvard Beneš and was a co-author of the so-called Christmas agreement, which initiated cooperation between the government-in-exile and the center of the Communist émigré community in Moscow.

In 1945 Kopecký was one of the authors of the Košice program, which was announced by the government of the National Front of Czechs and Slovaks. In 1945 he also became a member of the CC and the Presidium of the CC of the CPC and a deputy to the National Assembly. A member of the Politburo of the CPC CC from 1954 on, Kopecký served as deputy prime minister from October 1949 to April 1950 and from January 1953 to August 1961, holding the post of first deputy prime minister from January to September 1953. In addition, he was minister of information and, from 1953 to 1954, minister of culture. One of the main party ideologists during the Stalinist period, he shaped the Communist cultural policy in the 1940s and 1950s. As one of the senior leaders of the CPC, Kopecký actively participated in unlawful party activities and took part in staging political trials in the 1950s, showing ingenuity in fabricating and presenting trumped-up charges against members of non-Communist parties, Catholic clergy, and "internal enemies" within the party. Kopecký's publications include Třicet let KSČ (Thirty years of the CPC; 1951) and ČSR a KSČ (ČSR and the CPC; 1960), which justified the unlawful political trials and expounded the Stalinist interpretation of history. (PU)

Sources: ČBS: Českoslovenští politici: 1918–1991 (Prague, 1991); Kdo byl kdo v našich dějinách ve 20. století, vol. 1 (Prague, 1998); Vratislav Busek and Nicolas Spulber, eds., Czechoslovakia (New York, 1957); Josef Korbel, The Communist Subversion of Czechoslovakia, 1938–1948 (Princeton, 1959); Vladimir Reisky de Dubnic, Communist Propaganda Methods: The Case of Czechoslovakia (New York, 1960); Edward Taborsky, Communism in Czechoslovakia, 1948–1960 (Princeton, 1961); Paul E. Zinner, Communist Strategy and Tactics in Czechoslovakia, 1918–48 (New York, 1963).

KÕPP Johan (9 November 1874, Holdre–21 October 1970, Stockholm), Estonian Lutheran bishop. Kõpp graduated from high school in 1896 and completed theological studies in Tartu in 1906. He then worked for two years as a high school teacher in Pärnu, and from 1909 to 1922 he was a pastor in Laiuse. Kõpp was one of the first Estonians to take up a chair at the University of Tartu in 1916. In 1917 he was one of the leading organizers of a church congress at which the Estonian Evangelical Lutheran Church (EELC) was founded as an institution independent from German church structures. Between world wars Kõpp was one of the leaders of the Christian People's Party (Kristlik Rahvaerakond), a Christian-democratic party that called for increasing the role of the Lutheran Church in society and opposed reforms that might diminish the ownership rights of Protestant congregations. Still, secularization among the Estonian people began to increase in the late 1920s. From 1920 to 1927 Kõpp was deputy rector, and from 1928 to 1937 rector, of Tartu University. He had broad international contacts, and his writings were known abroad. In 1939 he was elevated to bishop, after Hugo Rahamägi, the former head of the EELC, had been dismissed in an atmosphere of public scandal that led to a deep rift among the hierarchs and the faithful. As a result of the Molotov-Ribbentrop Pact of August 1939, most Baltic Germans emigrated. After the German pastors, many of whom had worked in Estonian parishes, left Estonia, the numbers of the Lutheran clergy on the eve of the Soviet invasion diminished by one-fifth.

When the Red Army entered Estonia in June 1940, the role of the head of the EELC became even more difficult. Kõpp was not deported to the Soviet Union, but his work was severely limited and the Lutheran Church suffered harassment, including a ban on the printing of religious books, the removal of religion from the schools, the takeover of church farmlands and some other real property by the state, and persecutions of the clergy. When the Germans occupied Estonia in 1941, Kõpp managed to restore most of the rights and freedoms that the Lutherans had enjoyed before the war, but the theological schools were not reopened until 1943, and their reopening did not prevent a further drop in the number of pastors. Relations with the Germans, although correct, were not free from tensions over such issues as the confiscation of church bells for war production and the status of the Theological Institute. The reoccupation of Estonia by the Soviet Union and a mass exodus of Estonians in 1944 influenced Kõpp's decision to leave the country. As a result, the Lutheran Church found itself in a very difficult situation, because seventy-two pastors—half the total number—left Estonia along with Kõpp. Before leaving, Kõpp wrote a letter authorizing Anton Eilart to act as bishop assessor of the consistory. However, Eilart was soon arrested by the NKVD and was later forced to go underground. As a result, the EELC was deprived of its legal authorities, which made it easier for the Communists to control it.

Kõpp managed to prepare the EELC to work in exile. In 1943 the consistory and the Church Council enacted a law authorizing the bishop to act in situations when neither of these organs could assemble. This law made possible the transfer of the Church's activities abroad. Although the small Estonian community settled in several countries, Kõpp, who resided in Sweden, succeeded in establishing an efficient network of parishes and deaneries.

ies. The establishment of foundations for pastoral work successfully prevented the incorporation of Estonians into the local congregations of the countries where they had settled and preserved their native language in the liturgy. The EELC abroad easily gained acceptance by other Protestant churches and was put on the list of founders of the Lutheran World Federation (Lund 1947). The Theological Institute, which educated future pastors, was established during Kõpp's time, as was the periodical Estonian Church, which is still published today. In 1965 Kõpp retired. (AG)

Sources: Eesti Entsuklopeedia, vol. 5 (Tallinn, 1990); Tõnu Parming and Elmar Järvesöö, A Case Study of a Soviet Republic: The Estonian SRR (Boulder, Colo., 1978); Mati Laur, Tõnis Lukas, Ain Mäesalu, Ago Pajur, and Tõnu Tannberg, History of Estonia (Tallin, 2000); <http://www.eelk.ee/EELCabroad.html>; <http://www.okupatsioon.ee/english/overviews/index.html>; <http://www.eelk.ee/~eelk109/kogudus.htm>; <http://www.htg.tartu.ee/eng/index.html>.

KORBOŃSKI Stefan (2 March 1901, Praszka, near Częstochowa–23 April 1989, Washington, D.C.), Polish politician. While still a high school student, Korboński volunteered for the Polish Army, which was being formed at the end of 1918. He fought in the defense of Lwów (Lviv), and in 1920 he served in the Twenty-ninth Regiment of the Kaniów Riflemen. In 1921 he took part in the Third Silesian Uprising. Korboński completed legal studies in Poznań and then practiced in local courts and worked in the State Attorney General's Office of the Republic of Poland. In the 1930s, with his cousin Zygmunt Graliński, Korboński ran a law firm in Warsaw. In 1925 he joined the Polish Peasant Party–Liberation (Polskie Stronnictwo Ludowe–Wyzwolenie). After the unification of the peasant movement in 1931 Korboński joined the leadership of the Peasant Party (Stronnictwo Ludowe [SL]). In 1936–39 he was president of the Białystok executive board of the SL and a member of the Supreme Party Court. In September 1939 Korboński fought as a reserve officer and was captured by the Soviets in Włodzimierz Wołyński (now Volodymyr-Volynskyi). He escaped from a transport heading far into the USSR and returned to Warsaw, where he co-organized the underground SL. In October 1939 he joined its Chief Political Council. After the arrest of Maciej Rataj in March 1940, Korboński replaced him as party representative in the inter-party Political Agreement Committee (Polityczny Komitet Porozumiewawczy).

In 1941, after Korboński's resignation from the committee, the commander-in-chief of the Home Army and the government delegate appointed chief of the Directorate of Civil Resistance (Kierownictwo Walki Cywilnej [KWC]).

In this role he organized sabotage actions, passive resistance, and an underground judiciary that passed sentences on the traitors to the nation. He also ran a radio station called Świt, which kept the London government of the Republic of Poland, as well as Poles at home and abroad, informed about events in occupied Poland. Korboński's wife, Zofia, managed the Cipher Bureau. After the KWC merged with the Directorate of the Conspiratorial Struggle (which had been formed by the High Command of the Home Army to organize sabotage) and when the Directorate of Underground Struggle (Kierownictwo Walki Podziemnej) was established in July 1943, Korboński was appointed chief of civil resistance. During the Warsaw Uprising he also became head of the Interior Department of the Government Delegation. After the collapse of the uprising Korboński, along with the civilian population, left Warsaw. In March 1945 the Soviet services treacherously arrested sixteen leaders of Underground Poland, among them delegate Jan Stanisław Jankowski, and Korboński took over Jankowski's duties.

After the Yalta Conference, the London authorities of the SL found themselves in opposition to the government-in-exile. On 27 June 1945 Korboński resigned from his duties, and the following day Soviet functionaries arrested him in Kraków. The Communists agreed to the creation of the Polish Peasant Party (Polskie Stronnictwo Ludowe[PSL]) and since Korboński was one of the leaders he was released. In August 1945 Korboński became president of the PSL in Warsaw, and in 1946 he was elected to the Chief Executive Committee of the party. In the elections of January 1947 he won a seat in the capital. Korboński delivered two courageous speeches in the Assembly, stigmatizing the violations and abuses of power by the Communists. Both speeches were censored, not only in the press, but also in the parliamentary stenographic records. Threatened with the loss of his immunity and with arrest, on 5 November 1947 Korboński and his wife secretly went to Sweden and then, via England, arrived in the United States at the end of the month.

Initially, Korboński was linked with the Polish National Democratic Committee (Polski Narodowy Komitet Demokratyczny) of Stanisław Mikołajczyk, and after the organization disintegrated, he was one of the leaders of the PSL in exile in the United States, cooperating, for example, with Stanisław Bańczyk. In the conflict between the London government-in-exile and the Political Council, Korboński supported the latter, and he led the representation of the council in the United States. In 1954 he testified before the U.S. House of Representatives Committee to Investigate Communist Aggression. From 1954 on, as a representative of the Polish Political Council, Korboński sat in the Assembly of Captive European Nations (ACEN). In 1958–59, 1966–67, and 1971–85 he was president of the ACEN. For many years he also presided over the Polish Unity Council in the United States and was a member of the Polish Institute of Arts and Sciences.

Korboński was the author of many books: the trilogy W imieniu Rzeczypospolitej (1954; Fighting Warsaw, 1968), W imieniu Kremla (1956; Warsaw in Chains, 1959), and W imieniu Polski Walczącej (1963; Warsaw in Exile, 1966; published also in Spanish), as well as Polskie Państwo Podziemne (1975; The Polish Underground State: A Guide to the Underground, 1939–1945, 1981) and The Jews and the Poles in World War II (1989). Korboński was awarded the Virtuti Militari Cross for the war of 1920, the Home Army Cross, the 1939–45 war medal, and other decorations. In 1980 the Yad Vashem Institute in Jerusalem bestowed the Medal of the Righteous on him for his participation in saving Jews during the war. (WR) Sources: Kunert, vol. 1; Andrzej Pomian, “Stefan Korboński 2 III 1901–23 IX 1989,” Nowy Dziennik, 26 April 1989; Krystyna Kersten, Narodziny systemu władzy: Polska 1943–1948 (Poznań, 1990); Stanisław Łach, Polskie Stronnictwo Ludowe w latach 1945–1947 (Gdańsk, 1995).

KORCZAK Janusz [originally Henryk Goldszmit] (22 July 1878 or 1879, Warsaw–6 [?] August 1942, Treblinka), Polish doctor, writer, and teacher. Korczak was born into an assimilated Jewish family connected with the secular enlightenment Haskala movement. In 1905 he graduated in medicine from Warsaw University, and then he practiced in Berlin, Paris, and London clinics. After returning home in 1905, he worked as a pediatrician in Warsaw; this led to his lifetime passion and mission: aid to children. In 1907 he became connected with the Aid to Orphans society, and in 1912 he co-founded and until his death headed the Jewish Orphanage in Warsaw. In 1919, with Maryna Falska, Korczak established and until 1936 directed the Polish orphanage Our Home (Nasz Dom) in Warsaw. He was also active in many charity institutions, wrote for the periodicals Głos and Przegląd Społeczny, and gave lectures on the radio. Korczak explored child psychology and upbringing. In his orphanages he introduced his own educational programs, stimulating the activities of children (for instance, he engaged them in the editing of Mały Przegląd). Korczak described his pedagogical methodology in Momenty wychowawcze (Educational moments; 1919), Jak kochać dzieci (How to love children; 1920), and Prawo dzieci do szacunku (Children’s right to dignity; 1929), and he presented his findings at the Institute of Special Pedagogy and the Free University in Warsaw. After the German invasion in September 1939, Korczak made radio presentations for children, and after the capitulation of Poland he focused on securing safe living conditions for his Jewish pupils. In the fall of 1940 his Jewish orphanage was forced to move within the Warsaw Ghetto, and Korczak was arrested. After a few months he was released on bail, but on 5 August 1942 the orphanage was closed and his pupils were sent to the death camp of Treblinka. Although Korczak was offered a pardon, he accompanied his children to the very end and perished with them.

Korczak wrote a lot for children, but his works include important messages for adults as well. Some of these works are valuable documents of the time—for example, Jośki, Mośki i Srule (Joseks, Moseks, and Sruls; 1910) and Józki, Jaśki i Franki (Joes, Jacks, and Frankies; 1911). His most famous novel, Król Maciuś Pierwszy (1922; King Matt the First, 1986), along with its follow-up, Król Maciuś Pierwszy na bezludnej wyspie (King Matt on a deserted island; 1923), include serious philosophical reflections on human nature and power. Korczak also authored Sława (Fame; 1913), Bankructwo małego Dżeka (The bankruptcy of Little Jack; 1924), and Kajtuś czarodziej (Kajtuś the magician; 1934). His works were translated into many languages, gaining international recognition. In 1990 Andrzej Wajda directed the movie Korczak. In 1992–96 the first six volumes of Korczak’s Dzieła wszystkie (Complete works) were published in Poland. His Selected Works were published in the United States in 1967, Ghetto Diary in the United States in 1978, and the Ghetto Years in Israel in 1980. (PU)

Sources: PSB, vol. 8; Literatura polska XX wieku: Przewodnik encyklopedyczny, vol. 1 (Warsaw, 2000); Alicja Szlązakowa, Janusz Korczak (Warsaw, 1978); Maria Falkowska, ed., Kalendarium życia, działalności i twórczości Janusza Korczaka (Warsaw, 1978); Ludwika Barszczewska and Bolesław Milewicz, eds., Wspomnienia o Januszu Korczaku (Warsaw, 1981); Aleksander Lewin, ed., Janusz Korczak w getcie: Nowe źródła (Warsaw, 1992); Adir Cohen, The Gate of Light: Janusz Korczak, the Educator and Writer Who Overcame the Holocaust (Rutherford, N.J., 1994); Betty Jean Lifton, The King of Children: A Biography of Janusz Korczak (New York, 1997); www.korczak.pl/biography.htm.

KORDAČ František (11 January 1852, Seletice, near Libán, district of Nymburk–26 April 1934, Prague), Czech archbishop. In 1878 Kordač completed philosophical and theological studies in Rome. In 1879, after taking holy orders, he began his ministry in Liberec. In 1885 he became a professor and in 1889 the rector of a theological seminary in Litoměřice. In 1905 he became a professor of philosophy and Christian apologetics at the Theological Department of Charles University in Prague. From 1918 to 1919 he was a deputy to the revolutionary National Assembly as a representative of the Czechoslovak People's Party (Československá strana lidová [ČSL]). After he was consecrated bishop and appointed archbishop of Prague and Primate of Bohemia in September 1919, Kordač resigned his parliamentary seat. During the internal conflicts within the Czech Church, he firmly defended the authority of Rome and rejected calls for reforms from a part of the clergy, such as a demand to abolish celibacy. The only reform he supported was one that called for the use of the Czech language in pastoral services. Despite Kordač's efforts to maintain the unity of the Church, in 1920 a group of radical priests proclaimed the establishment of the Czechoslovak Church, which led to their excommunication. This, along with an agricultural reform that deprived the Church of much of its property, weakened the position of the Church in Czechoslovakia. In the second half of the 1920s Kordač successfully completed the construction of the archbishop's gymnasium and a theological seminary in Prague. After the papal nuncio ostentatiously left in 1925 in protest against the participation of the government in a commemoration of the death of Jan Hus, Kordač tried to explain in the Vatican that for the Czech people Hus had a national rather than a religious dimension. Kordač was actively involved in forging an agreement between Czechoslovakia and the Holy See; it was reached at the beginning of 1928, when the Vatican sent a new nuncio, Pietro Ciriaci. Kordač came into conflict with Ciriaci over the latter's financial claims. As a result, Kordač resigned as archbishop in 1931, although old age and ill health were given as the official reasons for his resignation. (PU)

Sources: ČBS; J. Dejmek, "Československo-vatikánská jednání o modus vivendi 1927–28," Český časopis historický, 1994; Milan Buben, Encyklopedie českých a moravských sídelních biskupů (Prague, 2000); Kdo byl kdo v našich dějinách ve 20. století, vol. 1 (Prague, 1998).

KOREC Jan Chryzostom SJ (22 January 1924, Bošany), Slovak cardinal. Korec started theological studies in Trnava. In 1939 he entered the Jesuit monastic seminary in Ružomberok, where he studied philosophy and theology. After the dissolution of the male orders in Slovakia by the Communists on 14–15 April 1950, Korec was interned in the Jasov, Podolíneč, and Pezinok monasteries. Ordained secretly in Rožňava in October 1950, he started working as a minister in a Jesuit seminary. On 24 August 1951 he was secretly consecrated by Bishop Pavol Hnilica SJ. Unable to work as an official minister, for ten years he worked as a blue-collar laborer. In March 1960 Korec was arrested, and in May 1960 he was sentenced to twelve years for "betraying the Socialist homeland" by, for instance, carrying on a religious ministry among the youth and secretly ordaining of priests.

For seven years Korec was detained in the worst Czechoslovak prisons, often under inhuman conditions. Conditionally released in February 1968, despite health problems, he joined in the official ministry—for instance, in the creation of the Work of the Council of Renewal, the most important church initiative during the Prague Spring. On 8 July 1969 Korec was received in a private audience by Pope Paul VI, who presented him with his own episcopal insignia. After returning home, Korec was prevented from taking over his diocese. Perceived by the Communists as the main organizer of Church structures independent from the state, during the so-called normalization he was banned from all official religious duties. From 1970 he lived in Bratislava under constant police surveillance. Nevertheless, until the fall of Communist rule in 1989 Korec was active in the underground Catholic Church in Slovakia, and he ordained 120 priests. He also stayed in contact with the leaders of the democratic opposition. He publicly protested the obligation of the clergy to belong to the state-controlled Pacem in terris Association. He belonged to the top moral authorities in Slovakia.

When on 25 March 1988 a demonstration in defense of believers was brutally dispersed by the riot police in Bratislava, Korec signed an open letter defending those repressed. He returned to his normal ministry in November 1989. In January 1990 he assumed the position of rector of Ss. Cyril and Methodius Catholic Seminary in Bratislava, and on 6 February 1990 he became bishop of Nitra, the oldest Slovak diocese. On 28 June 1991 Pope John Paul II appointed him cardinal. In 1991 Korec supported the dissolution of Czechoslovakia and the proclamation of an independent Slovakia. On 30 June 1995 he welcomed John Paul II in Nitra, where the Pope met the Slovak youth. During ten years of his episcopal service Korec consecrated about sixty new churches. He played an important role in negotiating the concordat between the Holy See and the Slovak state in 2000. He received many prestigious awards. In 1986 he became an honorary doctor of the University of Notre Dame in South Bend, Indiana. In 1993 he received the Legion of Honor for his human rights work. Korec authored sixty-five works, among them works on dialectic materialism and atheist humanism, as well as textbooks on spiritual training. He translated works by Karl Ranner SJ into Slovak. His memoirs, Od barbarskej noci (1994; Night of the Barbarians, 2002), were translated into many languages and won him fame. In 1997 he also published Človek na cestách Zeme (Man on earthy roads). In 1998 Korec was invited to deliver the Lenten retreat for the Pope and the Roman Curia workers. (AGr)

Sources: Norbert Kmet, Postavenie Cirkvi na Slovensku 1948–1951 (Bratislava, 2000); Jan Pešek and Michal Barnovský, Pod kuratelou moci: Cirkvi na Slovensku v rokoch 1953–1970 (Bratislava, 1999); František Mikloško, Nebudete ich moct rozvrátiť: Z osudov katolíckej cirkvi na Slovensku v rokoch 1943–1989 (Bratislava, 1991); Gość Niedzielny, 7 February 1999; Annuario Pontificio 2000.

KORFANTY Wojciech (20 April 1873, Sadzawka, near Katowice–17 August 1939, Katowice), Polish national and Christian Democratic politician. The son of a miner, shortly before his final exams Korfanty was expelled from a German gymnasium for his contacts with the Polish independence movement; therefore he passed his high school final exams in 1895 extramurally (i.e., without attending school). He began to study at the polytechnic school in Charlottenburg and later studied law at Breslau (now Wrocław) University. In 1898 he was admitted to the Union of Polish Youth called Zet, the junior arm of the National Democratic Party. He worked as a journalist for Polish magazines in Silesia, Górnoślązak and Praca. In 1904 he began writing for Polak, a periodical that he founded. In 1902 Korfanty was sentenced to four months in prison for the articles he published. He served the sentence in a “strict regime” prison in Wronki. Owing to his staunch resistance to the German authorities and to the policies of Germanization, Korfanty soon became a hero of the Polish people in Silesia, and on 25 June 1903 he was elected MP to the Reichstag. He sat in the German parliament between 1911 and 1918, repeatedly opposing the German policies toward the Poles. In 1904–18 he also sat in the Prussian Diet. In 1910 he reached an agreement with another independence activist in Silesia, Adam Napieralski, and this consolidated Polish political movements in the region.

During World War I Korfanty initially supported the German side, but in October 1914 he abandoned his loyalty to Germany since it had not abolished its anti-Polish laws. As the situation on the front was worsening for Germany, Korfanty became radicalized, and his last speech in the Reichstag on 25 October 1918 was a culmination of this change of attitude. In his address, Korfanty demanded the incorporation of all ethnically Polish lands, including Upper Silesia, into Poland. On 14 November 1918 he arrived in Warsaw, where along with Wincenty Witos, he tried to prevent the Socialists from forming a government. In December 1918 he left for Poznań, where he was one of the main negotiators with the Germans during the Great Poland Uprising (Powstanie Wielkopolskie). In 1919 he was elected MP to the Constituent Assembly and president of the National Democratic Club. In 1920 he became the Polish plebiscite commissioner in Silesia. After the failure of the plebiscite of 20 March 1921, having received confidential information that Poland would get only two administrative districts, at the beginning of May Korfanty made a decision to start the Third Silesian Uprising, announcing himself as dictator of the insurrection. As a result of the success of the uprising, Poland obtained more area in Silesia than previously intended. This success was the main reason for Korfanty’s later attacks against Józef Piłsudski, whom he blamed for the lack of military support for the uprising.

On 27 October 1923, during the rule of the center-right Chjeno-Piast coalition, Korfanty became minister without portfolio and deputy prime minister in the government of Witos, but this government collapsed on 19 December 1923. After the coup of May 1926 Korfanty stood in firm opposition to Piłsudski and the sanacja regime. In 1927 he was accused of connections with big German business in Upper Silesia. On 9 September 1930 he was arrested and put in the Brześć fortress. While in prison, he was elected senator and chairman of the Christian Democratic Party. On 20 December 1930 Korfanty left prison. In 1931 he became president of the Main Board of the Christian Democratic Party. In 1935, after the disintegration of the Christian Democratic Party, new political attacks were launched against Korfanty; therefore he decided to emigrate to Czechoslovakia. While abroad, he was elected president of the Labor Party (Stronnictwo Pracy [SP]) in 1937. He was a co-founder of the Morges Front, which rallied all centrist activists and parties in opposition to the sanacja regime. Having witnessed the Munich decision on Czechoslovakia and as a person who knew Germans well, Korfanty was aware of the danger that loomed over Europe; therefore, in April 1939 he returned to Poland. Arrested and placed in the Mokotów prison, he was released owing to ill health on 20 July 1939. (PU)

Sources: PSB, vol. 14; Kto był kim w Drugiej Rzeczypospolitej (Warsaw, 1994); Grzegorz Łukomski and Bogusław Polak, Powstanie Wielkopolskie 1918–1919 (Koszalin and Warsaw, 1995); Encyklopedia Powstań Śląskich (Opole, 1982); Encyklopedia historii Drugiej Rzeczypospolitej (Warsaw, 1999); Marian Orzechowski, Wojciech Korfanty: Biografia polityczna (Wrocław, Warsaw, Kraków, and Gdańsk, 1975); Jan Przewłocki, Wojciech Korfanty: Polityka, wzloty i niepowodzenia (Kielce, 1993); Ks. Jan Kudera, Wojciech Korfanty (Katowice, 1999); Edward Balawajder, Wojciech Korfanty: Myśl katolicko-społeczna i działalność (Katowice, 2001).

KORNAI János (21 January 1928, Budapest), Hungarian economist. Kornai studied history and philosophy at the University of Budapest. In 1947–55 he edited the central Communist Party daily, Szabad Nép. From 1955 he worked in the Hungarian Academy of Sciences, first at the Institute of Economics (until 1958); then as director of the Institute of Textile Industry (until 1963); as head of the Center for Computer Technology (until 1967); and then as director and professor of the Institute of Economics from 1967. From 1986 he was a professor at Harvard University in Cambridge, Massachusetts, and from 1989, at the Collegium Budapest. In 1972–77 Kornai was deputy chairman of the UN Planning Commission. In the 1960s and 1970s he was a visiting professor at leading American and West European universities. One of the top experts on command economies, Kornai initially saw shortcomings in excessive centralization. Later he tried to develop mathematical models to improve the mechanisms of command economies, but finally he concluded that there were unsolvable contradictions in the Socialist economies. Kornai's best-known books include Anti-equilibrium (1971; English edition, 1972) and Hiány (1980, Economics of Shortage, 1980), translated into many languages. In these books he showed that the command economy is limited by resources and that its problems result from inherent inefficiencies and constant shortages. Kornai created a dynamic model of the command economy, taking into account such phenomena as shortages, expansion drives, and soft budget constraints. After 1989 he focused on the transition from a command to a market economy, and in 1990 he formulated a general model of economic transformation based on the Hungarian case. Kornai also authored Highways and Byways: Studies on Socialist Reform and Postsocialist Transition (1995) and Struggle and Hope (1997). (MS)

Sources: Ki Kicsoda 2002 (Budapest, 2001); Magyar Nagylexikon (Budapest, 2000); <http://post.economics.harvard.edu/faculty/kornai/kornai.html>.

KORNİŁOWICZ Władysław (5 August 1884, Warsaw–26 November 1946, Laski), Polish Catholic priest, charity worker, and journalist. Kornilowicz was born into a Warsaw intelligentsia family with gentry roots. Aligned with the independence movement in his youth, he was expelled from high school in 1898 for protesting a ban on the use of the Polish language that was imposed by the Russian authorities. Kornilowicz graduated from another high school, where he was the leader of Filarecja, a youth group that pursued both patriotic and Catholic aims. He studied the natural sciences at the university in Zurich (1903–5) and then at a theological seminary in Warsaw (1905–6). He subsequently graduated from the department of philosophy and theology at the University of Fribourg. In Switzerland Kornilowicz was an active member in an association of Polish students, along with such other students as the Socialist Bolesław Drobner and the anthropologist Jan Czekanowski. Ordained on 11 April 1912, Kornilowicz started working as chaplain in the Jadwiga Zamoyska School in Zakopane. During World War I, along with Andrzej Małkowski, he started the Polish scouting movement among the students and alumni of this school. He also worked in the Diocesan Curia in Warsaw. In 1920, during the Polish-Soviet war, Kornilowicz served as chaplain on the front lines and in the Włocławek garrison. On the initiative of Mother Elżbieta Róża Czacka, the superior of the Franciscan Sisters and founder of the Society for the Care of the Blind, he became chaplain of the Franciscan Sisters. He simultaneously lectured in liturgy and ethics at the Catholic University of Lublin (1923–30).

From 1930 on Kornilowicz devoted himself primarily to work at the Institute for the Blind in Laski, where he settled permanently. He was also active in landed gentry circles and among scouts and university students, some of whom were members of the leftist Catholic organization Odrodzenie (Rebirth). Kornilowicz pleaded with the authorities on behalf of imprisoned political opponents of the sanacja regime, particularly members of left-wing parties. Thanks to his efforts, a number of people, including the Communist Henryk Dembiński, were released from prison. Kornilowicz held community retreats for converts, Catholic progressives, and liberal members of the so-called Circle. A proponent of neo-Thomism, he also put emphasis on active participation in the Holy Mass. He promoted his views in the periodical Verbum, of which he was editor-in-chief (1934–39). In Poland Kornilowicz popularized the ideas of Jacques Maritain, who was a friend of his. During the German occupation Kornilowicz went into hiding in a Franciscan convent in the Lublin region. Seriously ill, in 1945 he returned to Laski, where he died soon afterwards. Kornilowicz was considered a precursor of ecumenism and one of the spiritual fathers of the Second Vatican Council. (MC)

Sources: PSB, vol. 14; Stefan Wyszyński, "Ksiądz Władysław Kornilowicz," Tygodnik Powszechny, 1946, no. 50; Antoni Marylski, "Ksiądz Władysław Kornilowicz," Znak, 1966, no. 144; Tadeusz Mazowiecki, ed., Ludzie Lasek (Warsaw, 1987).

KORNIYCHUK Oleksander (25 May 1905, Khrystynivka, Kiev Province–14 May 1972, Kiev), Ukrainian writer and dramatist, Soviet party and state activist. Born into the family of a railroad worker, in 1929 Korniychuk graduated in philology from the Institute of Folk Culture in Kiev. Already a member of the Communist Party, from 1929 to 1934 he worked as a screenwriter in Kiev, Kharkiv, and Odessa. His first plays on "the building of socialism” are little known. It was his drama about the civil war, Zahybel eskadry (Loss of the squadron; 1933), that brought him fame. Korniychuk’s subsequent plays, such as Platon Krechet (1934) and Pravda (Truth; 1937), aroused the interest of Stalin himself. In the latter, he touched on the subject of “brotherly help,” which the Russian nation was supposed to give to the Ukrainians during the revolution of 1917. In 1934 Korniychuk became an executive member of the newly founded Union of Ukrainian Writers; in 1937 he became a deputy to the Supreme Council of the USSR, and a year later, also a deputy to the Supreme Council of the Ukrainian SSR. From January 1938 he presided over the Union of Ukrainian Writers. In 1939 he became a full member of the Academy of Sciences of the Ukrainian SSR and in 1943 also of the Academy of Sciences of the USSR.

For purposes of propaganda in favor of the unification of the Western Ukraine with the USSR, after 17 September 1939 Korniychuk wrote Bohdan Khmelnytsky, a play in the style of Soviet monumentalism praising the Pereyaslav agreement. The play became the basis for a film (1939) and then an opera (1951) under the same title. In 1939 Korniychuk married the Polish Communist activist Wanda Wasilewska. During the war, Korniychuk’s literary creativity was still connected with the political needs of the authorities. In the works Partyzany v stepakh Ukrainy (Partisans in the steppes of the Ukraine; 1942) and Front (1942), he depicted the drama of the war in a propagandist way. Despite the alliance between the USSR and the United States, in 1944 he wrote an anti-American play, Misija mistera Perkinsa v krajinu bilshovikiv (Mr. Perkins’s mission in the Bolshevik state). In February 1944 Korniychuk was appointed minister for foreign affairs of the USSR. In accordance with Stalin’s policy of extending the formal powers of the republic, Korniychuk even prepared the establishment of diplomatic relations between the Ukraine and the United States and Great Britain, but in July 1944 he lost his post because Stalin, having seized the entire territory of the Ukraine, abandoned his plan. Korniychuk’s next plays—for example, Kalynovyi hai (Cranberry grove; 1950)—closely followed the criteria of Socialist realism. In 1947–55 and 1959–72 he served as president of the Supreme Council of the USSR. He also became a member of the CC of the Communist Party of Ukraine (1949) and of the CC of the CPSU (1952). After Stalin’s death Korniychuk supported de-Stalinization. In 1954, in connection with another round of “Ukrainization” of the cadres in the USSR, he became deputy prime minister of the Ukrainian SSR. The same year he wrote a play, Kryla (The wings), a kind of satire on the Stalinist bureaucracy. (TS)

Sources: Yurii Kobyletskyi, Dramaturh i chas: Tvorchist’ Oleksandra Korniychuka (Kiev, 1965); D. Vakulenko, Oleksandr Korniychuk: Narys zhyttia i tvorchosti (Kiev, 1980).

KOROŠEC Antun (12 May 1872, Biserjane–14 December 1940, Belgrade), Slovene priest and politician. After graduating from high school in 1892, Korošec studied theology in Maribor and later earned a Ph.D. from the University of Graz. In 1895 he was ordained a priest and worked for three years in the parishes of Sladki Gori and Radljah. In 1898 he assumed the editorship of the newspaper Slovenski Gospodar. He later contributed to Süddeutschen Presse and edited Naš dom and the newspaper Straža. In 1906 he obtained a seat in the parliament in Vienna. In the autumn of that year he founded the Slovene Union of Peasants from Styria (Slovensko Kmečko Zvezo za Štajersko), which soon became the Slovene People’s Party (Slovenska Ljudska Stranka [SLS]). At that time Korpšec began working more closely with Janez Krek, who exerted an ideological influence on him. Together, they propagated a peasant form of the Slovene version of Social Catholicism.

In 1914 Korošec became head of the Croat and Slovene parliamentary representation in Vienna. In May 1917 he was elected president of the Yugoslav Club. On 30 May 1917 in the parliament in Vienna he read the so-called May Declaration, which he had helped to draft and which called for the unification of all Slovene, Croat, and Serb-populated territories of the monarchy into a democratic state under Habsburg rule. Korošec became head of the National Committee, which was established by all the major political parties of Slovenia—that is, the SLS under his leadership, the Liberal Party, and the Yugoslav Social Democratic Party. He served as president of the National Council of Slovenes, Croats, and Serbs, which was established on 5 October 1918 in Zagreb and which served as the chief political organ of the South Slavs in the Habsburg empire. On 29 October Korošec announced the secession of the South Slavs from Austria-Hungary. In October 1918, during negotiations on the establishment of a state with Nikola Pašić, prime minister of Serbia, and Ante Trumbić, a representative of the Yugoslav Committee, Korošec proposed a confederate model. These negotiations led to the signing of the Geneva Declaration on 9 November 1918 concerning a joint state.

When the South Slav nations united into the Kingdom of Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes, Korošec became deputy prime minister of its first government, established on 20 December 1918. He was disappointed by the adoption of the constitution (28 June 1921), which dashed federalist hopes. Following an unprecedented attack in 1928 inside the parliament building (Skupština), in which Stjepan

Radić and other Croatian deputies were assassinated, plunging the country into a deep crisis, Korošec performed the duties of prime minister from 28 July 1928 to 7 January 1929, the first ever non-Serbian politician to do so. Initially loyal to King Alexander, he gradually moved to the opposition as he saw that the Serbs were beginning to concentrate all power. Korošec supported the so-called Zagreb Manifesto of November 1932, announced by the Peasant Democratic Coalition, in which absolutism, centralism, and unitarism were condemned. He drafted the so-called Ljubljana Manifesto, passed by the Slovenes in December 1932, which not only criticized the royal regime, but also called for the establishment of a federation of the Yugoslav nations. As a result, Korošec was interned on the island of Hvar, along with other members of the SLS leadership. After the death of King Alexander in 1934, Korošec resumed political activities, hoping for an evolutionary change in the Serbian policy. In 1936 he joined the Yugoslav Radical Union, a political group established by Prime Minister Milan Stojadinović, which gained a significant majority in the parliament. From 1935 to 1938 Korošec served as minister of the interior. Elected Senate speaker in 1939, he supported the negotiations between the Serbs and Croats that resulted in the Sporazum (Agreement) of 26 August 1939. However, the Sporazum did little to improve the situation of the Slovenes. In foreign policy Korošec favored cooperation with the Germans. Shortly before his death he served as minister of education. (AO)

Sources: Enciklopedija Slovenije, vol. 5 (Ljubljana, 1991); Biographisches Lexikon, vol. 2; Carole Rogel, The Slovenes and Yugoslavism, 1890–1914 (Boulder, Colo., 1977); Alex N. Drag-nich, The First Yugoslavia (Stanford, 1983); Waclaw Felczak and Tadeusz Wasilewski, Historia Jugosławii (Wrocław, 1985); "Življenje in delo dr. Antona Korošca," Prispevky za zgodovino delavskega gibanja, 1991, no. 1; Feliks Bister, Anton Korošec, državnozbornski poslanec na Dunaju: Življenje in delo, 1872–1918 (Ljubljana, 1992).

KORVIN Otto (24 March 1894, Nagybecskő–28 December 1919, Budapest), head of the political police of the Hungarian Soviet Republic. Korvin was born into the family of a sawmill worker, and after school he worked as a clerk in the Budapest Timber Bank. In 1917 he joined the leftist anti-war movement of Ervin Szabó. After the arrest of the leading activists of the left in the summer of 1918, Korvin became radicalized and joined the Hungarian Bolsheviks in Budapest. When Béla Kun came from Russia to Budapest, on 17 November 1918 the Hungarian Communist Party was created (Kommunisták Magyarországi Pártja), and Korvin became a member of its Central Committee, serving at the same time as the secretary of propaganda. Between March and August 1919 he was head of the political department in the Commissariat of Internal Affairs in the Hungarian Soviet Republic (HSR), and he directed the secret police, which he organized along the pattern of the Bolshevik Cheka. He worked with the groups of "Lenin's Boys" (Lenin Fiúk), mostly criminals released from prisons at the beginning of the revolution who plundered the civil population and took hostages to extort information and ransom. Korvin was responsible for the unlawful arrests of "enemies of the people," torture during investigations, and executions carried out by his security apparatus. After the fall of the HSR Korvin did not manage to escape. Arrested in August 1919, he was sentenced to death and executed. (WR) Sources: Rudolf L. Tókes, Béla Kun and the Hungarian Soviet Republic (New York, 1967); Életrajzi Lexikon, vol. 1 (Budapest, 1967).

KÓS Károly [originally Kosch] (16 December 1883, Temesvár [Timisoara]–25 August 1977, Kolozsvár [Cluj]), Hungarian architect, graphic artist, and writer. Kós graduated from the Architecture Department of Budapest Technical University in 1907. Before World War I, he used traditional, Transylvanian architectural motifs to design a number of buildings, including Calvinist churches in the Óbuda district of Budapest and in Kolozsvár, the Székely National Museum of Sfintu Gheorghe, and the buildings of the Budapest Zoo. Kós designed the decorations prepared for the coronation ceremony of Emperor Karl I as King of Hungary (1916). In 1917–18 Kós traveled in Turkey, where he compiled materials for a monograph about the architecture of Istanbul, published in 1918, and then he returned to his native Transylvania. In 1919, after the 1918 presidential address of Woodrow Wilson, Kós proclaimed a republic in the region of Călăteia, whose national symbols, currency, and postal stamps he designed personally. Over the following years he mainly earned his living working as a graphic artist. He helped to organize the political and cultural life of the Hungarians in Transylvania, which was given to Romania by the 1920 Treaty of Trianon. Kós founded many periodicals, book publishing houses, and artistic associations. In 1925 he published the novel Varjú nemzetség (Nation of crows), a kind of chronicle of seventeenth-century Transylvania. He won the greatest acclaim as the author of Az Országépítő (The country builder; 1934), a romantic historical novel about King Stephen I that was later successfully adapted into a play.

Kós enthusiastically welcomed the incorporation of southern Transylvania into Hungary under the Second Vienna Award in August 1940, but he remained skeptical about a rapprochement between Hungary and Germany.

In 1940 he began lecturing at the School of Agriculture in Kolozsvár. In 1944 he moved there and got involved in public life, becoming head of the provincial branch of the Hungarian People's Union (1945–46), head of the Hungarian Union of Plastic Artists in Romania, a member of the board of the Economic Association of Transylvanian Hungarians, an editor of the periodical Világosság, and a member of the Romanian parliament (1946–48). In 1952 Kós retired. He was a codifier, but at the same time a creative transformer, of Transylvanian architecture. His literary and graphic output contributed to the maintenance of a separate regional identity for Transylvania. (MS)

Sources: Pál Balázs, Kós Károly (Budapest, 1971); János Varró, Kós Károly, a szépiró (Kolozsvár, 1973); Samu Benkő, "Búcsú Kós Károlytól," Tiszatáj, 1977, no. 10; György Száraz, "Búcsú Kós Károlytól," Élet és Irodalom, 1977, no. 36; Kós Károlyi emlékezete: Születésének 100 évfordulójára (Szentendre, 1984); Samu Benkő, Kós Károly (Budapest, 1991); Béla Köpeczi, ed., History of Transylvania (Boulder, Colo., 2001).

KOŚCIAŁKOWSKI-ZYNDRAM Marian, pseudonym "Jerzy Orwid" (16 March 1892, Ponedel, Lithuania–12 April 1946, Brookwood, United Kingdom), Polish officer and politician. In 1910 Kościałkowski-Zyndram began to study at the Psychoneurological Institute in St. Petersburg but after two years he switched to studying agriculture at the Riga Polytechnic. In 1911 he co-founded the Union of Active Struggle (Związek Walki Czynnej [ZWC]) in St. Petersburg and Riga. In 1912 he was commander of the ZWC Baltic district. In August 1914 he went to Warsaw, where he joined the Polish Legions. He played an important role in the so-called flying squadrons of the Polish Military Organization (Polska Organizacja Wojskowa [POW]), which carried out sabotage actions behind the lines of the Russian Army. In February 1915 he became second lieutenant and commander of the Warsaw flying squadron. From June 1915 he commanded all such units in the Russian-occupied territories. In August 1915 he became platoon commander in the First Brigade of the Legions. On the orders of Józef Piłsudski, Kościałkowski-Zyndram returned from the front to Warsaw, where he became commander of the POW district and later adjutant and inspector of the POW High Command. In 1917 he was active in the Military Commission of the Provisional Council of State of the Kingdom of Poland, which was established under the control of the German authorities-in-occupation.

In November 1918, as head of the department of active struggle of the POW High Command and commander of the flying squadrons, Kościałkowski-Zyndram was in charge of disarming the Germans in Warsaw. In April 1919 he served as head of an intelligence section of the Headquarters of the Commander-in-Chief, and he participated in the seizure of Vilnius. He fought in the Polish-Soviet war, holding various positions in the army, including that of head of the Second (Intelligence) Department of the Command of the Lithuanian-Belorussian Front. He organized POW and self-defense units in Lithuania and Belorussia. In August 1920 he took over command of the Union for the Defense of the Homeland, which carried out sabotage actions in the territories occupied by the Red Army. During the Vilnius expedition of General Lucjan Żeligowski in October 1920, he led a group called Bieniakonie, which was the first to enter the city. From 1920 to 1922 he served on the staff of the Armed Forces of Central Lithuania. On the orders of Piłsudski, in 1922 Kościałkowski-Zyndram retired from military service and became involved in politics as an activist of the Polish Peasant Party–Liberation (Polskie Stronnictwo Ludowe–Wyzwolenie [PSL–Liberation]). In March 1925 he joined the Main Board of the PSL–Liberation and became its vice-president. Kościałkowski-Zyndram belonged to the Masonic Lodge of Vilnius. In 1925 he co-founded the Labor Club, and in October 1926 he became president of the Labor Party, into which the Labor Club was transformed and which supported the sanacja government. From 1927 to 1930 he was vice-president of the Nonparty Bloc of Cooperation with the Government (Bezpartyjny Blok Współpracy z Rządem [BBWR]), and from October 1928 to December 1929 he was president of the Urban and Rural Labor Union. From 1922 to 1930 and from 1935 to 1939 he was an MP, and from July 1930 to March 1934 he was the provincial governor of Białystok. In 1932 he was appointed a reserve lieutenant colonel. In March 1934 Kościałkowski-Zyndram became president-commissioner of Warsaw. From June 1934 to October 1935 he served as minister of interior, and in the summer of 1935 he contributed to the conclusion of an agreement with the parliamentary representation of the Ukrainian National Democratic Alliance (UNDO). In the sanacja camp, he represented the liberal wing.

After Piłsudski's death, Kościałkowski-Zyndram joined the group led by President Ignacy Mościcki. On 13 October 1935 he became prime minister of the government and passed through parliament policy that gave special powers to the president, thereafter he ruled on the basis of presidential decrees. Although this government achieved a balanced budget by introducing a deflation policy, increasing taxes, cutting administrative expenses, and rationing foreign currency, these steps became factors that gave rise to workers' protests in Kraków and Lwów (Lviv) in the spring of 1936. After the government's resignation on 15 May 1936, Kościałkowski-Zyndram became minister of social welfare in the government of Feliks Sławoj-Składkowski. In September 1939, along with the government, he went to Romania; from there he made his way to France. In 1940 he settled in Great Britain. (JS)

Sources: PSB, vol. 14; Encyklopedia Historii Polski: Dzieje polityczne, vol. 1 (Warsaw, 1994); Encyklopedia historii Drugiej Rzeczypospolitej (Warsaw, 1999); Tadeusz Jędruszczak, Piłsudczycy bez Piłsudskiego (Warsaw, 1963); Władysław Pobóg-Malinowski, Najnowsza historia polityczna Polski, vol. 2 (London, 1983).

KOSHELIVETS Ivan [originally Yareshko] (10 November 1907, Koshelivka, Chernihiv region—5 February 1999, Munich, Germany), Ukrainian historian of literature and translator. In 1930 Koshelivets graduated from the Institute of Folk Literature in Nizhyn. In 1940–41 he was a doctoral student at the Taras Shevchenko Institute of Literature. From 1944 he lived in exile. In 1947 he settled in Munich, where in 1955–60 he co-edited the monthly Ukraińska literaturna hazeta. From 1961 to 1984 he was editor-in-chief of the monthly Suchasnist (with a break in 1968–75 and 1979–82). Koshelivets belonged to the Taras Shevchenko Scholarly Society and the Ukrainian Free Academy of Sciences. He was a professor at the Free Ukrainian University and a member of the editorial board of Entsyklopediya Ukrainoznavstva. Among other works, Koshelivets authored Narysy z literatury (Literary essays; 1954); Suchasna literatura v USRR (Contemporary literature in the USSR; 1964); Mykola Skrypnyk (1972); Z-pid yakykh bryl? (From under what solid figures? 1975); Oleksandr Dovzhenko (1980); and the memoirs Rozmowy po dorozh do sebe (Conversations on the way home; 1985). He edited the anthology Panorama naynovishoyi literatury v USRR (Panorama of recent literature in the USSR; 1963). He translated into Ukrainian works by Denis Diderot and Franz Kafka. On the orders of Jerzy Giedroyc, in 1969 Koshelivets edited the anthology Ukraina 1956–1968 (The Ukraine 1956–1968), which included documents concerning the generation of the 1960s among Ukrainian writers. This work was published by the (Polish) Literary Institute in Paris. (BB)

Sources: Encyclopedia of Ukraine, vol. 2 (Toronto, 1988); Ukraińska Literaturna Entsyklopediya, vol. 3 (Kiev, 1995); Khto ye khto v Ukraini 1997 (Kiev, 1997).

KOSIOR Stanislav (18 November 1889, Węgrów—26 February 1939, Moscow), Soviet Communist activist in the Ukraine. Kosior was born into a Polish working-class family that settled in the Donbas in 1896. At thirteen he began working at a factory, and in 1907 he joined the Russian Social Democratic Party. From 1907 to 1918 he was a Bolshevik activist in the Donbas region. During World War I he organized Bolshevik units in Kiev. He was imprisoned several times, and in 1915–17 he was in exile in Siberia. From March 1917 to March 1918 Kosior was involved in party activities in Petrograd. From March to April 1918 he served as people's commissar of finance in the Ukrainian Bolshevik government. One of the founders of the Communist Party (Bolshevik) of Ukraine (Komunistychna Partiya [Bilshovykiv] Ukrayiny [CP(B)U]), Kosior was a member and the secretary of the Central Committee (CC) from 1919 to 1920 and the head of the Organizational Department of the CC from 1922 to 1925. As a close associate of Stalin, Kosior was quickly promoted in the central party apparatus. From 1925 to 1928 he was secretary and from 1928 a member of the Politburo of the CC of the All-Union Communist Party (Bolsheviks) and a member of the Presidium of the Central Executive Committee of the Soviet Union.

In 1928 Kosior returned to Kiev and became secretary general (and from 1934 first secretary) of the CP(B)U CC. As the person in charge of collectivization, at the Third All-Ukrainian Conference of the CP(B)U in July 1932 he supported Lazar Kaganovich and Vyacheslav Molotov, who insisted that the Ukraine fulfill an excessive grain supply plan, although Kosior knew that there was not enough grain even for the Ukrainian people. On his initiative, grain reserves were established at the kolkhozes in the fall of 1932. The confiscation of these reserves and of seed grain, carried out on the orders of Stalin and Molotov with Kosior's support, was one of the main reasons for the great famine in the Ukraine in 1932–33, which caused the death of many millions of people. Kosior also opposed the policy of Ukrainization. Dismissed from his posts in the Ukraine in January 1938, he was appointed deputy prime minister of the Soviet Union. However, he was soon removed from all his party and government posts. Arrested in April or May 1938, he was falsely accused of being a member of the Polish Military Organization (Polska Organizacja Wojskowa [POW]). He was subjected to prolonged torture. He was allegedly interrogated by Stalin himself. Sentenced to death on 26 February 1939, Kosior was probably executed by firing squad on the spot. He was rehabilitated after the Twentieth CPSU Congress. (BB)

Sources: MERSH, vol. 17; Entsyklopediia Ukrainoznavstva, vol. 3 (Lviv, 1994); Malyi slovnyk istorii Ukrainy (Kiev, 1997); Dovidnyk z istorii Ukrainy (Kiev, 2001); Hryhory Kostiuk, Stalinist Rule in the Ukraine (New York, 1960); M. B. Pohrebinskyi, Stanislav Vikentiovych Kosior (Kiev, 1963); O Stanislave Kosiore: Wospominaniia, ocherki, stati (Moscow, 1989).

KOSTELNYK Havryil (1886, Ruski Krstur, near Bačka, Serbia—20 September 1948, Lviv [Lemberg, Lwów]), priest of the Greek Catholic (Uniate) Church, representative of its anti-Vatican wing. Kostelnyk studied philosophy and theology in Zagreb, Lemberg, and Friburg, where in 1913 he earned a Ph.D. From 1920 to 1928 he lectured at a seminary in Lwów. Dismissed for his anti-Vatican leanings by the rector of this seminary, Father Yosyf Slipyi, Kostelnyk became the parish priest of the Transfiguration Church, the biggest church in Lwów. He was a firm critic of communism, but because he had distanced himself from the Latin tendencies in the Uniate Church and from the Vatican's eastern policy, after the Red Army seized Lwów in September 1939, he became the Kremlin's candidate to lead the separation of the Uniate Church from Rome. Kostelnyk remained loyal to the Greek Catholic church as long as his patron and mentor, Archbishop Andrey Sheptytskyi, was alive. At the end of June 1941 he supported the Ukraine's declaration of independence, proclaimed by the Bandera faction of the Organization of Ukrainian Nationalists (OUN-B). Since his two sons were serving in the SS Galizien division, Kostelnyk became an easy target for blackmail by the Soviets when the Red Army again entered East Galicia. He called for an end to the fighting. With the support of Serhiy Danylenko ("Karin"), in April 1945, following the arrest of Archbishop Slipyi, Kostelnyk became administrator of Lviv Province and agreed to assume the chairmanship of the so-called Initiating Committee for the Reunification of the Greek Catholic Church with the Russian Orthodox Church.

Under close surveillance by the political police, the Initiating Committee staged a "unification" agitation campaign among the Uniate clergy, who were intimidated by arrests. On 8–10 March 1946 over two hundred delegates held a "council" (sobor) in St. George's Cathedral in Lviv, during which a decision was made to subordinate the Uniate Church to the Orthodox Church and appoint leaders of the Initiating Committee as bishops of the Orthodox Church. A Requiem Mass for the late Archbishop Sheptytskyi, as the precursor of Orthodox Christianity in East Galicia, was the extreme of hypocrisy. On 3 April 1946 Kostelnyk and his co-workers were admitted to see Nikita Khrushchev, head of the party in the Ukraine, and Mykhailo Khrechukha, president of the Supreme Soviet of the Ukrainian SSR. On 7 April the Patriarch of Moscow, Alexey I, accepted the Galician Church into the "mother Orthodox Church" and appointed Kostelnyk protopresbyter, which was the highest honor for a married Orthodox priest. As a result of the "council," 986 Greek Catholic priests joined the Orthodox Church and only 280 remained faithful to the Vatican. The majority of the latter were soon arrested and deported to labor camps. Uniate churches were taken over by the Orthodox Church.

Kostelnyk pleaded on behalf of the persecuted, but to no effect. After a Holy Mass in the Transfiguration Church, Kostelnyk was fatally shot on the street by an unknown assassin. The assassin was in turn shot dead from a car waiting for him. The Soviet authorities blamed the murder on the Ukrainian nationalist underground, but it is probable that the assassination was masterminded by the Soviet secret police. (WR) Sources: Encyclopedia of Ukraine, vol. 2 (Toronto, 1988); Diiania soboru hreko-katolyts'koi tserkvy u Lvovi, 8–10 bereznia 1946 (Lviv, 1946); Bohdan R. Bociurkiw, The Ukrainian Greek-Catholic Church and the Soviet State (1939–1950) (Edmonton, 1996).

KOSTENKO Lina (19 March 1930, Rzhyschiv, near Kiev), Ukrainian poet, one of the leaders of the 1960s generation (shestidesiatniki). After graduating from high school, Kostenko studied at the Kiev Pedagogical Institute and in 1952–56 at the Maksim Gorky Literary Institute in Moscow. She made her literary debut in the early 1950s. In 1957 she published her first volume, Prominnia zemli (Earth rays), and in 1958 another collection, Vitryla (Sails), but it was the volume Mandrivky sertsia (1961; Wanderings of the Heart, 1990) that won her wider recognition. Kostenko's subsequent collections of poems, Zorianyi horal (Star chorale; 1963) and Knyazha hora (Princely mountain; 1972), were banned from publication as a result of her involvement in protests against the Russification policies of Soviet Ukrainian authorities and her open support for arrested Ukrainian intellectuals (for instance, Mykhailo Horyn and Vyacheslav Chornovil). Kostenko's personal lyrics and poems analyzing the social role of a poet under totalitarianism were banned by censorship for many years. She was able to publish Nad berehami vichnoyi riky (On the banks of the eternal river) in 1977. She won great popularity with her poetic novel Marysia Churay (1979), initially ignored by official critics but awarded the Taras Shevchenko State Award in 1987. In the 1980s Kostenko's subsequent collections were published: Nepovtornist (Non-recurrence; 1980) and Sad netanuchykh skulptur (The garden of non-melting sculptures; 1987). She also co-authored and authored screenplays. A collection of English translations of Kostenko's poems was published as Lilac King: Poems (1990). (BB)

Sources: Encyclopedia of Ukraine, vol. 2 (Toronto, 1988); Khto ye khto v Ukraini 2000 (Kiev, 2000); Vyacheslav Briukhovetskyi, Lina Kostenko: Narys tvorczosti (Kiev, 1990); Ukraiinska Literaturna Encyklopedija, vol. 3 (Kiev, 1995); Bogumiła Berdychowska and Ola Hnatiuk, eds., Bunt pokolenia: Rozmowy z intelektualistami ukraińskimi (Lublin, 2000); Shevchenkivski laureaty 1962–2001: Entsyklopedychnyi dovidnyk (Kiev, 2001).

KOSTOV Ivan (23 December 1949, Sofia), Bulgarian politician and economist. After graduating in economics from the Karl Marx Institute of Economics in Sofia, Kostov worked there as an assistant professor. From 1979 he was a senior lecturer at the Department of Scientific Communism of the Lenin Memorial Higher Institute of Mechanical and Electric Engineering in Sofia. In 1982 he received a Ph.D. in mathematical modeling. During the Bulgarian Round Table Talks in early 1990 Kostov was an economic expert, and he authored a reform based on the Polish “shock therapy” of Leszek Balcerowicz. In the parliamentary elections of June 1990 Kostov won a seat on behalf of the Union of Democratic Forces (Sayuz na Demokratichnite Sili [UDF]). From December 1990 to November 1991 he was minister of finance in the government of Dimitur Popov. He negotiated an agreement with the trade unions, suspending strikes for half a year; this allowed for the liberalization of prices, given a partial freeze on wages. In view of the social costs of these steps, Kostov became a target of fierce attacks by the post-Communists and radical trade unions, including Podkrepa. On the other hand, his firmness and consistency in carrying out the reform won him supporters. As a result he retained his position in the government of Filip Dimitrov (November 1991–October 1992).

Kostov lost in the parliamentary elections of December 1994, but he won the election for UDF leader, and on 29 December 1994 he assumed this position. Under his influence economic liberalism became a key element of the UDF program. The economic disaster and the ineptitude of the government of Zhan Videnov led to an outburst of social discontent. Given the support of President Zhelyu Zhelev, Kostov succeeded in the early parliamentary elections of April 1997, in which the UDF won 52.2 percent of the vote. On 21 May 1997 he became prime minister. Within two years he had curbed inflation; he connected the leva with the Deutsche mark; restored agricultural and forest land property; succeeded in privatizing some large companies (e.g., the Balkan airline company); and reoriented foreign policy toward the West. In 1999 Bulgaria refused to grant air space for Russian air supplies to Yugoslavia during the NATO Kosovo operation. The army was reorganized so as to conform more closely with NATO standards. Appreciating these efforts, the European Union invited Bulgaria to accession talks. Kostov also strengthened his position as the UDF leader. Under his influence the UDF evolved from a loose federation of conflicting groups toward a steerable federative party, similar to German Christian Democracy. Thus after losing in the local elections in the fall of 1999, within one month Kostov managed to change two-thirds of his cabinet without much resistance within the UDF. Despite these successes Kostov and his government confronted serious problems: material conditions for most people were still bad; there was excessive bureaucracy, and there were corruption scandals involving his ministers. All this led to electoral defeat for the UDF in June 2001. On 24 July 2001 Kostov resigned as prime minister. He also gave up his UDF leadership in favor of Ekaterina Mikhailova, one of his closest aides who thus far had headed the UDF parliamentary club. Notwithstanding, Kostov remained one of the key figures in the UDF. (AG)

Sources: Koy koy e v Bulgariya (Sofia, 1998); Tasho Tashev, Ministrite na Bulgariya 1879–1999: Entsiklopedichen spravochnik (Sofia, 1999); Jerzy Jackowicz, Bulgaria od rządów komunistycznych do demokracji parlamentarnej 1988–1991 (Warsaw, 1992); Raymond Detrez, Historical Dictionary of Bulgaria (Lanham, Md., 1997); www.omda.bg/engl/news/party/sds_engl.htm; www.omda.bg/engl/personalia/kostov_engl.htm; www.electionworld.org/election/bulgaria.htm; www.ecn.org/est/balcani/bulga/bulgaria50.htm.

KOSTOV Traycho [originally Dzhunev] (17 June 1897, Sofia–17 December 1949, Sofia), Bulgarian Communist activist. Born into the family of a railroad worker, Kostov finished high school in Sofia and went on to study law at Sofia University, but he never graduated. In April 1919 he joined the then forming Bulgarian Communist Party (BCP). He served as secretary of a Communist youth organization in Sofia and was a member of the Central Committee (CC) of the Communist Youth Union. Arrested for taking part in preparations for the unsuccessful Communist uprising of September 1923, Kostov was sentenced to eight years the following year. Released in 1929, he left for Moscow, where he worked in the Executive Committee of the Communist International, studied at a Leninist school, and joined the Foreign Bureau of the BCP CC. After returning to Bulgaria in 1931, he became a member of the BCP CC. In 1934–35 he was in Moscow, where he served as a BCP delegate in the Comintern and worked in the Balkan Secretariat of the Communist International. In February 1936 Kostov returned to Bulgaria and became a member of the BCP CC Politburo. In 1938 he also joined the CC Secretariat and assumed the editorship of Rabotnicheski Vestnik, a party organ. In 1938–39 he was repeatedly arrested for anti-state activities but was released for lack of evidence. In 1940 he went underground, serving as secretary of the CC for political affairs. During the German-Soviet war he organized military resistance to the regime of Tsar Boris. Arrested in 1942 and sentenced to life imprisonment, Kostov was released by the government of Konstantin Muraviev on 2 September 1944. Only a week later he led a coup that overthrew Muraviev’s government.

When the Communist-controlled Fatherland Front ruled in Bulgaria, Kostov served as secretary general of the party's CC until the return from Moscow of Georgi Dimitrov, to whom he yielded his position in November 1945. In March 1946 Kostov became deputy prime minister in the government of Kimon Georgiev; he continued to hold this post from 1946 to 1948 in Dimitrov's government, in which he was also responsible for economic issues as minister for electrification, water, and natural resources, minister without portfolio, and president of the State Committee for Economic and Financial Affairs. On two occasions he traveled to Moscow to speak with Stalin (June 1946 and February 1948). In June 1948 he represented Bulgaria at the congress of the Information Bureau of the Communist and Workers' Parties, at which Josip Broz Tito and the Yugoslav leadership were denounced. Arrested in connection with the case of Noel Field in April 1949, Kostov was accused of "nationalism," hostility to the Soviet Union, spying for England and the United States, "Titoism," and collaboration with the Bulgarian tsarist police. The case was part of a wave of purges within the parties of the Communist bloc, but it was also part of a struggle for power between Bulgarian Communists who, like Kostov, had experience working in Bulgaria and those who from the 1930s had uninterruptedly resided in Moscow. As a result of the trial, in which he did not plead guilty despite being tortured, on 17 December 1949 Kostov was sentenced to death and executed. The press wrote widely about his allegedly having pleaded guilty. Partially rehabilitated in 1956, Kostov was fully vindicated in December 1989. His Izbrani proizvedenja (Collected works) were published in 1978. (WR) Sources: Lazitch; Blagoi Popovski, Sudskata provokatsiia vo Sofija (Skopje, 1950); Ob osnovnykh urokakh ot raskrytiia bandy Traicho Kostova (Sofia, 1950); Adam Ulam, Titoism and the Cominform (Cambridge, Mass., 1952); J. F. Brown, Bulgaria under Communist Rule (New York, 1970); S. Steven, Operation Splinter Factor (Philadelphia and New York, 1974); Marshall Lee Miller, Bulgaria during the Second World War (Stanford, 1975); Jerzy Tomaszewski, Bulgaria 1944–1971 (Warsaw, 1989); Mito Isusov, Poslednata godina na Traicho Kostov (Sofia, 1990).

KOŠTUNICA Vojislav (24 March 1944, Belgrade), Serbian lawyer and politician, president of Yugoslavia. The son of a judge, in 1970 Koštunica graduated in law from the University of Belgrade, and in 1974 he received a Ph.D. there. From 1970 he worked there as an assistant professor, but in 1974 he was forced to leave the university for co-organizing a petition in defense of an arrested professor. He worked at the Institute of Social Sciences and from 1981 at the Institute of Philosophy and Social Theory. For some time he was the director of the latter institute. Koštunica published several articles in constitutional law and political philosophy; he translated from English (for example, The Federalist Papers); and he edited the scholarly periodicals Arhiv za pravne i društvene nauke, Filozofske studije, and Filozofija i društvo. In the 1980s he was active in the human rights movement and joined the Committee for the Defense of the Freedom of Thought and Speech. In 1989 he co-founded the anti-Communist (Serbian) Democratic Party (Demokratska Stranka [DS]). He became its deputy chairman, and in 1990 he won a Serbian parliamentary seat on its behalf.

In 1992 the DS split because of differing opinions about participation in an opposition coalition called the Democratic Movement of Serbia (Demokratski Pokret Srbije [DEPOS]), created around the Serbian Renewal Movement (SRM) of Vuk Drašković. Along with a group of DEPOS adherents, Koštunica left the DS, founded the Democratic Party of Serbia (Demokratska Stranka Srbije [DSS]), and became its leader. In the 1992 elections the DSS won nineteen out of fifty mandates gained by the DEPOS. In 1993 the DSS left the DEPOS in protest against SRM support for the Bosnian Serb leader Radovan Karadžić. Running alone, in the elections of 1993 the DSS won a mere 2.7 percent of the vote, but Koštunica stayed an MP. In the federal elections of 1996 the DSS joined the coalition Together (Zajedno), which included the SRM and the DS of Zoran Djindjić. During the student protests of 1996–97 Koštunica was the only leader of the opposition invited to speak at the rallies. He also took part in a long sit-down strike in downtown Belgrade in January 1997. His party joined a boycott of republican and presidential elections. During the Kosovo conflict and the NATO air raids in 1999, contrary to the SRM, the DSS did not support Slobodan Milošević, but it was critical of NATO and maintained a distance from the liberal opposition cooperating with NATO diplomats.

Because of the DSS stance, Koštunica became the compromise candidate of a wide coalition of Milošević opponents, called the Democratic Opposition of Serbia (Demokratska Opozicija Srbije [DOS]), in the elections for president of Yugoslavia. According to the calculations of the opposition, Koštunica won more than 50 percent of the vote in the first round of voting on 24 September 2000, but the state electoral commission, controlled by Milošević, announced that it would be necessary to hold a second round. After mass demonstrations and after a part of the army and security forces had passed over to the opposition, Milošević admitted defeat, and Koštunica was officially announced as the new president. After he officially took over power on 7 October 2000, he adopted a cautious attitude toward settling accounts with Milošević and his clique. After the Serbian parliamentary elections in December 2000, Koštunica's ratings reached their highest point, but the DOS began to crumble, and Koštunica entered into a conflict with Prime Minister Djindjić regarding the new government's stance toward the defeated post-Communists and the Yugoslav Crimes Tribunal in The Hague. On both issues Koštunica was much more moderate than Djindjić. In April 2001 he agreed to hand over Milošević to The Hague tribunal. In the presidential election of 8 December 2002 Koštunica won 57.5 percent of the vote, but owing to the lack of a 50 percent participation rate, the election was determined to be invalid. From 3 March 2004 Koštunica was prime minister of Serbia. He authored several books, including Politički sistem kapitalizma i opozicija (The political system of capitalism and the opposition; 1978); Stranački pluralizam ili monizam (Party pluralism or monism; 1983 [with Kosta Cavoški]); and Između sile i pravde (Between force and truth; 2000). (AW) Sources: Lenard J. Cohen, Broken Bonds: The Disintegration of Yugoslavia (Boulder, Colo., 1993); Christopher Bennett, Yugoslavia's Bloody Collapse: Causes, Course and Consequences (London, 1995); Susan L. Woodward, The Balkan Tragedy: Chaos and Dissolution after the Cold War (Washington, D.C., 1995); Gregory O. Hall, "The Politics of Autocracy: Serbia under Slobodan Milošević," East European Quarterly, 1999, no. 2; www.predsednik.gov.yu.

KOSTURKOV Stoyan (25 November 1866, Panagyurishte–17 December 1949, Sofia), Bulgarian politician. After graduating from a theological school in a monastery in Liaskovets in 1890, Kosturkov worked as a teacher in Pazardzhik, Vratsa, Pomorie, Varna, and Sofia until 1906, except for the academic year 1891–92, when he studied law in Geneva. In 1905 Kosturkov was one of the founders of the Radical Democratic Party, which was renamed the Radical Party (RP) in 1922, and he served as secretary of the central leadership of this party from 1906 to 1934, except for an interval from 1922 to 1923. He was the editor of the party press organs, Demokrat (1905–10) and Radikal (1910–34), and a contributor to the party's theoretical organ, Demokrateski pregled. Kosturkov supported the proclamation of Bulgaria's independence in 1908 but opposed the consolidation of the monarchy. In 1915 he protested against Bulgaria's entering World War I on the side of Germany and Austria-Hungary. From 1913 to 1927 and 1931 to 1934 Kosturkov was a deputy to the National Assembly. Despite his opposition to Bulgaria's involvement in the war, in June 1918 he assumed the post of minister of education in the government of Aleksandur Malinov and continued to hold this post in the cabinet of Teodor Teodorov until October 1919.

Kosturkov was one of the leaders of the Constitutional

Bloc, which was in opposition to the government of the Bulgarian Agrarian National Union (BANU), led by Aleksandur Stamboliyski. Arrested after an unsuccessful anti-government action organized by the Constitutional Bloc in Tyrnovo (17 September 1922), Kosturkov was to stand trial as one of those who had brought about the second "national catastrophe" in Bulgaria in 1918, but his trial was prevented by the coup of 9 June 1923. Kosturkov was against the accession of the RP to the Democratic Alliance and was in opposition to the government of Aleksandur Tsankov. In 1931 the RP, under his leadership, joined the National Bloc, and he became minister of railways, post, and telegraphs in the government of Malinov and in the subsequent government of Nikola Mushanov (June 1931–May 1934). Kosturkov took part in congresses of the International Radical Entente in Paris, London, Copenhagen, and Sofia. In 1935–44 he defended the Tyrnovo Constitution, and in 1943 he stood up in defense of Bulgarian Jews. During World War II he tried to avoid contacts with the Communists and refused to cooperate with the Fatherland Front but did not stand up against it. After the coup of 9 September 1944, as a result of Kosturkov's efforts, the RP was revived, joining the Fatherland Front in 1945. Kosturkov became minister of education in the government of Kimon Georgiev (November 1945–November 1946). He also served as deputy to the National Assembly (1945–46). In 1946 he withdrew from politics. (JJ)

Sources: Entsiklopediya Bulgariya, vol. 3 (Sofia, 1982); Tadeusz Wasilewski, Historia Bułgarii (Wrocław, 1988); Georgi Dimitrov, Sychineniia, vol. 16 (Sofia, 1990); Milen Kumanov and Tania Nikolova, Politicheski partii, organizatsii i dvizheniia v Bulgariia i technite lideri 1879–1999: Kratyk spravochnik (Sofia, 1999); Tasho Tashev, Ministrite na Bulgariia 1879–1999: Entsiklopedichen spravochnik (Sofia, 1999); Angel Tzurakov, Entsiklopediia: Pravitelstvata na Bulgariia. Khronologiia na politicheskiia zhivot 1879–2001 (Sofia, 2001).

KOSZTOLÁNYI Dezső (29 March 1885, Szabadka [Subotica]–3 November 1936, Budapest), Hungarian writer and journalist. From 1903 to 1906 Kosztolányi studied Hungarian and German language and literature at Budapest University, and for a few months in 1904 he also attended the university in Vienna. After dropping out of university, he began working as a journalist. From 1908 on he contributed to Nyugat, the most important literary magazine in Hungary during the interwar period. In 1907 he published his first poetry volume, Négy fal között (Within four walls), in which he advocated "art for art's sake." In subsequent collections of poems—such as A szegény kisgyermek panasza (The complaints of a poor little child; 1910); Mágia (Magic; 1912); Mák (Poppy; 1916); Kenyér és bor (Bread and wine; 1920); and A bus férfi panasza (The sad man's laments; 1924)—Kosztolányi increasingly combined the concept of “art for art's sake” with reflections on the human condition. He also wrote stories that were published in 1908 in the collection Boszorkányos esték (Magic evenings) and press articles that were published in great numbers in all kinds of papers and periodicals. At the beginning of the 1920s Kosztolányi concentrated on prose writing. His novel Nero, a véres költő (1922; Bloody Poet Nero, 1927), about the clash between tyranny and humanism, is considered one of the best Hungarian historical novels. The novels Pacsirta (1924; Skylark, 1993); Aranysárkány (Golden kite; 1924); Édes Anna (1926); and the collection of novellas Esti Kornél (1933) are innovatively composed studies on man, human relations, and middle-class society. At the end of the 1920s Kosztolányi became actively involved in the literary life of Hungary and Europe. In 1930 he became the first president of the Hungarian PEN Club. He corresponded with and personally met most of the greatest writers of his time, including Thomas Mann, Maksim Gorky, and John Galsworthy. He was also an outstanding translator of William Shakespeare and Oscar Wilde. The publication of Kosztolányi's works was prohibited in Hungary in 1947–54 due to his critical attitude toward the Hungarian Soviet Republic. (MS)

Sources: Ferenc Baráth, Kosztolányi (Zalaegerszeg, 1938); László Rónay, Kosztolányi (Budapest, 1977); Ernő Kulcsár Szabó and Mihály Szegedy-Maszák, Tanulmányok Kosztolányiról (Budapest, 1998).

KOSZUTSKA Maria, pseudonyms “Kostrzewa,” “Vera,” and “Anna” (2 February 1876, Głowczyn, near Kalisz—9 July 1939, Yaroslavl?), Polish Socialist and Communist activist. Born into a noble family and brought up in the tradition of independence, Koszutska finished a girls' boarding school in Warsaw (1893) and obtained qualifications for teaching in private schools (1901). At the end of 1902 she joined the Polish Socialist Party (Polska Partia Socjalistyczna [PPS]), and with her husband, Józef Ciszewski, she conducted revolutionary agitation among workers. Arrested in 1903, she was sentenced to a three-year exile in Arkhangelsk Province. Released because of her mother's illness, she took part in the 1905 revolution. Arrested in January 1906 and released again, she went underground. An advocate of increasing the revolutionary struggle, in November of the same year Koszutska helped to establish the PPS-Left. From 1907 to 1914 she lived in Galicia, from where she directed party activities in the Kingdom of Poland and where she drafted the party program, according to which Poland would be a part of a Socialist Russia. At the beginning of 1916 she returned to German-occupied Warsaw, where she conducted intensive agitation and published extensively in various periodicals, including Głos Robotniczy. After the Bolshevik revolution in Russia, Koszutska advocated similar tactics in the struggle for power. In the autumn of 1918 she actively supported the extreme left, and in December of that year she brought about the establishment of the Communist Workers' Party of Poland (Komunistyczna Partia Robotnicza Polski [KPRP]). From the foundation of the party, Koszutska was a member of its Central Committee (CC), and in 1919–20 she served as the secretary of the CC.

During the Polish-Soviet war Koszutska was twice arrested for supporting the Red Army. Released on bail in January 1921, she went abroad. She was active in the KPRP and from 1925 in the Communist Party of Poland (Komunistyczna Partia Polski [KPP]) in Berlin, Gdańsk, Sopot, and Moscow. She was the co-author of Tezy Agrarne (Agrarian theses; 1922), in which she called for parceling out the great estates among smallholders and landless peasants in order to attract them to the Socialist revolution. This was a departure from the concept of land nationalization, predominant among the Bolsheviks. Koszutska expressed a similar view in a paper that she read at the Fourth Congress of the Communist International in Moscow in December 1922. In late September and early October 1922, at the Second KPRP Congress in Bolshevo, near Moscow, Koszutska's agrarian theses and the view that it was necessary to create “an alliance of peasants and workers” became incorporated into the resolutions of the congress, and she was elected to the Politburo of the party's CC abroad. At the Fifth Comintern Congress in July 1924, Stalin fiercely attacked her views, and Koszutska was expelled from the Politburo. At the Third KPRP Congress in February 1925 she did not join the CC. She was sent to work in the Peasant International. After the coup of May 1926 in Poland, which had been supported by the KPP, Koszutska criticized the so-called May mistake of the leadership of the party and again joined the CC. At the Fourth KPP Congress in May–August 1927 she returned to the party Politburo. However, the faction led by Julian Leński-Leszczyński received enough support from Stalin to expel her from the CC for her “rightist deviation.” After the Seventh Comintern Congress in 1935, when the KPP adopted the “united front” tactic, Koszutska wrote a letter in which she conducted self-criticism and stated that she wanted to join the leadership of the party again, but the CC found her self-criticism insufficient. In August 1937 she was arrested by the NKVD. In the August 1938 Comintern resolution dissolving the KPP, Koszutska was declared guilty of “instigating factional struggle.” She died in prison. In 1956 she was rehabilitated by the authorities of the Polish United Workers' Party. Her three-volume Pisma i przemówienia (Writings and speeches) were published between 1961 and 1962. (WR) Sources: PSB, vol. 14; Słownik biograficzny działaczy polskiego ruchu robotniczego, vol. 3 (Warsaw, 1992); M. K. Dziewanowski, The Communist Party of Poland (Cambridge, Mass., 1959); Feliks Tych, PPS-Lewica 1914–1918 (Warsaw, 1960); Tragedia KPP (Warsaw, 1989).

KOT Stanisław (22 October 1885, Ruda, near Ropczyce–26 December 1975, London), Polish Peasant Party politician and historian of culture and education. Born into a peasant family, Kot participated in the pro-independence movement while a high school student. He completed university studies at Lemberg (Lviv, Lwów) and earned a Ph.D. there in 1909. During World War I he was a close associate of Władysław Sikorski, head of the Military Department of the pro-Austrian Supreme National Committee. From 1914 to 1918 Kot directed the press bureau of this department and edited Wiadomości Polskie. In 1919 he settled in Kraków. In 1920 he became professor at the Jagiellonian University, where he held the chair of History of Culture until 1933. In 1921 he became a member of the Polish Academy of Arts and Sciences. An opponent of the ruling camp, he organized a protest against the arrest of the leaders of the center-left opposition (Centrolew) in 1930 and a protest against the reform of the school system. As a result, Kot was forced to retire, and his chair at the university was abolished. In 1933 he joined the Peasant Party (Stronnictwo Ludowe [SL]) and was a member of its Chief Council from 1935 to 1939 and a member of its Chief Executive Committee from 1936 to 1939. He represented the right wing of the party, but in 1937, working closely with Wincenty Witos, he co-organized peasant strikes.

In September 1939 Kot helped to reconstruct the Polish government-in-exile, in which he served as deputy prime minister and minister of interior from December 1939 to August 1941. In 1941–42 he was assigned to the Polish Embassy in the Soviet Union, the most difficult diplomatic post at that time. Trying to provide assistance to Polish citizens in the Soviet territories, Kot was unable to avoid conflicts with the Soviet authorities and with many Polish politicians. From 1942 to 1943 he served as minister of state for Polish affairs in the Middle East, and from March 1943 to November 1944, as minister of information. In April 1943 Kot issued a communiqué about the Katyń massacre. In July 1945 he returned to Poland and was one of the founders of the Polish Peasant Party (Polskie Stronnictwo Ludowe [PSL]). From 1945 to 1947 Kot served as ambassador to Rome, representing the Government of National Unity. In 1947, when Communist pressure was growing, he resigned and remained in exile. Kot's roles included that of president of the PSL Chief Council and president of the PSL European Council. He was active in the International Peasant Union. He left a vast scholarly legacy in the history of education and the history of culture, including particularly the history of the Reformation. His literary works on anti-Trinitarianism are especially highly regarded. Kot dealt with the history of sixteenth- and seventeenth-century political thought. He was a co-founder and editor of Biblioteka Polska (Polish library; 1919–39), a series that published masterpieces of literature. From 1921 to 1939 he edited the quarterly Reformacja w Polsce (Reformation in Poland). His publications include the following: Andrzej Frycz Modrzewski (1919); Rzeczpospolita Polska w literaturze politycznej Zachodu (The Republic of Poland in Western political literature; 1919); Ideologia polityczna i społeczna Braci Polskich zwanych arianami (Political and social ideology of the Polish Brethren, also called the Arians; 1932); Historia wychowania (History of education, 2nd rev. ed., 2 vols.; 1934); Listy z Rosji do generała Sikorskiego (Letters from Russia to General Sikorski; 1955); and Rozmowy z Kremlem (Talks with the Kremlin; 1959). (JS)

Sources: Słownik biograficzny działaczy ruchu ludowego (Warsaw, 1989); Encyklopedia historii Drugiej Rzeczypospolitej (Warsaw, 1999); Sprawa polska w czasie drugiej wojny światowej na arenie międzynarodowej: Zbiór dokumentów (Warsaw, 1965); Roman Buczek, Stronnictwo Ludowe w latach 1939–1945 (London, 1975); Jan Karski, The Great Powers and Poland (1919–1945) (Lanham, Md., 1985); Tadeusz Rutkowski, Stanisław Kot 1885–1975: Biografia polityczna (Warsaw, 2000).

KOTAŃSKI Marek (11 March 1942, Warsaw–18 August 2002, Nowy Dwór Mazowiecki), Polish social worker. After graduating in psychology from Warsaw University (1965), Kotański worked at the Sanatorium for People with Nervous Disorders in Warsaw. In 1968 he began working with the Social Anti-Alcoholic Committee. In 1978 he founded the Drug Addicts Resocialization Center in Głusków, and in 1981, he founded MONAR, the Youth Movement for Drug Abuse Prevention. He was also the founder of the association Solidarity against AIDS-PLUS. In 1986–89 Kotański was a member of a consultative council to the president of the Council of State. In January 1994 he founded Markot, an organization whose objective was to combat homelessness. He created shelters where young drug addicts could find support. While working with these young people, he tried to involve them in helping others. He also founded dozens of drug treatment centers, as well as shelters for the homeless. Initially Kotański believed in a liberal value system; for example, he stated that condoms were the most effective means of preventing HIV transmission. Before the visit of John Paul II to Poland in June 1999, Kotański called on young people to practice abstinence, and from then on he openly spoke about the religious motivation behind his work, promoting the Clean Hearts Movement. A charismatic leader and a strong personality immensely popular among the people with whom he worked, Kotański died in a car crash. He was the author of Ty zaraziłeś ich narkomanią (You turned them into drug addicts; 1982) and Sprzedatem się ludziom (I sold myself to the people; 1992). (WR) Sources: Kto jest kim w Polsce (Warsaw, 1993); “Był miłosierny,” Gość Niedzielny, 1 September 2002.

KOTSIUBYNSKYI Mykhailo (originally Zakhar Kozub) (17 September 1864, Vinnytsya, Ukraine–25 April 1913, Kiev), Ukrainian writer and social activist. Kotsiubynskyi spent his childhood in Podolia. After graduating from Sharhorod Seminary in 1880, he studied in a theological seminary in Kamyanyets-Podilsky. In 1882 he was expelled from school for his involvement in the Narodnik movement, and until the end of his life he was kept under surveillance. After his father’s death, Kotsiubynskyi had to support his family, working as a private teacher in and around Vinnytsya. A member of the Vinnytsya town council (1888–90), in 1891 he became qualified as an elementary school teacher and started working in the village of Lopatyntsy, near the town of Jampol, Podolia. In 1892–97 he worked on a commission appointed to exterminate a grapevine parasite. At the same time he was a member of the secret Taras Fraternity. He was the editor of the newspaper Volyn’ in Zhytomyr. In 1898 Kotsiubynskyi began working as a clerk in the Chernigov zemstvo (local self-government), where he also served as president of the local section of an education society called Prosvita from 1906 to 1908. In 1905 he traveled to Germany, Italy, Switzerland, and Austria, where in Lemberg (Lwów, Lviv) he became acquainted with such prominent people as Ivan Franko. He spent the years 1909–11 in Capri, where he went for reasons of health and where he got in touch with Maksim Gorky.

Kotsiubynskyi’s writing was influenced by the works of Taras Shevchenko, Fyodor Dostoevsky, and contemporary Western writers. Under the influence of Ludwig Feuerbach, he became an atheist. His first novels were realistic in character but included innovative elements, particularly in the way that landscape was presented. At the turn of the twentieth century Kotsiubynskyi deepened the psychological complexity of his characters. In the novels and collections of stories V putakh shaitana i inshi opovidannia (In the fetters of satan; 1899), Opovidannia z besarabskoho zhyttia (Stories from Bessarabian life; 1900), and Pid mineratamy

(Under the minarets; 1904), the protagonists are exotic characters: Moldovians, gypsies, and Turks. The works of that period, which show the influence of impressionism, made Kotsiubynskyi the leading Ukrainian writer of the modernist period. In the 1905 manifesto Z potoku zhyttia (From the stream of life), Kotsiubynskyi called for abandoning ethnographic topics in favor of social issues and for developing a style that would be understood by the contemporary reader. He realized the ideal of a committed artist in Smikh (Laughter; 1906) and Vin ide (He is coming; 1906), his stories from the period of the revolution of 1905–7; these depicted, among other things, processions and pogroms organized by members of the Russian nationalist organization Black Hundreds (Chernaia Sotnia), as well as other tsarist persecutions. In the novel Fata Morgana (2 vols.; 1904–10) Kotsiubynskyi presented a wide panorama of the fate of contemporary Ukrainian peasants. Intermezzo (1909) is an analysis of the dilemmas of an artist. Kotsiubynskyi’s last outstanding novel, Tini zabutykh predkiv (Shadows of forgotten ancestors; 1912), contains a lyrical picture of the life of the Hutsuls, Ukrainian highlanders. Complete editions of Kotsiubynskyi’s works were published in the Soviet Union in 1929–30 (5 vols.), 1961–62 (6 vols.), and 1973–75 (8 vols.). Many of his literary works were translated into foreign languages, and a number of his writings were adapted as films—for example, Tini zabutykh predkiv (1967). Kotsiubynskyi is considered the first Ukrainian prose writer of European stature. (TS)

Sources: Encyclopedia of Ukraine, vol. 2 (Toronto, 1988); Zoia Kotsiubynska-Iefimienko, Mykhailo Kotsiubynskyi: Zhyttia i tvorchist (Kiev, 1955); Myroslav Moroz, Mykhailo Kotsiubynskyi: Bibliohrafichnyi pokazhchuk (Kiev, 1964); Mykhailo Kostenko, Khudozhnia maisternist Mykhaila Kotsiubynskoho (Kiev, 1969); Elżbieta Wiśniewska, O sztuce pisarskiej Michajła Kociubynskiego (Wrocław, 1973); Oleksandra Chernenko, Mykhailo Kotsiubynskyi—impresionist: Obraz ludyny v tvorchosti pysmennyka (Munich, 1977).

KOTSIUBYNSKYI Yuri (7 December 1896, Vinnytsya–8 March 1937, Kiev), Ukrainian Communist activist. The son of the outstanding writer Mykhailo Kotsiubynskyi, Kotsiubynskyi attended a gymnasium in Chernihov. In 1913 he joined the Russian Social Democratic Workers’ Party. Mobilized by the Russian Army in 1916, he studied at an officer training school in Odessa and did his military service in Petrograd. In October 1917 in Petrograd he took part in the Bolshevik coup. In December 1917 he was appointed deputy to the people’s secretary for military affairs, later becoming the acting people’s secretary for military affairs. In January 1918 he became commander-in-chief of the Ukrainian Bolshevik army. In March 1918 he became a member of the Central Executive Committee (Tsentralnyi Vykonavchyi Komitet) and the people's secretary of interior of the Ukrainian Soviet People's Republic. At the end of November 1918 he joined the Provisional Workers' and Peasants' Government of the Ukraine. Between 1919 and 1920 he headed the Bolshevik state and party organs in Chernihov and Poltava.

In 1920 Kotsiubynskyi began working in the Soviet diplomatic service, first in Austria (1920–22 and 1925–27), then in Poland (1927–30). In February 1930 he became deputy president, and in February 1934 president, of the Planning Office and deputy prime minister of the Council of People's Commissars of the Ukrainian SSR. He was a member of the Central Committee (CC) of the Communist Party (Bolshevik) of Ukraine (Komunistychna Partiiia [Bilshovykiv] Ukrainy [CP(B)U]) and a member of the Ukrainian Central Executive Committee (Vseukrainskyi Tsentralnyi Vkonavchyi Komitet). In November 1934 Kotsiubynskyi was dismissed from work, expelled from the CP(B)U CC, and later expelled from the party. Arrested along with twenty-two prominent Communists in February 1935, he was accused of anti-Soviet activities and sentenced to six years in exile. In October 1936, while still in exile, he was arrested again and deported to Kiev, where he was accused of organizing and directing, on the orders of Georgii Piatakov, a counterrevolutionary Trotskyite organization in the Ukraine (Ukrainskyi Trotskistskyi Tsent). On 8 March 1937 he was sentenced by the USSR Supreme Court to execution by firing squad, and he was executed the same day. Kotsiubynskyi was rehabilitated in December 1955. (BB)

Sources: Encyclopedia of Ukraine, vol. 2 (Toronto, 1988); Entsyklopediya ukrainoznavstva, vol. 3 (Lviv, 1994); Dovidnyk z istorii Ukrainy (Kiev, 2001); Hryhory Kostyuk, Stalinist Rule in the Ukraine (New York, 1960); Iurii Shapoval, Volodymyr Prystaiko, and Vadym Zolotariov, ChK—GPU—NKVD v Ukraini: Osoby, fakty, dokumenty (Kiev, 1997).

KOTSYLOVSKYI Iosyf (3 March 1876, Pakoshivka, Lemkiv district–17 November 1947, Chapayevka, near Kiev), Greek Catholic bishop of Przemyśl. The son of an MP in the Galician Assembly, in 1895 Kotsylovskyi joined the Austro-Hungarian Army and then finished an officer training school. In 1901–7 he studied in Rome, earning two doctorates, one in philosophy (1903) and one in theology (1907). Ordained in 1907, he lectured at a theological seminary in Stanisławów (Ivano-Frankivsk), serving as its deputy rector. In 1911 he entered the Basilian order, taking the name of Yosafat. Appointed bishop of Przemyśl and Samborsk on 23 September 1917, Kotsylovskyi supported the Ukrainian (Galician) National Republic, which was proclaimed on 1 November 1918. After the fall of this republic, he worked in the territory of Poland, where he founded many social and religious organizations, as well as the periodical Ukrains'kyi Beskid. In 1921 he established a theological seminary in Przemyśl. He was initially opposed to the Polish state but gradually started making attempts to ease tensions and conflicts between the Ukrainians and the Poles. He also cooperated with the Roman Catholic Episcopate.

At the end of World War II the new Polish-Soviet border separated two-thirds of the faithful of the diocese from the diocesan capital; therefore, in the autumn of 1944 Kotsylovskyi appointed two vicars general: Father Mykhailo Melnyk in Drohobych and Father Mykola Panas in Sokal. Arrested by the State Security Office on 20 September 1945, Kotsylovskyi was held in a prison in Rzeszów, and on 18 January 1946 he was handed over to the Soviet NKGB (Narodnyi kommissariat gosudarstvennoi bezopasnosti). As the Soviet authorities wanted to avoid a confrontation with the Uniate Church before the elections to the USSR Supreme Soviet, Kotsylovskyi was temporarily released and returned to Przemyśl. He did not accept the decision of the "Ecumenical Council" of Lviv in March 1946 by which the Greek Catholic Church was incorporated into the Orthodox Church. On 22–24 June 1946, as the only Greek Catholic bishop not to have been imprisoned, Kotsylovskyi attended a conference of the Polish Episcopate in Częstochowa; there the Polish bishops sent a memorandum informing the Provisional Government of National Unity that they accepted the Greek Catholic bishop as a member of the Episcopate. Under pressure from the NKGB, the Polish Communist authorities decided to forcibly deport Kotsylovskyi to the Soviet Union. Although informed about these plans, he refused to escape to the West, and on 26 June 1946 he was arrested by the Polish security organs, handed over to the Soviet authorities, and imprisoned in Lviv. He was later deported to Kiev. As a Polish citizen, he refused to participate in the rigged trial. He was deported to a labor camp near Kiev, where he died. On 27 June 2001 Pope John Paul II beatified Kotsylovskyi at a solemn Holy Mass in Lviv. (WR)

Sources: Pamiaty peremyskoho vладыky kyr Iosafata Kotsylovskoho (N.p., 1956); "Iak pomer Kyr Iosafat," Ukrainski Vistii (Edmonton), 18 March 1957; Na Khrystovyi nivi, Spomyny (New York, 1978); Encyclopedia of Ukraine, vol. 2 (Toronto, 1988); Bohdan R. Bociurkiw, The Ukrainian Greek-Catholic Church and the Soviet State (1939–1950) (Edmonton, 1996); Osservatore Romano (weekly edition in English), 2001, nos. 25 and 27; Dariusz Iwaneczko, "Historia dwóch aresztowań przemyskiego biskupa grekokatolickiego Jozafata Kocyłowskiego," Biuletyn Instytutu Pamięci Narodowej, 2001, no. 7.

KOTTA Kostaq Koço (1889, Korçë [Korça]–1949, Burrell), Albanian politician. Born into an Orthodox family, Kotta studied medicine in Athens and then at one of the Italian universities. In 1913 he began working as a clerk in Korçë and later as secretary in the Ministry of Education.

In 1919 he was a school inspector in the district of Berat. In 1921–23 he served as prefect of Berat. As a member of parliament, he was politically aligned with the group of “localists,” who aimed at reducing the powers of the central government. Before 1924 Kotta served as minister of public works on two occasions. In 1924 he became a member of parliament. During the revolution of June 1924 he fled to Greece, from where he returned in December of the same year. Kotta was one of the organizers of a military operation to overthrow the revolutionary government of Fan Noli. In the first cabinet after the victory of Ahmed Zogu, Kotta assumed the ministry of the national economy and public works. On 3 October 1925, as a deputy from Korçë, he was elected speaker of the Chamber of Deputies. From 10 September 1928 to 5 February 1930 he headed the first cabinet appointed after the establishment of the monarchy. At that time he introduced modern civil and penal codes based on European legal principles. On 9 September 1936 Kotta became prime minister for the second time. After the Italian invasion, he resigned on 8 April 1939. During the war he was linked with the Legaliteti (Legality) Movement. In 1944 Kotta fled to Greece. Captured with the help of Greek Communists in Salonika and handed over to Albania, he was sentenced to life imprisonment in a public trial on 1 March 1945. He was incarcerated in a new prison in Burrell, which had been built in the 1930s when he was serving as prime minister. Kotta died as a result of torture. (TC)

Sources: Michael Schmidt-Neke, Entstehung und Ausbau der Königsdiktatur in Albanien (1912–1939): Regierungsbildungen, Herrschaftsweisen und Machteliten in Einen Jungen Balkanstaat (Munich, 1987); Sejfi Vllamasi, Ballafaqime politike në Shqipëri (1897–1942) (Tirana, 1995).

KOVÁČ Michal (5 September 1930, Ľubiša, Humenné district), Slovak economist and politician. After high school in Humenné, in 1954 Kováč graduated from the Higher School of Economics in Bratislava. In 1955–71 he worked in the local apparatus of the Czechoslovak central bank in Bratislava, belonging to the Communist Party of Czechoslovakia (CPC). In 1964–65 he lectured at the school of the central bank of Cuba, and in 1967–69 he was deputy director of the London office of Živnobanka. During the so-called normalization after the Warsaw Pact invasion of Czechoslovakia, in 1970 Kováč was expelled from the CPC and demoted. From 1971 to 1978 he worked in the Bratislava city office of the central bank, and then until 1989 he was a researcher at the Central Economic Planning Institute in Bratislava. During the Velvet Revolution he joined Public against Violence (Verejnost’ proti Nasiliu [VPN]). From December 1989 to May 1991 he was minister of finance in the Slovak government, and in June 1990 he won a seat in the Chamber of the People of the Federal Assembly on behalf of the VPN. In March 1991, along with Vladimír Mečiar and other advocates of a “social market economy,” Kováč established the faction For a Democratic Slovakia, which soon left the VPN, and Kováč and his friends from the SAID faction founded a party called the Movement for a Democratic Slovakia (Hnutie za Demokratické Slovensko [HZDS]). In 1991–93 Kováč was its deputy chairman. In June 1992 he took part in negotiations between the victorious parties—the Slovak HZDS and the Czech Civic Democratic Party—on the future of Czechoslovakia. From June to December 1992 Kováč was the last speaker of the Federal Assembly.

After the breakup of Czechoslovakia, on 15 February 1993 Kováč was elected the first democratic president of Slovakia, and on 2 March 1993 he was sworn in. He left the HZDS and entered into an ever-growing conflict with his former ally, Mečiar. On Kováč’s initiative, on 11 March 1994 the parliament passed a vote of no confidence on the Mečiar government. The conflict intensified after the early parliamentary elections of the fall of 1994, when the HZDS created a coalition with the Slovak National Party (Slovenská Národná Strana), the Association of Slovak Workers (Združenie Robotníkov Slovenska) and another government headed by Mečiar. In view of the latter’s authoritarian style and his tendency to marginalize the opposition, Kováč remained the last mainstay of democracy. In his policies he could count on the support of the opposition and of the Catholic Church, but the ruling coalition attempted to make him resign. In 1995 Mečiar’s special services kidnapped Kováč’s son and drove him to Austria. All attempts to bring those responsible to court were fruitless. The Mečiar government tried to limit the authority of the president and to compromise him in the eyes of the Slovaks. Kováč managed to survive until the end of his term on 2 March 1998. Then Mečiar took over the presidential duties and amnestied all those involved in the kidnapping of Kováč’s son. After the electoral victory of the anti-Mečiar coalition in September 1998 and the introduction of direct presidential elections, Kováč planned to run, but four days before the voting in May 1999, he withdrew, asking his supporters to vote for the candidate of the ruling coalition, Rudolf Schuster. (PU)

Sources: ČBS; Kdo byl kdo v našich dějinách ve 20. století, vol. 1 (Prague, 1998); Jan Rychlík, Rozpad Československa: Česko-slovenské vztahy 1989–1992 (Bratislava, 2002); Eric Stein, Czecho/Slovakia: Ethnic Conflict, Constitutional Fissure, Negotiated Breakup (Ann Arbor, 1997); www.referaty.sk/index.php?referat=4434; www.president.sk.

KOVÁCS Béla (20 April 1908, Mecsekalja–21 June 1959, Pécs), Hungarian Peasant Party politician. For many years Kovács farmed in his home village. After meeting Ferenc Nagy in 1932, he became active in the revived Independent Smallholders' Party (Független Kisgazdapárt [ISP]). In 1941 he became the secretary of a bipartisan peasant alliance that was in opposition to the Horthy regime and demanded radical agrarian reform. At the end of 1944 Kovács became undersecretary of state in the Ministry of Interior of the Provisional Government, first in Debrecen, then in Budapest. In 1945 he became deputy secretary general of the ISP, and on 19 August 1945, secretary general of the ISP. After the ISP victory in the elections of 4 November 1945, Kovács was the party's candidate for the post of minister of interior, but he was thwarted by Marshal Kliment Voroshilov, the head of the Allied Control Commission for Hungary. Kovács assumed the portfolio of minister of agriculture. In the autumn of 1946 he proposed the establishment of the Peasant Federation, composed of the ISP and the National Peasant Party (NPP). Until then, the NPP had been in a leftist bloc together with the Communists. Kovács's proposal, as well as his great popularity among the peasants, was a thorn in the Communists' side. The Communists attempted to tie him to an alleged conspiracy against the state. In January 1947 Kovács was accused of being involved in the espionage activities of alleged conspirators against the Red Army. He resigned as secretary general of the ISP, and on 26 February 1947 he was imprisoned by the Soviet authorities. Kovács's testimony, extracted by the use of torture, was used as the basis for the fabrication of charges against the current prime minister, Ferenc Nagy, who was accused of involvement in a "plot" and forced to resign in May 1947. Kovács was deported to the USSR, where he spent many years in prisons and camps.

Released under an amnesty in April 1956, Kovács was allowed to return to Hungary. On 27 October 1956 Imre Nagy invited him to take part in a coalition government as the representative of the ISP, which was revived after Stalinism. Kovács began to work on the reconstruction of the party and supported the neutralization of Hungary. After the suppression of the insurrection in Budapest, he fell seriously ill and avoided arrest. He withdrew from political life and was not persecuted. In January 1957 János Kádár tried to persuade Kovács to join the new state authorities, but he refused. Only in the autumn of 1958, after the execution of Nagy, did he agree to stand for parliamentary "elections," lending support for the policy of Kadarism. Kovács won a seat in parliament, but as a result of his prison ordeals his health declined rapidly, and he died prematurely. (WR) Sources: Steven Bela Vardy, Historical Dictionary of Hungary (Lanham, Md., 1997); Nagy Képés Milleniumi Arcképcsarnok (Budapest, 1999); Magyar Nagylexikon, vol. 10 (Budapest, 2000); Magyarország 1944–1956, CD-ROM, Budapest 2001; Ferenc Nagy, The Struggle Behind the Iron Curtain (New York, 1948); Newsweek, 6 July 1959; New York Times, 23 June 1959.

KOVÁCS Imre (19 March 1913, Felsőöböjárás–28 October 1980, New York), Hungarian Peasant Party politician. Born into a peasant family on the estates of Archduke Joseph Habsburg, after completing high school Kovács enrolled at the economics university in Budapest. During his studies he joined a radical literary group called Country Discoverers. In his book, A néma forradalom (Mute revolution; 1937), he depicted the misery of the Hungarian countryside and its social stratification. The Horthy government banned the publication of the book. Kovács was expelled from his studies and sentenced to three months of prison. After his release, he joined the liberal Peasant March Front, which was in opposition to the government and insisted on the implementation of an agrarian reform and the liberalization of the political system. In June 1939 Kovács was one of the co-founders of the small National Peasant Party (Nemzeti Parasztpárt) and became its secretary general. At first he held the post officially, and from 1944 in secret. Imprisoned by the Germans in the autumn of 1944 and released at the beginning of 1945, Kovács could not control his party, which was penetrated by the Communists.

In November 1945 Kovács was elected to the parliament, but the following year he resigned the leadership of the party, which was now dominated by the Communists. After the arrest at the beginning of 1947 of Béla Kovács, secretary general of the Independent Smallholders' Party, and the defeat of the main forces of the peasant opposition, Kovács left for Switzerland. He later went to France and England and finally settled in the United States, where he was active in Hungarian organizations in exile. He belonged to the Hungarian National Council and, from 1958, to the Hungarian Committee and the Free Europe Committee. As the president of the Hungarian Calvinist Reformed Church in New York, in 1956 Kovács led protests against the Soviet invasion of Hungary. In 1958 he founded Új Látóhatár, an exile literary monthly. He was also the editor of the volume Facts about Hungary (1959) and of the memoirs From One Occupation to Another (1949), published in German, Hungarian, French, and English. Kovács also authored novels and essays on political and agricultural topics. (WR) Sources: The Annual Obituary, 1980; István Hartyányi, Kovács Imre bibliográfiája (Budapest, 1993).

KŐVÁGÓ József [originally Küronya] (8 April 1913, Csömödér–10 December 1996, Linwood, New York), Hungarian Peasant Party politician. After graduating from the Military Technical Academy in Budapest, Kővágó received a diploma in engineering from the Budapest Polytechnic. In 1939 he began working at the Military Technical Institute and served in the army for a short time. When the Arrow Cross Party took over power on 15 October 1944, Kővágó joined the military resistance movement. He was a member of the group led by Jenő Nagy, a colonel in the General Staff. As aide-de-camp to General János Kiss, he took part in the work of the Hungarian National Insurrection and Liberation Committee. On 22 November 1944 Kővágó was arrested. Although the case was referred to a military court, he was released and sent to the front lines, from which he escaped in March 1945. In November 1944 Kővágó had joined the Independent Smallholders' Party (ISP). In May 1945, on the party's request, he became deputy mayor of Budapest, and in the fall of that year, after local and parliamentary elections, he became mayor of Budapest and an MP. He played a major role in the reconstruction of Budapest and the normalization of life in the capital. In 1947 he was forced to resign his post under Communist pressure, and he consequently withdrew from public life.

Arrested on false charges in 1950, Kővágó was sentenced to life imprisonment. He was released in September 1956. During the revolution he helped to revive the ISP. On 3 November 1956 he was elected secretary general of the party. On 1 November 1956 he again became mayor of Budapest. After the suppression of the revolution, on 30 November he fled abroad and settled in the United States. In January 1957, at an open session of the United Nations, he defended the cause of the Hungarian Revolution. At the founding general meeting of the Hungarian Revolutionary Council in Strasbourg, Kővágó was elected vice-president and held the post until 1960. While in exile, he helped preserve the memory of the revolution and played an active role in protests initiated by Western countries against the Soviet occupation of Hungary. From 1961 to 1978, he conducted research as an engineer. From 1973 to 1983 he worked as a university professor. In 1991 he received the Middle Cross of the Order of the Hungarian Republic, and in 1992 he became an honorary citizen of Budapest. In January 1997 Kővágó was buried in Budapest. His writings include You Are All Alone (1959). (JT)

Sources: A magyar forradalom és szabadságharc enciklopédiája (Budapest, 1999); Magyar Nagylexikon, vol. 11 (Budapest, 2000); Ferenc Nagy, The Struggle behind the Iron Curtain (New York, 1948).

KOVALYK Zinovi (18 August 1903, Ivachev, near Ternopil–22 June 1941, Lviv), Ukrainian Greek Catholic priest, martyr for the faith. After finishing secondary school, Kovalyk entered the Redemptorist order, and on 28 July 1926 he took his vows. He later completed philosophical and theological studies in Belgium. Ordained a priest in September 1932, he worked in a parish in Volhynia. After the Red Army seized the Polish eastern territories in September 1939, Kovalyk continued his pastoral work despite persecution by the new authorities. Arrested by the NKVD while preaching a sermon in church on 20 December 1940, he was held and interrogated in the Brygidki Prison in Lviv. When the Soviet troops and authorities were withdrawing from Lviv after the Third Reich attacked the Soviet Union, Kovalyk was cruelly murdered: he was crucified on a prison wall. On 27 June 2001 at a Solemn Mass in Lviv, Pope John Paul II beatified him as a martyr for the faith. (WR) Sources: Osservatore Romano (weekly edition in English), 2001, nos. 25 and 27.

KOVPAK Sydor (25 May 1887, Kotelva, near Poltava–11 December 1967, Kiev), Soviet general of Ukrainian descent. Kovpak took part in World War I. In 1919 he joined the Bolshevik party. In his native village he was in command of a guerrilla unit fighting against the Germans, and he also commanded the troops of General Anton Denikin. In 1920 he fought against the army of General Pyotr Wrangel in the twenty-fifth "Chapayev" division. After the Bolshevik victory Kovpak worked on military committees in various towns of the USSR, among others Kryvyi Rih. From 1937 to 1941 he was president of the town military commission in Putivl, Sumy district. Between 1941 and 1944 he was in command of a partisan group, first of a brigade, and later of a division. From 1941 he led partisan attacks in the districts of Sumy, Kursk, Orlov, and Bryansk. From 1942 to 1943 he led a raid from the Bryansk forests through the districts of Homel, Pinsk, Volhynia, Rovno, Zhytomyr, and Kiev, as well as the famous raid from the Dnieper River to the Carpathians. In 1944 the partisan group that he commanded was renamed the First S. Kovpak Ukrainian Partisan Division. In 1947 Kovpak became deputy chairman of the Presidium of the Supreme Council of the USSR. In April 1967 he joined the Presidium of the Supreme Council of the USSR. At the Sixteenth—Nineteenth and Twenty-first—Twenty-third Congresses of the Communist Party (Bolshevik) of Ukraine, Kovpak was elected to the Central Committee. He was a deputy to the Second—Seventh Supreme Soviets of the USSR. Kovpak wrote the memoirs Od Putivla v

Karpaty (From Putivl to the Carpathians). He was twice decorated with the star of the Hero of the USSR (1942 and 1944). Four times decorated with the Order of Lenin, Kovpak also held the Order of the Red Banner. (GM)

Sources: Andrii Chaikovsky, Nevidoma viina (Kiev, 1994); Ukraińska radiańska encyklopedia, vol. 5 (Kiev, 1980); Werszyhora Petro, Karpacki rajd (Warsaw, 1951).

KOWALCZYK Stanisław (12 December 1924, Pabianice–30 January 1998, Warsaw), Polish Communist activist. Born into a working-class family, Kowalczyk graduated from the Academy of Mining and Metallurgy in Kraków. In 1947 he joined the Polish Socialist Party (Polska Partia Socjalistyczna [PPS]) and in December 1948 the Polish United Workers' Party (Polska Zjednoczona Partia Robotnicza [PUWP]). After the war he served in the army and subsequently worked in the chemical industry, gradually rising through the party ranks. From 1960 to 1968 Kowalczyk served as secretary of the PUWP Executive Committee in Katowice. In 1964 he became a deputy member and in 1968 a member of the PUWP Central Committee (CC). In 1968 he began working in the CC apparatus, serving as head of the Department of Industry and Transport.

A close associate of Edward Gierek, Kowalczyk became CC secretary in December 1971 and minister of interior in March 1973. In June 1973 he became a deputy member and in December 1975 a member of the PUWP CC Politburo. As a minister, he came into conflict with Franciszek Szlachcic, the CC member responsible for the Ministry of Interior. When Szlachcic left the party leadership in June 1974, Kowalczyk consolidated his position as a functionary who was in charge of the ministry of interior on Gierek's behalf. In 1974 Kowalczyk became brigadier general and in 1977 major general of the police. During his term in office the Ministry of Interior apparatus was in touch with the criminal world abroad and smuggled valuables into Poland that had been gained illegally (Operation Iron). It remains unclear to what extent Kowalczyk was aware of these activities. He was responsible for the persecution of workers who protested price increases in June 1976 and for attempts to suppress the emerging democratic opposition, also by illegal means. The Fourth Department of the Ministry of Interior intensified actions against the Catholic Church and against priests. In the summer of 1980 Kowalczyk became a member of a government task force to prepare the suppression of strikes by force. The plan prepared in the Ministry of Interior, code named "Summer 80," included the pacification of strikes in the Gdańsk Shipyard and the abduction of Lech Wałęsa. In October 1980 Kowalczyk left the Ministry of Interior.

On 1–2 December 1980 at the Seventh CC Plenum he was expelled from the Politburo as part of a broader action aimed at eliminating Gierek's associates. Kowalczyk became deputy prime minister but resigned in February 1981, and at the Ninth PUWP Congress he did not even become a member of the CC. An MP in the Assembly of the Polish People's Republic from 1969 on, Kowalczyk resigned his seat in January 1982. After 1989 he was never held responsible for his activities. (PK)

Sources: Mołdawa; Włodzimierz Janowski and Witalij Pawłow, Generał Pawłow: Byłem rezydentem KGB w Polsce (Warsaw, 1994); Andrzej Albert [Wojciech Roszkowski], Najnowsza historia Polski 1914–1993, vol. 2 (Warsaw, 1995); Henryk Dominiczak, Organy bezpieczeństwa PRL 1944–1990 (Warsaw, 1997); Aleksander Kochański, Informator o strukturze i obsadzie personalnej centralnego aparatu PZPR 1948–1990 (Warsaw, 2000).

KOWALSKA Faustyna [originally Helena] (25 August 1905, Głogowiec–5 October, 1938), saint of the Catholic Church. One of ten children in a peasant family, Kowalska completed only three grades of primary school. At eighteen she decided to enter a convent, but her parents could not afford to provide her with a dowry. Following her calling to a religious life, she went to Warsaw, where, after much effort, she was finally accepted into the Congregation of the Sisters of Our Lady of Mercy in 1925. Members of this congregation took care of wayward or neglected girls. Kowalska was a sister of the "second choir"—that is, one of the uneducated sisters assigned to humble manual chores. Despite her poor health, Kowalska worked beyond her strength and often suffered humiliation from other nuns. Kowalska began to have visions, and as time went on, her visions became more frequent; in them, Christ ordered her to spread devotion to the Divine Mercy, but no one believed her. In 1933 her confessor, Father Michał Sopoćko, became interested in her visions and encouraged her to write down her experiences. She wrote the five-hundred-page Dzienniczek (published in English as Divine Mercy in My Soul: The Diary of St. Faustina). Psychiatric examinations did not show any deviations from normality, and the contents of Kowalska's diary went beyond the theological knowledge of an uneducated nun. Based on one of her visions, a picture was painted showing Christ with two rays shining forth from his breast and the words "Jesus, I Trust In You," which Christ supposedly told her to use in prayers. After a stay in convents in Płock and Wilno (Vilnius), Kowalska died of tuberculosis in a convent near Kraków. Thanks to the efforts of Father Sopoćko, the message of Divine Mercy continued to spread in Polish parishes, despite the doubts of the Church hierarchy. In November 1958, on the basis of an inaccurate translation of Kowalska's Dzienniczek, the Congregation of the Holy Office stated that the cult of Divine Mercy had no supernatural sources. In 1965 a new investigation into her life and diary was launched by Karol Wojtyła, Archbishop of Kraków. After his election as pope, John Paul II beatified Kowalska on 18 April 1993 and canonized her on 30 April 2000. In August 2002, during his visit to Poland, John Paul II consecrated the huge Sanctuary of the Divine Mercy in Łagiewniki, near Kraków. In 1994 the film Faustyna, directed by Jerzy Łukasiewicz, enjoyed great popularity. (WR) Sources: Ks. Stanisław Urbański, Mistyczny świat ducha: Kanonizacja s. Faustyny Kowalskiej (Warsaw, 2000); Jan Grzegorzczak, Każda dusza to inny świat (Poznań, 2000); Jan Turnau, "Faustyna, święta drugiego choru," Wysokie Obcasy, 17 August 2002; http://www.vatican.va/news_services/liturgy/saints.

KOWALSKI Władysław (26 August 1894, Paprotnia, near Rawa Mazowiecka–14 December 1958, Warsaw), Polish Peasant Party and Communist activist. Born into the family of a horse groom, early on Kowalski became allied with the radical peasant movement. After the outbreak of World War I he was in the Puławy Legion, and from 1914 to 1917 he served in the Russian Army. In 1919 he joined the Polish Peasant Party–Liberation (Polskie Stronnictwo Ludowe–Wyzwolenie [PSL–Liberation]). At the same time he was also a member of the Communist Party of Poland (Komunistyczna Partia Polski [KPP]). In 1925 he went over to the crypto-Communist Independent Peasant Party (Niezależna Partia Chłopska [NPCh]), and in 1926 he became a member of its Central Committee (CC). When the NPCh was declared illegal in 1927, Kowalski helped to found the Union of the Peasant Left–Mutual Aid, which was a legally operating agency of the KPP in the countryside, and in 1928 he became the editor-in-chief of Samopomoc Chłopska, a press organ of the party. He joined the Central Agricultural Department of the KPP CC. Arrested in 1932, Kowalski was sentenced to three months in jail. From 1937 he was active in the Democratic Club in Warsaw, becoming a member of its Main Board.

During World War II Kowalski lived in Warsaw and was active in the underground. He was arrested and caught in street roundups several times. In 1941 he was a member of a Communist group called Proletariusz, and he edited a periodical under the same title. In 1942 he joined the Polish Workers' Party (Polska Partia Robotnicza [PPR]). In 1942–43 he edited Trybuna Chłopska. In late 1943 and early 1944 he helped to establish the National Home Council (Krajowa Rada Narodowa [KRN]) and became its vice-president. On the orders of the PPR, Kowalski helped to found the Peasant Party–People's Will (Stronnictwo Ludowe–Wola Ludu) and became its vice-president in February 1944. One of the founders of the pro-Communist Peasant Party (Stronnictwo Ludowe [SL]) in the autumn of 1944, Kowalski served as vice-president of the SL from March to September 1945 and as a member of the SL Chief Council and the Chief Executive Committee from January 1946 on. He edited Zielony Sztandar. From June 1945 to February 1947 Kowalski was minister of culture in the Provisional Government of National Unity. In February 1947 he became leader of the SL parliamentary representation and speaker of the Legislative Assembly. He tolerated abuses of power against MPs by granting permission for the temporary arrest of many them, often after the fact. He canvassed for support of peasant movement activists for the PPR. After the remains of the debilitated Polish Peasant Party (Polskie Stronnictwo Ludowe [PSL]) were incorporated into the SL in November 1949, Kowalski was elected president of the Chief Executive Committee of the United Peasant Party (Zjednoczone Stronnictwo Ludowe [ZSL]). From 1952 to 1956 he was a member of the State Council. He strictly subordinated the ZSL to the Polish United Workers' Party (Polska Zjednoczona Partia Robotnicza) and supported the collectivization of agriculture. Kowalski committed suicide at the time of political transformations in Poland after October 1956. He was the author of stories and novels, including W Grzmiącej (In Grzmiąca; 1936). (JS)

Sources: PSB, vol. 14; Roman Buczek, Stronnictwo Ludowe w latach 1939–1945 (London, 1975); Tadeusz Błajejewski, Polityka i pióro: O Władysławie Kowalskim (Łódź, 1978); Zygmunt Hemmerling, Władysław Kowalski (Warsaw, 1977); Słownik biograficzny działaczy ruchu ludowego (Warsaw, 1989); Krystyna Kersten, Narodziny systemu władzy: Polska 1943–1948 (Poznań, 1990); Stanisław Łach, Polskie Stronnictwo Ludowe w latach 1945–1947 (Gdańsk, 1995).

KOZAL Michał (25 September 1893, Nowy Folwark, near Krotoszyn–26 January 1943, Dachau), Polish Roman Catholic bishop, martyr. The son of a manorial clerk, after graduating from high school in Krotoszyn, Kozal studied in a theological seminary in Poznań and Gniezno (1914–18). Ordained in February 1918, he worked as a curate in rural parishes, a religion teacher in a girls' high school in Bydgoszcz, and a lecturer in theology and liturgics at a seminary in Gniezno. In 1933 he was named papal chamberlain. On 12 June 1939 Kozal was appointed bishop auxiliary of Włocławek. When the Germans occupied Włocławek in September 1939 and Bishop Karol Radoński left the town, Kozal was left in charge of the diocese, but on 7 November he was arrested by the Gestapo. Cesare Orsenigo, the papal nuncio in Berlin, was able to negotiate his release on condition that he be placed in charge of the Lublin diocese, to which Pope Pius XII agreed. Kozal rejected that proposal, as he believed that such a decision, made under duress, would amount to cooperation with the occupier. In April 1941 Kozal was transferred to the Dachau concentration camp. Subsequent requests for his release, made by Orsenigo on behalf of Bishop Radoński and the Holy See, were rejected by the Nazi authorities, who claimed that he had engaged in “anti-German activities.” Kozal died in the Dachau concentration camp. Pope John Paul II beatified him during his visit to Poland in June 1987. (WR)

Sources: PSB, vol. 14; Jacek Wilczur, “Biskup Michał Kozal—więzień nr 24544,” Narodowiec, 1966, no. 105; “Ofiary zbrodni niemieckich spośród duchowieństwa diecezji wrocławskiej,” Kronika Diecezji Wrocławskiej, 1947; Ateneum Kapłańskie, 1946 and 1957.

KOZICKI Stanisław (4 April 1876, Łempice, near Pułtusk—28 September, 1958 Polanica Zdrój), Polish journalist, historian, and politician. Kozicki studied in the Higher Agricultural School in Berlin and in Halle, where he received a Ph.D. in philosophy in 1899. In 1899–1902 he worked as an assistant professor at the Jagiellonian University in Kraków. During his student years he belonged to the Union of Polish Youth—Zet. Upon his return home in 1900 Kozicki joined the National League (NL) and, in 1902, the National Democratic Party (Stronictwo Narodow-Demokratyczne [NDP]). In 1902 he went to Warsaw, where he headed the NDP’s organizational work. He was also active in the Society of National Education and published a lot. In 1905 Kozicki co-organized the National Workers’ Union. He organized the NDP campaign before the elections to the Russian Duma. In 1910 he became a member of the NL Central Committee and the NDP Chief Board. He worked closely with Roman Dmowski, fully supporting his anti-German line based on cooperation with Russia. In 1910 he was an observer at the Slavic Congress in Sofia.

When in 1915 the German Army was approaching Warsaw, Kozicki, along with some of the most anti-German politicians, left for Russia; there he published in National Democratic periodicals Sprawa Polska and Gazeta Polska, and he was active in the National Committee of Poland (Komitet Narodowy Polski [KNP]). In 1917, on Dmowski’s request, Kozicki moved to London, where he worked in the KNP office, heading its Civil and Press Department and promoting the Polish cause in Great Britain. In 1919–20 he was general secretary of the Polish delegation to the Paris Peace Conference. After returning to Poland, he was active in the National Democratic Party, renamed the Popular National Union (Związek Ludowo-Narodowy [ZLN]). In 1922 Kozicki was editor-in-chief of Przegląd Wszeczpolski, and until May 1923 he was editor-in-chief of Kurier Poznański. In 1922–26 he was an MP, and from June to December 1923 he headed the ZLN parliamentary club. In February 1926 he became minister plenipotentiary in Italy, but as a result of the May 1926 coup he was recalled from this post. In 1926 Kozicki co-organized the Camp of Great Poland, designed according to the Italian Fascist pattern and meant as a reaction to the system introduced by Józef Piłsudski. In 1928 Kozicki was elected to the Senate on behalf of the ZLN. He was a senator until 1935, also belonging the Chief Committee of the National Party (Stronictwo Narodowe) in 1934–39. During World War II Kozicki retired from politics, and after the war he published in Tygodnik Warszawski, Tygodnik Powszechny, and Kierunki. He authored several works, including Niemcy i Polska na tle polityki powojennej (Germany and Poland in postwar politics; 1927); Na Sycylii (In Sicily; 1928); and Historia Ligi Narodowej (1889–1907) (History of the National League, 1889–1907; 1964). (PU)

Sources: PSB, vol. 14; Kto był kim w Drugiej Rzeczypospolitej (Warsaw, 1994); Encyklopedia historii Drugiej Rzeczypospolitej (Warsaw, 1999); Marian Seyda, Polska na przełomie dziejów, vols. 1–2 (Warsaw and Wilno, 1927–31); Władysław Pobóg-Malinowski, Narodowa Demokracja 1887–1918 (Warsaw, 1933); Marian Leczyk, Komitet Narodowy Polski a Ententa i Stany Zjednoczone 1917–1919 (Warsaw, 1966); Krzysztof Kawalec, Roman Dmowski (Warsaw, 1996).

KOZŁOWSKI Leon (6 June 1892, Rembieszyce, Kielce region—11 May 1944, Berlin), Polish archaeologist and politician. After graduating from high school in 1910, Kozłowski started studies in the natural sciences and archaeology at the Jagiellonian University in Kraków and then continued them in Tübingen, Germany, in 1912–13. He belonged to the Union of Progressive Youth and then to the Union of Active Struggle and the Riflemen’s Association, both connected with Józef Piłsudski. After the outbreak of World War I Kozłowski interrupted his studies, and in 1914–17 he served in the Polish Legions. In 1917–18 he completed his studies in Tübingen and received a Ph.D. In 1920 he volunteered to fight in the Polish-Soviet war. Later in 1920 he became an associate professor of prehistory at the Jagiellonian University, and in 1921–31 and 1935–39 he was a professor at John Casimir University in Lwów (Lviv). Kozłowski authored many scholarly works, including Groby megalityczne na wschód od Odry (Megalith tombs east of the Oder River; 1921); Starsza epoka kamienna w Polsce (The Old Stone Age in Poland; 1922); Młodsza epoka kamienna w Polsce (The New Stone Age in Poland; 1924); and Zarys pradziejów Polski południowo-wschodniej (Outline of prehistory of Southeast Poland; 1939). From 1935 Kozłowski was a corresponding member of the Polish Academy of Arts and Sciences.

Kozłowski started his political career after the May 1926 coup, organizing the Union for the Reform of the Republic (Związek Naprawy Rzeczypospolitej) in Lwów. In 1928–35 he was an MP on behalf of the ruling Nonparty Bloc of Cooperation with the Government. He was a member of its leadership and senator on its behalf in 1935–39. From August 1930 to March 1932 he was minister of agrarian reforms in the governments of Józef Piłsudski, Walery Sławek, and Aleksander Prystor. In 1932–33 he was undersecretary of state in the Ministry of Treasury, and from 15 May 1934 to 28 March 1935 he was prime minister. After the assassination of Bronisław Pieracki, in June 1934 Kozłowski was also acting minister of interior. Thought to be an ally of the group of legionnaires and its elite—the “colonels”—after the death of Piłsudski, Kozłowski supported Sławek. In 1937–38 he was a member of the Camp of National Unity (Obóz Zjednoczenia Narodowego [OZN]). After the outbreak of World War II and the Soviet invasion of East Poland, on 26 September 1939 Kozłowski was arrested by the NKVD in Lwów. In July 1941 he was sentenced to death. The sentence was then commuted to ten years. Following the Polish-Soviet agreement, in September 1941 he was released, and in October 1941 he joined the army of General Władysław Anders. Soon he disappeared, got through the front lines, and was interned by the Germans. Sentenced to death by a Polish martial court for desertion, Kozłowski died in prison in Berlin. (PU)

Sources: PSB, vol. 15; Encyklopedia historii Drugiej Rzeczypospolitej (Warsaw, 1999); Kto był kim w Drugiej Rzeczypospolitej (Warsaw, 1994); Władysław T. Kulesza, Koncepcje ideowo-polityczne obozu rządzącego w Polsce w latach 1926–1935 (Wrocław, 1985); Władysław Pobóg-Malinowski, Najnowsza historia polityczna Polski, vol. 3 (London, 1986).

KOZOVSKI Ferdinand (27 January 1892, Knezha–12 September 1965, Sofia), Bulgarian Communist activist and general. While a high school student, Kozovski joined the Socialist movement, and in 1911 he became a member of the “narrow” faction of the Bulgarian Workers’ Social Democratic Party (Tesnyaki), close to the Bolsheviks. He established a party organization in Knezha. He fought in the Balkan Wars (1912–13) and subsequently finished a school for reserve officers. During World War I Kozovski agitated for peace. After the war he graduated in law from the university in Sofia and practiced as an attorney in Knezha. After the failure of the Communist uprising in 1923, Kozovski emigrated to Yugoslavia. In 1926 he left for the Soviet Union, where he graduated from the Frunze Military Academy. He subsequently served as an officer in the Red Army and taught military subjects at a Moscow university to émigrés from Western countries. During the Civil War in Spain, under the pseudonym “Petrov,” Kozovski commanded the Twelfth International Brigade and served in the command of the Fourth Corps of the Republican Army; he was wounded. After the outbreak of World War II, Kozovski worked as an editor in the Bulgarian section of Moscow Radio and in Khristo Botev Radio. He returned to Bulgaria after the coup of 9 September 1944 and was assigned to the Defense Ministry, where he conducted a purge of officers. Between 1944 and 1945 he was assistant to the commander-in-chief of the Bulgarian Army, subsequently becoming deputy minister of national defense and head of the Political Board of the army. From 1948 to 1950 Kozovski was in the diplomatic service in Hungary and Poland. After returning to Bulgaria, he became one of the senior leaders of the Fatherland Front. (AG)

Sources: Entsiklopediya Bulgariya, vol. 3 (Sofia, 1982); Jerzy Tomaszewski, Bułgaria 1944–1971 (Warsaw, 1989).

KRAIGHER Sergej (30 May 1914, Postojna, Slovenia–17 January 2001, Ljubljana), Slovene Communist activist. Kraigher studied in Ljubljana and then in Zagreb, where he graduated from the medical school. In February 1934 he joined the Communist Party of Yugoslavia (CPY). Arrested in 1934, he spent two years in prison in Sremska Mitrovica. From 1941 to 1945 he fought with the Communist partisans. He served as secretary of party committees in Trbovlje, Grosuplje, Celje, and Maribor. In 1945 he became secretary of the CPY city committee in Ljubljana and vice-president of the local city council. In 1946–50 he served as vice-president of the government of the Slovene Republic, and in 1948 he became a member of the CC of the Communist Party of Slovenia. From 1951 to 1953 Kraigher was chairman of the National Bank of Yugoslavia, and from 1963 to 1967, vice-president of the Federal Executive Council—that is, the federal government of Yugoslavia. From 1963 to 1967 he headed a commission for socioeconomic relations appointed by the Federal Council of the Assembly of the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (SFRY). From 1967 to 1974 he was president of the National Assembly of the Socialist Republic of Slovenia, and from May 1974 to May 1979, chairman of the Presidium of the Socialist Republic of Slovenia. In 1969–74 Kraigher was a member of the Presidium of the CC of the League of Communists of Yugoslavia (LCY), and from 1974 to 1982, a member of the Presidium of the CC of the League of Communists of Slovenia (LCS). He was a member of the presidency of the SFRY (1971–74 and 1979–84), its vice-president (1980–81), and its president (1981–82), holding the highest position in the state at that time. Kraigher was the author of numerous articles on socioeconomic relations. In 1982 he headed a commission that drafted an anti-inflation program to stabilize the economy, but the implementation of that program did not prevent the economic collapse of the country in the late 1980s. (AO)

Sources: Enciklopedija Jugoslavije, vol. 5 (Zagreb, 1962); Who's Who in the Socialist Countries of Europe (Munich, London, and Paris, 1989); Enciklopedija Slovenije, vol. 5 (Ljubljana, 1991).

KRAJIŠNIK Momčilo (20 January 1945, Zabrje, near Sarajevo), Bosnian Serb activist. The speaker of the parliament of Bosnia-Herzegovina in 1991, in 1992 Krajišnik resigned from this position and took over the position of speaker of the Bosnian Serb assembly. Controlling the local authorities, the police, military units, and the arms trade, he gained enormous power. Along with Biljana Plavšić, Krajišnik represented the nationalist “hawks” in the leadership of the Serbian Democratic Party (SDP) in Bosnia-Herzegovina. As a result of the elections of September 1996, he became a member of the three-man presidency of the Republic of Bosnia-Herzegovina on behalf of the Serbian Republic of Bosnia. In 1997 he was defeated by its president, Plavšić, who, with the support of NATO units, took over control of the police and chose a more conciliatory line. After the SDP lost the majority in the parliament of Bosnia-Herzegovina in November 1997, Krajišnik's position was further weakened when the government of Bosnia-Herzegovina was taken over by a moderate prime minister, Milorad Dodik. In August 1998 Krajišnik was accused of killing an officer connected with Plavšić, and in February 2000 he was accused by the International Yugoslav War Crimes Tribunal in The Hague of co-responsibility for the genocide of Bosnian Muslims. Arrested by French soldiers in Pale in April 2000, he was brought before the tribunal in February 2004, but he pleaded not guilty. (WR)

Sources: Laura Silber and Allan Little, The Death of Yugoslavia (London, 1995); Ante Čuvalo, Historical Dictionary of Bosnia and Herzegovina (Lanham, Md., 1997); www.diplomatiejudiciaire.com/UK/Tpyuk/KrajsnikUK.htm; www.rulers.org.

KRAMÁŘ Karel (27 December 1860, Vysoké nad Jizerou–26 May 1937, Prague), Czech politician, lawyer, and economist. Kramář's father secured the social advancement of his family, starting as a bricklayer and gradually acquiring a considerable fortune as an entrepreneur. Kramář took up law studies in Prague, which he completed in 1884. Then he studied public economics and political science in Berlin, London, and Paris. In Vienna, he entered political life, founding, along with Tomáš Garrigue Masaryk, the so-called realist movement. Kramář was the author of the political part of the movement's program, stressing the need for cooperation among the Slavic nations within the framework of the Austro-Hungarian Empire. Such cooperation was supposed to lead to the transformation of the empire into a federal state. In 1891 Kramář was elected an MP, representing the Young Czech party. Quite soon, he became one of its leaders, and at the turn of the century he was considered the leading Czech politician in Vienna. Although in the first general elections to the Viennese parliament in 1907 Kramář's party lost its position as the strongest Czech political force, he himself retained his position among the Czech politicians. (He was an ardent advocate of the elections in any case.)

In the ideological sphere, Kramář was the creator of “New Slavism,” a concept according to which cooperation among the Slavic nations (including Russia) would be a counterbalance for the increasing influence of Germany in Austria-Hungary. In accordance with this idea, he organized two all-Slavic rallies, in Prague (1908) and Sofia (1910). In 1914 Kramář submitted, to the foreign minister of Russia, Sergey Sazonov, a project for the creation of a Slavic “Reich” under the scepter of the Romanovs. From the beginning of World War I Kramář was oriented against Austria. Along with Masaryk, Alois Rašín, Edward Beneš, and Josef Scheiner, he founded an organization called Mafia, which led the movement for independence in the Czech and Slovak territories. Along with Rašín, Kramář was arrested in 1915, and on 3 June 1916, sentenced to death. A year later the sentence was changed to twenty years of prison, but then Kramář was amnestied, and he returned to political life. On 9 February 1918 his efforts led to the unification of the “young Czechs” with the “old Czechs” and to the creation of the conservative Czech State Democratic Party (Česka Státoprávní Demokracie).

In July 1918 Kramář became the head of the Czechoslovak National Committee (Československý Národní Výbor), which was joined by members of all political parties. Next, he headed a delegation to Geneva, where he met with representatives of the Czechoslovak National Council (Národní Výbor Československý) under the leadership of Beneš. On 14 November 1918 Kramář gave a speech in the National Assembly in which he announced the removal of the Habsburgs from the Czech throne and the appointment of Masaryk to the post of president of the new state. Between 14 November 1918 and 8 July 1919 Kramář was the first Czechoslovak prime minister.

In 1919 he was the head of the Czechoslovak delegation during the Paris Peace Conference, at which there were differences on foreign policy between Masaryk and Beneš. Kramář proposed to organize an anti-Bolshevik intervention in Russia that was supposed to ensure the security of the smaller Slavic countries in case of a German aggression. In 1919 the conservatives, led by Kramář, lost the parliamentary elections, and he himself ceased to be prime minister. His party changed its program and its name to Czechoslovak National Democracy (Československá Národní Demokracie).

As a result of his conflict with Masaryk and Beneš, Kramář soon lost his position as one of the most influential politicians in Czechoslovakia. From 1919 to 1934 he was an MP and leader of National Democracy. In 1934, along with Jiří Stříbrný and František Mareš, he created the National Union (Národní Sjednocení), a group with a nationalistic program that did not gain great social support. Kramář was the author of many theoretical and historical works, among them the following: České státní právo (Czech state law; 1896); Les parties politiques et la situation parlementaire en Autriche (Political parties and the parliamentary situation in Austria; 1899); Dějiny české politiky od roku 1879 (A history of Czech politics from 1879; 1909); Austrian Terrorism in Bohemia (1916); Ruská krise (The Russian crisis; 1921); and Československi stát a Slavstvo (The Czechoslovak state and Slavism; 1927). In 1938 the first part of Kramář's memoirs, Paměti, appeared. (PU)

Sources: ČBS; Kto bol kto za I. ČSR (Bratislava, 1993); Kdo byl kdo v našich dějinách ve 20. století, vol. 1 (Prague, 1998); Politická elita meziválečného Československa 1918–1938: Kdo byl kdo za první republiky (Prague, 1998); Vladimír Sis, Karel Kramář (Prague, 1930); Kamil Krofta, Politická postava Karla Kramáře (Prague, 1930); Vincenc Červinka, Karel Kramář, jeho život a význam (Prague, 1930); První ministerský předseda ČSR dr. Karel Kramář (Prague, 1938); Karel Herman, Slovenska politika Karla Kramáře (Prague, 1971).

KRASSÓ György (19 October 1932, Budapest–13 February 1991, Budapest), Hungarian journalist and political activist. At the age of fourteen Krassó joined the Hungarian Communist Party (HCP). From 1949 to 1951 he served his apprenticeship as a turner and studied for his high school final examinations at an evening school. In 1951 he began studying at the Academy of Economics in Budapest. Accused of spreading “revisionist” views, he was thrown out of the party in 1952 and expelled from the university in 1955. Involved in the armed struggle from the beginning of the 1956 revolution, Krassó took part in the assault on the radio station and other operations. Arrested for distributing leaflets after the fall of the revolution, he was sentenced to ten years' imprisonment. He was released under an amnesty in 1963. Arrested again in the same year, he was held under investigation for several months and accused of “anti-state agitation.” From 1964 to 1970 Krassó worked as a turner. In 1970 he was dismissed from work for his opposition activities, such as illegal publications. In 1973 he retired on a pension. He organized protests against the arrests of members of Charter 77 in Czechoslovakia. In the 1980s he set up the underground publishing house Magyar Október (Hungarian October) and organized activities commemorating the 1956 revolution, as a result of which he was placed under house arrest in 1984. In 1985 Krassó emigrated to Great Britain, where he worked with the BBC and Radio Free Europe. In 1989 he returned to Hungary, calling for a thorough de-Communization modeled on the de-Nazification process in Germany. In 1990, the Hungarian October Party (Október Párt), which Krassó had founded, did not gain the required 5 percent of the vote in the first democratic parliamentary elections in Hungary. (MS)

Sources: Péter Sneé, Meghalt Krassó György, “Magyar Nemzet,” 1991, no. 37; Új magyar irodalmi lexikon (Budapest, 1994); György Litván, ed., Rewolucja węgierska 1956 roku (Warsaw, 1996).

KRAVCHUK Leonid (10 January 1934, Velykyi Zhytyn, Volhynia), Ukrainian Communist activist and post-Communist politician. After graduating from a technical high school in Rivne, Kravchuk studied economics at Kiev University. In 1958–60 he lectured in political economy in Chernihiv. In 1960–67 he worked in the Department of Propaganda and Agitation of the Chernihiv regional committee of the Communist Party of Ukraine (Komunistychna Partiya Ukrainy [CPU]). From 1967 he was a doctoral student at the Academy of Social Sciences of the Central Committee (CC) of the CPSU, where he received a Ph.D. in 1970. Then he started working in the CPU apparatus. From 1980 Kravchuk was head of the Department of Propaganda and Agitation of the CPU CC. From October 1988 to October 1989 he was head of the Ideological Department of the CPU CC. An adherent of perestroika, from October 1989 to June 1990 he was CPU CC secretary for ideology and a deputy member of the CPU Politburo. In June 1990 he became a member of the Politburo and second secretary of the CPU CC. In March 1990 he was elected a deputy to the Supreme Council of the Ukrainian SSR. Kravchuk supported the autonomy of the Ukrainian party and republic. When on 16 July 1990 the Supreme Council announced Ukrainian sovereignty—meaning the priority of local laws before all-Soviet legislation—Kravchuk became the council's chairman.

As a result of the August 1991 putsch in Moscow, Krav-chuk gave up his party membership. After the failure of the putsch, on 24 August the Supreme Council passed the declaration of Ukrainian independence. On 1 December 1991 Kravchuk was elected president, winning 61.6 percent of the vote. On the same day, about 90 percent of Ukrainians supported the independence declaration in a referendum. Realizing that the breakup of the Soviet Union was inevitable, in the fall of 1991 Kravchuk supported a loose federation of Soviet republics, but when this attempt to save the Soviet state failed, on 7–8 December 1991 Kravchuk met with the presidents of Russia, Boris Yeltsin, and Belorussia, Stanislau Shushkevich, in Belovezha Forest and signed an agreement on the formation of the Commonwealth of Independent States, which led to the dissolution of the Soviet Union.

Under Kravchuk's rule Ukraine had no exact borders, its economy was in ruins, and the new political system was only in the making. Kravchuk was one of the leaders of the Social Democratic Party of Ukraine (United) (Sotsialdemokratychna Partiya Ukrainy [Obyednana]). There were serious tensions with Russia over borders, the division of the armed forces, and the nuclear arsenal. In August 1992 Kravchuk agreed with Yeltsin on the division of the Black Sea Fleet; the agreement finally came into force after another meeting with Yeltsin in June 1993. Kravchuk did not accept the secession of the Crimean Republic and did not recognize Sevastopol as a part of Russia. On 14 January 1994 he signed with U.S. president Bill Clinton and with Russian president Yeltsin an agreement on the delivery of the Ukrainian nuclear arsenal to Russia in exchange for American and Russian guarantees of Ukrainian independence and American economic aid. Kravchuk established diplomatic relations with most countries of the world and established good neighbor agreements with Poland and Romania. From the spring of 1993 a conflict grew between Kravchuk and Prime Minister Leonid Kuchma over economic reform. Because of delays in the reform, the economic situation of the country worsened. In the presidential elections of July 1994 Kravchuk came first in the first round but lost to Kuchma in the second round. From September 1994 Kravchuk was a deputy to the Supreme Council of Ukraine, but his party was sidelined. Kravchuk authored the memoirs Mayemo te, shcho mayemo: Spohady i rozdumy (We have what we have: Memoirs and reflections; 2002). (BB)

Sources: Khto ye khto v Ukraini 2000 (Kiev, 2000); Ukraina: Znaki zapytania (Warsaw, 1990); Tadeusz Andrzej Olszański, Historia Ukrainy XX w. (Warsaw, n.d.); Mykola Mikhalchenko and Viiktor Andrushchenko, Belovezhe. L. Kravchuk. Ukraina 1991–1995 (Kiev, 1996); Andrzej Chojnowski, Ukraina (Warsaw, 1997); Bohdan Nahaylo, The Ukrainian Resurgence (Toronto, 1999); Bugajski.

KRECHEUSKI Pyotr (7 August 1879, Kobryn–8 March 1928, Prague), Belorussian writer, historian, and politician. The son of a village deacon, Krecheuski graduated from the Wilno (Vilnius) Theological Seminary (1909) but decided to pursue a teaching career. From 1902 to 1909 he worked as a teacher in the counties of Białystok and Wołkowysk (Volkovysk). From 1909 to 1914 he was employed in the Wilno State Bank. From 1914 he served in the Russian Army. In December 1917 he took part in the preparations for and the work of the First All-Belorussian Congress and became one of the senior leaders of the Belorussian People's Republic (BPR). In 1918, after the Belorussian Socialist Hromada split into three groups, Krecheuski became one of the leaders of the Belorussian Party of Socialists-Federalists. He was an avowed supporter of the struggle to maintain the independence of the BPR. He believed that an alliance with neither the Poles nor the Bolsheviks offered a compromise solution to the Belorussian question. In May 1918 Krecheuski became secretary of trade of the BPR and, in October 1918, secretary of the Council of the BPR, which served as a provisional legislative government of the republic. On 13 December 1919 he became president of the Council of the BPR. After the council withdrew from Belorussian territory, Krecheuski held his position in exile: in Kaunas, in Berlin, and finally in Prague. At that time he established a network of BPR representatives in various countries. He kept Western governments—as well as public opinion—informed about the situation of the Belorussian people under the Soviet and Polish governments. In September 1921 he convened a Belorussian conference in Prague, at which representatives of various organizations in exile recognized his government. Despite intrigues by the Soviet services, Krecheuski managed to maintain unity within the Belorussian government-in-exile. In Prague, he also founded the Belorussian Archive, which was intercepted by the Red Army in 1945.

Krecheuski was the author of works on the Polish-Soviet Treaty of Riga of 1921 and on the Belorussian National-Political Conference in Prague in September 1921. These works were published in Berlin in 1925. Krecheuski defined both Poland and Soviet Russia as occupiers of Belorussian territories. The drama Rahmeda, written in 1921, depicted the political situation in the Polotsk Duchy in the tenth century; it was a metaphorical picture of the situation of Belorussia at the beginning of the twentieth century. Krecheuski was the editor of Zamezhnaia Belarus (Foreign Belorussia; 1926), a compendium about the history, culture, and economy of Belorussia. (EM)

Sources: Khrystianskaia Dumka (Vilnius), 20 March 1938; Batskaushchyna (Munich), 15 March 1953; Byelorussian Times (Flushing, N.Y.), January 1978; Vitaut Kipel and Zora Kipel, eds., Byelorussian Statehood (New York, 1988); Entsyklapiedyia historyi Bielarusi, vol. 4 (Minsk, 1997).

KREJČI Jaroslav (27 June 1892, Křemenec–18 May 1956, Leopoldovo), Czech lawyer and politician. In 1915 Krejčí graduated from law studies at the university in Prague. During World War I he served in the rear of the Austro-Hungarian Army. From 1918 to 1920 he worked in a land office in Brno. In 1919 he joined the Czech National Socialist Party. In 1920 he became a government official, later an adviser to the prime minister, and from 1936 to 1938 he was president of the secretariat of the Law Council, an advisory body at the office of the prime minister. From 1921 to 1938 Krejčí served as secretary, and from 1938 to 1939 as president, of the Constitutional Tribunal. He also pursued academic work at the university in Brno, where in 1938 he became a professor of constitutional law. In his views at that time, Krejčí was close to the ideas of Tomáš Garrigue Masaryk, and between 1928 and 1938 he was one of the leaders of the National Socialist Party. From 1928 to 1945 he published the periodical Moderní stát and was the author of numerous studies in the field of constitutional law and the legal system.

In the governments of the Second Republic (1938–39) Krejčí served as minister of justice and head of the government commission for the German minority in the Czech territories. In the second government of the Protectorate of Bohemia and Moravia in 1940 he served briefly as minister of agriculture. After the arrest of Alois Eliaš, in September 1941 Krejčí took over his duties, and from 19 January 1942 to 19 January 1945 he served as prime minister of the puppet Czech government of the Protectorate of Bohemia and Moravia. As head of the government, he performed the duties of head of state in place of the ailing president, Emil Hácha, de facto from 1943 and officially from May 1944. In the final stages of the war Krejčí again served as deputy prime minister. After the appointment of Reinhard Heydrich as Reich Protector of Bohemia and Moravia and the appointment of Krejčí as prime minister, the situation of the people in the Protectorate of Bohemia and Moravia worsened. Arrests and death sentences became more frequent, the extermination of Jewish people was stepped up, and the powers of the Czech administration were restricted. As head of the government, Krejčí not only endorsed German policies and gave assurances of the Czech people's support for Hitler, but he also carried out the Nazis' orders. Arrested in May 1945, Krejčí was accused of collaboration with the occupation authorities. One year later the People's Court sentenced him to twenty-five years' imprisonment. He died in prison. (PU)

Sources: ČBS; Kdo byl kdo v našich dějinách ve 20. století, vol. 1 (Prague, 1998); Politická elita meziválečného Československa 1918–1938: Kdo byl kdo za první republiky (Prague, 1998); Českoslovenští politici: 1918–1991 (Prague, 1991); Jerzy Tomaszewski, Czechosłowacja (Warsaw, 1997).

KREK Janez Evangelist (27 November 1865, St. Gregor pri Ribnici–8 October 1917, Johannisthal [Šentjanž]), priest, writer, politician, and leader of the Slovene national movement. The son of a teacher, Krek was ordained a priest in Laibach (Ljubljana) in 1888 and subsequently studied theology in Vienna, where in 1892 he received a Ph.D. After returning to Ljubljana, he became a lecturer in fundamental theology and Thomism at a local seminary. Already in Vienna, he had become aware of the increasingly crucial working-class question and unresolved social problems. In his writings, Krek tried to outline a plan for the future organization of Slovene society based on Pope Leo XIII's Social Encyclical Rerum Novarum and on the thought of Karl von Vogelsang. Krek's theoretical principles became the basis for the program of the Catholic National Party (Katoliška Narodna Stranka [CNP]), announced in 1895. Over the following years Krek actively participated in Slovene national life and was one of the main founders of a network of savings and loan associations modeled on the system of Friedrich W. Raiffeisen. He also helped to found agricultural associations and cooperatives. In 1910 the Central Cooperative Union consisted of as many as 560 organizations. On Krek's initiative, a school training staff for cooperative societies was established in 1908 and a school of agriculture and housekeeping for women in 1913, both in Ljubljana. These successes were accompanied by the increase of importance of the CNP, renamed the Slovene People's Party (Slovenska Ljudska Stranka [SLS]) in 1905. The SLS was supported by small and medium Slovene farmers, whose financial situation improved as a result of the developing cooperative movement.

Krek also managed to attract the majority of workers to the SLS. In 1894 he founded the Slovene Catholic Workers' Union (Slovensko Katoliško Delavsko Društvo), whose influence quickly spread across industrial centers where Slovene workers were employed. He also founded the Consumers' Union, the School Union, and the dynamic Union for the Construction of Workers' Housing Estates. In October 1895, at the first meeting with workers' delegates, Krek presented "A Social Plan to Improve the Situation of Slovene Workers," which for many years provided the main program guidelines for the Slovene Christian Democratic Party. In 1897 Krek initiated the establishment of the Slovene Christian Social Workers' Union, which was later transformed into the apolitical Union of School Circles.

As a result of Krek's efforts, the socially engaged ideology of the Christian Democratic movement became the main influence on the institutions of the Slovene national revival, and after 1918 the Catholic parties gained a dominant position in Slovene political life, relegating Social Democrats to defensive positions. At the same time Krek opposed the nationalist extremists. A member of the Reichsrat of Austria-Hungary (1897–1900, 1907–17) and the provincial parliament of Krajina (1902–17), Krek called for intensive cooperation among the South Slavic nations, which, according to his plan, were to be united in a separate administrative district within the framework of the Habsburg empire. He designated a special role for the Slovenes in the economy and cultural life of the future province of the Southern Slavs. Krek played a key role in drafting the May Declaration of 1917, submitted by Slovene, Croat, and Serb politicians, who called for unity within a single state but still under Habsburg rule. Thanks to Krek, the cooperative movement also successfully developed in Croatia and on the Dalmatian coast. Krek's literary and journalistic legacy consists of four volumes, but a complete edition did not come out until 1922–23 in Ljubljana, where his Izbrani Spisi (Selected writings) were published posthumously. Krek was instrumental in shaping the intellectual attitudes of several generations of Slovene intelligentsia and politicians. (AG)

Sources: Biographisches Lexikon, vol. 2; Enciklopedija Jugoslavije, vol. 5 (Zagreb, 1962); Enciklopedija Slovenije, vol. 6 (Ljubljana, 1992); Fran Erjavec, Zgodovina katoliškega gibanja na Slovenskem (Ljubljana, 1928); R. Jurčec, Krek (Ljubljana, 1935); Ferdo Gestrin and Vasilij Melik, Slovenska zgodovina od konca osemnajstega stoletja do 1918 (Ljubljana, 1966); Vinko Brumen, Srce v sredini: Življenje, delo in osebnost Janeza Evangelista Kreka (Buenos Aires, 1968); Carole Rogel, The Slovenes and Yugoslavism, 1890–1914 (Boulder, Colo., 1977); Wacław Felczak and Tadeusz Wasilewski, Historia Jugosławii (Wrocław, 1985).

KREK Miha (29 September 1897, Leskovicica–18 November 1969, Cleveland, Ohio), Slovene politician. Krek studied law in Zagreb and Ljubljana, where he earned a doctorate in 1930. An active member of the Slovene People's Party, he joined Slovene Catholic Action and edited the periodical Slovenec. In 1935 Anton Korošec supported his candidacy for the post of minister without portfolio in the government of Milan Stojadinović (June 1935–February 1939). In 1940 Krek became head of the Slovene branch of the Bank Committee. After the German invasion in April 1941, he left for London, where he served as minister and deputy prime minister of the government-in-exile until Prime Minister Ivan Šubašić concluded an agreement with the Communists led by Josip Broz Tito. Krek did not accept this agreement and warned the Allies against recognizing the Communist regime in Yugoslavia. In 1944 in Rome he founded an anti-Communist national committee that favored the liberation of Slovenia by the Allies. In the spring of 1945 Krek protested the Allies' handing over Home Guard (Domobranci) members to the Communists. He helped Slovene refugees in Italy. In 1947 he settled in the United States, where he was active in émigré circles. Krek served as a member of the leadership of the Union of Christian Democratic Parties of Eastern Europe. (WR)

Sources: Enciklopedija Slovenije, vol. 6 (Ljubljana, 1992); Leopoldina Plut-Progelj and Carole Rogel, Historical Dictionary of Slovenia (Lanham, Md., 1996).

KREVE-MICKEVIČIUS Vincas [originally Mickevičius] (19 October 1882, Subartonys, near Merkyne–7 July 1954, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania), Lithuanian writer, philologist, and politician. "Kreve" was his pen name. Between the wars he used both names, and after the war he signed himself as Kreve only. From 1898 to 1900 Kreve attended a theological seminary in Vilnius (Wilno). In 1902 he moved to a gymnasium in Kazan, and he graduated in 1904. Between 1904 and 1905 he studied at the historical and philological department of the university in Kiev, but because of the outbreak of the revolution, the tsarist authorities closed the university, and Kreve moved to study in Lviv (Lwów). There he defended his thesis in comparative philology, and in 1908 he obtained a Ph.D. in philosophy. He started working as a high school teacher in Baku and continued part-time linguistic studies in Kiev, where he earned an M.A. in comparative philology based on his thesis on the origin of the names of Buddha and Pratekhabuddha. After the fall of tsarism and the proclamation of independence by Azerbaijan, Kreve was appointed Lithuanian consul in Baku. After the seizure of Azerbaijan by the Bolsheviks, he returned to Lithuania, where from 1920 to 1921 he worked in the Ministry of Education. In 1922 he was appointed professor at the university in Kaunas, where he lectured in Slavic literature until 1940. He published extensively and was the editor and publisher of many periodicals—for example, Tauta ir Žordis in 1924–31 and Musu Tautosaka in 1930–35. His literary and scholarly activities, as well as intensive journalism, brought him many awards and distinctions, including an honorary doctorate at the University of Riga.

After the Soviet invasion in June 1940 Kreve assumed the post of deputy prime minister in the so-called people's government of Justas Paleckis, and he endeavored to prevent the final incorporation of Lithuania by the USSR. To achieve his aim on 1 July he met with Vyacheslav Molotov, but the latter stated that the decision to deprive Lithuania of sovereignty would not be withdrawn. Later, Kreve publicly revealed the substance of the talk with Molotov; it became one of the key pieces of evidence in a 1954 report by the U.S. Congress that determined that the actions of the USSR toward the Baltic States could be regarded as aggression. After his return from Moscow, Kreve withdrew from political life and devoted himself to scholarly work. He assumed the post of director of the Institute of Lithuanian Studies, which was later transformed into the Lithuanian Academy of Sciences. After 22 June 1941 he temporarily lectured at the University of Vilnius, but fearing arrest by the Gestapo, he went into hiding. With the arrival of the Red Army in 1944, he decided to emigrate. He managed to get to the United States via Austria. In the United States he assumed the post of lecturer in Slavic literature at the University of Pennsylvania in Philadelphia. (AG)

Sources: EL, vol. 3; "Vinca Kreve's Place in Lithuanian Literature," Studi Baltici (Florence), 1952, no. 9; B. Vaškešis, "Vincas Kreve: The Lithuanian Classic," Lithuanus, Fall 1965; Joseph Pajauvis-Javis, Soviet Genocide in Lithuania (New York, 1980).

KRIEGEL František (10 April 1908, Stanisławów [now Ivano-Frankivsk]–3 December 1979, Prague), Czech doctor and political activist. Born into a Jewish family in Galicia, at the end of the 1920s Kriegel went to Czechoslovakia, where in 1934 he graduated in medicine from Charles University in Prague. By then he was already a member of the Communist Party of Czechoslovakia (CPC). From 1934 to 1936 he worked in an internal medicine clinic in Prague and subsequently was a doctor in the republican army in Spain until 1939. In 1939 he was interned in France for a short time. From 1940 until the end of the war Kriegel worked as a doctor in the Chinese Communist Army, and then he returned to Czechoslovakia and until 1949 served as the organizational secretary of the Provincial Committee of the CP of Czechoslovakia in Prague. During the Communist coup d'état in February 1948 Kriegel was deputy chief of the general staff of the People's Militia (Lidové Milice), fighting squadrons that played a major role in controlling the public during the coup. From 1949 to 1952 he held the post of deputy minister of health but was dismissed as part of the anti-Semitic purges conducted under the slogan of the "struggle against Zionism." After his dismissal, Kriegel worked as a doctor, and from 1960 to 1963 he was a health adviser to the government of Cuba. In 1964–65 he headed the hospital ward of the Institute for Research on Rheumatic Diseases in Prague, and later he became head of the internal medicine ward of Thomayer Hospital in Prague. From 1964 to 1969 he sat in the National Assembly and later, for a short time, in the People's Chamber of the Federal Assembly.

During the Prague Spring of 1968 Kriegel became one of the senior leaders of the party, where he represented a reformist faction. From 1966 to 1969 he sat on the Central Committee (CC) of the CPC, and from 4 June to 31 August 1968 he was a member of the CC Presidium. In 1968 he also served as president of the CC of the National Front. After the invasion of Czechoslovakia by Warsaw Pact troops on 21 August 1968, along with other government representatives Kriegel was taken to Moscow. However, he did not take part in negotiations with the Soviet leadership. He was asked to sign the final protocol ending the Moscow negotiations, but as the only member of the Czechoslovak delegation, he refused. On 18 October 1968, together with three other deputies, Kriegel voted in the Federal Assembly against the adoption of an agreement allowing Soviet troops to be stationed on Czechoslovak territory. In 1969 he was expelled from the CC of the CPC and then from the party itself. He was subsequently stripped of his parliamentary seat. In the 1970s Kriegel was active in the opposition, and in 1977 he was one of the first signatories of Charter 77. (PU)

Sources: ČBS; Českoslovenští politici: 1918–1991 (Prague, 1991); Kdo byl kdo v našich dějinách ve 20. století, vol. 1 (Prague, 1998); Gordon H. Skilling, Czechoslovakia's Interrupted Revolution (Princeton, 1976); Vilém Precan, ed., Charta 77 (1977–1989). Od morální k demokratické revoluci: Dokumentace (Bratislava, 1990); Andrzej Garlicki and Andrzej Paczkowski, eds., Zaciskanie pętli: Tajne dokumenty dotyczące Czechosłowacji 1968 r. (Warsaw, 1995).

KRILYK Osyp, pseudonym "Vasylykiv" (22 July 1898, Krakowiec, near Jaworów, Galicia–11 September 1941, Orlov), Ukrainian Communist activist. In 1918, while a law student at the University of Lemberg (Lwów, Lviv), Krilyk was a co-founder of International Revolutionary Social Democracy, a group drawing on the ideas of Mykhailo Drahomanov; it represented the national faction in the Ukrainian Communist movement. In 1919 the members of this group joined the Communist Party of Eastern Galicia (CPEG). In 1920 Krilyk began organizing Communist circles among soldiers of the Ukrainian Galician Army who had been interned in Czechoslovakia. He also founded the Committee to Aid the Revolutionary Movement of Eastern Galicia in Prague and the CPEG Foreign Committee in Vienna. After returning to Galicia at the end of 1920, Krilyk assumed the post of secretary of the CPEG Central Committee. Arrested by the Polish police on 30 October 1921 along with several members of the Communist Workers' Party of Poland (Komunistyczna Partia Robotnicza Polski [KPRP]), Krilyk was tried in a trial of thirty-nine Communists in Lwów (the so-called St. George trial, November 1922–January 1923). Acquitted of charges of high treason, he became head of the nationalist faction within the CPEG (Vasylykiv's faction, known as the Vasylykivtsi).

In November 1922, like most Ukrainian parties in Galicia, the CPEG boycotted the elections to the Polish Assembly. Trying to increase the autonomy of the CPEG vis-à-vis the KPRP, in 1923 Krilyk brought about the transformation of the CPEG into the Communist Party of Western Ukraine (Komunistychna Partiia Zakhidnoi Ukrainy [KPZU]). He contributed to an increase in the popularity of the nationalist-Communist orientation among the Ukrainians in Eastern Galicia through the activities of the Ukrainian Peasants' and Workers' Socialist Union (known as the Sel-Rob), a party independent from the KPZU, in 1926–32. Krilyk implemented the resolution of the Fifth Comintern Congress of 1924 and the policies of the authorities of the Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic. The secretary of the KPZU CC, Krilyk also joined the KPRP CC, and in 1927 he entered the Politburo of the Communist Party of Poland (Komunistyczna Partia Polski [KPP]), becoming a KPZU representative in the Polish section of the Comintern in Moscow. In April 1927 the Vasylykivtsi faction, who had a majority within the KPZU, refused the request of the leaders of the Communist Party (Bolshevik) of Ukraine (CP[B]U) and the Communist International that they too denounce the so-called nationalist deviation of Oleksandr Shumsky, minister of education of the Ukrainian SSR. As a result, in 1928 Krilyk was expelled from the Comintern, and Stalinists assumed control of the KPZU leadership. Expelled from the KPZU in March 1929, in 1932 Krilyk left for the Ukrainian SSR, where he became a member of the management of a publishing house in Kharkiv. Arrested in May 1933, he was deported to Karelia. After the German Army invaded Ukraine, on 11 September 1941, Krilyk was executed, along with Khristian Rakovsky and others, by an NKVD firing squad in a prison in Orlov. (TS)

Sources: Encyclopedia of Ukraine, vol. 2 (Toronto, 1988); Proces komunistów we Lwowie (Warsaw, 1958); Janusz Radziejowski, Komunistyczna Partia Zachodniej Ukrainy 1919–1929: Węzłowe problemy ideologiczne (Kraków, 1976); Roman Solchanyk, "The Communist Party of Western Ukraine 1919–1938," Ph.D. diss., University of Michigan, 1973.

KRLEŽA Miroslav (7 July 1893, Zagreb–29 December 1981, Zagreb), Croatian writer. Krleža came from a lower-middle-class family. His father was a clerk in Zagreb. In 1908 Krleža entered the Cadet School in Pécs and was later educated at the Ludoviceum, a military academy in Budapest. During the Balkan Wars he twice tried to join the Serbian Army but was unsuccessful. However, in 1913 he went to the front lines anyway, to fight on the Serbian side, but was arrested by the Serbs, who suspected him of spying. Upon his return to Austria-Hungary, Krleža was in turn arrested as a deserter and expelled from the Austro-Hungarian Army. After the outbreak of World War I, he was again inducted into the Austro-Hungarian Army in December 1915. As he had symptoms of tuberculosis, he was sent to a hospital. Later he fought in Galicia. After the war he devoted himself to writing. The year 1917 saw the publication of Tri simfonije (Three symphonies), a collection of poems that was highly acclaimed by the critics. Krleža was also the author of many dramas, of which Golgota was staged in 1922 and Michelangelo Buonarroti and Adam i Eva (Adam and Eve) in 1925.

Krleža was against the establishment of the monarchy in the Kingdom of Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes. From 1918 to 1939 he was a member of the Communist Party. His fascination with Marxism and with the Bolshevik revolution in Russia was reflected in his publications in the bi-weekly Plamen, first issued in 1919. In 1922 he published the collection of novellas Hrvatski bog Mars (The Croatian God Mars). From 1923 to 1927 he published the monthly Književna republika. After the introduction of the authoritarian regime of King Alexander I in 1929, for a short time the Croatian opposition formed a united front: Communists, including Krleža, sat on the board of Matica Hrvatska, the leading Croatian cultural society, side by side with clericals.

Krleža's drama U agoniji (In agony) was published in 1928. With Gospoda Glembajevi (The Glembajs; 1928) and Leda (1932) it formed a trilogy about the Glembaj family. Krleža used the disintegration of a family as a vehicle to criticize the downfall of bourgeois society. He regarded this trilogy as his greatest achievement, although some critics received it unfavorably. After moving to Czechoslovakia, Krleža finished the novel Povratak Filipa Latinovića (1932; The Return of Philip Latinovich, 1959). In the spring of 1932 he went to Warsaw, where he met the Polish writer Zofia Nałkowska, with whom he formed a friendship. After Krleža's return to Zagreb in 1933 a sort of "poster war" occurred: in response to posters announcing a public speech by Krleža, there appeared posters calling for its boycott. In additional posters, prominent people of culture defended Krleža. The speech was cancelled, and Krleža severed his ties with Matica Hrvatska. In 1934, attacked by both the right wing and some left-wing parties, Krleža founded Danas, a literary monthly that attracted Communist writers. After the intervention of the authorities, this monthly was suspended. In 1939 Krleža published the periodical Pečat.

Arrested by the Ustashe during World War II, Krleža was de facto held under house arrest in Zagreb. After the war he founded the monthly Republika. He was in the executive of the League of Communists of Yugoslavia (LCY) and the executive of the League of Communists of Croatia (LCC). Elected a member of the Yugoslav Academy of Science and Art, he became its vice-president in 1947. From 1958 to 1961 he served as president of the Yugoslav Writers' Union. The director of the Yugoslav Lexicographic Institute (Leksikografski Zavod Jugoslavije) from 1951 on, Krleža was editor-in-chief of Enciklopedija Jugoslavije (Encyclopedia of Yugoslavia, 8 vols.; 1955–71). Krleža's most important works also include Balade Petrice Kerempuha (Ballads of Petrica Kerempuh; 1936); Na rubu pameti (1938; On the Edge of Reason, 1976); Bankiet u Blitvi (1939; Banquet in Blitva, 2002); Davni dani (Bygone days; 1956), Zastave (Flags; 1967); and Dnevnik (Diary; 1977). (AO)

Sources: Enciklopedija Jugoslavije, vol. 5 (Zagreb, 1962); Mały słownik pisarzy zachodnio-słowiańskich i południowo-słowiańskich (Warsaw, 1973); Jan Wierzbicki, Miroslav Krleža (Warsaw, 1975); Marijan Matković, La vie et l'oeuvre de Miroslav Krleža (Paris, 1977); Stanko Lasić, Krleža: Kronologija života i rada (Zagreb, 1982); Vojislav Djurić, ed., Miroslav Krleža (Belgrade, 1967).

KROFTA Kamil (17 July 1876, Plzen–16 August 1945, Prague), Czech historian and diplomat. After graduating from high school in Plzen, Krofta studied history at the university in Prague and Austrian history at the Institute of Vienna. In 1899 he commenced two years of studies in Rome, where he did research in the Vatican archives. After returning from Italy, he accepted a job in the Czech Land Archives in Prague, where he worked until 1912. In 1911 Krofta was appointed associate professor of Austrian history, and after the establishment of independent Czechoslovakia he became a full professor of Czech history at Charles University in Prague. Krofta mainly dealt with the history of the Czech reformation, the development of national consciousness in Central Europe, and the history of Slovakia. He wrote many studies, including Bila hora (White mountain; 1913); Mistř Jan Hus v životě a památkách českého lidu (Master Jan Hus in the life and memory of the Czech people; 1915); Přehled dějin selského stavu v Čechách a na Moravě (Overview of the history of agriculture in Bohemia and Moravia; 1920); Cechy do válek husitských (Bohemia before the Hussite wars; 1930); Nesmrtelný národ (The immortal nation; 1940); and Dějiny československé (Czechoslovak history; 1946).

After the establishment of the Czechoslovak state, Krofta worked in the Ministry of Education. From 1920 on he was active in the diplomatic service, initially serving in the Vatican. He later worked in the Czechoslovak embassies in Vienna (1921–25) and Berlin (1925–27); then he returned to Prague and became head of the Presidium of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. In that capacity Krofta was the deputy to and the closest co-worker of minister Edvard Beneš. Krofta had much genuine influence on Czechoslovak foreign policy; for example, he worked out the modus vivendi adopted by Czechoslovakia and the Vatican in 1927, after the Holy See had recalled the papal nuncio from Prague in 1925.

After Beneš became president, Krofta was appointed foreign minister in March 1936. In accordance with Beneš's line, he based Czechoslovak foreign policy on the inviolability of borders guaranteed by the Treaty of Versailles, an alliance with France, and an agreement with the Soviet Union. The efforts of Czechoslovak diplomacy were unsuccessful, though; therefore, following the Pact of Munich of September 1938, Krofta resigned and withdrew from politics. After the outbreak of World War II, he was active in the anti-Fascist resistance movement. From 1942 to 1944 he was one of the representatives of the National Preparatory Revolutionary Committee and a co-author of its program. Arrested by the Gestapo in June 1944, Krofta was held in prison in Terezín (Theresienstadt) until the end of the war. The stay in prison seriously undermined his health, and he died shortly after the liberation. Krofta was the author of the memoirs Z dob naši první republiky (From the times of the First Republic; 1939). (PU)

Sources: ČBS; Kto bol kto za I.ČSR (Bratislava, 1993); Kdo byl kdo v našich dějinách ve 20. století, vol.1 (Prague, 1998); Politická elita meziválečného Československa 1918–1938: Kdo byl kdo za první republiky (Prague, 1998); Henri Noguères, Munich: "Peace for Our Time" (New York, 1963); Jindřich Dejmek, Historik v cele diplomacie, Kamil Krofta: Studie z dějin československé zahraniční politiky v letech 1936–1938 (Prague, 1998).

KROSS Jaan (19 February 1920, Tallinn), Estonian writer and translator. During the German occupation Kross was mobilized. For supporting Estonian independence he was arrested for a few months. After his release in 1944, he graduated in law at the University of Tartu. After the war he lectured in constitutional and international law there, but in 1948 he was arrested. Detained in Tallinn, he was later sent to a labor camp in the Komi ASSR. After his release in 1954 he started writing, although he was hardly tolerated by the authorities. In 1959 Kross became the target of propaganda attacks. In 1976–80 he was secretary of the Association of Writers of the Estonian SSR. Kross thought the Estonians had survived as a nation thanks to their innate skepticism, and he promoted national revival through the "recovery of history." In the 1980s he was increasingly active in the national movement. On 24 February 1988, a prewar national holiday, Kross signed an appeal by Estonian intellectuals to celebrate the anniversary of independence. In 1992–93 Kross was an MP, and he chaired a parliamentary commission to investigate cooperation with the KGB. He received honorary doctorates from the universities in Tartu (1989) and Helsinki (1990).

Kross made his literary debut before the war, but he started his literary career in 1958 when he published Söerikastaja (Coal concentrator). Later he published Kivist viiulid (Violin of stone; 1964), Lauljad laevavööridel (Singing aboard; 1966), and Vihm teeb tore-daid asju (The rain creates funny things; 1969). For the collection Voog ja Koolmpii (The wave and the trident; 1971) Kross received the J. Smull Award (1972). He received this award several times—for the novels Kolme katku vahel (Between three plagues, 2 vols.; 1970–72), Keisri hull (Imperial madman; 1978), and Profesor Martensi ärasõit (1984; Professor Martens' Departure, 1994). Kross also wrote Neli monoologi Püha Jüri asjus (Four appeals to St. George; 1970); Michelsoni immatrikuleerimine (Matriculation of Michelson; 1971); and Taevakivi (1975; The Rock from the Sky, 1983). His novels, including Mesmeri ring (The Mesmer ring; 1995), were translated into many languages. Kross also translated from Bertold Brecht, Heinrich Heine, Paul Eluard, and William Shakespeare.

Kross's writing evolved from a poetic reflection on the fate of his country and the hopes for a better future, connected with a rising standard of living, to a more critical approach in the 1970s. His typical hero was a man involved in unresolvable moral dilemmas, forcing him to make heroic choices between compromises with a hostile social environment and moral resistance that would mean destruction. In view of the heavy censorship Kross frequently described figures from Estonian history. He placed them in positions typical of Greek tragedies, making clear allusions to the realities of the Soviet occupation. He also reached back into his memory—for instance, in Silmade avamise päev (The open door day; 1988) and Väljakaevamised (Exhumations; 1990)—describing the Stalinist era through the eyes of its victims. One of the most outstanding Estonian intellectuals, Kross has been mentioned as a serious candidate for the Nobel Prize in Literature. (AG)

Sources: Kto yest kto v kulture Estonii: Izobrazitelnyie isskustva, literatura, teatr, muzika, kino (Avyenaris, 1996); Eesti Entsüklopeedia, vol. 14 (Tallinn, 2000); Tõnu Parming and Elmar Järvesoo, A Case Study of a Soviet Republic: The Estonian SSR (Boulder, Colo., 1978); Toivo U. Raun, Estonia and the Estonians (Stanford, 1991); Anatol Lieven, The Baltic Revolution (New Haven, 1993); Rein Taagepera, Estonia: Return to Independence (Boulder, Colo., 1993).

KRUCZEK Władysław (27 April 1910, Zwięczyca, near Rzeszów–5 November 2003, Warsaw), Polish Communist activist. Kruczek was a member of the Communist Party of Poland (Komunistyczna Partia Polski [KPP]) before World War II, and during the war he joined the People's Guard (Gwardia Ludowa). He organized Communist power in the Rzeszów region. In 1945 he joined the Polish Workers' Party (Polska Partia Robotnicza [PPR]), becoming a member of the Polish United Workers' Party (Polska Zjednoczona Partia Robotnicza [PUWP]) in 1948. As a PUWP member, Kruczek supported ideological orthodoxy and Stalinist iron-fisted rule. From 1955 to 1956, at the time of the struggle for power within the PUWP, Kruczek was close to the Natolin faction, working with people like Franciszek Mazur, Wiktor Kłosiewicz, and Kazimierz Mijal. This group enjoyed the support of Marshal Konstantin Rokossovsky and propagated anti-intellectual and anti-Semitic slogans. After October 1956 Kruczek remained a dogmatist. For example, at the beginning of the 1960s he attacked the editorial staff of the periodical Polityka, specifically Mieczysław F. Rakowski personally for "revisionist" leanings. From 1956 to 1971 Kruczek was first secretary of the PUWP Provincial Committee in Rzeszów, and from 1968 to 1980, a member of the PUWP CC Politburo. As a result of his efforts, the position of the city of Rzeszów in the region improved through investments, the establishment of local offices of government agencies, and the opening of a higher pedagogical school. This came about at the expense of other cities, particularly Przemyśl.

Kruczek supported the removal of Władysław Gomułka from power in December 1970. After Gomułka's overthrow, Kruczek became head of a commission appointed at the Ninth Plenum of the PUWP CC to investigate the December 1970 Baltic Coast events. This commission failed to arrive at any conclusion. Its final report, presented at the Sixth PUWP Congress on 6–11 December 1971, put the blame for the December 1970 events on the leaders who had been removed from power. From 1971 to 1980 Kruczek served as president of the Central Council of Trade Unions; therefore, the strikes in the summer of 1980 strongly undermined his position in the apparatus of power. At a session of the Politburo on 28 August 1980 Kruczek went so far as to demand that a state of emergency be declared. At the Seventh CC Plenum on 1–2 December 1980 he was dismissed from his position. From 1961 to 1985 Kruczek was an MP; from 1972 to 1982 he was a member of the Council of State, and from March 1972 to 1980 he was vice-president of the Council of State. (PK) etnia 1970. Bibliografia prac wydanych drukiem oraz artykułów zawartych w czasopiśmie (przemówienia, wywiady, artykuły) w latach 1956–1969 (Rzeszów, 1970).

Sources: Moldawa; Michał Czajka and Marcin Kamler, Leksykon Historii Polski (Warsaw, 1995); P. Paślowska and Z. Przywara, Władysław Kruczek: 60 lecie urodzin 27 kwietnia 1910–27 kwi-

KRUJA Mustafa Merlika (15 March 1887, Kruja–27 December 1958, Niagara Falls), Albanian politician, linguist, and writer. After finishing school in his native Kruja, Kruja continued his education in Ioánnina. He later studied at the university in Istanbul, where, under the pseudonym “Asim Dzhenan,” he wrote articles for liberal Turkish newspapers. Expelled from the university for taking part in student protests in Istanbul in 1909, Kruja continued his education thanks to the intercession of the Albanian deputies to the Turkish parliament. After completing his studies in administration and political science (1910), Kruja worked as a mathematics teacher at a high school in Durrës. In the spring of 1912 he joined an uprising in the north of the country. He attended the Albanian assembly in Vlorë that ended with a declaration of independence (28 November 1912). In 1915, on the orders of Essad Pasha Toptani, Kruja was arrested and placed in a prison in Bari. He was later interned in Sicily. Released in 1917, he went to Rome, where he became editor-in-chief of Kuvendi, a political and literary periodical. In December 1918 he returned to Albania. He became minister of post and telegraphs in the government established under Italian auspices in Durrës. He was the secretary of the Albanian delegation to the Paris Peace Conference in 1919. Elected to parliament from the Kosovo district in 1921, Kruja became aligned with the Progressive Party (Partia Perparimtare). He also belonged to the Kosovo Defense Committee and cooperated with the units led by Bajram Curri. During the revolution of 1924 he served as secretary general in the Ministry of Interior. In practice, he was in control of Central Albania.

After the collapse of the revolution, along with a group of the closest associates of Fan Noli, Kruja fled, via Vlorë, to Brindisi. He later lived for a few years in Zadar, where he worked with the National Union (Bashkimi Kombëtar). Before the Italian invasion of Albania, Kruja was one of the best-known activists of the anti-Zog émigré community in Italy. After the invasion, he returned to his country in April 1939 and served as cultural adviser to the Italian authorities. In April 1940 he became director of the Institute of Albanian Studies in Tirana. He succeeded Shefqet Vërlaci as prime minister in the collaborationist government and held his post from 4 December 1941 to 9 January 1943. He also assumed the ministry of interior in this government. During his term in office, the Italians made some concessions, increasing Albanian autonomy. After resigning from his post, Kruja became politically close to the pro-Western Abas Kupa and to the monarchist movement known as Legaliteti (Legality). Kruja was particularly hated by the Communists, who regarded him as a symbol of collaboration with the Italian occupiers. On 12 October 1943, in the center of Tirana, an attempt was made on his life, as a result of which he was lightly wounded. Captured by the Communist partisans, he was released under British pressure and went to Rome. From there he made his way to Egypt, where he met King Zog I. Subsequently, via France, he went to the United States, where he lived until the end of his life. His signature on the Declaration of Independence of 1912 was covered up in publications from the Communist period. Kruja was the author of numerous historical publications and an Albanian dictionary. (TC)

Sources: Fjalori Enciklopedik Shqiptar (Tirana, 1985); Biographisches Lexikon, vol. 2; John Swire, Albania: The Rise of a Kingdom (London, 1929); Ernest Koliqi, “Shtatëdhjetëvjetori i lindjes së Mustafës Kruja,” in Shëjzat—Le Pleiadi, 1957; Francesco Jacomini di San Savino, La politica dell’Italia in Albania (Bologna, 1965); Sejfi Vllamasi, Ballafaqime politike në Shqipëri (1897–1942) (Tirana, 1995); Mustafa Kruja, Anthologji historike: Shkrime e përkthime (Elbasan, 2001).

KRUMINŠ Janis, pseudonym “Pilate” (25 September 1894, Skrivers Volost, near Riga–15 March 1938, Moscow), Latvian Communist activist. Born into a peasant family, Kruminš joined the Latvian Social Democratic Party in 1912, gradually drifting toward the Bolsheviks. In March 1917 he began spreading Leninist slogans in Livonia. In June 1917 he became deputy chairman of the Executive Committee of the Latvian Soviet of Delegates. At the beginning of 1918, during the German occupation of Latvia, Kruminš worked in the Communist underground in Livonia. In 1919, he worked in Courland, by then under Latvian rule. At the beginning of 1919 he helped to found the Communist Party of Latvia (CPL), which chose to function within the Comintern. He also joined the Central Committee (CC) of the CPL, and in March 1919 he represented this party at the congress of the Russian Communist Party (Bolsheviks). After the CPL was declared illegal in 1929, Kruminš went to the Soviet Union, where he settled permanently. In 1931 he became head of the foreign bureau of the party, which he represented on the Executive Committee of the Communist International. In 1935 he spoke at the Seventh Congress of the Comintern. Accused of “Latvian nationalism,” Kruminš was arrested by the NKVD in 1938 and was murdered. He was rehabilitated by the authorities of the Soviet Union in 1956. (WR)

Sources: Lazitch; MERSH, vol. 18; Who Was Who in the USSR (Metuchen, N.J., 1972); Andrew Ezergailis, The 1917 Revolution in Latvia (New York, 1974); Latvijas Koministiskās Partijas kongresu, konferencu un CK plenumu resolucijas un lemmi, 1904–1940 (Riga, 1958).

KRUPAVIČIUS Mykolas (1 October 1885, Balbieriškis, near Mariampole—4 December 1970, Chicago, Illinois), Roman Catholic priest, politician, leader of the Lithuanian Christian Democratic Party. In 1913 Krupavičius completed a seminary in Sejny. Ordained a priest in June 1914, during World War I he graduated from the Theological Academy in Petrograd. In 1917 he worked as a chaplain in a Lithuanian gymnasium in Voronezh, where he was sentenced to death in absentia by the Bolsheviks. Krupavičius left for Lithuania, where he co-organized the Christian Democratic Party. From 1918 he worked in the Ministry of Interior and later in the Ministry of Agriculture of Lithuania, where he prepared a draft agrarian reform aiming at the expropriation of the large Polish landowners. From 1920 to 1926 Krupavičius was a Christian Democratic MP to parliament. At that time he was a member of the chief leadership of the Christian Democratic movement, which headed not only the party itself, but also its appendages—the Peasant Union in the countryside and a workers' labor federation. In 1923–26, as minister of agriculture, Krupavičius supervised the implementation of an agrarian reform that had been passed by the parliament in 1922. After the nationalist coup of December 1926 he left for France, where he studied sociology, economics, and law. In the 1930s he lectured at a seminary in Vilkaviškis.

In 1940 Krupavičius escaped being arrested by the NKVD, and in June 1941, along with Kazys Grinius and other Lithuanian politicians, he submitted a memorandum to the Germans warning against actions that the Lithuanians would not accept—for example, the extermination of Jews. It is all the more noteworthy that Krupavičius was known for anti-Semitism and a dislike of Poles. As the Soviet offensive arrived in 1944, Krupavičius emigrated to Germany, and the end of the war found him there. In 1945 he was elected president of the Supreme Committee for the Liberation of Lithuania (Vyriausias Lietuvos Islaisvinimo Komitetas [VLIK]) in exile. From 1948 he was a domestic prelate of Pope Pius XII. After his resignation as head of the VLIK in 1957, Krupavičius left for the United States, where he died. He was one of the main theoreticians of Lithuanian social Catholicism, especially sensitive about the peasantry. He published (among other works) Zemes klausimas Lietuvoje (The agrarian question in Lithuania; 1919), Krikščioniskoji demokratija (Christian Democracy; 1948), and his memoirs, which end in 1926 (1972). (WR)

Sources: EL, vol.3; Saulius Sužiedelis, Historical Dictionary of Lithuania (Lanham, Md., 1997); Petras Maldeikis, Mykolas Krupavicius (Chicago, 1975); Valstybininkas politikos sukuriuose: Prelatas Mykolas Krupavicius 1885–1970. Biografine apybraiža:

Amžininku atsiminimai, dokumentai, laiskai (Chicago, 1980); Alfonsas Eidintas and Vytautas Žalys, Lithuania in European Politics: The Years of the First Republic, 1918–1940 (New York, 1997).

KRUSHELNYTSKYI Anton (4 August 1878, Łańcut—13 November 1941, Soviet Union), Ukrainian writer, journalist, and politician. While a student, Krushelnytskyi was associated with the monthly Moloda Ukraïna, and with Ivan Franko he edited Literaturo-naukovyï vistykyk. He subsequently worked as a high school teacher and was active in the Ukrainian Radical Party. From April to August 1919 he served as minister of education in the Borys Martos government of the Ukrainian National Republic. After the war he worked in the Viennese publishing house Chaika, which specialized in textbooks and translations of classical literature. After returning to Galicia in 1925, Krushelnytskyi could not find a job as a teacher. From 1929 to 1933 in Poland, he edited pro-Soviet periodicals, Novi Shliakhy and Krytyka. Arrested by the authorities on many occasions, in 1934, along with his family, he went to the Ukrainian SSR. However, the family was arrested on charges of taking part in a “White Guard” organization. Along with his wife, Krushelnytskyi was sent to a labor camp, while their two sons, Ivan and Taras, were executed by firing squad. In his writing Krushelnytskyi was influenced by the traditions of West European modernism. His literary output includes the collections of stories Proletari (Proletarians; 1899) and Svitla i tyni (Lights and shadows; 1900); the dramas Artistka (An artist; 1901) and Cholovik chesti (A man of honor; 1904); the comedy Orly (Eagles; 1906); and the novels Rubaiut' lis (The forest is being felled; 1919), Iak promovyt zemlia (When the earth speaks; 1920), Iak pryhorne zemlia (When the earth takes one in; 1920), and Budenny Khlib (Daily bread; 1920). Krushelnytskyi was also the author of literary essays, critical pieces, and translations. (WR) Sources: Ukraine: A Concise Encyclopedia, vols. 1–2 (Toronto, 1963–71); Encyclopedia of Ukraine, vol. 2 (Toronto, 1988); Hryhory Kostyuk, Stalinist Rule in the Ukraine (New York, 1960).

KRUUS Hans (10 October 1891, Tartu—30 June 1976, Tallinn), Estonian historian and Communist activist. Born into a working-class family, early on Kruus became allied with the radical movement. In 1917 he helped to found the Estonian Party of Socialist Revolutionaries, and for some time he served as chairman of the party. After Estonia gained independence, he became a member of the Constitutional Assembly (1919) and then a member of the first parliament (Riigikogu). From 1920 to 1921 he was one of the senior leaders of the crypto-Communist Estonian Independent Socialist Workers' Party. In 1922 he graduated from Tartu University and began a brilliant academic career. The work Eesti: Maa, Rahva, Kultuur (Estonia: Territory, people, culture), published in 1926, was one of the major achievements of Estonian interwar historiography. In 1927 Kruus received a Ph.D. Until the end of the 1930s he lectured in history at Tartu University and served as its deputy rector from 1934 to 1937. He was also the editor-in-chief of Ajaloolise Ajakirja, the main Estonian historical periodical. Under his editorship the first three volumes of a collective history of Estonia were published in 1935–40, and the publication of an Estonian biographical dictionary was launched. Kruus was also a member of the editorial staff of the first Estonian encyclopedia and a member of many scholarly organizations.

After the Soviet invasion in June 1940, Kruus became deputy prime minister of the so-called people's government of Johannes Vares, in which he was the only prominent representative of the prewar Estonian elite. In the same year he joined the Communist Party and was elected to the Supreme Soviet of the Estonian SSR. Along with Nigol Andresen, he supervised the transformation of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs (MFA) of Estonia into the People's Commissariat of Foreign Affairs of the Estonian SSR, and he accepted the purge of the ministry of which he was in charge. In June 1941 Kruus also became the rector of Tartu University. He was responsible for personnel purges, the closing of one of the most prestigious schools of Protestant theology in Europe, and the introduction of Marxist-Leninist indoctrination. He dissolved student organizations and decided that admittance to the university would be conditional on a "proper" social background and that tuition fees would be obligatory only for those students whose parents' income "was not a result of their own work." He even agreed to the loss of degree-granting rights by the university.

In June 1941 Kruus fled to the Soviet Union. He returned to Estonia in 1944 and was charged with reestablishing the People's Commissariat of Foreign Affairs of the Estonian SSR. In 1946 the People's Commissariat of Foreign Affairs was transformed into the MFA of the Estonian SSR. At the same time Kruus headed the Academy of Sciences of the Estonian SSR until 1950 and sat in the Supreme Soviet of the Estonian SSR from 1940 to 1950. To some extent he believed that the existence of the MFA of the Estonian SSR could play a constructive role in preserving the symbols of Estonian sovereignty. He put a great emphasis on educating a diplomatic staff, and he preferred to employ Estonians who often spoke little Russian or none at all. The price was that the MFA of the Estonian SSR played the role of a propaganda mouthpiece among the Estonian émigré community. The very existence of the MFA gave credibility to the 1940 annexation and to Soviet propaganda claims about the alleged freedom of the Estonian SSR as a sovereign member of the Soviet Union, when the truth was that the top positions in the MFA were occupied by Moscow's agents or even by NKVD functionaries and that the activities of the MFA were closely subordinated to the Kremlin's directives. Dismissed from his position at the party CC plenum in March 1950, Kruus was accused of "bourgeois nationalism." The publication of all his works was banned until 1955, when he was reinstated as senior lecturer at Tartu University. In 1958 Kruus became president of the Commission for Research on the Homeland of the Academy of Sciences of the Estonian SSR. (AG)

Sources: Eesti Nokogrida Entsuklopeedia, vol. 5 (Tallinn, 1990); Eesti Entsuklopeedia, vol. 14 (Tallinn, 2000); Evald Uustalu, The History of the Estonian People (London, 1952); Eero Medijainen, "Foreign Ministry of the Estonian SSR"; Väino Sirk, "The Soviet Educational System in Estonia 1940–1991"; Piret Lotman, "Censorship during the Occupation of Estonia," all in Strona Muzeum Okupacji, www.okupatsioon.ee/english/overviews/index.html.

KRYMSKYI Ahatanhel (15 January 1871, Volodymyr Volynsky–25 January 1942, Kustanay, Kazakhstan), Ukrainian writer, translator, and literary scholar. Krymskyi attended high school in Ostroh and Kiev. In 1885 he entered the Pavlo Galagan College in Kiev and later studied at the Lazarev Institute of Oriental Languages and at the university in Moscow. In 1898 he became an associate professor (docent). From 1900 to 1918 Krymskyi worked as a professor of Arabic literature and Oriental history at the Lazarev Institute. In 1896–98 he was in Syria and Lebanon. In 1918 he became a professor at Kiev University. In the autumn of 1918 he helped to found the All-Ukrainian Academy of Sciences (Ukraiinska Akademiya Nauk [UAN]) and served as the first UAN permanent secretary. Krymskyi greatly contributed to the development of the UAN, particularly its historical and philological department, which he directed until 1929, when he was forced to resign his post. In 1921–29 he was in charge of the Institute of Oriental Studies (Instytut Skhodoznavstva) in Kiev. In May 1928 the authorities did not approve his reelection to the post of permanent secretary of the UAN and soon abolished all the institutions that he directed. In 1930 Krymskyi was removed from scholarly and pedagogical work. Arrested in July 1941 by the NKVD, he was accused of nationalist anti-Soviet activities and imprisoned. The circumstances of his death are unclear.

Krymskyi wrote many scholarly works on the history and culture of Arab countries, Iran, and Turkey, including Istoriia musulmanstva (The history of Islam, 3 vols.; 1904–12); Istoriia Arabiv i arabskoy literatury svitskoyi i dukhovnoy (The history of the Arabs and Arabic secular and religious literature; 1911–12); Istoriia Persi ta yi pismenstva (The history of Persia and its literature; 1923); and Istoriia Turechchyny ta yi pismenstva (The history of Turkey and its literature; 1924–27). Krymskyi's interests also included the history of the Ukrainian language and literature, and his most important works in this field include Ukrainskaia gramatika (Ukrainian grammar; 1907) and Narysy z istorii ukraiiskoy movy (An outline of the history of the Ukrainian language; 1922 [co-authored by Oleksiy Shakhmatov]). Krymskyi's most important literary works include three volumes of lyrical poetry, Palmove hillia (Palm branches; 1901, 1908, and 1922); the collection Povistky i eskizy z ukraiinskoho zhyttia (Narratives and sketches from Ukrainian life; 1895); Beyrutski opovidannia (Beirut stories; 1906); and the novel Andriy Lahovskyi (1905; full edition, 1972). Krymskyi translated many Turkish and Persian literary works as well as literary classics into Ukrainian. (BB)

Sources: Encyclopedia of Ukraine, vol. 2 (Toronto, 1988); Dovidnyk z istorii Ukraïny (Kiev, 2001); Oleh Babyshkin, Ahatanhel Krymskyi (Kiev, 1967); Kazimir I. Gurnitskyi, Agatangel Efimovich Krymskyi (Moscow, 1980); Solomiia D. Pavlychko, Natsionalizm, seksualnist, orientalizm. Skladnyi svit Ahatanhela Krymskoho (Kiev, 2000).

KRYPYAKEVYCH Ivan (25 June 1886, Lemberg [Lwów, Lviv]–21 April 1967, Lviv, Ukraine), Ukrainian historian. In 1904 Krypyakevych graduated from high school in Lemberg, and in 1909 he completed studies at Lemberg University. In 1907 he was detained for taking part in the struggle for the Ukrainization of this university. Until 1914 Krypyakevych was influenced by Mykhailo Hrushevskyyi. Under Hrushevskyyi's guidance, in 1911 he earned a Ph.D. for a thesis about the Cossacks during Stefan Batory's times; Hrushevskyyi also shaped Krypyakevych's research interests, which included the history of the Cossacks and the history of Lviv and the Halych District from the thirteenth to the seventeenth centuries. Later their paths parted, as Hrushevskyyi remained involved in Narodnyk (national) historiography while Krypyakevych became closer to the so-called statehood approach to Ukrainian history. Because of his negative assessment of the historical role of Poland in the Ukraine, Krypyakevych could not hope to get a position at the University of Lwów, dominated by the Poles. From 1911 to 1939 he worked in Ukrainian and Polish high schools in Rohatyn, Lwów, and Żółkiew (now Zhovkva). He was involved in the work of the underground Ukrainian university in Lwów (1921–24) and lectured at the Greek Catholic Theological Academy (1934–39). His research work was mostly carried out within the framework of the Shevchenko Scientific Society (NTSh). In 1911 he became a full member of the NTSh and later also the president of its historical and philosophical commission. In 1934 he began editing Zapysky Naukovoho Tovarystva im. Shevchenka (ZNTSh).

Between 1925 and 1931 Krypyakevych wrote his pioneering work, Studii nad derzhavoiu Bohdana Khmelnytskoho (Studies on the rule of Bohdan Khmelnytskyi.). Ukrainska istoriografii (Ukrainian historiography), written in 1923, was another of his important works. Krypyakevych maintained relations with scholars from the Ukrainian SSR, and in 1929 he visited Kiev and Kharkiv. In 1931 these contacts were severed by the Soviets, and he was attacked as a "Fascist." In the 1930s, in collaboration with other historians, Krypyakevych wrote the syntheses Velyka istoriia Ukraïny (Great history of Ukraine; 1935); Istoriia ukraiinskoho viyska (The history of the Ukrainian Army; 1936); Istoriia ukraiinskoy kultury (The history of Ukrainian culture; 1937); and Vsesvitnia istoriia (General history; 1938–39). He also worked on his own synthesis, Istoriia Ukraïny (History of Ukraine), but it was not published until 1949 in Munich, with Krypyakevych using the pseudonym of Ivan Kholmnskyi.

As part of the Kremlin's pro-Ukrainian tactics after the annexation of Eastern Galicia in October 1939, Krypyakevych was appointed professor and took up the chair of Ukrainian history at Lviv University. In 1940 he became the director of the Lviv branch of the Historical Institute of the Academy of Sciences of the Ukrainian SSR. At that time the Soviet authorities abolished the NTSh. Krypyakevych continued his scholarly work during the German occupation of Lviv. When the Soviet authorities returned in 1944, he again assumed his former posts, but from 1946 to 1948 he worked at the central branch of the institute in Kiev since its Lviv branch had been closed. In 1948 he returned to Lviv and worked in an ethnographic museum. In 1953 he became the director of the Institute of Social Sciences of the Academy of Sciences of the Ukrainian SSR. In the post-war years he wrote the monograph Bohdan Khmelnytskyi (1954); the collection of source documents Dokumenty Bohdana Khmelnytskoho (1648–1657) (Documents of Bohdan Khmelnytskyi [1648–1657]; 1961); and Halych-Volynske kniazivstvo (The Halych-Volhynia Duchy; 1984). In 1958 Krypyakevych was elected a full member of the Academy of Sciences of the Ukrainian SSR. All together, he published over five hundred historical works. (TS)

Sources: Encyclopedia of Ukraine, vol. 2 (Toronto, 1988); D. Doroshenko and O. Ohlobyn, "A Survey of Ukrainian Historiography," Annals of the Ukrainian Academy of Arts and Sciences in the US, vols. 5–6 (New York, 1957); I. Dashkevych, "Ivan Krypyakevych: Istoryk Ukraïny," in I. Krypyakevych, Istoriia Ukraïny (Lviv, 1990).

KRZAKLEWSKI Marian (23 August 1950, Kolbuszowa), Polish trade union activist and politician. Krzaklewski graduated from the Department of Automatics of the Silesian Polytechnic in Gliwice. In 1976–84 he worked at the Department of Complex Automatic Systems of the Polish Academy of Sciences (PAS) in Gliwice. From 1985 he worked at the Katowice branch of the Silesian Polytechnic. In 1986 he received a Ph.D. in computerizing industrial processes. From August 1980 he belonged to Solidarity, and from September 1980 he was deputy chairman of the PAS Upper Silesian Coordination Commission of Solidarity. From the beginning of martial law in December 1981, Krzaklewski worked in the secret PAS commission and with the regional underground structures of the union. He also edited its publications. In 1985 he was arrested and sentenced for trade union activity. Amnestied in 1986, he was forced to leave the PAS. From 1986 he belonged to the Silesian underground structure of Solidarity and was responsible for the printing and distribution of publications. From 1989 he belonged to the National Executive Commission of Solidarity and to the Civic Committee of the Chairman of Solidarity. He was secretary of the Silesian Regional Civic Committee; when Lech Wałęsa was elected president, in February 1991 Krzaklewski was elected chairman of Solidarity. From 1991 he was a member of the board of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions. In 1996 he co-organized Solidarity Electoral Action (Akcja Wyborcza Solidarność [AWS]), which united small and fragmented centrist and right-wing parties and won the parliamentary elections in September 1997. An MP on behalf of the AWS and chairman of its parliamentary club, Krzaklewski substantially influenced the policies of the government of Jerzy Buzek. In 1997–2001 he belonged to the Polish delegation to the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe and was deputy chairman of the Group of the European People's Party. An AWS candidate in the presidential elections of October 2000, Krzaklewski won 15.6 percent of the vote, coming in third. In 2001 he co-initiated the AWS–Solidarity of the Right, which lost the parliamentary elections of September 2001, failing to reach the required 5 percent threshold. In September 2002 Krzaklewski lost in the elections for Solidarity chairman, but he remained in the union's leadership. (IS)

Sources: Janusz A. Majcherek, Pierwsza dekada III Rzeczypospolitej (Warsaw, 1999); Antoni Dudek, Pierwsze lata III Rzeczypospolitej 1989–2001 (Kraków, 2002); Wojciech Roszkowski, Historia Polski 1914–2001 (Warsaw, 2002).

KRZYŻANOWSKI Adam (19 January 1873, Kraków–29 January 1963, Kraków), Polish economist and politician. Krzyżanowski was the son of a bookseller from a landed gentry family. After graduating from high school in Kraków, he studied law and administration at the Jagiellonian University (Uniwersytet Jagielloński [UJ]), earning a doctorate in 1894. The following year he studied in Berlin and Leipzig, attending lectures by such scholars as Gustav Schmoller. In 1895 he published his first treatise on the social and economic aspects of the parceling out of land. From 1896 to 1904 Krzyżanowski worked in the Kraków Agricultural Society, publishing a number of works on economic and agricultural issues, including Projekt reformy agrarnej (Agrarian reform proposal; 1897), Studia agrarne (Agrarian studies; 1900), and Rolnictwo wobec polityki handlowej (Agriculture and trade policy; 1901). Krzyżanowski was influenced by the German Historical School and “Academic Socialism” (Kathedersozialismus), although he was also a member of the Conservative Club. In 1908 he received his postdoctoral degree, and in 1911 he published the theoretical work Pieniądz (Money). In 1916 he became a professor of state finance at the UJ. During World War I, Krzyżanowski changed his interests and views, drifting toward the neo-liberal school in Socjalizm a prawo natury (Socialism and natural law; 1911), Gospodarka wojenna (War economy; 1919), and Założenia ekonomiki (Principles of economics; 1919).

During the first years of independence, Krzyżanowski published a great deal on inflation, taking a stance as its opponent and as an advocate of reductions in budget expenditures. His works Bolszewizm (Bolshevism; 1920); Socjalizm po wojnie (Socialism after the war; 1920); Waluta i kredyt (Currency and credit; 1921); and Walka z drożyzną (Struggle against high prices; 1922) consolidated his position as a prominent Polish economist and leader of the so-called liberal Kraków school. He criticized the treasury and currency reform implemented by Władysław Grabski, as he believed that it would fail without foreign assistance. Krzyżanowski did not change his stance after the initial success of this reform and considered the so-called second inflation in 1925 a confirmation of his opinion. He believed that the weakness of the Polish economy was a result of the lack of capital. Hoping the coup of May 1926 would bring about political stabilization, Krzyżanowski assumed the post of head of the Polish bureau of the Edwin Kemmerer mission. He negotiated the terms of the American loan, which was finalized in the autumn of 1927. In 1928 he was elected an MP representing the Nonparty Bloc of Cooperation with the Government (Bezpartyjny Blok Współpracy z Rządem [BBWR]), a political organization that supported the sanacja regime, and he was in charge of the Treasury Committee of the Assembly. Krzyżanowski was one of the few economists who foresaw the great economic crisis. In 1930, despite his critical attitude toward the BBWR, he again represented the BBWR in the 1930 parliamentary elections, in which he won a seat. However, he refused to support the position of the BBWR parliamentary representation in a vote on the detention of opposition leaders, and in February 1931 he resigned his seat. In 1932 he sent a memorandum to the authorities in which he urged that the deflation policy be abandoned, and in 1937 he even called for the introduction of controlled inflation to stimulate economic development. However, he was an avowed opponent of economic statism. In politics, Krzyżanowski drifted toward the Union of Conservative Political Organizations. He again became involved in social issues, publishing Demograficzne oblicze kryzysu (Demographic aspects of the crisis; 1932); Moralność współczesna (Contemporary morality; 1935); and Dolar i złoty (The dollar and the złoty; 1936). From 1933–34 to 1937–38 Krzyżanowski was deputy rector of the UJ. As a scholarly authority, he opposed the anti-Semitic excesses of some universities.

Arrested along with other UJ professors by the Nazis on 6 November 1939, after the German invasion of Poland, Krzyżanowski was sent to the Sachsenhausen concentration camp. Released in February 1940, he was involved in underground academic teaching in Kraków. Invited by the Yalta Good Offices Commission, he took part in Moscow negotiations that led to the establishment of the Communist-dominated Provisional Government of National Unity in June 1945. He was also co-opted to the National Home Council (Krajowa Rada Narodowa [KRN]). In the rigged elections of January 1947 Krzyżanowski obtained a seat from the slate of the Democratic Party (Stronnictwo Demokratyczne [SD]). He also served as chairman of the SD Provincial Committee in Kraków. After the Stalinization of the universities, Krzyżanowski was retired, despite objections of the UJ Senate in December 1948. On 12 July 1949 he resigned his parliamentary seat and his party position. At that time he published Wiek XX: Zarys dziejów najnowszych (The Twentieth Century: An outline of recent history; 1947) and Chrześcijańska moralność polityczna (Christian political morality; 1948). Banned from publishing his works after 1949, Krzyżanowski worked on his memoirs, a history of nineteenth- and twentieth-century Poland, a history of Russia, and “Nauka o ludności” (Population studies), which remained in manuscript form. After October 1956 he resumed lecturing at the UJ. He was also elected president of the Polish Academy of Arts and Sciences (Polska Akademia Umiejętności), which was revived for a short time. Active in the Club of Catholic Intellectuals in Kraków, in 1958 Krzyżanowski was awarded an honorary doctorate by the UJ. (WR) Sources: PSB, vol. 15; Encyklopedia historii gospodarczej Polski do 1945 roku, vol. 1 (Warsaw, 1981); Encyklopedia historii Drugiej Rzeczypospolitej (Warsaw, 1999); Ferdynand Zweig, Adam Krzyżanowski (Kraków, 1937).

KRZYŻANOWSKI Aleksander, pseudonym “Wilk” (18 February 1885, Bryansk–29 September 1951, Warsaw), colonel of the Polish Home Army. During World War I Krzyżanowski served in the Russian Army and in the First Polish Corps of General Józef Dowbór-Muśnicki. In 1919–20 he took part in the Polish-Soviet war. Decorated with the Cross of the Brave for his action at Lida, after the war he remained in the army. During the coup of May 1926 he sided with the government; therefore after the victory of Józef Piłsudski, he considered retirement from the service. Krzyżanowski remained and commanded different units of artillery in Bydgoszcz, Prużany, and Tarnopol. In 1934 he was promoted to major. In the September campaign of 1939 he commanded Poznań, an artillery unit in the twenty-sixth army regiment. In October 1939 he was sent from Warsaw to Wilno (Vilnius) with a mission to organize and subordinate the local conspiracy against the command of the Polish Victory Service (Służba Zwycięstwu Polski [SZP]). Krzyżanowski assumed the post of chief of staff and deputy district commander of the SZP in Wilno. When in June 1940 the Red Army entered the city, he escaped arrest.

After the imprisonment of his superior, Colonel Nikodem Sulik, in May 1941, Krzyżanowski assumed the command of the Wilno District of the Union of Armed Struggle (Związek Walki Zbrojnej [ZWZ]). After the German invasion of the USSR he considerably developed the military conspiracy in the Wilno region. He also tried, in vain, to come to terms with representatives of the local Lithuanians and Belorussians. From mid-1943 the Home Army (Armia Krajowa [AK]) in the Wilno region steadily moved from organizational and diversionary activities toward armed struggle. This was also dictated by the increasing activity of the Soviet guerrillas, who acted against the AK. In January 1944 Krzyżanowski negotiated an agreement with the commander of the Soviet guerrilla group in the Wilno area, but already in February 1944 the agreement was broken by a guerrilla attack on the fifth brigade of the AK. In the face of the approaching Soviet offensive, Krzyżanowski held talks with representatives of German intelligence, aiming at an exchange of captives and at gaining reconnaissance about German positions. However, no agreements were reached. During Operation Burza (Tempest) Krzyżanowski commanded the units of the Home Army of the Wilno District. In July 1944 he agreed with the commander of the Third Belorussian Front on cooperation in the Wilno operation. The operation was successful. After capturing Wilno, the commander of the front invited Krzyżanowski and his chief of staff to negotiate. They both were arrested, like most officers of the district who were gathered in Bogusze. On 28 September 1944, while in prison, Krzyżanowski was promoted to the rank of colonel by the Polish commander-in-chief and was decorated with the Order of Virtuti Militari by the chief commander of the AK. Krzyżanowski was transported from Wilno to Butyrki Prison and in October 1946 to the camp in Diagilevo. On 17 August 1947 he escaped from there but was arrested in Wilno. After a short inquiry in Moscow, in November 1947 he was evacuated to Poland, and he arrived in Gdańsk.

Krzyżanowski then assumed the post of director of a scutching plant in Pakość, near Mogilno. On 3 July 1948 he was arrested there by the Communist security police and transported to the prison on Rakowiecka Street in Warsaw. He was falsely charged with collaboration with the Germans, the liquidation of Communist activists, and the continuation of postwar underground activities. After three years of investigation, in which he did not plead guilty, Krzyżanowski died in prison as a result of tuberculosis and exhaustion. (WR)

Sources: PSB, vol. 15; Krzysztof Tarka, "Pułkownik Aleksander Krzyżanowski 'Wilk'—Komendant Okręgu Wileńskiego Związku Walki Zbrojnej—Armii Krajowej," Zeszyty Naukowe Uniwersytetu Polskiego, 1996.

KUBILIŪNAS Petras (16 May 1894, Rokiškis–22 August 1946, Moscow), Lithuanian officer and politician. After graduating from the Military Academy in Vilnius (1914), Kubiliūnas served in the Russian Army during World War I. In 1919 he returned to Lithuania, where he joined the army and took part in military operations on the front lines. From 1925 to 1927 he studied in the Military Academy in Prague, and in 1929 he was appointed chief of the general staff with the rank of colonel in the Lithuanian Army. In 1934 Kubiliūnas joined the supporters of Augustinas Voldemaras. After the failure of an attempted coup d'état by Voldemaras in May of that year, Kubiliūnas was arrested and sentenced to death. President Antanas Smetona exercised his power of pardon, and the sentence was commuted to life imprisonment, and then it was quashed in 1936. Arrested after the Soviet invasion of Lithuania in June 1940, Kubiliūnas avoided deportation and was released when the Germans seized Lithuania in June 1941. In August 1941 he was appointed first general counselor to the Nazi commissioner-general of Lithuania, Theodor von Renteln. The highest-ranking Lithuanian collaborator with the German authorities-in-occupation, Kubiliūnas was widely criticized by pro-independence Lithuanians for his unconditional submissiveness to the occupiers, especially after he applied for German citizenship in 1943.

He called on the Lithuanians to join the Reichsarbeitsdienst and auxiliary Lithuanian units that fought on the side of the German Army against the Soviets. Because the Lithuanians generally remembered the Soviet occupation as worse than the Nazi occupation, toward the end of the war Kubiliūnas's urgings achieved considerable results. In the summer of 1944 Kubiliūnas withdrew along with the German Army, and after the end of the war he settled in the British zone of occupation in Germany. Abducted by the Soviet services in December 1945, Kubiliūnas was taken to Moscow, where, after long interrogations and tortures, he was sentenced to death and executed. (WR)

Sources: EL, vol. 3; Saulius Sužiedelis, Historical Dictionary of Lithuania (Lanham, Md., 1997).

KUBILIUS Andrius (8 December 1956, Vilnius), Lithuanian politician. In 1979 Kubilius graduated in physics from Vilnius University, and in 1979–90 he worked there as an assistant professor. In 1988 he joined the Lithuanian Movement for Perestroika (Sajūdis). He became known as an efficient organizer, good in human relations, so he was elected executive secretary of the Sajūdis. After Lithuania regained independence in 1991, in 1992 Kubilius was elected to the parliament. After Sajūdis, a party emerged called the Homeland Union–Lithuanian Conservatives (Tėvynės Sąjunga–Lietuvos Konservatoriai); for a short time Kubilius headed its parliamentary club. After the electoral victory of this party in October and November 1996, he became speaker of the parliament and head of its European commission. From 3 November 1999 to 26 October 2000 Kubilius was prime minister. He resigned after his party lost the elections of October 2000, but he won a seat and stayed an MP. (WR)

Sources: Richard J. Krickus, Showdown: The Lithuanian Rebellion and the Breakup of the Soviet Empire (Washington, D.C., 1997); www.rulers.org; www.lrs.lt; www.tlst.lt.

KUBINA Teodor Filip (16 April 1890, Świętochłowice–13 February 1951, Częstochowa), Polish bishop. The son of a miner, Kubina graduated from high school in Königshütte (Królewska Huta). From 1901 he studied at the Theological Department of Breslau (Wrocław) University and at the Collegium Germano-Hungaricum in Rome, where he received a Ph.D. in philosophy in 1904. Later he defended another Ph.D. dissertation in theology at the Gregorianum University in Rome. Contacts with Polish Jesuits strengthened his Polish consciousness and encouraged him to improve his Polish. Ordained in Rome in October 1906, after returning home Kubina worked as a vicar in Königshütte and was active in Polish social organizations. As a result, in 1911 he was transferred to Berlin, where he was a minister to Polish workers. In September 1917, he was the first Pole to become parish priest of the Holy Virgin Mary parish in Kattowitz (Katowice). After World War I Kubina actively supported the incorporation of Upper Silesia into Poland (for instance, as head of the Silesian Academic Union). At the end of 1920 he took part in a delegation of the Polish Plebiscite Commissariat to Rome, aimed at convincing the Holy See that Polish priests should participate in the plebiscite campaign. For his nationalist activities Kubina became the target of German fighting squadrons. After the plebiscite and division of Upper Silesia, Kubina joined the Supreme National Council in the Polish part of the region, and in 1923 he became the first editor-in-chief of the weekly Gość Niedzielny. After the creation of the Częstochowa diocese, on 14 December 1925 he was appointed its first ordinary bishop. In this capacity he organized diocese institutions and founded the weekly Niedziela. In 1926 he visited the Polish American communities. In 1931 he established the Society of Polish Emigrants under the Protection of the Queen of the Polish Crown. Kubina developed charity work among the poorest, especially in the Dąbrowa industrial region. His work Akcja katolicka a akcja społeczna (Catholic action and social action; 1930), as well as his pastoral letters from the time of the Great Depression, belong among the sharpest Church criticisms of social and political relations in Poland. As a result Kubina even had to explain his position in the Roman Curia, where he was suspected of stimulating social radicalism.

During the German occupation Kubina stayed in Częstochowa, organizing the religious life of the diocese, which was divided by the border between the Reich and the General Gouvernement (the official name of the Nazi occupation authority in Poland). He supported various charity efforts and maintained contact with the delegate of the Polish Government-in-Exile for the Homeland. He co-authored a memorandum of bishops on 25 May 1940 that demanded freedom for the Church from the German authorities. He organized a ministry among Polish forced laborers in Germany—for instance, by financing the Polish Protective Committee. He also organized aid for the Polish refugees from Warsaw, especially after the suppression of the Warsaw Uprising in the fall of 1944. In 1945 Kubina elaborated a new administrative division of his diocese, reorganized the Episcopal curia, and founded the diocese charity committee, Caritas. In 1946 he joined in signing a letter condemning the Kielce pogrom. After 1945 he repeatedly spoke in defense of religious freedom. Kubina authored more than two hundred books and articles. (AGr)

Sources: PSB, vol. 16; Słownik biograficzny katolicyzmu społecznego w Polsce, vol. 2 (Warsaw, 1994), Słownik biograficzny katolickiego duchowieństwa śląskiego XIX i XX wieku (Katowice, 1996); Jan Żaryn, Kościół a władza w Polsce (1945–1950) (Warsaw, 1992).

KUBIYOVYCH Volodymyr (23 September 1900, Nowy Sącz—2 November 1985, Sarcelles, near Paris), Ukrainian geographer, demographer, encyclopedist, and political activist. Kubyovych began studying at the Jagiellonian University in Kraków in 1918 and completed his studies in 1923, after a break caused by his participation in the Polish-Ukrainian war. From 1918 to 1919 he served in the artillery in the Ukrainian Galician Army. In 1928 he became an associate professor (docent) at the Jagiellonian University. In 1931 he was elected a full member of the Shevchenko Scientific Society (NTSh) and headed its geographic commission. In 1939 he was dismissed as docent at the Jagiellonian University. During the war, in 1940 Kubyovych was appointed professor at the Ukrainian Free University in Prague, and in April of the same year he became head of the Ukrainian Central Committee (Ukrayiiivskyi Tsentralnyi Komitet [UCC]) in Kraków, which coordinated the work of Ukrainian social and cultural organizations in German-occupied Poland. In April 1943 Kubyovych was one of the initiators and then head of the Military Board (Viyskova Uprava) in Lviv, which was in charge of organizing the Ukrainian Division of the Ukrainian National Army (SS Galizien division). In 1944 he appealed for an end to the hostilities between the Poles and the Ukrainians. From 1945 Kubyovych lived in exile, where he devoted himself mostly to scholarly work. He was the initiator and chief editor of Entsyklopediia Ukrainoznavstva, whose three general volumes were published in 1949–52 and eleven alphabetical volumes in 1952–95. He also edited and contributed numerous entries to the six-volume Encyclopedia of Ukraine (Toronto, 1984–93). From 1947 to 1963 Kubyovych served as secretary general of the NTSh abroad, and from 1952 until his death he was president of the NTSh in Europe.

In his scholarly work, Kubyovych's interest turned to the anthropogeography of the Carpathian region and to the demographic processes in Galicia, the Carpathian region, Volhynia, and the Pripet Marshes. He was the author of nearly eighty scholarly works, including Życie pasterskie w Beskidach Wschodnich (Pastoral life in the Eastern Beskyds; 1926); Terytoriia i liudnist ukraiivskykh zemel (The territory and population of the Ukrainian lands; 1935); Atlas Ukrainy i sumezhnykh krayiv (An atlas of Ukraine and adjacent countries; 1937); Heohrafiia ukraiivskykh i sumezhnykh zemel (A geography of Ukraine and adjacent lands; 1938); and Etnichni hrupy Pivdenno-zakhidnoyi Ukrainy (Halychyny) (Ethnic groups of Southwestern Ukraine [Galicia]; 1953).

Kubiyovych was also the author of wall maps of the Ukraine and Galicia. His memoirs include Meni 70 (I am 70; 1970) and Ukrainci v Heneralniy Hubernyi 1939–41 (Ukrainians in the General Gouvernment 1939–41; 1975). (BB)

Sources: Encyclopedia of Ukraine, vol. 2 (Toronto, 1988); Entsyklopediia Ukraïnoznavstva, vol. 4 (Lviv, 1994); Dovidnyk z istorii Ukraïny (Kiev, 2001); Vydatni diiachi Ukraïny mynulykh stolit (Kiev, 2001); Malyi slovnyk istorii Ukraïny (Kiev, 1997); Oleh Shablyi, Volodymyr Kubiyovych: Entsyklopediia zhyttia i tvorennia (Paris and Lviv, 1996).

KUČAN Milan (14 January 1941, Krizevci), Slovene Communist activist and post-Communist politician, president of Slovenia. The son of a teacher, at the age of three Kučan lost his father, who was killed by the Nazis. He graduated in law from the University of Ljubljana. From 1958 he belonged to the Communist Party of Slovenia, and from 1964 he was active in the Slovene Youth Union. In 1968–69 he was its chairman. From 1969 to 1973 Kučan was a member of the Secretariat of the Central Committee (CC) of the League of Communists of Slovenia (LCS); in 1973–78 he was secretary of the Socialist Union of Working People (Socialistična Zveza Delovnega Ljudstva), and then he was chairman of the Assembly of the Slovene Socialist Republic. From 1982 to 1986 he represented Slovenia in the Presidium of the CC of the League of Communists of Yugoslavia, and from 1986 to 1989 he was chairman of the LCS CC. At this time Kučan supported political reforms and the liberalization of social life. He tolerated the development of new political movements that led to the so-called Slovene Spring of 1988. In April 1990 Kučan became chairman of the Presidium of the Slovene Republic. He supported the declaration of Slovene independence on 25 June 1991, taking the lead of the new state. After the beginning of the Yugoslav People's Army (YPA) intervention, Kučan declared he would resist it by all available means. He took part in the negotiations that led to the agreement of Brioni of 7 July 1991. Yugoslav leader Slobodan Milošević agreed that the YPA would leave Slovenia, where, unlike Croatia or Bosnia-Herzegovina, there was no Serb population.

In December 1992 Kučan was elected president of Slovenia by a 64 percent majority of the vote. In November 1997 he was reelected in the first round, gaining 56 percent of the vote. His second term was over in December 2002. In foreign policy Kučan represented a definitely pro-Western line. He not only managed to avoid Slovenia's involvement in the war in the former Yugoslavia, but he also established good relations with all of Slovenia's neighbors. Kučan fully supported efforts by the government of Janez Drnovšek that aimed at the integration of Slovenia into NATO and the European Union. On 10 June 1996 Slovenia signed an association treaty with the union, and in March 1998 accession talks began. Although Slovenia was not included in the first round of NATO enlargements in 1999, Kučan continued with efforts that ultimately led to the country's entry into NATO and the European Union in 2004. Kučan also supported the systemic transformation of Slovenia from a command to a market economy and from totalitarianism to democracy. In surveys by Slovene Public Opinion in 1995 and 1998, Kučan was recognized as the third most important figure in all of Slovene history. (AO)

Sources: Enciklopedija Slovenije, vol. 6 (Ljubljana, 1992); Jill Benderly and Evan Kraft, eds., Independent Slovenia: Origins, Movements, Prospects (London, 1994); Leopoldina Plut-Pregelj and Carole Rogel, Historical Dictionary of Slovenia (Lanham, Md., 1996); Warren Zimmermann, Origins of a Catastrophe (New York and Toronto, 1996); Bugajski; www.sigov.si/up-rs/enpredmk.htm.

KUCCHARZEWSKI Jan (27 May 1876, Wysokie Mazowieckie—4 July 1952, New York), Polish politician, lawyer, and historian. Born into an intellectual family, Kucharzewski received a law degree from Warsaw University (1898) and then completed further studies in law, sociology, and economics in Berlin. He subsequently worked as an attorney. He lectured in law and political economics at the Society for Scientific Courses. He was a member of the Union of Polish Youth called Zet. From 1905 to 1908 he was active in the National Democratic Party (Stronnictwo Narodowo-Demokratyczne [SND]) and from 1905 to 1911 in the National League. Kucharzewski severed his ties with the national parties after they decided that Germany, rather than Russia, was the biggest threat to Poland. During World War I, in Switzerland from 1914 to 1917, Kucharzewski promoted the cause of Polish independence. After the issue (on 5 November 1916) of the Two Emperors' Manifesto, which proclaimed the creation of a Polish kingdom under German control, he began favoring the Central Powers. After returning to Poland, he started working in the organs of the Provisional Council of State in June 1917 and later in the Regency Council in Warsaw. From 26 November 1917 to 11 February 1918 Kucharzewski served as prime minister of the government of the Kingdom of Poland. He resigned in protest against the Treaty of Brest-Litovsk. In February 1918 he became a member of the board of the Union for the Establishment of the Polish State. On 2 October 1918 he was again designated prime minister but gave up the task of forming a government.

After 1920 Kucharzewski withdrew from politics and devoted himself to scholarly and journalistic pursuits.

In general, though, he supported the policies of Józef Piłsudski. He considered Soviet Russia to be the greatest threat to Poland. He supported a plan for a wide federation of East Central European countries. In April 1940 he left occupied Poland. After a stay in Italy, France, and Portugal, in July 1940 he settled in the United States, where he was active as a journalist and scholar. Kucharzewski helped to establish the Polish Institute of Arts and Sciences of America (Polski Instytut Naukowy w Ameryce [PIASA]), and in 1942 he became president of its board. From 1911 he belonged to the Warsaw Scientific Society and from 1926 to the Polish Academy of Arts and Sciences (Polska Akademia Umiejętności). He was an independent researcher and was not connected to any university. Kucharzewski was initially interested in law and sociology, but from World War I on he focused his attention on the history of nineteenth-century Poland and Russia. In his works he analyzed the ideology and methods of the Russian revolutionary movement. He argued that Bolshevism was the continuation of tsarist despotism. Kucharzewski was the author of many highly acclaimed works on Polish and Russian history, including Socjalizm prawniczy (Legal socialism; 1906); Narodowość a państwo (Nationality and the state; 1907); Sprawa polska w parlamencie frankfurckim, 1848 r. (The Polish cause in the Frankfurt parliament; 1908); and particularly the unfinished monumental work Od białego caratu do czerwonego (From white to the red tsarism, 7 vols.; 1923–35) and The Origins of Modern Russia (1948). (JS)

Sources: PSB, vol. 16; Oskar Halecki, “Śp. Jan Kucharzewski,” Teki historyczne, vol. 5, 1952; W. Kamieniecki, Historycy i politycy warszawscy, 1900–1950 (Warsaw, 1992); Encyklopedia Historii Polski: Dzieje polityczne, vol. 1 (Warsaw, 1994); Krzysztof Dybciak and Zdzisław Kudelski, eds., Leksykon kultury polskiej poza krajem od roku 1939 (Lublin, 2000).

KUCHMA Leonid (9 August 1938, Chaykyne, Chernihiv region), Ukrainian Communist activist and post-Communist politician. In 1955–60 Kuchma studied at the Department of Physics and Technology of the Dniepropetrovsk university, where he specialized in rocket technology. From 1960 to 1972 he was an engineer, and then until 1975, he was deputy chief engineer at the Pivdenne (South) Design Office, which produced SS-18 and SS-24 rockets, as well as Kosmos, Interkosmos, Tsyklon, and Zenith rockets and various types of satellites. Kuchma was also technical director of Soviet rocket testing at the Baykonur cosmodrome. In 1975–81 he was secretary of the party committee in the Pivdenne office, and in 1981–82, secretary of the party committee of the Southern Production Association of Machine Construction (Vyrobynye Obyednannia Pivdennyi Mashynobudivnyi Zavod [SPAMC]). In 1982–86 Kuchma was first deputy engineer designer of the Pivdenne office, and from 1986 to 1992, general director of the SPAMC, which was then one of the largest armaments factories in the world. In 1990–92 Kuchma was a deputy to the Supreme Council of the Ukrainian SSR and from 1991 of Ukraine. He also belonged to the council’s Commission of Defense and Security.

From 13 October 1992 to 22 September 1993 Kuchma was prime minister and a member of the Council of National Security. A supporter of economic reforms, he found himself in conflict with a more conservative president, Leonid Kravchuk. After leaving the government, Kuchma headed the Ukrainian Union of Industrialists and Entrepreneurs (Ukraiinskyi Soyuz Promyslovtsiv ta Pidpriemtsiv), gaining the full support of the economic administration, especially in the armaments sector. In March 1994 he was reelected to the Supreme Council, where he belonged to the Inter-Regional Group of deputies and co-chaired the Constitutional Commission.

In July 1994 Kuchma was elected president, gaining 52.2 percent of the vote in the second round and defeating Kravchuk. He assumed the office on 19 July 1994. One of his main successes was the passing of a new constitution by the Supreme Council on 28 June 1996. Kuchma followed a cautious foreign policy, maintaining correct relations with the West and Poland, which he treated as a bridge to the West, and with Russia, with which Ukraine was closely connected in economic terms. During his term the foundations of Ukrainian statehood were strengthened, as were the state capitalist structures, which he skillfully steered. In November 1999 Kuchma was reelected, gaining 56.3 percent of the vote in the second round. In the fall of 2000 the Socialist leader Oleksandr Moroz accused Kuchma of having masterminded the kidnapping and murder of a journalist, Georgi Gongadze. In 2002 protests against his rule reached mass dimensions. Participants at huge rallies demanded Kuchma’s resignation. Suspected of selling Kolchuga radar systems to Iraq, Kuchma was also isolated internationally, but he survived the crisis. During the elections in the fall of 2004 he supported Victor Yanukovich, but after an election fraud was disclosed, Kuchma agreed to repeating the second round. In January 2005 Kuchma finally turned presidential power over to the newly elected Viktor Yushchenko. (BB)

Sources: Khto ye khto v Ukraini 2000 (Kiev, 2000); Leonid Lukanov, Tretyi prezident: Politychnyi portret Leonida Kuchmy (Kiev, 1996); Andrzej Chojnowski, Ukraina (Warsaw, 1997); Ihor Sharov, 100 vydatnykh imen Ukrainy (Kiev, 1999); Bohdan Nahaylo, The Ukrainian Resurgence (Toronto, 1999); Bugajski; Dmytro Czobit, Chas pidlod vlady abo Chy ye “Sprava Honhadze” spravoyu Kuchmy? (Kiev, 2001); www.president.gov.ua.

KUHARIĆ Franjo (15 April 1919, Gornji Pribić, near Krasić–11 March 2002, Zagreb), Croatian cardinal. The son of a peasant, after elementary school Kuharić graduated from a theological seminary in Šalati, near Zagreb, in 1939. Later he studied philosophy and theology in the higher theological seminary in Zagreb. In July 1945 he was ordained by Archbishop Alojzije Stepinac. In 1946 he administered the Rakov Potok parish, whose parish priest was killed by the Communists. In 1947 Kuharić barely avoided an attempt on his own life. For some time he went into hiding, and in 1948 he was wounded during a pilgrimage to the Marija Bistrica sanctuary. From 1950 Kuharić was parish priest in Okiča. In December 1956 he was repeatedly interrogated by the security office in Zagreb because of alleged counterrevolutionary activities. From 1957 he was parish priest in Sambor, and on 30 May 1964 Archbishop Franjo Šeper consecrated him bishop. Kuharić participated in the Second Vatican Council. He was editor-in-chief of the bi-weekly Glas Koncila, transforming it into an opinion-shaping weekly with a circulation of more than one hundred thousand. After Cardinal Šeper became prefect of the Congregation of the Doctrine of Faith, in 1969 Pope Paul VI appointed Kuharić apostolic administrator of the Zagreb metropolis, and on 16 June 1970, archbishop of Zagreb. For more than fifteen years Kuharić also presided over the Conference of Yugoslav Bishops. During his term he created sixty new parishes and erected twenty-three new churches. He initiated the renovation of many sacral buildings, including the Gothic cathedral of Zagreb. Kuharić prepared and led the celebration of the 1,300th anniversary of Christianity in Croatia, which ended with a national eucharistic congress in Marija Bistrica in 1984. Kuharić opposed the propagation of atheism in the schools and demanded freedom of religion. He developed a ministry for the Croatian diaspora worldwide. The Communist authorities labeled him a “provocateur” and an “enemy of the system” for his public denunciations of Communist policies. On 2 February 1983 Pope John Paul II appointed him cardinal, which the Communist authorities considered a “hostile act” toward Yugoslavia.

In the summer of 1991 Kuharić supported Croatian efforts at independence. He contributed to the recognition of the Croatian state by the Holy See. From the beginning of the war in the former Yugoslavia, Kuharić was engaged in the defense of human rights and demanded international sanctions against the aggressors. He maintained contacts with Orthodox and Muslim clergy. For instance, he met with Patriarch Pavle, head of the Serbian Orthodox Church, and together they appealed for a termination of military operations. Kuharić organized assistance for the refugees from territories occupied by the Yugoslav Army and Serbian squadrons. He also condemned war crimes committed by Croatian soldiers against Bosnian Muslims during the war in Bosnia-Herzegovina. In 1994 Kuharić visited a besieged Sarajevo, where he met with the Patriarch of Moscow, Alexey II. In July 1995 he supported the Croatian military action in Krajina, inhabited mostly by Serbs; this raised some controversy. When the Conference of the Croatian Episcopate was created in May 1993, Kuharić became its chairman. In October 1994 he organized the pilgrimage of John Paul II on the occasion of the 900th anniversary of the Zagreb metropolis. Kuharić repeatedly defended the memory of Cardinal Stepinac, slandered by the Communists as a Croatian nationalist and alleged war criminal. Kuharić started Stepinac’s beatification trial, which ended on 3 November 1998 with the proclamation that Stepinac was blessed. In 1997 John Paul II accepted Kuharić’s retirement. (AGr)

Sources: Darko Pavčić, Razgovori s kardinalom (Zagreb, 1995); Annuario Pontificio, 2002; Polish Catholic Information Agency, 11 and 12 March 2002; Glas Koncila, 17 March 2002; www.catholic-hierarchy.org.

KUKABAKA Mikhas (1936, Babruysk), Belorussian dissident. Kukabaka’s father perished in the Finnish-Soviet war in 1939, and his mother, engaged in pro-independence guerrilla activities, died of wounds in 1947. Kukabaka was brought up in an orphanage. He graduated from a trade school, and in 1953 he was sent to work on the construction of an oil refinery on the Angara River in Siberia. Then he served in the army and worked as an electrician in Babruysk. Kukabaka started political activities in March 1968, when he protested the Warsaw Pact invasion of Czechoslovakia. He repeatedly protested the Russification of Belorussia. Arrested in 1970, he was detained and released many times. All together he spent more than seventeen years in prison, including seven years in psychiatric wards in Sychovka and Mogilev, owing to a so-called schizophrenia without symptoms. In 1977 Kukabaka gave up his Soviet citizenship and applied for emigration from the USSR, but in vain. He was not allowed to leave until December 1988. Kukabaka settled in Moscow, where he wrote and published announcements and political essays. (EM)

Sources: S. P. de Boer, E. J. Driessen, and H. L. Verhaar, eds., Biographical Dictionary of Dissidents in the Soviet Union, 1956–1975 (The Hague and Boston, 1982); Jan Zaprudnik, Historical Dictionary of Belarus (Lanham, Md., 1998); Karta, 2002, no. 34.

KUKAN Eduard (26 December 1939, Horný Jatov), Slovak politician. Kukan graduated from the Moscow Institute of International Relations in 1964, and later he received a Ph.D. in law from Charles University in Prague. From 1964 he worked in the Foreign Ministry, and in 1968–73 he was attaché, second secretary, and chargé d'affaires in Lusaka, Zambia. Later he served as councillor and deputy ambassador in the United States; from 1981 to 1985 he was director of the Department of Sub-Saharan Africa; in 1985–88 he was ambassador to Ethiopia; then until 1990 he was director of the Department of Latin America in the Foreign Ministry. From the early 1960s to 1989 Kukan belonged to the Czechoslovak Communist Party. In 1990 he was appointed ambassador to the United Nations. From the breakup of Czechoslovakia in January 1993 to 1994 he was Slovak ambassador to the United Nations. In March 1994 Kukan became minister of foreign affairs in the government of Jozef Moravčík. In the early parliamentary elections of September 1994 he won a seat on behalf of the Democratic Union of Slovakia (Demokratická Únie Slovenska [DUS]), which he joined in March 1995. He sat on the parliamentary foreign affairs and European integration commissions. In December 1994, when the government of Moravčík collapsed, Kukan resigned from his position.

In March 1997 Kukan was elected chairman of the DUS. One of the architects of an agreement among opposition parties and of the formation of the Slovak Democratic Coalition (Slovenská Demokratická Koalícia [SDK]), he became its deputy chairman in July 1998. After the elections of September 1998 and an SDK victory, in late October 1998 Kukan became foreign minister again. He had considerable influence on the pro-Western reorientation of Slovak foreign policy, aimed at making up for time lost during the Vladimír Mečiar regime. Slovakia began to be perceived as a serious candidate for the European Union and NATO. In 1999–2001 Kukan was an envoy of UN Secretary General Kofi Annan to the Balkans. After another electoral victory of the center and right parties in the elections of September 2002, Kukan retained the position of foreign minister, ultimately leading Slovakia into NATO and the European Union in March and June 2004 respectively. A supporter of the transformation of the SDC into one party, he co-founded and became deputy chairman of the Slovak Democratic and Christian Union (Slovenská Demokratická Kresťanská Únie [SDKÚ]). Kukan received an honorary doctorate from Uppsala College, New Jersey, and received the Pontifical Order of St. Gregory for his contribution to a concordat with the Holy See. In April 2004 Kukan ran in the presidential elections but came in third in the first round. (PU) správa o stave spoločnosti (Bratislava, 1999); Slovensko 2000: Súhrnná správa o stave spoločnosti (Bratislava, 2000); www.home.sk/www/slovpolitika/kukan.htm; www.referaty.sk/?referat=1610; www.government.gov.sk; www.sdkuonline.sk/podpreds2.php3.

Sources: Slovensko 1996: Súhrnná správa o stave spoločnosti (Bratislava, 1997); Slovensko 1997: Súhrnná správa o stave spoločnosti (Bratislava, 1998); Slovensko 1998–1999: Súhrnná

KUKIEL Marian (15 May 1885, Dąbrowa Tarnowska–15 August 1973, London), Polish general, historian, and politician. Kukiel was allied with the independence movement in his youth. In 1905 he was active in the military structures of the Polish Socialist Party (Polska Partia Socjalistyczna [PPS]). In 1908 he was a co-founder of the Union of Active Struggle (Związek Walki Czynnej [ZWC]) in the Austrian partition of Poland; later, as a close associate of Józef Piłsudski, he played a leading role in organizing the rifle corps. At the same time Kukiel studied history in Lwów under the guidance of Szymon Askenazy. He specialized in the history of the Polish military from the eighteenth century to modern times. In 1909 he received a Ph.D. During World War I Kukiel served in the Polish Legions. In 1915 he was promoted to officer in the First Brigade of the Polish Legions. He fought in the Polish-Soviet war as commander of a regiment and an infantry brigade. On 1 July 1923 he became a general. At that time he published Dzieje Wojska Polskiego w dobie napoleońskiej, 1795–1815 (The history of the Polish Army in the Napoleonic period, 1795–1815, 2 vols.; 1918–20) and Zarys historii wojskowości w Polsce (An outline of Polish military history, 2 vols.; 1921). From 1925 to 1926 Kukiel was the head of the Historical Bureau of the General Staff. During the coup of May 1926 he supported the legitimate authorities, and as a result, he was expelled from the army. From 1927 to 1935 he was an associate professor (docent) and subsequently a full professor at the Jagiellonian University in Kraków. From 1930 to 1939 he worked as a curator at the Czartoryski Museum in Kraków. In 1927 he published Wojny napoleońskie (The Napoleonic Wars). In 1932 Kukiel became a member of the Polish Academy of Arts and Sciences (Polska Akademia Umiejętności). In 1937 he published the two-volume Wojna 1812 roku (The War of 1812). Kukiel gradually moved into the opposition to Piłsudski, and at the end of the 1930s he was one of the founders of the Christian-Democratic Labor Party (Stronnictwo Pracy [SP]).

During the September campaign of 1939, Kukiel was the military commander of Tarnów and an officer of the staff in the defense of Lwów. He subsequently made his way to France and Great Britain, where General Władysław Sikorski appointed him deputy minister for military affairs and later commander of the First Corps of the Polish Armed Forces (Polskie Siły Zbrojne [PSZ]) in Scotland. In September 1942 Kukiel became minister for military affairs in Sikorski's government. After Sikorski's death, Kukiel continued to hold this post in the governments of Stanisław Mikołajczyk (until 1944) and Tomasz Arciszewski (until February 1949). On 16 April 1943, on behalf of the Government of the Republic of Poland, Kukeil requested that the International Red Cross investigate the killing of Polish officers in Katyń. After World War II Kukiel worked as the director of the London-based Władysław Sikorski Historical Institute from 1947 to 1973 and lectured as a professor at the Polish University Abroad (Polski Uniwersytet na Obczyźnie) from 1945 to 1973. He co-edited sixteen volumes of Teki historyczne (Historical papers; 1947–71). Kukiel's publications include a work about Prince Adam Czartoryski, Książę Adam (Prince Adam; 1950), and its English version, Czartoryski and European Unity 1770–1861 (1955); the synthesis Dzieje Polski porozbiorowej 1795–1921 (The history of Poland after the partition 1795–1921; 1961); and the biography Generał Sikorski: Żołnierz i mąż stanu Polski walczącej (General Sikorski: Soldier and statesman of fighting Poland; 1970). Kukiel published extensively in the London-based Wiadomości and in other émigré periodicals. (MC)

Sources: Teki Historyczne, vol. 17 (London, 1978–80); Zbigniew Mierzwiński, Generałowie II Rzeczypospolitej, vol. 1 (Warsaw, 1990); Janusz Zuziak, Generał Marian Kukiel 1885–1973: Żołnierz, historyk, polityk (Pruszków, 1997); Rafał Habielski, Życie społeczne i kulturalne emigracji (Warsaw, 1999); Leksykon kultury polskiej poza krajem od roku 1939, vol. 1 (Lublin, 2000).

KUKK Juhan (13 April 1885, Käru, near Viru–December 1945, Soviet Union), Estonian politician. Kukkk studied in Dorpat (Tartu), at the Department of Commerce of Riga Polytechnic College (1904–10), and in Germany. After returning to Estonia in 1910, he worked in the Dorpat Loan and Insurance Company. In 1911 he became editor-in-chief of the cooperative newspaper Ühistegevusleht and was active in the cooperative movement. During World War I Kukkk was a member of the Estonian Nutrition Committee. In 1917 he obtained a seat in the Estonian Provincial Assembly (Eestimaa Maanõukogu) and became head of the Financial Department of the Estonian Provincial Government. Kukkk was one of the authors and the editor of the final version of the declaration of Estonian Independence of 23 February 1918. In the Estonian Provisional Government, he became minister of finance and state property, then minister of finance (1919–20), and then minister of industry and trade (1921–22). Kukkk managed to establish the foundations of the state's financial apparatus: the Ministry of Finance and the Central Bank, of which he became the director in 1919. Although the bank's exposure to political influences proved unfavorable for the economy, to some extent Kukkk succeeded in bringing the chaos in public finances under control through such measures as the introduction of the Estonian mark, which replaced the Finnish and German marks and the Russian ruble, which had previously been in circulation.

One of the senior leaders of the Estonian Labor Party (ELP), Kukkk served as member of the Constitutional Assembly and as speaker of the first parliament (Riigikogu). From 21 November 1922 to 2 August 1923 he was head of state (riigivanem). The rejection of one of the bills in a referendum forced the authorities to call an early election, as a result of which the ELP lost nearly half of its twenty-two seats. Kukkk served as an MP for the following three years, and later he devoted himself to social and economic work. From 1919 to 1930 he was president of the Central Council of Cooperative Unions. After retiring from active politics, he served as president of the Estonian Consumer Union in 1926–30. In 1920 he became a member of the board of the People's Bank (Rahvapank) and of several of the largest commercial companies in the country, such as Balti Manufakuur and Kreenbalt. From 1937 to 1940, as a representative of large-scale industry, Kukkk was a member of the board of the Chamber of Commerce and Industry. From 1936 to 1940 he served as president of the All-Estonian Union of Textile Manufacturers. He believed in parliamentary democracy; therefore he anxiously observed the development of authoritarianism. After the coup of 1934, led by Konstantin Päts, Kukkk joined the opposition. In 1938, along with Jaan Tõnisson, Jaan Teemant, and Ants Piip, he sharply protested the restrictions imposed by the new electoral law. After the Red Army seized Estonia in June 1940, Kukkk was arrested and died in unexplained circumstances. (AG)

Sources: Evald Uustalu, The History of the Estonian People (London, 1953); Matti Laur, Tõnis Lukas, Ain Mäesalu, Ago Pajur, and Tõnu Tannberg, History of Estonia (Tallinn, 2000); Strona Urzędu Prezydenta Republiki Estonii, <http://www.president.ee/eng/riigipead/JuhanKukk.html>; Strona Ministerstwa Finansów Estonii <http://www.fin.ee/pages.php/011805>; Strona obchodów 80-lecia niepodległości Estonii, <http://ew80.www.ee/eng/chronicle/1918.html>; <http://www.kirmus.ee/Valjaanded/ekmar/milleks.html>.

KUKK Jüri (1 May 1940, Pärnu–27 March 1981, Vologda), Estonian Democratic activist, victim of Communist repression. From 1958 to 1963 Kukkk studied chemistry at Tartu University, where he worked at the chemistry department from 1965. At that time he joined the CPSU. In 1972 he received the Candidate of Science degree. In 1975–76, along with his wife, Kukkk completed a scientific internship program in Paris. The stay in the West induced him to leave the party in May 1978 as he had had enough of dishonesty. In July 1979 the authorities expelled him from university. Along with a group of forty-five Lithuanians, Latvians, and Estonians, Kukkk signed the Baltic Appeal in August 1979; in it they demanded the admittance of the fact that the Molotov-Ribbentrop Pact had been unlawful from the beginning. Kukkk applied for permission to emigrate, but to no effect. He signed an open letter to Leonid Brezhnev in protest against the aggression of the USSR in Afghanistan. He also protested the deportation of Andrei Sakharov to Gorki. After turbulent events in Tallinn that occurred on the day of the prewar Independence Day, in February 1980 Kukkk was arrested and subjected to psychiatric “treatment.” In January 1981 he was sentenced to two years in the Gulag. He died on his way to Siberia. The authorities fixed a marker with the number 23781 upon his grave and forbade a tombstone there. Only after a long time was his family allowed to place a gravestone and a cross on his grave. (WR) Sources: Rein Taagepera, Softening without Liberalization in the Soviet Union: The Case of Juri Kukkk (Lanham, Md., 1984).

KUKLIŃSKI Ryszard (13 June 1930, Warsaw–11 March 2004, Washington, D.C.), Polish colonel. In 1947 Kukliński joined the (Communist) Polish Army. In 1950 he graduated from the Officers’ School of Infantry in Wrocław, and later he served in various units in Piła and Kołobrzeg. In 1961 he enrolled in the Academy of the General Staff, and from 1963 he worked in the General Staff, where he soon became a trusted aide to General Wojciech Jaruzelski. At the beginning of 1968, for half a year Kukliński served in Vietnam as a member of the International Arbitrage Commission. Upon his return to Poland he became a liaison officer between the commander-in-chief of the Warsaw Pact, Marshal Viktor Kulikov, and the Polish minister of defense, General Jaruzelski, during the preparations for the invasion of Czechoslovakia. In 1975 Kukliński trained at the Kliment Voroshilov Academy of the Soviet Armed Forces, where he met General Czesław Kiszczak. After returning to Poland, he became head of the Strategic Planning Section and later of the Operations Administration of the General Staff. He also served as a liaison officer in the General Staff of the Soviet Army, gaining access to top classified information. In 1980–81 he took part in the preparations for the introduction of martial law in Poland.

From 1971 Kukliński worked with U.S. intelligence, delivering to the Americans about thirty-five thousand pages of top secret Warsaw Pact documents. He started this cooperation on his own initiative, supplying, for instance, an extensive memorandum on the weakness of NATO forces in Europe. Thanks to Kukliński, the Americans learned about Soviet plans, including those for a Warsaw Pact invasion of Western Europe and the details of martial law in Poland. In view of the growing risk of Kukliński being unmasked, on 7 November 1981 the CIA evacuated him, along with his family, to the United States. On 23 May 1984 the Martial Court of the Warsaw Military District sentenced him to death in absentia for high treason. On the basis of the amnesty of 1989 this sentence was commuted to twenty-five years in prison. Kukliński’s case became known in Poland in April 1987, when the Paris-based monthly Kultura published an extensive interview with him titled “Wojna z narodem widziana od środka” (The war against the nation as seen from within). After the fall of communism in Poland, Kukliński’s rehabilitation raised a heated debate. In 1994 his two sons, Bogdan and Waldemar, perished in mysterious circumstances. There are hints that they may have been murdered by Communist special services. In May 1995 the Polish Supreme Court repealed Kukliński’s sentence, in September 1997 he was acquitted, and in May 1998 he went to Poland for the first time since 1981. (PU)

Sources: Bohater czy zdrajca: Fakty i dokumenty (Warsaw, 1992); Zbigniew Kumoś, ed., Nikt czyli Kukliński (Rzecz o zdradzie) (Warsaw, 2002); Józef Szaniawski, Samotna misja: Pułkownik Kukliński i zimna wojna (Warsaw and Chicago, 2003); Benjamin Weiser, A Secret Life: The Polish Officer, His Covert Mission, and the Price He Paid to Save His Country (New York, 2004).

KULISH Mykola (5 December 1892, Chaplyntsi, Tavriya Province–3 November 1937, Solovets Islands), Ukrainian playwright. After graduating from high school, Kulish entered a school for warrant officers in Odessa (1913). During World War I he fought on the front lines. At the beginning of 1918 he became president of the Soviet of Workers’ and Peasants’ Delegates in Oleshkiv. From 1919 to 1921 he served in the army, fighting against the army of General Anton Denikin. Demobilized, he was in charge of education in Oleshkiv County, and he edited the journal Chervonyi shliakh in Zinovyevsk (now Kirovohrad). In 1922 Kulish began working in the provincial department of people’s education in Odessa. In 1924 he wrote the drama 97 about the great famine of 1921–22. The following year he wrote the drama Komuna v stepakh (Commune in the steppes). Both plays were staged in Kharkiv and won him great acclaim. In 1925 Kulish moved to Kharkiv, where he became friends with Mykola Khvylovi and Les Kurbas. In the 1920s Kulish was a member of Hart, a writers’ group, and later a member of the Free Academy of Proletarian Literature (Vilna Akademiya Proletarskoyi Literatry [VAPLITE]). From November 1926 to January 1928 he served as president of the VAPLITE. At the end of 1929 he joined the presidium of a new writers' organization, Politfront.

Kulish was one of the co-founders of the new Ukrainian theater. His first dramas were realistic and social in character. The comedy Khuliy Khuryna (1926) reveals expressionist influences, and Zona (1926) was a criticism of party careerism. In Otak zahynuv Huska (That's how Huska died; 1927) he was influenced by symbolism. Kulish's best dramas include Narodnyi Malakhiy (The people's Malachi; 1928); Myna Mazaylo (1929); and Patetychna sonata (Sonata pathétique; 1929). The first two dramas present a clash between revolutionary ideas and Soviet reality and between Ukrainian national aspirations and Communist ideology, while the third depicts the Ukraine of the years 1917–18 and the struggle for the Ukraine among the Whites, the Communists, and the national-patriotic camp. In the 1930s Kulish wrote, among other things, Maklena Grasa (1933), Proshchay, selo (Farewell, countryside; 1933), and Povorot Marka (Marko's return; 1934). Most of his dramas were staged by the Berezil Theater in Kharkiv under the direction of Les Kurbas, the most famous Ukrainian theater director at that time. Kulish's popularity was accompanied by increasing criticism from conservative party circles, particularly after the publication of Narodnyi Malakhiy. Arrested in December 1934, Kulish was accused of being a member of a terrorist organization linked with the Organization of Ukrainian Nationalists (Orhanizatsiya Ukrayinskykh Natsionalistiv [OUN]). In 1935 he was sentenced to ten years in an isolation cell in a concentration camp on the Solovets Islands. In November 1937, by judgment of an NKVD troika, he was executed by firing squad, along with a group of other Ukrainian writers. Kulish was rehabilitated posthumously in 1956. (BB)

Sources: Encyclopedia of Ukraine, vol. 2 (Toronto, 1988); Roman Bzheskyi, Polityczni ideii tvoriv Mykoly Kulisha (Munich, 1955); Ivan Semenchuk, Slukhaiu muzyku liudskoï dushi: Stanovlennia Mykoly Kulisha (Kiev, 1997); Volodymyr Pratsovytyi, Ukrainskyi natsionalnyi kharakter u dramaturhii Mykoly Kulisha (Lviv, 1998); Iuriy Lutskyi, Literaturna polityka v radianskiy Ukraini (Kiev, 2000); Dovidnyk z istorii Ukrainy (Kiev, 2001).

KUN Béla (20 February 1886, Szilágycseh, Transylvania–29 August 1938?, Moscow), Hungarian Communist leader. The son of an impoverished clerk of Jewish origin, in 1902 Kun joined the Social Democratic Party and worked in the editorial offices of leftist journals in Kolozsvár, Nagyvárad, and Budapest. During World War I he served in the Austro-Hungarian Army. He attained the rank of lieutenant on the eastern front. In 1916 the Russians captured him. Kun was put into a prison camp near Tomsk, where he led Marxist agitation, mainly among the Hungarian captives. Released after the February 1917 revolution, he wrote for the revolutionary press, through which he attracted the attention of the Bolsheviks. After the October Revolution of 1917 Kun went to Petrograd, where Karol Radek named him his assistant in the Commissariat for Foreign Affairs. Kun also edited Nemzetközi Szocialista, a Bolshevik newspaper for Hungarian soldiers who were still fighting on the side of Austria-Hungary.

On 24 March 1918 Kun founded a Hungarian section in the Bolshevik party, and soon after that he became the president of the Federation of Foreign Groups in the Russian Communist Party (Bolsheviks). After the fall of the Austro-Hungarian monarchy, on 17 November 1918 Kun arrived in Budapest on Lenin's orders and founded the Hungarian Communist Party there, propagating Bolshevik tactics used in the struggle for power. The economic crisis, inflation, an external trade embargo, and the Entente's harsh conditions of armistice—all these created a breeding ground for revolutionary agitation in Hungary. Kun demanded the resignation of the republican government of Mihály Károlyi and aimed at acquiring full power. On 20 February 1919 the Union of the Unemployed, which was controlled by the Hungarian Bolsheviks, organized street demonstrations in Budapest in which several people were killed. Kun and sixty-seven other organizers of the demonstration were arrested. Battered by the guards, Kun became the hero of the crowd. Already in a prison hospital he prepared an open letter calling for the establishment of a "dictatorship of the proletariat" and the unification of the entire left under the slogan of "full power for the Soviets." The Károlyi government lost control over the army and had to yield to the Entente's ultimatum that the Hungarian Army withdraw to its "ethnic boundaries." Giving power to the left seemed the only way to calm the masses.

The Social Democrats and the Hungarian Communist Party formed a new government under the leadership of Sándor Garbai. On 21 March 1919 this government proclaimed the Hungarian Soviet Republic (HSR). Released from prison, Kun was appointed head of the Commissariat for Foreign Affairs and became the gray eminence of the ruling alliance. The Social Democrats also accepted his program. However, the HSR authorities failed to solve any of the pressing problems of the country. Kun rejected the ultimatum of the Entente but could not oppose the Entente's allies, the Czechs and the Romanians. Efforts to export revolution to Slovakia, a prewar territory of the Kingdom of Hungary, were unsuccessful. Endeavors to reach an agreement with the Socialists, who were holding power in Austria, failed. Attempts at collectivization and the uncontrollable terror in towns caused many people to be disappointed with the HSR; therefore on 1 August 1919 the revolutionary government fell, and Romanian forces invaded Budapest. Kun fled to Austria; after a short time he managed to get to Germany and in August 1920 to Russia.

In October 1920 Kun became a member of the Military Council of the Southern Front in the struggle against General Peter Wrangler, and he took part in a bloody crackdown on White officers in the Crimea. As early as February 1921 he began to organize groups of Hungarian Bolsheviks for an action in Hungary. In the spring of 1921 he went to Germany to support the local Communists. At a Comintern Congress in July 1921, he became a member of the Executive Committee (EC). In the Hungarian Communist Party Kun represented a radical course aiming at the revival of the Communist movement in the country and at another revolution, but a strong party opposition, under the leadership of Jenő Landler, preferred longer preparations. When one of his close associates embezzled Comintern funds to set up a private shop in Transylvania, Kun was sent to Sverdlovsk, where he headed the propaganda department (Agitprop) of the Urals office of the Bolshevik party. In 1923 he returned to Moscow, where he became a member of the Central Committee (CC) of the Comsomol, and in 1924 he was promoted to head of the Propaganda Department of the CC of the party. In 1925 Kun distanced himself from Leon Trotsky, and in 1926, from his former patron, Grigoryi Zinovyev. In the summer of 1926 in Berlin Kun held talks with Károlyi on commuting the sentence of Mátyás Rákosi, who was under threat of capital punishment in Hungary. On a trip with a Comintern mission to Austria in 1928, Kun was arrested, but he was sent back to the USSR. At the Sixth Comintern Congress in July and August 1928 Kun joined the Presidium of the EC of the Communist International, and in August 1929 he became head of its Balkan Secretariat, which coordinated the activities of the Bulgarian, Cypriot, Greek, Yugoslav, and Romanian parties.

In the summer of 1929 Kun lost in the elections in the Hungarian club in Moscow and in retaliation ordered a GPU (security police) associate to arrest the opponents of Landler's faction on charges of Trotskyism. However, the Comintern did not support Kun's accusation. At the beginning of the 1930s Kun was among the leading ideologists of the Comintern. He also lectured at the International Leninist School and at the Institute of the Red Professorship. At a meeting of the EC of the Comintern in December 1933 Kun sharply criticized West European Social Democracy and the "uniform front." At the Seventh Congress of the Comintern in the summer of 1935 Kun did not join the Presidium of the EC because of an open conflict in the Hungarian party. In May 1936 the Presidium submitted the case for examination by the Control Committee, and after its negative assessment on 5 September 1936 Kun was expelled from the party and from the Comintern. In 1937 false news of his death was announced in Budapest. The Presidium of the EC of the Comintern attacked him for "Hungarian nationalism." Kun was arrested in connection with the trial of Nikolai Bukharin and comrades, but for a long time his fate was unknown. Even the date of his death is the subject of controversy. According to information provided by the USSR Embassy in Hungary in 1989, Kun was executed immediately after the announcement of his death sentence in prison. His wife and two children survived exile. In 1986 Kun's works were published in Moscow. (WR) Sources: MERSH, vol. 18; Géza Herczeg, Kun Béla (Budapest, 1929); Bélané Kun, Kun Béla (Budapest, 1966); Rudolf L. Tókes, Béla Kun: The Man and the Revolutionary (New York, 1966); Rudolf L. Tókes, Béla Kun and the Hungarian Soviet Republic (New York, 1967); György Borsányi, The Life of a Communist Revolutionary: Béla Kun (Boulder, Colo., 1993).

KUNDERA Milan (1 April 1929, Brno), Czech writer. After graduating from a high school in Brno in 1948, Kundera started studies in literature at Charles University in Prague, but soon he moved to the Department of Film and Television at the Academy of Theater and Musical Arts, where he graduated in screenplay writing. In 1952–70 he lectured there in world literature, advancing to associate professor in 1964. In 1964 he also received the State Award and in 1968 the award of the Association of Czechoslovak Writers. In 1948–50 and 1956–70 Kundera belonged to the Communist Party of Czechoslovakia. From the late 1960s he was one of the leaders of the Czech cultural opposition. After the suppression of the Prague Spring, during the so-called normalization, Kundera was banned from publishing, and in 1975 he emigrated to France, where he delivered guest lectures. In 1980 he became a professor at the École des Hautes Études in Paris. In 1979 he was deprived of his Czechoslovak citizenship, and in 1981 he became a citizen of France.

Kundera made his literary debut in 1946, and his first volume of poetry was titled Člověk: zahrada širá (A man: A wide open garden; 1953). Initially he wrote Socialist realist works, but he departed from this style in a collection of erotic poetry, Monology (Monologues; 1957). Kundera's poems were very personal and belonged to the vanguard style, officially rejected in Czechoslovakia. In 1963 he published his first drama, Majitelé klíčů (Key owners), in which he considered the choice between an active but risky life and passivity and safety. In the late 1950s Kundera joined in the debate on cultural policy and contemporary art, which resulted in the book Umění románu (1960; The Art of the Novel, 1988). In 1963–69 he published three volumes: Směšné lásky (1963; Laughable Loves, 1974), in which he expressed skepticism about life; the novel Žert (1967; Joke, 1982), a political resume of the past; and the play Ptákovina (Bird; 1969), a black comedy showing a reality full of hypocrisy, dullness, and cruelty. In 1967–69 Kundera was very active, publishing a lot on Czech history, culture, and politics.

In exile Kundera continued writing prose, publishing Život je jinde (1979; Life Is Elsewhere, 1986) and Valčík na rozloučenou (1979; Farewell Waltz, 1998). In France he wrote his best known works, Knih smíchu a zapomnění (1981; Book of Laughter and Forgetting, 1980), Nesnesitelná lehkost bytí (1981; Unbearable Lightness of Being, 1984), and Nesmrtelnost (1990; Immortality, 1991). In these works he dealt with the situation of a man in a totalitarian system and his internal freedom in the face of a dangerous and unfriendly world. His hero is a person seeking security and finding it only within himself, in the ability to judge. Kundera drew close to the French rationalism of Denis Diderot, his master. Among other works, he wrote a play, Jakub a jeho pán (1970, Jacques and His Master, 1985). In one of his essays Kundera presented his own controversial vision of Central European cultural identity. He became one of the best known contemporary Czech writers, and he received many literary awards. His books served as the foundations for many screenplays and were translated into many languages. (PU)

Sources: ČBS; Slovník českých spisovatelů od roku 1945, vol. 2 (Prague, 1998); Marketa Goetz-Stankiewicz, The Silenced Theatre (Toronto, 1979); Maria Nemcová Banerjee, Terminal Paradox: The Novels of Milan Kundera (New York, 1990); Miloslav Hoznauer, Milan Kundera (Prague, 1991); Proměny, 1991, no. 31; Fred Misurella, Understanding Milan Kundera: Public Events, Private Affairs (Columbia, S.C., 1993); Květoslav Chvatík, Svět románů Milana Kundery (Brno, 1994); Helena Kosková, Milan Kundera (Jinočany, 1998); Peter Petro, ed., Critical Essays on Milan Kundera (New York, 1999); Harold Bloom, ed., Milan Kundera (Philadelphia, 2002).

KUPALA Yanka [originally Ivan Lutsevich] (7 July 1882, Vyazhynka, near Minsk–28 June 1942, Moscow), Belorussian poet, dramatist, and journalist. Born into a family of lesser gentry, from 1902 to 1909 Kupala worked as a traveling teacher, a court secretary in Radoszkowicze (Radashkovichy), and a clerk in a brewery near Minsk. Between 1909 and 1913 he studied in St. Petersburg and worked at a local public library. In 1908 he began contributing to Nasha Niva. In October 1913 he settled in Vilnius, where he worked as secretary of the Belorussian Publishing Society, and in March 1914 he became the secretary of Nasha Niva. In August 1915 Kupala fled to Moscow. Mobilized in January 1916, he served in a construction battalion in Minsk, Polotsk, and Smolensk. At the beginning of 1919 he settled in Minsk. He edited the literary periodicals Run' and Vol'ny Shtandar. He supported every government that promised freedom for Belorussia, irrespective of whether it was Soviet or Polish. The signing of the Treaty of Riga (March 1921) caused Kupala to have a nervous breakdown and a long illness.

From 1921 to 1922 Kupala worked in the Commissariat of Education of the Belorussian SSR, serving as head of its Publishing Department. He was one of the initiators of the Belorussian National Theater, the Belorussian State University, the Institute of Belorussian Culture, and an association of writers called Polymia. In 1928 he became a member of the Academy of Sciences of the Belorussian SSR, and in 1929, a member of the Academy of Sciences of the Ukrainian SSR. In the summer of 1930 Kupala was accused of promoting “bourgeois nationalism.” His family was deported to Siberia as part of the drive to “get rid of the kulaks.” Soon after that he was accused of leading a counterrevolutionary organization called the Belarus Liberation Union. As a result of repeated public humiliation, Kupala attempted suicide on 27 November 1930. Saved by doctors, he had no more strength to resist; he publicly admitted his “erroneous views” and promised to fight against the “kulak nationalist rebirth movement.” In October 1939 he took part in the proceedings of the People’s Assembly, which made a decision to incorporate Belorussian territories that until then had belonged to Poland into the Belorussian SSR. During the German-Soviet war Kupala engaged in propaganda to mobilize people to fight the German invaders. He died in unexplained circumstances in the Hotel Moscow. He was probably murdered.

Kupala wrote his first literary works in Polish. In 1903 he began to publish them in the periodical Ziarno. In 1905 he wrote his first poem in Belorussian, Muzhyk (Peasant), and published it in the Minsk newspaper Severno-Zapadnyĭ Kraĭ. From then on, he was one of the chief contributors to the canon of the modern Belorussian literary language. From 1908 on Kupala regularly published in Nasha Niva. In 1909 he published Zhaleika, the first collection of his poems, but a part of its edition was confiscated. The enslaved Belorussian peasant, presented against the background of the beautiful world of nature, is a recurring motif in his writing. In the collection Huslar (Wizard; 1910) a romantic view of the world was predominant. In the collection Shliakh zhytstsia (Along the path of life; 1913) Kupala focused on patriotic and moral values. Dignity, honor, and freedom for the Belorussian people became the motifs of his subsequent literary works. These were predominant in the poems Son na kurhanie (Dream on a Kurgan; 1910) and Mahila Iva (Tomb of a lion; 1913), in the drama Razburanaie hniazdo (Ravaged nest; 1913), and in the collection Pesni vainy (Songs of war; 1915). In the collection Spadchyna (The heritage; 1922) Kupala was very critical of the revolution, which he saw as a source of destruction and devastation. Kupala gained his greatest renown as the author of Tuteyshyia (The natives; 1922), a comedy that depicted the shaping of the national consciousness of Belorussian peasants. Kupala's works written during the period of Socialist realism—Pesnia budaunitstvu (Song about construction; 1936) and Ad sertsy (Coming from my heart; 1940)—are of less literary value. Six volumes of collected works, titled Zbor tvorau, were published in 1961–63 in Minsk. (EM)

Sources: Wielka Encyklopedia Powszechna, vol. 6 (Warsaw, 1965); Bielarускаia SSR: Kratkaia entsiklopediia, vol. 5 (Minsk, 1982); Nicholas P. Vakar, Belorussia: The Making of a Nation (Cambridge, Mass., 1956); Irina Bahdanovich, Ianka Kupala i romantyzm (Minsk, 1989); A. Bialatski, Litaratura i natsiia (Minsk, 1991); Uladzimir Hnilamiodau, Ianka Kupala: Novy pohliad (Minsk, 1995); Jan Zaprudnik, Historical Dictionary of Belarus (Lanham, Md., 1998); Rainer Lindner, Historiker und Herrschaft: Nationsbildung und Geschichtspolitik in Weissrussland im 19. und 20. Jahrhundert (Munich, 1999); Dzmitri Saniuk, Estetyka tvarchoŭstvi Ianki Kupaly (Minsk, 2000).

KUPERJANOV Julius (11 October 1894, Likhowo, near Novorzhevsk—2 February 1919, Tartu), Estonian military commander. Kuperjanov was the son of Estonian peasants who escaped to Russia following a conflict with the local landowner. In 1904 he returned to Estonia, went to school in Sipe, and then, against the will of his parents, he continued his education in a teacher training college at the University of Dorpat (Tartu). During his studies he took part in the activities of young radicals. In early 1914 Kuperjanov worked as a teacher in a parish school in Kambja. Upon the outbreak of war in the summer of 1914, he was drafted into the Russian Army, and in 1915 he graduated from the Reserve Officers' School in Petrograd. During World War I he commanded a reconnaissance unit, and from 1917 he was an officer in the Estonian supply battalion, which he co-organized. In 1918 he organized and commanded a guerrilla group of youngsters and peasants threatened by Bolshevik terror; he managed to transform it into a disciplined and well-armed unit. This unit was moved to the rear of the advancing Bolshevik army and efficiently disorganized its operations. The unit made history as the Kuperjanov Battalion, thanks to the recapture of Tartu in mid-January 1919. The reopening of the railway line leading to this town made possible the entry of an armored train into the Tartu railway station and the seizure of the town by surprise. Despite fierce attacks by the more numerous Bolshevik troops, Tartu was held until the Estonian rescue came. This operation probably saved the town from Bolshevik slaughter. The Bolsheviks managed to shoot only about a dozen people, including Orthodox bishop Platon. At the end of January 1919, the Kuperjanov unit fought in the bloodiest battle of the Estonian War of Independence, at Valka, which was captured mainly thanks to Kuperjanov's personal engagement. Severely wounded near the Paju estate, he soon died. In independent Estonia exclusive Estonian troops bore his name. (AG)

Sources: Eesti Entsüklopeedia, vol. 14 (Tallinn, 2000); Jaan Soots, "Wojna Estonji o wyzwolenie 1918–1920," Przegląd Wojskowy, 1929, vol. 6, no. 20; Jan Lewandowski, Estonia (Warsaw, 2001).

KUPI Abas, pseudonym "Bazi Canës" (August 1891, Bilajt, near Fush Kruje—9 January 1976, Freeport, Long Island, New York), Albanian officer, politician, pro-independence activist, and member of the pantheistic sect Bektashi. Initially KUPI was involved in criminal activities in the region of his native Kruje, but by 1914 he was already known as one of the leaders of the self-defense units that maintained order there. In 1920 KUPI fought against units from the Kingdom of Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes in the region of Koplik. During the democratic revolution of June 1924, he supported the current government authorities, organizing a defense of Lezhe that lasted a few days. When King Zog returned to power, KUPI was promoted to the rank of officer and became commander of the gendarmerie in Kruje. On 7 April 1939, during the Italian invasion of Albania, KUPI, who held the rank of major, was one of the few officers who tried to organize a defense. His unit, fighting in the region of Dürres, was defeated after several hours of struggle, and he himself emigrated to Turkey.

In 1940 KUPI made his way to Yugoslavia, where he helped to establish the Unity Front, regarded as the first organized group of the Albanian resistance movement and linked with British intelligence. Plans to instigate an anti-Italian uprising in Albania failed. KUPI returned to Albania and became leader of a guerrilla unit that was active in the region of Kruje. In April 1942 he became a member of the General Council of the National Liberation Front, which was to represent a broad political coalition in the Albanian resistance movement. In July 1943 KUPI became a member of the General Staff of the National Liberation Army. The monopolist tendencies of the Communists prompted him to establish his own group. At that time his unit was active in the region of Diber-Mati. In October 1943 he became a member of the Regency Council. In consultation with the British, on 20 November 1943, at a congress of royalists faithful to King Zog in Herri, Kupa established an organization called Legality (Legaliteti) and became its leader. The organization, influential mainly in the north of the country, had two thousand armed men. During negotiations with the British, who tried to persuade Kupa to take more a decisive stance against the Germans, he made his own demands. He insisted that the Allies recognize King Zog I and Greater Albania, including Kosovo. As his demands were not met, Legality became involved in actions against the Communist partisans rather than against the Germans. In September 1944 Kupa began to form the general staff of a military organization, but his plans were thwarted after the Communists seized the region of Mati, where Legality had the greatest influence.

In November 1944 Kupa left Albania for Italy. On 26 August 1949 in Paris, he announced the establishment of the Albanian National Committee, based on an agreement between royalists like him and republicans led by Midhat Frashëri. In 1949 Kupa helped to prepare English sabotage actions against the Communist government in Tirana. Despite heavy Communist losses, none of the guerrilla groups sent from Italy fulfilled their mission because the Communists had been informed about their plans by the Soviet agent Kim Philby. In 1967 Kupa went to the United States, where he lived until his death. He left eight children. (TC)

Sources: New York Times, 11 January 1976; Hugh Seton-Watson, The East European Revolution (London, 1950); Robert Lee Wolff, The Balkans in Our Time (Cambridge, Mass., 1956); Kim Philby, My Silent War (London, 1968); Nicholas Bethell, Betrayed (London, 1984); Reginald Hibbert, Albania's National Liberation Struggle: The Bitter Victory (London and New York, 1991); Gjergj Titani, Hasani Proletar: Personalitete ushtarake shqiptare ne vite 1912 Dhjetor–1997, vellimi i pare (Tirana, 1997); Sejfi Vllamasi, Balafaqime politike ne Shqiperi (1897–1942) (Tirana, 1995).

KURBAS Les (25 February 1887, Sambor–3 November 1937, Solovets Islands?), Ukrainian director, actor, and theater theorist. Born into a family of actors, after passing his high school final examinations in Tarnopol (Ternopil), Kurbas studied philosophy at the University of Vienna. In 1908 he transferred to the University of Lemberg (Lviv, Lwów), where in 1909 he organized a drama society. In 1910, when relations between Poles and Ukrainians deteriorated, he was expelled from the University of Lemberg. For some time he studied drama in Vienna, and in the summer of 1911 he was invited by the Hutsul Theater in Verkhovyna to work as a stage manager. From 1912 to 1914 he performed in a theater run under the auspices of the Ruska Besida (Ruthenian Conversation) Society. In September 1915 he founded and directed the Ternopilski Teatralni Vechory (Ternopil Theater Evenings), a theater company in Ternopil. In March 1916 Kurbas moved to Kiev, where from August 1917 to April 1919 he helped to establish the Molodyy Teatr (Young Theater), becoming its artistic director and stage manager. In June 1920, along with a group of actors, he formed the Kiev Drama School (Kyivdramte [KDS]), in which he played various roles, including that of Macbeth, his last theater role. In the same year Kurbas staged Shevchenko's Haidamaky (The Haidamaks) in the Taras Shevchenko Theater in Kiev. This production played a major role in the development of Ukrainian theater. In May 1921 the KDS group moved to Kharkiv, where it changed its name to the State Exemplary Touring Theater.

In 1922 Kurbas founded the Berezil Artistic Association, an avant-garde theater. It initially functioned in Kiev and from 1926 on in Kharkiv. It was during the Kharkiv period of the Berezil Theater that Kurbas was most successful as a director. In his creative work he combined literature, theater, music, painting, and philosophy, particularly Expressionism and Constructivism. At that time he befriended the playwright Mykola Kulish, who became his closest associate. They both believed that theater was an instrument capable of shaping the public opinion and national consciousness of the Ukrainian people. Kurbas presented his views on theater in Molodyi Teatr: Henezha–zavdannia–shliakhy (The Young Theater: Origins–tasks–paths; 1917), Shliakhy ukraiinskoho teatru i Berezil (The paths of the Ukrainian theater and the Berezil; 1927), and other works. He lectured at the Kiev and Kharkiv music and drama institutes (1922–26 and 1926–33 respectively). He was also one of the initiators of the theater journals Teatralni visti, Barykady teatru, and Radians'kyi teatr.

At the end of 1930 Kurbas became the director of the reorganized Veselyi Proletar (Happy Proletarian) Small Forms Theater. Earlier, a Ukrainian opera house and a theater for children had been founded in Kharkiv on his initiative. From 1927 on, Kurbas's work was the subject of increasing official criticism. He was accused of (among other things) nationalism, formalism, and detachment from Soviet reality. He was banned from staging Kulish's Sonata Pathétique and other plays. At the beginning of 1931 a campaign was launched against Kurbas, and in September 1933 Pavel Postyshev, first secretary of the Central Committee of the Communist Party (Bolshevik) of Ukraine, demanded that he perform a self-criticism and denounce Mykola Khvylovyi and Mykola Skrypnyk. Kurbas refused, and in October of that year he was dismissed as artistic director of the Berezhil Theater. Later he was stripped of the title of People's Artist, which he had received in 1925. Arrested in December 1933, he was sent to a prison camp and was later executed. In some sources, 15 November 1942 is given as the date of his death. Filosofia teatru (Philosophy of the theater; 2001) is the most complete edition of his writings. (BB)

Sources: Encyclopedia of Ukraine, vol. 2 (Toronto, 1988); Ukrainska Literaturna Entsyklopediia, vol. 3 (Kiev, 1995); Dovidnyk z istorii Ukrainy (Kiev, 2001); Les Kurbas u teatralniy diialnosti, v otsinkakh suchasnykiv—dokumenty (Baltimore and Toronto, 1989); Nelli Korniienko, Les Kurbas: Repetytsiia maibutnioho (Kiev, 1998).

KUROŃ Jacek (3 March 1934, Lwów [Lviv]–17 June 2004, Warsaw), Polish social and political activist. Kuroń graduated in history from Warsaw University in 1957. In 1949–53 and 1955–56 he was active in the (Communist) Union of Polish Youth, and from 1955 to 1961, in the Walter Circle of Red Scouting. In 1956 he took part in the youth “renewal” movement at Warsaw University, and he worked with the workers’ council of the Żerań Motor Car Factory. In 1953 and from 1956 to 1964 Kuroń belonged to the Polish United Workers’ Party (Polska Zjednoczona Partia Robotnicza [PUWP]). In 1962 he co-founded a political discussion club at Warsaw University. The club was dissolved by the Communist authorities in 1963. In 1964–65, along with Karol Modzelewski, Kuroń prepared and signed an “Open Letter to PUWP Members,” in which he and Modzelewski pointed to the divergence between Communist ideas and practice. In March 1965 he was arrested and sentenced to three years in prison, and in 1967 he was released. The “Open Letter” was smuggled to the West and published there. It was translated into many languages and made both signatories famous, especially among the Western left. Kuroń took part in many activities of the “rangers” (extreme leftist critics of the Communist system in Poland)—for instance, he took part in demonstrations to protest the banning of Adam Mickiewicz’s play Dziady (Forefathers). Arrested on 8 March 1968 and sentenced to three and a half years in prison for organizing student protests, Kuroń was released in 1971. In 1975 he co-organized protests against the amendment of the constitution, and he signed the “Letter of 59” on this issue. In July 1976 he wrote a letter to the Italian Communist leader, Enrique Berlinguer, asking his assistance in the defense of Polish workers arrested after protests in June 1976.

On 23 September 1976 Kuroń was among the founding members of the Committee for the Defense of Workers (Komitet Obrony Robotników [KOR]). He co-authored the concept of overcoming totalitarianism by social self-organization outside of official Communist structures (Myśli o programie działania [Thoughts on the program of action]; 1976). Detained from May to July 1977, Kuroń was one of the leaders of Committee of Social Self-Defense KOR. He published a lot in the uncensored press. He was editor of the periodical Kwartalnik Polityczny Krytyka and a member of and lecturer in the Society of Scientific Courses. Repeatedly detained for forty-eight-hour periods, in 1979 Kuroń was the target of an assault by a squad from the Socialist Union of Polish Students, inspired by the Security Service. He took part in the KOR’s meetings with Czech Charter 77 representatives. From September 1980 he was an adviser to the Inter-Factory Founding Committee of Solidarity in Gdańsk and then to its National Coordination Commission and the National Commission. One of the key experts of Solidarity and co-author of the concept of the self-limiting revolution, Kuroń was treated by the Communist authorities as an extremist. The Kremlin demanded his arrest. After the introduction of martial law on 13 December 1981, Kuroń was interned and then arrested because of an attempt to overthrow the system by force. Amnestied in 1984, he worked with the Solidarity underground structures and the uncensored press.

In 1988 Kuroń joined the Civic Committee of the Chairman of Solidarity, and from February to April 1989 he took part in the Round Table Talks. From June 1989 to 1997 he was an MP. From September 1989 to December 1990 and from July 1992 to September 1993 he was minister of labor and social welfare. A member of the Presidium of the Civic Parliamentary Club and deputy chairman of the Democratic Union and later of the Union of Freedom, Kuroń was active in numerous charity efforts whose aim it was to ease the social costs of the economic transformation—for instance, the SOS Foundation. In 1993 he initiated the Pact on State Enterprise. In 1993–97 he chaired the parliamentary commission of national and ethnic minorities. For many years he was the most popular politician in Poland. In 1995 he was a candidate in the presidential elections, but he won only 9 percent of the vote. Kuroń authored many works, including the following: Zasady ideowe (Ideological principles; 1978); Polityka i odpowiedzialność (Politics and responsibility; 1984); Wiara i wina (Faith and guilt; 1990); Gwiazdny czas (Star times; 1991); Moja zupa (My soup; 1991); Spoko! czyli kwadratura koła (Play it cool or squaring the circle; 1992); Na krawędzi (On the edge; 1997); and Działanie (Acting; 2002). (AF)

Sources: Nasi w Sejmie i Senacie (Warsaw, 1990); Opozycja w PRL: Słownik biograficzny 1956–1988, vol. 1 (Warsaw, 2000); Andrzej Friszke, Opozycja polityczna w PRL 1945–1980 (London, 1994); Jan Skórzyński, Ugoda i rewolucja: Władza i opozycja 1985–1989 (Warsaw, 1995); Janusz A. Majcherek, Pierwsza dekada III Rzeczypospolitej 1989–1999 (Warsaw, 1999); Wojciech Roszkowski, Historia Polski 1914–2000 (Warsaw, 2001); Antoni Dudek, Pierwsze lata III Rzeczypospolitej 1989–2001 (Kraków, 2002).

KUSHAL Frantsishak (16 February 1895, Pershay, near Volozhin [Valozhyn]–25 May 1968, Rochester, New York), Belorussian general and national activist. Born into a peasant family, Kushal graduated from a high school in Ivanets. In 1915 he was mobilized into the Russian Army, and in February 1916 he finished an officer training school. As a company commander on the German front lines, he received many awards and was promoted to staff captain. After the February 1917 revolution, Kushal became involved in the Belorussian pro-independence movement. In the autumn of 1917 he retired from military service and settled in Minsk and Vilnius, where he took part in Belorussian political life. In April 1919 he was briefly detained by the Polish authorities for working in support of the cause of Belorussian independence. When the Belorussian Military Commission was established, Kushal served as a member until the end of the Polish-Soviet war. In 1921 he became a career officer in the Polish Army. He served in Chełm, Pułtusk, and Małkinia. In September 1939 he fought in the battle of Lwów (Lviv) and was taken prisoner by the Soviets. He was held in prison camps in Starobelsk and Paulishchy Bor, near Smolensk, and the Lubyanka Prison in Moscow. In mid-June 1941 he was taken to Minsk and placed under surveillance by the local NKVD.

After the Nazi invasion of the Soviet Union in June 1941, Kushal collaborated with the Germans. In December 1941 he became commander of a school for non-commissioned officers that trained cadres for the Belorussian Self-Defense organization. In July 1942 he was put in charge of a training course for officers of Belorussian Self-Defense and appointed head of the department of military affairs of the Belorussian People's Mutual Aid Association, whose founders intended it to become a form of Belorussian government allied with the Third Reich. In December 1943 Kushal joined the Belorussian Central Council (BCC), which operated with the consent of the Germans and which described itself as the political representation of the nation. In March 1944 the BCC appointed Kushal commander of Belorussian National Defense, military units formed of recruits. In the summer of 1944 Kushal went to Germany, and one year later he emigrated to the United States. While there, he founded the Association of Belorussian War Veterans in 1947, and from 1952 to 1954 he served as president of the Belorussian and American Union. Kushal was one of the founders of and contributors to the émigré periodicals Belarus and Bats'kaŭushchyna. He also wrote numerous works on Belorussian military history. In 1999 Kushal's Sproby stvarennia belaruskaha voiska (Efforts to establish the Belorussian Army) was published in Minsk. (EM)

Sources: Entsyklapiedyia historyi Bielarusi, vol. 4 (Minsk, 1997); New York Times, 27 May 1968; Belarus (New York), 1968, no. 134; Vitaut Kipel and Zora Kipel, eds., Byelorussian Statehood (New York, 1988).

KUSTURICA Emir (24 November 1954, Sarajevo), Yugoslav film director. Born into a Muslim family in Bosnia, Kusturica graduated from the FAMU Film Institute in Prague, Czechoslovakia. In 1978 he received the first prize at a student film festival in Prague. Upon returning home, he worked in Sarajevo television. Kusturica made his directorial debut in 1979, and he gained a wider reputation for a television adaptation of Ivo Andrić's Buffet Titanic (1980). All his later movies were successes. For Sjećas li se Dolly Bell? (Do you remember Dolly Bell? 1981) he won the Golden Lion in Venice in 1981; for Otaca na službenom putu (When father was away on business; 1985) he received the Golden Palm in Cannes in 1985. He won the Golden Palm again in 1989 for Dom za vešanje (Time of the Gypsies), in which he combined improvisation by amateur actors with surreal visions of Balkan gypsies. Kusturica was always fascinated by the gypsy culture, and he thought the secret of his success was his own version of a Federico Fellini-like creativity. In the 1980s Kusturica was one of the leaders of the Sarajevo movement of New Primitivism, which filled the Communist authorities with consternation. He also performed in the musical group Zabranjeno Pušenje (No Smoking), which won great popularity. The music for the Time of the Gypsies was composed by Goran Bregović, with whom Kusturica worked out a specific style, called umza-umza, combining Balkan and gypsy folk music with funky and punk rock. After the breakup of Yugoslavia and the outbreak of war in its former territory, Kusturica stressed that he was a Yugoslav. He opposed Serbian nationalism, and he challenged one of its leaders, Vojislav Šešelj, to a duel.

From 1990 Kusturica frequently worked in the United States—for instance, at Columbia University in New York. It was in America that his movie Arizona Dreams (1992) was directed, with an international cast, winning him the Golden Bear in Berlin in 1993. Nevertheless, Kusturica became disappointed with the American movie industry and returned home, where he directed his best-known film, Bila jednom jedna zemlja (Underground; 1995), for which he won his third Golden Palm in Cannes in 1995. In the movie, in a symbolic and surrealist way, he presented half a century of Communist Yugoslav history and its final destruction. In 1998 Kusturica directed Crna mačka, beli mačor (Black Cat, White Cat). (WR) Sources: Jean-Marc Bouineau, Mala knjiga o Emiru Kusturici (Belgrade, 1995); Georgio Bertellini, Emir Kusturica (Milan, 1996); Paolo Vecchi, Emir Kusturica (Rome, 1999); Stach Szablowski, "Emir Kusturica," www.e-zone.pl/lk/lk_kusturica.php; www.actu-star.com/biographies/kusturicaemir.html.

KUSÝ Miroslav (1 December 1931, Bratislava), Slovak dissident philosopher and political scientist. In 1954 Kusý graduated in philosophy from Charles University in Prague. Later he worked as assistant professor, associate professor, and (from 1967) full professor at the Department of Philosophy of Comenius University in Bratislava. During the Prague Spring of 1968 he was one of the reform leaders of the Communist Party of Slovakia (CPS). From October 1968 to April 1969 he headed the Ideological Department of the CPS Central Committee. As a result of the Warsaw Pact invasion, during the so-called normalization Kusý was expelled from the CPS and from the university (1970), and he started dissident activities for which he was further repressed. He became one of the leaders of the democratic opposition in Slovakia, closely cooperating with Czech dissidents. In 1977 he signed Charter 77. He published a lot in the uncensored press and abroad, mainly on the political and social situation in Czechoslovakia. In the 1970s and 1980s Kusý worked as a blue-collar laborer. In August 1989 he was arrested, but in late November 1989 he was released during the "Velvet Revolution." In 1989 he was a co-founder of the Czechoslovak Helsinki Committee, and in 1990, of the Slovak Helsinki Committee. In 1990–91 he was an MP and member of the Presidium of the Slovak National Council, and then he worked as head of the Bratislava office of President Václav Havel. He was also rector of Bratislava University and founded the chair of political science there in 1990. In 1992 he founded and became UNESCO chair of human rights at this university. From the elections of 1998 Kusý worked as an adviser for human rights and national minorities to Prime Minister Mikulaš Dzurinda. Kusý authored many works, including Zakázané písomnosti (Forbidden writings; 1990); Na vlnách Slobodnej Európy (On the waves of Free Europe; 1990); Eseje (Essays; 1991); and Čo s našimi Maďarmi? (What about our Hungarians? 1998). (PU)

Sources: ČBS; Rudolf Chmel, ed., Kwestia słowacka w XX wieku (Gliwice, 2002); www.ceu.hu/sun/SUN%202002/Descriptions/CVs/Kusy.htm.

KUTLVAŠR Karel (27 January 1895, Michalovice–2 September 1961, Prague), Czech general. Before World

War I Kutlvašr worked as a clerk in Kiev. After the outbreak of the war he joined a Czech unit and took part in intelligence operations. In 1917 he became an officer of the Czechoslovak Legions, and on 2 July 1917 he fought at Zborov, the Legions' first battle in Russia. In 1918 he distinguished himself in fighting against the Bolsheviks, and in October of that year he became commander of the first regiment, with which he fought in Siberia in 1919. In February 1920, as commander of this regiment, Kutlvašr returned to Prague, where he was put in command of an infantry regiment until 1923. From 1923 to 1931 he served as commander of an infantry brigade in Chomutov, and then he directed an infantry school in Milovice until 1934. In 1932 he became brigadier general. From 1934 to 1939 he commanded a division in Hradec Králové. During the German occupation Kutlvašr was active in the national resistance movement as a member of an organization called Defense of the Nation (Obrana Národa). In May 1945 he was military commander of the Prague Uprising. In this role he accepted the capitulation of the German forces. The Communists claimed that Kutlvašr had thus prevented the Red Army from liberating Prague and never forgave him. Initially after the war Kutlvašr was promoted to major general and served as commander of the Greater Prague military district, and in 1946 he assumed command of a corps in Plzen. From 1946 to 1948 he was deputy district commander in Brno. After the coup of February 1948 Kutlvašr was forced to retire. In the autumn of 1948 he assumed the leadership of an anti-Communist organization founded by Josef Hruška, a provocateur working for Bedřich Reicin, head of military intelligence. Arrested in December of that year, Kutlvašr was sentenced to life imprisonment in May 1949. Amnestied in 1960, he was rehabilitated in 1968, during the Prague Spring. In 1991 he was posthumously promoted to army general. (PU)

Sources: ČBS; Kdo byl kdo v našich dějinách ve 20. století, vol. 1 (Prague, 1998); Libor Vukoupil, Slovník českých dějin (Brno, 2000).

KUTRZEBA Stanisław (15 November 1876, Kraków–7 January 1946, Kraków), Polish legal historian. From 1894 to 1898 Kutrzeba studied at the School of Law of the Jagiellonian University (Uniwersytet Jagielloński [UJ]) in Kraków, earning a doctorate. From 1899 to 1900 he attended lectures at the Collège de France and the École des Hautes Études. From 1901 to 1908 he was an assistant professor at the City and Land Archives in Kraków. In 1902 he received his postdoctoral degree from the UJ for his work on the history of Polish law, and in 1908 he was offered a UJ professorship. In the academic years 1913–14 and 1920–21 Kutrzeba was dean of the UJ School of Law. In 1914 he became a corresponding member of the Department of History and Philosophy of the Academy of Arts and Sciences in Kraków. In 1918 he became an active member of the Polish Academy of Arts and Sciences (Polska Akademia Umiejętności [PAU]) and chairman of the PAU Legal Committee. From 1919 to 1926 he was secretary of the PAU Department of History and Philosophy, and in 1926 he became secretary general of the PAU. In the academic year 1932–33 Kutrzeba was the rector of the UJ, and from 1939 to 1946 he was president of the PAU. He was also a foreign member of the Czech Academy of Arts and Sciences, a foreign member of the Hungarian Academy of Sciences, and a corresponding member of the Académie des Sciences Morales et Politiques in Paris. He was an expert on the Polish delegation to the Paris Peace Conference in 1919 and headed a delegation that negotiated an arbitration treaty with Czechoslovakia in 1925. He increasingly embraced federalist views.

After the outbreak of World War II, Kutrzeba became deputy chairman of the Civic Assistance Committee in Kraków. Arrested along with other UJ professors by the Nazis during the Sonderaktion Krakau, on 6 November 1939, he was sent to the Sachsenhausen concentration camp. Returning to Poland in February 1940, Kutrzeba refused an offer to work with the Institut für Deutsche Ostarbeit. He was involved in clandestine teaching, serving as dean of the underground UJ school of law. In 1945 in Moscow he attended negotiations on the establishment of the Provisional Government of National Unity. At that time he was coopted to the National Home Council (Krajowa Rada Narodowa [KRN]). Kutrzeba wrote articles for Tygodnik Powszechny and helped found Tygodnik Warszawski. He left a vast and wide-ranging legacy. Recognized as an expert on the history of Polish law and the political system, he also published legal and political source documents. Kutrzeba is the author of several hundred publications, including the following: Sądy ziemskie i grodzkie w wiekach średnich (Land and town courts in the Middle Ages; 1901–2); Mężobójstwo w prawie polskim XIV i XV wieku (The crime of husband killing in Polish fourteenth- and fifteenth-century law; 1907); Historia ustroju Polski w zarysie (An outline history of the Polish political system, 4 vols.; 1905–17); Dawne polskie prawo sądowe (Old Polish law of courts, 2 vols.; 1921); Polska Odrodzona 1914–21 (Poland reborn 1914–21; 1921); Sejm walny dawnej Rzeczypospolitej Polskiej (The National Diet of the Old Republic of Poland; 1922); Polskie prawo polityczne według traktatów (Polish political law according to treaties; 1923); and Historia źródeł dawnego prawa polskiego (History of sources of old Polish law, 2 vols.; 1925–26). (JS)

Sources: PSB, vol. 16; Adam Vetulani, Stanisław Kutrzeba: Historyk prawa (Kraków, 1947); Słownik historyków polskich (Warsaw, 1994); Stanisław Kutrzeba, 1876–1946: Materiały z Uroczystego Posiedzenia PAU w dniu 24 czerwca 1996 (Kraków, 1998).

KUTRZEBA Tadeusz (15 April 1885, Kraków–8 January 1947, London), Polish general and historian. The son of an officer of the Austrian Army, Kutrzeba studied at a military high school, and in 1906 he graduated from the Technical Academy in Vienna as a second lieutenant of sappers. He studied at the Austrian General Staff Academy, and he took a higher course in military engineering. During World War I he fought in the Austro-Hungarian Army, but in late 1918 he joined the Polish Army as a captain. He quickly advanced. During the Polish-Soviet war Kutrzeba was chief of staff and commander of the first Legionary division of infantry, and from April 1920 he commanded the southeastern and middle fronts. During the May 1926 coup Kutrzeba supported President Stanisław Wojciechowski and fought on the government's side, but after the victory of Józef Piłsudski he stayed in the army. Promoted to the rank of brigadier general in 1928, he took over the command of the Higher Military School and held it until the outbreak of war in 1939. From 1935 Kutrzeba also worked in the General Inspectorate of the Armed Forces.

On the eve of war, Kutrzeba was appointed general of division and assumed command of the Poznań Army. During the September 1939 campaign, after the Polish troops had retreated from the German border, Kutrzeba commanded the Poznań and Pomorze Armies at the Battle of the Bzura River. On 9 September he started a counteroffensive that took the Germans by surprise. This move started a battle that lasted a few days, the largest in the Polish defense war of 1939; it forced the Germans to change their plans and move several divisions, aircraft, and armored units to the Bzura area. The Polish counteroffensive delayed the capture of Warsaw. Since the units commanded by Kutrzeba could not receive Polish support, he ordered the retreat to Warsaw. With the remnants of the Poznań Army he made his way to the capital and was appointed deputy commander of the Warsaw Army. After the capitulation of Warsaw, Kutrzeba was taken prisoner of war, and he spent the war years in a POW camp in Germany. After the war he did not come back to Poland; he settled in London, where he worked at the Historical Commission of the September Campaign. Kutrzeba authored several works, including Bitwa nad Niemnem (wrzesień–październik 1920) (The Battle of the Niemen River, [September–October 1920;] 1926); Wyprawa Kijowska 1920 roku (The Kiev Operation of 1920; 1937); and Bitwa nad Bzurą (The Battle of the Bzura River; 1958). In 1957 Kutrzeba's ashes were transported to and buried in Warsaw. (WD)

Sources: PSB, vol. 16; J. Godlewski, "Bitwa nad Bzurą," Wojskowy Przegląd Historyczny, 1962, nos. 1–4, and 1963, no. 1; Wielka Internetowa Encyklopedia Multimedialna, Encyklopedia II wojny światowej (Warsaw, 1975).

KVATERNIK Eugen Dido (29 March 1910, Zagreb–10 March 1962, Rio Cuarto, Argentina), Croatian nationalist politician. Kvaternik was the son of Slavko Kvaternik, the grandson of Josip Frank, and the great-grandson of Eugen Kvaternik (1825–71). In 1930, along with his father and Ante Pavelić, he co-founded the Ustasha (Insurgent) movement. He was its leading activist in Italy (1930–34). As chief of staff of its revolutionary operations, acting under the pseudonym "Longin," Kvaternik planned and carried out the assassination of Yugoslav King Alexander I on 9 October 1934. In late September 1934 he went from Italy to Switzerland to instruct the assassins, who arrived from the Jankapuszta camp, near Nagykanizsa, in Hungary. After the assassination Kvaternik fled from France to Italy. Arrested in Turin, he was placed under house arrest until April 1941. In France he was sentenced to death in absentia. After the proclamation on 10 April 1941 of the Independent Croatian State (Nezavisna Država Hrvatska [NDH]), under Nazi auspices, Kvaternik became its chief ideologue. He was also an MP, the minister of interior, and head of the security (Ravsigur). He approved of the arrests of Jews and of paying the German authorities the equivalent of 30 German marks for each person transported to the death camps. Jewish property was confiscated by the NDH. Kvaternik also directed the extermination of Croatian Serbs, announcing that irrespective of the final outcome of the war, after its termination there would be no Serbs at all in Croatia. In October 1942 Kvaternik was dismissed by the Germans owing to the chaos caused by his genocidal policies. It is estimated that about 125,000 Serbs and many thousands of Jews were killed in Croatia during World War II. A 1964 estimate by the Center for Scholarly Documentation of the Institute of the History of the Workers' Movement in Zagreb fixed the number of victims at 249,000. According to the Jewish commune of Zagreb, the number of victims of the Jasenovac concentration camp was 85,000. In independent Croatia Kvaternik's memoirs were published as Sjećanja i zapažanja 1925–1945 (Memoirs and reflections, 1925–1945; 1995). (JD)

Sources: Branimir Yelitch, Fight for the Croatian State (Buenos Aires, 1960); Ivo Omrčanin, Dramatis Personae and Finis of the Independent State of Croatia in British and American Documents (Bryn Mawr, Pa., 1983); Bogdan Krizman, Ante Pavelić i Ustaše (Zagreb, 1983).

KVATERNIK Slavko (25 August 1878, Vučinić Selo–8 June 1947, Zagreb), Croatian marshal and nationalist politician. Kvaternik was the son of Eugen Kvaternik, the leader of an unsuccessful uprising against the Hungarians in 1871. After graduating from the Infantry Cadet School in Karlstadt (Karlovac), he began to serve in the Austro-Hungarian Army. From 1904 to 1906 he studied at the Military Academy and was promoted to captain. During World War I he served as a staff officer of the forty-second Honved division, chief of staff of the fifty-fifth infantry division, and then colonel in the Austro-Hungarian military government in Belgrade. In December 1918 Kvaternik supported the Yugoslav cause, but after a short period of service in the army of the newly founded Kingdom of Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes, he became disenchanted and left the army. Through his marriage with the daughter of Josip Frank, leader of the Croatian Party of Rights (Hrvatska Stranka Prava), he became involved with the Croatian nationalists who negated the constitution of 1921. His son, Eugen Dido, was one of the major Ustasha leaders. As the director of the Croatian Worker cooperative (Hrvatski Radiša), Kvaternik was one of the leading figures in the country supporting Ante Pavelić.

On 10 April 1941 in Zagreb, before the city was captured by the Germans, Kvaternik proclaimed the establishment of the Independent State of Croatia. When the head of state, Pavelić, arrived in Croatia, Kvaternik became his deputy. He was also appointed defense minister in the government established on 15 April and commander-in-chief with the rank of marshal of the Croatian military forces. Almost immediately he began to form the Croatian Home Army (Domobranstvo). However, lacking the required skills, he was neither successful in his work nor respected. In addition, because of his pro-Habsburg sympathies, Kvaternik was not the kind of politician with whom the leaders of the Third Reich wanted to work. He resigned his position owing to ill health at the beginning of October 1942, at the time of the purge of former supporters of the Habsburgs. In November of that year Pavelić finally dismissed him, as well as his son, from all their official duties, though the fact was not announced until January 1943. From then on Kvaternik lived in Bratislava, Vienna, and Semmering. While abroad, he criticized the Ustasha regime in Zagreb. Handed over to the Titoist authorities, Kvaternik was sentenced to death (7 June 1947) and executed. (WR) Sources: Biographisches Lexikon, vol. 2; Rudolf Kiszling, "Die Wehrmacht des unabhängigen Staates Kroatien 1941–1945," Österreichische Militärische Zeitschrift, 1965, nos. 261–266; Jerzy Kozeński, Agresja na Jugosławię (Poznań, 1979); Ivo Omrčanin, Dramatis Personae and Finis of the Independent State of Croatia in British and American Documents (Bryn Mawr, Pa., 1983); Bogdan Krizman, Ustaše i Treći Reich, vols. 1–2 (Zagreb, 1983); Bogdan Krizman, Ante Pavelić i Ustaše (Zagreb, 1983); Marcus Tanner, Croatia: A Nation Forged in War (New Haven, 1997).

KVIESIS Alberts (22 December 1881, Tērvetes, Courland–9 August 1944, Riga), Peasant Party politician, president of Latvia. Born into the family of a municipal clerk, in 1902 Kviesis graduated from a high school in Mitava (Jelgava). In 1907 he graduated from the Law School of the university in Dorpat (Tartu). He later worked as an attorney in Mitava, taking an active part in the city's public life. In 1915, as a war refugee in Dorpat, he headed the Committee for Aid to Latvian Refugees. In 1917 he was elected to the Provisional Council of Courland, based in Dorpat. In 1917 he became a member of the Latvian Peasant Union. In 1918 he returned to Mitava and later moved to Riga, where in November of that year he joined the Latvian Provisional National Council. In 1919 he became a member of the Judiciary Council and subsequently its chairman from May 1920 to 1930 (except for the period from 1921 to 1923, when he served as minister of interior). As a deputy to the Constitutional Assembly and member of parliament (Saeima) for three terms, Kviesis represented the Peasant Union and worked closely with Kārlis Ulmanis. In 1926 he became deputy speaker of the parliament.

In 1930 Kviesis was elected president of the state for the first time and was reelected in 1933. He continued to perform his duties after the coup staged by Ulmanis in May 1934. After his second term as president ended, Kviesis resumed his work as an attorney in Riga. During the Soviet occupation of 1939–41 he avoided deportation and lived in the countryside. After the German invasion in July 1941, he returned to his job in Riga, and in 1942 he became a legal adviser to the justice department of the Latvian self-government under German supervision. In 1943 Kviesis became director general of the department. In November 1944 he protested in vain against the conscription of men born in ten successive years into the Latvian Waffen SS Legion. Kviesis died of a heart attack after he had boarded a ship bound for Germany during the evacuation of the city. He was buried in Riga. (EJ)

Sources: Latvijas darbinieku galerija (Riga, 1928); Latvijas vadošie darbinieki (Riga, 1935); Es viņu pazīstu (Riga, 1939); Andrejs Plakans, Historical Dictionary of Latvia (Lanham, Md., 1997).

KWAPIŃSKI Jan [originally Piotr Chałupka] (12 November 1885, Warsaw–4 November 1964, Penley, United Kingdom), Polish Socialist activist. Kwapiński graduated from a factory school, and from 1900 he worked at the rolling mill in Ostrowiec Świętokrzyski. In 1901 he joined the Polish Socialist Party (Polska Partia Socjalistyczna [PPS]). A participant in the 1905 revolution, because of his role in the so-called Ostrowiec Republic, he had to go into hiding. Kwapiński left for Kraków, where he graduated from a course for PPS fighting squadron instructors. From 1906 he was active in the PPS–Revolutionary Faction and directed many armed operations. Arrested in April 1907, he was brought to the ill-famed Tenth Pavilion of the Warsaw Citadel. In December 1907 he was sentenced to death, but the sentence was then commuted to fifteen years of forced labor. In 1908 Kwapiński was sent to Orel Province. Released after the February 1917 revolution, he represented political prisoners in the Executive Committee of the Orel soviet. He founded a PPS cell there and helped Polish refugees.

In November 1918 Kwapiński returned to Poland, taking over the Ministry of Interior administration in Piotrków Trybunalski. In March 1919 he was suspended as a PPS member for his attempts to turn the Polish workers' councils into organs of power. In April 1919, after resuming his PPS membership, Kwapiński was elected to the party's Supreme Council and evolved toward reformism. In 1920 he became a member of the PPS Central Executive Committee. In 1919 he co-organized the Trade Union of Farm Hands of the Polish Republic, and he was chairman of its Main Board until 1939. In 1922–39 he was also chairman of the Central Commission of Trade Unions. Kwapiński combated Communist influence in the trade unions. As an MP (1922–30), he favored legal methods of struggle against the sanacja regime. Co-organizer of the Centrolew opposition bloc, in 1930 Kwapiński was sentenced to a year in prison for a speech in which he attacked Józef Piłsudski. In the mid-1930s he strove to create a democratic opposition bloc and wrote for the Socialist press. In March 1939 he became mayor of Łódź.

In September 1939 Kwapiński went eastward. In June 1940 he was arrested by the NKVD and detained in Altai Yakutsya. Released after the Polish-Soviet Treaty of July 1941, in October 1941 he became a delegate of the Polish Embassy in Tashkent. He left for London, where in January 1942 he became head of the PPS Foreign Committee and a member of its Commission for Homeland Affairs. From June 1942 he was minister of industry and trade; from July 1943, deputy prime minister and minister of industry, trade, and navigation; and from November 1944, also minister of the treasury in subsequent governments-in-exile. Kwapiński firmly opposed concessions concerning Poland's eastern border. After the war he stayed in London and worked in the Central Foreign Committee of the PPS. In 1952–54 he was its deputy chairman and from 1954 to 1961, chairman. Kwapiński authored many works, including the following: O jaką reformę rolną walczy Polska Partia Socjalistyczna? (What kind of land reform is the Polish Socialist Party fighting for? 1925); Organizacja Bojowa. Katorga. Rewolucja rosyjska. Z moich wspomnień

1905–1919 (Fighting Squads. Exile. Russian Revolution. My memoirs 1905–1919; 1928); Pod Rogowem: Ze wspomnień bojowca (At Rogów: Memoirs of a fighter; 1928); 1939–1945: Kartki z pamiętnika (1939–1945: Notes from a diary; 1947); and Moje wspomnienia, 1904–1939 (My memoirs, 1904–1939; 1965). (JS)

Sources: PSB, vol. 16; Słownik biograficzny działaczy polskiego ruchu robotniczego, vol. 3 (Warsaw, 1992); Kto był kim w Drugiej Rzeczypospolitej (Warsaw, 1994); Encyklopedia historii Polski: Dzieje polityczne, vol. 1 (Warsaw, 1994); Jerzy Holzer, Polska Partia Socjalistyczna w latach 1917–1919 (Warsaw, 1962); Tadeusz Wolsza, Rząd RP na obczyźnie wobec wydarzeń w kraju, 1945–1950 (Warsaw, 1998).

KWASIBORSKI Józef, pseudonyms “Dębicki” and “Rafał” (14 October 1898, Minsk–17 October 1980, Pruszków), Polish politician. The son of an artisan metalworker, while a student at Mikołaj Rej Gymnasium in Warsaw, Kwasiborski joined the Polish Military Organization (Polska Organizacja Wojskowa [POW]), and in 1918 he became deputy commander of the POW district of Grodzisk Mazowiecki-Błonie. In 1919 he passed his high school final examinations and began to study medicine at Warsaw University. He discontinued his studies in 1920, when he volunteered to serve in the Polish Army during the Polish-Soviet war. In 1921 he resumed his studies but discontinued them because of financial problems in 1923. Kwasiborski worked at an institution for the mentally ill in Pruszków while simultaneously studying at the School of Journalism; at the Warsaw University Medical School; and, from 1930 to 1931, at the Law School of Warsaw University, but he never completed his studies. In 1924 he became chairman of the provincial board of the Polish Christian Democratic Party, and in 1928 he became a member of the Main Board of this party. From 1937 to 1939 he served as deputy secretary of the Main Board of the Labor Party (Stronnictwo Pracy [SP]).

Kwasiborski fought in the September 1939 campaign, and when it ended, he returned home to Pruszków. In March 1940 he was one of the two vice-chairmen of the underground SP, which he represented in the Coordinating Political Committee from October 1942 to May 1943. From 1941 until the end of the war Kwasiborski served as district delegate of Warsaw Province of the Polish government-in-exile. He fought in the Warsaw Uprising; a few days after its capitulation, he left the city and continued his underground activities in Milanówek and Pruszków. In April 1945 he became a member of the National Unity Council (Rada Jedności Narodowej [RJN]). When Karol Popiel returned from exile in July 1945, Kwasiborski helped to revive the SP, but the original SP leaders had to reconcile themselves to sharing party leadership equally with the Zryw group, known as the Party of National Upsurge (Stronnictwo Zrywu Narodowego [SZN]), led by Zygmunt Felczak and Feliks Widy-Wirski. In December 1945 Kwasiborski became a deputy to the National Home Council (Krajowa Rada Narodowa [KRN]), but when the members of the SZN took control of the SP, he resigned his seat in September 1946. On 31 August 1948 Kwasiborski was arrested by the State Security Office. On 6 April 1951, after a long interrogation in a rigged trial, he was sentenced to life imprisonment on charges including “Fascist and Nazi crimes.” In October 1956 he was released under an amnesty, and in July 1958 his sentence was declared null and void ab initio. Kwasiborski was active in the Literary Archconfraternity in Warsaw and served as chairman of the Community Temperance Committee in Pruszków. In 1972 he received the papal award Pro Ecclesia et Pontifice. (WR) Sources: Kunert, vol. 2; Sojusznicy Gestapo: Proces Kwasiborskiego i innych (trial transcript) (Warsaw, 1951); Stefan Korboński, Polskie państwo podziemne (Paris, 1975); F. Galewicz, “Józef Kwasiborski,” Chrześcijanin w Świecie, 1979, no. 11; Henryk Przybylski, Chrześcijańska Demokracja i Narodowa Partia Pracy w latach 1926–1937 (Warsaw, 1980); Konstanty Turowski, “Dzieje Stronnictwa Pracy w latach 1945–1946,” Chrześcijanin w Świecie, 1982, no. 1; Janusz Zabłocki, Chrześcijańska Demokracja w kraju i na emigracji 1947–1970 (Lublin, 1999).

KWAŚNIEWSKI Aleksander (15 November 1954, Białogard), Polish Communist activist and post-Communist politician. In 1973–77 Kwaśniewski studied in the Department of Transportation Economics at Gdańsk University, but he did not graduate. During his studies he was active in the Socialist Union of Polish Students (SUPS). In 1977 he joined the (Communist) Polish United Workers’ Party (Polska Zjednoczona Partia Robotnicza [PUWP]) and continued his career in the SUPS apparatus as deputy chairman of its provincial administration in Gdańsk (1977–79) and head of the Department of Culture of its Main Board (1979–80). In November 1981 Kwaśniewski became editor-in-chief of the student periodical Ita. Scrutinized during martial law, he continued in this capacity until February 1984, when he became editor-in-chief of the daily Sztandar Młodych. From November 1985 Kwaśniewski was minister for youth affairs, and in October 1987 he assumed the chair of the government Committee for Youth and Physical Culture. In 1988–91 he was also chair of the Polish Olympics Committee. It was then that he made numerous contacts with other youth and sports activists, often connected with special services. From October 1988 to August 1989 Kwaśniewski was minister without portfolio, a member of the Government Presidium, and chairman of the Socio-Political Committee of the Council of Ministers. In this capacity he played a key role in the preparation of the Round Table Talks, and he took part in them as co-chairman of the trade union pluralism group. In the parliamentary elections of 4 June 1989 he ran for the Senate, but he lost.

In late 1989, during the growing crisis in the Communist Party, Kwaśniewski mobilized younger cadres, and with the support of the party leadership he took the lead of the “renewal” wing of the party. At the Eleventh PUWP Congress in January 1990, when the party was dissolved, Kwaśniewski assumed leadership of the post-Communist Social Democracy of the Polish Republic (Socjaldemokracja Rzeczypospolitej Polskiej [SdRP]). He gained the support of the former PUWP apparatus and rank-and-file membership since he successfully nourished their hopes for political survival. In the parliamentary elections of October 1991 Kwaśniewski won a seat and took the lead of the parliamentary Club of the Democratic Left. Former Communists not only managed to appropriate a significant part of state property, becoming the new business class, but they also benefited from the social costs of transformation and a growing discontent with the post-Solidarity elites. Thence the SdRP ratings grew, along with those of a wider coalition, the Democratic Left Alliance (Sojusz Lewicy Demokratycznej [SLD]). In the elections of September 1993 the SLD gained more than 20 percent of the vote and became the largest parliamentary faction. Kwaśniewski made use of the resistance of President Lech Wałęsa and avoided heading the government; this made it possible for him to maintain a distance from the coalition government of the SLD and the Polish Peasant Party under Waldemar Pawlak (1993–95), and even from the governments headed by his SLD colleagues, Józef Oleksy and Włodzimierz Cimoszewicz (1995–97). Kwaśniewski chaired the parliamentary constitutional commission and contributed substantially to the preparation of the constitution that came into force in October 1997.

In the presidential campaign of 1995 Kwaśniewski enjoyed the highest ratings, and the competition among post-Solidarity candidates made him the key challenger to Wałęsa. During the campaign Kwaśniewski skillfully utilized Wałęsa’s mistakes and the social costs of transformation, promoting the slogan “let us choose the future.” He was unharmed by lies he told about his education (he claimed he had a master’s degree) and by inaccuracies in his property statement. Finally, Kwaśniewski defeated Wałęsa by a slight margin in the second round of voting on 19 November 1995, winning 51.7 percent of the vote. Contrary to the expectations of the Kremlin and some of the post-Communists, as president, Kwaśniewski continued his pro-Western foreign policies, supporting the Polish application to NATO and the European Union. He established good personal relations with the leaders of Germany, France, and Great Britain. He also frequently visited Brussels and other European capitals. He succeeded in maintaining close relations with Ukraine and Lithuania without antagonizing Russia. Despite a controversial visit to Minsk in March 1996, Kwaśniewski harbored no illusions as to the Alyksandr Lukashenka regime in Belorussia.

After the victory of Solidarity Electoral Action in the parliamentary elections of September 1997 and the formation of the government of Jerzy Buzek, Kwaśniewski effectively become its counterweight, vetoing several bills and strengthening his personal position as the ultimate arbitrator. In foreign policy he continued the previous line, endorsing the entry of Poland into NATO in March 1999. In domestic policy he generally supported the SLD opposition. Even obvious lapses did not reduce his popularity. Before the presidential elections of 8 October 2000 Kwaśniewski was a firm favorite and was reelected in the first round, winning 53.9 percent of the vote. When in addition the SLD won the parliamentary elections of September 2001, Kwaśniewski co-ruled with his own political base, and he maintained high ratings in the society. He was actively in favor of a reconciliation of the Poles with the Germans, Ukrainians, and Jews. In early 2003 he entered into a conflict with Prime Minister Leszek Miller on several issues, ranging from financial policies to issues of corruption. In May 2004 Kwaśniewski led Poland into the European Union. (WR)

Sources: Mołdawa; Wielka encyklopedia PWN, vol. 15 (Warsaw, 2003); Andrzej Albert [Wojciech Roszkowski], Najnowsza historia Polski 1914–1993, vol. 2 (Warsaw, 1995); Jan Skórzyński, Uгода i rewolucja: Władza i opozycja 1985–1989 (Warsaw, 1995); Antoni Dudek, Pierwsze lata III Rzeczypospolitej 1989–1995 (Kraków, 1997); Janusz A. Majcherek, Pierwsza dekada III Rzeczypospolitej 1989–1999 (Warsaw, 1999).

KWIATKOWSKI Eugeniusz (30 December 1888, Kraków–22 August 1974, Kraków), Polish politician. Born into an intelligentsia family possessing a landed estate, in 1907 Kwiatkowski graduated from a prestigious high school in Chyrów. He studied in Lemberg (Lwów, Lviv) and from 1910 at the Königliche Bayerische Technische Hochschule in Munich, Germany, where he graduated in chemical engineering in 1912. Until 1909 Kwiatkowski belonged to the Union of Polish Youth–Zet and then to the Organization of Pro-Independence Youth–Zarzewie (Embers). In 1909–10 he was a member of the Polish Military Union. From 1913 he worked as a deputy director of a private gas works in Lublin. In the spring of 1916 he joined the Polish Legions. He also worked with the Polish Military Organization (Polska Organizacja Wojskowa). In November 1918 he took part in the disarming of the Austrian garrison in Łuków, following which he joined the Polish Army. Kwiatkowski served as deputy head of the Chemical Department of the Main Supply Administration of the army. Then he lectured in chemistry at the Warsaw Polytechnic, where he became friends with Ignacy Mościcki. Thanks to him, Kwiatkowski later played an important role in economic policy. He worked at the State Factory of Wood Distillation in Hajnówka, and in 1923–26 he was technical director of the Factory of Nitric Compounds in Chorzów.

Kwiatkowski became an active politician after the May 1926 coup d'état, assuming the portfolio of industry and trade (June 1926–August 1930). In 1928–30 and 1938–39 he was an MP on behalf of the Nonparty Bloc of Cooperation with the Government and the National Unity Camp. He advocated a widely planned industrialization. He was associated with the construction of the port and town of Gdynia, a showcase of the modern Polish economy. Suspected by the ruling group of contacts with the opposition, owing to intrigues of the group of Legionnaires, Kwiatkowski was dismissed by Józef Piłsudski. Despite efforts by President Mościcki, Kwiatkowski stayed out of the government until the end of the Great Depression. In 1930 he returned to industry and worked as director of the State Factory of Nitric Compounds in Mościce, near Tarnów, and later of the United State Factories of Nitric Compounds in Chorzów, Mościce, and Jaworzno (1931–35). Kwiatkowski published a lot on current economic issues. In 1932 he published Dysproporcje: Rzecz o Polsce dawnej i obecnej (Disproportions: On past and present Poland), analyzing Poland's position in the world and its economic chances for the future. He drew attention to the German threat and to the necessity for the state stimulation of social and economic activity. This book, handed to the president and prime minister, played an important role in the elaboration of the sanacja economic program. From 1934 Kwiatkowski was a member of the Academy of Technical Sciences in Warsaw, and in 1935 he published Kryzys współczesny i zagadnienia odbudowy życia gospodarczego (The contemporary crisis and the question of economic reconstruction). From 1936 he was an honorary member of the Polish Chemical Association and an ordinary member of the Warsaw Scientific Society.

After the death of Piłsudski, Kwiatkowski returned to political life. On 13 October 1935 he joined the government of Marian Zyndram-Kościałkowski and then that of Felician Sławoj-Składkowski. Until September 1939 he was deputy prime minister and minister of the treasury.

He belonged to the liberal wing of the ruling group, connected with President Mościcki. Kwiatkowski favored the development of Polish industry on the basis of local raw materials and domestic demand and by means of state intervention. He supervised the implementation of economic plans aimed at reducing the gap between Poland and other European nations. His chief investment at this time was the development of the Central Industrial Region (Centralny Okręg Przemysłowy [COP]) within the Four-Year Investment Plan (1936–39), aimed at strengthening Poland's security and reducing unemployment. Located at the confluence of the Vistula and San Rivers, the COP included several modern heavy-industry projects. After the Four-Year Plan was fulfilled ahead of time, in mid-1939 Kwiatkowski announced a comprehensive Fifteen-Year Plan of social and economic development for 1939–54, aimed at the modernization of the army; at the development of a transportation network, agriculture, and education; and at closing the gap between the more and less developed regions of Poland.

After the German invasion of Poland in September 1939, along with the whole government, Kwiatkowski left for Romania. He declared his readiness to cooperate with General Władysław Sikorski, but as a sanacja politician, he was not trusted. Interned in Romania, he stayed there for the whole of the war. He studied economic history and wrote Zarys dziejów gospodarczych świata (Outline of world economic history; vol. 1, 1947; vol. 2 was banned by Communist censorship in Poland).

After World War II, in June 1945 Kwiatkowski was encouraged to return to Poland. In 1945–48 he headed the Office of the Government Delegate for the Reconstruction of the Baltic Coast. In January 1947 he was elected to the parliament on behalf of the Communist-dominated Democratic Bloc. Initially the Communist propaganda was successful in convincing Kwiatkowski to return to Poland, but his planning methodology was contrary to the logic of the centralized and armament-oriented strategy of the Communists, who expelled him from public positions. In 1950 he became chairman of the Committee of Technical Sciences of the Polish Academy of Arts and Sciences, but the academy was soon dissolved by the authorities. From 1948 Kwiatkowski was attacked in public and placed under police surveillance. He was banned from living in Warsaw and the Baltic Coast, so he settled in Kraków. For some time he was allowed to teach at the School of Political Science of the Jagiellonian University, but in the early 1950s he became totally isolated. Until his death Kwiatkowski did chemical research. In the early 1970s the Communist authorities remembered him during the implementation of the economic policy of Edward Gierek. Kwiatkowski was given a few awards, and he was invited to consult in the construction of the Northern Port in Gdańsk. In 1974 Gdańsk University awarded him an honorary doctorate. (PK)

Sources: Słownik Polityków Polskich XX w. (Poznań, 1998); Encyklopedia historii Drugiej Rzeczypospolitej (Warsaw, 1999); Janusz Rakowski, Eugeniusz Kwiatkowski: Szkic biograficzny młodych lat na tle ruchu niepodległościowego 1886–1920 (London, 1977); Marian M. Drozdowski, Eugeniusz Kwiatkowski: Człowiek i dzieło (Kraków, 1989); Janusz Zareba, Eugeniusz Kwiatkowski: Romantyczny polityk (Warsaw, 1998); Andrzej Zwoliński, Eugeniusz Kwiatkowski (Wrocław, 2001).

KYRYCHENKO Oleksiy (25 February 1908, Chornobaivka, near Kherson–29 December 1975, Moscow), Ukrainian Communist activist. Kyrychenko began to work in the apparatus of the Central Committee (CC) of the Communist Party (Bolshevik) of Ukraine (CP[B]U) in 1938. During World War II he served as a political officer. From 1949 to 1953, as second secretary of the CP(B)U CC, Kyrychenko was the highest-ranking Ukrainian in the party at that time. At the CP(B)U CC Plenum in June 1953, shortly after the death of Stalin, Kyrychenko was elected first secretary of the Ukrainian party. He was the first Ukrainian to fill this post, except for the short-lived leadership of Dmytro Manuilsky in the 1920s. Aligned with Nikita Khrushchev, who was first secretary of the CP(B)U CC from 1947 to 1949, Kyrychenko helped to strengthen the Ukrainian representation in the party leadership and to increase Ukraine's economic autonomy. These changes were introduced at the Eighteenth Congress of the Communist Party of Ukraine (CPU) in 1954 and at the Nineteenth Congress in 1956. The authorities of the Ukrainian SSR supported Khrushchev's denunciation of Stalin at the Twentieth Congress of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union (CPSU) (February 1956). The year 1954 saw the beginning of new relations between Kiev and Moscow, marked by the transfer of the Crimean Peninsula from the Russian Soviet Federated Socialist Republic to the Ukrainian SSR on the occasion of the 300th anniversary of the Pereyaslav Agreement. After suppressing the so-called anti-party group led by Georgy Malenkov, Lazar Kaganovich, and Vyacheslav Molotov in June 1957, Khrushchev decided to promote Kyrychenko. Already a member of the CPSU CC Politburo since 1955, in December 1957 Kyrychenko was transferred to Moscow; the position he vacated in Kiev was filled by Nikolay Podgorny. The late 1950s and early 1960s saw the gradual development of political opposition in the Ukraine, and a part of the intelligentsia pinned its hopes on Kyrychenko as a possible successor to Khrushchev as first secretary of the CPSU. However, Khrushchev chose a policy line aimed at increasing central control and extended it to the Ukraine. In January 1960 Khrushchev unexpectedly removed Kyrychenko from party leadership, relegating him to the role of secretary of a district committee in Rostov. Kyrychenko held this post only for half a year. Khrushchev's decision was probably motivated by his fear that Kyrychenko, who described himself as the "second person in the state," might seize power. Later Kyrychenko disappeared from public life. (TS)

Sources: Prominent Personalities in the USSR (Metuchen, N.J., 1968); Encyclopedia of Ukraine, vol. 2 (Toronto, 1988); Robert S. Sullivant, Soviet Politics and the Ukraine 1917–1957 (New York and London, 1962); Borys Lewytzkyj, Politics and Society in Soviet Ukraine 1953–1980 (Edmonton, 1984).

L

LAAR Mart (22 April 1960, Viljandi), Estonian politician. Laar graduated in history from the University of Tartu. In 1983–85 he taught history at a high school in Tallinn, and in 1987–90 he was head of the Department of National Heritage Protection at the Ministry of Culture of the Estonian SSR. In 1987 he co-founded the Estonian Society for the Protection of Monuments, a social organization aimed at cultivating Estonian national traditions, and he became head of the historical section of the society. A member of the Estonian Congress and the Estonian Committee, alternative organs striving for the restitution of independence in 1989–91, Laar was also a deputy to the Supreme Council of the Estonian SSR and of Estonia from April 1990 to August 1992. After the restitution of Estonian independence in August 1991, in the elections to the parliament (Riigikogu) of August 1992 Laar won a seat on behalf of the Estonian Christian Democratic Party, running within the Pro Patria (Isamaa) coalition.

On 21 October 1992 Laar became prime minister. In the same month he was also elected chairman of the Pro Patria Union (Isamaaliit [PPU]). In June 1993 the parliament passed a law on foreigners, imposing an obligation on the Russians living in Estonia to either gain citizenship within two years or obtain a residence permit; in consequence tension grew between Russia and Estonia, all the more so because significant numbers of Russian troops were still stationed in the country. When the parliament eased the law in September 1993, Laar negotiated the withdrawal of Russian troops by the end of August 1994. His government managed to overcome the economic decline connected with the collapse of the Soviet and Russian markets. Accused of embezzlement in the course of an exchange of rubles for Estonian crowns, on 27 October 1994 Laar resigned after his coalition lost the parliamentary majority. In the parliamentary elections of March 1995 the PPU and the Estonian National Independence Party lost, gaining only a few mandates. Laar himself won a seat but remained in the opposition. After new elections, when the PPU won 18 percent of the mandates, on 25 March 1999 Laar became prime minister of the government based on a coalition of the PPU, the Estonian Reform Party (Eesti Reformierakond), and the People's Party Moderates (Rahvaerakond Mõõdukad). He became known as a radical reformer who liberalized the Estonian economy. In foreign policy he strove for Estonian membership in NATO and the European Union. Laar resigned on 28 January 2002 following the dissolution of the ruling coalition. (MK)

Sources: Kes on Kes? Eesti 2000 (Tallinn, 2000); Józef Darski, Estonia: Historia, współczesność, konflikty narodowe (Warsaw, 1995); The Baltic States: A Reference Book (Tallinn-Riga-Vilnius, 1991); Europa Środkowo-Wschodnia 1994–1995 (Warsaw, 1997); Matti Laur, Tõnis Lukas, Ain Mäesalu, Ago Pajur, and Tõnu Tannberg, History of Estonia (Tallinn, 2000); www.ee/eng/govmin/curricula.html; www.rulers.org.

LĀCIS Mārtins, pseudonyms “Jan Sudrabs,” “Dyadya,” and “Garais” (16 December 1888, Večpiebalga Volost, near Cesis–20 March 1938?, USSR), Latvian Communist activist, leading functionary of the Bolshevik political police. Born into a family of farm workers, after graduating from high school, Lācis studied at Shanyavski University in Moscow (1912–1915). He was one of the main founders of the Bolshevik faction of the Social Democratic movement in Latvia. Arrested in 1915 and deported to Irkutsk, he managed to escape. Lācis took part in the February 1917 revolution, during which he headed a Bolshevik organization in the Vyborg district of Petrograd. In July 1917 he became a member of the Petrograd Military Revolutionary Committee and took part in the preparations for a coup. After the October Revolution of 1917, Lācis became one of the top figures in the People's Commissariat of Internal Affairs. In May 1918 he became a member of the Presidium of the Cheka, and in August of that year he was made head of the Cheka in the Fifth Army on the eastern front. On 6 July 1918, during an unsuccessful revolt attempt organized by members of the Socialist Revolutionary Party (SR Party), Lācis was briefly detained by the SR functionaries of the Cheka. After the attempted assassination of Lenin, Lācis advocated bloody reprisals against the opponents of the regime. From 1919 to 1921 he headed the Cheka in the Ukraine and was responsible for mass killings and atrocities. He attended the first congresses of the Bolshevik party after the revolution, but when Stalin consolidated his position and the “Bolshevik old guard” was removed from power, Lācis's position was gradually undermined. At the end of the 1920s he served as deputy chairman of the Central Mining Council. In 1928 he became a party lecturer, and in 1932, the director of the Plekhanov Economics Institute. In 1937, during a purge of Latvian Communists, Lācis was arrested and then executed. His publications include Dva goda borby na vnutrennem fronte (Two years of struggle on the internal front; 1920) and Cherezvychainye komisii po kontrrevolutsii (The Cheka in the struggle against counterrevolution; 1921). These works are important sources for the history of the Bolshevik terror. (WR)

Sources: MERSH, vol. 19; Geroi Oktjabria, vol. 2 (Leningrad, 1967); Who Was Who in the USSR (Metuchen, N.J., 1972); Alexander Rabinovitz, The Bolsheviks Come to Power: The 1917 Revolution in Petrograd (New York, 1976); Adam B. Ulam, The Bolsheviks (New York, 1978); Ilga Gore, Mārtins Lācis: Cekists un literāts (Riga, 1989).

LACIS Vilis (29 April 1904, Rinuži, near Riga–6 February 1966, Riga), Latvian Communist activist. The son of a docker, Lacis spent the years from 1917 to 1921 in Russia. He later worked in the dockers' trade union and at the same time was active in the Communist underground in Latvia. He also wrote novels about the lives of fishermen and dockers, including Putni bez sparniem (The wingless birds, 3 vols.; 1931–33). From 1928 Lacis secretly belonged to the All-Union Communist Party (Bolsheviks). During the Russian invasion in June 1940 he assumed the post of minister of interior, and after the “elections” of July 1940 and the incorporation of Latvia into the USSR, he became head of the Latvian SSR government. After the German invasion Lacis headed partisan activities in the rear of the front. Following the Soviet reconquest, he became head of the Latvian SSR government and held this post until 1959. From 1952 he was also the president of the Supreme Council of the republic. In 1944 and 1949 Lacis approved major deportations of Latvians far into the USSR; he was responsible for the deaths of thousands. Between 1952 and 1961 Lacis was a deputy member of the Central Committee of the CPSU. He was a member of the Soviet delegation to the founding conference of the Warsaw Pact in May 1955 and also represented the Supreme Council of the USSR during official visits to Belgium and Finland. In 1954 he presided over a session of the Council of Nationalities of the USSR. Lacis continued to write and publish extensively; he was the author of novels, stories, and dramas, such as Vedekla (Daughter-in-law; 1943) and Uzvara (The victory; 1945)—model products of Socialist realism for which Lacis was granted the Stalin Award in 1948 and 1952. In July 1959 Lacis was deprived of his post but remained a member of the Central Committee of the Republican Party. In 1987 his letters were published in the volume Vestules. (WR)

Sources: MERSH, vol. 19; Romuald J. Misiunas and Rein Taagepera, The Baltic States: Years of Dependence, 1940–1980 (Berkeley, 1983); Ingrida Sokolova, Vilis Lacis: Ocherk tvorchestva (Moscow, 1959); Vilhelmina Kairisa, Tautas rastnieks Vilis Lacis (Riga, 1964); Miesta zhizni i dieiatelnosti Vilisa Licisa (N.p., 1974); Biruta Gudrike, ed., Atminas par Vili Laci (Riga, 1975).

LAIDONER Johan (12 February 1884, Viiratsi, near Viljandi–13 March 1953, Vladimir), Estonian general and politician. The son of a farm laborer, after graduating from high school in Vilnius, Laidoner studied at the Nikolayev Academy of the General Staff, graduating in 1912. During World War I he fought as a Russian staff officer on the western front. In 1916 he became a divisional chief of staff. In December 1917 he assumed command of an Estonian division, and until 1920 he commanded units that fought against the Bolsheviks for the independence of Estonia. On 23 December 1918 Laidoner formally became commander-in-chief of the Estonian Army. In 1919 he was promoted to major general, and in 1920 he became lieutenant general. In January 1919 the Red Army was thirty kilometers from Tallinn but was driven back eastward owing to the mobilization of all military forces, English and Finnish material assistance, and Laidoner's military talents. In the spring of 1919 the Estonian troops and the Russian units led by Nikolay Yudenich combined their forces to fight against the Bolsheviks. After the end of the war and the signing of the treaty of 2 February 1920, in which Soviet Russia recognized the independence of Estonia, Laidoner transferred to the reserves in March 1920. As a member of parliament for its first three terms, he represented the Union of Farmers (Põllumeeste Kogu), led by Konstantin Päts, and sat on the budget, finance, and national defense committees.

On 1 December 1924 Laidoner returned to the army as commander-in-chief to put down an attempted Communist coup d'état in Tallinn. He subsequently left the army again and became involved in political and economic activities. He became a member of the supervisory boards of several companies but was not successful in that role. The Estonian political system was undermined by the supremacy of parliament and the excessive fragmentation of the political parties. Therefore, many politicians, including Laidoner, sought ways to change the constitution so as to improve the functioning of the state. At the end of 1933 Päts and Laidoner made unsuccessful attempts at reaching an agreement with the Union of Veterans of the War of Independence (Eesti Vabadussõjalaste Liit [EVL]), an extreme rightist organization. When in January 1934 a new constitution came into force and the EVL put forward its own candidate in the presidential elections, Laidoner was proposed by the parties of new settlers and the political center. The course of the campaign indicated that the EVL, which had many supporters, might use force to gain power if it lost the elections. In that situation, Päts decided to take preventive measures. On 12 March 1934 he again appointed Laidoner as commander-in-chief of the army, granting him special powers to restore “law and order.” Over four hundred EVL leaders were arrested, and the organization itself was abolished. By restoring Laidoner to active duty, Päts secured the loyalty of the army because Laidoner was very popular among the military. After the new government consolidated its position, Laidoner continued as commander-in-chief, responsible for the army and for domestic security. Laidoner was a co-founder of the ruling party, the Fatherland League (Isamaaliit), and, as the second-ranking person in the state, he supported the authoritarian regime of Päts. From 1934 to 1940 he also served as chairman of the Estonian Olympics Committee.

In foreign policy, Laidoner was skeptical about the prospects of the Baltic Entente and sought to strengthen Estonia's security by establishing relations with Germany and the Soviet Union. He also advocated the strengthening of political and military relations with Poland; one of the reasons was that his wife, Maria Kruszewska, was Polish. From 1930 to 1940 he was an honorary chairman of the Estonian-Polish Society. He visited Poland for the first time in 1928, during the celebrations of the tenth anniversary of Poland's independence, and for the second time in April 1939, when he and the Polish government analyzed threats to security in Eastern Europe from Germany and the Soviet Union. After the Molotov-Ribbentrop Pact was signed on 23 August 1939, the situation in Estonia became hopeless; therefore Laidoner did not protest the Soviet ultimatum, and, under threat of invasion by the Red Army, he endorsed a new Estonian-Soviet treaty of 28 September 1939 that forced Estonia to agree to the establishment of Soviet bases on the islands of Saaremaa and Hiiumaa and in the Paldiski port. Given the Soviet ultimatum of 15 June 1940, Laidoner supported the decision of President Päts that Estonia offer no resistance, and two days later he signed a formal consent allowing Red Army units, eighty thousand strong, to enter Estonia. On 19 July 1940 Laidoner was deported to Penza. In the spring of 1941 he was arrested and taken to a prison in Kirov and then sent from there to Ivanovo. Shortly afterwards he was transferred to Butyrki Prison in Moscow and finally to Vladimir, where he died. (WR) Sources: Johan Laidoner: Mälestusi kaasaeglasilt (Tallinn, 1934); Johan Laidoner (Stockholm, 1953); Piotr Łossowski, Kraje bałtyckie na drodze od demokracji parlamentarnej do dyktatury (1918–1934) (Wrocław, 1972); Georg von Rauch, The Baltic States, the Years of Independence: Estonia, Latvia, Lithuania, 1917–1940 (Berkeley, 1974); V. Raudvassar, ed., Johan Laidoner, 1884–1953 (Tartu, 1991); K. Deemant, "Johan Laidoneri riigikaitseisest pärandist," Looming, 1994, no. 2; H. Tõnismägi, Ülekohtu toimikud (Tallinn, 1998; Andres Kasekamp, The Radical Right in Interwar Estonia (London, 2000).

LAKOTA Hryhoriy (31 January 1883, Holodivka, Lemkiv region–12 November 1950, Abez, near Vorkuta), Uniate bishop, martyred by the Communists. Lakota was born into a peasant family. He graduated from high school and then completed theological studies in Lemberg (Lviv). Ordained in 1908, he continued his studies in Vienna (1909–13), earning a Ph.D. in theology in 1913. He subsequently taught homiletics, canon law, and church history at a seminary in Przemyśl. From 1918 to 1926 he was its rector. In 1924 he became vicar general, and on 16 May 1926, auxiliary bishop of the diocese of Przemyśl and Sambor (Sambir). After the Red Army invaded Poland in September 1939, Lakota moved to Jarosław, which was occupied by the Germans, and in June 1941 he returned to Przemyśl. At the end of World War II, the administration of the diocese became difficult because the new Polish-Soviet border separated two-thirds of the faithful of the diocese from the diocesan capital. Lakota did not accept the decision of the "Ecumenical Council" of Lviv in March 1946 incorporating the Uniate Church into the Orthodox Church. Consequently, as part of the Soviet effort to abolish the Uniate Church, on 9 June 1946 Lakota was arrested by the Polish Security Service and handed over to the Soviet NKGB. Sentenced to ten years, he was held in Vorkuta labor camps, where he became seriously ill and died. Lakota was the author of (among other works) a commentary on matrimonial law and Try synody Peremys'ky v XVI–XIX st. (Three synods of Przemyśl in the sixteenth–nineteenth centuries; 1939). On 27 June 2001 Pope John Paul II beatified Lakota at a solemn Holy Mass in Lviv. (WR)

Sources: Atanasiï Pekar, Ispovidnyky viry nashoi suczastnosti: Prychynok do martirolohii Ukraïn's'koï Katolitskoï Tserkvi pid sovitami (Toronto, 1982); Martirolohia Ukraïn's'kikh tserkov u chetyriokh tomakh, vol. 2 (Toronto, 1985); Encyclopedia of Ukraine, vol. 3 (Toronto, 1993); Kto był kim w Drugiej Rzeczypospolitej (Warsaw, 1994); Bohdan R. Bociurkiw, The Ukrainian Greek-Catholic Church and the Soviet State (1939–1950) (Edmonton, 1996); Osservatore Romano (weekly edition in English), 2001, nos. 25 and 27.

LAMPE Alfred (14 May 1900, Warsaw–10 December 1943, Moscow), Polish Communist activist. Born into a working-class family, Lampe studied in Warsaw and Paris. In 1917 he became a member of Jugend, a youth organization linked with the Jewish Social Democratic Workers' Party–Poale Zion (Workers of Zion), and in 1921 he joined the Communist Workers' Party of Poland (Komunistyczna Partia Robotnicza Polski [KPRP]; renamed the Communist Party of Poland [Komunistyczna Partia Polski, KPP] in 1925). In 1922 Lampe helped to found the Union of Communist Youth in Poland. Arrested and sentenced to imprisonment after a long interrogation, he was released in 1926. In the same year he became a member of the Central Committee (CC) and in 1929 a member of the Politburo and the Secretariat of the CC of the KPP. Arrested again in 1933, he was sentenced to fifteen years in prison for Communist activities. Lampe was released after the outbreak of World War II in September 1939. He went to the territories occupied by the Red Army, and later, after the German attack on the Soviet Union in June 1941, he went further eastward. In 1942, along with Wanda Wasilewska, Jerzy Borejsza, and Jerzy Putrament, Lampe began working on the editorial staff of the periodical Nowe Widnokregi, and in 1943, on the editorial board of Wolna Polska. On 4 January 1943, together with Wasilewska, he sent a letter to Vyacheslav Molotov proposing the establishment of a new center in charge of Polish affairs, to which Stalin consented. Lampe played a key role among the leaders of the Union of Polish Patriots (Związek Patriotów Polskich [ZPP]) and was one of the leading Polish Communist ideologists in the Soviet Union. He was the author of the ZPP ideological declaration of May 1943 and co-founder of the Tadeusz Kościuszko First Infantry Division, which fought with the Red Army. In the autumn of 1943 he drafted the program of the Polish National Committee, but he did not hold any formal position in it. Lampe died suddenly. (PK)

Sources: Maria Turlejska, "Rozwój myśli politycznej Alfreda Lampego," in Twórcy polskiej myśli politycznej, vol. 2 (Warsaw, 1978); Krystyna Kersten, Narodziny systemu władzy: Polska 1943–1948 (Poznań, 1990); Andrzej Albert [Wojciech Roszkowski], Najnowsza historia Polski 1914–1993, vol. 1 (Warsaw, 1995); Słownik polityków polskich XX w. (Poznań, 1998).

LANDLER Jenő (23 November 1875, Gelse–25 February 1928, Cannes, France), Hungarian Communist activist. The son of a rich land leaser, Landler graduated from a Piarist high school in Nagykanizsa and in law from Budapest University. Later he worked as a lawyer. He was a legal adviser to the Hungarian Railwaymen's Trade Union. After the national railwaymen's strike of 1904 Landler defended the organizers of the strike (the Trial of the Thirteen). In 1906 he was one of the leaders of the Budapest tramway workers' strike, and in 1908 he joined the Hungarian Social Democratic Party (Magyarországi Szociáldemokrata Párt [MSP]), belonging to its left wing. During World War I Landler was one of the leaders of anti-war movements. He was arrested for three months for organizing a strike. From October 1918 Landler headed the office of the Hungarian National Council. On 21 March 1919, as one of the leaders of the MSP left wing, he took part in negotiations with imprisoned Communist leaders on the unification of their parties and on a common takeover of power.

After the Hungarian Soviet Republic (HSR) was formed, Landler became commissar of interior (March–April and May–August 1919), railways and navigation (April–May), and trade (March–April 1919). He organized the Red Guard (militia) and a united armed force of internal security. When Romanian and Czechoslovak troops intervened against the HSR, on 7 May, Landler was appointed commander of the Third Corps of the Hungarian Red Army, leading a victorious campaign in Upper Hungary (Slovakia) in May and June 1919. On 14 July the Governing Revolutionary Council appointed him commander-in-chief of the Hungarian Red Army. After the fall of the HSR, Landler fled to Austria, where he took part in the reconstruction of the Hungarian Communist Party (Kommunisták Magyarországi Pártja [KMP]) and joined its provisional Central Committee. His main task was to reorganize the illegal Communist movement in Hungary by combining legal and clandestine measures. As head of the Hungarian Communist émigré community in Vienna, Landler soon entered into a conflict with the Moscow group of Béla Kun. In 1925 the conflict eased up, and Landler joined in the preparations for the First KMP Congress near Moscow. In 1920–22 in Vienna Landler edited the Hungarian-language Communist periodical Proletár, and he wrote for the Vienna periodicals Bécsi Vörös Újság and Új Március, the Košice Kassai Munkás, the Paris Párisi Munkás, and the Moscow Moszkvai Vörös Újság. On the orders of the Communist International Landler joined the Communist Party of Austria and took part in the third and fourth congresses of the Comintern. Landler died of a heart attack. After cremation in Paris, his ashes were placed at the Kremlin Wall in Moscow in August 1928. (JT)

Sources: Magyar Életrajzi Lexikon, vol. 2 (Budapest, 1969); Magyar Nagylexikon, vol. 11 (Budapest, 2000); Biographisches Lexikon, vol. 3; Rudolf L. Tókes, Béla Kun and the Hungarian Soviet Republic (New York, 1967); Péter Földes, Az utca hadvezére: Dr Landler Jenő élete (Budapest, 1970); Bennet Kovrig, Communism in Hungary from Kun to Kadar (Stanford, 1979).

LANDSBERGIS Vytautas (18 October 1932, Kaunas), Lithuanian politician. Landsbergis was born into a family with patriotic traditions. One of his grandfathers was Jonas Jablonskis, and the other, Gabrielius Landsbergis, was an associate of Vincas Kudirka. In 1955 Landsbergis graduated from a music conservatory, with piano as his subject, and in 1969 he received a Ph.D. in musicology. In the 1960s and 1970s he taught at the conservatory and at the Vilnius Pedagogical Institute. He became an expert in and interpreter of works by Mikolajus Čiurlonis. In 1986 he published Čiurlioniu muzika (The music of Čiurlonis), and in 1992, M. K. Čiurlonis: Time and Content. In June 1988 Landsbergis joined the pro-independence movement, taking the lead of the Lithuanian Movement for Perestroika (Lietuvos Persitvarkymo Sąjūdis). In the period of perestroika, when the Soviet empire was declining and international changes were increasingly favorable, Landsbergis strove for the reconstruction of a sovereign Lithuanian state. He played the key role in demonstrations during the August 1988 anniversary of the Molotov-Ribbentrop Pact and in a brutally crushed demonstration at Gediminas Square in Vilnius on 28 September 1988. At the First Sąjūdis Congress on 22–24 October 1988 Landsbergis consolidated his position in the movement. In March 1989 he was elected a delegate to the Congress of People's Deputies of the USSR, and in May 1989 he led the Lithuanian delegates out of the congress in protest against Mikhail Gorbachev's opposition to Lithuanian demands for autonomy. Owing to Landsbergis's growing personal popularity, he was perceived as the leader of the pro-independence movement. After the elections to the Lithuanian Supreme Council in February 1990, won by the Sąjūdis, Landsbergis was elected chairman of the council, which, by a large majority, announced the independence of Lithuania and the restitution of national symbols on 11 March 1990. This step caused serious international repercussions. The Kremlin protested, but at the same time it annulled the Molotov-Ribbentrop Pact, giving the Lithuanians a substantial boost in their quest. In the West it was feared that the secession of Lithuania might strengthen conservative opposition to Gorbachev and jeopardize perestroika.

From March 1990 to August 1991 Landsbergis zig-zagged between defending the independence declaration and responding to Soviet and Western pressure. On 12 May 1990 he met with the leaders of Estonia (Arnold Rüütel) and Latvia (Anatolijs Gorbunovs) to renew the Baltic Council of the three nations that had been established in 1934. On 13 January 1991 a limited Soviet intervention started in Vilnius, leading to about a dozen victims. Landsbergis bravely defended the Lithuanian desire for independence but decided to suspend the independence declaration. Immediately after the collapse of the Moscow putsch of August 1991, he reactivated the declaration. From this moment Lithuania began to gain international recognition as a sovereign state. Landsbergis faced growing opposition from both the extreme nationalists and the post-Communists. The former attacked him for having risked the Soviet intervention, while the latter fueled the social discontent connected with economic shortages. Therefore in the parliamentary elections of 25 October 1992 the moderate post-Communist Lithuanian Democratic Labor Party of Algirdas Brazauskas won. When Brazauskas also defeated a pro-independence candidate, Stasys Lozoraitis, in the presidential elections of February 1993, Landsbergis seemed completely ousted. In May 1993 Sąjūdis changed its name to the Homeland Union–Lithuanian Conservatives (Tėvynės Sąjunga–Lietuvos Konservatoriai [TSLK]). After four years of economic problems, the parliamentary elections of October and November 1996 brought victory to center and right-wing groups, and Landsbergis was elected speaker of the parliament (Seimas). He held this position until the elections of October 2000. Landsbergis won a seat on behalf of the TSLK, but the party lost and moved into the opposition. In December 1997 Landsbergis was defeated in the first round of the presidential elections. Apart from collections of speeches and documents from 1988–94, in 2000 Landsbergis published his memoirs, Lithuania Independent Again, in Great Britain. From July 2004 Landsbergis was a member of the European Parliament on behalf of the European People's Party. (WR) Sources: Wielka encyklopedia PWN, vol. 15 (Warsaw, 2003); Saulius Sužiedelis, Historical Dictionary of Lithuania (Lanham, Md., 1997); Alfred E. Senn, Lithuania Awakening (Berkeley, 1990); Anatol Lieven, The Baltic Revolution (New Haven, 1993); Romuald J. Misiunas and Rein Taagepera, The Baltic States: Years of Dependence, 1940–1990 (Berkeley, 1993); V. Stanley Vardys and Judith B. Sedaitis, Lithuania: The Rebel Nation (Boulder, Colo., 1997); Bugajski; www.lrs.lt; www.tslt.lt.

LANGE Oskar (27 July 1904, Tomaszów Mazowiecki–2 October 1965, London), Polish economist and political activist. After graduating from high school in Tomaszów Mazowiecki, Lange studied economics at the university in Poznań and at the Jagiellonian University (Uniwersytet Jagielloński [UJ]) in Kraków, where he also worked as an assistant to Adam Krzyżanowski. In 1928 Lange earned a doctorate from the UJ. He contributed to Economic Review and Przegląd Współczesny. In 1929 he studied in England. In 1931 he became an associate professor (docent) at the UJ. From 1934 to 1936 he held a Rockefeller Foundation scholarship in Great Britain and the United States, where he lectured at the London School of Economics, the University of Michigan, and other schools. After a short stay in Poland, Lange again went to the United States. From 1938 to 1945 he was a professor of economics and statistics at the University of Chicago. His publications include “On the Economic Theory of Socialism” in the Review of Economic Studies (1936–37) and Price Flexibility and Employment (1944). Lange was one of the founders of econometrics and a co-founder of the Econometric Society. He also edited Econometrica, a journal of this society. In 1927 Lange joined the Polish Socialist Party (Polska Partia Socjalistyczna [PPS]). In the United States he was a member of the Union for Democratic Action and was active in trade unions.

In 1944 Lange was in the Soviet Union, invited by the Union of Polish Patriots (Związek Patriotów Polskich [ZPP]), a political organization controlled by Stalin. He believed that it would be possible to introduce an innovative model of a Socialist economy in Poland. In November 1945 Lange became an ambassador of the Provisional Government of National Unity (Tymczasowy Rząd Jedności Narodowej) to Washington, and later he was the Polish delegate to the UN Security Council. In December 1947 he returned to Poland and took up the chair of statistics at the Warsaw School of Economics (Szkola Główna Handlowa [SGH]). After the SGH was transformed into the Central School of Planning and Statistics (Szkola Główna Planowania i Statystyki [SGPiS]) and program changes in the Stalinist spirit were introduced, Lange served as rector of the SGPiS from 1952 to 1955. In 1947 he became a member of the Central Executive Committee of the PPS; in December 1948, a member of the Central Committee (CC) of the Polish United Workers' Party (Polska Zjednoczona Partia Robotnicza [PUWP]); and until August 1952 he served as chairman of the PUWP parliamentary representation in the Assembly. Lange accepted the principles of the Six-Year Plan, which was modeled on similar Soviet plans. A supporter of the new system, he also held a chair at the Institute of Social Sciences of the PUWP CC (1950–54). From 1955 to 1956 he was a planning adviser to the government of India and later to the governments of Ceylon, Egypt, and Iraq. Lange's advisory experiences resulted in, among other things, publications on the economies of developing countries. In 1956 Lange took the chair of economics at Warsaw University. In April 1955 he became a member of the Council of State, and in February 1957, its vice-chairman. From 1957 to 1962 Lange was president of the Economic Council, advising the Council of Ministers of the Polish People's Republic, but the Economic Council was marginalized by the PUWP leadership. Despite this, Lange belonged to the Communist establishment until the end of his life. From 1957 to 1959 he was chairman of the UN Economic Commission for Europe. Lange's Wstęp do ekonometrii (Introduction to econometrics; 1958) was translated into many languages and was highly regarded as an academic textbook, as was another one of his works, Ekonomia polityczna (1959; Political Economy, 1963), which, although a Marxist synthesis, was far from schematic in its approach. From 1973 to 1986 eight volumes of Lange's Dziela (Works) were published. (WR)

Sources: PSB; Mołdawa; Jerzy Topolski, "Oskar Lange," Kwartalnik Historyczny, 1966; Stanisław Jankowski, "Oskar Lange," Poczet wybitnych profesorów SGH-SGPiS (Warsaw, 1986); Tadeusz Sierocki, Oskar Lange (Warsaw, 1989).

LARKA Andres (5 March 1879, Pilstvere, near Vilijandi–8 January 1943, Malmö, near Kirov), Estonian general and politician. Born into the family of a miller, Larka served as a volunteer in the tsarist army. In 1902 he graduated from the Vilnius Military Academy and then fought in the 1904–5 Russo-Japanese War. In 1912 Larka graduated from the General Staff Academy in St. Petersburg. He served as an officer in World War I. After the 1917 Bolshevik revolution, Larka was one of the organizers of the first Estonian division and commanded an artillery brigade that was stationed in Haapsalu. Larka became defense minister in the Estonian Provisional Government, and in March 1918 he was promoted to major general. From November to December of 1918 he also served as chief of staff. As minister, Larka helped to form self-defense units (omakaitse) that served as the army, the police, and the civil defense during the critical times of late 1918 and early 1919. Larka supervised the development of Estonian military terminology and the design of uniforms; this work had to be done partly in secret because the German occupation authorities did not recognize the Estonian state. Larka himself had to go into hiding in September 1918. After the capitulation of Germany, he failed to control the situation during the war against the Bolsheviks. The fate of the war of independence changed after Konstantin Päts assumed the portfolio of minister of war and General Johan Laidoner was appointed to the newly established post of commander-in-chief of the army. At the beginning of 1919 Larka became deputy minister of defense. He was seen as a professional without political ambitions, but because of the frequent changes of war ministers, his role was more important than his position would suggest.

In 1925 Larka retired because of ill health (tuberculosis). He bought a farm and a mill in Saue, near Tallinn. In 1926 he joined the Union of Veterans of the War of Independence (Eesti Vabadussõjalaste Liit [EVL]) and was one of its leaders until the end of its existence. Larka was not a charismatic figure, but the pro-Fascist founders of the EVL hoped that he would attract new members and win public support for the EVL. Although he had little influence on EVL members, Larka unreservedly endorsed all EVL activities, which aimed at changing the constitution to support authoritarianism. Larka was the EVL candidate in the presidential elections of 1934. A well-organized campaign, led by Hjalmar Mäe, promoted Larka as the major candidate for president, but a coup d'état staged by Päts thwarted the EVL's success. Unlike other EVL leaders, Larka was not arrested, and he attempted to challenge Päts's activities in the Supreme Court. He also became entangled in the activities of the EVL leaders, who planned a coup to remove the Päts regime from power (December 1935). Arrested along with other EVL leaders after a failed coup attempt, Larka was sentenced to twenty years in prison but was released after two years. He resigned as head of the EVL and withdrew from political life. After the Red Army occupied Estonia, Larka was arrested on 23 July 1940 in Tallinn. He died in a labor camp. (AG)

Sources: Eesti Entsüklopeedia, vol. 14 (Tallinn, 2000); Jaan Soots, "Wojna Estonji o Wyzwolenie 1918–1920," Przegląd Wojskowy, 1929, no. 20; Piotr Łossowski, Kraje bałtyckie na drodze od demokracji parlamentarnej do dyktatury 1918–1934 (Wrocław, 1972); Tõnu Parming, The Collapse of Liberal Democracy and the Rise of Authoritarianism in Estonia (Beverly Hills, Calif., 1975); Andres Kasekamp, The Radical Right in Interwar Estonia (London, 2000); www.mod.gov.ee/english/history/defhistory.html; www.mod.gov.ee/english/history/history.html.

LASTOUSKI Vaclau, pen names "Artsiom Muzyka," "Juri Vereshchanka," "Vlast," and others (8 November 1883, Kalesniki estate, near Dzisna–23 January 1938, Saratov), Belorussian political activist, historian, ethnographer, and writer. In 1902 Lastouski joined the Polish Socialist Party in Lithuania. In 1906–17 he was member of the Belorussian Social Democratic Hramada. From 1909 to 1915 he was secretary of the editorial staff of the Nasha Niva newspaper; in 1916–17 he was editor of the Homan newspaper, and from 1918 he was editor of the journal Kryvichanin. Lastouski initiated an extensive discussion about the development of Belorussian literature; in it Yanka Kupala, Maksim Haretski, and others took part. Lastouski was the owner of the Belorussian Kniharnia (Bookshop) and of the Lastouski Belorussian Publishing Society in Wilno (Vilnius), and he printed and wrote textbooks for schools. He was one of the authors of the "Memorandum of the Representatives of Belorussia," written for an international conference in Lausanne in 1916 and including the Belorussian demand for a national state. At the end of 1918 Lastouski was the head of the Belorussian representation in Lithuania and the Belorussian attaché at the Lithuanian Embassy in Berlin. In 1919 he became the leader of the Belorussian Socialist Revolutionaries.

In December 1919 Lastouski became the head of the first independent government of Belorussia. The Polish authorities did not acknowledge the independence of Belorussia, and on 17 December 1919 Lastouski was put in prison in Minsk. Released in February 1920, he went to Riga. In 1920 he addressed the Entente states with a request for help for the government of the Belorussian People's Republic (BPR). On his initiative the Bloc of Belorussian Parties for the Struggle for an Independent and Unified Belorussia against Soviet Rule and against Polish Occupation was created on 20 October 1920 at a Belorussian conference in Riga. From 1920 to 1923 Lastouski went on diplomatic missions to Belgium, Germany, the Vatican, Italy, Czechoslovakia, France, Switzerland, and other countries. In 1923 he resigned from the post of prime minister of the BPR. Between 1923 and 1927 he edited the journal Kryvich in Kaunas. In 1927 he agreed to come to Soviet Belorussia to create the Belorussian Academy of Sciences (BAS). He also became a member of the BAS. He held the post of director of the Belorussian State Museum, worked at the Institute of Belorussian Culture (Inbelkult), and was head of the BAS ethnographic department. During an ethnographic expedition organized by Lastouski, one of the Belorussian symbols was found, the Cross of Efrasinia Polatskaia. In October 1929 Lastouski was dismissed as secretary of the BAS, and on 21 July 1930 he was arrested and accused of creating the Belorussian Liberation Union. Deprived of his academic title (which was restored to him posthumously in 1990), after ten months of prison he was exiled for five years to Saratov, where he directed the department of old prints and manuscripts of the university library. Arrested again on 20 August 1937, he was convicted by the Supreme Military Court of the USSR and executed in Saratov. Lastouski was vindicated, and his first sentence was overturned in 1958 and the second in 1988.

Lastouski was the author of many works significant for Belorussian culture. In 1910 he published his first scholarly work, Karotkaia historiai Belarusi (Short history of Belorussia). In 1924 he published a concise Russian-Kryuski (Belorussian) dictionary in Kaunas, and in 1926 his Historyia bielaruskai (kryuskai) knihi (History of Belorussian [Kryuski] books) appeared in print, a survey of over one thousand of the most significant manuscripts, old documents, and old prints, dating from the beginning of Belorussian literature in the tenth century to the nineteenth century. Lastouski was the author of the historical fantasy novel The Labyrinth (1923). He translated into Belorussian (for example) the works of Alexander Tolstoy from Russian, Rudyard Kipling from English, Eliza Orzeszkowa and Kazimierz Tetmajer from Polish, and Christian Andersen from Danish. (AS/SA)

Sources: Nicholas P. Vakar, Belorussia: The Making of a Nation (Cambridge, Mass., 1956); Vitaut Kipel and Zora Kipel, eds., Byelorussian Statehood (New York, 1988); Jazep Januszkiewicz, "Nieadmienny sakratar adradzeñnia Waclau Łastouski," Nawuka i technika (Minsk, 1995); Jan Zaprudnik, Historical Dictionary of Belarus (Lanham, Md., 1998).

LATKOVSKIS Vikentijs (20 June 1899, Dagdas, Livonia–3 November 1983, Riga), Latvian Communist activist. After graduating from high school, Latkovskis began to work as a teacher in rural elementary schools in Livonia in 1918. From 1919 to 1921 he served in the Red Army and later returned to Latvia. From 1921 to 1928 he again worked as a teacher. In 1928–30 Latkovskis was a member of the board of Dünaburg (Daugavpils) County. In 1930 he began to work as a teacher in Riga. He simultaneously studied agriculture at the University of Latvia in Riga. After a coup staged by Kārlis Ulmanis in May 1934, Latkovskis was dismissed as a teacher. He moved to his native municipality of Dagdas and took part in the Communist underground. In 1938 he resumed his studies. After the Red Army entered Latvia in June 1940, Latkovskis became deputy minister of interior in the “people’s government” of Augusts Kirchenšteins and chief of the political police of the State Security Board. As a deputy to the People’s Assembly of Latvia, Latkovskis was instrumental in the formal annexation of Latvia by the Soviet Union. From 1940 to 1941 he was one of the main organizers of the terror and deportations of Latvians. He also took an active part in the reconstruction of the Communist Party of Latvia (CPL). In September 1940 he was appointed people’s commissar for the food industry of the Latvian SSR, and later he also became a member of the Supreme Soviet of the Latvian SSR. During the Soviet-German war, Latkovskis served as deputy to the plenipotentiary of the Central Committee (CC) of the CPL and of the Council of People’s Commissars (government) of the Latvian SSR in Omsk and Novosibirsk Provinces (1941–44). In 1944 he returned to Latvia, together with the Red Army, but he played a less important role than previously. From 1954 to 1957 and from 1966 to 1971 he served as deputy minister of the food industry of the republic. (EJ)

Sources: Latvijas PSR Mazā enciklopēdija, vol. 2 (Riga, 1969); Latvijas padomju enciklopēdija, vol. 5 (Riga, 1984).

LATYSHEVSKYI Ivan (17 October 1879, Bohorodczany–27 November 1957, Ivano-Frankivsk [Stanisławów]), Uniate bishop of Stanisławów. Latyshevskyi studied theology in Lemberg (Lviv, Lwów) and then in Vienna, where he earned a doctorate in 1905. He later completed biblical studies in Innsbruck and Vienna. Ordained in October 1907, he worked as a religion teacher at a high school in Stanisławów and taught church history at a local seminary. In November 1918 he began working in the Department for Religious Affairs of the Western Ukrainian National Republic. After the collapse of this republic, he resumed his pastoral work in Polish territories. On 26 January 1930 Latyshevskyi was appointed auxiliary bishop of Stanisławów. He had many duties; for example, he was in charge of the activities of Catholic Action. During the Soviet occupation between 1939 and 1941, Latyshevskyi was frequently interrogated. He continued his pastoral work also during the German occupation. After the return of the Red Army, Latyshevskyi was arrested on 11 April 1945 as part of the campaign to abolish the Uniate Church. Placed in prison in Kiev and held under investigation for one and a half years, he was subsequently sentenced to ten years in a labor camp. He served the sentence in labor camps in Merke, Chulak-Tau, and other places. On 3 June 1955 he was allowed to return to Stanisławów (renamed Ivano-Frankivsk after the war), where he assumed the duties of bishop; these included consecrating his successor, Bishop Ivan Slezyuk. Latyshevskyi died shortly afterwards as a result of the ordeal he had suffered in labor camps. (WR)

Sources: Atanasiy Pekar, Ispovidnyky viry nashoy suczastnosti: Prychynok do martirolohii Ukraïnskoy Katolitskoy Tserkvi pid sovita-mi (Toronto, 1982); Encyclopedia of Ukraine, vol. 2 (Toronto, 1985); Martirolohia ukraïnskikh tserkov u chetyriokh tomakh, vol. 2 (Toronto, 1988); Bohdan R. Bociurkiw, The Ukrainian Greek-Catholic Church and the Soviet State (1939–1950) (Edmonton, 1996).

LAURISTIN Johannes (29 October 1899, Tallinn–28 August 1941, Tallinn), Estonian Communist activist and writer. Born into a working-class family, Lauristin finished only a primary school (1914). He took an active part in the October Revolution and became a member of the Bolshevik party (1917). However, during the war for Estonian independence Lauristin fought on the side of the emerging Estonian republic. He served in the Estonian Army until 1922. A laborer, he was quickly promoted in the structures of the Estonian trade unions. He was one of the organizers of the illegal Union of Communist Youth of Estonia and a co-founder of the Estonian Union of Young Proletarians. He also became a member of the Central Committee (CC) of the Communist Party of Estonia (CPE). From 1923 to 1933 Lauristin was editor-in-chief of Noor Tooline. In 1922 he was elected to the Central Council of Trade Unions of Estonia. At the Third Congress of the CPE he was coopted to the top leadership of the party. In March 1923 Lauristin won a seat in the parliamentary elections as a candidate of the United Front of Working People, but he did not take his seat because on the day before the elections, he was arrested and then sentenced to seven years in prison. While in prison, Lauristin wrote Riigiikukatajad (Destroyers of the state). In 1932 he was released from prison, but after a trial in 1932–34 he was sentenced to an additional six years of hard labor. At that time he began writing the novel Vabariik (Republic), which he did not complete. Released from prison under an amnesty in 1938, Lauristin was coopted to the underground Politburo of the CC of the CPE. Officially, he worked as an inspector of the Health Care Fund in Tallinn. After Estonia was occupied by the Red Army in June 1940 and then incorporated into the USSR as the Estonian SSR in July 1940, Lauristin became first chairman of the Council of People's Commissars of the Estonian SSR, secretary of the CC of the CP (Bolshevik) of Estonia (the name of the party was expanded in October 1940), and a member of the USSR Supreme Soviet. Because of his positions, Lauristin held the primary responsibility, together with Nikolai Karotamm and Karl Säre, for the crimes against the Estonian people committed by the Soviet regime between 1940 and 1941. According to the official version of his death, Lauristin attempted to escape to the Soviet Union on the ship Yakov Sverdlov shortly before the German Army entered Tallinn, but he died at sea. However, there is suspicion that he was murdered by the NKVD. (AG)

Sources: Bolshaia Sovetskaia Entsiklopediia, vol. 14 (Moscow, 1973); Eesti Entsiklopedia, vol. 14 (Tallinn, 2000); Romuald J. Misunas and Rein Taagepera, The Baltic States: The Years of Dependence, 1940–1970 (Berkeley, 1993); Pekka Ereht, "Kas Lauristin tapeti," Eesti Ekspress, 21 October 1999.

LAURISTIN Marju (7 April 1940, Tallinn), Estonian political activist. The daughter of Johannes Lauristin, in 1966 Lauristin graduated in Estonian philology from the University of Tartu, and then she worked as a radio journalist. From 1970 she was connected with the University of Tartu, where in 1976 she received a Ph.D. in philology. She was interested in the sociology of culture, and in the 1980s she worked at the chair of journalism. In 1968–90 she belonged to the CPSU. In 1980, along with Jaan Kaplinski and other intellectuals, Lauristin sent the "Letter of 40," whose signatories demanded the discontinuance of discrimination against the Estonian language; the discrimination increased when Karl Vaino took over as first secretary of the Communist Party of Estonia (CPE). Lauristin's involvement in opposition activities, although still as a party member, brought her authority as a leading representative of party reformers, supporting perestroika and opposing the policies of the Vaino party apparatus.

As dean of the Department of Journalism of Tartu University, on 13 April 1988 Lauristin, along with the head of the Planning Commission, Edgar Savisaar, appeared on television and called for the creation of the People's Front (Rahvariine [PF]), aimed at supporting Mikhail Gorbachev's reforms but with a strong emphasis on the need for a new union agreement for the Soviet republics. At this time the PF opposed overly radical demands, "separatist" tendencies, and full independence, which was demanded by the anti-Communist opposition. During the October 1988 congress of the PF, Lauristin joined its leadership. Under the pressure of anti-Communist civic committees, in September 1989 she supported the civic committee movement and full independence from the USSR. In January 1990 Lauristin left the CPE and took the lead of the Estonian Social Democratic Party of Independence (Eesti Sotsialdemokrate Iseseisvuspartei). After this party merged with two small similar groups, in September 1990 Lauristin co-founded the Estonian Social Democratic Party, renamed the Party Moderates (Mõõdukad [PM]), which joined the Socialist International. In the elections to the Estonian Congress in February 1990 Lauristin won a seat and joined the Estonian Committee, but because of rivalry between the PF leaders and the anti-Communists, as well as Lauristin's opposition to Prime Minister Savisaar's policies, in October 1990 she was expelled from the committee. In 1989–91 Lauristin was a member of the Supreme Council of the USSR, and in 1990–92, of the Supreme Council of the Estonian SSR. In the government that emerged after the first free elections of October 1992 under Mart Laar, Lauristin became minister of social affairs, but owing to her conflict with the prime minister, she left the government.

In the 1995 elections Lauristin lost and stayed out of the parliament. In 1999 she managed to win a seat again. Later her ratings declined, and in 1999 she lost in the local elections in Tartu. The fusion of her party with a conservative faction led by Toomas Hendrik Ilves into the People's Party Moderates further eroded her influence, and in 2000 Ilves took over the party's leadership. Lauristin authored many scholarly works, including the following: Towards a Civic Society (1993); Return to the Western World: Cultural and Political Perspectives on the Estonian Postcommunist Transition (co-author; 1997); Political Control and Ideological Canonisation: The Estonian Press during the Soviet Period (1997); Transformations of the Public Sphere and the Changing Role of the Media in Postcommunist Society (1998). (AG)

Sources: Eesti Enstuklopeedia, vol. 14 (Tallinn, 2000); Anatol Lieven, The Baltic Revolution (New Haven, 1993); Rein Taagepera, Estonia: Return to Independence (Boulder, Colo., 1993); Mel Huang, "Does Estonia Have a Left?" Central European Review, 2000, no. 13; Józef Darski Web site: <http://republika.pl/darski/kraje/estonia/chronb.htm>.

LAUŠMAN Bohumil (30 August 1903, Žumberk–9 May 1963, Prague), Czech Social Democratic politician. In his youth Laušman worked at a bank. Between 1935 and 1939 he was an MP, and in 1938–39 he was secretary of the National Labor Party (Národní Strana Práce). In 1939 he emigrated to France and then to Great Britain, where he was active in the Czechoslovak National Council. After his return to Czechoslovakia in the fall of 1944 Laušman, as a representative of the party, worked in Banská Bystrica in the government-in-exile for the affairs of the liberated territories. In 1946 he was elected to the parliament. Although he was closely connected with Zdenek Fierlinger, Laušman was a member of the wing of the Social Democratic Party (Československa Sociální Demokracie) that was independent from the Communists. After the elections of May 1946 Laušman assumed the post of minister of industry in the government of Klement Gottwald. At a congress in Brno on 16 November 1947 the Social Democrats made a shift toward greater independence from the Communists, and Laušman became secretary general of the party. In February 1948 at Laušman's house ministers gathered who had resigned from the government in protest against the Communization of the police. Laušman unsuccessfully attempted to mediate, criticizing both the decision of the non-Communist ministers and the Communist undertakings. He let the most vigorous opponents of communism resign from the leadership of Social Democracy, but in March 1948, after a coup, Laušman was dismissed as head of the party. He then managed a power plant in Bratislava. In 1949 he emigrated, at first to Yugoslavia and then to Austria. He worked in the Czechoslovak section of Radio Free Europe. In December 1953 Laušman was abducted from Austria by agents of Soviet and Czechoslovak "security." Imprisoned during an investigation and sentenced to seventeen years' imprisonment in 1957, he died in Ruzyně Prison in Prague under vague circumstances. Laušman published (among other works) Hospodářská výstavba republiky (Economic development of the republic; 1946), Řeknu pravdu (I will tell the truth; 1947), and Kdo bol vinen? (Who was to blame? 1953). (WR)

Sources: ČBS; Encyklopédia Slovenska, vol. 3 (Bratislava, 1979); Kurt Glaser, Czecho-Slovakia: A Critical History (Caldwell, Idaho, 1961); Stefan Pagáč, Svedek z cely číslo 13: Dokument (New York, 1979); Stefan Pagac, State Secret No. 1: Warning for the Free World (New York, 1981).

LÁZÁR György (15 September 1924, Isaszeg), Hungarian Communist activist. A draftsman by trade, in 1945 Lázár joined the Hungarian Communist Party, quickly advancing in its ranks. From 1948 he held directorial positions in the State Planning Commission. In 1958 he became the commission's deputy chairman, and in 1973, chairman. In this capacity he counteracted a more rational economic policy. From February 1970 to June 1973 Lázár was minister of labor, and from June 1973 to May 1975, deputy prime minister. Until 1968 he was a member of the Central People's Revisory Commission and then a member of the Central Committee (CC) of the Hungarian Socialist Workers' Party (HSWP). In 1975 he became a member of the HSWP CC Politburo and an MP. Lázár was among the closest friends of János Kádár. From 15 May 1975 to 25 June 1987 he was prime minister. In this position, he impeded the economic reforms of his predecessor, Jenő Fock. Lázár tried to avoid ideologically risky reforms and to shield the inefficiency of the economic system by accepting huge foreign loans, especially in the 1980s. He became a symbol of the so-called goulash socialism, based on spreading social opportunism and apathy. Lázár signed an agreement with Czechoslovakia on the construction of the ecologically disastrous Nagymaros-Gabčíkovo Dam on the Danube River. He stepped down in the face of aggravated economic crisis. He became the HSWP deputy general secretary, but as a result of pro-democratic and pro-market movements, in May 1988 Lázár was expelled from his party positions, and then he lost his parliamentary mandate. (AH)

Sources: Bennet Kovrig, Communism in Hungary from Kun to Kádár (Stanford, 1979); A nép támogatásával a szocializmus útján: Válogatott beszédek, cikkek (Budapest, 1983); Miklós Molnár, From Béla Kun to János Kádár: Seventy Years of Hungarian Communism (New York, 1990); 20 századi magyar történelem (Budapest, 1997).

LAZARENKO Pavlo (23 January 1953, Karpivka, near Dnepropetrovsk), Ukrainian Communist and post-Communist activist. The son of a kolkhoz director, after primary school Lazarenko worked as a driver in his father's enterprise, and from 1971 to 1973 he served in the Soviet Army in Central Asia. In 1978 he graduated from the Institute of Agrarian Economics in Dnepropetrovsk. In 1978–79 he worked as an agronomist, and from late 1979, as director of the Mikhail Kalinin kolkhoz in the New Moscow region. From December 1985 Lazarenko headed the Agricultural Department of the regional Communist Party committee in Dnepropetrovsk, and from August 1990 he was deputy chairman of the regional executive committee. In early 1992 Leonid Kravchuk appointed Lazarenko presidential representative in Dnepropetrovsk. The promotion of an agronomist to a key position in the Ukrainian industrial center was intended to reduce the influence of the local lobby, but Lazarenko took the lead of the Dnepropetrovsk oligarchy and helped it build a leading position in the Ukraine. Lazarenko became co-owner of a number of local presses and television channels. From 1994 he was a member of the Ukrainian Supreme Council, and in May 1995 he became deputy prime minister responsible for the power sector in the government of Yevhen Marchuk. When President Leonid Kuchma dismissed Marchuk, on 27 May 1996 Lazarenko became prime minister.

Lazarenko's key success as prime minister was the introduction of a Ukrainian currency—the hryvna. He also consolidated the position of his oligarchs on the fuel market. In July 1996 Lazarenko barely avoided a bomb attack in Kiev, believed to be an attempt by the rival Donetsk group to eliminate him. On 1 July 1997, pressured by Kuchma, Lazarenko stepped down. He became head of the Dnipropetrovsk regional council and a member of the Supreme Council. In September 1997 he took the lead of the All-Ukrainian Association Community (AUAC; Hromada [AUAC]), which proclaimed itself to be a Social Democratic party opposing President Kuchma. In December 1998 Lazarenko was arrested in Switzerland on charges of the embezzlement of the equivalent of U.S.$20 million in connection with financial settlements for the supply of gas from Russia. He was let out on a bail of U.S.$3 million, and in early 1999 he returned to the Ukraine. Lazarenko explained the accusation against him as a part of Kuchma's presidential campaign. When in February 1999 the prosecutor's office moved to deprive him of parliamentary immunity, he left the Ukraine. He applied for political asylum in the United States, but he was arrested there. His extradition was requested by both the Ukraine and Switzerland (money laundering in local banks). In early 2000 Lazarenko accused Kuchma's aides of illegal financial deals. He declared his readiness to return to the Ukraine on condition of immunity, but the Supreme Council did not grant it. In March 1999 the AUAC dissolved, and most of its MPs joined a new party, Fatherland (Batkivshchyna), led by Lazarenko's hitherto ally, Yulia Tymoshenko. (TS)

Sources: Europa Środkowo-Wschodnia 1996 (Warsaw, 1998); Radziśława Gortat, Ukraińskie wybory (Warsaw, 1998); Bohdan Nahaylo, The Ukrainian Resurgence (Toronto, 1999); Bugajski; www.rulers.org.

LEBED Dmytro (11 January 1893, Nikolayevka, Yekaterinoslav Province–30 October 1937?), Ukrainian Communist activist. Born into a poor peasant family, Lebed began working as a locksmith in 1908. In 1909 he became a member of the Bolshevik party and was active in its structures in Yekaterinoslav (now Dnipropetrovsk, Ukraine) until 1920. From 1918 to 1920 he was in the Commissariat of Internal Affairs of the Soviet Ukraine, and in 1920 he became a member of the Central Committee (CC) of the Communist Party (Bolshevik) of Ukraine (CP[B]U). Lebed was one of the representatives of the “Yekaterinoslav orientation,” which aimed to establish a so-called Donetsk–Kryvy Rih Soviet Republic. They wanted to introduce Soviet rule only in the eastern, industrialized part of the Ukraine and did not hope for a revolution in the central and western Ukraine, which was dominated by the peasants. Lebed considered the revolution in the Ukraine to be part of the Russian Revolution, which was to grow into a world revolution. He believed that any compromise between the Communist ideas of internationalism and the national ideas amounted to ushering in counterrevolution. Lebed's view, according to which the “building of socialism” required that the proletarian urban culture assume leadership over the peasant rural culture, meant a subordination of the Ukrainian people—as the more “backward”—to the Russian culture and language. Lebed developed these views in Sovetskaia Ukraina i natsionalnyi vopros za piat' let (Soviet Ukraine and the national question during the last five years; 1924). From 1921 to 1923 Lebed held the post of second secretary of the CP(B)U CC. When in 1925 in Moscow it was decided to increase the pace of Ukrainization, Emanuel Kvirying, head of the CP(B)U, was replaced by Lazar Kaganovich; this meant the end of Lebed's career as well. Mykola Skrypnyk, the main strategist of Ukrainization until its end in the early 1930s, described Lebed's theory as an expression of Great Russian nationalism in the Ukraine and compared it to Ukrainian nationalism, regarding both as equally dangerous for efforts to resolve the national question in the Soviet Union. Arrested during the Great Purge, Lebed died in prison. (TS)

Sources: MERSH, vol. 19; Encyclopedia of Ukraine, vol. 3 (Toronto, 1993); E. Hirschak, Na dva fronta v borbe s natsionalizmom (Moscow and Leningrad, 1930); Mykola Skrypnyk, Do teorii borotby dvokh kultur (Kharkiv, 1926).

LEBED Mykola, pseudonyms “Skyba” and “Maksym Ruban” (23 November 1909, Strilychi Novi, near Bóbrka–19 July 1998, Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania), Ukrainian nationalist politician. From 1932 to 1934 Lebed was a liaison officer between the National Executive of the Organization of Ukrainian Nationalists (OUN), based in Poland, and its Directorate (Provid) abroad. In June 1934, on Stepan Bandera's recommendation, he organized the assassination of the Polish interior minister, Bronisław Pieracki. In the preparations for the assassination he was assisted by (among others) his future wife, Daria Hnatkivs'ka. After Pieracki's assassination, Lebed fled, at first to Gdańsk and then to Germany. At the demand of the Polish authorities he was arrested, on the orders of Heinrich Himmler, and delivered to Poland. In 1936 in Warsaw, Lebed was sentenced to death in a trial of OUN activists (among them Bandera); the sentence was then changed to life imprisonment. Lebed served the sentence first in Święty Krzyż, then in Rawicz and Siedlce. On 5 September 1939 he escaped and returned to his native land.

In 1940 in Rome, Lebed took part in a mediation effort between members of the Bandera faction and Andriy Melnyk. After the split of the OUN into a revolutionary faction (i.e., the followers of Bandera [OUN-B]) and a Melnyk faction, Lebed became a member of the OUN-B Directorate (Provid). In June 1941 he joined the government of Yaroslav Stetsko, which was established on the initiative of Bandera followers after the outbreak of the German-Soviet war. After the Germans arrested members of this government, as well as numerous activists of the OUN-B, on 15 September 1941 Lebed assumed the duties of head of the OUN-B. He organized three OUN conferences. He was hunted by the Gestapo, which arrested his mother, his sister, and (in January 1944) his wife and child. On 13 May 1943 his duties as providnik (head) of the OUN-B were taken over by a three-member Bureau of the Provid, headed by Roman Shukhevych. Lebed's opposition to the democratization of the OUN program was the reason for his leaving. According to another, less likely version, Lebed was forced to step down from his post because he opposed the extensive development of the Ukrainian guerrilla movement.

Lebed rejected Shukhevych's proposal to join the Bureau of the Provid. Finally, he became responsible for directing the foreign policy of the OUN-B. Between 1941 and 1944 he headed talks with the Polish Home Army (Armia Krajowa [AK]) and with the Delegation of the Polish Government-in-Exile. In the Ukrainian Supreme Liberation Council (UHVR), which was established in July 1944 and was the political superstructure of the Ukrainian Insurgent Army (Ukrainska Povstancha Armiia [UPA]), Lebed served as secretary general for foreign affairs. In that capacity he directed talks with the Hungarians that led to the establishment of local agreements between the Ukrainian guerrillas and Hungarian units. He mediated in talks between the UPA and the Germans that resulted in (among other things) the release of many members of the Bandera faction (including Bandera and Stetsko) from Nazi concentration camps. Lebed left the Ukraine in July 1944, when the war front was passing, and he was given the task of gaining the support of Western allies for the Ukrainian cause.

From 1945 Lebed was in exile in Italy, Germany, and (from 1949) the United States, where he held the post of secretary general of the foreign representation of the UHVR. He was one of the initiators of another split in the OUN, as a result of which the so-called OUN abroad was created. In 1952–73 Lebed was head of Prolog, a research and publishing institute in New York that informed Western public opinion about the policies of the USSR in the Ukraine. He left commentaries and the monograph UPA, which was published in 1946. Lebed's attitude toward the mass murders of Poles in Volhynia (Wołyń) remained vague. According to some interpretations, he opposed them, while according to others, it was Lebed who had ordered the liquidation of thousands of Polish civilians. In 1988 and 1992, the American press presented information about Lebed's cooperation with the Gestapo and his participation in the murders of Jews in Eastern Galicia. His responsibility for the death of Minister Pieracki was noted, as well as his cooperation with the CIA after the war. Lebed consistently denied these accusations, maintaining that they were based upon fabrications by the KGB. (GM)

Sources: Entsyklopediia Ukrainoznavstva, vol. 6; Encyclopedia of Ukraine, vol. 3 (Toronto, 1993); The Ukrainian Weekly, 26 July 1998; Ryszard Torzecki, Polacy i Ukraińcy: Sprawa ukraińska w czasie II wojny światowej na terenie II Rzeczypospolitej (Warsaw, 1993); Anatol Kaminskyi, Vasyl Okhrimovich (Toronto, New York, and London, 1999); Petro Mirchuk, Ukrainska Povstanska Armiia 1942–1950 (Lviv, 1993); Chicago Sun, 17 April 1988; New York Times, 17 September 1992.

LECHOWICZ Włodzimierz (16 January 1911, Szczucin, near Dąbrowa Tarnowska–25 November 1986, Warsaw), Polish political activist. Lechowicz graduated in philosophical studies from Warsaw University and then worked in the government administration. From 1936 to 1939 he was secretary general of the Association of Government Officials. Before World War II he belonged to the illegal Communist Party of Poland (Komunistyczna Partia Polski [KPP]). During the German occupation he was active in the underground resistance movement; for example, he participated in the work of the State Security Corps, which was the embryo of a police force, and in the work of the sabotage department of the Command of the Underground Struggle. He also cooperated with the General Staff Information Department of the Communist People's Guard (later the People's Army) and with Soviet intelligence. In 1942 Lechowicz became a member of the Democratic Party (Stronnictwo Demokratyczne [SD]). From 1945 to 1947 he worked in the Ministry of Regained Territories. In November 1945 he became a member of the SD Central Committee (CC); in July 1946, a member of the Political Committee of the SD CC; and in November of that year, deputy chairman of the party. Lechowicz won a parliamentary seat in the rigged elections of January 1947. From February to March 1947 he served as minister for supplies and trade and subsequently as minister for supplies. In September 1948 he was dismissed from his ministerial post. Arrested in October of that year, Lechowicz was held in prison for seven years although he had not been convicted. Because of his double role during the occupation, he was subjected to torture by the Communists, who wanted to extort testimony against Władysław Gomułka and other activists of the national Communist underground to incriminate them as collaborators with the pro-independence (“reactionary”) underground movement. Lechowicz was stripped of his parliamentary immunity in April 1949—that is, after his imprisonment. In July 1955 he was sentenced to fifteen years in prison. Released in May 1956, he was rehabilitated in December 1956. From 1956 to 1969 Lechowicz again served as deputy chairman of the SD CC. In 1957–61 he was editor-in-chief of the newspaper Kurier Polski. He was also president of the board of the Epoka Publishing House. From July 1961 to December 1970 he was chairman of the Small-Scale Producers’ Committee, which was in charge of crafts. From 1970 to 1974 Lechowicz served as ambassador to Holland. From 1957 to 1972 he was an MP in the Assembly of the Polish People’s Republic. (WR)

Sources: Mołdawa; Maria Turlejska, Te pokolenia żałobami czarne . . . Skazani na śmierć i ich sędziowie 1944–1954 (London, 1989); Stanisław Marat and Jacek Snopkiewicz, Ludzie bezpieki (Warsaw, 1990).

LEDERER Jiří (15 July 1922, Kvasiny, district of Rychnov nad Kněžnou–12 October 1983, Birnbach, Germany), Czech journalist, translator, and commentator. From 1945 to 1948 Lederer studied in the Department of Philosophy at Charles University and at the Higher Political and Social School in Prague. From 1948 to 1949 he studied at the Jagiellonian University in Kraków. In 1951–54 he worked as a turner. In 1946 he began to contribute articles to Social Democratic newspapers. In 1954 he started working as a journalist for the periodical Svět sovětů, then for the newspaper Večerní Praha, and then for Technické noviny. Between 1962 and 1967 he was head of a research group of Czechoslovak radio. One of the leading journalists during the Prague Spring, Lederer wrote for Literární listy and Reportér. During the so-called normalization period, he took part in opposition activities, for which he was imprisoned several times (1970, 1972–73, 1977–80). In 1977 Lederer signed Charter 77. In 1980 he emigrated to the Federal Republic of Germany, where he worked as a journalist. In underground periodicals and abroad, he published a number of commentaries and essays, including České rozhovory (Czech conversations; 1979; published in Cologne). He wrote a book devoted to Jan Palach, Palach: Zpráva o životě, činu a smrti českého studenta (Jan Palach: An account of the life, activities, and death of a Czech student; 1990); it was published posthumously. (PU)

Sources: ČBS; J. Brabec et al., Slovník zakázaných autorů 1948–80 (Prague, 1991); František Knopp, Česká literatura v exilu 1948–89: Bibliografie (Prague, 1996).

LEDNICKI Aleksander (15 July 1866, Minsk–11 August 1934, Warsaw), Polish lawyer and politician. The son of small landowners who took part in the January Insurrection of 1863, after losing his father, Lednicki was brought up by his grandfather in a patriotic spirit. In 1885 he passed his high school final examinations in a gymnasium in Minsk, and in 1889 he completed law studies in Yaroslavl. He subsequently worked as an attorney in Moscow, gaining fame and fortune, and in 1903 he became a member of the local bar association. Lednicki’s high earnings allowed him to buy several landed estates in Lithuania and Belorussia. He also owned a lot of real estate in Moscow, Minsk, Smolensk, and Vilnius. After becoming the chairman of the United Bank in Moscow in 1910, he was active among the Poles in Russia and in Russian liberal circles. One of the founders of the Progressive Democratic Union in 1904, Lednicki served as the party’s vice-president. In 1906 he was elected to the first State Duma. After the dissolution of the Duma, he wrote a protest manifesto, as a result of which he was imprisoned for three months in 1908. From 1907 to 1910 Lednicki was a member of the Grand East of the Peoples of Russia lodge, and he maintained Masonic contacts later on. In 1905 he helped to found the Constitutional Democratic Party (also known as the Kadets), and he was a member of its Central Committee until 1916. In April 1916 a conference of this party was held in Lednicki’s apartment in Moscow, at which his proposal that the Kingdom of Poland be granted autonomy was adopted as part of the party’s program.

During World War I Lednicki was active in the Central Civic Committee. He was also the founder of the Polish Committee for Aid to War Victims and served as its chairman from 1914 to 1917. He initially supported Polish-Russian rapprochement as a means to secure the autonomy of the Polish territories, and he worked with the National Democrats and the Party of Real Politics (Stronnictwo Polityki Realnej [SPR]). As the Russian position on the issue of Polish autonomy was unclear and the tsarist army suffered defeats, in 1916 Lednicki called for the independence of Poland and joined the underground Polish Independence Association, whose members included activists of the pro-Piłsudski Polish Military Organization (Polska Organizacja Wojskowa [POW]). After the February 1917 revolution, the Provisional Government appointed him chairman of the Liquidation Commission for the Affairs of the Kingdom of Poland (Komisja Likwidacyjna do spraw Królestwa Polskiego) on 15 March 1917. Thanks to Lednicki’s efforts as chairman of this commission, the Provisional Government issued a declaration on 30 March that accepted the principle of Polish independence. Lednicki also founded Polish democratic committees in Russia that recognized the Provisional Council of State and the Regency Council; consequently, he came into conflict with members of the National Democratic movement. After the Bolshevik revolution, when the Regency Council appointed Lednicki as its representative to liaise with the new government, the National Democrats increased their attacks against him, accusing him not only of wrong political choices, but also of dishonesty.

The attacks by the National Democrats, particularly by Zygmunt Wasilewski, a journalist, did not stop after Lednicki's arrival in Warsaw in October 1918. From 1919 to 1923 Lednicki edited the periodical Tydzień Polski. His numerous publications of that period include Z lat wojny: Artykuły, listy, przemówienia 1915–1918 (The war years: Articles, letters, speeches 1915–1918; 1921), Nasza polityka wschodnia (Our eastern policy; 1922), and Zadania chwili (Tasks of the moment; 1922). In 1926 Lednicki successfully sued Wasilewski for slander but retired from active politics. He nonetheless continued to serve as president of the Polish Pan-European Union. He also worked as a legal counselor to (among others) Western entrepreneurs who invested in Poland, and he was a member of the supervisory boards of many banks and companies. In May 1934 Lednicki mediated an agreement, very disadvantageous for Poland, between the Polish government and the French shareholders of a factory in Żyrardów. Under fire from part of the government press, for whom he was a scapegoat, Lednicki committed suicide. (WR)

Sources: PSB, vol. 16; Antoni Pieretiatkowicz, Współczesna encyklopedia życia politycznego (Warsaw, 1931); Who's Who in Central Europe, 1935/36 (Zurich, 1937); Waclaw Lednicki, Pamiętniki, vols. 1–2 (London, 1963–67); Janusz Pajewski, Wokół sprawy polskiej Paryż-Lozanna-Londyn, 1914–1918 (Poznań, 1970); Andrew Kier Wise, "Aleksander Lednicki: Polish Patriot and Russian Liberationist," Ph.D. diss., University of Virginia, 1996; Ludwik Hass, Masoneria polska XX wieku (Warsaw, 1996).

LEDNICKI Waclaw (28 April 1891, Moscow–20 October 1967, Berkeley), Polish literary historian. The son of Aleksander Lednicki, Lednicki graduated from a gymnasium (high school) in Moscow in 1910. He subsequently studied Polish philology at the Jagiellonian University in Kraków and Romance and German philology at Moscow University. After completing his studies in 1915, he worked as a teacher. In 1918 he served as secretary of the Regency Council representation, liaising with the Bolshevik government. This representation was directed by his father. After returning to Poland, Lednicki served in the Polish Army (1919–20), and then he devoted himself to scholarly work. In 1922 he earned a Ph.D. in Romance philology, but he later became primarily involved in Russian literature. In 1926 he received the postdoctoral degree for a study on Aleksandr Pushkin.

However, for political reasons, Lednicki did not obtain a professorship at the Jagiellonian University until 1928. He also held the chair of Russian literature at the Université Libre in Brussels. After the Nazi invasion of Poland, Lednicki managed to escape to Belgium; from there he made his way, via Portugal, to the United States. From 1940 to 1944 he lectured at Harvard University, subsequently becoming a professor of Slavic studies at the University of California in Berkeley. In 1947 he was awarded an honorary doctorate by the Université Libre in Brussels. Lednicki was one of the founders of the Polish Institute of Arts and Sciences in New York. In 1962 he retired. Lednicki was one of the pioneers in the study of Russian literature in the United States. He studied Aleksandr Pushkin, Leo Tolstoy, and Fyodor Dostoevsky. He also investigated the relations between Russian writers and Poland. Lednicki's publications include the following: Przyjaciele Moskale (Muscovite friends; 1935); Panslavism (Pan-Slavism; 1948); Russia, Poland, and the West (1954); Pushkin's Bronze Horseman (1955); and his extensive Pamiętniki (Diary; 1963–1967). The Adventures of a Modern Gil Blas during the Last War (1971) was published posthumously. (WR) Sources: PSB, vol. 16; W. Jakubowski, "Droga naukowa Waclawa Lednickiego," Zeszyty Naukowe UJ, 1970, vol. 17; Polacy w historii i kulturze krajów Europy Zachodniej (Poznań, 1981).

LEKA I (6 April 1939, Tirana), successor to the Albanian throne. The son of Ahmed Zogu (King Zog) and Geraldine Apponyi, Leka was born on the eve of the Italian invasion of Albania and left it as a baby only a few days old. He graduated from Sandhurst Military Academy in Great Britain. After his father died in 1961, Leka was proclaimed king of Albania by a group of Albanian monarchists in Paris. Arrested several times for the illegal possession of arms—for instance, in Thailand and Spain—in 1972 Leka held a conference in Madrid and announced the formation of the Military Council of Liberation of Ethnic Albania, which he would head. According to press accounts, he dealt with the military training of Albanian volunteers. Expelled from Spain, in February 1979 Leka went to Rhodesia, where he dealt in the arms trade. From 1980 he lived in Johannesburg, South Africa. From 1989 he repeatedly announced plans to return to Albania, where he claimed to have a major influence. Leka's vision of monarchy was similar to that of King Juan Carlos of Spain. In order to gain support in Albania, Leka established the National Democratic Party, which later assumed the historical name of the Movement for Legality; it gained 2–3 percent of the vote in subsequent elections. Leka returned to Albania on 19 November 1993, but he was expelled because he held an invalid passport (he indicated "King of Albania" as his profession). After the crisis connected with financial pyramids, in 1997 Leka managed to return to Albania, where the parliamentary elections were connected with a referendum on the political system. On 29 June 1997 the majority of Albanians rejected monarchy. On 3 July 1997 Leka organized a rally in downtown Tirana and accused the ruling Socialists of having falsified the referendum. He appeared armed, and the Socialists interpreted this as an attempt at a coup. Leka left the country, and he was sued in absentia. Late he lived on a farm near Randberg in South Africa with his wife, Susan Cullen-Ward, and his children. (TC)

Sources: William Bland and Ian Price, A Tangled Web: A History of Anglo-American Relations with Albania (1912–1955) (London, 1986); Gwen Robyns, Geraldine of the Albanians (London, 1987); Miranda Vickers and James Pettifier, Albania: From Anarchy to a Balkan Identity (New York, 1997); www.rulers.com.

LÉKAI László [originally Lung] (12 March 1910, Zalalövö–30 June 1986, Esztergom), Primate of Hungary. In 1934 Lékai graduated in theology and philosophy in Rome and was ordained. In 1936 he received a Ph.D. in theology. Later he worked as a diocese priest, catechist in a pedagogical institute for boys, and lecturer in the theological seminary in Veszprém. From 1944 he was an adviser to the Hungarian Episcopate, and in 1944–48 he was secretary to Primate József Mindszenty. During the German occupation of Hungary Lékai was imprisoned along with Mindszenty. In 1946 he was appointed papal camerlengo. From 1948 to 1972 he was parish priest in Balatonlelle, Zalaszentiván, and Badacsony on Lake Balaton. On 8 February 1972 he was appointed apostolic administrator of the Veszprém diocese, and on 16 March 1972 he was consecrated as bishop. In 1973 Lékai failed to make Primate Mindszenty to give up his position. In 1974 he became apostolic administrator of Esztergom, and after the death of Mindszenty, on 12 February 1976, he was appointed archbishop of Esztergom and Primate of Hungary. On 24 May 1976 Lékai became cardinal. He joined the Vatican Congregation of Catholic Education. Initially perceived as a follower of the uncompromising line of Mindszenty, Lékai later became known as a supporter of the eastern policies of Cardinal Agostino Casaroli. In the atmosphere of the so-called goulash communism, Lékai's policies provided the hierarchy and believers with apparent security at the cost of some priests sitting on the Communist parliament and helping out Communist authorities by discriminating against anti-Communist priests (for example, the Bokor youth movement of Father György Bulányi). As a result the official Catholic Church was made an ally of the atheist authorities. Many priests were released from prisons and the hierarchy was reconstructed, but the Church lost authority among the believers, many of whom thought Lékai's "small steps" policies were leading nowhere. Lékai was awarded several state honors. (MS)

Sources: "A meggyesett fa kizöldül": Portré dr. Lekai Lászlóról (Budapest, 1984); Alceste Santini, Ungheria quarantanni dopo (Rome, 1985); Jenő Gergely, "Lékai László," Világosság, 1986, nos. 8–9; Hansjakob Stehle, Tajna diplomácia Watykanu (Warsaw, 1993); Andrzej Grajewski, Kompleks Judasza (Poznań, 1999); www.catholic-hierarchy.org.

LEM Stanisław (12 October 1921, Lwów [Lviv]—27 March 2006, Kraków), Polish writer. In 1940 Lem enrolled in medical studies, which he pursued in 1944–45 in the Lviv Institute of Medicine and which he completed at the Jagiellonian University in Kraków, where he settled after World War II. He made his literary debut in 1946; his first novel to attract attention was Astronauci (Astronauts; 1951), a work of science fiction atypical of the Socialist realist pattern of the early 1950s. Later Lem published a number of short stories and novels in this genre, including Obłok Magellana (Magellanic cloud; 1955); Dzienniki gwiazdowe (1957; Star Diaries, 1976); and Solaris (1961; English edition 1970); these won him fame in Poland and soon also abroad. Constantly improving his style and deepening the psychology of his characters, Lem asked fundamental questions about the future of human beings during a period of scientific and technological revolution, as well as about the nature of the world and the limits of knowledge. His views evolved toward a skeptical or even pessimistic vision of the development of human civilization. Lem's subsequent works—such as Summa technologiae (1964), Bajki robotów (1964), Cyberiada (1965), Filozofia przypadku (1968; Chain of Chance, 1978), and Kongres futurologiczny (1973; Futurological Congress, 1974)—were like philosophical treatises, full of paradoxes and subtle grotesqueness. Lem was increasingly interested in literary creativity and the cognitive value of literature, as well as in the debate on the links between technological progress and the evolution of humans as a species. The reviver of science fiction, a futurologist, and a theoretician of literature, Lem became one of the most frequently published Polish authors, both at home and abroad. His works were translated into thirty languages. Selections from his works were published many times. The most extensive of these was Dziela (Works, 19 vols.; 1994–97). (WR)

Sources: Literatura polska: Przewodnik encyklopedyczny, vol. 1 (Warsaw, 2000); Stanisław Lem an der Grenzen Science Fiction (Meitingen, 1985); Jerzy Jarzębski, ed., Lem w oczach krytyki światowej (Kraków, 1989); J. Madison Davis, Stanisław Lem (Mercer Island, Wash., 1990); Antoni Smuszkiewicz, Stanisław Lem (Poznań, 1995); Małgorzata Szpakowska, Dyskusje ze Stanisławem Lemem (Warsaw, 1996).

LENÁRT Jozef (3 April 1923, Liptovská Porúbka), Slovak Communist activist. A chemist by trade, in 1939–44 Lenárt worked in the Bat’ a shoe factory. In the summer of 1944 he took part in the Slovak National Uprising. From 1946 he was active in the Communist Party of Slovakia (CPS). In 1950–53, 1957–66, and 1970–88 Lenárt was a member of the CPS Central Committee (CC). From 1950 to 1951 he was director of the 29 August Factory, and then, until 1953, he was deputy minister of light industry. In 1953 he was sent to study at the Higher Party School of the CPSU CC in Moscow. After returning to Czechoslovakia, he became first secretary of the Bratislava party committee (October 1956–January 1958). In 1958 he joined the CC of the Communist Party of Czechoslovakia (CPC) and became secretary of the CPS CC. From 1962 to 1989, with a short break (1968–70), Lenárt belonged to the Presidium of the CPC CC. In 1962–63 he presided over the Slovak National Council, and from 20 September 1963 to 8 April 1968 he was prime minister of Czechoslovakia. He was dismissed as an aide of Antonín Novotný. From 1960 to 1969 Lenárt was a member of the National Assembly, and then, until 1990, a member of the Chamber of the People of the Federal Assembly. During the Prague Spring he avoided taking a clear position, but after the Warsaw Pact intervention of August 1968 he supported the “brotherly help” of the Warsaw Pact nations. From 23 to 26 August 1968 Lenárt took part in talks in Moscow, and upon returning home, he became one of the leading spokesmen of “normalization.” At the end of November 1989 Lenárt retired from politics, and in February 1990 he was expelled from the CPC. In 1996 he was accused of treason after the events of 1968, but in October 1997 the case was dismissed. In January 1998 the Supreme Court resumed the case, and in September 2002 Lenárt was tried, along with Miloš Jakeš, but both were acquitted. (PU)

Sources: ČBS; Who’s Who in the Socialist Countries of Europe, vol. 2 (Munich, London, and Paris, 1989); Českoslovenští politici 1918/1991 (Prague, 1991); Kdo byl kdo v našich dějinách ve 20. století, vol. 1 (Prague, 1998).

LEONAS Petras (16 November 1864, Leškava, near Marijampole–12 May 1938, Kaunas), Lithuanian lawyer and politician. In 1889 Leonas received a law degree from Moscow University. While a student, he led a secret organization of Lithuanian students and was a co-founder of Varpas, one of the first underground national periodicals. After completing his studies, Leonas worked as a deputy public prosecutor and later as a judge. In 1905 he was one of the leading Lithuanian journalists of the revolutionary period. Dismissed as a judge because of his contacts with the radical movement, Leonas settled in Kaunas in 1906 and ran a law practice there. Elected to the second Russian Duma in 1907, he focused his attention on Lithuanian autonomy, drafting a bill on that issue, but it was never implemented. He also dealt with agrarian reform. After the outbreak of World War I Leonas became a member of the Lithuanian Central Committee for Assistance and was sent to St. Petersburg, where he directed institutions providing aid to Lithuanian refugees in the capital and in Moscow. After the February 1917 revolution, he co-founded the populist National Democratic Freedom League–Santara, the origin of the future Lithuanian Peasant Union. Over the years his ties with this party weakened.

Leonas’s professional qualifications and the respect he enjoyed among the Lithuanian people led to his appointment as minister of justice in the first government of independent Lithuania, established on 11 November 1918. In 1919 he was appointed minister of interior. He significantly contributed to the development of legislation—for example, acts on the judicial system and laws regulating the functioning of local self-government were prepared under his direction. After leaving the government, Leonas became chairman of the Central Electoral Committee, which supervised parliamentary elections for three successive terms. When the university in Kaunas was founded, Leonas was made dean of the School of Law. He held this post for eleven years and simultaneously lectured in law and sociology. His views, emphasizing individual rights and the advantages of liberal democracy, were not approved of by the regime of Antanas Smetona; therefore, in 1933 Leonas was dismissed as dean and was banned from lecturing. In response, the School of Law defiantly granted him the title of honorary professor. This position did not have to be confirmed by the authorities, so Leonas could continue lecturing to students.

Leonas was one of the most prominent Lithuanian lawyers of the interwar period. A supporter of legal positivism, he tried to use the achievements of sociology in his work. In 1933 he was granted an honorary doctorate from Kaunas University. He was one of the founders of the Lithuanian Law Society, and from 1929 to 1933 he served as chairman of the Lithuanian Bar Association. Leonas published numerous works and articles in scholarly periodicals. His publications include Teise enciklopedijos paskaitos (An introduction to lectures in law; 1924), Teises filosofijos istorija (History of the philosophy of law; 1928), and Sociologijos paskaitos (A lecture in sociology; 1938). (AG)

Sources: EL, vol. 3; A. Rimka, Lietuvių tautos atgimimo socialiniai pagrindai (Kaunas, 1931); Kultura, 1938, no. 5; Z. Toliūsis, “Petro Leono gyvenimas ir darbai,” Naujoji Romuva, 1938; Wojciech Roszkowski, “Litewskie partie chłopskie (1905–1970),” in Krzysztof Jasiewicz, ed., Europa nieprowincjonalna (Warsaw, 1999).

LESZCZYŃSKI-LEŃSKI Julian (8 January 1889, Płock–June 1937?, Moscow), Polish Communist activist. The son of a laborer, Leszczyński-Leński joined the Social Democracy of the Kingdom of Poland and Lithuania (Socjaldemokracja Królestwa Polskiego i Litwy [SDKPiL]) in 1905. After graduating from high school in Płock (1909), he studied history and literature at the Jagiellonian University in Kraków. Expelled from the university in 1911 for directing a student strike, he moved to Warsaw. In October 1913 he attended a Bolshevik conference in Poronin, where he met Vladimir Lenin. Arrested shortly afterwards in Warsaw, he was deported to Russia. Released on bail in 1915, he made a living by working as a tutor in Moscow. In March 1917 Leszczyński-Leński became an SDKPiL delegate to the April conference of the Bolshevik party, and he joined the SDKPiL Central Executive Committee in Russia. In June 1917 he was elected to the Petrograd Executive Committee of the Soviet of Workers', Peasants', and Soldiers' Deputies and later to the Constituent Assembly. During the October Revolution, along with a group of soldiers, Leszczyński-Leński occupied the Main Telegraph building. At the Second All-Russian Congress of Soviets (7–8 November 1917) he became a deputy member of the All-Russian Central Executive Committee of Soviets (Vserossiiskii Tsentralnii Iсполnitel'nyi Komitet [VTsIK]). On 7 December 1917 he was named a full member of the VTsIK. Four days later he was appointed commissar for Polish affairs at the People's Commissariat for Ethnic Affairs in Russia.

When the Red Army launched its westward offensive in November 1918, Leszczyński-Leński helped to establish the Bolshevik administration in the territories seized from the Germans. In January 1919 he became commissar of education in the government of the Belorussian and Lithuanian Soviet Republic and one of the leaders of the Communist Workers' Party of Poland (Komunistyczna Partia Robotnicza Polski [KPRP]) in Russia. After the Polish troops captured Wilno (Vilnius), Leszczyński-Leński returned to Minsk and conducted Bolshevik agitation among the Poles. In August 1920 he was a delegate of the Polish Provisional Revolutionary Committee at the command of the southwestern front of the Red Army. At the end of 1920 he was an expert for the Bolshevik delegation to negotiations with Poland in Riga, and from March 1921 to December 1923 he served as a member of the Polish Bureau at the Central Committee (CC) of the All-Russian Communist Party (Bolsheviks). In late September and early October 1923 Leszczyński-Leński attended the Second Congress of the KPRP, at which he criticized the "opportunism" of the party's leadership. The conflict between him and the KPRP leaders continued after they forbade him to take any executive positions in the party. As a delegate to the Fifth Congress of the Communist International, Leszczyński-Leński was influential in the headquarters of the Communist movement and gradually recovered control of the situation. The Polish Commission, elected at this congress, annulled the decision of the KPRP and sent Leszczyński-Leński to Poland. His intensive work to win allies was interrupted by his arrest in October 1924. In October 1925 he escaped from prison in Warsaw and made his way to the Soviet Union. In December 1925, during a conference of the KPRP at which it changed its name to the Communist Party of Poland (Komunistyczna Partia Polski [KPP]), Leszczyński-Leński became a member of the party's CC. At a CC plenum in June 1929 he was elected secretary general of the KPP. His triumph was linked with the fact that he supported Stalin, who at that time gained full power within the All-Union Communist Party (Bolsheviks). At the Sixth Comintern Congress Leszczyński-Leński became a deputy member of the Presidium of the Comintern Executive Committee. In mid-1934, in agreement with the Comintern leaders, he introduced changes of policy toward the Socialists, supporting the idea of a "united front." In August 1935 he became a member of the Presidium of the Comintern Executive Committee. In 1936 he settled in Paris, where the headquarters of the KPP CC Politburo was based. In June 1937 he was summoned to Moscow. Arrested shortly after his arrival, he was accused of enabling Polish intelligence to infiltrate the KPP leadership. He was executed soon afterwards. (WR)

Sources: PSB, vol. 17; M. K. Dziewanowski, The Communist Party of Poland (Cambridge, Mass., 1959); K. Gruda, "Sprawa polska na V Kongresie Międzynarodówki Komunistycznej," Z Pola Walki, 1962, no. 4; Księga Polaków uczestników rewolucji październikowej (Warsaw, 1967).

LETTRICH Jozef (17 June 1905, Turčianské Teplice-Divaky–29 September 1968, New York), Slovak lawyer and politician. Lettrich studied law at Comenius University in Bratislava. In 1929 he earned a master's degree. From 1931 to 1935 he was an attorney's assistant in Zvolen. He subsequently worked as a clerk (1935–41) and attorney (1941–44) in Bratislava. In the 1930s he was among the young intelligentsia of the Slovak agrarian movement. These intellectuals supported Slovak nationalism and questioned the policies of the Agrarian Party, which promoted "Czechoslovakism." After the collapse of Czechoslovakia Lettrich did not accept the establishment of the Slovak Fascist state, and from 1939, he worked with the civic wing of the resistance movement led by Ján Lichner. In 1940 Lettrich became a member of an organization called Demec. The Nazis detained him twice:

in 1939 and 1941. Lettrich took part in negotiations with the Communists on cooperation in the struggle against the Germans. In December 1943, after long talks, he was one of the signatories of the “Christmas Agreement,” which concerned cooperation between the civic and Communist resistance movements. From 1943 to 1944 Lettrich was a member of the illegal Slovak National Council (Slovenská Národná Rada [SNR]), established as a result of the Christmas Agreement; he served as an unofficial secretary of the SNR and participated in the preparations for an uprising. During the Slovak National Uprising he was one of the SNR leaders and served as a commissioner for education and the school system.

From 1945 to 1948 Lettrich was head of the Democratic Party, president of the SNR, and a deputy to the National Assembly. In 1946 he was a co-author of the “April agreement” with the Slovak Catholic movement. He subsequently represented the Slovak democratic center. After the elections of May 1946, which were won by the Democratic Party, Lettrich opposed the growing centralism of the government in Prague and the increasing Communist influence. He also protested the death sentence against Reverend Jozef Tiso. During the Communist coup in February 1948 Lettrich agreed that ministers of the Democratic Party should resign from the government, and he called on other members of the party not to join Communist-initiated action committees. Forced to resign as president of the SNR on 26 February 1948, Lettrich emigrated to the United States, where he was active in various émigré organizations, including the Council of Free Czechoslovakia and the Permanent Conference of Slovak Democratic Exiles. He also wrote and published extensively. The History of Modern Slovakia (1955) is one of his best-known works. (PU)

Sources: ČBS; SBS, vol. 3; Reprezentačný biografický lexikón Slovenska (Martin, 1999); Libor Vykoupil, Slovník českých dějin (Brno, 2000).

LEVYTSKYI Borys [also known as Lewytskyj] (19 May 1915, Vienna–28 October 1984, Munich), Ukrainian journalist, politician, and political scientist. While a student of philosophy and psychology at Jan Kazimierz University in Lwów (Lviv), Levytskyi became the editor of the periodical Nove Selo (1936–39) and an activist in the Organization of Ukrainian Nationalists (OUN). He completed his studies in 1938. After the German invasion of the Soviet Union in June 1941, Levytskyi, together with Ivan Mitrynga, went to Central Ukraine and attempted to found the Ukrainian Democratic Peasant Party there. After the war, he went to the Western world, where he left the OUN and became one of the founders of the Ukrainian Revolutionary Democratic Party. He also edited the periodical Vpered (1949–56). In 1948 Levytskyi established his own center for research on the Soviet Union that published a monthly bulletin about the Soviet authorities. In the 1950s he published a great deal—for example, as a regular contributor to the Süddeutsche Zeitung in Munich (under the pseudonym “Paul Sikora”). In the 1970s Levytskyi was an adviser on Soviet affairs to the West German Social Democratic Party (SPD). He also published through the Paris-based Polish Instytut Literacki (Literary Institute) and in the periodical Kultura. He was the author of important works on the history and practices of communism, including the following: Vom Roten Terror zur sozialistischen Gessellschaft (1961); Die Sowjetukraine, 1944–1963 (1964); Die Rote Inquisition (1967; The Uses of Terror, 1971); The Soviet Political Elite (1969); Die sowjetische Nationalitätspolitik nach Stalins Tod, 1953–1970 (1970); Die Marschälle und die Politik (1971); Sowjetische Entspannungspolitik heute (1975); and Politics and Society in Soviet Ukraine, 1953–1980 (1984). Levytskyi also edited biographical publications, including Who’s Who in the Socialist Countries (1978), Who’s Who in the Soviet Union (1984), and The Stalinist Terror in the Thirties (1974). (WR)

Sources: Encyclopedia of Ukraine, vol. 3 (Toronto, 1993).

LEVYTSKYI Dmytro (1877 Dobrachyn, near Sokal–31 October 1942, Bukhara, Uzbekistan), Ukrainian lawyer and politician. After graduating in law from the university in Vienna, Levytskyi worked as an attorney in Rawa Ruska (Rava Rus’ka) and Brzeżany (Berezhany) from 1912 to 1914. During World War I he served as an officer in the Austro-Hungarian Army. Taken prisoner, he was held in Tashkent. In 1917 he organized the Galicia and Bukovina Committee in Kiev. During the rule of Hetman Pavlo Skoropadsky, Levytskyi was the secretary of the opposition Ukrainian National Union. He subsequently served as head of the diplomatic mission of the Ukrainian People’s Republic (UPR) to Denmark (1919–21). After the war he returned to Galicia, which was under Polish rule, and he published the daily Dilo (1923–25). He was also one of the founders and leading activists of the Ukrainian National Democratic Alliance (Ukrainske Natsionalno-Demokratychnе Obiednaniie [UNDO]), which called for a compromise with Poland. From 1925 to 1935 Levytskyi was chairman and then (until 1939) vice-chairman of the UNDO. From 1928 to 1930 and from 1930 to 1935 he was an MP in the Assembly of the Republic of Poland and chairman of the Ukrainian parliamentary representation. From the end of 1930 to 1931 Levytskyi was imprisoned for criticizing Polish policies. The sanacja government prevented him from running in the elections to the Assembly. From 1936 to 1939 Levytskyi was the founder and then the leader of the Ukrainian Coordinating Committee, which represented all Ukrainian groups that were allowed to function in Poland. In September 1939 Levytskyi was arrested by the NKVD. Released after the German invasion of the Soviet Union in June 1941, he was ordered to settle in Uzbekistan, where he died in a Polish nursing home. (WR)

Sources: Encyclopedia of Ukraine, vol. 3 (Toronto, 1993); Kto był kim w Drugiej Rzeczypospolitej (Warsaw, 1994); Encyklopedia historii Drugiej Rzeczypospolitej (Warsaw, 1999); Ryszard Torzecki, Kwestia ukraińska w Polsce 1923–1929 (Kraków, 1989).

LEVYTSKYI Kost (18 November 1859, Tysmenytsya, near Tlumach–12 November 1941, Lviv [Lemberg, Lwów]), Ukrainian lawyer and politician. Levytskyi graduated in law from the university in Lemberg, where he subsequently opened a law practice (1890). He was an editor and the publisher of the periodical Chasopys pravnycha (1899–1900). One of the leaders of the Prosvita Society, he succeeded in changing it from a purely educational group into an educational and economic organization. Levytskyi was the founder and benefactor of many Ukrainian economic organizations, including Narodna Torhovla; the insurance company Dnister; Tsentrobank (from 1898 to 1939 he was its director); the Audit Commission of Ukrainian Cooperative Societies (from 1904 to 1914 he was its chairman); the Mortgage and Land Bank; and the Karpatia Reinsurance Company. In 1899 he became a member of the Shevchenko Society. Levytskyi was a nationalist and populist in his views. He organized the People's Council and served as its president from 1885 to 1899. After joining the Ukrainian National Democratic Party, he served as its secretary and president of its board from 1902 on. In 1907 he became an MP in the Austrian parliament (Reichsrat) and in 1908 also in the Galician Assembly. As the leader of the strongest Ukrainian party in both parliaments, Levytskyi played a major role in Galician political life at that time.

During World War I Levytskyi was one of the leaders of the movement for Ukrainian independence. In 1914 he was elected president of the Supreme Ukrainian Council (Holovna Ukraïnska Rada) in Lviv, and in 1915 he was also elected president of the General Ukrainian Council (Zahalna Ukraïnska Rada) in Vienna. Although most of the population of Lviv spoke Polish and the Ukrainians were a minority there, Levytskyi believed that because of the Ukrainian-speaking majority in the surrounding area, the city should become the center of the Ukrainian government. As head of the Lviv branch of the Ukrainian National Rada (Council), established on 18 October 1918 and led by Yevhen Petrushevych, on 1 November Levytskyi ordered Ukrainian units to forcibly occupy Lviv, and they seized power from the retreating Austrian authorities. This caused resistance from the Polish insurgents in the city, who were supported by units of the newly formed Polish Army sent from central Poland. Although the Ukrainian authorities had to escape from Lviv, on 7 November Levytskyi assumed the post of head of the Secretariat (provisional government) of the Western Ukrainian National Republic (Zakhidno-Ukraïnska Narodna Republika [ZUNR]). However, in mid-December he resigned from this position. After the Polish troops gained full control of Eastern Galicia, Levytskyi, together with the ZUNR authorities, left for Vienna, where he served as press secretary and then secretary for foreign affairs of Petrushevych's government-in-exile.

In 1923 Levytskyi returned to Galicia, which was under Polish rule. He worked energetically to consolidate Ukrainian trade, economic, and cultural organizations. He served as chairman of the Ukrainian Lawyers' Union, editor of the periodical Zhyttia i pravo, and director of Tsentrobank. He was one of the leaders of the Ukrainian National Democratic Alliance (Ukraïnske Natsionalno-Demokratyчне Obiednannya [UNDO]) but was not directly involved in politics. After the Red Army occupied Eastern Galicia in September 1939, Levytskyi became head of the delegation of the Ukrainian National Committee to conduct talks with the new authorities. Arrested and taken to Moscow, he was released in the spring of 1941, and he returned to Lviv. On 30 June 1941, after the Nazis occupied Lviv, Levytskyi established the Ukrainian National Council, which proclaimed Ukrainian independence and a "Promethean" program that called for the liberation of all nations enslaved by Russia. However, the council did not gain German support, and shortly afterwards Levytskyi died. Levytskyi was the author of several monographs, including the following: Istoriia polytychnoy dumky halytskykh Ukraïntsv 1848–1914 (The history of political thought of the Galician Ukrainians 1848–1914, 2 vols.; 1926); Istoriia vyzvolnykh zvahan halytskikh Ukraïntsv z chasu svitovoy viyny (The history of the liberation struggle of the Galician Ukrainians during the world war, 3 vols.; 1929–30); Velykyi Zryv (The great effort; 1931); and Ukraïnski polytyki (Ukrainian politicians; 1936). (WR)

Sources: Encyclopedia of Ukraine, vol. 3 (Toronto, 1993); Matthew Stachiv and Jaroslav Sztendera, eds., Western Ukraine at the Turning Point of Europe's History, 1918–1923, vols. 1–2 (New York, 1971); Maciej Kozłowski, Między Sanem i Zbruczem: Walki o Lwów i Galicję Wschodnią 1918–1919 (Kraków, 1990); Tadeusz Andrzej Olszański, Historia Ukrainy XX w. (Warsaw, n.d.); Paul R. Magocsi, A History of Ukraine (Seattle, 1996); Orest Subtelny, Ukraine: A History (Toronto, 2000).

LEXA Ivan (18 August 1961, Bratislava), Slovak political activist. Lexa graduated in chemical technology from the Higher Technical University in Bratislava in 1983, in chemical doctoral studies in 1987, and from a managerial school at the Industrial Institute in Bratislava in 1991. In 1983–90 he worked for the Slovnaft Company. In the early 1990s he became one of the most trusted aides of Vladimír Mečiar. From January to April 1991 Lexa headed Mečiar's Office of the Slovak Prime Minister. After the resignation of Mečiar's government, until June 1992 Lexa headed the chancellery of the Movement for a Democratic Slovakia (Hnutie za Demokratické Slovensko [HZDS]). In 1992–93 he was the HZDS plenipotentiary for the creation of the office of president of the Slovak Republic, and later he was secretary of the Ministry of Administration and the Privatization of National Property, where he helped Mečiar's people with the appropriation of state assets. In November 1994 Mečiar wanted to make Lexa head of this ministry, but President Michal Kováč refused to endorse this decision.

In the elections of 1994 Lexa won a seat in the parliament on behalf of the HZDS. Despite President Kováč's opposition, Mečiar succeeded in forcing an amendment of the law on the Slovak Information Service (Slovenská Informačná Služba [SIS]), achieving the right to nominate the SIS head. Thus on 18 April 1995 Lexa was appointed head of the SIS. He continued in this capacity until 28 October 1998, becoming a symbol of the lawless operations of the Mečiar elite. Among other things, Lexa was instrumental in the kidnapping of President Kováč's son and in his deportation to Austria, in attempts to compromise Bishop Rudolf Balaž, and in the eavesdropping and intimidation of opposition politicians and journalists. In all these operations Lexa was supported by Mečiar. Immediately after Mečiar took over the duties of president, all functionaries involved in the capture of Kováč's son were amnestied. After the elections of September 1998, in order that Lexa could retain immunity, Mečiar gave up his mandate in his favor. This step did not shield Lexa from investigation, since the new prime minister, Mikulaš Dzurinda, annulled the amnesty and on 15 April 1999 the parliament repealed Lexa's immunity. In July 1999 the court decided that Lexa might stay at liberty during the investigation. In May 2000 Lexa fled abroad, so in July 2000 the Slovak authorities issued a warrant for his arrest. On 14 July 2002 Lexa was arrested in South Africa and deported to Slovakia. (PU)

Sources: Marian Leško, Mečiar a mečiarizmus (Bratislava, 1998); Slovensko 1996: Súhrnná správa o stave spoločnosti (Bratislava, 1997); Slovensko 1997: Súhrnná správa o stave spoločnosti (Bratislava, 1998); Slovensko 1998–1999: Súhrnná správa o stave spoločnosti (Bratislava, 1999); L'uba Lesna, Únos demokracie: Zo zákulisia slovenskej tajnej služby (Prague and Bratislava, 2001); Slovensko 2000: Súhrnná správa o stave spoločnosti (Bratislava, 2000); Sme, 18 July 2002.

LIBOHOVA Myfit bey (July 1876, Libohovë–10 February 1927, Tirana), Albanian writer and diplomat. Born into a Muslim landowning family, Libohova was the eldest son of Neki Pasha, governor of Gjirokastër and deputy to the first Turkish parliament. After graduating from high school in Ioánnina, Libohova studied law in Istanbul and France. After graduating, he worked in diplomacy, beginning as first secretary in the Turkish Embassy in Belgium and later assuming the post of Turkish consul in Lárissa. In 1908 he was an MP for the Gjirokastër district in the Young Turk parliament. From November 1912 to January 1914 he headed the ministry of interior in the government of Ismail Kemal, and then he became minister of justice in the cabinet of Turhan Pasha Përmeti. Libohova represented Albania in the International Control Commission, which supervised the Albanian state from 1913 to 1914. In 1918, on his initiative, a congress was held under Italian auspices in Dürres. This congress established a government in which Libohova assumed the ministry of foreign affairs. A supporter of the monarchy, from 1920 to 1924 he was politically aligned with the Beys' Party, which was active in Gjirokastër and represented the large landowners. From March to June 1924 Libohova headed the ministry of justice in the government of Shefqet Vërlaci. After the outbreak of the revolution in the south, he was appointed a special government representative to conduct talks with the rebels in Vlorë, but they imprisoned him for some time. After Fan Noli became prime minister, Libohova fled to Greece. In December 1924, when Ahmed Zogu returned to regain power, Libohova, who was Zogu's trusted associate, was supposed to capture the south of the country but managed to gain control only of the frontier post at Kakavi. From January 1925 to March 1928 Libohova headed the ministries of finance, justice, and foreign affairs in Zogu's first government. In 1925 he was elected a member of parliament for the Gjirokastër district. A supporter of cooperation with the Italians, Libohova, together with his brother Eqrem, became involved in negotiations leading to the conclusion of treaties in 1926–27 that made Albania politically dependent on Italy in exchange for economic aid. Libohova's publications include his memoirs, Politika ime ndë Shqipëri 1916–1920 (My policy in Albania; 1922). Libohova's brother Eqrem (1882–1948) served as prime minister (19 January–13 February and 12 May–9 September 1944) in the government that collaborated with the Italians. (TC)

Sources: Biographisches Lexikon, vol. 2; Michael Schmidt-Neke, Entstehung und Ausbau der Königsdiktatur in Albanien (1912– 1939); Regierungsbildungen, Herrschaftsweisen und Machteliten in Einen Jungen Balkanstaat (Munich, 1987); Bardhosh Gaçe, Ata që shpallën Pavarësinë Kombëtare (Tirana, 1997).

LIEBERMAN Herman (3 January 1870, Drohobych–21 October 1941, London), Polish lawyer and socialist activist of Jewish origin. While a high school student in Boryslav and Stryy, Lieberman organized pro-independence and socialist circles. In 1889 he began studying law in Paris. Expelled from France in 1890, he returned to Galicia and completed law studies at the Jagiellonian University in Kraków, earning a Ph.D. in 1894. In 1899 he opened a law practice in Przemyśl. From 1893 to 1919 he was a member of the Polish Socialist Democratic Party of Galicia and Teschen Silesia (Polska Partia Socjalno-Demokratyczna Galicji i Śląska Cieszyńskiego [PPSD]), and from 1901 to 1919 he was a member of the board of this party. From 1907 to 1918 Lieberman sat in the Austrian parliament (Reichsrat) in Vienna as a PPSD representative. In 1914 he joined the Polish Legions, from which he was expelled in 1917 for anti-German agitation. After the oath of allegiance crisis of July 1917 Lieberman became counsel for the defense of legionnaires accused of high treason. In 1918 he co-organized the Soviet of Soldiers and Workers and the Polish National Council in Przemyśl. From 1919 to 1933 he was an MP in the Assembly. An expert on constitutional law, Lieberman contributed significantly to the drafting of the constitution of March 1921. As an MP in the Assembly, he also dealt with military affairs. In 1919 he joined the Polish Socialist Party (Polska Partia Socjalistyczna [PPS]). From 1920 to 1939 he was a member of the PPS Chief Council, and from 1931 to 1934, vice-president of the PPS Central Executive Committee. He represented the PPS in the Bureau of the Socialist International (from 1932 to 1939) and in its Executive Committee (from 1937 on).

After the coup of May 1926 Lieberman opposed the sanacja government. In 1929 he was the chief Assembly prosecutor in the Tribunal of State trial of Treasury Minister Gabriel Czechowicz. He was also active in the so-called Centrolew, a center-left coalition of opposition parties that defended democracy. In September 1930, along with other opposition leaders, Lieberman was arrested and imprisoned in the Brest fortress. In January 1932 he was sentenced to two and a half years in prison. Upon learning that the sentence had become final and binding, Lieberman emigrated to Czechoslovakia (October 1933) and later to France. He worked in Paris and earned a living by contributing to leftist periodicals. He also edited the periodical Świat i Polska. He worked with left-wing and peasant parties in Poland. During the Spanish Civil War Lieberman was the chairman of a committee for aid to wounded Polish volunteers. After the outbreak of World War II, he worked closely with General Władysław Sikorski, supporting Sikorski's policy toward the Soviet Union. In December 1939 Lieberman became vice-president of the National Council in exile. In March 1940 he was elected president of the PPS Central Executive Committee in exile. In September 1941 he became minister of justice in Sikorski's government. Lieberman successfully completed many projects; for example, as a result of his efforts, the government passed a symbolic resolution to abolish the isolation camp at Bereza Kartuska. Lieberman was the author of many articles and agitation brochures, as well as Pamiętniki (Memoirs; 1996). (JS)

Sources: PSB, vol. 17; Kto był kim w Drugiej Rzeczypospolitej (Warsaw, 1994); Encyklopedia historii Polski: Dzieje polityczne (Warsaw, 1994); Artur Leinwand, Posel Herman Lieberman (Kraków, 1983); Marian Leczyk, ed., Sprawa brzeska (Warsaw, 1987); Janusz Gmitruk, Herman Lieberman, Stanisław Mikołajczyk: Zmagania z totalitaryzmem (Warsaw, 2001).

LIICEANU Gabriel (23 May 1942, Râmnicu Vâlcea), Romanian writer and cultural activist. In 1965 Liiceanu graduated from the Department of Philosophy and in 1973 from the Department of Classical Philology of Bucharest University. In 1976 he received a Ph.D. there. In 1965–75 he worked at the Institute of Philosophy and from 1975 to 1989 at the Institute of Arts of the Romanian Academy of Science. In 1982–84 he worked as a Humboldt Foundation Fellow in Heidelberg. One of the close associates of Constantin Noica, in 1983 Liiceanu published Jurnalul de la Păltiniș: Un model paideic în cultura umanistă (Păltinișu dairy: Paideia as a model in humanist culture), and in 1987, Epistolar (Letters), in which he promoted Noica's theories. Both books brought Liiceanu wide recognition. In 1983 he received an award from the Association of Romanian Writers for Jurnalul de la Păltiniș and became one of the leading Romanian intellectuals. In 1990 Liiceanu became head of the political press Editura Politică (later renamed Humanitas), which soon gained a dominant position on the Romanian book market. From 1992 Liiceanu was a professor in the Department of Philosophy at Bucharest University. (AB)

Sources: Romania-on-line.net/whoswho/LiiceanuGabriel.htm.

LILIĆ Zoran (27 August 1953, Brza Palanka, near Kladovo), Serb politician. Lilić was born into a poor family with many children. He studied metallurgical technology, at the same time working sporadically as a model and a conductor. After his studies, for twelve years Lilić worked in the Rekord Factory in the Rakovica outskirts of Belgrade. In 1990 he became a member of the Serbian parliament on behalf of the Socialist Party of Serbia (SPS). Rapidly advancing, he became the deputy chairman of the SPS and the chairman of the Serbian parliament. After the resignation of Dobrica Ćosić from the presidency of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (FRY), on 25 June 1993 Lilić took over this position and remained head of state for four years as an obedient executor of the policies of Slobodan Milošević. When in July 1997 Milošević was elected FRY president, in the September 1997 elections Lilić was supported by the SPS in the elections for the Serbian presidency, but he lost to Vojislav Šešelj. Owing to a low turnout, the election results were annulled, but Lilić did not run again. He refused to testify in the Milošević trial before The Hague Tribunal for War Crimes in the Former Yugoslavia, but in July 2002 Lilić was arrested by the Serbian police and brought to The Hague as a witness. (AO)

Sources: Željko E. Šuster, Historical Dictionary of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Lanham, Md., 1999); Bugajski; Europa Środkowo-Wschodnia 1993–1999 (Warsaw, 1995–2001); www.rferl.org.

LILOV Aleksandur (31 August 1933, Granichak), Bulgarian Communist activist. Lilov entered into contact with the Communist movement in 1947, when he joined the Dimitrov People's Youth Union (DPYU). In 1954 he became a member of the Bulgarian Communist Party (BCP). In 1962 he graduated in Bulgarian philology from Sofia University. Gradually advancing through the party ranks, in 1962 Lilov became a member of the DPYU Central Committee (CC) Bureau, and in 1963–66 he was secretary of the DPYU CC. Later he studied in Moscow, where he received a Ph.D. in literature and arts at the Soviet CC party school. After returning to Bulgaria, Lilov worked as editor of the party press. In 1971 he became a member of the BCP CC; in 1972 he became CC secretary; and in 1974 he became a member of the BCP Politburo. A member of the National Assembly and of the Fatherland Front, in 1981 Lilov received a Ph.D. in Marxist philosophy, and from 1975 he worked at the Institute of Art and Science of the Bulgarian Academy of Science (BAS) as a close aide of Ludmila Zhivkova.

After Zhivkova died in 1981, Lilov's political career was interrupted. Lilov's conflict with Ludmila's father, Todor Zhivkov, led to his dismissal from the CC Politburo and Secretariat. For six years he was director of the BAS Institute of Contemporary Social Theories. At the end of 1989, realizing the inevitability of change in Bulgaria in view of perestroika and the collapse of the Communist system in the Soviet bloc, Lilov joined the BCP opposition against Zhivkov and contributed substantially to his toppling. As a result, Lilov became the party's top ideologist, who was to adjust the BCP to its new role in a pluralist society. This new task required renaming the party the Bulgarian Socialist Party (BSP); the dismissal of its most dogmatic leaders; support for the free market system; and opposition to de-Communization, which was advocated by some of the opposition leaders. These changes were carried out at the party congress in January and February 1990, at which Lilov was elected its leader. When the BSP lost the elections and was removed from power, in December 1991 another party congress dismissed Lilov from the leadership and chose Zhan Videnov in his place. Two years later Lilov was accused of the illegal financing of pro-Soviet Third World countries. The parliament deprived him of immunity, but he was soon acquitted. Lilov remained one of the BSP leaders, heading its strategic center. After the crisis in early 1997, when the BSP's ratings fell dramatically and its structures disintegrated, Lilov played a leading role in the dismissal of Videnov and in the stabilization of the party. (AG)

Sources: Koy koy e v Bulgariya (Sofia, 1998); Entsiklopediya Bulgariya, vol. 3 (Sofia, 1982); Jerzy Jackowicz, Bulgaria od rządów komunistycznych do demokracji parlamentarnej 1988–1991 (Warsaw, 1992); Ivan Stoyanov, Nova saga za Lilov (Plovdiv, 1993); Raymond Detrez, Historical Dictionary of Bulgaria (Lanham, Md., 1997); www.ceri-sciencespo.com/publica/etude/etude31.pdf; www.nato.int/acad/fellow/94–96/dimitrov/04–03.htm; www.house.gov/csce/bulgarep93.html.

LIMANOWSKI Bolesław (18 October 1835, Podgórze, near Dvinsk [now Daugavpils, Latvia]–1 February 1935, Warsaw), Polish Socialist activist, historian, and sociologist. After graduating from a high school in Moscow in 1854, Limanowski studied medicine in Moscow and Dorpat (Tartu) in 1854–69. While a student, he was sentenced to six years in exile in Arkhangelsk Province for organizing and taking part in a patriotic demonstration in 1861. In 1870 he settled in Galicia. From 1873 to 1875 Limanowski studied philosophy in Lemberg (Lwów, Lviv), earning a Ph.D. In 1878 he went to live in Switzerland. Limanowski was one of the main founders of the Polish Socialist movement, in which he combined Socialist ideas with the struggle for Polish independence. In 1881, at a Socialist congress in Chur, he defended the position that Polish independence was consistent with the Socialist program, clashing on this point with Ludwik Waryński and Kazimierz Dłuski. From 1881 to 1882 Limanowski co-founded the Polish People Socialist Association, which supported the struggle for a free Poland based on the working class. In 1882 he published Historia ruchu narodowego od 1861 do 1864 (The history of the national movement from 1861 to 1864), the first history of the January Insurrection of 1863 written from the perspective of the “Reds.” In 1887 Limanowski became a member of the Polish League (Liga Polska), but because of his social views, he later distanced himself from the national movement. In 1889 he became secretary of the board of the Association of Polish Émigrés. In November 1892 he served as chairman of a conference in Paris at which the Polish Socialist Party (Polska Partia Socjalistyczna [PPS]) was founded. He was also a co-author of the party’s program. In 1893 Limanowski returned to Paris, where he found a job in an insurance company. He continued to write extensively. His publications include Stuletnia walka narodu polskiego o niepodległość (The century-long struggle of the Polish nation for independence; 1894) and Historia demokracji polskiej w epoce porzobiorowej (The history of Polish democracy after the partition; 1901). In 1900 Limanowski represented the PPS at the International Socialist Congress in Paris. By then he was very popular, both among the émigrés and in partitioned Poland. During the split within the Polish Socialist movement he supported the PPS–Revolutionary Faction.

In 1907, after returning from exile, Limanowski settled in Kraków, where he devoted himself to intensive scholarly work. At that time he wrote Historia powstania narodu polskiego 1863–1864 (A history of the 1863–1864 uprising of the Polish people; 1909), Szermierze wolności (Champions of freedom; 1911), Historia ruchu rewolucyjnego w Polsce 1846 roku (A history of the 1846 revolutionary movement in Poland; 1913), and other works. Limanowski often represented Polish Socialists at international congresses and conferences. Despite his partial deafness, from which he suffered from the end of the nineteenth century and which hampered his political activities, he was engaged in supporting the pro-independence efforts of Józef Piłsudski, and in 1912 he became head of the Polish Military Treasury. He also conducted lectures for the youth of the Riflemen’s Association and other Polish organizations in Galicia. During World War I Limanowski supported Piłsudski, although he criticized the Piłsudski associates who began to abandon Socialist ideas.

After Poland regained independence, in 1919 Limanowski moved to Warsaw, where he completed his Socjologia (Sociology, 2 vols.; 1915–19) and wrote Walerian Łukasiński (1920) and Mazowsze pruskie (Prussian Mazovia; 1925). The last, a brochure, was a result of his travels around the northeastern part of the Second Republic of Poland. In November 1922 Limanowski was elected to the Senate on behalf of the PPS. After the coup of May 1926, which he criticized, Limanowski joined the opposition to the government. He repeatedly criticized the new form of government, as well as Piłsudski’s struggle against parliamentarism. In 1928 the government did not allow Limanowski to act in the capacity of senior senator. He continued to serve as senator, though, until the end of his life. Among Limanowski’s numerous writings, his historical treatises, which educated two generations of pro-independence activists, are particularly valuable. Although an autodidact in the field of history, he strictly followed the principles of scholarly work. He did not consider himself a Marxist. A researcher and an activist strongly concerned with social injustice, Limanowski aimed at combining the national struggle with the struggle for better living conditions for wide circles of society. In 1957 his Pamiętniki (Memoirs) were published. (WR)

Sources: PSB, vol. 17; Wiktor Feldman, Dzieje polskiej myśli politycznej w okresie porzobiorowym, vol. 3 (Warsaw, 1920); Księga jubileuszowa Polskiej Partii Socjalistycznej 1892–1932 (Warsaw, 1933); Marcei Handelsman, Historycy: Portrety i profile (Warsaw, 1937); Zbigniew Żechowski, Socjologia Bolesława Limanowskiego (Poznań, 1964); Jerzy Targalski, Szermierz wolności: Stuletni żywot Bolesława Limanowskiego, 1835–1935 (Warsaw, 1973); Kazimiera Janina Cottam, Bolesław Limanowski (1835–1935): A Study in Socialism and Nationalism (Boulder, Colo., 1978).

LIPIŃSKI Edward (24 November 1888, Nowe Miasto on Pilica–13 July 1986, Warsaw), Polish economist. Lipiński studied at the College of Commerce in Leipzig (1909–12) and at the university in Zurich (1912–13). Back in Warsaw, from 1907 to 1918 he was a member of the Polish Socialist Party–Left (Polska Partia Socjalistyczna–Lewica [PPS–Lewica]), and between 1914 and 1918 he was active in the Society for the Propagation of Knowledge on Commerce and Industry, a sort of workers’ university. Lipiński was one of the pioneers of labor protection in Poland. In 1918–20 he headed the labor inspection of the Governing Board of the City of Warsaw, served as an adviser to the Ministry of Labor, and was head of the Labor and Industry Statistics Department of the Central Statistical Office of Poland. From 1923 Lipiński was a lecturer, and from 1929 a professor, at the Warsaw School of Economics (Szkola Główna Handlowa [SGH]). In 1937 he became vice-president of the SGH. Between 1928 and 1939 he was an initiator and director of the Institute for Market and Price Research (Instytut Badania Koniunktur Gospodarczych i Cen); from 1929 he served as editor-in-chief of the quarterly Ekonomista; and from 1934 he held the post of president of the Society of Polish Economists and Statisticians in Warsaw. Lipiński was the first in Poland to lecture on the theory of economic fluctuations and the theory of economic growth. He also initiated research on labor, salary, and price statistics. In the 1920s he was a member of the Polish Socialist Party (Polska Partia So-cialistyczna [PPS]) and a co-founder of and activist in the League for the Defense of Human and Civil Rights.

During the German occupation Lipiński was an organizer and director of the Municipal Trade School, which formally was a technical school but in fact ran academic classes. From 1945 to 1949 he was professor and vice-president of the SGH; in 1945–47 he was director of the Institute of the National Economy in the Presidium of the Council of Ministers; from 1946 to 1948 he was director of the National Economy Bank; and in 1946–65 he was president, and then honorary president of the Polish Economic Society. Between 1946 and 1948 Lipiński was a member of the PPS and then, until 1976, a member of the Polish United Workers' Party (Polska Zjednoczona Partia Robotnicza [PUWP]). From 1951 he was a member of the Polish Academy of Sciences, and from 1954, dean of the Department of Economics of Warsaw University. Lipiński also lectured at the Central School of Planning and Statistics (formerly the SGH). He belonged to many international scientific societies. During the Stalinist years Lipiński mainly conducted research on the history of Polish economic thought and the theory of political economics; he was a follower of Marxism, which he attempted to develop in an original way, posing questions about the future of mankind and civilization during transformations in the economic system. In 1956–62 Lipiński was vice-president of the Economic Council to the Council of Ministers, which was supposed to prepare a plan for economic reform but did not as a result of the reluctant attitude of the PUWP executive. In 1958 Lipiński retired, but he continued to take an active part in public life. In 1964 he signed the “Letter of 34” against the tightening of censorship.

Between 1971 and 1976 Lipiński was consulted by the Communist administration, and he used the opportunity to plead for the release of political prisoners. From 1972 he belonged to the Kopernik Masonic lodge. In 1975 he was one of the initiators of a protest against amendments to the constitution and a signatory of the “Letter of 59.” In May 1976 Lipiński submitted an open letter to Edward Gierek in which he criticized Gierek's economic policies and the political system of the Polish People's Republic. Lipiński was a co-founder and one of the major leaders of the Committee for the Defense of Workers (Komitet Obrony Robotników [KOR]), founded on 23 September 1976, and then of the KOR Committee for Social Self-Defense (Komitet Samoobrony Społecznej KOR [KSS KOR]). Lipiński used his position to protect younger KOR activists (from 1978 the meetings of the committee were held in his flat), and he won the sympathy of the West for the committee (through his visits to the United States in the autumn of 1976 and his appeals for the release of the imprisoned between 1976 and 1977.) From 1978 Lipiński was a member of the informal Society for Scientific Courses (Towarzystwo Kursów Naukowych). At a Solidarity congress on 28 September 1981 Lipiński read an announcement about the dissolution of the KSS KOR.

Lipiński was the author of a few hundred scientific and popular works in economics. He had already published the first of his works during World War I. Among other works, he authored Teorie ekonomiczne Erazma Majewskiego (The economic theories of Erasmus Majewski; 1920) and edited Konjunktura gospodarcza w Polsce 1924–1927 (Polish business conditions, 1924–1927, 4 vols.; May 1928–December 1931). Lipiński contributed to the theory of economic fluctuations in Ekonomista (1934–36), the theory of investment (Polityka Gospodarcza, 1936), and the theory of growth in Z problemów gospodarczych wzrostu (On the economic issues of growth; 1930). He was also the author of lectures on the theory of economics (1945–46), Historia myśli ekonomicznej (The history of economic thought; 1950), and of works about Mikołaj Kopernik as an economist (1953). After October 1956 Lipiński dealt with the model of the “socialist economy” (Nowe drogi, 1956, no. 11), but in the 1970s he also wrote Historia polskiej myśli ekonomicznej do końca XVIII wieku (The history of Polish economic thought until the end of eighteenth century; 1975). At the end of his life Lipiński was increasingly skeptical about the prospects of the command economy—for example, in Problemy, pytania, wątpliwości: Z warsztatu ekonomisty (Problems, questions, doubts: From the economist's workshop; 1981). (AF)

Sources: Opozycja w PRL: Słownik biograficzny 1956–89 (Warsaw, 2000); Józef Nowicki, “Edward Lipiński (1888–1986),” in Poczet wybitnych profesorów SGH-SGPIŚ (Warsaw, 1986); Wyższa Szkoła Handlowa, Szkoła Główna Handlowa, Miejska Szkoła Handlowa (Warsaw, 1984); Andrzej Friszke, Opozycja polityczna w PRL 1945–1980 (London, 1994); Encyklopedia historii Drugiej Rzeczypospolitej (Warsaw, 1999).

LIPIŃSKI Waław, pseudonyms “Aleksander” and “Gwido” (28 September 1896, Łódź–4 April 1949, Wronki), Polish officer, historian, and politician. Born into a craftsman's family, from childhood Lipiński was active in scouting. In 1914 he joined the Polish Legions. In July 1917 he refused to swear allegiance to the emperors of Germany and Austria-Hungary, but he avoided internment. He became secretary of the League for the Independence of Poland, which called for a sovereign Poland federated with an independent Lithuania. He also became a member of the High Command of the Polish Military Organization (Polska Organizacja Wojskowa [POW]).

In November 1918 Lipiński took part in the fighting for Lwów (Lviv), and in the spring of 1919 he took part in the Polish Army's campaign leading to the takeover of Wilno (Vilnius). He later served as a press officer in the command of the Lithuanian-Belorussian front, becoming deputy head of the Second Department of the Poznań Area Military Command in February 1920. In 1921 Lipiński received a law degree from the Jagiellonian University in Kraków and earned a doctorate there in 1922. He also studied history at the Jagiellonian University and at the School of Political Sciences in Kraków. In 1917 he began working at the Military Historical Office, where he wrote Walka zbrojna o niepodległość Polski 1905–1918 (The armed struggle for the independence of Poland 1905–1918; 1935). In 1932 Lipiński became secretary of the Niepodległość publishing house. From 1934 to 1936 he was secretary general of the Institute for Research in the Modern History of Poland, and in 1936 he became the director of this institute, which changed its name to the Józef Piłsudski Institute. In 1936 Lipiński received the postdoctoral degree in history. His book Wielki Marszałek (The great marshal) was a popular hagiography of Piłsudski. Lipiński was also the editor-in-chief of Pisma zbiorowe Józefa Piłsudskiego (Collected writings of Józef Piłsudski, 10 vols.; 1937–38).

During the September campaign in 1939, Lipiński served as head of the propaganda department in the Command of the Defense of Warsaw. His radio talks lifted public morale. After the capitulation of Warsaw, Lipiński made his way, via Zakopane, to Hungary, where, at the end of 1940, he got in touch with Marshal Edward Rydz-Śmigły, who had fled from internment in Romania. In March 1942 Lipiński returned to Warsaw and began working with a pro-Piłsudski group called Myśl Państwowa (State Thought) and with the Convention of Pro-Independence Organizations. Lipiński's underground publications include Pakt polsko-rosyjski (The Polish-Russian pact; 1942), Bilans czterolecia (Four years: An assessment; 1944), and Wojna polsko-niemiecka: Kampania wrześniowa w Polsce r. 1939 (The Polish-German war: The September 1939 campaign in Poland; published under the pseudonym "W. Gel" and co-authored by "A. Szański," probably the pseudonym of Rydz-Śmigły). Arrested by the Gestapo in February 1944, Lipiński was ransomed by his family in May of the same year. He settled near Grodzisk Mazowiecki and did not take part in the Warsaw Uprising. At the beginning of 1945 Lipiński returned to a devastated Warsaw and unsuccessfully sought employment at Warsaw University. In the spring of 1946 he founded the pro-Piłsudski National Independence Party (Stronictwo Niezawisłości Narodowej [SNN]) and published the underground Głos Opozycji. On 25 September 1946 he initiated the establishment of the Coordinating Committee of Polish Underground Organizations (Komitet Porozumiewawczy Organizacji Polski Podziemnej [KPOPP]), an association of organizations that had not been legalized by the Communists, including the Freedom and Independence Association (Zrzeszenie Wolność i Niezawisłość [WiN]), the National Party (Stronictwo Narodowe [SN]), the SNN, and the Polish Socialist Party/Freedom-Equality-Independence (PPS/Wolność-Równość-Niezawisłość). Arrested on 7 January 1947 at a KPOPP meeting, Lipiński was sentenced to death on 17 December of that year. The sentence was commuted to life in prison, where he was murdered. (WR)

Sources: PSB, vol. 17; Kunert, vol. 2; Słownik polityków polskich XX wieku (Poznań, 1998); Gazeta Ludowa, 4–28 December 1947; Władysław Pobóg-Malinowski, "Wacław Socha-Lipiński," Kultura (Paris), 1949, no. 3; Tomasz Nałęcz, Polska Organizacja Wojskowa 1914–1918 (Warsaw, 1984); Marek Gałęzowski, Wzór Piłsudczyka: Wacław Lipiński 1896–1949 (Warsaw, 2001).

LIPSKI Jan Józef (25 May 1926, Warsaw–10 September 1991, Kraków), Polish historian of literature and social activist. During the Nazi occupation Lipski fought in the underground scouting units of the Gray Ranks (Szare Szeregi) and in the Home Army (Armia Krajowa). He took part in the Warsaw Uprising, was wounded, and was decorated with the Cross of Valor. In 1953 he graduated in Polish philology from Warsaw University and became an editor at the State Publishing Institute; he was expelled from there in 1959 for political reasons. From 1956 to 1957 he was head of the literary department in the editorial offices of Po prostu. In 1961–82 Lipski was a researcher at the Institute for Literary Research of the Polish Academy of Sciences. In 1965 he earned a Ph.D. From 1956 he belonged to a discussion society called the Club of the Crooked Circle (Klub Krzywego Koła); in 1957–58 he was its president, then vice-president and secretary until 1962, when the club was dissolved by the authorities. In 1961 Lipski co-initiated the revival of an underground Freemasons' lodge called Kopernik; in 1962–81 and 1986–88 he was its president, and between 1988 and 1990, its secretary. Lipski was active in many protest actions—for example, he was co-initiator of the "Letter of 34" in 1964. From 1965 he administered a secret fund that was set up to provide aid to people arrested for political reasons, as well as to their families. Lipski attracted a multigenerational group of intellectuals critical of the regime. In 1975 he was one of the initiators of a protest against amendments to the constitution, and he was a signatory of the "Letter of 59."

Lipski co-organized help for workers who were subjected to repressive measures for taking part in demonstrations on 25 June 1976, and he co-founded the Committee for the Defense of Workers (Komitet Obrony Robotników [KOR]) on 23 September 1976. Later he was one of the most committed activists of the KOR Committee for Social Self-Defense (Komitet Samoobrony Społecznej KOR [KSS KOR]); he was responsible for its finances and was imprisoned in May and June 1977. Lipski belonged to the Society of Scientific Courses (1978–81) and its Stipend Committee. He worked with the uncensored press. From 1980 Lipski was an activist in Solidarity and was the union's expert during negotiations over the censorship law. A member of the Executive Committee of the Solidarity Mazowsze Region, he was a delegate to the union's congress in September 1981. After the imposition of martial law in Poland Lipski took part in a strike in the Ursus factory, was arrested, and was tried. His trial was interrupted owing to his ill health, and he was allowed to go to Great Britain for treatment. He returned in September 1982, after an announcement that a trial of KSS KOR members had been prepared. Arrested and then released on January 1983 owing to ill health, Lipski was amnestied in 1984. He collaborated with the underground structures of Solidarity and its secret press and publications.

In November 1987 Lipski co-initiated the formation of the Polish Socialist Party and became president of its Chief Council. From 1988 he was a member of the Civic Committee of the Chairman of Solidarity, and from 1989 he was a senator of the Civic Parliamentary Club (Obywatelski Klub Parlamentarny [OKP]). Lipski referred to the traditions and thought of the non-Communist left. He combined ideological and ethical ideas and sharply stigmatized nationalism and national xenophobia in Dwie ojczyzny—dwa patriotyzmy (Two motherlands—two patriotisms; 1981). Because of this he was attacked by the national wing of Solidarity. Opposition to Lipski became obvious in 1989, for example, when his candidacy for senator from Radom was challenged by a candidate supported by the local bishop's curia and by some union activists. From 1989 Lipski was critical of the so-called Balcerowicz Plan, and the radical turn of the OKP and the government toward economic liberalism. He stood for a protective state and opposed the rapid increase of social stratification. Lipski authored several works in the history of literature, including Twórczość Jana Kasprowicza 1878–1906 (The literary works of Jan Kasprowicz 1878–1906; 1975); Szkice poezji (Poetry drafts 1992); a collection of essays, Tunika Nessosa (Nessos's tunic 1987); and the historical monographs KOR (KOR: A history of the Workers' Defense Committee in Poland, 1976–1981; 1985) and Katolickie Państwo

Narodu Polskiego (The Catholic state of the Polish nation, 1994). (AF)

Sources: Nasi w Sejmie i Senacie (Warsaw, 1990); Andrzej Friszke, Opozycja polityczna w PRL 1945–1980 (London, 1994); Jan Józef: Spotkania i spojrzenia (Warsaw, 1996).

LIPSKI Józef (5 June 1894 Breslau [Wrocław]–1 November 1958, Washington, D.C.), Polish diplomat. Lipski came from a landed gentry family. After graduating in law from Lausanne University in Switzerland, he worked in the legal section of the Polish National Committee in Paris. In June 1919 he began working in the Polish diplomatic corps. Until January 1922 he was secretary in the legation of the Republic of Poland in London and subsequently served at diplomatic missions in Paris and Berlin. In 1925 he became deputy head, and in 1928 head, of the Western Section of the Political and Economic Department at the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. In July 1933 he was appointed envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to Berlin. After the legation was elevated to the status of embassy in October 1934, Lipski became ambassador to Germany. He was a co-author of the Polish-German declaration of non-aggression of January 1934. In October 1938 the German authorities presented him with demands that an extraterritorial corridor be created across northern Poland and that Gdańsk be incorporated into the Third Reich, as well as a demand for Polish cooperation against the Soviet Union. The Polish government rejected these demands. On 31 August 1939, after the deadline, Lipski was given Hitler's ultimatum, the rejection of which was to be a pretext for Hitler to attack Poland. In September 1939 Lipski made his way to France, where he volunteered to serve in the Polish Army. Until June 1940 he served as a private in the Polish Armed Forces in the West and from 1940 to 1946 on the staff of the commander-in-chief. At that time Lipski traveled a lot with Generals Władysław Sikorski, Kazimierz Sosnkowski, and Władysław Anders. After the war Lipski remained in exile. In 1951 he became an official representative of the Polish government-in-exile in the United States. In 1968 his memoirs, Diplomat in Berlin, 1933–1939: Papers and Memoirs of Józef Lipski, Ambassador of Poland, were published in the United States. (JS)

Sources: Kto był kim w Drugiej Rzeczypospolitej (Warsaw, 1994); Simon Newman, March 1939: The British Guarantee to Poland (Oxford, 1976); Olgierd Terlecki, Pułkownik Beck (Kraków, 1985); Tadeusz Wolsza, Rząd RP na obczyźnie wobec wydarzeń w kraju, 1945–1950 (Warsaw, 1998).

LIVYTSKYI Andriy (9 April 1879, Poltava region–17 January 1954, Karlsruhe), lawyer, president of the Ukrainian National Republic (UNR). Born into an old Cossack family, Livytskyi was educated at Halahan College in Kiev. He graduated from the law school of Kiev University. He worked as an attorney and a justice of the peace in Łubnie, Kaniów, and other places. From his youth he was active in the sociopolitical life. He was president of the Students' Hromada (Community) in Kiev. In 1901 he joined the Revolutionary Ukrainian Party (RUP), which opted for the autonomy of the Ukraine. He was arrested and tried for taking part in the revolution in 1905. The Court of Appeals quashed the verdict of the Court of First Instance, and Livytskyi regained his freedom. After the transformation of the RUP into the Ukrainian Social Democratic Workers' Party (USDWP) in 1905, Livytskyi became one of its leading activists, along with (among others) Volodymir Vynnychenko and Symon Petlyura.

In 1917 Livytskyi became a member of the Central Rada (Council) and commissar of the Poltava guberniya (province). In 1918 he joined the Ukrainian National Union; during the rule of the Directory he was one of the organizers and members of the Labor Congress. In April 1919 he became minister of justice and deputy prime minister of the UNR. In August 1919 he became head of the Ministry for Foreign Affairs of the UNR; in October 1919 he was appointed head of a diplomatic mission that was sent to Poland. On 22 April 1920 Livytskyi signed the Treaty of Peace and Alliance between Poland and the Ukraine, known in Poland as the Piłsudski-Petlyura Alliance and in the Ukraine as the Treaty of Warsaw. After the failure of the Polish-Ukrainian military campaign, on October 1920 Livytskyi became prime minister of the UNR. In the following years, at Petlyura's side, he directed the diplomatic activities of the UNR government-in-exile. After Petlyura's assassination in May 1926, Livytskyi became his successor. From that moment until his death he directed UNR activities. At the outbreak of World War II Livytskyi lived in Warsaw, where he was interned by the Germans. It is believed that in 1940 he delegated Taras Borovets to Polesie with a mission to organize an anti-Communist underground there. In 1944 he nominated Pavlo Shandruk to the Ukrainian committee formed in support of the Third Reich. He transformed the Ukrainian SS Galizien Division into the First Division of the Ukrainian National Army, which saved its soldiers from deportation to the USSR. In 1945 he resumed the work of the UNR government-in-exile and invited recent émigrés to join this government. In 1946 he entrusted Izaak Mazepa with the mission of conducting negotiations with all Ukrainian groups in exile; this led to the establishment of the Ukrainian National Council in 1948. The council was a substitute for the Ukrainian parliament. Livytskyi died in Germany and was buried in Munich. (GM)

Sources: Derzhavnyi tsentr Ukrainiskoyi Narodnoyi Respubliki v ekzyli: Stati i materialy (Philadelphia, Kiev, and Washington, D.C., 1993); Entsyklopediia Ukrainoznavstva, vol. 4 (Lviv, 1994); Robert Potocki, Idea restytucji Ukrainiskiej Republiki Ludowej (1920–1939) (Lublin, 1999); Ryszard Torzecki, Kwestia ukraińska w Polsce w latach 1923–1929 (Kraków, 1989); Jan Jacek Bruski, Petlurowcy: Centrum państwowe Ukrainiskiej Republiki Ludowej na wychodźstwie 1919–1924 (Kraków, 2000).

LIVYTSKYI Mykola, pseudonym “V. Tkach” (9 January 1907, Kiev–8 December 1989, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania), Ukrainian politician, son of Andriy Livytskyi. After the Treaty of Riga was signed in 1921, Livytskyi lived with his parents in Warsaw, where he went to school and then to university. He was active in the community of Ukrainian students, and from 1925 to 1927 he headed the Ukrainian Students' Hromada. In the 1930s he went to Geneva, where he completed economic and journalism studies. He served as secretary of the delegation of the government of the Ukrainian National Republic (UNR) to the League of Nations and directed a branch of the Ukrainian Press Bureau. In 1937, on the orders of the UNR government, Livytskyi made diplomatic visits to Italy, Germany, Czechoslovakia, Austria, Poland, and France. From 1938 to 1939 he served as the representative of the UNR in Khust, in Subcarpathian Ruthenia. In 1942 he arrived in Kiev. Briefly detained by the Gestapo, he was sent to the part of Poland known as the General Government. From 1945 to 1946 Livytskyi helped establish the Ukrainian National State Union, of which he became head in 1951. In 1949 he became a member of the Ukrainian National Council, which served as the UNR parliament in exile. In 1957 he was appointed head (prime minister) of the executive of the Ukrainian National Council, as well as director of foreign affairs; in that capacity, he made numerous foreign visits, during one of which he met the prime minister of Canada. In 1967 Livytskyi was elected president of the UNR government-in-exile, and he held this position until his death. He made official visits to Australia (1973) and Canada and the United States (1976). He initiated the establishment of the Symon Petlyura Foundation (1976). In 1979 he reformed the UNR government-in-exile. Livytskyi was the author of numerous publications; these came out in two volumes: Vidnosyny Zakhid–Skhid i problemy ponevolenykh Moskvoiu natsii (West–East relations and the affairs of the nations enslaved by Moscow; 1975) and DTS UNR v ekzyli mizh 1920 in 1940 rokamy (The State Center [Derzhavnyi Tsentr] of the UNR in exile in the years 1920–1940; 1984). (GM)

Sources: Encyclopedia of Ukraine, vol. 3 (Toronto, 1993); Entsyklopediia Ukrainoznavstva, vol. 4 (Lviv, 1994); Derzhavnyi Tsentr Ukrainiskoyi Narodnoyi Respubliki v ekzyli: Stati i materialy (Philadelphia, Kiev, and Washington, D.C., 1993).

LJOTIĆ Dimitrije (12 August 1891, Belgrade–23 April 1945, Ajdovcina, Slovenia), Serbian nationalist politician. Ljotić came from an affluent family that supported the Karadjordjević dynasty. His grandfather, Dimitrije, was a close associate of Prince Alexander. After graduating from high school, Ljotić commenced law studies. Initially he was fascinated by Leo Tolstoy and pacifism, but his views changed as a result of his experiences during the Balkan Wars (1912–13). In the autumn of 1913 a scholarship funded by Peter I Karadjordjević allowed Ljotić to go to Paris, where he continued his education. Ljotić was greatly influenced by Charles Maurras and his nationalist ideas. After the Sarajevo assassinations in 1914, Ljotić returned to Serbia and was inducted into the army. For a short time he considered entering a monastery. From 1920 to 1929 he was a member of the Radical Party and served as head of its youth section. He supported the authoritarian rule of King Alexander that began in January 1929. In February 1931 he assumed the post of minister of justice in the government of Petar Živković but resigned after King Alexander rejected his plans for a constitution.

After the assassination of Alexander I in 1934, Ljotić founded the Yugoslav national movement Zbor and became its leader. He always emphasized that Zbor was not a political party—he had a negative attitude toward parties—but a way of organizing the nation. Estimates of the number of his supporters range from several hundred to several thousand. On 6 January 1935—the anniversary of the establishment of an authoritarian government by the king—Zbor’s program was announced. In it, Ljotić presented an apocalyptic vision of the world. According to his mystical doctrine, in order to save the nation it was necessary to preserve its “holy” values: the monarchy, the nation, and morality. He considered individualism, liberalism, communism, democracy, feminism, and modernity as the main threats. He was against freemasonry and the Jews. His ideas were akin to fascism, although he denied it. His views were promoted in the Belgrade weekly Otadžbina. Ljotić gained a reputation as an excellent speaker, and some even considered him a prophet. He was arrested on several occasions, and the distribution of Otadžbina was prohibited by the authorities. However, in the elections of 1935 and 1938 neither Ljotić nor any of his supporters became members of parliament.

Zbor did not join in the demonstrations against Yugoslavia’s accession to the Tripartite Pact. Ljotić served in the Yugoslav Army during the Nazi invasion of April 1941, but after the capitulation he collaborated with the German occupation authorities. In April 1941 he helped to prepare an agreement with the Germans and to establish an administrative council to which two members of Zbor were appointed. In September 1941 he helped to establish the collaborationist government of General Milan Nedić. Ljotić put his most loyal soldiers in the Serbian Voluntary Corps, which was established on 15 September 1941. Informally, it was the Zbor army, whose aim was to struggle against the Communist partisans. In the anticipation of German defeat, Ljotić joined the Chetniks and tried to unite the national forces. After the victory of the partisans of Josip Broz Tito, Ljotić attempted to escape, via Slovenia, to the West, but he died in a car crash. His memoirs, Iz moga života (From my life), were published in 1952, and Light of Truth was published in 1984. (AO)

Sources: Philip Rees, Biographical Dictionary of the Extreme Right since 1890 (New York, 1990); Alex N. Dragnich, The First Yugoslavia (Stanford, 1983); M. Stefanović, Zbor Dimitrija Ljotića, 1934–1945 (Belgrade, 1984); Nebojša Popov, Serbski dramati: Od faszystowskiego populizmu do Miloševića (Łódź, 1994); John Lampe, Yugoslavia as History (Cambridge, 1996).

LOGA-SOWIŃSKI Ignacy (20 January 1914, Vankewitz, Germany–10 December 1992, Warsaw), Polish Communist activist. The son of a farmhand, in his youth Loga-Sowiński worked in the building trade. From 1935 he was a member of the Communist Party of Poland. From 1939 to 1941 he worked in the Soviet-occupied part of Poland, where he entered into cooperation with Soviet intelligence. Transferred to the German-occupied part of Poland, in 1942 he joined the (Communist) Polish Workers’ Party (Polska Partia Robotnicza [PPR]), and from 1943 he was a member of its Central Committee. In 1944 Loga-Sowiński was the party’s plenipotentiary in the Lublin region, and in early 1945 he was the plenipotentiary of the (Communist) Provisional Government in the Łódź region. From 1946 to 1948 he was the PPR first secretary of the Łódź region. From 1944 to 1947 Loga-Sowiński belonged to the National Home Council, and from 1947 to 1952 he was a member of the (Communist) Constituent Assembly. From December 1948 in the Polish United Workers’ Party (Polska Zjednoczona Partia Robotnicza [PUWP]), he was closely connected with Władysław Gomułka. In 1951 Loga-Sowiński was arrested and imprisoned. He returned to political life along with Gomułka. At the Eighth Plenum of the PUWP Central Committee (CC) in October 1956, he joined the CC and the Politburo of the PUWP. In 1956–71 Loga-Sowiński chaired the Central Council of Trade Unions, and from 1957 to 1971 he was a member of parliament. In 1957 he became a member of the Council of State, and from 1965 to 1971 he was the council’s deputy chairman. In December 1970, along with Zenon Kliszko and General Grzegorz Korczyński, Loga-Sowiński came to the Baltic Coast, where he joined a special task force responsible for the pacification of workers' protests in the Triple City (Gdańsk, Gdynia, and Sopot). During a Politburo meeting on 19 December 1970 Loga-Sowiński opposed the removal of Gomułka. In February 1971 he was dismissed from the Politburo and in December 1971 from the CC. In 1971–78 Loga-Sowiński was ambassador to Turkey. Later he retired from political life. (PK)

Sources: Mołdawa; Słownik polityków polskich XX wieku (Poznań, 1998); Krzysztof Lesiakowski, Mieczysław Moczar "Mietek": Biografia polityczna (Warsaw, 1998); Jerzy Eisler, Grudzień 1970 (Warsaw, 2000).

LONČAR Budimir (1 April 1924, Preko, Croatia), Yugoslav Communist activist and diplomat of Croatian nationality. After graduating from high school, Lončar studied at a military school, and in 1941 he joined the guerrilla movement of Josip Broz Tito. During World War II he held various positions in the Union of Communist Youth of Yugoslavia and in the Communist Party of Dalmatia. In 1947–49 he worked in the security service. In 1950 he became consul in New York and councillor at the Yugoslav standing mission to the United Nations. From 1956 Lončar worked in the Foreign Ministry in Belgrade. In 1965 he became ambassador to Indonesia and simultaneously held the position of auxiliary ambassador to Malaysia and Singapore. From 1969 he was an adviser to the foreign minister. In 1973 he became ambassador to West Germany, and in 1977, undersecretary of state in the Foreign Ministry. From 1979 to 1983 Lončar was ambassador to the United States. In 1983–87 he was deputy federal secretary (deputy minister), and from December 1987, federal secretary (minister) of foreign affairs. Lončar tried to prevent the dissolution of the Yugoslav federal republic, seeking assistance from the European community, but in vain. After Slovenia and Croatia proclaimed independence on 25 June 1991, the federal government of Ante Marković gradually lost power. In December 1991 Lončar resigned from his position and retired. (AO)

Sources: Warren Zimmermann, Origins of a Catastrophe (New York, 1996); www.mfa.gov.yu/history/Ministri/B_Loncar_.s.html.

LORKOVIĆ Ivan (17 June 1876, Zagreb–24 February 1926, Zagreb), Croatian politician. As a student of law at Zagreb University, Lorković belonged to the founders of the Union of Croatian and Serbian Academic Youth, which edited the periodical Narodna misao from 1897. Co-founder and leader of the Croatian Progressive Party (Hrvatska Napredna Stranka), in December 1905 Lorković belonged to the founders of the Croatian-Serbian Coalition, uniting political efforts of the two nations under Habsburg rule. From 1906 he was a member of the Croatian Assembly (Sabor). After Frano Supilo withdrew from the coalition, Lorković became the key spokesman for cooperation between Serbs and Croats. At the end of March 1918 he joined the Croatian Committee, which declared itself in favor of a joint state with the Serbs and Slovenes. After the Kingdom of Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes (SHS) came into being in December 1918, Lorković was increasingly disappointed by the centralist policies of the Serbs, and in 1919 he founded the Croatian Union (Hrvatska Zajednica), which adopted a federalist program. After the passing of the June 1921 constitution, along with the Croatian Republican Peasant Party of Stjepan Radić and the Croatian Party of Law, Lorković established the Croatian Bloc, acting in sharp opposition to the political system of the SHS. (WR) Sources: Enciklopedija Jugoslavije, vol. 5 (Zagreb, 1962); Mark Biondich, Stjepan Radić, the Croat Peasant Party, and the Politics of Mass Mobilization, 1904–1928 (Toronto, 2000).

LORKOVIĆ Mladen (1 March 1909, Zagreb–25 April 1945, Lepoglava), Croatian nationalist politician. Lorković was the son of Ivan Lorković, leader of the Croatian Progressive Party. The political failure of his father, who had called for a national union of the Southern Slav nations and who died prematurely, increased his patriotic feelings. While a student, Lorković took part in military actions against the regime of King Alexander I (Karadjordjević). Fearing arrest, he fled to Berlin, where he worked closely with Ante Pavelić. Lorković was imprisoned after returning to Yugoslavia but was released after a hunger strike. In 1939 he published Narod i zemlja Hrvata (The nation and the land of the Croats). After becoming minister of foreign affairs of the Independent State of Croatia in June 1941, Lorković followed the pro-German line of Pavelić. He resigned in April 1943, after a protest by the Italians, who did not like his comments about their policy toward Croatia. Lorković remained a member of the Ustasha government until Nikola Mandić became prime minister in September 1943, when he resigned for a short time in protest against expected changes in the political line. However, in October 1943 he returned to the government, assuming the portfolio of minister of interior. In July 1944 he was arrested by the Ustasha authorities for taking part in an alleged pro-Allied plot. Along with a dozen or so other Croatian politicians and officers, Lorković was murdered by the Ustasha in a prison near Zagreb shortly before the end of the war. (WR)

Sources: Jere Jareb, Pola stoleća hrvatske politike: Povodom Mačekove autobiografije (Buenos Aires, 1960); Ivo Omrčanin, Dramatis Personae and Finis of the Independent State of Croatia in British and American Documents (Bryn Mawr, Pa., 1983); Bogdan Krizman, Ustaše i Treći Reich, vols. 1–2 (Zagreb, 1983); Bogdan Krizman, Ante Pavelić i Ustaše (Zagreb, 1983); Marcus Tanner, Croatia: A Nation Forged in War (New Haven, 1997).

LOSIK Yazep (6 November 1883, Mikalaieushchina, Minsk County–1 April 1940), Belorussian political and social activist, philologist, writer, and teacher. Losik was the uncle of Yakub Kolas. He was educated in a teacher-training college in Molodechno (1898–99) and graduated from a municipal school in Novgorod (1902). In 1905 he was active in the revolutionary movement and was exiled to Siberia. In 1907 he escaped from prison and went into hiding. Captured in 1911, he was again exiled for life to Siberia. In Irkutsk he began to write for the Wilno (Vilnius) paper Nasha Niva. After the February 1917 revolution, Losik returned to Belorussia. He was one of the founders of the Belorussian Social Democratic Hramada (BSDH). In 1917–18 he edited the Wolna Belarus paper. In 1917 he campaigned for the autonomy of Belorussia within the Russian federation. After the dissolution of the All-Belorussian Congress and signing of the Brest-Litovsk Treaty, Losik declared his support for the independence of Belorussia. At a congress of Belorussian organizations and national parties he was elected to the Executive Committee of the Central Council of the Belorussian Organizations and became a member of the Great Belorussian Council. During the German occupation Losik worked in Minsk. He was one of the initiators of the proclamation of the Belorussian People's Republic (BPR). On 25 April 1918 Losik was among the signatories of a telegram from the BPR to Emperor Wilhelm II of Germany in which the signatories stated that “they saw the future of Belorussia only under the patronage of the German state.” After a split in the BSDH Losik was one of the leaders of the Belorussian Social Democratic Party, and from June 1918 he was president of the Council of the BPR. After a split in the BPR on 13 December 1919 Losik took the leadership of its Higher Council.

After the end of World War I Losik remained in the Belorussian SSR and was one of the first to recognize the Soviet authorities. From 1921 he lectured at Minsk University, at courses for instructors, and at the School of Pedagogy. He translated The Communist Manifesto, by Marx and Engels, into Belorussian. In 1922 Losik was elected a member of the Institute of Belorussian Culture (Inbelkult). The same year he published a practical grammar of the Belorussian language (Hramatyka belaruskai movy: Fonetyka). The Bolshevik paper Zviazda labeled the book as counterrevolutionary. Losik was arrested but was released after the intervention of the people's commissar of the BSSR, Usievalad Ihnatouski. In November 1926 Losik organized a conference devoted to the reform of the Belorussian grammar and alphabet. In July 1930 he was arrested again in allegedly because of his connection with the Belorussian Liberation Union which did not actually exist. On 6 December 1930 Losik was deprived of his academic title. By a decision of the OGPU of the BSSR on 10 April 1931, Losik was exiled to Kamyshyn in the Saratov district for five years. In November 1934 he was amnestied but was not allowed to return to Belorussia. He lived with his family in the district of Bryansk. In June 1938 Losik was arrested again and in 1940 sentenced to five years for “anti-Soviet agitation.” According to the official version, Losik died in prison. In 1958 he was vindicated, and his 1938 sentence was quashed; in 1988 his 1931 sentence was quashed. Losik published extensively on the history and national revival of Belorussia—for example, the essays 1517–1917 (1917), a history of the Great Lithuanian-Belorussian Duchy (1918), and a depiction of the battle of Grunwald in medieval chronicles. Between 1921 and 1927 he published dozens of linguistic works. In 1994 Tvory: Apaviadanni, kazki, artykuly (Works: Short stories, tales and articles) was published, and in 1995 Losik's Belorussian grammar was reissued. (AS/SA)

Sources: Miasnikou Anatol, Natsdemy: Los i trahiediiia Fabiana Shantyra, Usievalada Ihnatouskaha i Jazepa Losika (Minsk, 1993).

LOSONCZY Géza (5 May 1917, Érsekcsanád–21 December 1957, Budapest), Hungarian Communist activist, victim of the 1956 revolution. Born into the family of a clergyman of the Evangelical Reformed Church, after passing his high school exams, Losonczy studied Hungarian and Romance languages and literatures at Debrecen University. In 1937 he joined the leftist March Front, one of the aims of which was to revitalize the Hungarian countryside. In 1939, while on a scholarship in France, Losonczy joined the Hungarian Communist Party (HCP), which was illegal in Hungary. After returning home, he worked as a journalist with Népszava, the central organ of the Social Democratic movement. In 1940 he was arrested for his political activities. He was subsequently kept under police surveillance. In 1941 Losonczy completed his studies in Budapest. He helped to publish an anti-war issue of Népszava with articles by major representatives of the anti-Nazi movement. In 1942 he went underground. After Germany occupied Hungary in March 1944, Losonczy was active in the resistance movement and helped to organize the Hungarian National Independence Front. In March 1945 he became the editor of Szabad Nép, the central organ of the HCP. He was also a member of its Central Committee (CC) from 1946 to 1951, a member of parliament from 1945 to 1951, and secretary of state for political affairs in the Ministry of People's Education from 1949 to 1951. Arrested in 1951 on false charges, Losonczy was sentenced to fifteen years' imprisonment. Seriously ill, he was released in the summer of 1954. He spent one year in a hospital and sanatorium. In April 1955 he was rehabilitated.

After recovering, Losonczy became one of the leading figures of the so-called party opposition centered around Imre Nagy. In 1955 he signed a memorandum presented to the CC of the Hungarian Workers' Party (HWP) by writers protesting the retightening of censorship. On the night of 23–24 October 1956 Losonczy was coopted to the leadership of the HWP and elected a deputy member of the Politburo, but, along with Ferenc Donáth, he resigned from these positions in protest against the policy of First Secretary Ernő Gerő and the entire CC, and he supported the demands of the insurgents. On 26 October at a CC meeting Losonczy insisted that the HWP start negotiations with the insurgents. On 30 October he joined the government of Imre Nagy, becoming the minister of state in charge of press and propaganda. He was also a member of the provisional leadership of the Hungarian Socialist Workers' Party (HSWP). On 3 November, along with Zoltán Tildy, Losonczy conducted the last press conference of Nagy's government. The day after the second Soviet intervention started, Losonczy took refuge in the Yugoslav Embassy in Budapest. On 22 November, along with other members of Nagy's group, he was abducted and interned in Romania. In mid-April 1957 Losonczy was brought to Budapest. During investigations, his lung disease recurred. However, he began and continued a hunger strike. Before his trial began, Losonczy died in jail in unexplained circumstances. Information about his death was not announced to the public until June 1958, when a communiqué was issued about the trial and execution of Imre Nagy and his associates, together with whom Losonczy was ceremoniously reburied in June 1989 in Budapest. (JT)

Sources: A magyar forradalom és szabadságharc enciklopédiája, CD-ROM (Budapest, 1999); Magyar Nagylexikon, vol. 12 (Budapest, 2001); Ferenc A. Vali, Rift and Revolt in Hungary (Cambridge, Mass., 1961); Paul E. Zinner, Revolution in Hungary (New York, 1962); György Litván, ed., Rewolucja węgierska 1956 roku (Warsaw, 1996).

LOTOTSKYI Oleksandr (22 March 1870, Bronitsa, Podolia–22 October 1939, Warsaw), Ukrainian politician, scholar, and Orthodox Church activist. Born into a clergyman's family, Lototskyi studied at the Podolian Theological Seminary, and from 1892 to 1896 he studied canon law at the Kiev Theological Academy. After his studies he started working as a state controller in Kiev and then in St. Petersburg (1900–17). In both centers Lototskyi was active in Ukrainian social and Orthodox Church life; for example, he translated the Bible into the Ukrainian language and participated in the founding of the Vik publishing house in Kiev (1896). In 1917 he co-founded the Ukrainian Party of Socialists-Federalists (UPS-F), a centrist pro-independence party that continued the tradition of the Society of Ukrainian Progressives. At the beginning of 1917 Lototskyi became president of the Ukrainian National Rada (Council) in Petrograd. In May 1917, on the motion of the Ukrainian Central Rada (UCR), the Provisional Government of Russia appointed him commissar of Bukovina and Pokutia (Pokucie). From September to November 1917 Lototskyi was general secretary in the General Secretariat of the UCR, from which he resigned because of its radicalization. He returned to the government during the presidency of the Socialist Revolutionary Vsevolod Holubovych at the beginning of 1918, but he again stepped down because he opposed Holubovych's overly leftist policy. At the end of the regime of Hetman Pavlo Skoropadskyi, Lototskyi, as minister for religious affairs, joined (in October 1918) the second cabinet of Fedor Lyzohub, which was established to negotiate with the Ukrainian left—that is, the Directory of Volodymyr Vynnychenko.

At an ecumenical council in Kiev on 12 November 1918 Lototskyi firmly supported the autocephaly of the Orthodox Church in the Ukraine. He prepared a law about autocephaly that was promulgated by a decree of 1 January 1919 issued by the Directory of the Ukrainian People's Republic (UPR). From January 1919 to March 1920 Lototskyi served as the UNR ambassador to Istanbul, with a mission of gaining the recognition for the autocephaly by the Patriarch of Constantinople. After the fall of the UNR Lototskyi emigrated to Vienna and then to Prague, where between 1922 and 1929 he was an assistant professor and professor of Orthodox law at the Ukrainian Free University. There, he continued his political activities within the framework of the Ukrainian Radical Democratic Party, and he remained deputy prime minister and minister for religious affairs in subsequent UPR governments-in-exile.

In 1928 Lototskyi moved to Warsaw, where he assumed the position of professor at the School of Orthodox Theology of Warsaw University and the post of head of the Department of Slavic Orthodox Churches and Romanian Orthodox Church History. On his initiative, in 1930 the Ukrainian Scientific Institute was founded in Warsaw, the only Ukrainian research institution financed by government funds in Poland before 1939. Lototskyi headed the institute until 1938. His efforts led to the publication of around fifty-four volumes of scholarly works in the fields of literature and literary studies, history and Orthodox Church history, statistics, economics, and jurisprudence. Lototskyi was buried in the Orthodox cemetery in Warsaw. In 1971 his son Boris obtained the consent of the authorities of the Polish People's Republic to take his father's ashes to the United States, where they were buried in Bound Brook, New Jersey.

Lototskyi was the author of many articles in Ukrainian and Russian periodicals. He helped to obtain the permission of St. Petersburg for the publication of a series of Ukrainian books (for example, a full edition of Kobzar, by Taras Shevchenko, 1907). Lototskyi himself also wrote several fundamental works in Orthodox Church history: Prawo cerkiewne (Orthodox Church law; 1924); Ukrains'ki dzherela tserkovnoho prava (Foundations of the Ukrainian Orthodox Church law; 1931); and "Autokefalia" (Autocephaly, 2 vols.; 1935–38); he also wrote a biography of Symon Petlyura (1936). Lototskyi also left his memoirs: Storinky mynuloho (Stories of the past, 3 vols.; 1932–1934) and U Tsarhorodi (In Tsarigrad; 1939), which contain invaluable materials on the history of Ukrainian sociopolitical life, especially in the period between 1900 and 1917. (GM)

Sources: Encyclopedia of Ukraine, vol. 3 (Toronto, 1993); Lytsar pratsi i oboviazku: Zbirnyk prysviachenyi pamiaty prof. O. Lototskoho-Bilousenka (Toronto and New York, 1983); Stefan Kozak, "Oleksandr Łotoćkyj: Uczony, dyplomata, i polityk," Warszawskie Zeszyty Ukrainoznawcze, vol. 3.

LOVINESCU Monica (20 November 1923, Bucharest), Romanian journalist and émigré activist. Lovinescu graduated in linguistic and philosophical studies at Bucharest University. She made her literary debut in the periodical Vremea. Later she contributed to Revista Fundațiilor Regale and, after World War II, also to the weekly Democrația. In September 1947 Lovinescu went to Paris on a scholarship from the French government, and in January 1948 she asked for political asylum there. Soon after coming to Paris, Lovinescu married Virgil Ierunca. In 1958 the Romanian Communists arrested her mother, Ecaterina Bălăcioiu, and sentenced her to a long-term imprisonment, during which she died. In 1961–75 Lovinescu edited Romanian musical and literary broadcasts on French radio. From 1962 she worked with Radio Free Europe, editing (along with her husband) the very popular broadcasts Actualitatea culturală românească (Contemporary Romanian culture and Teze și Antiteze la Paris (Theses and antitheses in Paris). In 1977

Lovinescu strongly supported Paul Goma. In April 1989 she signed a demand for the liberalization of cultural life in Romania. After the fall of the Nicolae Ceaușescu regime in 1989, Lovinescu continued her cultural activities, both in Romania and abroad. In 2002 she published her Jurnal 1981–1984 (Diary 1981–1984) and Jurnal 1985–1988 (Diary 1985–1988). (AB)

Sources: Mihai Pellin, Opisul emigrației politice: Destine în 1222 de fișe alcătuite pe bază dosarelor din arhivele Securității (Bucharest, 2002).

LOZORAITIS Stasys (5 September 1898, Kovno [Kaunas]–24 December 1983, Rome), Lithuanian politician. After Lithuania regained its independence, Lozoraitis worked in the Ministry of Interior and in the chancellery of the government. In 1923 he entered the diplomatic service, becoming first secretary and later councillor at the legation in Berlin. He simultaneously studied international law at Berlin University. In 1929 he was sent to the diplomatic mission at the Holy See, where in 1931 he became chargé d'affaires. After returning to Lithuania in 1932, Lozoraitis became director of the political department in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, and in June 1934 he became head of this ministry. He strengthened the ties between Lithuania and the other states of the Baltic Entente (Latvia and Estonia) and called for the normalization of relations with Poland; he expressed his views in memoranda presented to President Antanas Smetona. However, Lozoraitis resigned as minister in protest against the Polish ultimatum of March 1938. In February 1939 he was appointed minister plenipotentiary to Italy. In the face of mounting pressure from the Soviet Union, in May 1940 the minister of foreign affairs, Juozas Urbšys, authorized Lozoraitis to act on behalf of the Lithuanian government in the case that the Soviet Union occupied the country. After Lithuania was seized by the Soviet Union in June 1940, Lozoraitis made numerous attempts to draw the attention of Western governments and public opinion to the unlawful annexation of Lithuania and to the mass terror introduced into the country by the Kremlin. After World War II, he continued his efforts; for example, he sent letters to the United Nations and other international organizations. His son, also Stasys Lozoraitis (1924–94), was a representative of the Lithuanian government-in-exile at the Holy See and later in the United States; in the autumn of 1992 he returned to Lithuania, where he ran in the February 1993 presidential elections, in which he obtained around 40 percent of the votes but lost to Algirdas Brazauskas. (WR)

Sources: EL, vol. 3; Saulius Sužiedelis, Historical Dictionary of Lithuania (Lanham, Md., 1997).

LOZYNSKYI Mykhailo (30 July 1880, Babyn, Galicia–3 November 1937, Solovets Islands), Ukrainian lawyer and politician. Lozynskyi graduated in law. Before World War I he was the editor of Dilo (later Hromads'ka Dumka) and a contributor to Haslo, an organ of the Ukrainian Radical Party in Tschernowitz (now Chernivtsi); he also worked with the Rada (Council) in Kiev. During the war he belonged to the Union for the Liberation of Ukraine and supported the Central Powers. In March 1919 he became deputy secretary for foreign affairs of the Western Ukrainian National Republic (Zakhidno-Ukrayins'ka Narodna Republika [ZUNR]), a member of the ZUNR delegation to talks with Poland, and a Ukrainian delegate to the Paris Peace Conference. From 1921 to 1927 Lozynskyi was a professor of international law at the Ukrainian Free University in Prague. Disappointed by the Entente's March 1923 decision to give Eastern Galicia to Poland and by the lack of an autonomous government there and encouraged by the initial successes of the Ukrainization policy in the Ukrainian SSR, Lozynskyi decided to move to Kharkiv. In 1927 he took up the chair of law at the Institute of the National Economy. He also worked at the Ukrainian Institute of Marxism-Leninism. Arrested in 1930 in connection with the case of the so-called Union for the Liberation of Ukraine, Lozynskyi was deported to the Urals and then to the Solovets Islands, where he was sentenced to death and executed.

Lozynskyi published extensively on Ukrainian-Polish relations. His first work was devoted to the liberation struggle in the Ukraine in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. Emphasizing the traditions of freedom of the Cossacks, in the treatise Marks-Engels-Liebknicht pro vidbudovanie Polshchi (Marx, Engels, and Liebknicht on the reconstruction of Poland; 1906), he criticized thinkers who had a preconceived idea of Poland and its "historical" borders. Lozynskyi was drawn to Mikhail Bakunin's proposals to dismember Russia and separate the Ukraine as a member of a future federation of East European nations. His book Polsky i ruskyi revoliutsiyni rukh i Ukraina (The Polish and Russian revolutionary movement and the Ukraine; 1908) was a polemic against the views of Polish and Russian political parties. In Avtonomiia kraiv v avstriyskii konstytutsii (Autonomy of the countries in the Austrian constitution; 1912) and Podil Halychyny (The division of Eastern Galicia; 1913) he addressed current issues. In the collection Akt 12 kvitnia 1908 r. (The Act of 12 April 1908; 1909) Lozynskyi tried to justify the killing of Alfred Potocki, governor of Galicia, by stressing the miserable living conditions of Ukrainians under Polish rule. During World War I Lozynskyi worked in Vienna to change the status of Eastern Galicia and have it made into a separate province (Die Schaffung einer ukrainischen Provinz in Oesterreich; 1915); he challenged the Polish influence with the Central Powers (Dokumente des polnischen Russophilismus; 1915), as well as with the Entente countries (Les "droits" de la Pologne sur la Galicie; 1917). In 1919 he published a political and propaganda treatise, L'Ukraine Occidentale (Galicie): L'invasion polonaise en Ukraine Occidentale est crime contre le Droit. During a stay in Prague, Lozynskyi wrote many works on international law and the history of Ukrainian constitutional law, including his principal work, Halychyna v rr. 1918–1920 (Eastern Galicia 1918–1920; 1922). (TS)

Sources: Encyclopedia of Ukraine, vol. 3 (Toronto, 1993); Kost Levytskyi, Istoriia politychnoyi dumky halytskykh ukraiintsv 1848–1914 (Lviv, 1926); Kost Levytskyi, Istoriia vyzvolnykh zmahhan halytskykh ukraiintsv z chasiv svitovoyi viyny 1914–1918 rr. (Lviv, 1928); M. Lytvyn and K. Naumenko, Istoriia ZUNR (Lviv, 1995); G. Cvengros, La République Démocratique Ukrainienne—la République Française (1917–1922) (Lviv, 1995).

LUBACHIVSKYI Myroslav Ivan (24 June 1914, Dolina–14 December 2000, Lviv), cardinal and head of the Ukrainian Greek Catholic Church. In 1938 Lubachivskyi graduated in theology from the University of Lwów (Lviv), and later he studied theology in Innsbruck. He was ordained by Metropolitan Andriy Sheptytskyi in September 1938. Later he worked in the Greek Catholic archdiocese of Lviv. In 1942–47 he lived and worked at the Biblical Institute and the Gregorianum in Rome and at the Rome Medical Academy. In May 1947 Lubachivskyi left for the United States and received American citizenship. Until 1980 he worked there among Ukrainian Greek Catholics as (among other things) secretary to the archbishop of Philadelphia for Ukrainians of the Byzantine rite. Lubachivskyi translated the catechism into Ukrainian, and he edited homilies, reflections, and catecheses. He also worked in Austria, Switzerland, and Italy. In 1967–68 he edited Radio Vatican broadcasts. On 13 September 1979 the Synod of the Ukrainian Greek Catholic Church elected him archbishop of Philadelphia for the Ukrainians. He was personally consecrated by Pope John Paul II on 12 November 1979. On 27 March 1980 the Synod appointed Lubachivskyi coadjutor with the right of succession to the archbishop of Lviv, Cardinal Josyf Slipyi. After Slipyi's death, on 7 September 1984, Lubachivskyi became archbishop of Lviv, and on 25 May 1985 John Paul II appointed him cardinal. In October 1987 Lubachivskyi met with the Primate of Poland, Cardinal Józef Glemp, and started reconciliation talks between the Greek and Roman Catholic Churches and between the Poles and Ukrainians. In November 1987 he made a similar effort toward the patriarchate of Moscow, but to no avail.

Lubachivskyi returned to the Ukraine in March 1991, during the breakup of the Soviet Union. He dealt with the reconstruction of Greek Catholic structures after forty-five years of Communist oppression. He tried to ease the tensions with the Orthodox Church. On 25 March 1994 Lubachivskyi wrote a pastoral letter on the unity of the Christian churches in which he appealed for the termination of inter-Christian hostilities and the reconstruction of church unity in the Ukraine. In view of his ailing health, in 1996 Lubachivskyi asked the Pope for an assistant bishop to deal with the current administration of the Uniate Church and the Lviv archdiocese. On 14 October 1996 the Synod elected Bishop Lubomyr Huzar for this role, and the next day the Holy See confirmed this choice. Lubachivskyi took an active part in the synods of the Catholic Church in 1980, 1983, 1985, 1987, and 1990 (as co-chairman), as well as in the First Special Synod of European Bishops in 1991. After the death of Cardinal Slipyi, Lubachivskyi chaired all the synods of the Greek Catholic Church. In 1986 he published a booklet, Was It Really Russia That Was Christianized in 988? In 1988 he also chaired the celebrations for the Millennium of the Baptism of Kievan Ruthenia in various countries. Lubachivskyi was buried in St. Yur (George) Cathedral in Lviv, which he had reconstructed after the years of Communist destruction. (AGr)

Sources: Encyclopedia of Ukraine, vol. 3 (Toronto, 1993); Bohdan Nahaylo, The Ukrainian Resurgence (Toronto, 1999); Annuario Pontificio, 2000; Andrzej Kaczyński, "Arcybiskup większy Lwowa," Rzeczpospolita, 22 December 2000; Rev. Bogdan Pańczak, "Wielkim sercem i Duchem," Tygodnik Powszechny, 7 January 2001.

ŁUBIEŃSKI Konstanty (21 March 1910, Zassów, near Dębica–25 September 1977, Warsaw), Polish politician. Born into a landowner's family, Łubieński completed studies in law and economics at the Jagiellonian University in Kraków in 1934, and from 1936 to 1939 he worked in the Ministry of the Treasury. Active in a conservative group called Big Power Ideology (Myśl Mocarstwowa), he contributed to the periodicals Bunt Młodych and Polityka, edited by Jerzy Giedroyc. During the Nazi occupation Łubieński was a soldier in the Home Army (Armia Krajowa), and in 1944 he commanded its Mielec district. In 1945 he joined a group founded by Bolesław Piasecki and centered around the weekly Dziś i jutro. Łubieński was the author of List otwarty do Pana Tadeusza Łady (An open letter to Mr. Tadeusz Łada; 1948), encouraging Catholics to support the Socialist system. After the creation of the pro-government Catholic organization Pax in 1952, Łubieński became one of its leaders. From 1952 until his death, he was an MP. In the fall of 1956 he was one of the main opponents of Piasecki's policies within Pax. In November 1956 Łubieński left the organization and co-founded a group centered around the weekly Za i przeciw.

After this group split in the fall of 1957, he joined the Club of Catholic Intellectuals (Klub Inteligencji Katolickiej [KIK]) in Warsaw. From 1958 to 1962 he was a member of the KIK board, then its vice-president (1962–69) and president (1969–72). In 1957 he joined a parliamentary group called Znak, in which he mainly dealt with economic issues but also defended the ownership rights of the Roman Catholic Church and the rights of the faithful. In June 1971 he became vice-president of the All-Polish Committee of the National Unity Front (Ogólnopolski Komitet Frontu Jedności Narodu) and advocated a greater involvement of the Znak movement in political life. This was opposed by a majority of KIK members and led to Łubieński's resignation from the KIK leadership. In 1976 he belonged to a special committee for drafting amendments to the Constitution of the Polish People's Republic, and he supported the amendments. This led to a sharp conflict with most members of the Znak movement. After the elections of 1976 Łubieński became a member of the State Council and president of the parliamentary group called Znak, which was not recognized by most members of the movement as representative. In June 1976 he left the KIK. The following month Łubieński co-founded the Polish Club of Catholic Intellectuals (Polski Klub Inteligencji Katolickiej) and became its president. (AF)

Sources: Andrzej Micewski, Współrzędzić czy nie kłamać? PAX i "Znak" w Polsce 1945–1976 (Paris, 1978).

LUBOMIRSKI Zdzisław, prince (4 April 1865, Nizhny Novgorod–31 July 1943, Maławieś, near Grójec, Poland), Polish conservative politician from an aristocratic family. The son of a participant in the January Insurrection of 1863, Lubomirski was born in exile. He was brought up and educated in Galicia. He received a law degree from the Jagiellonian University in Kraków and from the university in Graz. In 1893 he settled in the so-called Kingdom of Poland. Lubomirski was involved in charity and educational work, joining the Warsaw Philanthropic Society and the Society for School Tuition Fees. He was also an initiator of the Society of National Education (Towarzystwo Oświaty Narodowej [TON]). Lubomirski was the leader of conciliatory circles; in 1904, along with other activists, he issued a servile memorandum to the tsarist government. From 1908 to 1909 he took part in negotiations with the Russophile Pan-Slavic movement in Bohemia and the Kingdom of Poland, as a result of which he drifted toward the National Democratic Party.

After the outbreak of World War I, Lubomirski became chairman of the Civic Committee of the City of Warsaw (3 August 1914). He cooperated with the Party of Real Politics (Stronnictwo Polityki Realnej [SPR]) and the Polish National Committee. He remained in Warsaw after the withdrawal of the Russians, who had appointed him mayor of the city on 4 August 1915. After the Germans occupied Warsaw, they recognized Lubomirski's appointment. Under his leadership, the Central and Warsaw National Committees dealt de jure with educational and charity work, while de facto they handled many of the administrative and political responsibilities of the non-existent Polish government. Lubomirski tried to prevent the establishment of a Polish army under the auspices of Germany and to ease tensions in the capital. He opposed extreme Germanophile tendencies, cooperated with the Provisional Council of State, and maintained contacts with Józef Piłsudski. Shocked by the revolution in Russia, Lubomirski began to work closely with the pro-Polish activists. On 15 October 1917 the emperors of Austria-Hungary and Germany appointed Lubomirski, together with Archbishop Aleksander Kakowski and Count Józef Ostrowski, as members of the Regency Council of the Kingdom of Poland. In the fall of 1918 an attempt to appoint Lubomirski head of state ended in failure. However, he managed to take control of the Polish military units that had been established by the Germans. On 10 November at the railway station in Warsaw, Lubomirski welcomed Piłsudski back to Poland, and on 14 November the Regency Council passed its duties on to Piłsudski.

Lubomirski returned to politics during the coup of May 1926, undertaking mediation negotiations among the parties. He later became deputy chairman of the pro-Piłsudski Polish Conservative Organization of Pro-State Work. From 1931 to 1935 he also served as chairman of the Chief Council of Landed Gentry Organizations. From 1928 to 1938 he sat in the Senate, first as a representative of the Nonparty Bloc of Cooperation with the Government (Bezpartyjny Blok Współpracy z Rządem) and later as a presidential nominee. Lubomirski protested the authoritarian leanings of the sanacja regime, particularly during the co-called Brześć Trial. Because of his contacts with the opposition, Lubomirski lost his senatorial seat. During the defense of Warsaw in September 1939, he acted in the Civic Committee. Under the German occupation he was involved in charity work and maintained contacts with the underground circles of the landed gentry. Arrested by the Gestapo on 10 November 1942, Lubomirski was released in January 1943, with his health broken. He died shortly afterwards on his family estate. (MC)

Sources: PSB, vol. 18; Władysław Pobóg-Malinowski, Najnowsza historia polityczna Polski, vols. 1–3 (London, 1983–86); Krzysztof Jasiewicz, Lista strat ziemiaństwa polskiego 1939–1945 (Warsaw, 1995).

LUCA Vasile (8 June 1898, Cătălina, Transylvania–23 July 1963, Aiud), Romanian Communist activist. Born into a family of Transylvanian Hungarians, Luca lost his parents when he was seven and was brought up in an orphanage in Sibiu. In 1913 he became an apprentice to a locksmith and later worked on the railways. Inducted into the army in 1915, he fought on various fronts in World War I. From April to August 1919 he was a soldier of the Red Guard of the Hungarian Soviet Republic (HSR). As a member of the Hungarian Communist Party (HCP), in the autumn of 1919 Luca returned to Transylvania, which had been incorporated into Romania. When the Communist Party of Romania (CPR) was founded in 1922, Luca became a member. From 1924 to 1927 he was imprisoned for his Communist activities. Released in 1927, he joined the CPR Central Committee (CC). In accordance with the Comintern line, he called for the establishment of a separate state of the “Transylvanian proletariat.” Luca was active in the trade union movement in Transylvania, organizing strikes at the Lupeni mines in 1929 and at the Grivița plants in Bucharest in 1933. From 1933 to 1938 and from 1939 to 1940 he was imprisoned again. In April 1940 he attempted to cross the Soviet border. Captured by the Romanian authorities, he spent three months in prison. He was released after the Soviet Union seized Bessarabia in June 1940. In 1940 Luca was elected to the Supreme Soviet of the Ukrainian SSR. From 1941 to 1944 he was in Moscow, where he was in charge of the Romanian section of Moscow Radio (Radio România Liberă). He also helped to establish the Tudor Vladimirescu Division, which was recruited from Romanian prisoners of war.

In June 1944 Luca arrived in Moldavia, together with the Red Army. In September 1944, after the overthrow of the regime of Marshal Ion Antonescu, he returned to Bucharest and became leader of the National Democratic Bloc (NDB), a pro-Communist coalition against the so-called historical parties and against the king. Luca served as the NDB leader until November 1946. From 1944 to 1952, along with Ana Pauker, Teohari Georgescu, and Gheorghe Gheorghiu-Dej, Luca was one of the senior leaders of the Romanian Communist Party (RCP), serving as secretary of the CC and a member of the RCP Politburo. He co-organized the parliamentary pseudo-elections of 19 November 1946 and was co-responsible for the political persecutions and brutal Sovietization of Romania in 1944–52. Luca's name was associated with the “internationalist” faction in the party, which competed with the “national” faction of Gheorghiu-Dej.

Between November 1947 and May 1952 Luca served as minister of finance. Aligned with Pauker and Georgescu, he became a target of attacks by Gheorghiu-Dej and his supporters. The party purge in these years was caused by many factors, including attempts to “Romanize” the party, but the monetary reform that had deprived people of their savings was the main pretext. Although a decision to launch the reform had been taken by the entire leadership of the party, Luca was responsible for its implementation. At a CC meeting on 29 February–1 March 1952 Luca was attacked for errors and abuses during the implementation of this reform. A special commission was appointed whose findings contributed to Luca’s expulsion from the CC at its next meeting on 26 May. Soon afterwards Pauker and Georgescu were also purged. Arrested in August of that year, Luca was sentenced to hard labor for life on 10 October 1954. He served his sentence in various places, including Râmnicul Sărat, where he met the Peasant Party activists Ion Mihalache and Corneliu Coposu. In 1963 Luca’s sentence was commuted to twenty-five years, but he died in prison soon after. In 1956 Gheorghiu-Dej stated that the expulsion of Georgescu, Luca, and Pauker had been part of the de-Stalinization process in Romania, but in 1968 Luca was rehabilitated by Nicolae Ceaușescu as a “victim of Stalinism.” (FA/TD/WR)

Sources: Vladimir Tismăneanu, Arheologia terori (Bucharest, 1992); Gheorghe Apostol, Eu și Gheorghiu Dej (Bucharest, 1998); Stelian Tanase, Elite și societate în timpul lui Gheorghiu Dej (Bucharest, 1999); Dennis Deletant, Communist Terror in Romania: Gheorghiu-Dej and the Police State, 1948–1965 (New York, 1999); Robert Levy, Ana Pauker: The Rise and Fall of a Jewish Communist (Berkeley, 2000).

LUCACIU Vasile (21 January 1852, Apa, near Satu Mare, Transylvania–29 November 1922, Sisesti, near Satu Mare), Romanian Greek Catholic priest, writer, and politician. In 1868 Lucaciu began to study theology and philosophy in Rome. In 1874 he earned a Ph.D. from the University of Rome. In 1878, after returning to Romania, he began to teach in Transylvanian high schools. In the 1880s he became active in the Romanian National Party (RNP), serving as its secretary general from 1892 to 1918. Lucaciu was a co-author and signatory of a memorandum from Transylvanian Romanian activists to Emperor Francis Joseph in 1892; in it they called for autonomy for Transylvania within the empire rather than the Kingdom of Hungary. They also sharply criticized the Hungarian electoral, legal, and educational systems. Lucaciu was arrested; during his trial in 1894 he courageously defended the Romanian cause. A supporter of the radical line of the party, he called for the union of Transylvania with the Old Kingdom. Imprisoned on several occasions, Lucaciu became a legend in the Romanian national movement in Transylvania. In 1905 he became a member of the Hungarian parliament, where he firmly criticized the policies of Budapest toward the national minorities. After the outbreak of World War I, in December 1914 Lucaciu became leader of the League for the Cultural Unity of All Romanians. Consequently, he was expelled from Transylvania by the Hungarian authorities. He went to the Old Kingdom and then abroad. In April 1917 he visited the United States, presenting the demands of Transylvanian Romanians to the American government. In September 1918 he became vice-president of the Romanian Provisional National Committee in Paris. Lucaciu was one of the main organizers of the National Assembly in Alba Iulia on 1 December 1918, at which the union of Transylvania and the Old Kingdom of Romania was proclaimed. From 1919 to 1920 Lucaciu served as minister of the Governing Council of Transylvania. From 1919 to 1922 he was a member of the Romanian parliament, initially representing the RNP and from 1920 onwards the People’s Party, led by General Alexandru Averescu. (FA/WR) Sources: R. W. Seton-Watson, A History of the Romanians (Hamden, CT, 1963); Ștefan Pascu and Miron Constantinescu, eds., Unification of the Romanian State: The Union of Transylvania with Old Romania (Bucharest, 1971); Ștefan Pascu, A History of Transylvania (Detroit, 1982); Béla Köpeczi, ed., History of Transylvania (Budapest, 1994); Șerban N. Ionescu, Who Was Who in Twentieth Century Romania (Boulder, Colo., 1994).

LUCHIAN Ștefan (1 February 1868, Stefanești–28 June 1916, Bucharest), Romanian painter. Luchian came from Northern Moldavia. In 1873 his family moved to Bucharest, where in 1889 he graduated from the School of Fine Arts. Later he also studied in the Akademie der Bildenden Künste in Munich, Germany, and in the Académie Julian in Paris, where his tutor was William-Adolphe Bouguereau. Soon Luchian gave up academism and became influenced by impressionism. After the death of his mother in 1883, Luchian inherited a considerable fortune, but he soon spent it and found himself in poverty. After returning to Romania in 1892, he worked out his own style, combining expressionism, symbolism, and impressionism. He belonged to the movement of Independent Artists. In 1900 Luchian was partially paralyzed, and it influenced the emotional intensity of his works—for instance, his Self-Portrait (1907). Luchian also painted landscapes and scenic pieces. In several works he presented the living conditions of the poor in the countryside; therefore he was later treated as the forerunner of Socialist realism. At the end of his life Luchian was fully immobilized and mainly painted flowers and still lifes. Luchian committed suicide. (WR) Sources: Richard Frucht, ed., Encyclopedia of Eastern Europe (New York and London, 2000); Vasile Drăguț, Luchian (Bucharest, 1963); Zoe Dumitrescu Busulenga, Ștefan Luchian (Bucharest, 1993); Jacques Lassaingne, Ștefan Luchian (Bucharest, 1994); www.artnet.com/library/05/0523/T052321.asp.

LUCINSCHI Petru (27 January 1940, Radulenii Vechi), Moldavian Communist and post-Communist politician. In 1962 Lucinschi graduated in philology and history from Kishinev University. Later he joined the League of Young Communists, and in 1963, the Komsomol and the Higher School for Personnel at the Central Committee (CC) of the CPSU. In 1964 he became a member of the Communist Party of Moldavia (Partidul Comunist din Moldova [CPM]) and then of the CPSU. In 1971 Lucinschi moved from the Komsomol to the CC Secretariat of the CPM. In 1976 he became first secretary of the Kishinev Town Planning Committee, and in 1977 he received a Ph.D. in Marxist philosophy at Kishinev University. In 1978 he went to Moscow, where until 1986 he was deputy head of the Department of Propaganda of the CPSU CC. Promoted to deputy member of the CPSU CC, Lucinschi was sent to Tajikistan, where he became second secretary of the local republican party and deputy to the Supreme Council of the USSR. In 1989, on Mikhail Gorbachev's request, he returned to the Moldavian SSR to introduce perestroika there. A delegate to the Congress of People's Deputies and a member of the last Politburo of the CPSU CC, in 1990 Lucinschi became first secretary of the CPM. In early 1991 he returned to Moscow, where he joined the CPSU CC Secretariat.

After the CPSU dissolved itself in late August 1991 and after the USSR broke up in December 1991, Lucinschi stayed in Moscow, where he headed the Institute of Sociopolitical Studies and later the Foundation for the Development of the Social Sciences. In 1992 he returned to the then independent Moldova, and after a few months he became its ambassador to Moscow. In 1993 Lucinschi went back to Kishinev, where, supported by Communists and other groups opposing unification with Romania, he became speaker of the parliament. He spoke in favor of Moldova's integration with the Commonwealth of Independent States (CIS) and for a special autonomous status for the mostly Russian-speaking Transnistria and the Gagauz areas. Also in 1993 Lucinschi took the lead of the pro-Russian Agrarian Democratic Party of Moldova (Partidul Democrat Agrar din Moldova), which won the 1994 parliamentary elections. As a result, he regained the position of speaker of parliament. In 1995 Lucinschi left this party and formed the Bloc for a Democratic and Prosperous Moldova (Pentru Moldova Democrată și Prosperă), although he was formally not a member. He sharply criticized President Mircea Snegur, who spoke in favor of rapprochement with Romania, while Lucinschi favored a close relationship with the CIS and a "socially oriented" market economy.

Supported by leftist and pro-Russian parties, at the end of 1996 Lucinschi won the presidential elections, and on 15 January 1997 he took over Moldova's presidency. In order to widen his political base he turned toward centrist and rightist groups, thus antagonizing the leftist and pro-Russian forces. In 1997 a coalition of centrist and leftist groups that supported Lucinschi came into being under the name of Prosperous and Democratic Moldova (Moldova Prosperă și Democrată). Also in 1997 Lucinschi made an agreement with Boris Yeltsin on the withdrawal of the Russian Fourteenth Army from Transnistria, but the Russian Duma did not ratify this agreement. In 1998 Lucinschi introduced Moldova into an alliance with Georgia, Ukraine, Azerbaijan, and (from 1999) Uzbekistan (GUUAM). In 1998 he gave up his pro-Russian rhetoric and commenced rapprochement with Western Europe and Romania, stressing the independence of Moldova. In 1998 he lost the support of the parliamentary majority. In 1999 he won support for the extension of presidential powers in a referendum that the Constitutional Court found contradicted the constitution. In 2000 the parliament, united against Lucinschi, transformed Moldova into a parliamentary republic. In early 2001 conflicts in the parliament made it possible for Lucinschi to dissolve it and to announce new parliamentary elections in which the Party of Moldovan Communists (Partidul Comunist al Republicii Moldova [PMC]) won an absolute parliamentary majority. The bloc Republic, supporting Lucinschi, was completely defeated. On 7 April 2001 Lucinschi resigned from the presidency. (LW)

Sources: Aleksander Rahr, ed., A Biographical Directory of 100 Leading Soviet Officials (Boulder, Colo., 1990); Józef Darski, Rumunia: Historia, współczesność, konflikty narodowe (Warsaw, 1995); Dictionar Enciclopedic, vol. 4 (Bucharest, 2001); www.cidob.org; Bugajski; www.rulers.com.

LUDZHEV Dimitur (27 March 1950, Burgas), Bulgarian politician, economist, and sociologist. After graduating from the Karl Marx Economic Institute in Sofia, Ludzhev worked in the regional apparatus of the Communist Youth Union and later in its central headquarters. He lectured at Sofia University and was a researcher at the Institute of History of the Bulgarian Academy of Sciences (1976–83). In 1983 he went on scholarship to Poland, and in 1989 and 1995, to the United States. In 1988 Ludzhev joined the Club for the Support of Glasnost and Perestroika, led by Zhelyu Zhelev, and in the June 1990 elections he won a mandate on behalf of the Union of Democratic Forces (Sayuz na Demokratichnite Sili [UDF]). In December 1990 he became deputy prime minister for economic affairs in the government of Dimitur Popov, whose policy of "shock therapy" led to dramatic price increases and a decline in the standard of living. After the parliamentary elections of October 1991, won by the UDF, Ludzhev became minister of national defense. In May 1992 he stepped down as a result of an illegal arms sale in which he was involved.

In the spring of 1993 Ludzhev left the UDF and founded the New Policy Center (NPC). In the parliament his group was called the New Choice (Now Izbor). The NPC program favored negotiations with striking trade unions and was quite popular for some time as an alternative to the government of Filip Dimitrov, which introduced socially painful reforms. Moreover, Ludzhev remained on friendly terms with President Zhelev. After the government of Luben Berov resigned, in June 1993 Zhelev asked Ludzhev to form a new cabinet, but he failed to accomplish this mission. In the parliamentary elections of December 1994 the NPC was defeated, winning only 1.5 percent of the vote. On the eve of the 1997 elections Ludzhev began working with the (Turkish) Movement for Rights and Freedoms of Ahmed Dogan, and, along with a few small groups, he established the Alliance for National Salvation. Ludzhev became its deputy chairman and won a parliamentary seat. He opposed the UDF government of Ivan Kostov, and he played no major role. In July 1998 Ludzhev joined the Liberal Democratic Coalition, aiming at winning local elections, but a lack of cooperation with his main allies—Zhelev and Dogan—caused the coalition to fail. (AG)

Sources: Raymond Detrez, Historical Dictionary of Bulgaria (Lanham, Md., 1997); Jerzy Jackowicz, Bułgaria od rządów komunistycznych do demokracji parlamentarnej 1988–1991 (Warsaw, 1992); www.omda.bg/engl/personalia/ludjev_engl.htm; www.icn.bg/bgnews/pointarticles/liberalunion/en.htm; www.online.bg/politics/who/govern/assemblies/pgdps.htm,

LUKÁCS György (13 April 1885, Budapest–5 June 1971, Budapest), Hungarian philosopher, theoretician of Marxism, and politician. Lukács was the son of a credit bank director of Jewish origin. After graduating from high school, in 1902 Lukács became an auditor in law at the University of Budapest. In 1906 he earned his doctoral degree in Kolozsvár (now Cluj in Romania), and subsequently, until 1907, he studied in Berlin. Lukács was a student of Max Weber. In 1908 his work on the history of modern drama won the Kisfaludy Society Prize. In 1910 his first book, a volume of essays, was published: Lélek és formák (Soul and form; 1974). Until 1911 Lukács lived mainly in Berlin, and from 1912 he lived in Heidelberg for five years (except for brief intervals). Between the fall of 1915 and the summer of 1916 Lukács did his military service in the office that censored letters in Budapest. In November 1917 he moved to Budapest, and in December 1918 he joined the Communist Party of Hungary. In February 1919 he became a member of the party's illegal Central Committee (CC), and on 1 March he became one of the editors of Vörös Újság.

From the moment the Hungarian Soviet Republic (HSR) was proclaimed on 21 March 1919, Lukács was a deputy people's commissar, and on 3 April he became the people's commissar for education. In May and June he was a political commissar in one of the divisions of the Hungarian Red Army. After the fall of the HSR, in August 1919 Lukács went into exile in Vienna. In 1920 he became a member of the provisional CC of the Hungarian Communist Party that was active in Vienna. In October 1921, as a result of factional strife, he left the CC. In 1921 he attended the Third Congress of the Communist International in Moscow. In 1923 he published History and Class Consciousness (English edition in 1971), a work on the history of class consciousness that was condemned by the Comintern. It was only in June 1926 in Berlin that Lukács was again coopted into the CC. In 1929 his program project, Blum-tézisek (Blum's theses), was rejected by the Central Committee. These theses set as an aim the "democratic dictatorship of peasants and workers," instead of the "dictatorship of the proletariat." At the Second Congress of the Communist Party of Hungary in 1930 Lukács was again expelled from the CC. He began to work in the Marx-Engels-Lenin Institute in Moscow. From the summer of 1931 he again lived in Berlin. In March 1933 he returned to Moscow, where he was a researcher in various scientific institutes. After the German attack against the USSR, Lukács was arrested by the NKVD but was soon released, having conducted an ideological self-criticism. At the end of 1941 he was transferred from Moscow to Tashkent, and in 1943 he was allowed to return to Moscow with his family.

In August 1945 Lukács again returned to Budapest, where in his absence he had been appointed a deputy to the Provisional National Assembly. In 1949 he became a member of parliament. He resigned his seat in December 1951, but in 1953 he again became an MP. From 1945 Lukács lectured at Budapest University and dealt with cultural policy. From 1948 he was a full and honorary member of the Hungarian Academy of Sciences and was also elected to the presidium of the academy. During the so-called Lukács Debate in 1949–50, the crux of which was Lukács's understanding of democracy, Lukács was forced to carry out an open self-criticism. At an extraordinary conference of the CC of the Hungarian Workers' Party between 23 and 24 October 1956 Lukács was elected a member of the CC. Between 27 October and 3 November he was minister of people's education in the government of Imre Nagy. On 31

October 1956 he became a member of the committee that prepared the founding congress of the Hungarian Socialist Workers' Party (HSWP). Lukács opposed Hungary's withdrawal from the Warsaw Pact. Along with Nagy, on 4 November Lukács asked for asylum in the Yugoslav Embassy. On 18 November he left the embassy, was arrested by the Russians, and was interned in Romania.

In April 1957 Lukács and his wife were allowed to return to Hungary, and no legal proceedings were instituted against him. In 1958 he retired. His works were published in the West. In 1967 Lukács again became a member of the Communist Party. Under the influence of the events of 1968 in Czechoslovakia, he submitted a study to the CC of the HSWP. In this study, he called "Socialist democracy" a real alternative to Stalinism. In the late 1960s Lukács began writing A társadalmi lét ontológiájáról (1976; Ontology of Social Being, 1980). In 1989 his memoirs were published: Megélt gondolkodás: Életrajz magnószalagon (Life memoirs: A biographical record). (JT)

Sources: Magyar Életrajzi Lexikon, vol. 3 (Budapest, 1985); Biographisches Lexikon, vol. 3; The Times, 5 June 1971; George Lichtheim, György Lukács (Munich, 1971); Fritz Raddatz, György Lukács (Reinbeck bei Hamburg, 1972); Tibor Hanák, Lukács was anders (Meisenheim/Glan, 1973); Andrew Arato and Paul Breines, The Young Lukács and the Origins of Western Marxism (New York, 1979); A magyar forradalom és szabadságharc enciklopédiája, CD-ROM (Budapest, 1999).

LUKANOV Andrey (26 September 1938, Moscow–2 October 1996, Sofia), Bulgarian Communist activist. The son of Karlo Lukanov, Lukanov graduated from the Institute of International Relations in Moscow (1963). In 1957 he joined the Dimitrov Communist Youth League, and in 1966, the Bulgarian Communist Party (BCP). In 1976 he became a deputy member, and in December 1977 a member, of the BCP Central Committee (CC). After returning to Bulgaria, Lukanov worked in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs (1963–65), served as head of the International Organizations Department in the Ministry of Foreign Trade (1966–68), and was first secretary of Bulgaria's representation to the United Nations in Geneva (1969–72). From 1972 to 1976 he served as deputy minister of foreign trade. In July 1979 he became a deputy member of the Politburo and chairman of the Currency Commission of the BCP CC. From 17 June 1976 to 19 June 1986 Lukanov was deputy prime minister, and on 19 August 1987 he became first deputy prime minister in the government of Georgi Atanasov. From 1981 to 1986 he was Bulgaria's permanent representative to the Comecon in Moscow. From August 1987 to November 1989 he served as minister of foreign economic relations. From 1976 to 1996 he was a deputy to the National Assembly.

In the face of a crisis of the system, Lukanov was one of those who initiated the removal of Todor Zhivkov from power at the BCP CC Plenum on 10 November 1989. On 16 November Lukanov joined the CC Politburo and Secretariat, and the following day he became a member of the Council of State. From 2 February to 25 September 1990 he was a member of the Presidium of the Supreme Council of the Bulgarian Socialist Party (BSP), as the BCP was renamed. He later became BSP deputy chairman. He presided over a parliamentary committee established to investigate mismanagement and corruption; the committee prepared a report on the economic crisis in Bulgaria. On 5 February 1990 Lukanov became prime minister. Although he strove to establish a coalition government, he headed a one-party post-Communist government that failed to implement any reforms. On 22 December 1990 he was forced to resign under pressure from the trade unions and as a result of public discontent.

On 27 August 1991, after the unsuccessful coup in Moscow, Lukanov resigned as BSP deputy chairman in protest against the wavering policies of Aleksandur Lilov, chairman of the BSP. He subsequently helped to establish new capital investment groups in Bulgaria and, as a representative of a company called Multigroup, he coordinated natural gas trades with Russia. On 7 July 1992, upon the demand of the public prosecutor general, Lukanov was deprived of his parliamentary immunity and subsequently arrested on a charge of issuing grants to aid pro-Soviet Third World countries. He was released from prison on 3 December 1992. In 1996 Lukanov was shot and killed by a gunman in front of his house. In March 1997 the European Court of Human Rights in Strasbourg punished Bulgaria for the improper handling of this case by the Bulgarian prosecutorial services. The compensation was awarded to Lukanov's family. In 2000 the case was discontinued owing to a lack of suspects. Lukanov's publications include Chetirideset godini sotsialisticheska vunshna turgoviia na NR Bulgariia (Forty years of Socialist foreign trade of the Bulgarian People's Republic; 1985); Za krizata (About the crisis; 1992); Sotsialnata demokratsiia: Alternativa za Bulgariia (Social Democracy: An alternative for Bulgaria; 1992); and Bulgarskata korida: Pismo ot "Razvigor" (The Bulgarian corrido: Letters from "Razvigor"; 1993). (JJ)

Sources: Entsiklopediya Bulgariya, vol. 3 (Sofia, 1982); Deputatite na VII Velikoto narodno subranie, 1991; Deloto "Lukanov" (Sofia, 1993); Raymond Detrez, Historical Dictionary of Bulgaria (Lanham, Md., 1997); Nora Ananieva, Andrei Lukanov v Parlamenta (Sofia, 1998); Tasho Tashev, Ministrite na Bulgariya 1879–1999: Entsiklopedichen spravochnik (Sofia, 1999); Evgeniia Kalinova and Iskra Baeva, Bulgarskite prekhodi 1944–1999 (Sofia, 2000); Angel Tsurakov, Entsiklopediia. Pravitelstvata na Bulgariya: Khronologiia na politicheskiiia zhivot 1879–2001 (Sofia, 2001).

LUKANOV Karlo (20 October 1897, Pleven–15 July 1982, Sofia), Bulgarian politician. The son of a Socialist activist, Lukanov joined the Union of Social Democratic Working Youth in 1913 and the Bulgarian Workers' Social Democratic Party (the so-called narrow Socialists) in 1917. In the same year he graduated from a school for reserve officers and then fought in World War I as an officer of the Twenty-sixth Artillery Regiment. After graduating in law from Sofia University in 1921, he worked as an attorney in Pleven. In 1921 he became a member of the Bulgarian Communist Party (BCP), and in 1923 he began working with the BCP Foreign Bureau. Lukanov was arrested for those activities and sentenced to four and a half years' imprisonment in 1925. Released under an amnesty in 1926, he emigrated to the Soviet Union at the beginning of 1927. From 1927 to 1936 Lukanov worked as a judge in Moscow. He belonged to the Soviet All-Union Communist Party (Bolsheviks) until 1944. He fought in the Spanish Civil War (1936–39) as chief of staff of the Twelfth International Brigade and head of the international brigades' training base in Albacete. After returning to Moscow, he worked for the Communist International. From 1941 to 1944 Lukanov was a journalist and anchorman with the Moscow-based Bulgarian-language radio station Khristo Botev. After returning to Bulgaria in October 1944, he became the director of Bulgarian Radio. In 1947 he became deputy chairman of the State Planning Commission, and in 1949, chairman of the Commission for Science, Arts, and Culture. Lukanov subsequently served as chairman of the State Planning Commission (until February 1952), deputy prime minister in the government of Vulko Chervenkov (until January 1954), ambassador to the Soviet Union and Mongolia and minister plenipotentiary to Finland (1954–56), deputy prime minister in the government of Anton Yugov (April 1956–February 1957), minister of foreign affairs (August 1956–November 1962), and ambassador to Switzerland (1962–64). From 1964 to 1982 he served as deputy chairman of the All-National Committee of Bulgarian-Soviet Friendship, and from 1976 to 1982, as a member of the National Council of the Fatherland Front. From 1950 to 1982 Lukanov was a deputy to the National Assembly. (JJ)

Sources: Entsiklopediya Bulgariya, vol. 3 (Sofia, 1982); Lazitch; Narodni predstaviteli v Sedmo narodno subranie (Sofia, 1982); Georgi Dimitrov, Sychineniia, vol. 15 (Sofia, 1989); Tasho Tashev, Ministrite na Bulgariya 1879–1999: Entsiklopedichen spravochnik (Sofia, 1999); Angel Tsurakov, Entsiklopediya. Pravitelstvata na Bulgariya: Khronologiya na politicheskiia zhivot 1879–2001 (Sofia, 2001).

LUKASHENKA Alyaksandr (30 August 1954, Kopy, near Orsha), Belorussian Communist activist, dictator of Belarus. In 1971–75 Lukashenka studied at the Pedagogical Institute in Mogilev. From 1975 he was Komsomol secretary in a school in Shklov, and in 1975–77 he was an instructor in the political section of the Western Frontier Region of the Frontier Protection Force of the all-Soviet KGB in Brest. From 1977 he was Komsomol secretary of the Mogilev town administration and an instructor in its executive committee. In 1978–80 he worked as secretary of Znaniye, a political propaganda society in Shklov. In 1979 he joined the CPSU. In 1982–83 he was deputy chairman of the Udarnik Kolkhoz in the Shklov region, and from 1983 to 1985 he was deputy director of the building materials combine in Shklov. In 1985 he graduated extramurally from the Belorussian Agricultural Academy and became party secretary of a kolkhoz in the Shklov region. From 1987 to 1990 he headed the Gorodyets Sovkhoz in this region.

During the election of Soviet deputies in 1989 Lukashenka lost to the then chairman of the Council of Ministers of the Belorussian SSR, Vyacheslav Kebich. Lukashenka took part in a few rallies of the Belorussian National Front. Elected to the Belorussian Supreme Council in 1990, in 1991 he co-founded Communists of Belorussia for Democracy, whose aim it was to create alternative structures in the Communist Party. Lukashenka criticized the Central Committee of the Communist Party of Belorussia for “detaching itself from the masses.” His rhetoric was emotionally charged, appealing to the common folk. He condemned the nomenklatura for its appropriation of party and state assets, and he gained support among democratic journalists. On 25 August 1991 he signed a motion for the dismissal of the chairman of the Supreme Council of the Belorussian SSR, Mikalay Dziamantsiey. Stanislau Shushkevich was elected in his place. During the voting Lukashenka entered the hall carrying the red-and-white banner of Belarus. During the ratification of the agreement on the Commonwealth of Independent States Lukashenka abstained from voting, but he later claimed to have voted against it. In July 1993 he took the lead of a provisional parliamentary commission to investigate the economic activities of republican and local party structures. In November 1993 he announced the findings of this commission: the chairman of the Supreme Council, the prime minister, and a number of other leaders were accused of embezzlement. On 25 January 1994 Lukashenka gained a Communist majority on a motion to dismiss Shushkevich.

In the presidential elections of July 1994 Lukashenka won in the second round, having promoted the themes of social justice and the combating of corruption. In 1994–99 he intensified dictatorial policies. In December 1994, when the MP Siarhiej Antonchik announced a report on corruption in the administration, Lukashenka banned its publication. In January 1995 he announced a decree on the Office of Presidential Protection, providing it with the right to invigilate the opposition. In April 1995 he ordered special services to remove nineteen opposition MPs who were on a hunger strike against the tariff union with Russia, a referendum on national symbols, and the introduction of Russian as a second official language in Belarus. The referendum was held on 14 May 1995, confirming changes proposed by Lukashenka. As a result, Belarus returned to the symbols of the Belorussian SSR but without the hammer and sickle. On 24 November 1996 Lukashenka organized another referendum that was an outright violation of the constitution; therefore no serious international organization recognized its results. (Among other things, a citizen allegedly gave up his interest in the sources of financing of the ruling group.) A new version of the constitution was prepared, and a pseudo-parliament was convened to rubber-stamp the presidential decrees. In 1997–98 Lukashenka carried out an authoritarian and anti-market economic reform. Local authorities were banned from economic activity, and 70 percent of private firms were also banned. The authorities gained the right to confiscate private property without court procedures. Repression of the opposition became a permanent mode of governance, and the independent press was constantly threatened and fined for spreading “false information.” Private radio and television stations were not allowed to operate.

Lukashenka isolated Belarus from abroad and limited its sovereignty. When in September 1995 a military helicopter shot down an American balloon and its two pilots were killed, instead of apologizing, Lukashenka fell back on the old Cold War rhetoric. On 17 June 1998 representatives of twenty-two embassies were asked to move to new locations. Ambassadors from the European Union and the United States left Belarus for a couple of months. On 2 April 1996 and again in 1997 Lukashenka and Russian president Boris Yeltsin signed agreements on the formation of the Union of Belarus and Russia (UBR), and on 25 December 1999 they signed an agreement on the “unification” of the two countries. From 2000 Lukashenka was chairman of the UBR State Supreme Council. He financed Russian strategic military bases, including an anti-rocket command, from the Belorussian budget. In May 1999 Lukashenka suppressed attempts to organize free presidential elections. During the campaign, hundreds of opposition activists were arrested, including one of the candidates, Mikhail Chyhir. After the elections, in August 1999 the chairman of the Supreme Council of Belarus,

Syamyon Sharetsky, left the country, fearing for his life. In September 1999 the chairman of the Central Electoral Commission, Viktar Hanchar, disappeared. From 20 July 1999 Lukashenka exercised presidential power without a constitutional foundation, quoting the results of the 1996 referendum, which, however, did not include the issue of an extension of the presidential term in office. (AS/SA)

Sources: Belarus: Encykłapedychny davednik (Minsk, 1995); Siergiej Owsianik and Jelena Striełkowa, Władza a społeczeństwo: Białoruś 1991–1998 (Warsaw, 1998); Yanka Zaprudnik, Belarus na historychnykh skryzavanyakh (Minsk, 1996); Tsentrum Karta, Archiu naynoushaye historii, Demokratychnaja apazytsia Belarusi 1956–1991. Dawiednik (Minsk, 1999); Volha Paulava, Syklouskiya strastsi (Moscow, 1999); David R. Marples, Belarus: A Denationalized Nation (Amsterdam, 1999); Bugajski.

ŁUKASZEWICZ Jerzy (24 September 1931, Warsaw–18 July 1983, Warsaw), Polish Communist activist. In his youth Łukaszewicz worked as a blue-collar laborer. From 1949 he was active in the (Communist) Union of Polish Youth, and from 1951 he belonged to the (Communist) Polish United Workers’ Party (Polska Zjednoczona Partia Robotnicza [PUWP]). In 1956 he started to work at the Nowotko Factory in Warsaw. In 1957–60 he was deputy head of the Department of Organization of the Central Committee (CC) of the Union of Socialist Youth (Związek Młodzieży Socjalistycznej [ZMS]), and in 1960–62 he was first secretary of the ZMS Warsaw Committee. Later he worked in the PUWP apparatus. Until 1964 Łukaszewicz headed a department in the Warsaw PUWP Committee. Later he was first secretary of the Wola Quarter PUWP Committee, and from 1969, the Warsaw Provincial PUWP Committee. From June 1964 a deputy member and from November 1968 a member of the PUWP CC, Łukaszewicz was close to the so-called partisan faction of Mieczysław Moczar. He graduated from the Higher School of Social Sciences at the PUWP CC. During the events of December 1970 Łukaszewicz declared himself in favor of Edward Gierek, so in December 1971 he joined the CC Secretariat, and in January 1972 he became head of the Department of Propaganda, Press, and Publications of the PUWP CC. From March 1972 he was also an MP. From December 1975 he was a deputy member and from February 1980 a member of the Politburo of the PUWP CC. Responsible for ideology, in the 1970s Łukaszewicz was a key engineer of cultural policies. In this role he became known as narrow-minded and dogmatic, personally supervising the loyalty of artists and scholars and penalizing their disobedience. According to Łukaszewicz’s own assessment in 1981, he held the press, radio, and television in a stranglehold. In this connection he had a very bad reputation in cultural circles. As a result of the Baltic Coast strikes, as early as August 1980 Łukaszewicz was dismissed from the CC Secretariat and Politburo; in October 1980, from the CC; and in December 1980, he gave up his parliamentary mandate. (WR) Sources: Moldawa; Zbigniew Błażyński, Towarzysze zeznają: Z tajnych archiwów Komitetu Centralnego (London, 1987); Andrzej Albert [Wojciech Roszkowski], Najnowsza historia Polski 1914–1993, vol. 2 (Warsaw, 1993).

LUKOV Khristo (1887, Varna–13 February 1943, Sofia), Bulgarian general and politician. Lukov graduated in military studies in Sofia in 1907. He quickly advanced, and during World War I, already a general, he commanded the Second Army on the Macedonian front. In 1924 he was appointed commander of the School of Artillery, and in 1928–34 he headed the Department of Education at the Ministry of War. In 1932 Lukov founded the Union of Bulgarian National Legions, an extreme rightist organization with an anti-Turkish and anti-Semitic program. From November 1934 to January 1935 Lukov was minister of war in the cabinet of Kimon Georgiev. Although he initially favored the Zveno group, he later changed his mind and supported Tsar Boris III, helping him gain control of the army. Lukov declared his loyalty to the monarch, but the legionnaire movement was suspended in January 1936 and went underground. Fearing that Lukov had excessively close contacts with the Nazis, the tsar dismissed him from command in January 1938. Later Lukov tried to draw closer to Aleksandur Tsankov, aiming at a unification of the extreme right, but to no avail. During World War II, the Third Reich used Lukov as a means of pressure on Boris III. Lukov himself planned to gain power with German help, but he was assassinated. According to one version, the assassins were the Communists; according to another, they were the followers of Zveno, while a third version points to the agents of the tsar. (WR) Sources: Philip Rees, Biographical Dictionary of the Extreme Right since 1890 (New York, 1990); Z. Kolev, Suyuz na Bulgarskite Natsionalni Legioni (Sofia, 1976); Marshall Lee Miller, Bulgaria during the Second World War (Stanford, 1975); John D. Ball, The Bulgarian Communist Party (Stanford, 1985).

LUKŠA Juozas (1921, Juodbudžiai–September 1951, near Prienai), anti-Soviet Lithuanian partisan leader. Lukša graduated from a high school in Kaunas. He was arrested when the Red Army seized Lithuania in 1940. Released after the outbreak of the German-Soviet war in June 1941, he commenced architectural studies in Kaunas and was also active in the anti-German underground. After the Red Army again occupied Lithuania in the summer of 1944, Lukša continued his studies, as well as his underground activities which were now directed against the Soviet authorities. In 1945, Lukša went into hiding, and at the beginning of 1946, along with his brother Stasys, he joined a forest-based partisan unit. In November 1946 he was appointed captain. In 1947 he secretly made his way, via Poland, to Scandinavia and then to Rome, where, as a special representative of the Lithuanian underground, he presented a letter to Pope Pius XII about the dire situation of Catholics in Lithuania under Soviet rule. Under the pseudonym “J. Daumantas,” Lukša wrote Partizanai už Geležinį Uždangą (English translation: Fighters for Freedom, 1975) and published it in the United States. In it he described the Lithuanian resistance movement against communism. He also established contacts with the Lithuanian Liberation Committee in exile. At the end of 1950 Lukša returned to Lithuania and continued the military struggle against the Soviet authorities. He was killed during a battle against NKVD units. His father, five brothers, and eleven relatives were murdered in retaliation for his activities. Lukša became a legendary hero in the struggle for Lithuanian independence. (WR) Sources: EL, vol. 3; N. E. Süduis, Vienų vieni (Brooklyn, 1954); Zeznanie Grigorija Burlickiego, Fourth Interim Report of the House of Representatives Select Committee on Communist Aggression (Washington, D.C., 1954); Constantine R. Jurgėla, Lithuania: The Outpost of Freedom (St. Petersburg, Fla., 1976).

LUKYANENKO Lev (Levko) (24 August 1928, Khrypivka, Chernihiv region) Ukrainian dissident and politician. The son of a peasant, in 1944 Lukyanenko was drafted into the Red Army. Until 1950 he served, among other places, in the Soviet occupation zone in Austria and in the Caucasus. In 1951–53 Lukyanenko belonged to the Komsomol and then to the Communist Party. After completing law studies in Moscow in 1958, he worked in the propaganda apparatus in the Lviv region and then he worked in law. Disapproving of official policies toward collectivization, Lukyanenko decided to undertake underground activities. In 1959 he co-founded the Ukrainian Workers’ and Peasants’ Union (Ukraińska Robotnično-Selanska Spilka). At its first meeting on 7 November 1960, the founding members thought Lukyanenko’s program was too radical, and on the eve of the second meeting, in January 1961, all the founders were arrested. In May 1961 in Lviv Lukyanenko was sentenced to death by firing squad, but the Supreme Court changed the verdict to fifteen years in prison. He served in Mordovian camps, where, along with representatives of the “generation of the 1960s” (shestidesiatniki)—that is, victims of the post-1965 arrests in the Ukraine—Lukyanenko became engaged in the defense of prisoners’ rights. For organizing a strike in one of the Perm camps, in 1974 Lukyanenko was sent to Vladimir Prison and underwent a forced psychiatric examination. Released in 1976, he worked as an electrician. In September 1976 he joined the Ukrainian Helsinki Group. He reported to the Belgrade Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe, sending information on the violation of human rights in the USSR. Arrested again in December 1977, Lukyanenko refused to testify and started a hunger strike. In June 1978 he was sentenced to ten years in camp and five years of forced settlement. He served in Sosnovka, Mordovia, and (from February 1980) Kuchino, near Perm. In December 1987 he was forced to settle in Berezivka in the Tomsk region in Siberia. In March 1988 he was elected chairman of the Ukrainian Helsinki Union (UHU) in absentia. Offered release on the condition that he emigrate, Lukyanenko refused and was released in November 1988.

In April 1990 Lukyanenko was elected chairman of the Ukrainian Republican Party (Ukrainska Respublikanska Partiya [URP]), which was based on the UHU. He was also elected to the Supreme Council of the Ukrainian SSR and became deputy chairman of the People's Council, an opposition parliamentary group. He co-wrote the act of Ukrainian independence of 24 August 1991. In the presidential elections of December 1991 Lukyanenko won 4.5 percent of the vote. From May 1992 to November 1993 he was the first Ukrainian ambassador to Canada. He gave up this position in protest against government policies. From May 1992 he was an honorary URP chairman. In 1994 he led the electoral bloc Ukraina, and in 1998–99 he represented the National Front, which coordinated right-wing parties. Lukyanenko received the St. Vladimir Order and a Ph.D. in law at the University of Alberta, Canada. He authored Shcho dali? (What next? 1989); Spovid u kameri smertnykiv (Confession on death row; 1991); Za Ukrainu, za yiyi volu . . . (For the Ukraine, for its freedom . . . ; 1991); Viruyu v Boha i v Ukrainu (I believe in God and in the Ukraine; 1991) Ne dam zahnut Ukraini! (I will not let the Ukraine perish! 1994); Narodzhennia nowoyi ery (Birth of a new era; 1997); and U kraïini klenowovo lystka (In the land of the maple leaf; 1998). (TS)

Sources: Encyclopedia of Ukraine, vol. 3 (Toronto, 1993); Visnyk represiy v Ukraini (New York, 1982); Viesti iz SSSR, vol. 1, 1978–81; Taras Kuzio and Andrew Wilson, Ukraine: Perestroika to Independence (Edmonton, 1994); Heorhiy Kasyanov, Nezhodni: Ukrainiska intelihentsiya v rusi oporu 1960–80 rokiv (Kiev, 1995); Anatoliy Rusnachenko, Natsionalno-vyzvolnyi rukh v Ukraini (Kiev, 1998); Bohdan Nahaylo, The Ukrainian Resurgence (Toronto, 1999); Bugajski.

LULCHEV Kosta (9 March 1882, Oryakhovo–31 January 1965, Oryakhovo), Bulgarian Socialist politician. Lulchev joined the Bulgarian Workers' Social Democratic Party (BWSDP) in 1895. After its split in 1903 he followed the faction that supported an evolutionary change of the political system toward socialism—the so called broad Socialists. In 1913–31 Lulchev was an MP on behalf of the BWSDP, and in 1924–33 he was secretary of its Central Committee. In October 1944 he was elected secretary general of the party. Lulchev's election was a compromise in the course of the intensifying Sovietization of Bulgaria and a factional struggle among the Social Democrats, whose right wing, headed by Krystyo Pastukhov, opposed the Communists, while the left wing, led by Dimitur Neykov, demanded close cooperation with the Communists and on their terms. Lulchev supported cooperation with the Communists but with a separate identity for the Social Democrats. On 29 May 1945, the crypto-Communists of Neykov attempted to take over the leadership of the BWSDP and to merge the party with the Communist Party. Since the Communists managed to attract a part of the BWSDP leadership, Lulchev was forced to organize new party structures. On 10 June 1945 the Bulgarian Workers' Social Democratic (United) Party was created with Lulchev as its secretary general and Gregor Cheshmedzhiev as its chairman. Under pressure from Western countries, the new party was finally registered in September 1945.

In the campaign before the parliamentary elections Lulchev repeatedly protested the violations of the law by the Communists, and on 14 November 1945 he, along with Pastukhov, Nikola Petkov, and Petur Stoyanov, signed a memorandum to the regents and the prime minister demanding the resignation of the cabinet and a postponement of the elections. Lulchev also warned Western diplomats about what was happening, but he could not prevent repression nor the abuses of power. In the elections of November 1945 Lulchev won a seat in the parliament, where he protested the violation of democratic freedoms and defended his colleagues who had been arrested and sentenced on false grounds (among others, Pastukhov and Cveti Ivanov). After the arrest of the Peasant Party leader, Nikola Petkov, in 1947, Lulchev made dramatic appeals, pointing to the groundlessness of the accusations and the political nature of Petkov's trial. In July 1948 the Communists arrested Lulchev, by then the last opposition leader. After a show trial, in which, under the threat of a death sentence, Lulchev was forced to plead guilty, on 15 November 1948 he was sentenced to fifteen years in prison. He served eleven years of this sentence, in, among other places, the forced labor camps of Belene and Lovech. (AG)

Sources: Entsiklopediya Bulgariya, vol. 3 (Sofia, 1982); Hugh Seton-Watson, The East European Revolution (London, 1956); Jerzy Jackowicz, Partie opozycyjne w Bułgarii 1944–1948 (Warsaw, 1997); Petur Kuzmanov, Kosta Lulchev: Edin zivot v sluzhbe na sotsialdemokratsiyata (Sofia, 1998); www.fes.de/fes-publ/mitarbeiter/dauderstaedt/probe.html.

LUPESCU Magda Elena [née Wolff] (15 September 1895, Iași–28 June 1977, Estoril, Portugal), influential concubine and second wife of Charles II, the king of Romania. The daughter of a Jewish shopkeeper and a Romanian woman, in 1919 Lupescu married an officer in the Romanian Army who was promoted to the General Staff and moved with his wife to Bucharest in 1921. In 1923 they divorced, and she Romanized her maiden name to Lupescu (lupu in English means wolf). In 1924 Charles II started a romance with her, causing a court scandal. The next year he left with Lupescu for Italy and gave up his claims to the throne. Soon they settled in Paris, and in 1928 Charles formally divorced his Greek wife, Queen Helen. In 1930, in agreement with the head of the National Peasant Party, Iuliu Maniu, Charles returned to the throne on the condition that he break off his relationship with Lupescu. Nevertheless, he brought Lupescu with him to Bucharest and continued the relationship. Aiming at an authoritarian model of monarchy, Charles stirred up conflicts among and within the political parties, establishing a system based on his court camarilla, in which Lupescu played an important role. She had significant influence on Charles's political decisions and on his personnel policies. Acting behind the scenes, the camarilla became a new center of power in Romania, but the public did not welcome the royal concubine—because of her Jewish origins, among other reasons. Her name was frequently paraphrased into Lupeasca (She-Wolf). The political elite and upper echelons of officers, headed by General Ion Antonescu, held Charles and Lupescu responsible for the territorial concessions to the Soviet Union, Hungary, and Bulgaria in 1940, forcing Charles to abdicate and leave the country. He left along with Lupescu by a special train that included twelve cars of art objects from the royal palace; these were the national patrimony. In 1947 Charles and Lupescu married and settled in Portugal, where she lived until her death. (ASK) Sources: Paul Quinlan, "Lupescu: Romania's Grey Eminence," East European Quarterly, 1994, no. 1; Ioan Scurtu, Istoria României în Anii 1918–1940 (Bucharest, 1995); Ion Bulei, Scurtă Istorie a Românilor (Bucharest, 1996); www.uk-genealogy.org.uk/Database/D0021/I7090.html; lesmadeleines.free.fr/celebrities/lupescu.htm.

LUTOSŁAWSKI Kazimierz (4 March 1880, Drozdów–5 January 1924, Drozdów), Polish Catholic priest, journalist, and politician. Lutosławski came from a landed gentry family and was the half-brother of Wincenty Lutosławski. He studied medicine in Germany and Switzerland, earning a Ph.D. at the University of Zurich in 1903. From 1909 to 1911 he studied at a seminary in Fribourg. Ordained in 1912, he earned a Ph.D. in theology two years later. While in Switzerland, Lutosławski became a member of the secret Union of Polish Youth–Zet and later a member of the National League (Liga Narodowa), which was the beginning of a long-term collaboration with Roman Dmowski. After returning to the Kingdom of Poland, Lutosławski organized village education, published articles in nationalist newspapers, and wrote books. He also helped to found the Polish scouting movement in the Russian and later in the Prussian partition of Poland. In 1914 he protested the militarization of the scouting movement; consequently, he came into conflict with the leadership of the movement.

In 1915, during World War I, Lutosławski was evacuated to Russia, where he was involved in scouting and organized the Polish school system. In 1916 he became a military chaplain to the Polish Rifle Brigade. He edited nationalist newspapers and published articles. He was politically active among the Polish émigrés. From August 1917 Lutosławski represented the National League in the Council of Polish Parties' Union (Rada Polska Zjednoczenia Międzypartyjnego) in Moscow, which hoped for the victory of the Allies. Along with his brothers, Marian and Józef, he supported the formation of Polish military forces. After the Bolsheviks arrested and then executed his brothers in the spring of 1918, Lutosławski went into hiding, shifting his activities to the Ukraine. After returning to Poland, he participated in the activities of the National Popular Union (Związek Ludowo-Narodowy [ZLN]). As an MP for the Podlasie region from 1919 to 1924, he gained a reputation as a fiery, aggressive, and controversial speaker and an active legislator. He also continued his journalistic and scouting activities. In 1920 he served as a military chaplain and was decorated with the Cross of Valor for his bravery in the battles against the Bolsheviks. Lutosławski died suddenly on his family estate in Drozdowo. His publications include Hasła rewolucji w świetle nauki katolickiej (Revolutionary demands in the light of Catholic teaching; 1919); Teologia (Theology, 3 vols.; 1919); and Wychowanie młodzieży wobec współczesnych potrzeb i zadań (The upbringing of youth and contemporary tasks; 1923). (MC)

Sources: PSB, vol. 18; Wojciech Wasutyński, Czwarte pokolenie: Szkice z dziejów Nacjonalizmu Polskiego (London, 1982); Olaf Bergman, Narodowa Demokracja wobec problematyki żydowskiej w latach 1918–1929 (Poznań, 1998); Władysław Pobóg-Malinowski, Najnowsza historia polityczna Polski, vols. 1–2 (London, 1983–86).

LUTOSŁAWSKI Wincenty (6 June 1863, Warsaw–28 December 1954, Kraków), Polish philosopher and educator. Lutosławski came from a landed gentry family and was the half-brother of Reverend Kazimierz Lutosławski. He studied chemistry at the polytechnic in Riga and then in Dorpat (Tartu), where he also took up philosophy. He subsequently studied Romance languages at the Ecole Pratique des Hautes Etudes in Paris. He published his M.A. thesis from Dorpat as Erhaltung und Untergang der Staatsverfassungen nach Plato, Aristoteles und Machiavelli (1888). He received a Ph.D. at the University of Helsinki for a dissertation about the individualistic worldview, published as Über die Grundvoraussetzungen und Konsequenzen der individualistischen Weltanschauung (1898). From 1890 to 1893 Lutosławski worked as an associate professor (docent) at the university in Kazan in Russia, studying Plato's logic. He also investigated Plato's ideas during a stay in London and while traveling through North America. Lutosławski succeeded in determining the chronology of Plato's dialogues, which facilitated the study and interpretation of the development of Plato's thought. In his work Lutosławski used a methodology developed by the Scottish philologist Lewis Campbell; Lutosławski improved upon it and named it stylometry. He published his findings in O pierwszych trzech tetralogiach dzieł Platona (On the first three tetralogies of Plato's works; 1896) and The Origin and Growth of Plato's Logic with an Account of Plato's Style and the Chronology of His Writings (London, 1897). The latter work consolidated his position as a philosopher.

From 1895 to 1905 Lutosławski lived mainly in Spain, where he developed an intellectual system based upon Platonic idealism and Polish Romantic messianism. This was a spiritualist idea of progressive reincarnation inspired by the poetry of Juliusz Słowacki. According to Lutosławski, the world was based on a multi-level hierarchy of souls, from individual souls through collective (national and all-human) to the universal (cosmic) soul. The Polish national soul played quite an important role in this hierarchy. Lutosławski presented this theory in Seelenmacht: Abriss einer zeitgemäßen Weltanschauung (1899). From 1899 to 1900 Lutosławski lectured at the Jagiellonian University in Kraków and later at the universities in Lausanne and Geneva in Switzerland. From 1904 to 1906 he worked at the University College of London. In 1907 and 1908 he traveled throughout the United States, giving lectures at all major intellectual centers. Later, he lectured in Warsaw for one year. He also traveled throughout the territories of the former Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth and visited émigré communities, giving lectures in which he promoted his philosophy among wider circles. In 1913 he settled in Savoy and lectured at the University of Geneva. At that time he published Rozwój potęgi woli przez psychofizyczne ćwiczenia (The development of willpower through psychophysical exercise; 1910) and Volonté et Liberté (Will and freedom; 1913).

At the beginning of the twentieth century Lutosławski became attracted to the National League (Liga Narodowa). He developed close contacts with Roman Dmowski, Jan Ludwik Popławski, and Zygmunt Balicki. Their collaborative efforts were not very harmonious, though, and Lutosławski founded his own esoteric group of people interested in temperance and the spiritual aspect of nationalist thought. This group published the periodical Eleusis. However, in 1912 Lutosławski severed ties with them. During World War I he resumed his contacts with members of the National Democratic Party. At that time he was a very active current affairs commentator, writing in several languages. He supported Polish diplomats during the 1919 peace negotiations. In 1920 he became a professor at Stefan Batory University in Wilno (Vilnius). He strove to reconcile his university work with his educational passion, which involved frequent travels throughout Poland. He tirelessly published works in which he developed increasingly eccentric theories of the soul in a futurological context. These works had clearly nationalist overtones. According to Lutosławski, the Polish national spirit, imbued with freedom, would vanquish the German and Jewish spirits, which had poisoned the world with the doctrines of materialism and determinism. He covered these issues in The World of Souls (1924), Nieśmiertelność duszy (The immortality of the soul; 1925), and Knowledge of Reality (1934), as well as in other works. In 1931 Lutosławski retired and settled in Dziegiełków, near Cieszyn. In 1933 he published his memoirs, Jeden łatwy żywot (One easy life). During World War II and the German occupation he initially lived in Dziegiełków, and then he moved to Kraków. From 1946 to 1947 Lutosławski taught philosophy at the Jagiellonian University. (MC)

Sources: PSB, vol. 18; Wojciech Wasutyński, Czwarte pokolenie: Szkice z dziejów Nacjonalizmu Polskiego (London, 1982); Stanisław Kozicki, Historia Ligi Narodowej (London, 1964); Wit Jaworski, Eleuteryzm i mesjanizm: U źródeł filozofii społecznej Wincentego Lutosławskiego (Kraków, 1994).

LUTOSŁAWSKI Witold (25 January 1913, Warsaw–7 February 1994, Warsaw), Polish composer, pianist, and conductor. Lutosławski came from a landed gentry family aligned with the national movement. His father Józef, executed by the Bolsheviks in 1918, had dedicated to Lutosławski his posthumously published book, Chleb i Ojczyzna (Bread and the Fatherland). At home, Lutosławski was imbued with a love of classical music, particularly that of Frédéric Chopin and Ludwig van Beethoven. He began taking piano lessons when he was a child. He composed his first work at the age of nine. In 1932 he began studying at the Frédéric Chopin Music Academy in Warsaw. He studied composition with Witold Maliszewski and piano with Jerzy Lefeld. In the 1930s he was greatly influenced by Igor Stravinsky and Albert Roussel. In 1937 he graduated from the Warsaw Conservatory. He subsequently served in a communications officers' cadet school in Zgierz for one year. It was then he completed the Symphonic Variations. Lutosławski's further studies in Paris were interrupted by the war. In September 1939 he fought on the front lines. He was taken prisoner by the Germans but managed to escape. During the German occupation Lutosławski was active in various cultural initiatives of the underground resistance movement. To earn a living, he played piano in cafés. At that time he wrote Variations on a Theme by Paganini for two pianos (1941) and Symphony No. 1 (1941–47). His Melodie Ludowe (Folk melodies; 1945) for string orchestra did not cause protests by the Communist authorities, but his other works were banned. During the Stalinist period Lutosławski was accused of "formalism." His other works of that period include Little Suite for Orchestra (1951), Concerto for Orchestra (1954), and Dance Preludes for Clarinet and Piano (1954), but they were not performed during his life. He earned a living by writing popular songs under pseudonyms.

Lutosławski's creative work developed greatly after October 1956, especially after the authorities of the Polish People's Republic stopped combating contemporary music and the annual Warszawska Jesień (Warsaw Autumn) festivals were launched in Warsaw. The Funeral Music for string orchestra (1958), an innovative composition dedicated to the memory of Béla Bartók, brought Lutosławski international recognition and the prize of UNESCO's Tribune Internationale des Compositeurs. Lutosławski experimented with asynchronous compositions and was one of the first composers to employ aleatory methods—as, for example, in Venetian Games for orchestra (1961). Most of his subsequent works, though, were harmonically organized and monumental; these include Symphony No. 2 (1967), Symphony No. 3 (1983), and Symphony No. 4 (1993), and concertos for cello (1970) and for oboe and harp (1980). Lutosławski followed this trend in writing compositions for male voices and choral music for poems by Henri Michaux (1963). Lutosławski educated many students in Poland and abroad. He was also active as a conductor of his own music. He worked with many celebrities, including Mstislav Rostropovich, Sir Peter Pears, Anne-Sophie Mutter, and Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau. He received many awards, including the UNESCO Prize (1959, 1968), the French order of Commandeur des Arts et des Lettres (1982), the Grawemeyer Award (1985), the Royal Philharmonic Society Gold Medal (1986), the Polar Music

Prize (Sweden, 1993), and the Inamori Foundation Prize (Japan, 1993). Posthumously he received the International Music Award (1994). From the 1970s on, Lutosławski was spiritually aligned with the democratic opposition. (MC)

Sources: New Encyclopedia Britannica, vol. 7 (Chicago, 1990); The Times, 10 February 1994; Bohdan Pociąg, Lutosławski a wartość muzyki (Kraków, 1976); The Norton/Grove Concise Encyclopedia of Music (New York, 1994); Stanley Alexandrowicz, "A Transcription and Analysis of Witold Lutosławski's Melodie Ludowe," Ph.D. diss., Manhattan School of Music, New York, 1993; Irina Nikolaskaya, Conversations with Witold Lutosławski, 1987–92 (Stockholm, 1994); Charles Rodman Rae, The Music of Lutosławski (London, 1994); Jadwiga Paja-Stach, Witold Lutosławski (Kraków, 1996); Zbigniew Skowron, Lutosławski Studies (New York, 2001); Stanisław Będkowski, Witold Lutosławski (Westport, Conn., 2001).

LUTSKEVICH Anton (29 January 1884, Šiauliai–1946, Kazakhstan?), Belorussian political activist, ideologue of the national revival movement, and journalist. Lutskevich came from a noble family and was the younger brother of Ivan Lutskevich. After graduating from high school in Minsk (1902), he began studying at the Department of Mathematics and Physics of the University of Dorpat (Tartu). In 1902 he co-founded the Belorussian Revolutionary Party. After a split within this party, Lutskevich, along with his brother, founded the Belorussian Revolutionary Hromada in 1903. In 1904 he was arrested for distributing anti-tsarist literature. He took part in the 1905–7 revolution and was one of the founders of the Belorussian newspapers Nasha Dola and Nasha Niva in 1906. In 1907 he moved to Vilna (Wilno, Vilnius), where he helped to establish a Belorussian library and reading room. In 1915 Lutskevich became president of the Belorussian Committee for Aid to War Victims and chairman of the Belorussian National Committee. In 1916 he began publishing the periodical Homan in Vilna. During the February 1917 revolution and the Bolshevik revolution in 1917, his articles helped to consolidate the independence movement. Lutskevich advocated the establishment of a confederation of the grand duchy of Lithuania, which would include Lithuania, Latvia, and Belorussia. He discussed the issue with representatives of the Polish, Jewish, Lithuanian, and Latvian communities. At the beginning of 1918 he became president of the Vilna Belorussian Council and called for the establishment of a Belorussian state within its ethnic borders.

After the Germans occupied most of Belorussia, the Belorussian People's Republic (BPR) was proclaimed on 25 March 1918 as a result of an agreement with a similar council in Minsk. The weakening of the German position in the summer of 1918 and controversies over the extent of Belorussian dependence on the Germans undermined the union of the BPR government. In September 1918 the BPR Council appointed Lutskevich prime minister and minister of interior. He strove for international recognition of the BPR and established diplomatic relations with nineteen countries. In December 1918, the BPR government managed to escape the Bolsheviks, moving to Hrodna (Grodno). In January 1919 Lutskevich issued a protest against the entry of Polish troops into the Białystok and Bielsk districts, which, according to the BPR authorities, were part of the Belorussian state. After the Hrodna and Vilna regions were under the control of the Polish Army, Lutskevich went to Berlin, where he insisted that the Belorussian issue be put on the agenda of the Paris Peace Conference. In Paris, he met the Polish prime minister, Ignacy Paderewski, with whom he agreed on a plan of cooperation between the Polish and Belorussian governments. Arrested by the Polish authorities on his way back to Belorussia via Warsaw in September 1919, Lutskevich was released at the end of November; by then he had lost most of his supporters in the BPR Council.

At the end of February 1920 Lutskevich moved to Vilna, where he resumed publishing Nasha Niva. He also established the Belorussian National Committee and the Ivan Lutskevich Belorussian Museum. He worked as a teacher at the Belorussian Gymnasium in Vilna. He organized the parliamentary elections of 1922, in which eleven representatives of the Belorussian communities won seats in the Polish Assembly and Senate. In 1925 he became a member of the Belorussian Peasants' and Workers' Hromada. Accused of cooperation with the Communists and arrested in October 1927, Lutskevich was acquitted after a few months in prison. In 1930 he established a new group, the Central Union of Belorussian Cultural and Economic Organizations (Tsentsrayuz), which received financial help from the Polish authorities. This union published newspapers for peasant communities. Tsentsrayuz and Lutskevich were generally ostracized for their contacts with the Polish authorities. In 1933 Lutskevich lost his job as a teacher at the Belorussian Gymnasium and withdrew from public life. Arrested on 30 September 1939 by the Soviet authorities, he was sentenced by a NKVD court to six years in prison. According to the official version, he died in Kazakhstan in 1946. Lutskevich wrote a great number of articles and several analytical works on Belorussian history, including Ekonomiczna ewolucja i ruch białoruski (Economic evolution and the Belorussian movement; 1917); Polская akupatsyia u Belarusi (The Polish occupation of Belorussia; 1920); Ėvaliutsyia belaruskay adradzhenskay idéaliohii i iae adliustravanne u litaratury (The evolution of Belorussian revival ideology and its reflection in literature; 1926); and Za 25 hadou: 1903–1928 (Twenty-five years: 1903–1928; 1928). (EM)

Sources: Entsyklopedyia historyi Bielarusi, vol. 4 (Minsk, 1994); Nicholas P. Vakar, Belorussia: The Making of a Nation (Cambridge, Mass., 1956); Aleksandra Bergman, Sprawy białoruskie w II Rzeczypospolitej (Warsaw, 1984); Vitaut Kipel and Zora Kipel, eds., Byelorussian Statehood (New York, 1988); Jerzy Turonek, Białoruś pod okupacją niemiecką (Warsaw, 1993); J. Januszkiewicz, "Lutskevichy," in Shliakham hadou: Histarychna-litaraturny zbornik (Minsk, 1994); Jan Zaprudnik, Historical Dictionary of Belarus (Lanham, Md., 1998).

LUTSKEVICH Ivan (9 June 1881, Šiauliai–20 August 1919, Zakopane, Poland), Belorussian social activist, ethnographer, and archaeologist. The brother of Anton Lutskevich, Lutskevich graduated from the Moscow Archaeological Institute. At the beginning of the twentieth century, along with Vatslau Ivanouski, he organized the Belorussian People's Education and Culture Group in St. Petersburg. In 1902 he helped to establish the Belorussian Revolutionary Party, and in 1903, the Belorussian Revolutionary Hromada. In 1906 he was one of the founders of the newspapers Nasha Dola and Nasha Niva. During World War I he organized Belorussian schools in the Hrodna and Vilna regions. From his student days at a high school in Minsk, Lutskevich had collected exhibits and materials about the earliest history of Belorussia. Gradually, his collection became the basis for the establishment of the Belorussian Museum in Vilna (Wilno, Vilnius) in 1919. Along with his brother and Vatslau Lastouski, Lutskevich originated the concept of reconstructing the grand duchy of Lithuania, and from 1918 on he supported the declaration of independence by the Belorussian People's Republic. According to Lutskevich, the restoration of the Uniate (Greek Catholic) Church as the national church of the Belorussian people would be a chance to build a Belorussian state. As Belorussians associated Catholicism with Poland and the Orthodox Church with Russia, the Uniate Church would promote the development of Belorussian national consciousness. Later, this idea was often revived by Belorussian national activists. As a result of Lutskevich's efforts, the Belorussian issue was raised at international forums during conferences of nations in Stockholm and Lausanne in 1916, at which Lutskevich demanded an equality in relations among Belorussians, Ukrainians, Russians, and Poles through the establishment of national states within ethnic borders. At the end of his life Lutskevich suffered from tuberculosis. He died in Zakopane, where he went for treatment. A symbolic funeral was held for him in Vilnius in 1991. (EM)

Sources: Pamiatsi Ivana Lutskevicha: U pershyia uhodki s'mertsia jaho (Vilnius, 1920); Nicholas P. Vakar, Belorussia: The Making of a Nation (Cambridge, Mass., 1956); A. Kaval, "Ivan Lutskevich 1881–1919," Niva, 1981, no. 23; Vitaut Kipel and Zora Kipel, eds., Byelorussian Statehood (New York, 1988); Jerzy Turonek, Białoruś pod okupacją niemiecką (Warsaw, 1993); J. Januszkiewicz, "Lutskevichy," in Shliakham hadou: Histarychna-litaraturny zbornik (Minsk, 1994); Jan Zaprudnik, Historical Dictionary of Belarus (Lanham, Md., 1998).

LUX Josef (1 February 1956, Ústí at Orlici–22 November 1999 Seattle, Washington), Czech politician. Lux graduated in agriculture from Brno University in 1980, and then he managed a collective farm. He began his political activity in 1982, when he joined the Czechoslovak People's Party (Československá Strana Lidová [ČSL]); it was a way to avoid joining the Communist Party. Lux became seriously involved in politics only after the Velvet Revolution, when in January 1990 he was elected a deputy to the Federal Assembly of Czechoslovakia and in November 1990 became the leader of his party. After the elections of 1992 his party joined the parliament and the ruling coalition, and Lux assumed the post of deputy prime minister and minister of agriculture in the government of Václav Klaus. Lux gave his party a new profile. Under his leadership the party thrived, extending its name to the Christian Democratic Union–Czechoslovak People's Party (Křesťanská a Demokratická Unie–Československá Strana Lidová [KDU–ČSL]) and forming a rather stable (8–10 percent) electorate of Christian Democratic views. It paid off in the elections of 1996, when the KDU–ČSL was the only party in the coalition whose social support increased. At the same time Lux gained the reputation of an independent politician, often critical of his party's coalition partner, the Civic Democratic Party (Občanská Demokratická Strana [ODS]). The lack of acceptance of his political style and the obscure sources of finance for this party made Lux and the KDU–ČSL leave the coalition government on 29 November 1997, which caused its fall. At the beginning of December 1997 President Václav Havel entrusted Lux with forming a government, but he failed. In the provisional government of Josef Tošovski, which was formed in January 1998, Lux assumed the portfolio of minister of agriculture. After the early elections of 19–20 June 1998 the KDU–ČSL went into the opposition, and Lux disapproved of the political system of the Czech Social Democratic Party (Česká Strana Sociálně Demokratická [ČSSD]) and the ODS, accusing them of an attempt to eliminate other parties from the political scene. On 24 September 1998 Lux left all his party posts, announcing that he was suffering from leukemia. He died after postoperative complications. (PU)

Sources: ČBS; Kdo byl kdo v našich dějinách ve 20. století, vol. 1 (Prague, 1998); Eva Rolečková, Josef Lux: Muž se světlem v srdci (Prague, 2000).

LUXEMBURG Rosa, pseudonym “Róża Kruszyńska” (5 March 1870, Zamość–15 January 1919, Berlin, Germany), activist of the Polish and German workers' movements, theorist of socialism and the political economy. Born into the family of an assimilated Jewish merchant, Luxemburg spent her childhood in Warsaw, where she graduated from the Second Warsaw High School for Girls (1887). In 1888 she joined activists who were attempting to reestablish the Proletariat Party. Fearing arrest, she left for Zurich, where she studied the natural sciences and mathematics. After two years she transferred to the School of Law and Economics of Zurich University, where she received a Ph.D. for her dissertation, “Die industrielle Entwicklung Polens” (The industrial development of Poland), in 1897. In her dissertation, Luxemburg argued that it would be impossible to rebuild the Polish state owing to increasingly tight economic ties between the Kingdom of Poland and Russia. While a student, Luxemburg was active in Polish and Russian Socialist groups in Switzerland. In the conflict between supporters of Polish independence, who later formed the Polish Socialist Party (Polska Partia Socjalistyczna [PPS]), and supporters of the Russian Revolution, who called for abandoning the idea of an independent Poland, Luxemburg, as leader of the Social Democracy of the Kingdom of Poland (Socjaldemokracja Królestwa Polskiego [SDKP]) and the author of its ideological program, supported the latter group. She considered a national state to be a tool of exploitation and believed that the aim of world revolution was to improve the situation of the proletariat; consequently, she called for the abolition of borders altogether.

After completing her studies, Luxemburg settled in Berlin and worked with the Social Democratic Party of Germany (Sozialdemokratische Partei Deutschlands [SPD]). Her sharp speeches and non-German origins did not win her supporters. However, she soon became a leading spokesperson of the party's left wing, publishing Sozialreform oder Revolution (1899; Reform or Revolution, 1973), as well as articles in Leipziger Volkszeitung, an organ of the left wing. At the turn of the century, along with Marcin Kasprzak, Luxemburg attempted to break up the PPS in the Prussian partition by winning the support of members who represented a more internationalist attitude. When the Social Democracy of the Kingdom of Poland and Lithuania (Socjaldemokracja Królestwa Polskiego i Litwy [SDKPiL]) was founded in 1900, Luxemburg treated it with reserve at first, but, after program changes were introduced, she served as an SDKPiL delegate in the Bureau of the Second International from 1904 to 1918. In 1904 Luxemburg was briefly detained for insulting the German emperor. In her article “Organisationsfragen der russischen Sozialdemokratie” (Organizational questions of Russian Social Democracy) Luxemburg argued with Lenin, whom she accused of dictatorial leanings in the Russian Social Democratic Workers' Party (RSDWP).

After the outbreak of the 1905 revolution in Russia, Luxemburg went to Warsaw to participate in the struggle and was arrested. She managed to escape to Finland, where a conflict with Lenin was averted. She expressed herself in favor of Lenin's tactics, and at a 1907 congress of the RSDWP in London she sharply attacked the Mensheviks. Luxemburg advocated mass strikes as powerful tools with which to exert pressure upon state authorities (Massenstreik, Partei und Gewerkschaften, 1906; [The Mass Strike, the Political Party, and the Trade Unions; 1971]). Luxemburg's demands for mass action led to a sharp conflict with the SPD leadership, as well as with Karl Kautsky, who until then had been favorably disposed to her. As a result of this conflict, she was expelled from the editorial staff of Leipziger Volkszeitung. From 1907 to 1914 Luxemburg taught at the SPD school in Berlin, where she wrote Einfuehrung in die Nationaloekonomie (Introduction to political economy; 1925) and Akkumulation des Kapitals (1913; The Accumulation of Capital, 1951), in which she criticized the theses of Marx and Engels, emphasized the relationship between the activities of the state and the accumulation of capital, and described imperialism as a sort of passageway to Socialist society. She also published in the SDKPiL newspapers (Czerwony Sztandar, Trybuna, and Nasza Sprawa). After the SDKPiL split into two factions, one supporting the left wing of the SPD and the other supporting the Bolsheviks, Luxemburg supported the former faction. This led to a conflict with Lenin, who favored the latter faction and condemned her because she did not support his decision to expel the Mensheviks from the RSDWP and even attempted to impose arbitration by the International and the SPD on this issue.

In 1914 Luxemburg opposed the majority of the SPD, who had voted in the Reichstag in favor of war credits for the government. She founded a separate group within the party, Die Internationale, and sharply protested the war, which led to her imprisonment. While in prison, Luxemburg wrote Die Krise der deutschen Sozialdemokratie (1919; The Crisis in the German Social Democracy, 1969), which was distributed illegally. Freed from prison by the German Revolution at the end of November 1918, Luxemburg, supported by the Spartacus League, began to organize a Bolshevik-type revolution in Germany. She co-founded the Communist Party of Germany (CPG) and co-authored its program. According to the prevailing view, the Communist uprising of January 1919 in Berlin began against Luxemburg's recommendations because she realized that the chances for victory were slim. On 15 January 1919, during the persecutions after the uprising, Luxemburg was arrested, and while being transported to prison, she was murdered by German Freikorps troops. Her views were combated in the Communist movement as so-called Luxemburgism. Nonetheless, Luxemburg holds a place in the pantheon of the international revolutionary left. (AG)

Sources: PSB, vol. 18; Charles E. Rothwell, Rosa Luxemburg and the German Social Democratic Party (Stanford, 1942); Aleksander Koczański, Róża Luksemburg (Warsaw, 1976); Adam Ciołkosz, Róża Luksemburg a rewolucja rosyjska (Paris, 1961); Elzbieta Ettinger, Rosa Luxemburg: A Life (Boston, 1986); Richard Abraham, Rosa Luxemburg: A Life for the International (Oxford, 1989); Sebastian Haffner, Niemiecka rewolucja 1918/1919 (Lublin, 1996).

LYAPCHEV Andrei (30 November 1866, Resen, Macedonia–8 November 1933, Sofia), Bulgarian politician. Lyapchev graduated from a high school in Plovdiv. In 1885 he volunteered to fight in the Serbo-Bulgarian war. He subsequently studied finance in Zurich and political economy in Paris and Berlin (until 1893). After returning to Bulgaria, he worked in the Ministry of Finance (1894–1905) and was engaged in journalism. At the end of the nineteenth century Lyapchev was active in the Bulgarian liberation movement in Macedonia. From 1885 to 1896 he edited the newspaper Mlada Bulgariia. He later founded, and from 1899 to 1905 edited, the newspaper Reformi, an organ of the Supreme Macedonian Committee. After joining the Democratic Party, Lyapchev became one of its leaders and held many ministerial posts. He served as minister of agriculture and commerce (January 1908–September 1910) and minister of finance (September 1910–March 1911 and June–November 1918) in the government of Aleksandur Malinov and as minister of war in the government of Teodor Teodorov (November 1918–May 1919). Lyapchev was the first Bulgarian civil minister of war since the country's liberation from the Turkish yoke. On 28 September 1918 Lyapchev headed the Bulgarian delegation that signed an armistice with the Entente at Salonika. He was elected a deputy to the fourteenth and sixteenth through twenty-third National Assemblies (1908–11 and 1913–33). An opponent of the Bulgarian Agrarian National Union (BANU), Lyapchev took part in an unsuccessful action organized by the Constitutional Bloc against the government of Aleksandur Stamboliyski (17 September 1922). Arrested along with other ministers of Malinov's cabinet after the failure of this action, in March 1923 Lyapchev was brought before the State Court, which was established to try those who had brought about the "second national catastrophe" in Bulgaria.

After the coup of 9 June 1923, which overthrew the government of Stamboliyski, Lyapchev was released and became one of the leaders of the newly established Democratic Alliance (DA). The collapse of the government of Aleksandur Tsankov offered Lyapchev a chance to take up the post of head of government and minister of the interior and health (4 January 1926–29 June 1931). In domestic policy, Lyapchev followed Tsankov's political line and tried to initiate a policy of reconciliation. He legalized the Bulgarian Workers' Party, which continued the activities of the outlawed Bulgarian Communist Party. In foreign policy, he sought rapprochement with Great Britain and tried to encourage foreign investments in Bulgaria. As a result of his efforts, Bulgaria was included in the stabilization plan of the Financial Committee of the League of Nations and secured a loan to facilitate the settlement of refugees in the region (1926) and a stabilization loan (1928). Owing to an economic crisis, the DA lost its position in the elections of June 1931, and Lyapchev resigned as prime minister. After the DA split in 1932, Lyapchev became the leader of a moderate faction of a movement that opposed Tsankov's Fascist program. (JJ)

Sources: Entsiklopediya Bulgariya, vol. 3 (Sofia, 1982); Tadeusz Wasilewski, Historia Bulgarii (Wrocław, 1988); Milen Kumanov and Tania Nikolova, Politicheski partii, organizatsii i dvizheniia v Bulgariia i tekhnite lideri 1879–1999: Kratyk spravochnik (Sofia, 1999); Tasho Tashev, Ministrte na Bulgariia 1879–1999: Entsiklopedichen spravochnik (Sofia, 1999); Veselin Tepavicharov, Bulgarski dyrzhavnitisi i polititsi 1918–1947 (Sofia, 2000); Angel Tsurakov, Entsiklopediia. Pravitelstvata na Bulgariia: Khronologiia na politicheski zhyvot 1879–2001 (Sofia, 2001).

LYPA Yuriy (5 May 1900, Odessa–20 August 1944, Shutiv), Ukrainian writer. Because his father Ivan, a poet and minister of the Ukrainian National Republic, settled in Poland after World War I, Lypa graduated in medicine from the University of Poznań in 1929. Later he practiced medicine in Warsaw, becoming one of the key figures among Ukrainian émigrés in Poland. In 1929 he founded a literary group, Tank. Lypa made his literary debut in 1919, and later he published three volumes of poetry—Svitlist (The light; 1925), Surovist (Severity; 1931), and Viruyu (I believe; 1938); a novel, Kozaky v Moskovii (Cossacks in Moscow; 1931); the collections of short stories Notatnyk (Notebook, 3 vols.; 1936–37) and Kinnotchyk ta inshi opovidannia (The horseman and other stories; 1946); and a collection of essays on Ukrainian literature, Biyi za ukraiinsku literaturu (Struggles for Ukrainian literature; 1935). In the 1930s Lypa contributed to the Lviv (Lwów) monthly, Vistnyk, edited by Dmytro Dontsov. Lypa's literary output was strongly connected with politics, and in the late 1930s he worked out a nationalist “Black Sea” doctrine. In 1938–41 he published a trilogy: Pryznachennia Ukrainy (The fate of the Ukraine), Chornomorska doktryna (The Black Sea Doctrine), and Rozpodil Rosiyi (The disintegration of Russia). Lypa's theories were based on the assumption that race was a group of uniform psychological features. The survival of races was, in his opinion, determined by three factors: religion, morality, and a stable geopolitical orientation. In the case of the Ukraine it was to be based on the North–South, and not on the East–West, axis. According to Lypa, the “fate” of the Ukraine depended on control of the Crimea, a key to the Black Sea, and on northward expansion, following the pattern of the early Kievan rulers of the ninth to eleventh centuries. Lypa's medical works include Fitoterapia (Phytotherapy; 1933), Tsilyushchi roslyny v davniy i suchasniy medytsyni (Healing plants in old and contemporary medicine; 1937), and Liky pid nohamy (Medicines under our feet; 1943). Lypa was killed by Soviet security forces while serving as a doctor in the Ukrainian Insurgent Army. (TS)

Sources: Encyclopedia of Ukraine, vol. 3 (Toronto, 1993); Dovidnyk z istorii Ukrainy, vol. 2 (Kiev, 1995); L. Bykovskiy, Apostol novitnoho ukraiinstwa Yuriy Lypa (Geneva, 1946); Borys Kukhta, Z istorii ukraiinskoyi politycznoyi dumky (Kiev, 1994).

LYPKIVSKYI Vasyl Ivan (19 March 1864, Popudnia, near Lipovets, Kiev Province–27 November 1937, USSR), co-founder and head of the Ukrainian Autocephalous Orthodox Church (UAOC), metropolitan of Kiev. In 1873 Lypkivskiy entered a theological school in Uman. He later studied at the Kiev Theological Seminary (1879–84) and at the Theological Academy in Kiev, graduating in 1889. Ordained in 1891, he served as dean of a cathedral in Lipovets from 1892 to 1903. From 1903 to 1905 Lypkivskiy lectured on canon law at an Orthodox church school for teachers in Kiev, but he lost his job because he supported a separate Ukrainian Orthodox Church. After the fall of tsarism, Lypkivskiy strove to establish an autocephalous church in the Ukraine. He was elected president of the Kiev Eparchial Council and the Resurrection Brotherhood, which was soon changed into the All-Ukrainian Orthodox Church Council. In May 1919 in St. Nicholas Cathedral in Kiev, Lypkivskiy celebrated the first liturgy in Ukrainian. Although the Russian Orthodox hierarchs strongly opposed his activities, he gained wide support among Ukrainians. In the summer of 1919 he became a parish priest of St. Sofia Cathedral in Kiev.

In May 1920, after Symon Petlyura's troops (supported by the Polish Army) seized Kiev, the All-Ukrainian Orthodox Church Council proclaimed the establishment of the UAOC. After the Bolsheviks seized power in the Ukraine, Lypkivskiy was appointed the first UAOC metropolitan in October 1921. Since the Russian Orthodox bishops recognized neither the UAOC nor the appointment of Lypkivskiy as its metropolitan and since they refused to consecrate him, the council decided to consecrate him without the consent of other bishops, through the ancient ritual of the laying on of hands. However, Lypkivskyi's appointment was questioned by some of the Orthodox bishops and clergy in the Ukraine. Nonetheless, he began vigorously to organize the new Church. He traveled throughout the Ukraine, establishing over 500 parishes. In 1927 the UAOC consisted of 36 bishops and 2,500 priests. Lypkivskyi placed great emphasis on involving laypeople in church life. He also consecrated married priests as bishops. One of his main aims was to maintain the independence of the UAOC from the Moscow Patriarchate, which had become increasingly controlled by the Soviet authorities. In October 1927 the authorities managed to win the support of some members of the All-Ukrainian Orthodox Church Council, who dismissed Lypkivskyi from his office. He settled in the suburbs of Kiev, where he remained under de facto house arrest and lived in extreme poverty. Arrested by the NKVD in November 1937 and accused of anti-Soviet activities, he was executed by a firing squad shortly afterwards.

Lypkivskyi was the author of numerous works on canon law and the history of the Church and theology, but most of them remained in manuscript form and were destroyed during World War II. Only the last of his seven volumes on the history of the Ukrainian Orthodox Church was published posthumously in Canada: Vidrozhennia Tserkvy v Ukraini 1917–1930 (The revival of the Orthodox Church in the Ukraine in 1917–1930; 1961). In 1936 Lypkivskyi's autobiography was published in Nasza Kultura in Warsaw. Some of Lypkivskyi's articles were published in Ukrainian periodicals in exile after the war, including "Ukraińska Avtokefalna Tserkva iadianska komunistychna vlada" (The Ukrainian Autocephalous Orthodox Church and the Soviet government, in Vil'na Ukraina, 1955–58) and "Iak Ukraińska Tserkva povernula sobi voliu" (The road of the Ukrainian Church to freedom, in Ukraińske pravoslavne slovo, 1956). (WR) Sources: Encyclopedia of Ukraine, vol. 3 (Toronto, 1993); F. Heyer, Die Orthodoxe Kirche in der Ukraine von 1917–1945 (Cologne and Braunsfeld, 1953); W. Kolarz, Religion in the Soviet Union (London, 1961); Russian Oppression in the Ukraine (London, 1962); M. Sadylenko, Sumni naslidky lypkivshchyny v Ukraińskiyi Pravoslavniy Tserkvy (Toronto, 1978); R. Armstark, Die Ukrainische Autokephale Orthodoxe Kirche: Erinnerungen des Metropoliten Vasyl K. Lypkivskij (Würzburg, 1982).

LYPYNSKYI Vyacheslav [real name Waclaw Lipiński] (17 April 1882, Zaturce in Wołyń [Volhynia]–14 June 1931, Wienerwald, near Vienna), politician, publicist, and ideologist of Ukrainian conservatism and national thought (derzhavnystvo). Born into a Polish landowning family, Lypynskyi was educated in a gymnasium in Zhytomyr between 1893 and 1898 and later (1898–1902) in the First Kiev Gymnasium. Most probably, he had already by then been introduced to the Ukrainian national movement and despite his noble Polish birth he began to feel and declare himself a Ukrainian, without, however, renouncing Roman Catholicism. In 1903–8 Lypynskyi studied history at the Jagiellonian University in Kraków (among other places). Having settled in Galicia, from 1908 he devoted himself entirely to journalism and independent research. In 1909 in Kraków he published Szlachta na Ukrainie (Nobility in the Ukraine), and in 1912 in Kiev, along with other authors, he issued Z dziejów Ukrainy (From the history of the Ukraine). Lypynskyi tried to prove the Russian and Ukrainian origins of the local gentry, as well as the participation of their ancestors in Ukrainian state building during the time of Bohdan Khmelnytsky's uprising.

Even before 1914 Lypynskyi had put forward a territorial concept of the Ukrainian nation. He proposed that the problem of a lack of a "leading stratum" in the Ukrainian nation be solved by the transfer of all the Ukrainian nobility, regardless of its Polish or Russian origins, to the Ukrainian camp and that the existing traditions and culture of this class be preserved. This proposal led to a proposal for an independent Ukrainian state. In Memorandum (1912) Lypynskyi tried to go beyond the vision of policies based on the two occupying countries, Russia and Austria-Hungary, and to move toward propaganda in support of the Ukrainian cause in Germany and the Entente states.

Lypynskyi spent the first year of World War I as a Russian officer in a campaign in Eastern Prussia. However, in 1915, owing to ill health (lung disease), he was sent to convalesce. Between 1917 and 1919 he founded a conservative peasant and pro-independence party, the Ukrainian Democratic Farmers' [Khliborobiv] Party. Lypynskyi was an ambassador of Hetman Pavlo Skoropadskyi in Vienna. In November 1918 he supported a federal treaty between the Ukraine and "White" Russia. As the Directory of Symon Petlyura assumed power in the Ukraine, in July 1919 Lypynskyi left the diplomatic service and remained in exile in Austria. There he became involved in forming a conservative camp that was centered around the hetman. In 1926 in Vienna he published Lysty do bratviv-khliborobiv (Letters to brothers-farmers [khliboroby]), which presented his social and political thought—from the foundations of the philosophy of politics to concrete proposals for the political system. At that time Lypynskyi also wrote Ukraina na perelomi: 1657–59 (The Ukraine at the turning point: 1657–59) and Relihiia i tserkva v istorii Ukrainy (Religion and the Church in the history of the Ukraine), in which he advocated that the cultural influences of East and West should be synthesized in the Ukraine. In 1920 Lypynskyi had already founded the Ukrainian Union of Farmers [Khliboroby] and State-Supporters, and from 1919 to 1926 he published the periodical Khliborobs'ka Ukrainina. In 1926–27, on the request of Hetman Skoropadskyi, Lypynskyi took part in the establishment of the Ukrainian Scientific Institute in Berlin. Having disagreed with the hetman about the political system of the future Ukraine, he returned to Reichenau, where in 1930 he founded his own party, the Ukrainian Fraternity of “Classocrats”-Monarchist. Lypynskyi was buried in his native Zaturce, in the then Polish part of Volhynia. (TS)

Sources: Encyclopedia of Ukraine, vol. 3 (Toronto, 1993); Ivan Mirchuk, Dvi kontseptsii ukrainskoyi politychnoyi dumky: Viacheslav Lypynskyi—Dmytro Dontsov (Munich, 1980); Hryhoriy Vaskovych, Dvi konceptsii ukrainskoyi politychnoyi dumky: Viacheslav Lypynskyi—Dmytro Dontsov (New York, 1990); Ukrainian Harvard Studies, 1985, nos. 3–4 (issue devoted entirely to Lypynskyi).

LYSIAK-RUDNYTSKYI Ivan (27 October 1919, Vienna–25 April 1984, Edmonton, Canada), Ukrainian historian and pedagogue. Lysiak-Rudnytskyi was the son of Pavlo Lysiak and Milena Rudnytska. His uncle was Ivan Rudnytskyi-Kedryn. In 1937 Lysiak-Rudnytskyi graduated from the Academic Gymnasium in Lviv (Lwów); in 1937–39 he studied law at Lviv University, and in 1940–43, international relations at the University of Berlin. In 1945 he received a Ph.D. from Charles University in Prague. In the 1940s Lysiak-Rudnytskyi belonged to Mazepynets, a Ukrainian student organization; he chaired the Ukrainian Academic Hromada; and he was a member of the Organization of Ukrainian Nationalist Students, which, contrary to its name, attempted to detach Ukrainian youth from integral nationalism. Initially Lysiak-Rudnytskyi sympathized with the conservative movement of Hetman Pavlo Skoropadskyi, but in the 1940s, under the influence of Mihailo Drahomanov and Vyacheslav Lypynskyi, his views evolved toward liberal conservatism.

After World War II, Lysiak-Rudnytskyi went to Austria and in 1947 for Switzerland; in June 1951 he came to the United States. In 1951–52 he studied at Columbia University, and from 1954 to 1956 he worked as an urban transportation controller in Philadelphia. In 1956–67 he lectured in Russian and West European studies at La Salle College in Philadelphia, and in 1967–71, at the American University in Washington, D.C. In 1971 Lysiak-Rudnytskyi became a professor of Ukrainian and East European history at the University of Alberta in Edmonton, Canada. In the 1950s and 1960s he worked with the Free Ukrainian Academy of Arts and Sciences (Ukrainska Vilna Akademiya Nauk i Mystetstv) in the United States. He was a full member of the Taras Shevchenko Research Society (Naukove Tovarystvo im. T. Shevchenka), and in 1976 he co-founded the Canadian Institute of Ukrainian Studies at the University of Alberta. In 1961–67 Lysiak-Rudnytskyi worked with the key Ukrainian émigré monthly Suchasnist. In 1967 he co-authored a letter in which thirty-five American intellectuals of Ukrainian origin demanded from the Soviet Union the establishment of Ukrainian citizenship, relations between the Ukrainian SSR and other countries, recognition of the Ukrainian language as the official state language of the Ukrainian SSR, and legalization of the Ukrainian Autocephalous Orthodox Church and the Ukrainian Greek Catholic Church. Lysiak-Rudnytskyi authored and edited about two hundred works in Ukrainian history, including Drahomanov (1952), Mizh istorieyu i politykoyu (Between history and politics; 1973), and Rethinking Ukrainian History (1981). The most complete collection of his works was published as Istorychni ese (Historical essays, 2 vols.; 1994). (BB)

Sources: Encyclopedia of Ukraine, vol. 4 (Toronto, 1993); Dovidnyk z Istorii Ukrainy (Kiev, 2001); Yaroslav Hrytsak, “Ivan Lysiak-Rudnytskyi: Narys intelektualnoyi biohrafii,” Suchasnist, 1994, no. 11.

LYUBCHENKO Panas (14 January 1897, Kaharlyk, Kiev region–29 August 1937, Kiev), Ukrainian Socialist and Communist activist. From 1917 to 1918 Lyubchenko was a member of the Ukrainian Central Rada (Council). A member of the Central Committee (CC) of the Ukrainian Party of Socialist Revolutionaries, in 1918 he became the leader of the party’s leftist faction, which became a separate party, the so-called Borotbists. When in 1920 the internationalist part of the Borotbist faction merged with the Bolsheviks into the Communist Party (Bolshevik) of Ukraine (CP[B]U), Lyubchenko became the secretary of a provincial party organization in Kiev. From 1921 to 1922 he was head of the provincial Executive Committee in Chernihiv, and from 1922 to 1925 he was head of the All-Ukrainian Union of Agricultural Cooperatives. Promoted to first secretary of the CC in 1927, Lyubchenko became a member of the CP(B)U CC Politburo in 1934. In March 1933 he became deputy head, and in January 1934 head, of the Council of People’s Commissars of the Ukrainian SSR. Lyubchenko was considered one of the most talented but at the same time one of the most ruthless Communist activists in the Ukraine. As a representative of the All-Ukrainian Council of Trade Unions, in March and April 1930 he served as the “people’s prosecutor” during the show trial of a fictitious organization, the Union for the Liberation of Ukraine. At a CC plenum at the beginning of July 1933, Lyubchenko brutally attacked Mykola

Skrypnyk; the attack was one of the factors that led to Skrypnyk's suicide. Lyubchenko was instrumental in the implementation of the policy of forced collectivization in Ukrainian agriculture and in the confiscation of grain; these steps led to an unnecessary and tragic famine that caused the death of several million Ukrainians. Attacked from the beginning of 1937 as a member of the "Borotbist conspiracy" within the party and then as a "Fascist spy," Lyubchenko was dismissed from his position. Fearing arrest and the fate of many of his victims, Lyubchenko, together with his wife, committed suicide. (WR)

Sources: MERSH, vol. 20; Encyclopedia of Ukraine, vol. 3 (Toronto, 1993); Hryhory Kostiuk, Stalinist Rule in the Ukraine (New York, 1960); Andrzej Chojnowski, Ukraina (Warsaw, 1997).

M

MAČEK Vladimir (Vladko) (20 July 1879, Jastrebarsko–15 May 1964, Washington, D.C.), Croatian lawyer and politician. After graduating in law in Zagreb in 1903, Maček practiced as an attorney in Zagreb, Petrinja, and Samobor and as a judge in Ivanec. In 1905 he joined the Croatian Peasant Party (CPP). During World War I he served as an officer in the Austro-Hungarian Army on the Serbian and Russian fronts. In the parliament of the Kingdom of Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes Maček represented a moderate wing of the CPP. The party assumed the name Croatian Republican Peasant Party (Hrvatska Republikanska Seljačka Stranka [HRSS]) in 1920. As a result of an agreement between its head, Stjepan Radić, and Nikola Pašić in June 1925, the party dropped the adjective “republican,” which was provocative for the monarchy, and Maček became deputy speaker of the parliament. In 1927 he became head of the Peasant Democratic Coalition, formed by the CPP and the Democratic Party—groups demanding the establishment of a federation instead of a centralized state dominated by the Serbs. After the death of Radić, Maček was elected leader of the CPP (18 August 1928). After King Alexander I strengthened the centralized Serb dictatorship, Maček stepped up his protests against it. In November 1932 he was one of the signatories of the Zagreb Manifesto, which called for equal rights for the Yugoslav nations. As a result, in January 1933 Maček was arrested and in April 1933 sentenced to three years in prison.

After the assassination of Alexander in October 1934, Maček was soon released as part of the attempts by Regent Paul Karadjordjević to liberalize domestic relations. Paul invited Maček to talks in Belgrade, during which the latter agreed to the continuation of the monarchy on condition of the democratization and federalization of the state. The reorganization of Bosnia and Herzegovina, Dalmatia, Montenegro, and Macedonia remained a contentious issue. Maček maintained that if Montenegro and Macedonia were to come within the orbit of Serb influences, then Croatia should take up all of the territory that had belonged to Austria-Hungary before World War I. Before the elections of May 1935, Maček’s efforts resulted in a joint list of candidates submitted by the opposition bloc formed by the Peasant Democratic Coalition, in which the CPP was the most important party. Despite manipulations by the regime, this list obtained over 37 percent of the vote. In the elections of December 1938 the extent of vote rigging was even greater; still, the coalition gained almost 45 percent of the vote. Because of worsening geopolitical conditions, both sides became more willing to reach a compromise, and on 26 August 1939, on behalf of the majority of the Croatian parties, Maček signed an agreement (sporazum) with the government of Dragiša Cvetković. This agreement gave Croatia and the provincial parliament in Zagreb considerable autonomy within Yugoslavia. Maček became deputy prime minister of the central government. To some extent the agreement helped to ease tensions between the Croats and the Serbs, although it did not satisfy the Ustashe, who considered it a betrayal and continued their struggle for independence, even resorting to terrorism. At the beginning of 1941 Maček maintained that Yugoslavia should continue its passive resistance to pressure from the Axis countries; consequently, he supported its accession to the Tripartite Pact (25 March 1941).

After the coup d’état of 27 March 1941, to which the Croats generally had a negative reaction, Maček hesitated a few days before finally supporting the government of Dušan Simović on 3 April. Although Maček considered the coup an irresponsible step by Serb officers, he decided that the unity of the country was more important. However, his appeal to Croats for support of the Simović government in the face of the German invasion failed, and a great number of soldiers surrendered without fighting. When on 10 April 1941 the Germans occupied Zagreb, Maček decided to stay in Croatia. However, he refused to support a puppet Croat state established by the Ustashe under the leadership of Ante Pavelić. As a result Maček was arrested and placed in a concentration camp near Graz. During negotiations between the government-in-exile of King Peter II and the Communists led by Josip Broz Tito, Maček was proposed as prime minister of a coalition government, but the Communists did not agree to that. Released from the concentration camp at the end of the war, Maček returned to Yugoslavia, which was controlled by the Communists. As he could not reconcile himself to the fact that Croatia was now under Communist rule, Maček left his country on 6 May 1945. Via Germany and France he traveled to the United States, where he maintained intensive contacts with political émigrés from other Central and East European countries. He died in the United States. Maček authored In the Struggle for Freedom (1957), in which he described his political quandaries and choices. In 1992 his Memoari (Memoirs) were published in Zagreb. (WR) Sources: Biographisches Lexikon, vol. 3; Enciklopedija Jugoslavije vol. 5 (Zagreb, 1962); Constantine Fotich, The War We Lost (New York, 1948); Todor Stojkov, “O stvaranju bloka narodnog sporazuma,” in Istorija XX veka, 1964, vol. 6; Ljubo Boban, Sporazum Cvetković-Maček (Belgrade, 1965); Ljubo Boban, Maček i politika Hrvatske seljačke stranke 1928–1941, vols. 1–2 (Zagreb, 1974); Mark Biondich, Stjepan Radić, the Croat Peasant Party, and the Politics of Mass Mobilization, 1904–1928 (Toronto, 2000).

MACH Alexander (11 October 1902, Palárikovo–15 October 1980, Bratislava), Slovak journalist and politician. Mach intended to become a Catholic clergyman. In 1916 he began studies at a theological seminary in Esztergom, and he continued them in Trnava. In 1922 he stopped his studies and devoted himself to political and journalistic work. From 1922 Mach was a functionary of the party of Reverend Andrej Hlinka, the Slovak People's Party (Slovenská Ľudová Strana), which in 1925 extended its name to Hlinka's Slovak People's Party (Hlinkova Slovenská Ľudová Strana [HSL'S]). He soon became known as an opponent of the Czechoslovak state. For a long time the leadership of the party was dominated by those who supported autonomy for Slovakia within the framework of a common state of Czechs and Slovaks, but Mach was among those who advocated a sovereign Slovak state.

In the 1930s Mach was a co-founder of a paramilitary organization within the HSL'S, the Hlinka Guard (Hlinkova Garda [HG]). After the proclamation of Slovakia's independence (14 March 1939), Mach became head of the Office of Propaganda. He also directed the HG. He supported the further Fascization of Slovakia and close relations with the Third Reich. He propagated the slogans of "completing the Slovak national revolution" and "the march on Bratislava" to assume power by the radicals. Mach initiated a meeting of cultural activists in Tatranska Lomnica (August 1940), where the so-called Lomnica Manifesto was passed. In it, the principles of Slovak totalitarianism were expounded; these were a mixture of concepts gathered from papal encyclicals and from the ideology of the Third Reich. At the same time Mach maintained contacts with liberal and leftist intellectuals, to whom he liked to present himself as a patron of Slovak culture and a promoter of artists. Some of the intellectuals who were linked with the Communist movement—for example, Laco Novomeský—used their connections with Mach to intervene on behalf of political prisoners.

Along with Prime Minister Béla Tuka, Mach promoted anti-Semitic policies. As early as 1938 HG functionaries actively supported the deportation of Jews from the territories of southern Slovakia. In August 1940 Mach resigned as the head of the Office of Propaganda, criticizing the policy of President Josef Tiso, whom he accused of excessive submission to liberal-democratic politicians and of failure to cooperate with the Germans. In May 1940 President Tiso received Mach's resignation, dismissing him at the same time as head of the HG. Mach went to Berlin, where he was the guest of Joseph Goebbels and Joachim von Ribbentrop (among others). In June 1940 a Slovak-German conference took place in Salzburg, where Hitler expressed his discontent that Mach and Tuka had been removed from power. As a result both politicians returned to the government. Mach was appointed minister of interior and held the office until March 1945. He also resumed the leadership of the HG. At the beginning of 1941 at an HG conference in Trenčianske Teplice Mach took part in passing a resolution for "the final solution of the Jewish question in Slovakia"; a similar plan was prepared for the gypsies, who were labeled "anti-social elements." As minister of interior and head of the HG, Mach was responsible for the deportation of over fifty thousand Slovak Jews, the majority of whom were transported to death camps and perished. In 1944 on Mach's orders, HG units, along with German forces, took part in quelling the Slovak National Uprising. In March 1945 Mach fled to Austria. Interned there by the Americans, he was handed over by them to the Czechoslovak government. In 1947 he was sentenced to thirty years of prison by the Supreme Court in Bratislava. He was released under amnesty in 1968. Mach settled in Bratislava, where he lived until his death. Mach was the author of many articles, published mainly in Gardista, an organ of the HG. (AGr)

Sources: Kdo byl kdo v našich dějinách ve 20 století (Prague, 1994); Ivan Kamenec, Slovenský štát 1939–1945 (Prague, 1992); Ewa Orlof, Dyplomacja Polska wobec sprawy słowackiej w latach 1938–1939 (Kraków, 1980); Słowacja na przelomie: Powstanie słowackie 1944 (Warsaw, 1969).

MACIEREWICZ Antoni, pseudonyms "Marcin Ankiewicz," "Scriptor," and others (3 August 1948, Warsaw), Polish politician and historian. The son of a Christian Democratic politician murdered by the Communists after World War II, Macierewicz graduated in history from Warsaw University. In 1975–76 he worked there in the Department of Iberian Studies. A participant in the student protests of March 1968 and held in prison from March to July 1968, Macierewicz was commander of the Romuald Traugutt Memorial Warsaw Scouting Squad, called the Black One. In 1969 he co-founded the Senior Scouting Group and the Gang of Tramps connected with it. In 1972–73 he taught in a Warsaw high school, and in 1975–76 he took part in protests against the amendment of the constitution. From July 1976 Macierewicz co-organized relief efforts for workers repressed after the June 1976 protests. On 23 September 1976 he co-founded the Committee for the Defense of Workers (Komitet Obrony Robotników [KOR]), which supplied financial and legal aid to those imprisoned and fired, as well as to their families. Dismissed from work, from May to July 1977 Macierewicz was imprisoned. After his release, in September 1977 he joined the Committee of Social Self-Defense of the KOR, stimulating social organization outside of official structures. From 1977 to 1981 Macierewicz was editor-in-chief of the secretly published monthly Głos, attracting KOR followers opposing Jacek Kuroń and Adam Michnik. In August 1980 he organized a strike in the Town Cleaning Enterprise. From the fall of 1980 to December 1981 Macierewicz was the organizer and de facto head of the Center of Public Opinion Studies in the Mazowsze region of Solidarity.

After the introduction of martial law in December 1981, Macierewicz worked in the underground—for example, as editor of Głos. In early 1989 he opposed the Round Table Talks. In October 1989 he co-founded the Christian National Union (Zjednoczenie Chrześcijańsko-Narodowe [ZChN]) and became deputy chairman of its Supreme Board. In 1990 he joined the Civic Committee of Lech Wałęsa. In 1991 Macierewicz became a member of the Advisory Committee of President Wałęsa, and in 1991–93 he was an MP on behalf of the ZChN. In December 1991 he became minister of interior in the Jan Olszewski government. A radical advocate of lustration, on 4 June 1992, realizing that a parliamentary resolution was imminent, Macierewicz publicized a list of alleged secret collaborators in the Communist special services who still worked in the parliament and government. This became an immediate reason for the collapse of the Olszewski cabinet. Removed from the ZChN for a badly prepared move, from November 1992 Macierewicz presided over the Christian National Movement Polish Action, which in 1995 became allied with Olszewski's Movement for the Reconstruction of Poland (Ruch Odbudowy Polski [ROP]). From 1997 to 2001 Macierewicz was an MP on behalf of the ROP, and from 2001, on behalf of the League of Polish Families, which he left in 2002 and founded the Catholic National Caucus. The spokesman for radical de-Communization and lustration, Macierewicz is rated among the keen opponents of Poland's entry into the European Union. (AF)

Sources: Janusz A. Majcherek, Pierwsza dekada III Rzeczypospolitej 1989–1999 (Warsaw, 1999); Opozycja w PRL: Słownik biograficzny 1956–89, vol. 1 (Warsaw, 2000); Wojciech Roszkowski, Historia Polski 1914–2001 (Warsaw, 2002); Antoni Dudek, Pierwsze lata III Rzeczypospolitej 1989–2001 (Kraków, 2002).

MACKIEWICZ Józef (1 June 1902, St. Petersburg–31 January 1985, Munich), Polish journalist and writer. The brother of Stanisław Mackiewicz, Mackiewicz came from a family tracing its origins to the landed gentry. While a high school student in Wilno (Vilnius), he served as a volunteer in the Polish-Soviet war (1919–20). In 1921 he began studying at the School of Natural Sciences and Mathematics of Warsaw University and at the School of Law of Wilno University. In 1923 he discontinued his studies and became involved in journalism. A supporter of the “homeland idea,” as opposed to Polish and Lithuanian nationalisms, Mackiewicz emphasized the multicultural character of the lands of the former Grand Duchy of Lithuania and called for equal rights for its inhabitants. In 1938 he published Bunt rojstów (The rebel of the moors), in which he criticized Poland's policy toward national minorities. He advocated cooperation between the Baltic States and Poland in the face of the Soviet threat. An enemy of totalitarian systems, particularly communism, Mackiewicz also criticized nationalism; as a result, he came into conflict with leftist groups, nationalists, and pro-Piłsudski groups.

After the capture of Wilno by the Red Army in September 1939, Mackiewicz fled to Kaunas. He established cooperation with the Lithuanians, which he continued after Lithuanian troops entered Wilno on 14 October 1939. After publishing “My Wilnianie” (We, the people of Vilnius) in Lietuvos Zinios, where he included a criticism of Poland before September 1939, Mackiewicz was appointed by the Lithuanian authorities as the editor of Gazeta Codzienna, which promoted anti-communism and the “homeland idea” (November 1939–May 1940). After Lithuania was invaded by the Soviet Army and then incorporated into the Soviet Union, Mackiewicz went into hiding in the Rudniki Forest, where he worked as a woodcutter (June 1940–June 1941). When the Germans occupied Wilno, he returned to the city. Optimistic about the new occupier, he published several articles in Goniec Codzienny, a “reptile” newspaper (i.e., Polish language but German-controlled and collaborationist), from July to October 1941. In 1942 a special court of the Home Army sentenced Mackiewicz to death for collaboration. The reality of the German occupation, particularly the killings of Jews, made Mackiewicz change his views; therefore, the sentence was overturned at the beginning of 1943. In May 1943, most probably with the consent of the Home Army, Mackiewicz went to Katyń to observe the exhumation, by the Germans, of Polish officers murdered by the NKVD. After returning to Wilno, he gave an interview on the subject to Goniec Codzienny (3 June 1943).

From May to July 1944 in Warsaw Mackiewicz published the anti-Communist periodical Alarm, warning about the Soviet threat. In January 1945 he made his way, via Vienna, to Rome, where he became aligned with the Second Corps, led by General Władysław Anders. Mackiewicz edited a book about Katyń, Zbrodnia katyńska w świetle dokumentów (The Katyń massacre in the light of documents; 1946). He published articles in Orzeł Biały, where, among other things, he reminded the world about the extermination of the Jews from the Wilno region. From 1947 to 1955 Mackiewicz lived in London and then, until his death, in Munich. He published articles in Polish émigré periodicals, including Kultura, as well as in the periodicals of Russian, Lithuanian, and Ukrainian émigrés. In 1955 he published the novel Droga do nikąd (The Road to Nowhere, 1964), about life in Lithuania under Soviet occupation, and in 1957 the book Kontra, in which he described the handing over by the Allies of the Cossacks from the Don region to the NKVD. The novels Sprawa pułkownika Miasojedowa (The case of Colonel Myasojedov; 1962), Lewa wolna (Free Left; 1965), and Nie trzeba głośno mówić (No need to speak out loud; 1969) are also important. Both Mackiewicz's political journalism and his literary prose were characterized by extreme anti-communism. In 1962 he published Zwycięstwo prowokacji (The victory of provocation), a collection of essays attacking the Kraków Tygodnik Powszechny, a weekly that attempted to maintain an independent position within the limits of the political system of the Polish People's Republic. In the collections of commentaries W cieniu krzyża (1972; In the Shadow of the Cross, 1973) and Watykan w cieniu czerwonej gwiazdy (The Vatican in the shadow of the red star; 1975) Mackiewicz criticized the Vatican and the Western Allies for their policy of appeasement toward the Soviet Union. (MC)

Sources: Literatura polska XX wiek: Przewodnik encyklopedyczny, vol. 1 (Warsaw, 2000); Marek Adamiec, "Cień wielkiej tajemnicy . . .": Norwid, Grabiński, Leśmian, Tyrmand, Mackiewicz, Herbert, Vincenz (Gdańsk, 1995); J. Malewski [Włodzimierz Bolecki], Ptasznik z Wilna (Kraków, 1991); Leksykon kultury polskiej poza krajem od roku 1939, vol. 1 (Lublin, 2000); Włodzimierz Bolecki and Krzysztof Masłoń, "Zrozumieć Mackiewicza," Rzeczpospolita, 2 March 2002; "Moje credo pisarskie? . . . Prawda," Tygodnik Powszechny, 31 March 2002.

MACKIEWICZ Stanisław, penname, "Cat" (18 December 1896, St. Petersburg–18 February 1966, Warsaw), Polish politician and journalist. The brother of Józef Mackiewicz. Mackiewicz came from a family tracing its roots to the landed gentry. From 1906 to 1916 he attended high schools in St. Petersburg and Wilno (Vilnius). In 1914 he entered the Jagiellonian University in Kraków. Later, he studied law at Warsaw University and at the Jagiellonian University, finally graduating from Stefan Batory University in Wilno (1924). In 1911 Mackiewicz became aligned with a secret national youth group called Pet, and he edited its periodical, Pobudka. During World War I he was active in the secret pro-independence Union of Polish Youth–Zet and in the Polish Military Organization (Polska Organizacja Wojskowa [POW]) in St. Petersburg and Wilno. At that time he published a work about Henryk Sienkiewicz. Arrested by the Germans in 1917 in Warsaw, Mackiewicz fled to Kraków, where he began working for the conservative Czas. He soon volunteered to serve in the Thirteenth Regiment of the Vilnius Uhlans and fought with the Bolsheviks. He also contributed to the conservative and monarchist press, including Dziennik Poznański and the Warsaw Straż Kresowa. In 1922 Mackiewicz became editor-in-chief and later publisher of the daily Słowo in Vilnius and headed this paper until 1939. Despite his extremely conservative views, his periodical published articles by intellectuals representing various orientations, including those with Communist leanings, such as Henryk Dembiński and Czesław Miłosz (who wrote for Słowo's literary supplement Żagary). Mackiewicz published treatises about the necessity to form an alliance with the Germans (for example, Kropka nad i [Spelling it out]; 1927), as well as treatises about communism (Mysł w obcęgach [Russian minds in fetters]; 1931) and conservative politics (Książka moich rozczarowań [The book of my disappointments]; 1939). Michał Bobrzyński, Waław Studnicki, and Charles Maurras were his ideological masters. In his journalism, Mackiewicz combined imperialistic ideas in foreign policy with monarchism and economic liberalism in domestic policy. He was active in the Monarchist Organization (1925), the Union of Polish Monarchists (1926), the Polish Conservative Organization of Pro-State Work (1926), and the Conservative Party (1937). Mackiewicz initially supported Józef Piłsudski, organizing his so-called Nieśwież agreement with the conservative camp (1926). In the Assembly, to which he was elected on the ticket of the Nonparty Bloc of Cooperation with the Government (Bezpartyjny Blok Współpracy z Rządem [BBWR]), Mackiewicz represented the Polish Conservative Organization of Pro-State Work. After Piłsudski's death, Mackiewicz criticized his successors for etatism and mono-party leanings, as well as the foreign policy of Józef Beck and Poland's lack of military preparation for the imminent war. In March 1939 he was briefly detained in the camp at Bereza Kartuska.

After the Third Reich and the Soviet Union attacked Poland in September 1939, Mackiewicz left for France, where he continued to publish Słowo. He was active as a member of the Polish government-in-exile and sat on the National Council. Immediately after the defeat of France, Mackiewicz suggested that it was necessary to begin capitulation negotiations with Germany, but at the beginning of September 1940 he left for Great Britain. Initially ostracized for Germanophilia, he soon again became active in the National Council. He opposed General Władysław Sikorski. He particularly criticized negotiations between the Soviet Union and the Polish Communists. He accused the Western Allies, particularly the British, of treachery. Mackiewicz published extensively, including Historia Polski od 11 listopada 1918 do 17 września 1939 (The history of Poland from 11 November 1918 to 17 September 1939; 1941) and Klucz do Piłsudskiego (The key to Piłsudski; 1943). After the war Mackiewicz wrote for Dziennik Polski, Wiadomości, and Lwów i Wilno, a periodical that he edited. His publications include Lata nadziei (Years of hope; 1946) and Stanisław August (1953), a book about the last Polish king. One of the most implacable anti-Communists, on 7 June 1954 Mackiewicz became prime minister of the government-in-exile in London and held this position until 8 August 1955. On 14 June 1956 he unexpectedly returned to Poland. This decision was influenced both by his conviction that the work of the government-in-exile was pointless and by economic factors. Mackiewicz settled in Warsaw. At odds with the Poles in emigration, he sharply criticized postwar émigré circles in Londyniszczce (1957) and Zielone oczy (1958; Green eyes; 1958). Later he became involved in historical journalism. When his health deteriorated, Mackiewicz also wrote dramas, with aid from the PAX Association of Bolesław Piasecki. (MC)

Sources: PSB, vol. 19; Władysław Pobóg-Malinowski, Najnowsza historia polityczna Polski, vols. 2–3 (London, 1983–86); Jerzy Jaruzelski, Stanisław Cat-Mackiewicz, 1896–1966: Wilno-Londyn-Warszawa (Warsaw, 1994); Artur Górski, Władza polityczna w myśli Stanisława Cata-Mackiewicza (Kraków, 1999); Leksykon kultury polskiej poza krajem od roku 1939, vol. 1 (Lublin, 2000).

MACZEK Stanisław (31 March 1892, Szczerzec, East Galicia–11 December 1994, Edinburgh), Polish general. Maczek graduated from the Department of Philosophy and Polish Philology of the University of Lemberg (Lwów, Lviv), where, while a student, he underwent military training in the Riflemen's Association. During World War I he was an officer in the Austrian Army. He served in the Second Regiment of Tyrolean Riflemen, at first on the Russian front and later on the Italian front. From the fall of 1918 he was in the Polish Army. In the Polish-Soviet war (1919–20) he commanded a company in the Fourth Infantry Division. After the end of the war he commanded an infantry battalion of the Twenty-sixth Infantry Regiment in Lwów and then studied for one year at the War College. Afterwards, he was deputy commander of the Seventy-sixth Infantry Regiment and for five years commander of the Eighty-first Regiment of Grodno Riflemen.

In 1937 Maczek began to organize the Tenth Armored Cavalry Brigade, of which he became commander in 1938. With his brigade, a part of the “Kraków Army,” he fought in the September campaign of 1939. After the Soviet invasion of Poland, on 19 September 1939 Maczek, along with a group of his soldiers, crossed the Hungarian border and was interned there. In October 1939 he managed to get to France, where in 1940 he reconstructed the Tenth Armored Cavalry Brigade. In recognition of his merits in the September campaign, he was promoted to general. After the collapse of France in July 1940, Maczek went to Britain, where he again organized and commanded the Tenth Armored Cavalry Brigade. In 1942 he began to form the First Armored Division of soldiers and officers who fought under his command in Poland and France. His division started fighting on 1 August 1944 and took part in the Allied invasion of Normandy—for example, in the battle of Falaise, where it played a crucial role. Maczek's division then fought in Belgium and in the Netherlands, playing a special role in the battle of Breda. The division gained the gratitude of the local people because Maczek tried to avoid the destruction of towns during battles. The battle trail of this division ended in Wilhelmshaven in Germany.

From 1945 to 1947 Maczek commanded the First Corps of the Polish Armed Forces in the West, which were stationed in Scotland. After the war he remained in exile in Edinburgh. The Communist government in Warsaw stripped him of his Polish citizenship. Maczek published his memoirs, Od podwoły do czołga: Wspomnienia wojenne, 1918–1945 (From the wagon to the tank: War memoirs, 1918–1945; 1961). In 1990 Maczek was appointed lieutenant general. In 1994 he was decorated with the Order of the White Eagle. In accordance with his wishes, he was buried in Breda. (JS)

Sources: Franciszek Skibiński, Pierwsza pancerna (Warsaw, 1979); T. Wysocki, I. Polska Dywizja Pancerna 1939–1945 (Warsaw, 1994); Juliusz L. Englert and Krzysztof Barbarski, Generał Maczek i żołnierze I Dywizji Pancerniej (London, 1992); Zbigniew Tomkowski, Generał Maczek: Najstarszy żołnierz Rzeczypospolitej (Warsaw, 1994); Piotr Stawecki, Słownik biograficzny generałów Wojska Polskiego, 1918–1939 (Warsaw, 1994).

MADGEARU Virgil (14 December 1887, Galați–27 November 1940, near Snagov), Romanian economist and politician. After graduating from high school in Galați, Madgearu studied economics at the university in Leipzig, where in 1911 he earned a Ph.D. in economic sciences for a dissertation on the industrial development of Romania. He subsequently continued his studies in London. In 1912 he returned to Romania, where he was appointed head of the Workers' and Craftsmen's Central Insurance Fund, later becoming editor-in-chief of the insurance periodical Monitorul asigurarilor muncitorești. Madgearu published articles on the Romanian economy, especially agriculture.

In 1916 he became a professor at the Academy of Commerce and Industry in Bucharest. On his initiative, the chair of social policy and cooperative studies was established at this academy. From 1918 he edited the periodical Independența economică in Iași.

After World War I Madgearu was a co-founder of the Union for Social Reform Studies, which later became the Romanian Social Institute (Institutul Social-Român), and he served as its secretary general and then as chairman of the Social Policy Department. A member of the agrarian Peasant Party (Partidul țărănesc) from 1919 to 1926, its ideologue, and then its secretary general, Madgearu called for radical agrarian reform and advocated the development of the Romanian economy based on farming and small-scale manufacturing. He believed that peasants who acquired land in land reforms—the largest social group—should play a decisive role in a democratically governed Romania. When in 1926 the Peasant Party merged with the Transylvanian National Romanian Party (Partidul Național Român), forming the National Peasant Party (Partidul Național Țărănesc [NPP]), Madgearu became its secretary general. He served as a NPP member of parliament (1926–38); minister of trade and industry (November 1928–November 1929, July–October 1930, August–October 1932); minister of finance (November 1929–January 1930, October 1932–November 1933); and minister of agriculture (October 1930–April 1931). He called for the establishment of a bloc of agrarian countries to become more competitive with the industrialized Western countries, through the establishment of peasant cooperatives (among other things). He advocated a so-called third way of development, neither socialist nor capitalist. In 1935 Madgearu founded the Romanian Institute for the Study of Economic Cycles. After the royal dictatorship was established, Madgearu joined the opposition. After the abdication of King Charles II and the coming to power of General Ion Antonescu, as a critic of the Fascist Iron Guard Madgearu was abducted by Guardists in November 1940, subjected to torture, and shot dead in the forest near Snagov.

Madgearu's publications include the following: Structura și tendințele băncilor populare în România (The structure and tendencies of the people's banks in Romania; 1914); Revoluția agrară și evoluția clasei țărănești (The agrarian revolution and the evolution of the peasant class; 1923); Înțelegerea economică a statelor dunărene (Economic cooperation of the Danubian countries; 1932); Reorganizarea sistemului de credit (Reorganization of the credit system; 1934); and La politique économique extérieure de la Roumanie 1927–1938. In 1990 Madgearu was posthumously recognized as a member of the Romanian Academy of Sciences. (LW)

Sources: Dictionar Enciclopedic, vol. 4 (Bucharest, 2001); Vlad Georgescu, Istoria Românilor de la origini pînă în zilele noastre (Oakland, 1984); Józef Darski, Rumunia: Historia, współczesność, konflikty narodowe (Warsaw, 1995); Krzysztof Dach and Tadeusz Dubicki, Żelazny Legion Michała Archanioła (Warsaw, 1996); Dorina N. Rusu, Membrii Academiei Române 1866–1999 (Bucharest, 1999); Ion Alexandrescu, Ion Bulei, Ion Mamina, and Ioan Scurtu, Enciclopedia de istorie României (Bucharest, 2000).

MÁDL Ferenc (29 January 1931, Báánd, near Veszprém), president of Hungary. In 1955 Mádl graduated in law from Eötvös Lóránd University in Budapest, and in 1956 he started working in the Institute of Legal Studies of the Hungarian Academy of Sciences (HAS). In 1961–63 he studied in the Department of Law of the University of Strasbourg, France. In 1964 he received a Ph.D. in political science, and in 1973 he became a professor at Eötvös Lóránd University in Budapest. In 1978 he received his postdoctoral degree at the HAS. From this time Mádl was head of the Institute of Civil Law, and in 1985–87 he was dean of the Department of Law of his university. He also lectured at Harvard University in Cambridge, Massachusetts. From 1987 Mádl was a member of the HAS and later also a member of many foreign institutions dealing with international law. He was not a Communist Party member. From May 1990 to February 1993 he was minister without portfolio in the József Antall government, dealing with education, research policy, and privatization; then, until June 1994 he was minister of education and culture. In the presidential elections of June 1995 Mádl was supported by the Hungarian Democratic Forum, the Christian Democrats, and the Alliance of Young Democrats–Fidesz, but he lost to Árpád Göncz. From 1996 Mádl was chairman of the Hungarian Association of Civic Cooperation, politically close to Fidesz. On 6 June 2000 Mádl was elected president, and he continued the pro-Atlantic and pro-European policies of his predecessor. (WR)

Sources: www.cidob.org/bios/castellano/lideres/m-049.htm.

MADZHAROV Mikhail (31 January 1854, Koprivshitsa–23 January 1944, Sofia), Bulgarian politician. In 1877 Madzharov graduated from Robert College in Istanbul. From 1877 to 1879 he worked as a teacher in Pazardzhik. After Bulgaria's liberation from the Turkish yoke in 1878, he became leader of the National Party (1879) and editor of the newspaper Marica (1882–85). Madzharov served as deputy to the District Assembly, a member of the Standing Committee for Eastern Rumelia (1880–85), and director (minister) of finance in the directorate (government) of this province (1882–85). From 1880 to 1912 and from 1919 to 1920 he was a deputy to the National Assembly, and in 1911, a deputy to the Grand National Assembly, of which he was vice-president. In 1884 Madzharov became a corresponding member and subsequently a full member of the Bulgarian Literary Society (later the Bulgarian Academy of Sciences). Because of his Russophile views, Madzharov had to emigrate to Odessa and then to Istanbul. After three years he returned to Bulgaria. He worked as an attorney in Sofia and edited the periodical Bulgarska sbirka (1893) and the newspaper Mir (1894–1912). He served as minister of public housing, roads, and transportation (1894–99); minister of interior and health in the cabinet of Stoyan Danev (June 1913); and minister plenipotentiary to Great Britain (1913–14). In 1913 he signed a peace treaty in London ending the Second Balkan War. From 1914 to 1915 he was minister plenipotentiary to Russia.

Madzharov opposed Bulgaria's entering World War I on the side of Germany. After the war, he served as minister of war in the government of Teodor Teodorov (May–October 1919) and minister of foreign and religious affairs in the cabinet of Aleksandur Stamboliyski (October 1919–June 1920). From then on, Madzharov was an opponent of Stamboliyski's autocratic rule. After the 1922 congress of the Constitutional Bloc in Tŭrnovo, Madzharov was arrested and then sentenced on the grounds of being partly responsible for the national catastrophe in Bulgaria. Released after the coup of 9 June 1923, he became one of the leaders of the United National Progressive Party. A member of the opposition in 1935–44, Madzharov was against rapprochement with the Germans. Madzharov was killed during the Allied bombing of Sofia. His publications include Zashto me sŭdiat (Why they are trying me; 1923); Iztochna Rumelia (Eastern Rumelia; 1925); Poslednite godini na K. Stoilov (The last years of K. Stoilov; 1927); Od samovlastie kŭm svoboda i zakonnost (From autocratic rule to the rule of law; 1936); and Spomeni 1854–1889 (Memoirs 1854–1889; 1968). Madzharov translated War and Peace by Leo Tolstoy into Bulgarian (1889–92). (JJ)

Sources: Entsiklopediya Bulgariya, vol. 4 (Sofia, 1984); 100 godini na BAN, vol. 1 (Sofia, 1969); Tasho Tashev, Ministrite na Bulgariya 1879–1999: Entsiklopedichen spravochnik (Sofia, 1999); Georgi Milen Kumanov and Tania Nikolova, Politicheski partii, organizatsii i dvizheniia v Bulgariya i tekhnite lideri 1879–1999: Kratuk spravochnik (Sofia, 1999); Angel Tzurakov, Entsiklopediia. Pravitelstvata na Bulgariya: Khronologii na politicheskiia zhivot 1879–2001 (Sofia, 2001).

MÄE Hjalmar (24 October 1901, Kuivajõe–10 April 1978, Graz, Austria), Estonian politician, Nazi collaborator. Mäe studied in Berlin and Innsbruck. He earned a Ph.D. in philosophy in 1927 and in political science in 1930. After returning to Estonia, he joined the National Centrist Party (NCP) of Jaan Tõnisson and became a member of the municipal board in the region of Harju. Mäe was chairman of the Estonian Radio Union and served as editor-in-chief of a periodical devoted to radio. Until the end of his life he considered propaganda as the most important element in politics, even more important than military force. In 1931 Mäe left the NCP and joined the extremely rightist Estonian War of Independence Veterans' League (Eesti Vabadussõjalaste Liit [EVL]). He rose rapidly through the ranks of the EVL movement, becoming the de facto chief of its propaganda operations. He won many new members to the EVL, contributing to the support of constitutional amendments in an October 1933 referendum and to the victory of the EVL in the local elections to town councils in January 1934.

As the person in charge of the presidential campaign of General Andres Larka in 1934, Mäe made the mistake of expecting that General Johan Laidoner would be the main contender. This allowed Konstantin Päts to stay in the shadows and then, in agreement with Laidoner, to stage a coup d'état in March 1934. Briefly detained, Mäe was soon released and helped in the preparations for a coup that was to install the EVL in power. However, the plot was revealed, and Mäe was sentenced to twenty years' imprisonment in a trial of EVL leaders. Released under an amnesty of 1938, he was elected the new head of the EVL after the death of Artur Sirk. However, after the EVL was disbanded by the regime of Päts, who gradually gained wide public acceptance, Mäe retired from politics. He founded his own firm, dealing with imports from Germany. He frequently traveled to Berlin, where he established contacts with high officials of the Third Reich, including Werner Best, Heinrich Himmler's deputy. At the end of 1939, Mäe claimed German origins and repatriated to Germany; the move saved him from a massacre of EVL members that the Soviet authorities conducted from 1940 to 1941. In the spring of 1941 in Helsinki Mäe established the Estonian Liberation Committee, which aimed at the restitution of Estonian independence under German tutelage.

After the Germans occupied Estonia in June 1941, Mäe returned home as a German citizen and became general land director (General Landesdirektor), the top-ranking functionary of the Estonian self-government. Against the hopes of his former colleagues, Mäe did not revive the EVL. Without the restitution of Estonian independence and with the increasing economic exploitation of the Estonian people, the killings of Jews by the local police, and the formation of Estonian SS units, Mäe, who imitated Hitler's behavior, failed to gain wide support, and appeals to the Estonian people urging them to join the war against the Soviet Union had little effect. When the Red Army approached the borders of Estonia in 1944, Mäe declared a second war of independence, but it was only after a special radio appeal by Jüri Uluots that Estonian men began to join the army. After the war, from 1945 to 1947, Mäe was imprisoned in Austria, where he worked in local émigré organizations. He was an adviser on Soviet affairs to the governments of the Federal Republic of Germany and Austria, and he died undisturbed by anyone. (AG)

Sources: Eesti Entsüklopeedia, vol. 14 (Tallinn, 2000); Andres Kasekamp, Radical Right in Interwar Estonia (London, 1995); "Report of the Estonian International Commission for the Investigation of Crimes Against Humanity, Phase II—The German Occupation of Estonia, 1941–1944," Strona Estońskiej Międzynarodowej Komisji dla Badania Zbrodni Przeciwko Ludzkości www.historycommission.ee/temp/conclusions.htm

MĂGUREANU Virgil [originally Virgil Astaliş] (5 March 1941, Satu Mare, Transylvania), head of Romanian intelligence. During World War II Măgureanu's Romanian family name was Magyarized into Aształos. After primary school Măgureanu went to a textile trade school, where he became secretary of the local Communist youth organization. In 1964 he started studies in the Department of Philosophy at Bucharest University. During that time he got a scholarship to study in Moscow, where he was probably recruited by the KGB. During his studies he also started collaborating with the Romanian political police, Securitate, serving in its counterintelligence. After graduating, in 1969 Măgureanu started working in the Ștefan Gheorghiu Party Academy in Bucharest, adopting his mother's maiden name, Măgureanu, to avoid any suspicion of Hungarian descent. After Colonel Muammar Qaddafi took power in Libya in 1969, Măgureanu was sent there to help create a new Libyan security police. During this mission he developed close contacts with KGB officers, for which he was recalled to Romania. In the fall of 1971 he was moved to the Department of Scientific Socialism at the University of Bucharest, and in September 1972 he started working in foreign intelligence under the alias of "Captain Mihăil Mihai." In March 1973 Măgureanu retired and returned to the Ștefan Gheorghiu Party Academy, maintaining his contacts with the Securitate. In 1983 he was appointed professor. After the fall of Nicolae Ceaușescu the new post-Communist president, Ion Iliescu, appointed Măgureanu head of the Romanian Information Service, established in place of the dissolved Securitate. After the Iliescu group lost the elections in 1996, Măgureanu resigned. Soon afterwards he established the National Romanian Party (Partidu/ Național Român), which failed to win wide support. (ASK)

Sources: Bugajski; Kieron Williams and Dennis Deletant, Security Intelligence Service in New Democracies (London, 2001).

MAIORESCU Titu Liviu (15 February 1840, Craiova–2 July 1917, Bucharest) Romanian philosopher, journalist, and politician. The son of Ioan Maiorescu-Trifu, a well-known journalist and politician, Maiorescu studied at the Theresianum in Vienna (1856–58); at the universities in Berlin and Giessen; and at the Sorbonne in Paris (1858–61), earning a Ph.D. in 1861. From 1862 to 1870 he was a professor and subsequently the rector of the University of Iași. Maiorescu was the founder of modern Romanian philology, philosophy, and literary criticism. In 1863 in Iași he founded the Junimea (Youth) Society, a literary and political group that was opposed to democracy, considering it a phenomenon introduced into Romania in an artificial way. Maiorescu was also co-founder and publisher of Convorbiri Literare, the most important literary review in Romania, which first came out in 1867 in Iași and which is still published today. He was the founder of the Romanian Academy, established in 1867. He was also the first publisher of Mihai Eminescu, the greatest Romanian poet. One of the most prominent Romanian logicians, Maiorescu authored Logica (1876). From 1884 to 1901 he was a professor of logic at Bucharest University, and from 1885 to 1897 he was rector of this university. He translated German, English, and Scandinavian literature into Romanian.

Maiorescu belonged to the Conservative Party, which he represented in the Romanian parliament from 1871 onwards. From April 1874 to January 1876 he served as minister of national education; from May to July 1876, as Romanian minister to Berlin; and from 1888 to 1891, as minister of national education. From July 1900 to February 1901 he was minister of justice, and from December 1911 to March 1912, minister of foreign affairs. From 28 March 1912 to 4 January 1914 he simultaneously served as prime minister and minister of foreign affairs. In the summer of 1913, despite the reluctance of Charles I, Maiorescu decided that Romania would enter the Second Balkan War against Bulgaria, during which the Romanian troops reached the outskirts of Sofia. Maiorescu served as chairman of the Bucharest Peace Conference in August 1913, during which Romania obtained southern Dobruđa from Bulgaria. During World War I he represented a pro-German orientation, opposing Romania's entering the war on the side of the Entente. Maiorescu remained in German-occupied Bucharest, where he died. Maiorescu was the author or editor of a great number of publications, including the following: Critice (Critical pieces, 3 vols.; 1892); Discursuri parlamentare (Parliamentary speeches, 5 vols.; 1897–1915); Istoria contemporană a României 1860–1900 (Contemporary Romanian history 1860–1900; 1925); Inseminări zilnice (1855–1891)

(Diaries 1855–1891, 3 vols.; 1937–43); and Inseminări zilnice 1892–1917 (Diaries 1892–1917, 6 vols.; 1985–88). (FA/TD)

Sources: Biographisches Lexikon, vol. 3; Eugen Lovinescu, Titu Maiorescu, vols. 1–2 (Bucharest, 1936); Zigu Ornea, Junimea și junimirsul (Bucharest, 1969); Gheorghe Ivașcu, Titu Liviu Maiorescu (Bucharest, 1973); Zigu Ornea, Viata lui Titu Maiorescu, vols. 1–2 (Bucharest, 1986–87); Ion Bulei, Sistemul politic al României moderne: Partidul Conservator (Bucharest, 1987); Keith Hitchins, Rumania 1866–1947 (Oxford, 1994); Simion Ghita, Titu Maiorescu și filosofia europeana (Galați, 1995).

MAIRONIS-MAČIULIS Jonas [originally Mačiulevičius-Mačiulis] (21 October 1862, Pasandravys, Raseiniai County–28 June 1932, Kaunas), Lithuanian poet and Catholic priest. After finishing school in Kaunas, Maironis-Mačiulis began to study literature at the university in Kiev in 1883. Discouraged by the low standard of lectures and by the atmosphere among students there, he dropped his studies and entered the Kaunas Theological Seminary in 1884. After graduating, he continued his studies at the Theological Academy in St. Petersburg (1888–92), earning M.A. and Ph.D. degrees in theology. He taught moral theology at this academy from 1894 to 1909. From 1909 until his death Maironis-Mačiulis served as rector of the Kaunas Theological Seminary, where he introduced lectures in Lithuanian instead of the previously used Latin or Polish. He also supported pro-independence and cultural organizations. In 1905 he attended the Grand Lithuanian Assembly in Vilnius and was co-founder of the Christian Democratic movement. In 1922, after Lithuania gained independence, he became a professor at Kaunas University, where he taught moral theology, world literature, and Lithuanian philology. In 1932 Kaunas University granted him an honorary doctorate. Earlier he had been promoted to prelate of the Samogitian diocese and to the rank of protonotary apostolic.

Maironis-Mačiulis began his literary career while a student, when, under the tutelage of Bishop Antanas Baranauskas, he studied the classics of world literature. In 1885 in the illegally published periodical Aušra, he published his first poem, Lietuvos vargas (Lithuanian sorrow), later changed to Miškas užia (The sighs of the forest). Because in the tsarist empire all publications in Lithuanian were prohibited, Maironis-Mačiulis had to publish his works in Tilsit (then in Germany; now Sovetsk, Russia). In 1891, under the pseudonym of Stanislovas Zanavykas, he published Lietuvos istorija (The history of Lithuania). He first used the pseudonym Maironis in 1895, publishing the first collection of his poems, Pavasario balsai (Voices of spring). In his description of the Lithuanian past, he idealized the period from the thirteenth to the sixteenth centuries, emphasizing in particular the achievements of Vytautas the Great (1350–1430), grand duke of Lithuania. Maironis-Mačiulis had nothing against the lighter genres; for example, he wrote the libretto of the operetta Kame išganymas? (Where is deliverance?). In the poem Trab skausmų i garbę (Through suffering to glory; 1895), published as part of the collection Jaunoi Lietuva (Young Lithuania), he depicted the ideals of young people who devoted their lives to the national cause, overcame class antagonisms, and strove for the development of Lithuanian culture. By publishing the poem Znad Biruty (From Biruta; 1904) in Polish, Maironis-Mačiulis wanted to win the support of the Polonized nobility for the cause of Lithuanian revival. During the independence period he wrote a three-part historical drama with anti-Polish overtones: Kęstučio mirtis (The death of Kęstutis; 1921); Vytautas pas kryžiuočius (Vytautas the Great and the Teutonic knights; 1924); and Vytautas karalius (King Vytautas; 1930). During the independence period this trilogy was regularly staged on Independence Day, 16 February, in the State Theater in Kaunas.

Maironis-Mačiulis's writing greatly influenced twentieth-century Lithuanian literature. Pavasario balsai was published six times in the author's lifetime, and each successive edition included new poems; the first edition consisting of only 45 poems, while the last edition had 131 poems. Though greatly influenced by Romanticism, Maironis-Mačiulis did not yield to the conflict between emotion and reason, the two constituting a harmonious whole in his writings, leading to the victory of moral principles and heroism characteristic of patriotic poetry. He often used expressions of everyday speech. He replaced the traditional Lithuanian syllabic verse with tonic verse; as a result, his poetry became an inspiration for many composers, who wrote music to his poems. For example, his Marija, Marija became one of the most popular Lithuanian religious hymns, and Lietuva brangi (Dear Lithuania) was an unofficial national anthem during Soviet rule. After 1944 the Soviet authorities attempted to place a ban on the publication of Maironis-Mačiulis's works, but under public pressure, after 1956 his poems began to be published again. (AG)

Sources: EL, vol. 3; J. Tumas, Lietuvių literatūros pasjaitos: Jonas Mačiulis-Maironis (Kaunas, 1924); Vanda Zaborskaite, Maironis (Vilnius, 1987); Constantine R. Jurgela, Lithuania: The Outpost of Freedom (St. Petersburg, Fla., 1976); Lithuania: An Encyclopedic Survey (Vilnius, 1986); Irena Slavinskaite, Maironis (Kaunas, 1987); Romas Adomavičius, Maironio rastu bibliografija 1883–1989 (Vilnius, 1990); Saulius Sužiedelis, Historical Dictionary of Lithuania (Lanham, Md., 1997); Henryk Wisner, Litwa dzieje państwa i narodu (Warsaw, 1999).

MAISTER Rudolf (29 March 1874, Kamnik–26 July 1934, Unec, near Rakek), Slovene general and poet. Maister completed six grades of high school in Ljubljana and then went to a cadet school in Vienna. He began his military career in the Austro-Hungarian Army, becoming a lieutenant in 1885. He was stationed at Przemyśl in Galicia and in other places. During World War I, with the rank of major, Maister fought in Maribor. He worked with many Slovene politicians and also with the National Council of Styria. After the collapse of the Austro-Hungarian Empire, Maister took control of Maribor and all of Lower Styria (1 November 1918). Promoted to general, in November 1918 he established Slovene units consisting of four thousand soldiers and two hundred officers, and he brought about the disarmament of the units of the former Austro-Hungarian Army. He also occupied the Slovene outposts in Styria. On 27 November 1918 Maister signed an agreement with the local Austrian commander on the border between Styria and Carinthia. In May 1919 he commanded one of the five units that launched an offensive in Carinthia. After victory was achieved and a truce was signed, Maister assumed control of the Slovene outposts in Carinthia around St. Lenart and Ettendorf.

Under the Saint-Germain-en-Laye 1920 Treaty of southern Styria, with Maribor and a small part of Carinthia, was incorporated into the Kingdom of Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes (SHS), and the fate of southern Carinthia was to be decided by a plebiscite on 10 October 1920. Maister was elected honorary president of the National Council of Carinthia but failed to win the support of the Carinthian people for the SHS: 59 percent of the votes were in favor of the area becoming part of Austria. As a result, according to the decision of the plebiscite committee, Maister and his subordinates left Carinthia on 19 September 1919. He became the governor of Maribor and from 1921 to 1923 served as chairman of a commission in charge of demarcating the border with Italy. After retiring in 1923, Maister wrote several articles that were published in Boj za Maribor 1918–1919: Spominski zbornik ob sedemdesetletnici bojev za Maribor (Battle for Maribor 1918–1919: A collection of memoirs on the seventieth anniversary of the struggle for Maribor; 1988). Maister made his debut as a poet in the periodical Vrtec in 1890. He later published several collections of poems, including Poezije (Poetry; 1904). Monuments honoring Maister were built in his native Kamnik, as well as in Maribor (1987) and Ljubljana (1999). His portrait can be seen on Slovene banknotes. (AO)

Sources: Enciklopedija Slovenije, vol. 6 (Ljubljana, 1992); Enciklopedija Jugoslavije, vol. 5 (Zagreb, 1962); B. Hartman, Rudolf Maister (Ljubljana, 1989); Arnold Suppan, ed., Deutsche Geschichte in Osten Europas: Zwischen Adria und Karawanken (Berlin, 1998).

MAJER Václav (22 January 1904, Pochválov, near Rakovník–26 January 1972, College Park, Maryland), Czech

Social Democratic politician. A miner by trade, in 1935–38 Majer was head of the Union of Lease and Smallholders connected with the Social Democratic Party. After the Pact of Munich, in the fall of 1938 he tried in vain to establish the National Labor Party (Národní Strana Práce) in opposition to the Party of National Unity (Strana Národní Jednoty). At the beginning of the Nazi occupation Majer worked in the underground, but threatened with arrest, he fled through Hungary and Yugoslavia to France in 1940. He joined a Czechoslovak military unit there, but after the collapse of France, he moved to Great Britain. From 1942 to 1945 Majer belonged to the Czechoslovak State Council (Státní Rada Československa) and in 1944–45 was minister of industry, trade, and handicrafts in the government-in-exile. In March 1945 he took part in Moscow talks that led to the creation of a coalition government, which included the Communists. After World War II Majer was a member of the National Assembly and minister of supplies. He belonged to the top leadership of the Social Democratic Party, where he represented the right wing, opposing the Communists. During a coup in February 1948 he protested the Communist activities and stepped down on 25 February, the sole minister from his party to do so. He demanded that other Social Democratic ministers do the same, but he was outvoted by the party's left wing, headed by Zdenek Fierlinger, and center, headed by Bohumil Laušman. Majer left for Great Britain, where he presided over the Czech Social Democracy in exile. Later he emigrated to the United States, where he was active in the Council of Free Czechoslovakia, the Assembly of Captive European Nations, and the Socialist International. Majer published a lot and worked with Radio Free Europe and the Voice of America. (PU)

Sources: ČBS; Českoslovenští politici: 1918–1991 (Prague, 1991); Kdo byl kdo v našich dějinách ve 20. století, vol. 1 (Prague, 1998); Karel Kaplan, The Short March: The Communist Takeover in Czechoslovakia, 1945–948 (London, 1981); John O. Crane and Sylvia Crane, Czechoslovakia: Anvil of the Cold War (New York, 1982).

MAKHNO Nestor (27 October 1889, Gulay Pole, near Yekaterinoslav–25 July 1934, Paris), anarchist, leader of the Ukrainian peasant guerrillas. Makhno was born into a poor peasant family. Deprived of his father at an early age, from his youth he worked as a farm laborer. In 1906 he joined an anarchist circle. Makhno was sentenced to life imprisonment for his participation in the assassination of a local police officer. He served the sentence in Butyrki Prison in Moscow, where he met the anarchist Piotr Arshynov, who gave him a thorough introduction to philosophy and the tactics of anarchism.

Released under an amnesty after the February 1917 revolution, Makhno returned to his home village and organized a council of delegates there. In August 1917 he formed an armed band that plundered the neighboring gentry and gave away land to the poor peasants. Makhno's cruelties soon earned him the reputation of a new Stepan (Stenka) Razin. During the occupation of the Ukraine by the Central Powers Makhno remained in hiding and then went to Moscow, where he met his idol, Piotr Kropotkin, as well as Vladimir Lenin. After his return to Gulay Pole in the fall of 1918, Makhno became active again, this time against the Austrians and the supporters of Hetman Pavlo Skoropadskyi. Makhno's detachments, having strong support in the countryside and becoming increasingly better organized, could carry out activities on a large scale. During an encirclement they hid among apparently quietly working peasants, only to start an attack at the least expected moment. Makhno was a commander with unusual instincts, an iron will, and a sense of humor that won him authority and commanded obedience among his subordinates. After the fall of the hetman's government, Makhno's troops took a stand against the Directory of the Ukrainian People's Republic. In the first half of 1919 the territory around Gulay Pole was virtually independent. Realizing here the anarchist experiment, Makhno based his rule upon provisional rallies, as well as congresses of peasant and partisan delegates. Public education was introduced that was Ukrainian in character. This petty statehood was based upon agrarian communes and perfectly organized military troops, which Makhno kept in an iron grip. The local Jews played quite an important role in this anarchic structure since Makhno strove against anti-Semitism.

In January 1919 Makhno signed an alliance with the Bolsheviks against the army of General Anton Denikin. The Ukrainian insurgency under Makhno's command was incorporated into the Red Army, preserving only the customary black banner. Along with the Bolsheviks Makhno occupied Kharkiv. After the first Bolshevik attempt to gain control over his movement, in May 1919 Makhno broke off the alliance and ordered the execution of two Cheka agents who had come to kill him. In June 1919 the Red Army captured the Rosa Luxemburg Memorial Commune in Gulay Pole, and soon after Denikin's armed forces completed its destruction. Makhno's detachments withdrew and in the summer of 1919 resumed cooperation with the Bolsheviks against Denikin. In October and November 1919 Makhno occupied Yekaterinoslav and Alexandrovsk and introduced the principles of anarchism into the municipal organizations. This ended with a wave of atrocities. At the end of 1919 Makhno was ordered by the command of the Red Army to move westward to the Polish front, but he refused to comply with the orders as he did not want to leave his home area. In October 1920 the Bolsheviks again made an agreement with Makhno, offering amnesty for all anarchists and freedom for anarchist propaganda in exchange for help against General Peter Wrangel's army. Makhno rebuilt the communes of Gulay Pole and took part, along with the Bolsheviks, in the Crimean offensive. The Red Army, after defeating Wrangel's army, attacked Makhno's troops. On 25 November 1920 the Bolsheviks destroyed his forces in the Crimea. The next day Leon Trotsky ordered the final attack at Gulay Pole. The Bolsheviks captured the staff and a great number of Makhno's soldiers and then murdered most of them.

Makhno escaped the roundup and in August 1921 fled to Romania. After nearly one year of wayfaring through Romania and Poland and after a stay in Gdańsk and Berlin, he reached Paris, where he spent the last years of his life in misery. He worked in a car factory, but most of the time he drank. In 1929–37 three volumes of his memoirs, Russkaia revoliutsiia na Ukraine (The Russian revolution in the Ukraine), appeared in Paris. Makhno died of tuberculosis. In the 1970s his activities gained considerable popularity among the New Left, and in 1992 his memoirs were published in Moscow. (WR) Sources: MERSH, vol. 21; Joseph Kassel, Makhno et sa juive (Paris, 1925); David Footman, Makhnovshchina (Oxford, 1956); Victor Peters, Nestor Makhno (Winnipeg, 1970); Michael Palij, The Anarchism of Nestor Makhno, 1918–1921 (Seattle, 1977); Die Machno-Bewegung: Texte und Dokumente (Berlin, 1980); Yves Ternon, Makhno: La révolte anarchiste (Brussels, 1981); Valerii Volkovinskii, Makhni i ieho krakh (Kiev, 1991); W. F. Verstiuk, Makhnovshchina: Seliansky povstanskyi rukh na Ukraini (Kiev, 1991); Rostyslav Sambuk, Makhno: Ostannia pravda (Kiev, 1997).

MAKOVECZ Imre (20 November 1935, Budapest), Hungarian architect. Makovecz graduated from the Budapest Polytechnic College in 1959. In the 1960s and 1970s he worked as an architect in small towns. From 1981 he headed a design cooperative, Makona, simultaneously lecturing at the Budapest Polytechnic College and at the Central School of Industrial Design. From 1992 Makovecz was president of the Hungarian Academy of Fine Arts, and from 2000, deputy chairman of the Hungarian Chamber of Architecture. Makovecz is a chief representative of "organic architecture." He designed more than a hundred buildings of various types, combining the typical features of Hungarian national style with functionalism in an original way. He frequently used religious and plant motifs, as well as treatments that violated the traditional concept of symmetry. From the end of the 1980s Makovecz actively participated in public life, using his authority as an intellectual to support Christian Democratic and conservative initiatives. He exhibited numerous times in Europe and the United States. His major achievements include the following: the House of Culture in Sárospatak (1983); a church in Paks (1988); the Catholic University in Piliscsaba (1992–95); and the Hungarian pavilion at the World Exhibition in Seville (1992). Makovecz is the co-author (with Janós Gerle) of A századforduló magyar építészet (Hungarian Architecture at the turn of the century; 1990). (MS)

Sources: Attila Komjáthy, Makovecz Imre (Budapest, 1977); János Frank, Makovecz Imre (Budapest, 1980); Jeffrey Cook, Seeking Structure from Nature: The Organic Architecture of Hungary (Basel and Boston, 1996); Magyar Nagylexikon (Budapest, 2000).

MAKOWSKI Waclaw (15 November 1880, Wilno [Vilnius]–28 December 1942, Bucharest), Polish politician and lawyer. Makowski was born into an intelligentsia family tracing its origins to the landed gentry. He attended high school in Vilnius. In 1902 he completed law studies at Warsaw University and graduated in philosophy from the Jagiellonian University in Kraków and from the university in Lemberg (Lwów, Lviv). While a law student, Makowski was active in a secret Socialist pro-independence organization called Spójnia, and he published in underground leftist periodicals, including Głos, Ogniwo, and Spoleczeństwo. He also published two progressive and moralistic novels. From 1901 to 1906 the tsarist police arrested him twice for political reasons. Makowski was active in the Association of Public Defenders (1905–7) and pursued scholarly work, studying summary law and the sociology of law. He published articles in Ateneum and Gazeta Sądowa Warszawska. In 1911 he published Zbrodnie, kary i sądy wyjątkowe (Crime, punishment, and special courts). After the outbreak of World War I and the German occupation of Warsaw in 1915, Makowski supported the so called, activists who favored the Central Powers and established local government institutions in Warsaw, including the judicial system and the home guard. He supported Józef Piłsudski. In July 1916 he became a member of the Warsaw City Council and then was appointed deputy director of the Justice Department in the Provisional Council of State and justice minister in the government of the Regency Council (February–April 1918).

During the Polish-Soviet war Makowski served in the Polish Army. After being transferred to the reserves in 1922, he was promoted to colonel. The minister of justice in successive governments from June 1922 until May 1923, Makowski played an active role in standardizing Polish legislation. For example, he was a co-author of the penal code. A lecturer, professor, and dean of the Department of Law of Warsaw University, after the coup of May 1926 he again became minister of justice (May–September 1926) and was instrumental in the introduction of constitutional amendments (August 1926). In 1928 Makowski became an MP on behalf of the pro-government Labor Party and later as a representative of the Nonparty Bloc of Cooperation with the Government (Bezpartyjny Blok Współpracy z Rządem). He increasingly embraced corporatist and authoritarian ideas. He published a number of treatises on constitutional law, including Na drodze do reformy konstytucyjnej (On the way to constitutional reform; 1928). In a similar spirit he edited the quarterly Nowe Państwo. Makowski was active in the international arena, speaking in favor of Poland's right to access to the sea. In 1933 he co-authored (with Georges Cruzen and Andre Tibal) La question de Dantzig. Makowski was one of the authors of the Polish constitution of April 1935. From 1935 on he sat in the Senate. In 1938, elected on the government ticket of the Camp of National Unity (Obóz Zjednoczenia Narodowego), Makowski became Senate speaker. After the last session of parliament on 2 September 1939, he escaped to the south of Poland and later to Romania, where he was interned along with the authorities of the Republic of Poland. The new Polish authorities in France considered Makowski an important person of the former sanacja regime, and they prevented him from going to the West. (MC)

Sources: PSB, vol. 19; Władysław Pobóg-Malinowski, Najnowsza historia polityczna Polski, vols. 1–3 (London, 1983–86); Władysław T. Kulesza, Koncepcje ideowo-polityczne obozu rządzącego w Polsce w latach 1926–1935 (Wrocław, 1985); Kto był kim w Drugiej Rzeczypospolitej (Warsaw, 1994).

MALANCHUK Valentyn (13 November 1928, Ploskirov–25 April 1984, Kiev), Soviet party activist and historian of Ukrainian origin. After graduating from Lviv University in 1950, Malanchuk worked in the Lviv district committee of the Komsomol from 1950 to 1952 and in the Lviv district committee of the Communist Party of Ukraine (Komunistychna Partiya Ukrainy [CPU]) from 1952 to 1967. While working in Lviv, Malanchuk showed a particular zeal in suppressing “Ukrainian bourgeois nationalists,” which led to numerous conflicts with the cultural intelligentsia. In order to end these conflicts, Petro Shelest decided to transfer Malanchuk to Kiev. In 1967 Malanchuk became deputy minister of higher education, and in 1968 he became a professor at Kiev University. In 1972 he was appointed secretary for ideology of the Central Committee (CC) of the CPU and held the post until April 1979. From 1972 to 1981 he served as a deputy member of the CPU CC Politburo. Malanchuk's time in office in the CPU CC coincided with the greatest wave of anti-Ukrainian persecutions after World War II. An advocate of accelerated Russification and Sovietization of the Ukraine, he supported these persecutions. When more liberal policies toward the intelligentsia were introduced, Malanchuk left his post, becoming head of the department of CPSU history at Kiev Polytechnic. Malanchuk wrote numerous ideological articles on the history of the Communist movement in the Western Ukraine, as well as the books Istoriia Komsomolu Zakhidn'oi Ukraïny (The history of the Komsomol in the Western Ukraine; 1959) and Radians'ka natsionalna polityka (Soviet ethnic policies; 1963). (BB)

Sources: Who's Who in the Socialist Countries of Europe (Munich, London, and Paris, 1978); Oleh Bazhan, "Mene nazyvaiut' suchasnym Kochubeiem . . ." Literaturna Ukraïna, 2 December 1993; Jarosław Hrycak, Historia Ukrainy 1772–1999 (Lublin, 2000).

MALANIUK Yevhen (20 January 1897, Kherson–16 January 1968, New York), Ukrainian poet and politician. In 1917 Malaniuk became an officer in the army of the Ukrainian National Republic (UNR). After this army was defeated, he was interned by the Polish authorities in Kalisz. He subsequently went to Czechoslovakia and completed studies at the Academy of Agriculture in Poděbrady (1923). Malaniuk lived in Czechoslovakia until the end of World War II, and then he made his way via Germany to the United States. His publications include Hebriy (Herbarium; 1926); Zemlia i zalizo (Earth and iron; 1930); Zemna madonna (Earthly madonna; 1934); Persten Polikrata (The ring of Polycrates; 1939); Vlada (Power; 1951); and Ostannia vesna (The last spring; 1954). In 1953 Malaniuk published a longer poem, Piata symfoniia (Fifth symphony), and the collections of essays Narysy z istorii nashoi kultury (An outline of the history of our culture; 1954), Do problemy bo'shevyzmu (1956; On Bolshevism; 1956), and Knyha sposterezhen (Book of observations; 1962). Malaniuk was one of the contributors to Vistnyk, a periodical under the editorship of Dmytro Dontsov. He exerted great influence on the culture of the Ukrainian diaspora, but in the Ukrainian SSR he was attacked as a "Fascist" writer. Malaniuk's passionate style and the themes of his poems reflect his frustration over the failure of the Ukrainian struggle for independence and with the Ukrainian tragedy under Communist rule. (WR) Sources: Encyclopedia of Ukraine, vol. 3 (Toronto, 1993); Ann Lencyk Pawliczko, Ukraine and Ukrainians throughout the World (Toronto, 1994).

MALĚSHOVA Sejfulla (1900, MalĚshovë–9 June 1971, Fier), Albanian Communist activist, poet, and journalist. MalĚshova finished primary school in Vlorë and graduated from San Demetrio Corone High School in Cosenza, Italy. For a few years he studied medicine in Italy. In 1923 he returned to Albania and became a member of a youth organization called Bashkimi (Union). During the 1924 revolution MalĚshova was the personal secretary of Fan Noli. After the failure of the revolution, he went to Vienna and joined the leftist National Revolutionary Committee (Komiteti Nacional Revolucionar [KONARE]), founded in 1925. The KONARE appointed MalĚshova to a fourteen-member youth group sent him for training to Moscow and Leningrad. In Leningrad he graduated from a military school and translated The Communist Manifesto into Albanian. After leaving Moscow, MalĚshova settled in France, where in 1938, on the orders of the Comintern, he attempted to murder Llazar Fundo, a Communist activist who was aligned with Trotsky. In 1942 MalĚshova returned to Albania. In July 1943 he was appointed to the General Staff of the National Liberation Army. He rose quickly through the ranks of the Communist Party of Albania (CPA), becoming a member of its Central Committee (CC) in 1944 and then a member of the CC Politburo. He was also made secretary of the National Liberation Front.

Among the party leaders, MalĚshova had the best knowledge of Marxist-Leninist theory. As a result, he was appointed to many responsible positions. Working in the spirit of Stalinist orthodoxy, he directed the department of press and propaganda, served as head of the central bank, and also helped to establish the Albanian Writers' Union and the first post-1944 sports clubs. In 1946 he served briefly as minister of education. On his initiative, translations of Soviet texts glorifying Lenin and the Stakhanovite movement were introduced into the schools. Nevertheless, MalĚshova was one of the few party leaders who called for maintaining relations with the West and opposed overly close cooperation with Yugoslavia. In December 1945 the party leaders began to accuse MalĚshova of "rightist deviation" and opportunism, and in February 1946 he was expelled from the Politburo and from the CC of the party. Enver Hoxha publicly labeled him a "lackey of the bourgeoisie" and a proponent of the abolition of the Communist Party. On the orders of Koçi Xoxe, MalĚshova was arrested for opposing cooperation with Yugoslavia. Released after the fall of Xoxe in 1948, he spent the rest of his life in isolation, first working as a clerk in Berat and then in Fier, where he was banned from talking to local people. MalĚshova died of appendicitis as a result of the lack of proper medical care. MalĚshova first published his works in the 1930s under the pseudonym "Lame Kodra"

(Red Poet). In 1945 a collection of his poetry, Vjersha (Poems), was published in Tirana. (TC)

Sources: Lazitch; Bashkimi, 14 November 1945; Edmund Davies, Ilyrian Venture: The Story of the British Military Mission in Enemy-Occupied Albania (London, 1952); William E. Griffith, Albania and the Sino-Soviet Rift (Cambridge, Mass., 1963); Sejfi Vllamasi, Balafaqime politike në Shqipëri (1897–1942) (Tirana, 1995).

MALÉTER Pál (4 September 1917, Eperjes [now Slovakia]–16 June 1958, Budapest), Hungarian general. Born into an intellectual family, after graduating from high school, Maléter was a student at the Medical Academy in Prague. He continued his medical studies in Budapest, but because of financial problems he could not finish his studies. He volunteered for the military in order to obtain Hungarian citizenship. In the fall of 1940 he was admitted to the Ludovika Military Academy in Budapest. After graduating from the academy, Maléter served in Kassa (now Košice, Slovakia), and then in 1944 he was sent to the eastern front, where he was taken captive. In captivity he volunteered to fight against the Germans. After completing a guerrilla training school, in the fall of 1944 Maléter, along with his unit, found himself in Transylvania. In January 1945 he became commander of a battalion that was created to defend the Provisional National Government, and from the spring of that year he commanded the battalion protecting the Ministry of National Defense. Until the outbreak of the revolution of 1956 Maléter served in lower-level positions in the people's army before attaining the rank of colonel.

On 25 October 1956, on the orders of the head of the general headquarters, Maléter, accompanied by the students of the Military Academy and equipped with five tanks, set off to help one of his units, which was located in the Kilián Barracks. As only one tank managed to get to the barracks, Maléter, with the consent of his superiors, concluded a cease-fire agreement with the insurgent units fighting in that district. On 27 and 28 October, after the end of the cease-fire agreement, Maléter, along with his soldiers, took control of the buildings surrounding the barracks. Having received the information that the government of Imre Nagy had ordered a cease-fire, Maléter complied with the government order. Maléter took part in cease-fire talks in Corvin Alley (Corvin Köz), where the biggest insurgent group was located. At Nagy's invitation Maléter participated in talks that were held in the parliament with the delegates of the workers' councils, and on 31 October he took part in a conference on the creation of the National Guard. The same day Nagy appointed him first deputy minister of national defense, and on 3 November, minister with the rank of major general. The same day

Maléter took part in negotiations conducted with the Soviet command in the parliament. In the evening Maléter, heading the Hungarian delegation, went for further talks to the headquarters of the Soviet troops in Tököl, near Budapest, where he was arrested along with all the other members of the delegation on the orders of the KGB head, General Ivan Sierov, who was present. On 15 June 1958, in a secret trial of Nagy and his associates, the People's Judicial Council of the Supreme Court charged Maléter with treason against the homeland, rebellion, and also with the fact that as a military leader of the insurrection, he had initiated and led the uprising. He was sentenced to death, without the right of appeal. Maléter did not plead for clemency, and until the end he believed in the ideas of the uprising. The day after the sentence was pronounced he was executed. (JT)

Sources: Horváth Miklós, Maléter Pál: 1956-os Intézet-Osiris-Századvég (Budapest, 1995); 1956 kézikönyve, vol. 3: (Megtorlás és Emlékezés) (Budapest, 1996); A magyar forradalom és szabadságharc enciklopédiája, CD-ROM (Budapest, 1999).

MALINOV Aleksandur (21 April 1867, Pandykli, Bessarabia–20 March 1938, Sofia), Bulgarian politician. The son of a merchant, Malinov graduated from a high school in Belgrade and in law studies in Kiev. After returning to Bulgaria, he worked as a judge, public prosecutor, and defense attorney (1891–1902). One of the leaders of the Democratic Party, Malinov took the helm of this party in 1903 and held the top position until the end of his life. In 1903 Malinov was appointed president of the Tribunal of State, which sentenced former ministers Todor Ivanchov, Dimitur Tonchev, and Vasil Radoslavov to eight month's imprisonments for violating the constitution, embezzlement, and damage caused by their rule. Malinov served as deputy to the National Assembly (1901, 1908–34) and chairman of the Grand National Assembly in 1911. After the collapse of the government of Stoyan Danev (6 May 1903), he did not accept the proposal of Prince Ferdinand I to establish a new government. Under Malinov's leadership, the Democratic Party joined the Patriotic Bloc (1907–8), and on 16 January 1908 he became the head of a one-party government, serving also as minister of public housing, roads, and transportation (January 1908–November 1910) and minister of foreign and religious affairs (November 1910–March 1911). As prime minister, Malinov contributed to the establishment of the university in Sofia; took part in the preparations for and the proclamation of Bulgaria's independence as a kingdom (22 September 1908); and helped to draft amendments to the Turnovo Constitution and to consolidate the position of Tsar Ferdinand in Bulgaria. Malinov resigned on 16 March 1911.

Known for his pro-Western and pro-Russian sympathies, in September 1915 Malinov did not support Ferdinand's decision that Bulgaria enter World War I on the side of the Central Powers, and he called for neutrality. In the face of a deteriorating situation on the front and shortages of supplies in the cities, on 21 June 1918 Ferdinand appointed Malinov head of a coalition cabinet formed by the Democratic Party and the Radical Democratic Party. Until October he also served as minister of foreign and religious affairs and subsequently as minister of justice. In August Malinov warned the tsar and the German command about the military situation, but to no effect. After the collapse of the Macedonian front in mid-September, Malinov put down a military uprising in Radomir (27 September) and signed the armistice with the Entente in Salonika (29 September). Tsar Ferdinand had to abdicate, and Bulgaria was occupied by French, English, and Italian troops. In order to contain social unrest, in October Malinov introduced the moderate Socialists and the Bulgarian Agrarian National Union (BANU), led by Aleksandur Stamboliyski, into the governing coalition. However, on 28 November he resigned in protest against the Entente's decision to hand over southern Dobruja to Romania.

Under the rule of Stamboliyski (1919–23), Malinov played a leadership role in the establishment of the Constitutional Bloc (1922) and took part in an anti-government action organized by this bloc in Turnovo, for which he was arrested and imprisoned in Shumen. In March 1923 he was put on trial as one of those who had brought about the “national catastrophe” in Bulgaria, but he was released after the coup of 9 June 1923. In August 1923 he helped to establish the Democratic Alliance but left it at the beginning of 1924 and joined the opposition. At the end of May 1931 Malinov co-founded the National Bloc, which won the parliamentary elections in June. From 29 June to 12 October 1931 he served as prime minister and minister of foreign and religious affairs for the third time. As president of the National Assembly, he became the godfather of Princess Maria Luisa. After the coup of 9 May 1934 he again joined the opposition. Malinov died during an election campaign meeting in Sofia; he was a candidate of the democratic opposition. His publications include Pod znaka na ostrasteni i opasni politicheski borbi (Amid ardent and dangerous political struggle; 1934) and Stranichki ot nashata nova politicheska istoriia. Spomeni (Pages from our recent political history; 1938). (JJ)

Sources: Entsiklopediya Bulgariya, vol. 4 (Sofia, 1984); Biographisches Lexikon, vol. 3; John D. Bell, Peasants in Power: Alexander Stamboliski and the Bulgarian Agrarian National Union 1899–1923 (Princeton, 1977); Milen Kumanov, Aleksandur Malinov: Poznatiyat i nepoznatiyat (Sofia, 1993); A. Pantev and B.

Gavrilov, 100-te nai-vliiatelni bulgari v nashata istoriia (Sofia, 1997); Raymond Detrez, Historical Dictionary of Bulgaria (Lanham, Md., 1997); Tasho Tashev, Ministrte na Bulgariya 1879–1999: Entsiklopedichen spravochnik (Sofia, 1999); Bulgarski durzhavnitsi i polititsi 1918–1947 (Sofia, 2000).

MALINOWSKI Bronisław (7 April 1884, Kraków–16 May 1942, New Haven, Connecticut), Polish anthropologist and sociologist. After graduating from a high school in Kraków, Malinowski studied mathematics, physics, and the history of philosophy at the Jagiellonian University (1902–6), earning a Ph.D. in philosophy (1908) there. In 1909 he continued his studies in Berlin, and in 1910 he went to the London School of Economics, where, influenced by James Frazer, A. C. Haddon, and W. H. R. Rivers, he developed his own anthropological studies. From 1913 Malinowski lectured at the London School of Economics and also traveled extensively, conducting field studies. From 1914 to 1918 he was based in Melbourne and studied the peoples of New Guinea and the Trobriand Islands. The results of these studies, published in Argonauts of the Western Pacific (1922), Crime and Custom in Savage Society (1926), The Sexual Life of Savages in North-Western Melanesia (1929), and Coral Gardens and Their Magic (1935), brought him international fame. In 1927 Malinowski was appointed to the chair of anthropology at the University of London. In 1934 he conducted studies in southern and eastern Africa, and in 1940–41, among the Zapotecs in Mexico. In 1936 he received an honorary doctorate from Harvard University. In 1938 he went to the United States, where he obtained a professorship at Yale University the following year. As a member of the Polish Academy of Arts and Sciences (Polska Akademia Umiejetności), Malinowski maintained close ties with Poland. Apart from Oskar Halecki and Jan Kucharczyński, he was one of the main founders of the Polish Institute of Arts and Sciences (Polski Instytut Naukowy) in America, serving as its first chairman from 1940 to 1942.

Malinowski's major theoretical works were published posthumously. These are A Scientific Theory of Culture and Other Essays (1944), The Dynamics of Culture Change (1945), Freedom and Civilization (1947), and Magic, Science and Religion (1948). Malinowski advocated that anthropological studies be based on a solid empirical foundation and that hypotheses be verified by the investigation of human activities. He believed that culture distinguished man from other creatures. He considered economy, family and upbringing, the political system, law, magic, religion, art, knowledge, and recreation as the main structural elements of culture. In his functionalist theory of cultural change Malinowski distinguished between endogenous elements (spontaneous evolution) and exogenous ones

(external influences). He stressed the role of the clashes of cultures and changes as the disturbance of an existing culture balance. Malinowski's academic output is being published in Poland in his Dzieła (Works); seven volumes have already come out (1980–90). In 2002 his Dzienniki (Diaries) were published. (WR)

Sources: International Encyclopedia of the Social Sciences, vol. 9 (London, 1968); Polacy w historii i kulturze krajów Europy Zachodniej: Słownik biograficzny (Poznań, 1981); Uczni polscy XIX iXX stulecia, vol. 3 (Warsaw, 1997); Raymond Firth, ed., Man and Culture: An Evaluation of the Work of Bronislaw Malinowski (London, 1957); Andrzej K. Paluch, Malinowski (Warsaw, 1981); Mariola Flis and Andrzej K. Paluch, eds., Antropologia społeczna Bronisława Malinowskiego (Warsaw, 1985); Ernst Gellner, Language and Solitude (Cambridge, 1989); Krzysztof Dybciak and Zdzisław Kudelski, eds., Leksykon kultury polskiej poza krajem od roku 1939 (Lublin, 2000).

MALINOWSKI Roman (26 February 1935, Białystok), Polish Peasant Party activist. Born into a family of peasants and workers, in 1956 Malinowski graduated from the Central School of Planning and Statistics in Warsaw. From 1956 he belonged to the United Peasant Party (Zjednoczone Stronnictwo Ludowe [ZSL]), and he advanced in both the party, which was fully controlled by the Communists, and the state administration. In 1956–57 Malinowski was a member of the Chief Administration of the Association of Peasant Mutual Aid, from 1958 to 1963 he worked in the Central Association of Savings and Loan Cooperatives, and in 1969–71 he was deputy chairman of the Central Board of Dairy Cooperatives. From 1971 to 1973 he was deputy chairman of the Provincial National Council in Łódź, and from December 1973 to May 1975 he was the governor (wojewoda) of Łódź. From 1976 to 1989 he was a deputy to the parliament (Sejm), and from April 1980 to November 1985 he was deputy prime minister. The minister of the food industry and the state purchasing system from April to October 1980, from 1987 to 1991 he presided over the National Council of Polish-Soviet Friendship.

From November 1981 to September 1989 Malinowski was the ZSL chairman. He supported the introduction of martial law in December 1981. From 1983 to 1989 he belonged to the National Council of the facade organization, the Patriotic Movement of National Renaissance, and from 1985 to 1989 he was the speaker of the Sejm. Active abroad, Malinowski tried to overcome the international isolation of the Polish Communist authorities, paying visits to Italy and the Holy See (October 1984), Finland, Austria, Germany, and the United States (May–June 1987). A participant of the Round Table Talks, after the Communist defeat in the June 1989 elections and the failure of an attempt by General Czesław Kiszczak to create a new government, Malinowski entered into a new coalition. Lech Wałęsa's initiative of 7 August 1989, aimed at the creation of a coalition of former Communist satellites—the ZSL and the Democratic Party (Stronnictwo Demokratyczne [SD])—and the opposition Civic Parliamentary Caucus, gained the support of Malinowski and the SD leadership. The new coalition came into being on 17 August 1989, and Tadeusz Mazowiecki soon emerged as the first non-Communist head of the Polish government since World War II. Malinowski authored the memoirs Wielka koalicja. Kulisy (The great coalition: Behind the scenes; 1992). From 1989 Malinowski belonged to the Polish Peasant Party–Renaissance and then to the Polish Peasant Party (Polskie Stronnictwo Ludowe). (PK)

Sources: Mołdawa; Słownik polityków polskich XX w.; Michał Czajka, Marcin Kamler and Witold Sienkiewicz, Leksykon historii Polski (Warsaw, 1995); Jan Skórzyński, Ugoda i rewolucja: Władza i opozycja 1985–1989 (Warsaw, 1995).

MALY Václav (21 September 1950, Prague), Czech bishop. The son of a teacher, Maly's decision to enter a theological seminar in Litoměřice cost his father his job. In June 1976 he was ordained, and for two years he worked as a vicar. After signing Charter 77, Maly lost the permission of the Communist authorities to minister. Despite the administrative ban he performed his duties secretly; for this he was imprisoned from May to December 1979. In 1980–89 Maly worked in the underground Catholic Church, employed as a geodesist, stoker, and toilet cleaner. In 1981 he became a Charter 77 spokesman. From 1978 he was a member of the Committee for the Defense of the Unjustly Prosecuted (Výbor na Obranu Nespravedlivě Stíhaných [VONS]); later he was also a member of Polish-Czechoslovak Solidarity, and from 1988 he was a member of the Czech Helsinki Committee. Maly lectured at the secret Czech "Flying University." Frequently harassed by the political police, he became a popular personality in November 1989, when he led a demonstration of the Civic Forum on Letenské Sady in Prague. He encouraged its participants to say the Lord's Prayer, which was prohibited by the Communists outside of sacral buildings. The first spokesman of the Civic Forum, in January 1990 Maly returned to the ministry in St. Gabriel Parish in Prague Smichov, and in 1991–96 he worked in St. Anthony Parish in Prague Holešovice. He was also the first chairman of the Czech Catholic Charity (Česka Katolická Charita). He accompanied many dissidents in their peregrinations of the soul. A close friend of Václav Havel, Maly was the chairman of the Organization Committee for the pilgrimage of Pope John Paul II to the Czech Republic in 1997.

Appointed auxiliary bishop of Prague on 8 December 1997, Maly was consecrated by Cardinal Miloslav Vlk on 11 January 1998. (AGr)

Sources: Kdo byl kdo w našich dějinách ve 20. století (Prague, 1994); Information service of the (Polish) Catholic Information Agency, 8 December 1997 and 11 January 1998; www.totalita.cz; www.catholic-hierarchy.org.

MALYPETR Jan (21 December 1873, Klobouky–27 September 1947, Slaný), Czech Agrarian Party politician. After graduating from the Agricultural College in Kadani, Malypetr ran his family farm in Klobouki. From 1899 he was active in the Agrarian Party, and a year later he was elected to the local government. In 1906 he became a member of the Executive Committee of the party, in 1911 he was made starost (local representative of the authorities) in Klobouki, and in 1914 he was made district starost in Slaný. Malypetr became known as an efficient organizer; he was (among other things) a co-founder of the Union of Central Czech Power Plants. After World War I Malypetr became one of the leaders of the Agrarian Party (as of 1922, the Republican Party of Peasants and Smallholders), and during the First Republic he sat in the parliament. In 1922–25 he was minister of interior in the government of Antonín Švehla, contributing to political stabilization in Slovakia and Subcarpathian Ruthenia. After the elections of 1925 and the fall of Švehla's cabinet, Malypetr became speaker of the parliament, and he held the post until 1932. After the resignation of the government of František Udržal in October 1932, President Tomáš Garrigue Masaryk assigned Malypetr the task of forming a cabinet. Malypetr assumed the post of prime minister on 29 October 1932, at the time of the Great Depression and mounting problems in domestic policy connected with the resignation of the National Democrats from the government. Malypetr tried to save the situation by establishing tighter state controls over the economy. The parliament passed the necessary laws on 9 June 1933. Malypetr held the post of prime minister in the three subsequent cabinets, until 5 November 1935. In 1935–39 he was again speaker of the parliament. At the time of the Munich crisis in 1938, Malypetr advocated concessions toward Hitler. During the occupation he maintained a conciliatory attitude toward the Germans. In 1946 Malypetr was brought before the National Court and was charged with collaboration, but the court cleared him of the accusations. (PU)

Sources: ČBS; Kto bol kto za I.ČSR (Bratislava, 1993); Kdo byl kdo v našich dějinách ve 20. století, vol. 1 (Prague, 1998); Politická elita meziválečného Československa 1918–1938: Kdo byl kdo za první republiky (Prague, 1998).

MANDIĆ Ante (2 June 1881, Trieste–15 November 1959, Lovran), Croatian lawyer and politician. After studying law in Vienna and Graz, Mandić worked as an attorney in Trieste and Abbazia (now Opatija, Croatia). During World War I he was in Russia, where in 1915 he helped to establish the Yugoslav Committee (Jugoslavenski Odbor), which was involved in various activities, such as recruiting Croatian prisoners of war to a volunteer legion in Odessa. In September 1917 Mandić became head of the London-based Bureau of the Yugoslav Committee. After returning to his country in 1919, he worked with the Adriatic Committee and the Yugoslav-Czechoslovak League. From 1921 to 1937 he worked in Opatija and then in Belgrade. After the collapse and partition of Yugoslavia in April 1941, Mandić again went to Opatija. In 1943 he moved to the territories controlled by Josip Broz Tito's partisans. In November 1943 he attended the Second Congress of the Anti-Fascist Council for the National Liberation of Yugoslavia (Antifašističko Veće Narodnog Oslobođenja Jugoslavije [AVNOJ]) in Jajce. In 1944 Mandić was chairman of a commission for investigating war crimes, and from March to the end of November 1945 he was a member of the three-man Regency Council (Namjesništvo), which was in control of the government from the abdication of King Peter until the formal abolition of the monarchy. Mandić subsequently pursued scholarly work. His publications include Fragments za historiju ujedinjenja (Contributions to the history of the unification; 1956), a collection of documents for the study of the history of the Yugoslav Committee. (WR) Sources: Enciklopedija Jugoslavije, vol. 6 (Zagreb, 1965); Michał Jerzy Zacharias, Jugosławia w polityce Wielkiej Brytanii 1940–1945 (Wrocław, 1985).

MANDIĆ Nikola (15 January 1869, Dolac, near Travnik–7 June 1945, Zagreb), Croatian national politician. Mandić studied law in Sarajevo and Vienna. After graduation, he practiced as an attorney in Sarajevo. He was a member of the Croatian Party of Rights (led by Ante Starčević), which sought to unify all Croat-populated territories, first within the Habsburg monarchy and subsequently within a national state. In 1908 Mandić was a co-founder of the Croatian Peasant Party. In 1910 he was elected an MP and speaker of the Bosnian parliament. During World War I he was a civil commissioner, assisting the military governor of Bosnia. After the establishment of the Kingdom of Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes, Mandić served as a deputy to the Constitutional Assembly. He vigorously protested the 1921 constitution, and when it came into force, he retired from politics, resuming his professional career. At the end of the 1930s Mandić was known for his nationalist views, but he never joined the Ustasha movement. He also did not take an active part in the establishment of the Independent State of Croatia in April 1941. In September 1942 Ante Pavelić appointed Mandić secretary of state, and on 2 September 1943, prime minister—to the surprise of the Ustasha elite. Some politicians from Pavelić's entourage even resigned in protest. On 11 October 1944 Mandić reorganized his cabinet, bringing in politicians from the Croatian Peasant Party, which was to enhance the credibility of the Ustasha regime in the eyes of the Allies. Mandić fled from Zagreb on 6 May 1945. Caught by the British and handed over to the Communists on 18 May, he was sentenced to death and executed. (WR) Sources: Ladislaus Hory and Martin Broszat, Der kroatische Ustascha-Staat 1941–1945 (Stuttgart, 1964); Ivo Omrčanin, Dramatis Presonae and Finis of the Independent State of Croatia in British and American Documents (Bryn Mawr, Pa., 1983); Bogdan Krizman, Ustaše ili Treći Reich, vols. 1–2 (Zagreb, 1983); Bogdan Krizman, Ante Pavelić i Ustaše (Zagreb, 1983); Marcus Tanner, Croatia: A Nation Forged in War (New Haven, 1997).

MĂNESCU Corneliu (8 February 1916, Ploești–26 June 2000, Bucharest), Romanian Communist diplomat. Mănescu came from an intelligentsia family with liberal views. He completed law studies at the university in Bucharest. In the second half of the 1930s he became involved in a student movement and secretly joined the Romanian Communist Party (RCP). He officially wrote for the leftist newspapers. Following the Communist takeover after World War II, Mănescu served as deputy minister of national defense (1948–55), vice-president of the State Planning Committee (1955–60), ambassador to Hungary, and minister of foreign affairs (March 1961–October 1972). As head of the foreign service and one of the closest associates of Prime Minister Ion Maurer from 1961 to 1974, Mănescu significantly contributed to overcoming Romania's dependency on the Soviet Union and helped to broaden and diversify Romania's foreign relations. Mănescu's establishment of diplomatic relations with the Federal Republic of Germany in 1964, when the countries subordinated to the Soviet regime recognized the German Democratic Republic as the only representative of the German nation, was one of Romania's major moves independent of the Soviet Union. In September 1967 Mănescu became the first politician from the Soviet bloc to serve as chairman of the UN General Assembly; he chaired the twenty-second session, which investigated (among other things) the crucial issues of the 1967 Six Day Arab-Israeli War and the 1968 invasion of Czechoslovakia by Warsaw Pact troops (with the exception of Romania).

Gradually moved into the background as an opponent of the domestic policies of Nicolae Ceaușescu, Mănescu was forced to resign his last position, that of ambassador to France, and to retire in 1982. In March 1989 he was one of the co-authors of the "Letter of the Six," written by former top-ranking Communist officials and criticizing the disastrous policies of the leaders of the Romanian Communist Party, as well as denouncing Ceaușescu's personality cult. As punishment, Mănescu was placed under house arrest. After the revolution in December 1989, Mănescu served as a member of the Provisional Council of the National Salvation Front and chairman of a parliamentary committee for foreign policy from 1990 to 1992. (ASK)

Sources: Chronological History of Romania (Bucharest, 1974); Silviu Brucan, The Wasted Generation (Boulder, Colo., 1993); Șerban N. Ionescu, Who Was Who in Twentieth Century Romania (Boulder, Colo., 1994); Adevărul, 27 June 2000.

MĂNESCU Manea (9 August 1916, Braila), Romanian Communist activist, son-in-law of Nicolae Ceaușescu. The son of a Communist activist, after graduating from the Academy of Trade and Industry in Bucharest, in 1944 Mănescu, along with Ceaușescu began restoring the Association of Communist Youth. In 1951 he was appointed dean of the Department of Economics of Bucharest University, and in 1951–55 he was chairman of the Central Statistical Office. He also became a member of the Romanian Academy of Sciences. From October 1955 to March 1957 Mănescu was minister of finance, and then he became deputy chairman of the State Planning Commission and chairman of the State Commission of Labor and Wages. From 1959 he was secretary general of the National Sociological Committee and then deputy chairman of the Economic Research Society. In 1960 he became a member of the Central Committee (CC) of the Romanian Communist Party (RCP), for four years working as head of its Department of Culture and Science. In 1961 he became an MP, and in 1961–69 he headed the parliamentary commission for finance and economy. From 1965 Mănescu was a member of the State Council for Research; from 1966 to 1968 he was a deputy member of the CC Executive Committee and then a full member. From February 1971 he was a member of the CC Standing Presidium, the highest executive organ of the Communist Party. From 1969 to 1972 he was deputy chairman of the Council of State, and in October 1972 he became chairman of the State Planning Commission.

On 29 March 1974 Mănescu became prime minister, and in 1974–79 he also headed the Council for Economic and Social Relations. He implemented the diplomatic line of Ceaușescu, visiting France, the United States, and other Western countries. In contrast to other Communist countries, Romania maintained contacts with Israel and also entered into relations with the Palestinian Liberation Organization. On 29 March 1979 Mănescu resigned, formally for health reasons. Soon he was also removed from other party and state positions. In November 1982 he suddenly returned as deputy chairman of the Council of State and became chairman of the National Council for Consolidated Land Administration. In March 1983 he returned to the CC Executive Committee, and in December 1984 he became a CC Politburo member. Mănescu authored numerous works on economic development and mathematical modeling. After the fall of the Ceaușescu regime, Mănescu retired. (PC)

Sources: International Year Book and Statesmen's Who's Who (London, 1990); Who's Who in the Socialist Countries of Europe (Munich, London, and Paris, 1978).

MANIU Iuliu (8 January 1873, Simleu Silvaniei–July 1953?, Sighet), Romanian Peasant Party politician. Maniu was born into a peasant family in Transylvania. In February 1905 he was elected as a representative of the Romanian National Party (Partidul Național Românesc [RNP]) to the Hungarian parliament, where he demanded equal rights for the Romanian people in Transylvania. During World War I Maniu served in the Austro-Hungarian Army. In May 1918 he organized a revolt of the Romanian troops, which joined the side of the Entente. Maniu was a member of a delegation of Transylvanian Romanians who on 14 November 1918 rejected the conditions set by the National Council of Hungary on the matter of self-determination and voted for full secession. On 1 December 1918 Maniu presided over the Great Assembly of Transylvanian Romanians in Alba Iulia that proclaimed union with the Old Kingdom of Romania. He also became head of the RNP and of the Transylvanian Directing Council. The council's demands were supported by the Entente and ratified by the peace treaty signed with Hungary in Trianon in June 1920.

From 1926 Maniu headed the National Peasant Party (Partidul Național Țărănesc [NPP]), known as the Tsarans and formed by the merger of the Transylvanian RNP with the Peasant Party of Ion Mihalache from the Old Kingdom. Between 10 November 1928 and 10 October 1930 (with a short break), Maniu served as prime minister. He agreed to the return of King Charles II from exile in July 1930, but he resigned after the king broke his promise to leave his mistress, Magda Lupescu, and reconcile with Queen Helen. Two years later Maniu reconciled with the king, and from 20 October 1932 to 14 January 1933 he again served as the head of government. However, as Charles showed increasingly explicit dictatorial tendencies and accepted the Fascists from the Iron Guard in his regime, Maniu broke off his relations with the king and joined the opposition. After the king's conflict with the Iron Guard in 1937 Maniu formed a tactical electoral alliance with the Iron Guard. However, he failed to win the elections, which were manipulated by the royal administration, and he went against his own interests by entering into an alliance with forces representing aims contradictory to his own.

After Romania was divested of Transylvania and Bessarabia in the summer of 1940 and General Ion Antonescu came to power, the NPP was declared illegal, and a part of its base, northern Transylvania, was again included within the boundaries of Hungary. Despite this, Maniu enjoyed great respect in the countryside. He thought at that point that the regime of Antonescu might be a shield protecting Romania against extreme Fascists and against the conquest of the country by Germany. He accepted Romania's involvement in the war against the USSR in 1941 in order to regain Bessarabia, which had been incorporated by the Soviets, but when the involvement of the Romanian Army went beyond this aim, in January 1942 Maniu, along with the leader of the liberal opposition, Constantin Bratianu, sent a note to Antonescu demanding the withdrawal of Romanian forces to the west of the Dniester River. In August 1943, in agreement with groups close to Antonescu, Maniu authorized a letter to the United States and Great Britain proposing that Romania join the Allied side on condition that the Allies guarantee Romanian rule in Bessarabia. The letter went unanswered because of the role that the Allies attributed to the USSR on the eastern front. The Kremlin, on the other hand, considered Maniu's offer contrary to its interests and demanded the unconditional capitulation of Romania. With the approach of the Soviets, in June 1944 Maniu agreed to the preliminary conditions for negotiations with the Allies that were presented by Stalin: Romania would join the Allies against Germany; it would give up claims to Bessarabia; Transylvania would be returned to Romania; and the Red Army would be allowed to march through Romania. Maniu also began to form a national front that prepared a coup and brought Romania to the Allied side.

On 23 August 1944, the day of Antonescu's arrest by King Michael's guards and the establishment of a coalition government of the National Democratic Front, Maniu became a member of the cabinet. In November 1944 the USSR introduced its own military administration in Transylvania; removed the voluntary National Guard, a paramilitary organization that had remained under the influence of the NPP; and diminished the influence of the non-Communists. On 6 March 1945 under pressure from the Kremlin, a government dominated by the Communists and the left was established, and Petru Groza was installed as its head. Maniu and his party went into the opposition. On 18 July 1945 Maniu gave a speech in which he demanded the restoration of a broad coalition cabinet. Because the Allies had given the USSR leeway, this claim could not be realized, especially since in February 1946 the United States, Great Britain, and France recognized Groza's government. During negotiations on a peace treaty with Romania in 1946, the Peasant Party opposition protested the interference of the USSR in Romania's domestic affairs. However, in the falsified elections of November 1946, according to official statistics, Maniu's party gained only 12 percent of the vote.

In April 1947 Maniu, along with some leaders of the opposition, bravely sent a letter to a conference of foreign ministers of the great powers, accusing Groza's government of human rights abuses. In the beginning of July 1947 Maniu supported the acceptance of the Marshall Plan for Romania, but in the middle of the same month he was arrested by the Communists. In November 1947 he was sentenced to life imprisonment under the false accusations of spying against and the sabotage of "the people's democracy," as well as the fascization of Romania before World War II. Maniu died in prison. Different dates are given for his death, including 1951, 1953, and 1955. After the fall of communism in Romania some of Maniu's works were published, including Testament moral politic (A moral-political testament; 1991) and Trei discursuri (Three conversations; 1991). (WR)

Sources: Trial of the Former National Peasant Party Leaders: Maniu, Michalache, Penesco, Nicolesco-Buzesti, and Others from Shorthand Notes (Bucharest, 1947; also published in French); Andrzej Koryn, Rumunia w polityce wielkich mocarstw 1944–1947 (Wrocław, 1983); Ion Calafeteanu, ed., Iuliu Maniu, Ion Antonescu: Opinii si confruntari politice 1940–1944 (Cluj and Napoca, 1994); Josif Toma Popescu, Świadectwo (Warsaw, 1996); Ioan Scurtu, Iuliu Maniu: Activitatea politica (Bucharest, 1996); Dennis Deletant, Communist Terror in Romania: Gheorghiu-Dej and the Police State, 1948–1965 (New York, 1999).

MANOILESCU Mihail (10 December 1891, Tecuci–1950, Sighet), Romanian economist and politician. In 1915 Manoilescu graduated in engineering studies from the Budapest Polytechnic Institute. In 1920 he became director of a department at the Ministry of Industry and Trade, and from 1926 to 1927 he was a member of the People's Party (Partidul Poporului) and undersecretary of state in the Ministry of Finance. A member of the National Peasant Party (Partidul Național Țărănesc [NPP]) from 1927, Manoilescu was in opposition to the NPP's "peasant" wing, as he believed that peasants could not be the dominant force in a state undergoing modernization. He advocated industrialization and protectionism and supported the efforts of Charles II to regain the Romanian throne. In October 1927 Manoilescu was arrested while returning to Romania with secret letters from Charles to the Romanian opposition. Accused of a conspiracy that aimed to stage a coup d'état, he was tried and placed in Jilava Prison but was soon acquitted. After Charles assumed the Romanian throne in 1930, Manoilescu was cleared of charges and appointed minister of public works and transport.

From October 1930 to April 1931 Manoilescu was minister of industry and trade. Later he served as chairman of the central bank (June–November 1931) and worked as a professor of political economy at the university in Bucharest (1932–44). His views evolved from neo-liberalism to authoritarian corporatism and a fascination with Italian fascism. In 1932 Manoilescu founded the corporatist periodical Lumnea Nouă, and in 1933, the National Corporate League (Liga Național-Corporatistă), a group that combated the dominance of party politics in public life. In 1936 Manoilescu was a guest at a Nazi congress in Nuremberg. In 1937 he became a senator on the ticket of All for the Fatherland (Totul pentru Țară), an organization established by the Iron Guard (Gărdia de Fier). Manoilescu's views corresponded to a great extent with the ideology of the Iron Guard, although he was a supporter of the concentration of property and promoted protectionism and the introduction of protective anti-import customs duties. According to Manoilescu, free international trade strengthened only the developed Western countries at the expense of agricultural countries like Romania. King Charles II approved of his views. Consequently, after the 1938 coup d'état and the abolition of all political parties, when Charles assumed full control of the government, he made Manoilescu one of his closest associates. From June to September 1938 Manoilescu served as minister of foreign affairs and headed a delegation that accepted the Vienna Award on 30 August 1938. Under the Vienna Award around one-third of Romania's territory was ceded to Hungary and Bulgaria. After General Ion Antonescu came to power in September of that year, Manoilescu retired from politics.

In 1948 Manoilescu was arrested by the Communists and imprisoned without trial in Sighet Prison, where he died. Manoilescu's publications include the following: Politica Statului în cheștiunea refacerii industriale (State policy on industrial reconstruction; 1920); Organizarea financiară a economiei naționale (The financial organization of the national economy; 1924); La théorie du protectionisme industriel (The theory of industrial protectionism; 1929); Echilibrul economic european (European economic equilibrium; 1931); România, stat cooperatist (Romania, a corporate state; 1933); Secolul corporatismului (The age of corporatism; 1934); Le parti unique (One party; 1937); and La situation économique de la Roumanie en 1929 (Romania's economic situation in 1929; 1940). Manolescu also authored Memorii (Memoirs; 1993). (LW)

Sources: Philip Rees, Biographical Dictionary of the Extreme Right since 1890 (New York, 1990); Dictionar Enciclopedic, vol. 4 (Bucharest, 2001); Vlad Georgescu, Istoria Românilor de la origini pînă în zilele noastre (Oakland, 1984); Vasile C. Nechita, ed., Mihail Manoilescu, creator de teorie economica (Iași, 1993); Józef Darski, Rumunia: Historia, współczesność, konflikty narodowe (Warsaw, 1995); Krzysztof Dach and Tadeusz Dubicki, Żelazny Legion Michała Archaniola (Warsaw, 1996); Dorina N. Rusu, Membrii Academiei Române 1866–1999 (Bucharest, 1999); Ion Alexandrescu, Ion Bulei, Ion Mamina, and Ioan Scurtu, Enciclopedia de istorie României (Bucharest, 2000); pages.prodigy.net; www.miscarea-legionara.org.

MANOLESCU Nicolae (27 November 1939, Râmnicu Vâlcea), Romanian literary critic and politician. In 1956 Manolescu graduated from a high school in Sibiu, and in 1962 he graduated in philological studies at the University of Bucharest. In 1962–72 he published in the literary periodical Contemporanul and in 1972–93 in România literară. From 1971 to 1974 he was deputy editor-in-chief and from 1990 director of the latter periodical. In 1974 Manolescu received a Ph.D. in literature from the University of Bucharest, and in 1990 he became a professor of philology at this university. In 1990 he co-founded the democratic Civic Alliance (Alianța Civică [SO]), which aimed at the development of civic society in Romania. The organization split in 1991, when its Bucharest branch, headed by Manolescu, decided to turn into a political party, the Civic Alliance Party (Partidul Alianței Civice [PSO]). In 1991–95 the PSO, led by Manolescu, was a part of the Democratic Convention of Romania (Convenția Democrată Română [CDR]), which included parties opposing the post-Communist rule. In 1992–96 Manolescu was a senator on behalf of the CDR. In 1994–95 the PSO belonged to the Civic Citizens' Alliance, a failed attempt to unify the liberal parties. In 1995, owing to Manolescu's personal conflicts in the CDR, the PSO left the convention. Before the parliamentary and presidential elections of November 1996 the PSO merged with the Liberal Party into the National Liberal Alliance (Alianța Național-Liberală), but the alliance was defeated, while Manolescu, running for president, won only 0.7 percent of the vote. In 1998 Manolescu merged his party with the National Liberal Party (Partidul Național Liberal), and for some time he was a member of its National Council. Manolescu authored Literatura română de azi (Contemporary Romanian literature; 1965); Metamorfozele poeziei

(Metamorphoses of poetry; 1968); Eseuri critice (Critical essays, 7 vols.; 1971–89); Despre poezie (On poetry; 1987); Istoria critică a literaturii române (Critical history of Romanian literature; 1990); and Teme (Themes; 2001). In 1997 Manolescu became a member of the Romanian Academy of Sciences. (LW)

Sources: Dictionar Enciclopedic, vol. 4 (Bucharest, 2001); Józef Darski, Rumunia: Historia, współczesność, konflikty narodowe (Warsaw, 1995); Dorina N. Rusu, Membrii Academiei Române 1866–1999 (Bucharest, 1999); Ion Alexandrescu, Ion Bulei, Ion Mamina, and Ioan Scurtu, Enciclopedia de istorie României (Bucharest, 2000); romania-on-line.net/whoswho/ManolescuNicolae.htm.

MANOLIĆ Josip (22 March 1920, Kalinovac, near Djurdjevac), Croatian Communist activist and post-Communist politician. Manolić graduated in law in Zagreb. In 1939 he joined the Communist Party of Yugoslavia, and during World War II he fought with the Communist guerrillas. After the war he worked in the Public Security Office, in the Croatian republican Ministry of Interior (1948–60), and in the Secretariat of Internal Affairs in Zagreb (1960–65). In 1965 and 1969 Manolić won a seat in the Croatian republican assembly and chaired its legislative commission. After the “Croatian Spring” and the purge in the League of Communists of Croatia in December 1971, Manolić was accused of “nationalism.” He lost his mandate and withdrew from political life. In 1989 he co-founded the Croatian Democratic Union (Hrvatska Demokratska Zajednica [HDZ]) and was the first chairman of its Executive Council. In 1990 and 1992 Manolić was elected to the Croatian parliament. In 1990 he became deputy chairman of the Croatian Presidium, still within the Socialist Federative Republic of Yugoslavia.

On 24 August 1990 Manolić became prime minister of Croatia, which proclaimed its independence in June 1991. He remained in office until 3 August 1991. In 1991–93 he chaired the Office of Protection of the Constitutional Order (Ured za Zaštitu Ustavnog Poretka). In 1993 he became chairman of the House of Districts, the upper house of the Croatian parliament. In April 1994 a number of HDZ activists criticized President Franjo Tuđman. Manolić himself objected to Tuđman's anti-Muslim policies in Bosnia-Herzegovina and to his dictatorial style. As a result Manolić was dismissed from the HDZ, along with Stipe Mesić. In April 1994 Manolić co-founded the Croatian Independent Democrats (Hrvatski Nezavisni Demokrati [HND]) and became the party's deputy chairman. In May 1994 Manolić was also dismissed from the position of chairman of the House of Districts, which led to a parliamentary crisis that was resolved in the fall of 1994. After Mesić left the HND in 1997, Manolić became head of the party, but in the subsequent elections the party failed to gain more than one mandate. (AO)

Sources: Hrvatski Leksikon, vol. 2 (Zagreb, 1997); Robert Stal-laerts and Jeannine Laurens, Historical Dictionary of the Republic of Croatia (Lanham, Md., 1995); The International Who's Who 1996–97 (London, 1996); Europa Środkowo-Wschodnia 1994–95 (Warsaw, 1996–97); Bugajski.

MANSFELD Péter (10 March 1941, Budapest–21 March 1959, Budapest), victim of the Communist oppression. Mansfeld was the son of a barber. His parents divorced, and he was brought up by a single mother. After primary school, Mansfeld studied in a vocational school. In October 1956 he joined the insurgents in Szén Square in Budapest. He did not take part in the fighting but supplied arms and food and was a liaison between various groups of insurgents. On 5 November 1956 Mansfeld broke into the villa of former interior minister László Piros and took weapons that the latter hid at home. After the suppression of the revolution, Mansfeld continued his education. In February 1958, along with a friend, he decided to establish an armed group. They captured a militiaman from the post in front of the Austrian Embassy, disarmed him, and set him free. They also planned to free imprisoned friends and to take revenge against those who had informed on the insurgents, but they failed. Two days after the capture of the militiaman, Mansfeld was arrested. On 21 November 1958 he was sentenced to life imprisonment for taking part in a “plot against the power of the people.” On 19 March 1959 the Supreme Court changed this sentence to a death penalty. Two days later he was executed as an adult. (JT)

Sources: A magyar forradalom és szabadságharc enciklopediája, CD-ROM (Budapest, 1999); Magyar Nagylexikon, vol. 12 (Budapest, 2001); György Litván, ed., Rewolucja węgierska 1956 roku (Warsaw, 1996).

MANUILSKYI Dmytro (3 October 1883, Sviatets, Volhynia–22 February 1959, Kiev), Soviet and Communist activist of Ukrainian origin. In 1903 Manuilskyi began to study at St. Petersburg University and joined the Bolshevik faction of the Russian Social Democratic Workers' Party (RSDWP). From 1900 to 1906 he was involved in agitation work in St. Petersburg. In 1906 he was sentenced to five years' exile for his part in the mutiny of the sailors in Kronstadt, but he escaped to Kiev and joined the local RSDWP (Bolshevik) committee in 1907. In the autumn of that year Manuilskyi went to Paris, where in 1911 he graduated in law from the Sorbonne. From 1912 to 1913 he illegally stayed in Moscow and St. Petersburg and then again went abroad. In May 1917 he returned to Russia and later that year took part in the October Revolution. On 12 June 1918, along with Khristian Rakovsky, Manuilskyi signed the Preliminaries of Peace with the Ukrainian National Republic. Then he was sent by the Central Committee (CC) of the party to the Ukraine to organize the Bolshevik movement there. For some time he was drawn to the so-called federalist faction of the Communist Party (Bolshevik) of Ukraine (Komunistychna Partiya [Bilshovykiv] Ukrayiny [CP(B)U]), which called for a federal union in which the Ukrainian SSR and the RSFSR would have equal rights. From 1919 to 1920 Manuilskyi belonged to the All-Ukrainian Revolutionary Committee (Vseukrayins'kyi Revkom), and from 1920 to 1921 he was a delegate to the Polish-Soviet peace negotiations in Riga.

From 1920 to 1922 Manuilskyi was the people's commissar for agriculture of the Ukrainian SSR, and in 1921 he served for a short time as first secretary of the CP(B)U CC and editor of the newspaper Kommunist. From 1920 to 1923 and from 1949 to 1952 he was a member of the Politburo of the CP(B)U CC, and from 1924 to 1949, a member of the CC Presidium. In the struggle for power in the Kremlin, Manuilskyi gave his unreserved support to Stalin. From 1928 to 1943 he held the post of secretary of the Executive Committee of the Communist International. Head of the party delegation to the Third International, Manuilskyi was one of the main executors of Stalinist policies in this organization, including the bloody Stalinist purges in the Comintern apparatus and in foreign Communist parties. In 1944 Manuilskyi became deputy prime minister and the people's commissar for foreign affairs of the Ukrainian SSR. In April 1945 he was head of the Ukrainian delegation to the international conference in San Francisco where the United Nations was established. He was also head of the Ukrainian delegation to the Paris Peace Conference in 1946 and attended the first sessions of the UN General Assembly. From the UN rostrum he attacked, among other things, the work of Ukrainian émigré communities. From 1945 to 1946 Manuilskyi was one of the initiators and ideologues of yet another campaign against “Ukrainian bourgeois nationalism,” and he organized attacks against such prominent representatives of Ukrainian culture as the historians Mykola Petrovsky and Ivan Krypyakevych and the writers Oleksandr Dovzhenko, Volodymyr Sosyura, Yury Yanovsky, and Maksym Rylsky. From 1946 to 1953 Manuilskyi was deputy prime minister of the Ukrainian SSR, and from 1946 to 1952 he was also minister of foreign affairs. He subsequently retired. (BB)

Sources: MERSH, vol. 21; Encyclopedia of Ukraine, vol. 3 (Toronto, 1993); Malyy Slovyk Istorii Ukrainy (Kiev, 1997); Lazitch; Dovidnyk z istorii Ukrainy (Kiev, 2001); Hryhory Kostyuk, Stalinist Rule in the Ukraine (New York, 1960); Leonid Suyarko, D. Z. Manuilskyi: Revoliutsioner, diplomat, uchenyi (Kiev, 1983).

MÁRAI Sándor [originally Grosschmid] (11 April 1900, Kassa [Košice]–21 February 1989, San Diego, California), Hungarian writer, poet, and journalist. Márai's father was a successful attorney and a senator in Kassa, and his elder brother, Géza Radványi, was a film director. After graduating from a high school in Eperjes (Prešov), Márai went to Budapest, where he briefly attended the School of Arts at the university and subsequently worked as a journalist. Under the Hungarian Soviet Republic (HSR) he published in the Communist press. After the fall of the HSR he went to Vienna and then to Germany. In Leipzig, Berlin, and Frankfurt Márai published his articles in Frankfurter Zeitung, Prager Tageblatt, and the Budapest-based Újság. He wrote many reports from his foreign journeys. In 1928 he returned to Hungary, and for twenty years he was one of the most popular and prolific writers. In that time Márai published thirty-nine novels, poetry volumes, collections of novellas, and essays. He also wrote articles for newspapers. In 1934 he published Egy polgár vallomásai (Confessions of a burgher), a novel about the life of Kassa burghers that had numerous autobiographical elements. This book made Márai one of the most famous twentieth-century Hungarian prose writers. He was also an acclaimed playwright. His plays Kaland (Adventure; 1940) and Kassai polgárok (Kassa burghers; 1942) were successfully staged. In 1942 Márai became a member of the Hungarian Academy of Sciences. In 1943 he began to write a diary; the first volume, devoted to the period from 1943 to 1944, contains a moving description of war events (Napló [A diary]; 1946). The subsequent volumes of this diary, which Márai wrote and published until the end of his life, were a record of reflections of an émigré from Communist-ruled Central Europe and an analysis of relations between culture and authority, art and kitsch, and past and present.

In 1945 and 1946 Márai took a long journey around Western Europe and finally left Hungary in 1948 as a result of his troubles with the censors when writing the novel Sértődöttek (The offended; 1947–48), the third volume of which was eventually sent to a paper mill. After living in Switzerland for around two years, Márai went to Italy and in 1952 to the United States. From 1951 to 1967, under the pseudonym "Candidus," Márai worked with the Hungarian section of Radio Free Europe. He published extensively in the Munich-based Látóhatár, the most important political and literary periodical of Hungarians in exile. He also rewrote his old novels and wrote new ones. Márai spent the last years of his life in solitude and poverty, finally committing suicide. After the fall of communism in Hungary, he was posthumously awarded the most important national distinctions and literary prizes, becoming one of the most widely published writers. Márai's characters were merchants, entrepreneurs, and artists who strove for freedom of belief and behavior. Márai believed that an individual was socially and culturally predetermined and that only a depiction of an individual's fate allowed for philosophical reflections upon history. Other strong points of Márai's writing are its concise, emotionally aphoristic nature and its well-chosen composition. Márai was a great eulogist of Central European middle-class culture. (MS)

Sources: Gábor Thurzó, Magyar írók: Márai Sándor, "Erdélyi Helikon," 1934; Aladár Komlós, Írók és elvek. Márai Sándor (Budapest, 1937); Béla Horváth, "Márai estéje," Látóhatár, 1962, no. 1; Albert Tezla, Márai Sándor. Hungarian Authors (Cambridge, Massachusetts, 1970); Emil Csonka, "A legnagyobb élő magyar író. A 80 éves Márai Sándor," in Új Látóhatár, 1980, no. 1; Mihály Szegedy-Maszák, Márai Sándor (Budapest, 1991); Mały słownik pisarzy węgierskich (Warsaw, 1977).

MARCHENKO Valery [originally Umrilov] (1947, Kiev–7 October 1984, Leningrad), Ukrainian democratic activist, victim of the Soviet terror. The grandson of the historian Mykhailo Marchenko, after graduating in philology from Kiev University in 1970, Marchenko worked for the literary periodical Literaturna Ukraina from 1970 to 1973 and at the same time published in underground journals and studied the Azer language. Arrested on 25 June 1973, Marchenko was sentenced to six years in a labor camp and two years in exile on 29 December of that year. In 1974 he participated in a hunger strike in labor camp No. 35 in Perm. On 9 August 1974, along with thirteen other prisoners, he sent a letter to the International Red Cross, protesting the conditions in the labor camp, and in December of that year he sent a letter to the Supreme Soviet of the Soviet Union demanding recognition of the status of political prisoner. In 1975 Marchenko wrote Pismo dedu (A letter to grandfather), in which he criticized the servile attitude of his grandfather to the Communist regime, and Moia prekrasnaia ledi (My beautiful lady), describing the role of a beautiful KGB agent who had drawn him into making political confessions that led to his arrest. Both works appeared as samizdat publications. Because the authorities refused to grant him the status of political prisoner, on 10 December 1975 Marchenko renounced his Soviet citizenship. Temporarily released, he was again sentenced to twenty-three years in a labor camp in 1976. Marchenko died in prison because of delayed medical care. (WR)

Sources: S. P. de Boer, E. J. Driessen, and H. L. Verhaar, eds., Biographical Dictionary of Dissidents in the Soviet Union, 1956–1975 (The Hague and Boston, 1982); Encyclopedia of Ukraine, vol. 3 (Toronto, 1993).

MARCHLEWSKI Julian, pseudonyms “Karski” and “Kujawiak” (17 May 1866, Włocławek–22 March 1925, Nervi, Italy), activist in the Polish and international Communist movement, economist, and journalist. While a high school student, Marchlewski became involved in revolutionary activities as a member of a circle of the International Social Revolutionary Party Proletariat. In 1889 he was one of the founders of the Polish Workers’ Union (Związek Robotników Polskich [ZRP]). Persecuted by the tsarist authorities, Marchlewski was imprisoned between 1891 and 1892. In 1893 he emigrated to Switzerland and in 1895 moved to Germany. At that time he became active as a journalist, writing for Sprawa Robotnicza (1893–95). In 1893 he was one of the founders of the Social Democracy of the Kingdom of Poland, which in 1900 changed its name to the Social Democracy of the Kingdom of Poland and Lithuania (Socjaldemokracja Królestwa Polskiego i Litwy [SDKPiL]). Marchlewski was one of the leaders and ideologues of this party. In 1897 he published his doctoral dissertation, Fizjokratyzm w dawnej Polsce (Physiocracy in old Poland), and in 1903 he published Stosunki społeczno-ekonomiczne na ziemiach polskich Zaboru Pruskiego (Socioeconomic relations in the Polish territories of the Prussian partition). Marchlewski published articles in various periodicals of the Social Democratic movement, including Przegląd Robotniczy and Czerwony Sztandar.

In 1902 Marchlewski became a member of the Main Board of the SDKPiL. He represented the SDKPiL at many congresses of the Second International. Also in 1902 in Berlin he founded a company that published translations of Slavic and Scandinavian literature into German. In just over two years he published nearly fifty volumes, including works by Adolf Dygasiński, Waclaw Sieroszewski, Stefan Żeromski, and Kazimierz Przerwa-Tetmajer. During the 1905–7 revolution Marchlewski was initially in Kraków and then in Warsaw. From 1906 to 1907 he was imprisoned by the tsarist authorities. Released, he went to Germany. In exile, Marchlewski was one of the leaders and main journalists of the left wing of the German Social Democratic movement. During World War I Marchlewski took a pro-internationalist stance, condemning the leaders of Social Democratic parties who supported their governments. In 1916, along with other activists of the radical German left wing, he co-founded the Spartacus League. Arrested by the Prussian authorities, he was imprisoned in a camp at Havelberg.

In 1918, as part of an exchange of prisoners of war, Marchlewski went to Soviet Russia and joined the All-Russian Central Executive Committee of the Soviets of Workers’ and Soldiers’ Deputies. In 1919 he was again in Germany for a few months and was active in the Ruhr area. At that time he was a member of the Central Committee (CC) of the Communist Party of Germany. After returning to Russia in the same year, he took part in the establishment of the Communist International and represented the Communist Workers’ Party of Poland (Komunistyczna Partia Robotnicza Polski [KPRP]) in the Executive Committee of the Comintern. He also worked in the Soviet diplomatic service. For example, in July and October 1919 in Białowieża and Mikaszewice, as a representative of the Soviet authorities, Marchlewski negotiated with representatives of the Polish government. During the Polish-Soviet war he was head of the Polish Provisional Revolutionary Committee (Tymczasowy Komitet Rewolucyjny Polski [TKRP]), established by the Polish Bureau of the CC of the All-Russian Communist Party (Bolsheviks) in July 1920 in Moscow. The TKRP sought to establish a Polish Soviet Socialist Republic within the borders of Western Galicia and the former Kingdom of Poland. Marchlewski was depicted by Żeromski in his famous literary report, Na probostwie w Wyszku (At the rectory in Wyszów), which condemned the national treason of Polish Communists. In 1922, after the failure of revolutionary plans in Poland, Marchlewski helped to establish the Communist University of Western National Minorities, subsequently serving as its rector and a lecturer. An initiator of the International Organization for Aid to Revolutionaries, in 1922 Marchlewski also helped to establish this organization, becoming first president of its CC. Marchlewski died while being treated for an illness in Italy.

In the Communist movement Marchlewski was considered an expert on agrarian issues. His publications include Polskie programy burżuazyjne w kwestii rolnej (Polish bourgeois programs on the agrarian issue; 1908) and Komuniści a wiejski lud roboczy (The Communists and the rural working class; 1919). In 1920 Marchlewski worked on an agrarian program that was adopted at the Second Congress of the Communist International (Sprawa rolna a rewolucja socjalistyczna [The agrarian issue and the Socialist revolution]; 1926) and that was an official exposition of the Comintern’s strategy and tactics on the issue. In this program Marchlewski called for revolutionary expropriation and a collective agricultural economy. Marchlewski was also the author of Marxist works devoted mainly to Polish history and economy, including the following: Walka robotnicza pod caratem (Worker struggle under tsarist rule; 1905); O dochodzie (On income; 1907); Antysemityzm a robotnicy (Anti-Semitism and the workers; 1913); Kriegssozialismus in Theorie und Praxis (1915); and Wobec kwestii rolnej w Polsce (About the agrarian issue in Poland; 1918). Sochineniia was published in the Soviet Union in 1931, and Pisma Wybrane (Selected writings, 2 vols.) was published in Poland in 1952–56. In post-1945 Communist Poland Marchlewski was considered one of the main leaders of the Polish Communist left. Streets, squares, schools, kindergartens, and military structures were named after him. After 1989 they were renamed, and Marchlewski's monuments and busts disappeared from public sight in Poland. (WD)

Sources: PSB, vol. 19; MERSH, vol. 21; Słownik biograficzny działaczy polskiego ruchu robotniczego, vol. 3 (Warsaw, 1993); J. Kaczanowska, Bibliografia prac Juliana Marchlewskiego (Łódź, 1954); M. K. Dziewanowski, The Communist Party of Poland (Cambridge, Mass., 1959); Feliks Tych, Julian Marchlewski; Szkic biograficzny (Warsaw, 1966); Walentyna Najdus, Lewica polska w Kraju Rad 1918–1920 (Warsaw, 1971).

MARCHUK Yevhen (28 January 1941, Dolynivka, Kirovohrad region), Ukrainian Communist activist and post-Communist politician. In 1963 Marchuk graduated from the Pedagogical Institute in Kirovohrad. From 1963 he was a KGB functionary, first in the Kirovohrad region and from 1965 on the republican level. From 1988 he was head of the KGB administration in the Poltava region, and in 1990 he was promoted to first deputy chairman of the KGB of the Ukrainian SSR. Between June and November 1991 Marchuk was minister of defense, national security, and emergency situations of the Ukrainian SSR and then of the Ukraine. From November 1991 to July 1994 he was head of the Security Service of the Ukraine (Służba Bezpeky Ukrainy). Appointed general of the army, from July 1994 he was deputy prime minister. In September 1994 Marchuk was appointed a special presidential representative in the Crimean Autonomous Republic, and in October 1994, first deputy prime minister and head of the Coordination Committee to Combat Corruption and Organized Crime. In 1994–95 he headed the Coordination Council for the Development of the Ukrainian Frontier. From 1 March 1995 to 28 May 1996 he was Ukraine's prime minister. In 1995–2000 he served as MP of the Supreme Council. In 1999 he ran for the presidency, but he came in fifth in the first round, with 8.1 percent of the vote. In November 1999 President Leonid Kuchma appointed Marchuk secretary of the Council of National Security and Defense, and in December 1999, chairman of the State Inter-Ministry Commission for Ukraine's Cooperation with NATO. (BB)

Sources: Khto ye khto v Ukraini 2000 (Kiev, 2000); Bohdan Nahaylo, The Ukrainian Resurgence (Toronto, 1999); Bugajski.

MARGHILOMAN Alexandru (10 February 1854, Buzău–11 May 1925, Bucharest), Romanian politician, lawyer, and journalist. Marghiloman completed law studies at the Sorbonne and continued his studies at the School of Political Studies in Paris (1874–79), earning a doctorate. In 1884 he joined the Conservative Party and became a member of parliament on its behalf. Marghiloman was an influential politician, with a substantial fortune and with family connections, thanks to his marriage to Princess Eliza Știrbey. In 1888–89 and 1891–95 he was minister of justice. In that capacity he carried out a radical reform of the administration of the judiciary and the commercial code. Between 1889 and 1891 he was minister of public works. At that time Romania bought out the Romanian section of the Lemberg-Chernovitsy-Iași railway line. He also approved the construction of a strategic connection via the Danube between Fetești and Cernavoda. Marghiloman subsequently served as foreign minister (1900–1), interior minister (1910–12), and finance minister (1912–14). He was the author of the financial clauses included in the Bucharest Treaty of August 1913.

On 4 June 1914 Marghiloman became leader of the Conservative Party. Between 1914 and 1916 he advocated that Romania should remain neutral, with an option for possible cooperation with the Central Powers against Russia. When the Romanian authorities left Bucharest in November 1916, Marghiloman remained in the capital as president of the Romanian Red Cross. He probably reached an agreement with the head of the Liberal Party, Ion I. C. Brătianu, and when on 15 August 1916 Romania entered the war, he represented a pro-German option and Brătianu a pro-Allied option. For this reason, during the German occupation Marghiloman collaborated with the occupying authorities. Between 1 March and 12 November 1918 he was prime minister and took part in the National Assembly in Chișinău (Kishinev) that announced the incorporation of Bessarabia into Romania (27 March 1918). After the end of World War I Marghiloman was accused of collaboration with the Germans, but he was never brought to court. In 1919–20 he was an MP on behalf of the Conservative Party for the last time. Marghiloman was known for his elegance in private as well as in political life and also for his original memoirs, Note politice (Political notes; 1927). (FA/TD)

Sources: Holger H. Herwig and Neil M. Heyman, Biographical Dictionary of World War I (Westport, Conn., 1982); Mircea Mușat and Ion Ardeleanu, România după Marea Unire, vols. 1–2 (Bucharest, 1986); Glenn Torrey, General Henri Bertholet and Romania 1916–1919 (Boulder, Colo., 1987).

MARINKOVIĆ Vojislav (13 May 1876, Belgrade–18 September 1935, Belgrade), Serbian politician. The son of the politicians Dimitrije and Velika Marinković, Marinković graduated from a gymnasium in Belgrade. He later completed law studies in Paris, where he also studied economics and political science. After returning to Belgrade, he began to work in the Ministry of Finance in 1901. He soon left the civil service to become the director of the United Commercial Bank. Marinković began his political career in 1906, entering the parliament (Skupština), where he was one of the founders of the Serbian Progressive Party (Srbska Napredna Stranka [SPP]), led by Stojan Novaković. Marinković sat in the parliament from 1906 until the end of his life, holding various positions in the coalition cabinets of Nikola Pašić (November 1914–June 1917 and November 1918–December 1918), including that of minister of economy. After the death of Novaković, Marinković became leader of the SPP. As a representative of the opposition, he took part in negotiations with the Pašić government in Corfu (15 June 1917–20 July 1917). These negotiations ended in the drafting of the Corfu Declaration, which announced the intention of founding a unified Southern Slav state. Marinković was also one of the co-authors of the Geneva Agreement, which was a compromise between the Slavs who had lived in the Habsburg monarchy before 1917 and the government of the Kingdom of Serbs.

In the Kingdom of Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes, established after World War I, Marinković was one of the founders of the Democratic Union (Demokratska Zajednica [DU]), which united various political forces. The DU was a supranational platform of political cooperation that promoted a state ideology of a moderately rightist profile. In 1920 the DU was transformed from a confederation of parties into the Serbian Democratic Party (Demokratska Stranka [DP]). From December 1921 to June 1922 Marinković was minister of interior in the coalition cabinet of Pašić. After the wing led by Svetozar Pribičević was expelled from the DP in April 1924, Marinković, along with other Serbian parties, helped to establish an opposition bloc that was joined by the Slovene People's Party and the Yugoslav Muslim Organization. This agreement among the parties led to the collapse of the government based on a coalition formed by the Pašić party and the Pribičević group, and it also offered Marinković a chance to assume the post of head of diplomacy in the coalition cabinet of Ljubomir Davidović (July–November 1924). In 1927 Marinković was again appointed minister of foreign affairs, becoming a member of seven subsequent cabinets, and from 4 April to 1 July 1932 he served as prime minister. As minister of foreign affairs, Marinković signed a treaty of friendship with France (11 November 1927). He also succeeded in improving relations with neighboring countries and in thwarting Italian attempts to surround Yugoslavia and to force it to make territorial concessions. Marinković called for the softening of the royal dictatorship. However, as a result of an increase in party conflicts, Marinković was dismissed as head of government. From October 1934 to December 1934 he was a member of the government for the last time, serving in the cabinet of Nikola Uzunović. Unlike the majority of DP members, who opposed the dictatorship of King Alexander I, Marinković supported the royal regime, helping to draft the constitution of 3 November 1931, granted by a royal decree, and an electoral law that considerably restricted electoral rights. (AG)

Sources: Biographisches Lexikon, vol. 3; Enciklopedija Jugoslavije, vol. 6 (Zagreb, 1965); Osteuropa-Handbuch; Jugoslawien (Cologne and Graz, 1954); Kosta Pavlović, Vojislav Marinković i njegovo doba 1876–1935, vols. 1–5 (London, 1955–60); Branislav Gligorijević, Demokratska stranka i politički odnosi u Kraljevini Srba, Hrvata i Slovenaca (Belgrade, 1970); Dimitrije Djordjević, ed., The Creation of Yugoslavia 1914–1918 (Santa Barbara, Calif., 1980); Waclaw Felczak and Tadeusz Wasilewski, Historia Jugosławii (Wrocław, 1985).

MARKOV Georgi (1 March 1929, Sofia–11 September 1978, London), Bulgarian writer, journalist, and dissident, victim of communism. A chemical engineer by profession, Markov published his first works at the beginning of the 1960s. His novel Muzhe (Men; 1962) received Bulgaria's top literary award. His publications also include the poetry collections Patent (1966) and Komunisty (Communists; 1969). As a member of the privileged elite, Markov personally met many top leaders, including Todor Zhivkov. Markov's problems with the censors began after the 1968 invasion of Czechoslovakia by Warsaw Pact troops. In 1969 he obtained permission to visit his brother in Italy and decided to stay in the West. He settled in London. He became a broadcast journalist for the BBC, the Deutsche Welle, and Radio Free Europe, where he broadcast Zadochni reportazhi za Bŭlgariia (Correspondence reports from Bulgaria), in which he described everyday life under Communist rule, particularly the party and government elite's life behind the scenes. Markov's biting tongue and criticism of party leaders, including Zhivkov, made him one of the regime's most hated people. In 1972 the court in Sofia sentenced Markov in absentia to four years and eight months in prison. His wife, Zdravka Lekova, was subjected to persecution and pressured to divorce Markov, to which she finally agreed. As a result of the rise of the opposition movement in Bulgaria after 1978, which expressed itself in (among others things) "Declaration 78," the authorities decided that Markov was very harmful to the regime, and the security services made several attempts to kill him. Finally, on 7 November 1978 at a London bus stop, a Bulgarian agent, using a device hidden in an umbrella, secretly injected Markov with poison. Four days later Markov died in a hospital. The people responsible for his murder have never been brought to justice, and documents relating to the case were destroyed by the Bulgarian services. (AG)

Sources: Suvremenna Bulgarska Entsiklopediya, vol. 3 (Sofia, 1994); Georgi Markov: The Truth That Killed (New York, 1983); Kalin Todorov, Koi ubi Georgi Markov (Sofia, 1991); Interviu na Iliana Benovska z Georgi Markov (Sofia, 1993); Raymond Detrez, Historical Dictionary of Bulgaria (Lanham, Md., 1997); www.rferl.org/nca/features/1996/09/F.RU.960918155306.html; www.videofact.com/english/defectors_33_en.html.

MARKOVIĆ Ante (25 November 1924, Konjic, Bosnia-Herzegovina), Yugoslav Communist activist of Croatian descent. Marković fought in the Communist guerrilla movement during World War II. In 1954 he graduated in electrical engineering studies in Zagreb. In 1961–86 he was director of the Rade Končar Company, from 1982 to 1986 he was speaker of the Croatian republican assembly, and until 1988 he headed the Croatian republican Presidium. On 17 March 1989 the all-Yugoslav parliament appointed Marković head of the Federal Executive Council (government). He initially tried to modify the Socialist economic model but finally decided to introduce a market economy. In cooperation with Jeffrey Sachs, Marković worked out a program of economic reform close to the Polish “shock therapy” of Leszek Balcerowicz. The basic elements of the reform, which started on 18 December 1989, were the following: 10,000 old dinars were exchanged for one new dinar; the rate of exchange of the new currency was established at seven dinars for one German mark; the internal convertibility of the dinar was introduced; there was a partial liberalization of imports and prices, privatization, and privileges for foreign investors. Within the first six months, Marković managed to curb inflation from more than 2,500 percent per annum to almost zero. On 29 July 1990 Marković formed his own party, the Alliance of Reform Forces of Yugoslavia (Savez Reformskih Snaga Jugoslavije [SRSJ]), striving to maintain the unity of Yugoslavia. Nevertheless, in the elections of April and May 1990, most of the voters supported parties advocating national goals. Even in multiethnic Bosnia-Herzegovina the SRSJ gained only 5.4 percent of the vote and in Macedonia, 9.2 percent.

Marković failed to prevent the declarations of Slovene and Croatian independence on 25 June 1991. While the election of Stipe Mesić as Yugoslav president was blocked by the Serbs for months and the position of head of the Yugoslav armed forces was vacant, Marković authorized the Yugoslav People’s Army (YPA) to defend the Yugoslav borders. On 27 June 1991 the YPA started operations against Slovenia, which cost several dozen lives. Marković denied having ordered the use of force. In response the minister of defense, Veljko Kadijević, accused Marković of lying. The conflict was aggravated when Marković criticized the YPA operations against Croatia. In October 1991 the presidential palace in Zagreb, where Marković was talking with Franjo Tuđman, was bombed. Marković found that it was a YPA attempt on his life. Marković did not accept the budget for 1992, calling it a “war budget,” and he resigned on 20 December 1991. (AO)

Sources: Susan Woodward, Balkan Tragedy (Washington, D.C., 1995); Misha Glenny, The Fall of Yugoslavia (London, 1992); Warren Zimmermann, Origins of a Catastrophe (New York and Toronto, 1996); Laura Silber and Allan Little, The Death of Yugoslavia (London, 1995); Željko E. Šuster, Historical Dictionary of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Lanham, Md., 1999); Bugajski.

MARKOVIĆ Sima (8 November 1888, Kragujevac—after July 1939, USSR), Serb Communist leader, victim of Stalinist purges. The son of a teacher, Marković graduated in mathematics from Belgrade University, and in 1913 he obtained a Ph.D. there. From 1907 he was in the Serbian Social Democratic Party, belonging to the direktaši faction, formed by the supporters of the syndicalistic “direct action.” After World War I and the creation of the Kingdom of Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes (SHS) in 1918, Marković lectured at Belgrade University but was expelled for his revolutionary views. From the creation of the Communist Party of Yugoslavia (CPY) in April 1919, Marković was a member of its leadership. In June 1920 he was elected secretary general of the party and an MP to the parliament. In June 1921 he attended the Third Congress of the Communist International and was elected to its Executive Committee. After his return to the SHS, he was arrested and sentenced to a two-year imprisonment. After his release Marković went to Moscow, where, under the pseudonym “Semić,” he took an active part in Comintern activities. In April 1925 he clashed with Stalin, criticizing his approach to nationalist issues; therefore the Comintern suspended him from the party executive. Despite this, in 1926 at the party congress in Vienna Marković was again elected the CPY secretary general. Under pressure from the Comintern, the next congress of the CPY in Dresden ousted Marković from the party leadership, and in 1929 he was expelled from the party itself for his “rightist views.” Following his return to Yugoslavia, Marković, under the pseudonym “V. Bunić,” wrote several works in mathematics and philosophy. From 1931 he was kept a prisoner by the Yugoslav authorities. In 1934 he was allowed to leave for the USSR, where he lived as “Milan Milić.” In 1935 Marković was again admitted to the CPY, in which he did not hold any positions, working only at the Institute of Philosophy of the USSR Academy of Sciences. In July 1939 he was arrested as an “agent of imperialism” and sentenced to ten years of hard labor. After that Marković disappeared without a trace. (WR) Sources: Enciklopedija Jugoslavije, vol. 6 (Zagreb, 1965); Branko Lazitch, Biographical Dictionary of the Comintern (Stanford, 1986).

MAROSÁN György (15 May 1908, Hosszúpályi–20 December 1992, Budapest), Hungarian Communist activist. The son of a teacher and organist in a Greek Catholic church, from 1917 Marosán was brought up in an orphanage in Debrecen. In 1926 he moved to Budapest. In 1927 he joined the Hungarian Social Democratic Party (HSDP). In 1939 he was secretary general of the National Union of Food Industry Workers and from 1943 its president. From 1941 Marosán was a member of the Budapest executive of the HSDP. Temporarily arrested in 1942, in 1943 he was regional organizational secretary of the party. In 1944, during the German occupation, Marosán was arrested and interned in Nagykanizsa. Until August 1945 he was national secretary and from 1945 to 1947 secretary general of the HSDP. From February 1947 Marosán was deputy secretary general of the party; from April 1945 he was a member of the Provisional National Assembly; and until 1963 he was a member of parliament. One of the main initiators of the “unification” of the HSDP and the Hungarian Communist Party, Marosán took an active part in the removal of the right wing and the center of the Social Democratic Party. In 1948 he received a decoration from Tito; it was later used as one of the bases for accusations against him. At the “unification” congress of the two workers’ parties in June 1948 Marosán was elected third deputy secretary general and also a member of the CC, the Politburo, and the Secretariat of the Hungarian Workers’ Party (HWP). From August 1948 to July 1949 he was first secretary of the Budapest Committee of the HWP while keeping his other positions. Between June 1949 and August 1950 he served as minister of light industry. At the beginning of July 1950 Marosán was arrested and sentenced to death. The sentence was changed to life imprisonment. At the end of March 1956 Marosán was released, and three months later he was rehabilitated. At a meeting of the CC of the HWP in July 1956 he was elected a member of the Politburo. Between 30 July and 27 October that year he served as vice-premier.

At a congress of the Politburo of the HWP on 23 October 1956, Marosán, citing the threat of a counter-revolution, demanded that orders be given to shoot at demonstrators. On 31 October he was arrested for a short time by the insurgents at Szén Square. On 2 November he went to the Soviet headquarters in Tököl. He joined the so-called Hungarian Revolutionary Government of Workers and Peasants and also the CC and the Politburo of the Hungarian Socialist Workers’ Party (HSWP). In February 1957 Marosán became administrative secretary of the CC and deputy to János Kádár. Between February 1957 and January 1960 he was minister without portfolio, and from April 1957, secretary of the Budapest party committee. Marosán was an advocate of severe repressive measures against the insurgents. In 1962, during the preparation of an HSWP resolution that would put an end to the law-infringing Stalinist trials against activists of the workers’ movement, Marosán formulated a separate statement that led to a conflict with Kádár. In October 1962 the CC of the HSWP removed Marosán from the Politburo and Secretariat and expelled him from the CC. In 1965 Marosán left the HSWP, but in 1972 he again became a party member. In the autumn of 1989 Marosán opposed the dissolution of the HSWP, and he took part in the formation of a new HSWP, which at that time was already a splinter group. In 1989 Marosán’s memoirs, A tanúk még élnek (The witnesses are still alive), were published. (JT)

Sources: A magyar forradalom és szabadságharc enciklopédiája, CD-ROM (Budapest, 1999); William Shawcross, Crime and Compromise: Janos Kadar and the Politics of Hungary since the Revolution (New York, 1974); Bennet Kovrig, Communism in Hungary from Kun to Kádár (Stanford, 1979).

MARTANESHI Baba Faja [originally Xhani Mustafa] (1910, Luzin e Madhe, near Kavajë–19 March 1947, Tirana), Albanian clergyman of the Muslim Bektashis (a sect of Sufis) and participant in the resistance movement. In 1934 Martaneshi took charge of the parish of Martanesh. After the Italian invasion in 1939, he was among the first to form a unit that fought against the occupiers and was based in the region of Elbasan. Martaneshi rallied the Bektashis and other Muslims, who were convinced that the Italians had a negative attitude toward Islam. In 1944 his unit expanded into a battalion, and Martaneshi rose to the rank of colonel. He was one of the people most wanted by the Italians. He became a member of the General Council of the National Liberation Front, established in September 1942. In July 1943 he joined the General Staff of the (Communist) National Liberation Army. After the mysterious death of the Bektashi leader, Saliha Niyazi Dede, in November 1941, the Bektashi movement was split. Martaneshi enjoyed the support of the Communists. He became famous for his proposal to execute those who did not want to fight with the Communists and chose to fight independently. From May 1944 to January 1946 Martaneshi served as vice-president of the Council of the Anti-Fascist Front for National Liberation. An enthusiast of social reforms introduced by the Communists, he was one of those who called for changes aimed at decentralizing the Bektashi community. Martaneshi served as chairman of the Fourth Congress of the Bektashi Clergy (3–5 May 1945), at which he was elected secretary general of this community. In 1945 he became a deputy for the Elbasan district to the People's Assembly. Martaneshi died in unexplained circumstances, murdered in Tirana in a Bektashi shrine by Ded Baba Abazi, who committed suicide shortly afterwards. Some believe that Martaneshi's cooperation with the Communists was the reason for this murder. (TC)

Sources: Bashkimi, 18 November 1945 and 20 March 1947; Bernd Fischer, Albania at War 1939–1945 (London, 1999); Baba Selim R. Kaliçani, Histori e baballarëve te teqese se Martaneshit (Tirana, 1997); David Smiley, Albanian Assignment (London, 1984); Klaus-Detlev Grothusen, ed., Albanien (Göttingen, 1993).

MARTINOVIĆ Mitar (8 November 1870, Bajice, near Cetinje–11 February 1954, Belgrade), Montenegrin general and politician. In 1890 Martinović completed military studies in Turin. He subsequently served in the Montenegrin Army and was promoted to general in 1902. From 1907 to 1910 he served as minister of war. During the Balkan Wars King Nicholas appointed him prime minister, a position he held from 19 June 1912 to 8 May 1913. He also served as minister of war and foreign affairs in the government he headed. Martinović's government failed to retain control over the region of Shkodër, gained during the First Balkan War; it was awarded to Albania. Hoping for Serbian and Russian support, Montenegrin forces captured Shkodër in April 1913, and it was only the threat of war with Austria-Hungary and pressure from the Western powers that made King Nicholas and Martinović abandon their plans. As a result, Martinović resigned as prime minister. During World War I Martinović was in command of the Montenegrin forces on the Herzegovina and Drina front, and he also commanded the Sarajevo offensive. From April to December 1915 he was a delegate of the Montenegrin Army to the Russian Supreme Command and then served as a commander in the region of Kotor. After Montenegro became part of the Kingdom of Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes in 1918, Martinović joined the army of this kingdom and served as deputy commander of an army district. He was the author of Vojni duh i disciplina u vojsci (Military spirit and discipline in the army). (WR)

Sources: Enciklopedija Jugoslavije, vol. 6 (Zagreb, 1965); John D. Treadway, The Falcon and the Eagle: Montenegro and Austria-Hungary, 1908–1914 (West Lafayette, Ind., 1983); www.rulers.org.

MARTNA Mihkel (17 September 1860, Paimpere–24 May 1934, Tallinn), Estonian Social Democratic politician. Aligned with the Marxist movement from the 1880s, at the turn of the century, along with Konstantin Päts, Martna was co-founder of the radical newspaper Teataja, which promoted the cause of Estonian independence and called for radical social reforms. He was an active member of the group led by Päts for only a short time, though, because when the Social Democratic periodical Used was founded Martna transferred most of his articles there. Aligned with a group of Estonian Social Democrats who acted independently from the Russian Social Democratic Workers' Party, Martna called for the transformation of Russia into a democratic republic in which the rights of ethnic minorities would be respected. This program became the basis of the Estonian Social Democratic Workers' Union (Eesti Sotsiaaldemokraatlik Töölise Ühisus [ESTÜ]), established in 1905. The ESTÜ called for autonomy for Estonia within the framework of a Russian federal republic proposed by the Russian left.

Martna took an active part in the 1905 revolution. After its defeat, he emigrated and lived in England and Switzerland from 1906 to 1917. A member of the first foreign delegation of the Estonian National Council (Maapäev), he was assigned the task of getting to Germany and Switzerland to promote the Estonian struggle for independence there. This plan failed, though; on the way Martna got stuck in Copenhagen and stayed there. In 1919 he became an unofficial Estonian representative to Germany, but after a short mission he returned to Estonia owing to illness. In independent Estonia Martna was one of the leaders of the Estonian Social Democratic Workers' Party (Eesti Sotsiaaldemokraatlik Töölise Partei [ESTP]), which sought to establish a Socialist system in Estonia in an evolutionary way; Martna represented the radical wing of this party. It seems that because of this, although generally respected (in 1930 he was awarded an honorary doctorate by the University of Tartu), Martna never held any ministerial positions. From 1931 to 1932 he was chairman of the ESTP. He was a member of parliament (Riigikogu) for five terms, serving as its speaker during the third and fourth terms. Martna published numerous works on contemporary political issues, including Estland, die Esten und die estnische Frage (Estonia, the Estonians, and the Estonian question; 1919). (AG)

Sources: Eesti Entsüklopeedia vol. 14 (Tallinn, 2000); Evald Uustalu, The History of the Estonian People (London, 1952); Tõnu Tannberg, Matti Laur, Tõnis Lukas, Ain Mäesalu, and Ago Pajur, History of Estonia (Tallinn, 2000).

MÁRTON Áron (28 August 1896, Csíkszentdomokos [now Sândominic, Romania]–29 September 1980, Alba Iulia [Gyulafehérvár], Romania), Hungarian Roman Catholic bishop from Transylvania. Márton came from a Szekler family of farmers from Transylvania. During World War I he was wounded three times. After Transylvania was ceded to Romania under the 1920 Treaty of Trianon, Márton decided to stay in the Romanian territories. After completing theological studies, he was ordained a priest in 1924 and worked as a curate. From 1928 to 1929 he served as deputy headmaster of a Catholic high school in Tîrgu Mureş (Marosvásárhely). From 1930 to 1932 he served as a curate and archivist in Alba Iulia (Gyulafehérvár), and in October 1932 he became a minister of Hungarian students in Cluj-Napoca (Kolozsvár). From 1933 to 1938 Márton edited the pedagogical periodical Erdélyi Iskola, which he had helped to found and to which he regularly contributed articles on rural education. He established a non-school-based education network in the territories of the diocese of Alba Iulia. From 1934 to 1938 he was director of the reorganized Transylvanian Roman Catholic National Union.

In December 1938 Pope Pius XI appointed Márton bishop of Alba Iulia, the biggest of the then existing four Roman Catholic dioceses in Transylvania. At that time Márton became the spiritual leader of Hungarians from southern Transylvania who had remained in Romania after the Second Vienna Award of 1940. Márton was against the war, condemned anti-Semitism, and protested the racial persecutions and deportations of Jews. After the end of the war he opposed the Romanian Communist authorities on such issues as the independence of Church-run schools and religious practices. He consistently called for improving the situation of the Hungarian minority, which was deprived of its rights after the war. Márton was arrested in June 1949. Initially his trial was planned as part of the trial of László Rajk, who also came from Transylvania. Finally, in 1951, in a rigged trial Márton was sentenced to ten years in a high-security prison and to forced labor for life on false charges of treason and taking part in a conspiracy. In February 1955 Márton was released on the initiative of former prime minister Petru Groza. However, from 1956 to 1967 Márton was kept under house arrest, which was lifted only after the intervention of Franz König, archbishop of Vienna. (JT)

Sources: Nagy Képes Milleniumi Arcképcsarnok (Budapest, 1999); Magyar Nagylexikon, vol. 12 (Budapest, 2001); Jeromos Szalay, The Truth about Central Europe (Paris, 1955); Pál Péter Domokos, Rendületlenül: Márton Áron Erdélyi püspöke (Budapest, 1990); Dennis Deletant, Communist Terror in Romania: Gheorghiu-Dej and the Police State, 1948–1965 (New York, 1999); László Virt, Nyilott szívvel: Márton Áron erdélyi püspök élete és eszmei (Budapest, 2002).

MASARYK Jan (14 September 1886, Prague–10 March 1948, Prague), Czech diplomat and politician. The younger son of Tomáš Garrigue Masaryk, from 1897 to 1906 Masaryk attended a Realschule and a gymnasium in Prague but failed to pass his high school final examinations. From 1906 to 1913 he worked in the United States, mainly at the Crane railway plant in Bridgeport, Connecticut. During World War I he served in the Austro-Hungarian Army. In 1919 Masaryk entered the Czechoslovak diplomatic service, initially serving as chargé d'affaires in the United States, then as counselor in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs until 1924, and then as ambassador to Great Britain from 1925 to 1938. He pursued the foreign policy laid down by President Edvard Beneš, which was based on alliances with England and France and on the League of Nations. Masaryk enjoyed great popularity in British diplomatic circles and was a frequent guest at the royal court. His broad contacts and charming manners contributed to a positive image of the new state. Masaryk also tried to influence British foreign policy. In the 1930s he was a firm opponent of the Western policy of appeasement and repeatedly warned against Nazism. In 1938 he attempted to thwart German plans to annex Czechoslovakia. As early as February 1938 he intervened with Lord Halifax, urging that the British government abandon its policy of concessions to Germany, and he undertook similar efforts after the incorporation of Austria. Masaryk described the policy of appeasement as dangerous to the entire world. On 25 September 1938 he sent a letter to Prime Minister Neville Chamberlain in which, on behalf of Czechoslovakia, he rejected Hitler's demands. After the Pact of Munich (30 September 1938), Masaryk resigned as ambassador and asked for political asylum. Early in 1939 he went to the United States, where he gave a series of lectures.

After the German invasion and then the partition of Czechoslovakia in March 1939, Masaryk returned to London and resumed his political activities. One of the closest associates of Beneš, he served as minister of foreign affairs (1940–45) and as deputy prime minister (1942–45) in the London-based Czechoslovak government-in-exile headed by Beneš. From 1944 to 1945 Masaryk was also minister of national defense. He made regular wartime broadcasts from London to the Czechoslovak people. Thanks to his efforts as minister of foreign affairs, the Allies recognized the Czechoslovak government-in-exile, Great Britain annulled its signature on the Munich agreement, and Czechoslovakia was accepted as a member of the anti-Nazi coalition.

In April 1945 Masaryk became minister of foreign affairs of the government established on the basis of the Košice program. He attended the founding conference of the United Nations, and as a representative of Czechoslovakia, he signed the UN Charter on 26 June 1945. Masaryk tried to pursue a policy of balance between the Soviet Union and the Western powers, but he increasingly lost independence. In July 1947 he was forced by Stalin to reject postwar U.S. reconstruction aid under the Marshall Plan. During the Communist coup in February 1948 Masaryk criticized the resignation of other non-Communist ministers, considering their step to be erroneous and shortsighted. He represented Beneš as foreign minister in the newly established Communist cabinet of Klement Gottwald, but he never reconciled himself to the fact that the Communists had taken over power in Czechoslovakia. The circumstances of Masaryk's death are not clear to this day. He may have committed a protest suicide, or it may have been a political murder. On 10 March 1948 his body was found in the garden of Czernin Palace, where he had lived in an apartment on the top floor. Masaryk was buried beside his father at Lány Cemetery.

Before his death Masaryk enjoyed great public popularity and support, both because he was the son of President Masaryk, the “father of the nation,” and because of his stance before and during the war. The most popular politician between 1945 and 1948, after his death Masaryk became a symbol of democratic ideals. In 1946 his broadcasts from London were published in the book Volá Londýn (London calling). His wartime broadcasts to occupied Czechoslovakia were published in English as Speaking to My Country (1944). Masaryk's parliamentary speech in which he described his concept of Czechoslovakia's postwar foreign policy was reproduced in Ani opona ani most (Neither a curtain nor a bridge; 1947). (PU)

Sources: ČBS; Politická elita meziválečného Československa 1918–1938: Kdo byl kdo za první republiky (Prague, 1998); Kdo byl kdo v našich dějinách ve 20. století, vol. 1 (Prague, 1998); R. H. Bruce Lockhart, Jan Masaryk: A Personal Memoir (London, 1951); Claire Sterling, The Masaryk Case (New York, 1968); Telford Taylor, Munich: The Price of Peace (New York, 1979); Vladimír Vaněk, Jan Masaryk (Prague, 1994); Pavel Kosatík and Michal Kolář, Jan Masaryk: Pravdivý příběh (Prague, 1998); Zdeněk Šedivý, Jan Masaryk . . . při jméně, které nosil . . . musel zemřít (Vimperk, 1998); Antonín Sum, Otec a syn: Tomáš Garrigue a Jan Masarykové ve vzpomínkách přátel a pametinků (Prague, 2000).

MASARYK Tomáš Garrigue (7 March 1850, Hodonín–14 September 1937, Lány), Czech philosopher, sociologist, politician, and co-founder and first president of Czechoslovakia. Born into a family of limited means, in 1872 Masaryk passed his high school final examinations and began to study classical philology at the School of Philosophy in Vienna. Two years earlier, Masaryk, formerly a Roman Catholic, had joined the Uniate Church. That decision influenced his future views on the place of the church in the state. While a student, Masaryk devoted himself to philosophy, which he believed should help to establish a new, better order in the world. He identified with the concepts of Plato and Auguste Comte. Masaryk was also engaged in social work; he was a member of the Bohemian Academic Society, serving as its chairman from 1874 to 1875. In 1876 Masaryk graduated; his thesis was “The Nature of the Soul According to Plato.” He subsequently studied for a year in Leipzig, where he met an American, Charlotte Garrigue, whom he married in 1878. The following year he earned a postdoctoral degree from the University of Vienna for a study in which he analyzed suicide as a mass phenomenon of modern civilization. Over the following four years Masaryk worked as a Privatdozent at the university in Vienna. After the university in Prague was divided into a German university and a Czech university, Masaryk was appointed associate professor by the Czech university. He taught the history of philosophy, logic, ethics, the foundations of psychology, and sociology.

By then Masaryk already exerted great influence on Czech scholarly and intellectual life. He founded the monthly Athenaeum (1883), becoming its editor-in-chief, and initiated the publication of a new Czech encyclopedia. He was also one of the leading challengers of the authenticity of two thirteenth-century manuscripts: Rukopis královédvorský and Rukopis Zelenohorský; the controversy led to a sharp conflict with the senior academic staff, undermined his position at the university, and fueled numerous political attacks against him. In 1887 Masaryk entered politics, joining, along with Karel Kramář, a group of “realists” that became part of the Young Czech Party in 1890. One year later Masaryk became an MP in the parliament in Vienna and an MP in the Czech provincial parliament. In 1893 he resigned from both seats as a result of conflicts with the leadership of the Young Czech Party. At that time he called for autonomy for the Czech lands within the Habsburg empire and rejected any kind of radicalism. He believed that more could be gained through a steady democratization of Austria-Hungary and through the strengthening of the cultural and economic position of Bohemia within the monarchy and that sovereignty would be gained gradually. Masaryk based his political program upon his own concept of Czech history, which he presented in many works written in the 1890s, including the tetralogy Česká otázka (The Czech question), Naše nynější krise (Our present crisis), Jan Hus, and Karel Havlíček Borovský (1895–96). Masaryk maintained that humanism and freedom, particularly religious freedom, were the most important values in Czech history. He contrasted historical facts with myths and democracy with theocracy, absolutism, and dictatorship. He paid much attention to social issues and to the workers' movement. He called for, among other things, an eight-hour work day and universal suffrage, but he criticized Marxism and rejected revolution as an anachronistic phenomenon. He expounded his views in Otázka sociální (The social question; 1898), as well as in the periodical Naše doba, which he founded in 1893 and edited until 1914.

From 1900 to 1914 Masaryk was leader of the so-called Realist Party, initially known as the Czech People's Party and later—after merging with the Radical Progressive Party—as the Czech Progressive Party. This new party demanded autonomy for the Bohemian lands within the monarchy through changes to the electoral law and the introduction of universal suffrage—for women as well as for men. After 1907, when general elections were introduced, Masaryk again sat in the parliament in Vienna. At that time he dealt with the Slavic issue and worked for integration between the Slovaks and the Czechs, supporting so-called Czechoslovakism—that is, a concept according to which the Czechs and the Slovaks were one nation, speaking different dialects of the same language. Masaryk criticized Vienna's policy in the Balkans (the annexation of Bosnia and Herzegovina, political trials of Serbian and Croatian activists) and the dependency of the Habsburg empire on Germany. He was curious about Russia, which resulted in the work Rusko a Evropa (Russia and Europe; 1913). He was skeptical of pro-Russian sympathies, although he tried not to criticize Russia.

After the outbreak of the war in 1914, Masaryk began to organize an anti-Habsburg movement at home, and in December of the same year he traveled to the West to seek allies for the establishment of an independent state of Czechs and Slovaks. Masaryk worked with Edvard Beneš and Milan Štefánik, striving for international recognition of the future state's right to independence. In 1915 in France he founded the Czech Foreign Committee, which was renamed the Czechoslovak National Council in Paris in 1916. It was an organ that united Czech and Slovak emigrants, and Masaryk served as its president until 1918. Masaryk gained the support of many influential politicians in the West; "Czechoslovakia's liberation from foreign rule" was one of the issues mentioned by U.S. president Woodrow Wilson in 1917. Masaryk also co-organized a secret committee of Czech politicians at home; later it was called the "Mafia." In May 1917, after the fall of tsarism, Masaryk went to Russia, where he became involved in organizing Czechoslovak legions. While in Russia, he witnessed the Bolshevik revolution, toward which he reacted negatively, announcing the neutrality of the Czechoslovak troops. In March 1918, after Bolshevik Russia signed the Treaty of Brest-Litovsk with the Central Powers, Masaryk traveled via Japan to the United States, believing that the Americans would have a decisive influence on the shape of Europe after the war. In America he established contacts with President Wilson and brought about the signing of the Pittsburgh Convention (30 May 1918), which provided for the establishment of an independent Czech and Slovak state with autonomous organs for Slovakia. On 14 October 1918 Beneš informed the Allies that a provisional Czechoslovak government-in-exile was established and Masaryk was its president and prime minister. This government was officially recognized by the Western powers. Four days later Masaryk published the Washington Declaration—a declaration of Czechoslovakia's independence, in which he described the principles for the establishment of the new state. Elected the first president of Czechoslovakia by acclamation of the Revolutionary National Assembly on 14 November, Masaryk returned to his country on 21 December of the same year and took the presidential oath.

A politician who enjoyed the greatest prestige, Masaryk was reelected president in 1920, 1927, and 1934. He strove to consolidate the young state and to strengthen its parliamentary democratic system. As a supporter of Czechoslovakism, Masaryk was against autonomy for the Slovaks, but realizing that there were many nationally conscious minority groups, he advocated that their rights be respected so that they would accept the new Czechoslovak state. Masaryk became leader of an informal political group called Hrad (Castle), which consisted of his faithful friends and associates, who had liberal and reformist views and who exerted strong influence on the Czech political scene. Masaryk advocated that the presidential powers be increased according to the American model. He frequently represented Czechoslovakia abroad but left the implementation of the country's foreign policy to Beneš, his closest associate and successor. Masaryk based the security of Czechoslovakia on the Western powers and had a negative attitude toward the Bolshevik government in Russia. On 14 December 1935 Masaryk resigned as president for health reasons. Until the end of his life he lived at Lány Castle. Already during his lifetime he was honored for what he had done for the country. For example, in 1930 the parliament pronounced that "T. G. Masaryk deserves credit for his services to the state," and after his resignation he was styled "President-Liberator." Masaryk became the symbol of Czech democracy and moral authority, and he was the subject of folk legends.

In his philosophical views, Masaryk was a proponent of critical realism, which was based on positivism and which combined empirical research and rational criticism with the recognition of the role of man's emotional attitude to the world. He understood divinity as a creative and ruling power that gave sense and aim to everything. Masaryk's views had much influence on future Czech and Slovak thinkers. Masaryk left his memoirs from the time when the Czechoslovak state was being created: Světová revoluce za války a ve válce, 1914–1918 (1925; The Making of a State: Memoirs and Observations, 1914–1918, 1927). (PU)

Sources: ČBS; Kto bol kto za I. ČSR (Bratislava, 1993); Politická elita meziválečného Československa 1918–1938: Kdo byl kdo za první republiky (Prague, 1998); Kdo byl kdo v našich dějinách ve 20. století, vol. 1 (Prague, 1998); Karel Čapek, Hovory z T. G. Masarykiem, vols. 1–3 (Prague, 1928–35); Zdeněk Nejedlý, T. G. Masaryk, vols. 1–4 (Prague, 1930–35); R. W. Seton-Watson, A History of the Czechs and Slovaks (Hamden, Conn., 1965); Milan Machovec, T. G. Masaryk (Prague, 1968); Emil Ludwig, Defender of Democracy (New York, 1971); Jan Galandauer, T. G. Masaryk a vznik ČSR (Prague, 1988); T. G. Masaryk (1850–1937), vols. 1–3 (London, 1989–90); Jan Patočka, Tři studie o Masarykovi (Prague, 1991); Janusz Gruchała, Tomasz G. Masaryk (Wrocław, 1996).

MĀSĒNS Vilis (17 November 1902, Dikļi, Livonia–15 July 1964, New York), Latvian diplomat. After graduating from a Realschule in Valmiera, Māsēns studied chemistry (1920–22) and law (1922–24) at the University of Riga. From 1923 to 1927 he worked as a clerk at the consulate general in London. In 1928 he graduated from the London School of Economics and Politics. From 1930 to 1931 he was a secretary at a legation in Kaunas, and in 1931 he became an attaché. From 1933 to 1937 he served as secretary at a legation in Paris. After returning to his country, Māsēns became head of the Western Department and (in 1938) head of the Baltic Department of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. After the Red Army seized Latvia, he was dismissed from his position in September 1940, but he avoided deportation. In 1944 Māsēns went to Germany. In 1947 he earned a doctorate in law from the University of Heidelberg and subsequently worked as a counselor at the International Refugees Organization. In 1950 he left for the United States and became an activist in the Assembly of Captive European Nations (ACEN), where he served as Latvia's representative and chairman of its general committee (1958–62). (EJ)

Sources: Es viņu pazīstu (Riga, 1939); Daugavas Vanagu Mēnešraksts, 1964, no. 5; Daugavas Vanagi, 1964, no. 5; A. Rumpēters, "Dr. iur. Vili Māsēnu pieminot," Latviešu Juristu Raksti, 1968, no. 9.

MASHERAU Pyotr [known as Masherov in the USSR] (26 February 1918, Shyrki, Vitebsk region–4 October 1980), Belorussian Communist activist. Born into a peasant family, Masherau graduated from the Vitebsk Pedagogical Institute (1939) and subsequently worked as a physics teacher in Rasonsk (1939–41). In August 1941 he helped organize a partisan movement in the Vitebsk region, becoming the commander of a unit in October 1942 and of a brigade in March 1943. In October 1943 Masherau was transferred to party work. After the Vilnius region was seized by the Red Army, he became secretary of the Komsomol for the Vileyka region and subsequently head of a Komsomol organization in the Molodechno district. In October 1947 he was made first secretary of its Central Committee (CC). In July 1954 he became second secretary of the Brest City Committee of the Communist Party of Belorussia (CP of Belorussia); in August 1955 he became first secretary of the District Committee in Brest, and in October 1959, secretary of the CC of the CP of Belorussia. In March 1965 Masherau succeeded Kiryl Mazurau as first secretary of the CC of the CP of Belorussia and held this post until his death. From 1961 to 1964 he was also a member of the CC of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union (CPSU). Under his leadership the Belorussian SSR enjoyed economic prosperity, boosted by large investments in heavy industry. Monuments to Yakub Kolas and Yanka Kupala were built in Minsk, but at the same time the intensity of Russification and Sovietization increased—all young people belonged to the Komsomol, and every eleventh citizen was a member of the Communist Party. Masherau died in a car crash on the way from Baranovichy to Minsk in rather mysterious circumstances. (EM)

Sources: Archie Brown, ed., The Soviet Union: A Biographical Dictionary (London, 1990); Entsyklopedyia historyi Bielarusi, vol. 5 (Minsk, 1999); V. Yakutov, Petr Masherov (Minsk, 1992); Jan Zaprudnik, Historical Dictionary of Belarus (Lanham, Md., 1998); S. Antanovich, Petr Masherov: Zhizn', sud'ba, pamiat'. Dokumentalnaia povest' (Minsk, 1998).

MASOL Vitaliy (14 November 1928, Olyshivka, near Chernihiv), Soviet party and state official, prime minister of the Ukraine. In 1951 Masol graduated in mechanical engineering from the Kiev Polytechnic Institute. In 1953–71 he worked in a machine-building factory in Novokramatorsk, first as an engineer and later as the director. In 1972 he became deputy chairman of the Planning Commission of the Ukrainian SSR, and in 1979 he became its chairman and the first deputy prime minister of the Ukrainian SSR. From 1976 Masol was a member of the Central Committee (CC) of the Communist Party of the Ukraine, and in 1981–86 he was a member of the Central Inspection Commission of the CPSU. On the wave of personnel changes after the Chernobyl disaster, on 10 July 1987 Masol became prime minister of the Ukrainian SSR, continuing with conservative policies. In March 1990 he became deputy to the Supreme Council of the Ukrainian SSR. In view of the Communist domination in the council (the so-called Group of 239) over the independence-minded opposition, it proved impossible to oust the Masol government in a parliamentary way. Therefore, on 1 October 1990 the opposition undertook a failed attempt at a general strike. Hunger strikes by Kiev and Lviv students (2–16 October 1990), who were demanding Ukrainian sovereignty, had one goal: the dismissal of Masol. In order to prevent social upheaval, the chairman of the Supreme Council, Leonid Kravchuk, sacrificed Masol, who resigned on 14 November 1990. For the second time Masol became prime minister of the independent Ukraine on 16 June 1994, when President Kravchuk wanted to gain the support of the Russian-speaking and pro-Communist constituency of Eastern Ukraine in forthcoming presidential elections. After his victory, the new president, Leonid Kuchma, confirmed Masol as prime minister, but Masol proved unprepared for the job and unwilling to introduce reforms. His government lasted until 1 March 1995, when Masol stepped down under pressure from Kuchma. (TS)

Sources: Encyclopedia of Ukraine, vol. 3 (Toronto, 1993); W. Baran and V. Danylenko, Ukraina v umovakh systemnoi kryzy (1946–1980-i rr.) (Kiev, 1999); Bohdan Nahaylo, The Ukrainian Resurgence (Toronto, 1999); Volodymyr Lytvyn, Ukraina na mezhi tsysyacholit (1991–2000 rr.) (Kiev, 2000).

MATEŠA Zlatko (17 July 1949, Zagreb), Croatian politician. Mateša graduated in law from the University of Zagreb. He also studied at the Henley Management College in the United Kingdom. In 1978 he became assessor in a Zagreb court. He worked as a legal adviser for the INA petrochemical combine (1978–80); he was then head of its legal department (1980–82), director of the legal and personnel departments (1982–85), and general manager (1985–89). Later he became deputy chairman of the INA board of trustees and then general director of the board (1990–92). In 1992–93 Mateša was director of the Agency for Restructuring and Development. A close aide of President Franjo Tudjman and one of the leaders of the Croatian Democratic Union (Hrvatska Demokratska Zajednica [HDZ]), from April 1993 to September 1995 he was minister without portfolio and from September to November 1995, minister of the economy. From 7 November 1995 to 27 January 2000 Mateša was prime minister. During his term Croatian relations with the Western countries were rather cold. Croatian authorities were accused of violations of democracy and a lack of support for the Dayton Agreement of November 1995. Mateša made clear his critical assessment of The Hague Tribunal for War Crimes in Former Yugoslavia. Relations improved in 1999, when Mateša supported the NATO intervention in the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia. Croatia emerged from international isolation when Tudjman died and the opposition took over power after the parliamentary elections of January 2000. The ruling HDZ was defeated, and Mateša stepped down, drawing closer to the Croatian Democratic Center (Hrvatski Demokratski Centar). (AO)

Sources: Europa Środkowo-Wschodnia 1996–1999 (Warsaw, 1999–2001); Biographical Notes, Polish Press Agency PAP, February 2000.

MATSKEVICH Uladzimir (1 March 1947, Marina Gorka, near Mahilyow [Mogilev]), Soviet general, head of the Belorussian KGB. In 1970 Matskevich graduated from the Belorussian Technological Institute and in 1978 from the KBG Institute of the Belorussian Soviet Socialist Republic. From 1970 he worked as an engineer at the oil refinery in Mozyr, and from 1973 he was active in the Komsomol structures in the region of Homel. From 1976 he was a KGB official in Homel and in the Vitebsk region. From 1990 to 1993 Matskevich was head of the KGB administration of Minsk and the Minsk region, and in 1993–94, of the Brest district. In 1995 President Alyaksandr Lukashenka appointed Matskevich head of the KGB of Belorussia with the rank of lieutenant general. Matskevich has played a major role in strengthening and maintaining the dictatorial regime of Lukashenka, supervising the apparatus that has terrorized opponents of the regime. Some of the opposition leaders, such as, for instance, Viktar Hanchar, have disappeared under mysterious circumstances. (WR)

Sources: Bielarusaika entsyklapiedyia, vol. 10 (Minsk, 1999); Kto yest kto w Respublike Belarus (Minsk, 1999); Jan Zaprudnik, Historical Dictionary of Belarus (Lanham, Md., 1998).

MATULAITIS-MATULEVIČIUS Jurgis (13 April 1871, Marijampolė–27 January 1927, Kaunas), Lithuanian bishop beatified by the Catholic Church. One of eight children born into a poor peasant family, Matulaitis-Matulevičius was orphaned at an early age and remained under the care of an uncle. He studied at a seminary in Kielce, enrolled under the Polish surname of Matulewicz. Later on he also used the Lithuanized version of this surname, Matulevičius. He completed seminary studies in Warsaw and St. Petersburg. Ordained a priest in 1899, he worked in a parish in the diocese of Kielce and then continued his studies in Fribourg, Switzerland, earning a Ph.D. in 1902. After returning home, Matulaitis-Matulevičius was appointed professor and vice-rector of the seminary in Kielce. He was an ardent supporter of the social teachings of Pope Leo XIII. An expert in the field of Catholic social thought, he was active among workers, helping to establish (among other things) the Christian Democratic movement. He also edited Pracownik Polski. In 1907 he began teaching at the newly established Department of Sociology at the Theological Academy in St. Petersburg. In 1909 he entered the Marian order, reestablished its structures in Lithuania, and subsequently became the superior of this order. From 1911 to 1914 he was head of the Marian order in Fribourg, and then he worked in Warsaw, where in 1915 he restored the Marian monastery at Bielany.

In October 1918 Pope Benedict XV appointed Matulaitis-Matulevičius bishop of Vilnius. Vilnius changed hands several times in 1918–20 because it was the subject of a sharp dispute between the Poles, who were the majority of the Vilnius population, and the Lithuanians, who wanted Vilnius—the former Lithuanian capital—to be part of the Lithuanian state. Thus Matulaitis-Matulevičius found himself in the center of a conflict between two Catholic communities. He constantly strove to understand and reconcile the Poles and the Lithuanians. At the same time, though, he supported the right of Belorussians and Lithuanians to use their own language; because of this stance, he was sharply attacked by Polish nationalists. These attacks increased after the Vilnius region was finally incorporated into Poland in 1922. After Poland signed the concordat in 1925, Matulaitis-Matulevičius resigned as bishop and went to Rome to dedicate himself to the development of the Marian order. Appointed titular archbishop of Adulis and apostolic visitor to Lithuania by Pope Pius XI, he sought to establish a Lithuanian metropolis in Kaunas, and he laid the groundwork for a concordat with the Lithuanian Republic. Lithuanian nationalists never forgave him that he had resigned as bishop of Vilnius. In the summer of 1926 Matulaitis-Matulevičius went to the United States, where he visited Marian monasteries he had founded. Shortly after returning to Rome, he fell ill and died. Taking into account his moral virtues as well as his work for Polish-Lithuanian reconciliation, Pope John Paul II completed his beatification process, declaring him a Blessed of the Catholic Church on 28 June 1987. (WR) Sources: EL, vol. 3; Saulius Sužiedelis, Historical Dictionary of Lithuania (Lanham, Md., 1997); K. Čibiras, ed., Arkivyskupas Jurgis Matulevičius (Marijampolė, 1933); C. Reklaitis, Il Servo di Dio Giorgio Matulaitis (Rome, 1955); Stanley C. Gaucias, Archbishop George Matulaitis (Chicago, 1981); Tadeusz Górski, MIC, Rozmówiony w Kościele: Błogosławiony arcybiskup Jerzy Matulewicz (Warsaw, 1987).

MATULIONIS Teofilis (4 July 1873, Kadariškiai–20 August 1962, Šeduva), Lithuanian bishop. After completing theological studies at a seminary in St. Petersburg (1900), Matulionis worked in a parish in Latvian Latgalia. In 1910 he became a priest in the parish of the Most Sacred Heart of Jesus in St. Petersburg and worked among the working class. In 1923 he was arrested and sentenced in the Moscow trial of Archbishop Jan Cieplak to a three-year imprisonment for protesting the expropriation of churches. Released after two years, Matulionis was secretly consecrated bishop in 1929. He became auxiliary bishop in the apostolic administration of the archdiocese of Mogilev (now Mahilyow, Belarus), covering all of Russia. Arrested and interrogated for one year, in 1930 Matulionis was sentenced to ten years of forced labor on the Solovets Islands. Ill and emaciated, after two years he was transferred to a prison, then to a labor camp near Leningrad, and later to a prison hospital in Moscow. Exchanged for imprisoned Lithuanian Communists in 1933, he went to Lithuania. In 1934–36 Matulionis visited the United States and several West European countries. He was also received by Pope Pius XI, to whom he gave an account of conditions in the Soviet Union. After returning to Lithuania, Matulionis served as a judge in an ecclesiastic court in the archdiocese of Kaunas and as chaplain to the Benedictine order and chaplain to the Lithuanian armed forces (1940). In 1943 he was appointed ordinary bishop of Kaišiadorys. After the Red Army seized Lithuania in 1944, Matulionis continued his pastoral duties for some time, but in 1946 he was arrested and imprisoned, first in the Vladimir Prison and then in a labor camp in Potma in the Mordovian ASSR. Released in 1956, he was banned from exercising his pastoral ministry and was held under house arrest in Birštonas and then in Šeduva, where he died. In February 1962, shortly before his death, Matulionis was elevated to archbishop by Pope John XXIII. (WR) Sources: EL, vol. 3; Annuario Pontificio, 1958; T. Narbutas, Four Martyred Bishops (N.p., 1953); Pranas Gaida, Nemarus mirtingasis arkivyskupas Teofilus Matulionis (Rome, 1981); Irena Mikłaszewicz, Polityka sowiecka wobec Kościoła katolickiego na Litwie 1944–1965 (Warsaw, 2001).

MATUSZEWSKI Ignacy (10 September 1891, Warsaw–3 August 1946, New York), Polish politician. Born into an intelligentsia family, after graduating from high school in Warsaw, Matuszewski studied philosophy in Kraków, law in Dorpat (Tartu), and architecture in Milan. In 1913 he began studying agriculture in Warsaw. Mobilized into the Russian Army, he fought on the Galician front. In April 1917 he was promoted to captain, and in June of that year, he was one of the organizers of the First General Congress of Polish Military Men in Petrograd. Matuszewski helped to establish Polish military units in Russia and then served in the First Polish Corps and joined the Polish Military Organization (Polska Organizacja Wojskowa [POW]). In February 1918 he led the military capture of Minsk by Polish troops and then assumed command of this city. In May of that year he unsuccessfully attempted to remove General Józef Dowbór-Muśnicki from the command of the First Corps and to send his units to fight against the Germans. In the summer of 1918 Matuszewski was head of POW intelligence for Russia, Ukraine, and Belorussia. In late October he became a member of the POW High Command, and in early November he helped organize the Polish Army. Assigned to the General Adjutancy of Commander-in-Chief Józef Piłsudski, at the end of 1918 Matuszewski began serving in the Sixth Department and then in the Second Department (Intelligence) of the General Staff. In August 1920 he became head of this department and was a military expert to the Polish delegation at the peace negotiations with the Bolsheviks in Riga. In July 1923 he resigned as head of intelligence and took a one-year course at the Military College.

Promoted to colonel in August 1924, after the coup of May 1926 Matuszewski became head of a department in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, and in April 1927 he became director of the Administrative Department of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. Regarded as a member of the so-called group of colonels, he was an envoy to Hungary until September 1929; from April 1929 to May 1931, during the initial stage of the Great Depression, he served as head of the Ministry of the Treasury. At that time he signed a “match loan” agreement in Sweden, the terms of which were rather disadvantageous for Poland. Matuszewski also unsuccessfully attempted to balance the budget. He considered his main task to be the protection of a fixed exchange rate for the Polish zloty. A supporter of deflation policy, Matuszewski resigned as a result of a conflict with Piłsudski over the budget for the army. Later, he became a leading journalist of the pro-government Gazeta Polska. An adherent of Edward Rydz-Śmigły, in May 1936 Matuszewski resigned from the editorial staff after a conflict with the government of Felicjan Sławoj Składkowski, and he became chairman of Towarzystwo Kredytowe Miejskie (City Credit Company) in Warsaw. In September 1939 he was in charge of evacuating the gold reserves of the Bank of Poland to France. After the capitulation of France, Matuszewski made his way to the United States in July 1940 and became one of the founders of the National Committee of Americans of Polish Descent (Komitet Narodowy Amerykanów Polskiego Pochodzenia). He published extensively in the Polish émigré press, criticizing the policies of the governments led by General Władysław Sikorski and Stanisław Mikołajczyk. Matuszewski's publications include Próby syntez (Attempts at syntheses; 1937).

Sources: PSB, vol. 20; Kto był kim w Drugiej Rzeczypospolitej (Warsaw, 1994); Zygmunt Karpiński, O Wielkopolsce, złocie i dalekich podróżach (Warsaw, 1971); Feliks Młynarski, Wspomnienia (Warsaw, 1971); Władysław T. Kulesza, Koncepcje ideowo-polityczne obozu rządzącego w Polsce w latach 1926–1935 (Wrocław, 1985).

MATUSZEWSKI Stefan (2 December 1905, Giżyn, near Mława–21 March 1985, Warsaw), Polish Communist activist. Born into a peasant family, Matuszewski graduated in theology from Warsaw University in 1930. He was ordained a priest but then left the priesthood. In 1937 he joined the Polish Socialist Party (Polska Partia Socjalistyczna [PPS]) and was active in the Society of Workers University. During World War II he was in the Soviet Union, serving, from 1943 to 1944, in the Polish Army, which was being formed there under the auspices of the Kremlin. After returning to Poland, in cooperation with the Communists, Matuszewski organized Communist-dependent PPS structures. In September 1944 he became deputy head of the Information and Propaganda Department of the Polish Committee of National Liberation (Polski Komitet Wyzwolenia Narodowego [PKWN]). In 1945 he served as secretary general and deputy chairman of the Central Executive Committee of the so-called licensed (i.e., permitted by the authorities) Polish Socialist Party (Polska Partia Socjalistyczna [PPS]) and advocated that the PPS be incorporated into the Polish Workers' Party (Polska Partia Robotnicza [PPR]). In August 1946 Matuszewski was suspended as a PPS member for his vehement speeches in support of this merger. From December 1944 to September 1946 he was minister of information and propaganda, and from 1944 to 1947, he was a deputy to the National Home Council (Krajowa Rada Narodowa [KRN]). When in 1948 the pro-Communist orientation prevailed within the PPS, Matuszewski again became one of the PPS leaders and worked for the incorporation of the PPS into the PPR. He served as chairman of the PPS Provincial Committee in Warsaw Province, a member of the Chief Council and Central Executive Committee of the PPS, and secretary of the Central Commission of Trade Unions (Komisja Centralna Związków Zawodowych [KCZZ]). After the Polish United Workers' Party (Polska Zjednoczona Partia [PUWP]) was established, Matuszewski served as first secretary of the PUWP Executive Committee in Warsaw from 1948 to 1949 and as a member of the Central Committee (CC) and deputy member of the PUWP CC Politburo from 1948 to 1954. In 1949–52 he was president of the Mass Organizations Commission of the PUWP CC and government plenipotentiary responsible for a program to eliminate illiteracy. From 1952 to 1954 he was head of the PUWP CC Administrative Department. Matuszewski's influence diminished after the March 1954 congress of the PUWP, when he left the Politburo. From 1952 to 1956 he was an MP, and from 1952 to 1957, a member of the Council of State. In October 1956 he supported the dogmatic Natolin faction. Later Matuszewski taught at Warsaw University. (PK)

Sources: Mołdawa; Włodzimierz Janowski and Aleksander Kochański, Informator o strukturze i obsadzie personalnej centralnego aparatu PZPR 1948–1990 (Warsaw, 2000); Krystyna Kersten, Narodziny systemu władzy: Polska 1943–1948 (Poznań, 1990); Marek Łatyński, Nie paść na kolana: Szkice o opozycji lat czterdziestych (Warsaw, 1987).

MATWIN Władysław (17 July 1916, Grodziec), Polish Communist activist. The son of a miner, Matwin graduated from high school. In the 1930s he was active in the Communist Party of Poland, and he spent 1938–39 in exile in Czechoslovakia. During World War II he was in the Soviet Union, where he joined the Soviet-sponsored Union of Polish Patriots and was its representative in Tehran, Iran. In 1945–46 Matwin was secretary of the Polish Embassy in Moscow. In 1946–48 he was secretary of the Provincial Committee of the Polish Workers' Party (Polska Partia Robotnicza [PPR]) in Wrocław, and from March to October 1947 and July to December 1948 he was its first secretary. During a party congress in December 1948, when the Polish United Workers' Party (Polska Zjednoczona Partia Robotnicza [PUWP]) came into being, Matwin sharply criticized Władysław Gomułka. From December 1948 to June 1949 Matwin was first secretary of the PUWP Provincial Committee in Wrocław, and then until November 1952 he was chairman of the Main Board of the Union of Polish Youth (Związek Młodzieży Polskiej [ZMP]). During his term, the Polish Scouting Association was incorporated into the ZMP, and the union's daily, Sztandar Młodych, was started. From December 1952 to February 1954 Matwin was first secretary of the PUWP Warsaw Provincial Committee, and from January 1954 to March 1956 and from November 1956 to March 1957 he was editor-in-chief of the party daily, Trybuna Ludu.

From 24 January 1955 to 30 November 1963 Matwin was secretary of the PUWP Central Committee (CC), and from March 1957 to October 1963 he was also first secretary of the PUWP Provincial Committee in Wrocław. After Nikita Khrushchev made his secret speech at the Twentieth CPSU Congress in February 1956, Matwin declared himself in favor of a new line for the Polish Communist Party. He criticized the overgrowth of the CC apparatus and its low standards. He suggested structural changes in the party organization. His duties included supervision of the Democratic Party, the Main Political Administration of the army, and youth organizations. He controlled CC departments of education, planning and finance, and administration. Initially Matwin opposed the rehabilitation of Gomułka. At the same time party dogmatics accused him of loosening censorship. Matwin was one of the "young secretaries" of the PUWP, considered to be in the Puławska faction. From October 1952 to April 1965 Matwin was an MP, and from August 1952 to November 1956, a member of the Presidium of the All-Polish Conference of the National Front. Gradually sidelined, he studied mathematics and later worked in this field. In the course of time Matwin drew closer to the revisionist opposition. (PK)

Sources: Mołdawa; Antoni Czubiński, Dzieje Najnowsze Polski 1944–1989 (Poznań, 1992); Włodzimierz Janowski and Aleksander Kochański, Informator o strukturze i obsadzie personalnej centralnego aparatu PZPR 1948–1990 (Warsaw, 2000); Andrzej Albert [Wojciech Roszkowski], Najnowsza historia Polski 1914–1993, vol. 2 (Warsaw, 1995).

MAURER Ion (23 September 1902, Bucharest–8 February 2000, Bucharest), Romanian Communist activist and lawyer. Maurer's mother was Romanian and his father was a German from Alsace who had taught French to Crown Prince Charles of Romania. After finishing high school in Craiova, Maurer studied law at the University of Bucharest, graduating in 1923 and then earning a Ph.D. from this university. He subsequently practiced as a counsel for the defense in political trials. In the 1930s he defended some leaders of the Communist Party and favored revolutionary Marxism. In 1936 Maurer joined the Communist Party of Romania. From 1941 to 1943 he was imprisoned in a concentration camp for his Communist activities. In August 1944 he helped the leaders of the party, including Gheorghe Gheorghiu-Dej, to escape from the camp. After the coup d'état and the arrest of Marshal Ion Antonescu, Maurer served as deputy minister of transportation and public works (1944–46). From 1945 to 1955 he was a member of the Central Committee (CC) of the Romanian Communist Party, which from 1948 to 1965 was known as the Romanian Workers' Party (RWP). From 1946 to 1947 Maurer was minister of national education; from 1947 to 1948, minister of industry and trade. From 1946–47 he was a member of the Romanian delegation to the Paris Peace Conference. From 1948 to 1952 he was first deputy president of the Council of Ministers, and from 1952 to 1957, director of the Institute of Legal Studies of the Romanian Academy of Sciences. In 1955 Maurer became a member of the Romanian Academy of Sciences. From 1957 to 1958 he was minister of foreign affairs. In 1960 he again became a member of the RWP CC, and in 1965, a member of the Standing Presidium of the Executive Committee of the RCP CC. He served as chairman of the Grand National Assembly until 1961.

On 21 March 1961 Maurer became prime minister and held this post until 29 March 1974. From 1965 to 1974 he also served as vice-president of the Council of State. As prime minister and a close associate of Gheorghiu-Dej, Maurer implemented Gheorghiu-Dej's neo-Stalinist concepts of economic policy, the nationalist line in domestic policy, and a foreign policy that was relatively independent of the Soviet Union. In March 1964 Maurer went to Beijing and unsuccessfully attempted to bring about a resumption of the Soviet-Chinese dialogue. After the death of Gheorghiu-Dej in March 1965, Maurer was instrumental in Nicolae Ceaușescu's succession. Although Gheorghiu-Dej had wanted Gheorghe Apostol as his successor, Maurer proposed the candidacy of Ceaușescu, who promised Maurer that he would keep him on as prime minister. Maurer also hoped that Ceaușescu would be more efficient in maintaining a relative independence from Moscow. Ceaușescu initially continued the policy of abandoning intensive industrialization and laying greater emphasis on consumer goods, which characterized the last years of Gheorghiu-Dej's rule, but in 1971 he returned to neo-Stalinist methods in economic policy and to intensive industrialization, and he also began to build an extensive personality cult around himself. Maurer, who advocated a greater decentralization of the state and the economy, became an opponent of Ceaușescu and his personality cult. In 1974, like many other former associates of Gheorghiu-Dej, Maurer was forced to resign and to retire from politics. In the 1980s he maintained secret contacts with the anti-Ceaușescu opposition within the party, and in 1987 he was the co-author of a letter with proposals for reforms in Romania; the letter was addressed to Mikhail Gorbachev and delivered to the embassy of the Soviet Union. (LW)

Sources: Ion Alexandrescu, Ion Bulei, Ion Mamina, and Ioan Scurtu, Enciclopedia de istorie României (Bucharest, 2000); Dictionar Enciclopedic, vol. 4 (Bucharest, 2001); Ion Rațiu, Contemporary Romania (Richmond, 1975); Vlad Georgescu, Istoria Românilor de la origini pînă în zilele noastre (Oakland, 1984); Juliusz Demel, Historia Rumunii (Wrocław, 1986); Lavinia Betea, Maurer și lumea de ieri (Arad, 1995); Józef Darski, Rumunia: Historia, współczesność, konflikty narodowe (Warsaw, 1995); Dorina N. Rusu, Membrii Academiei Române 1866–1999 (Bucharest, 1999); Dennis Deletant, Communist Terror in Romania: Gheorghiu-Dej and the Police State, 1948–1965 (New York, 1999).

MAZEPA Izaak (16 August 1884, Kostobobriv, Chernihiv Province–18 March 1952, Augsburg, Germany), Ukrainian politician. Mazepa studied in St. Petersburg, where he was an active member of the Ukrainian Student Hromada (community). In 1905 he joined the underground Ukrainian Social Democratic Workers' Party (Ukrayins'ka Sotsial-Demokraticheskaya Rabochaya Partiya [USDRP]) and soon became one of its leaders. From 1911 to 1917 Mazepa worked as an agronomist. After the February 1917 revolution he was a member of the Yekaterinoslav City Duma and the Yekaterinoslav Soviet of Workers' and Peasants' Deputies. In April 1918 he became head of the Yekaterinoslav Provincial Revolutionary Soviet. Under the rule of Hetman Pavlo Skoropadskyyi, Mazepa co-edited the USDRP paper, Nasha Sprava. In January 1919 Mazepa was a delegate to the Labor Congress in Kiev and was elected secretary of the USDRP Central Committee (CC). In April 1919 he became minister of interior in the government of the Ukrainian National Republic (Ukrayins'ka Narodna Republika [UNR]). On 29 August 1919 Mazepa was appointed prime minister of the UNR government. He opposed territorial concessions and announced his resignation in protest against the Piłsudski-Petlyura treaty of April 1920, but when the Polish-Ukrainian forces entered Kiev, Mazepa formally continued to serve as head of government until late May 1920. Later, he held the post of UNR minister of agriculture. In late 1920 Mazepa settled in Lwów (Lviv), and in 1923 he emigrated to Czechoslovakia. From 1927 he was an associate professor (docent) at the Ukrainian Husbandry Academy and its successor, the Ukrainian Technical and Husbandry Institute (UTHI), in Poděbrady. He represented the USDRP at international Socialist conferences and was a member of the Executive Committee of the Labor and Socialist International.

In 1945 Mazepa settled in Germany. In 1946 he became a professor at the UTHI in Munich. He co-founded the Ukrainian National Rada—a parliament of Ukrainians in exile—and was the first chairman (prime minister) of its executive organ from 1948 to 1952. He was also a founding member of the Ukrainian Socialist Party in exile (established in 1950). Mazepa's publications include the following: Bolshevyzm i okupatsiia Ukrainy (Bolshevism and the occupation of the Ukraine; 1922); a two-volume outline of Ukrainian policies, Pidstavy nashoho vidrodzhennia (Foundations of our rebirth, 1946); and memoirs of the years 1917–21, Ukraina v ohni i buri revoliutsii (Ukraine in the fire and storm of revolution, 2 vols.; 1941). Mazepa also wrote scholarly works on such topics as Carpathian mountain pastures. (GM) Sources: Encyclopedia of Ukraine, vol. 3 (Toronto, 1993); Entsyklopediia Ukraïnoznavstva, vol. 4 (Lviv, 1994); Panas Fedenko, Issak Mazepa: Botets za voliu (London, 1954); “Issakovi Mazepi na vichnu pamiat,” Nashe Slovo, 1973, no. 3; Ryszard Torzecki, Kwestia ukraińska w Polsce w latach 1923–1929 (Kraków, 1989).

MAZOWIECKI Tadeusz (18 April 1927, Płock), Polish politician. Mazowiecki studied law at Warsaw University. In 1949–55 he was connected with the periodical Dziś i Jutro and with the (Catholic) association PAX of Bolesław Piasecki that cooperated with the Communist Party. In 1950–52 he was deputy editor-in-chief of the PAX daily, Słowo Powszechne, and from 1953 to 1955 he was editor-in-chief of the PAX weekly, Wrocławski Tygodnik Katolików. In 1955 Mazowiecki led the so-called Fronda and was suspended as a PAX member. In October 1956 he co-founded the All-Polish Club of the Progressive Catholic Intelligentsia. From 1957 he belonged to the board of the Catholic Intelligentsia Club (Klub Inteligencji Katolickiej [KIK]), and in 1975–81 and 1988–90 he was its deputy chairman. In 1958 Mazowiecki co-founded the monthly Więź and was its editor-in-chief until 1981. Inspired by the personalist thought of Emanuel Mounier, Mazowiecki advocated an opening of the Catholic Church to contemporary social change; he initiated dialogue with non-believers, supported ecumenism, and pointed to the necessity to democratize the Communist system. From 1961 to 1971 he was an MP on behalf of the club Znak (Sign). In 1968 he co-authored a parliamentary interpellation concerning repression of students taking part in the March 1968 events.

In the 1970s Mazowiecki belonged to the non-conformist wing of the Znak movement, favoring a dialogue with the secular revisionist opposition. In 1976 he co-initiated protests against amendments to the constitution. He was a spokesman for the hunger strike in St. Martin Church in Warsaw (May 1977). He organized a session on human rights in the Warsaw KIK (October 1977), was an active member of the Society of Scientific Courses (1978–81), and published in the uncensored press. In August 1980 Mazowiecki chaired the Commission of Experts of the Inter-Factory Strike Committee in Gdańsk, and he was one of the architects of the August Accord. Later he was one of the key advisers to Lech Wałęsa and the National Coordination Commission of Solidarity. He was also editor-in-chief of the weekly Tygodnik Solidarność. Supporter of a moderate line, Mazowiecki tried to avoid confrontation with the Communist powers and to allow Solidarity to survive and democratize the Communist system. Interned from 13 December 1981 to 23 December 1982, in 1983–84 Mazowiecki chaired the KIK Program Council and was an adviser to Wałęsa. In the summer of 1988 he advised the strike committee in the Gdańsk Shipyard and co-organized the Civic Committee of the Chairman of Solidarity. A key negotiator during preparations for the Round Table Talks (February–April 1989), as well as one of the participants, Mazowiecki chaired the negotiating group on trade union pluralism. From June 1989 he was again editor-in-chief of Tygodnik Solidarność. He did not run in the parliamentary elections of 4 June 1989, disagreeing with the way “social” candidates were selected.

On 24 August 1989 Mazowiecki was appointed prime minister, forming a cabinet with only a few Communist ministers—the first postwar government in Poland not fully controlled by the Communists. As prime minister, he started systemic transformations: a limitation of links with the Soviet Union and rapprochement with the West; the liquidation of the system of nomenklatura; local self-government reforms; the abolition of censorship; and scrutiny of the Civic Militia and security service functionaries. Mazowiecki’s government started an economic transformation toward a market economy (Leszek Balcerowicz’s “shock therapy”) and concluded a Polish-German treaty confirming the existing border between the two countries (14 November 1990). From early 1990 Mazowiecki’s policies were increasingly criticized by a more radical part of the Civic Parliamentary Club and by Wałęsa as too cautious in dismantling the old system; this started the so-called “war at the top.” The conflict among the Solidarity elite made Mazowiecki run against Wałęsa in the presidential elections. On 25 November 1990 Mazowiecki won 18 percent of the vote, coming in third. He lost not only to Wałęsa, but also to an obscure candidate, Stanisław Tymiński. As a result, he resigned from the premiership, and his resignation was accepted by the parliament on 14 December 1990. From 2 December 1990 Mazowiecki chaired the Democratic Union (Unia Demokratyczna), formed by his followers from the presidential campaign. After it merged with the Gdańsk Liberals into the Union of Freedom (Unia Wolności [UW]) in 1994, Mazowiecki was UW chairman until April 1995. From 1991 to 2001 he was an MP, and in 1992–93 he chaired the Constitutional Commission of the National Assembly. From 1992 to 1995 Mazowiecki was a special reporter of the UN Committee on Human Rights in Former Yugoslavia. Co-author of the constitutional compromise of 1997, Mazowiecki authored numerous books and articles, including Rozdroża i wartości (Crossroads and values; 1970) and Internowanie (Internment; 1983). Mazowiecki retired from politics in 2002. (AF)

Sources: Mołdawa; Kto jest kim w Polsce (Warsaw, 2001); Andrzej Micewski, Współzadzić czy nie kłamać? (Paris, 1978); Jerzy Holzer, “Solidarność” (Warsaw, 1983); Timothy Garton Ash, The Polish Revolution: Solidarity (New York, 1985); Zbigniew Domarańczyk, 100 dni Mazowieckiego (Warsaw, 1990); Tadeusz Mazowiecki: Polityk trudnych czasów (Warsaw, 1997); Jan Skórzyński, Ugoda i rewolucja: Władza i opozycja 1985–1989 (Warsaw, 1995); Antoni Dudek, Pierwsze lata III Rzeczypospolitej 1989–2001 (Kraków, 2002).

MAZUR Franciszek [originally Horodenko] (1 August 1895, Volkovtse, Podolia–7 March 1975, Warsaw), Polish Communist activist of Ukrainian descent. Mazur's biography is obscure at some points and contains gaps. Born into the family of a farm worker, he took part in the Bolshevik revolution of 1917 and in the civil war in Russia. In 1919 he joined the All-Russian Communist Party (Bolsheviks). He later probably worked for the NKVD and the judicial persecution apparatus in the Ukraine. In 1930 Mazur came to Poland and became a member of the Central Committee (CC) of the Communist Party of Poland (Komunistyczna Partia Polski [KPP]). He also directed the work of the Communist Party of Western Ukraine (KPZU) and was imprisoned by the Polish authorities. In September 1939 he was in the Soviet Union. In 1945 he came to Poland, and in August of that year he became secretary of the CC of the Polish Workers' Party (Polska Partia Robotnicza [PPR]). From 1946 to 1948 Mazur headed the Organizational Department of the PPR CC. In November 1948 he became a deputy member of the Politburo and a member of the Organizational Bureau of the PPR CC. In 1946 he joined the National Home Council (Krajowa Rada Narodowa [KRN]). In 1947 he became an MP in the Constituent Assembly, and in 1948 he served as president of the PPR parliamentary representation.

Elected to the CC of the Polish United Workers' Party (Polska Zjednoczona Partia Robotnicza [PUWP]) in December 1948, Mazur was in charge of the CC Organizational Department and served as a member of the Organizational Bureau and a deputy member of the Politburo of the PUWP CC. In May 1950 he became a member of the Politburo, secretary of the PUWP CC Organizational Bureau, and secretary of the PUWP CC. One of the Kremlin's most trusted co-workers in the party executive, Mazur was a very influential figure, supervising (among other things) the cooperative movement, youth organizations, and the clergy. He was also one of the people in charge of the ministry of national defense and security. He was responsible for the economic, foreign, financial and administrative departments, as well as others. In 1953 Mazur was in charge of establishing a "special sector" within the CC for controlling the security police. He was deputy speaker of the first Assembly (1952–56). From 1952 to 1957 he served as vice-president of the Council of State. He was one of the chief implementers of the policy to persecute the Catholic Church in 1950–56.

He signed an agreement with the Episcopate on 14 April 1950, but he was also co-responsible for the decision to arrest Cardinal Stefan Wyszyński in September 1953. On his initiative, in March 1953 the PAX association of Bolesław Piasecki took over Tygodnik Powszechny, removing the legitimate editorial staff. Mazur was a close associate of Bolesław Bierut and was aligned with the dogmatic Natolin faction in the PUWP. In May 1956 he took part in negotiations with Władysław Gomułka on Gomułka's return to power. From late September to mid-November 1956 Mazur was in the Soviet Union. At the Eighth CC Plenum in October 1956 he left the Politburo and Secretariat of the PUWP CC, and in March 1959 he was dropped from the CC. Mazur was a member of the PUWP Central Audit Committee from 1959 to 1964 and an ambassador to Czechoslovakia from 1957 to 1965. He subsequently retired. (PK)

Sources: Mołdawa; Józef Światło, Kulisy partii i bezpieczeństwa (N.p., n.d.); Jan Nowak, Wojna w eterze (London, 1985); Antoni Czubiński, Dzieje Najnowsze Polski 1944–1989 (Poznań, 1992); Włodzimierz Janowski and Aleksander Kochański, Informator o strukturze i obsadzie personalnej centralnego aparatu PZPR 1948–1990 (Warsaw, 2000).

MAZURAU Kiril [known as Mazurov in the Soviet Union] (7 April 1914, Rudnia Prybytkouskaya, near Homel–19 December 1989, Moscow), Soviet activist in Belorussia. In 1933 Mazurau finished a course in road construction in a technical high school in Homel, and in 1947 he graduated from the Higher Pedagogical School of the Central Committee (CC) of the Communist Party (Bolshevik) of Belorussia [CP(B)B]). From 1936 to 1939 he served in the Red Army and was a political worker of the Belorussian railways. From 1939 to 1941 he worked in the Komsomol apparatus. In June 1941 Mazurau began serving on the front line, initially as a political officer of a company, and in 1942, of the Twenty-first Army, with the rank of lieutenant colonel. In September 1942 he became a representative of the Red Army General Staff in the partisan movement in the territories of German-occupied Belorussia. In 1943 he was again transferred to work in the Komsomol. After the war Mazurau became first secretary of the Komsomol. From 1947 onwards he worked in the apparatus of the CP(B)B CC, holding a variety of posts, including that of secretary of the Municipal Committee and the District Committee in Minsk. From 1953 to 1956 he served as chairman of the Council of Ministers of the Belorussian SSR. He was the first Belorussian to assume the post of first secretary of the CP(B)B CC (July 1956). Mazurau served as head of the party and head of the political authorities of the Belorussian SSR until 1965 and was instrumental in increasing the degree of Sovietization of Belorussia in all areas of social and cultural life. At the same time Belorussia went into a new stage of industrialization, modeled on that of the Soviet Union. Mazurau had ambitions to make Belorussia a leader among other Soviet-dominated republics in building a “developed Communist” society. From 1965 to 1978 Mazurau was a member of the Politburo of the CC of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union and first deputy prime minister of the Soviet Union. From 1950 to 1979 he was a deputy to the Supreme Soviet of the USSR. Dismissed at the end of Leonid Brezhnev’s rule, Mazurau served as president of the All-Union Council of War and Labor Veterans from 1986 until the end of his life. (EM)

Sources: Archie Brown, ed., The Soviet Union: A Biographical Dictionary (London, 1990); Jan Zaprudnik, Historical Dictionary of Belarus (Lanham, Md., 1998); Entsyklapedyia historyi Bielarusi, vol. 5 (Minsk, 1999); Bielaruskaia entsyklapiedyia, vol. 9 (Minsk, 1999).

MEČIAR Vladimír (26 July 1942, Zvolen), Slovak politician. After graduating from high school in 1959, Mečiar was a white-collar worker in the county National Committee (NC) in Žiar nad Hronem. In 1962 he joined the Communist Party of Czechoslovakia (CPC), and he became active in its youth organizations. In 1967–68 he chaired the regional committee of the Socialist Union of Czechoslovak Youth. From 1967 to 1969 he was deputy chairman of the Committee of People’s Control in the county NC. In 1970 Mečiar was expelled from the CPC for supporting the Prague Spring of 1968. Until 1973 he worked as a blue-collar laborer in Western Slovakia. He also graduated in law from the University of Bratislava. In 1973–90 Mečiar was a legal adviser to the Skloobal Nemšova Company.

Mečiar started his political career during the Velvet Revolution of 1989. He was one of the founders and leaders of the Public against Violence (Verejnosť proti Nasiliu [VPN]). From January to June 1990 he was minister of interior and the natural environment of the Slovak republic. As a result of the first free elections in June 1990, Mečiar won a seat in the Chamber of the People of the Federal Assembly on behalf of the VPN. From 27 June 1990 to 23 April 1991 he was head of the Slovak government. In March 1991 he entered into conflict with the VPN leadership and created a platform called For a Democratic Slovakia. This led to his dismissal from the premiership. Mečiar left the VPN, and at the end of April 1991 he created the Movement for a Democratic Slovakia (Hnutie za demokratické Slovensko [HZDS]). At the founding congress of the party, on 22 June 1991, Mečiar was elected its chairman. The party adopted a populist program with the slogan of a “social market economy” and with particular reference to the “Slovak question.” Mečiar was increasingly critical of the economic reforms of Václav Klaus, combining his criticism with nationalist rhetoric. He demanded a Czechoslovak confederation and a separate “Slovak economic road.” He gained massive support, so the HZDS won the June 1992 elections in Slovakia. Mečiar became an MP to the Slovak National Council, and on 24 June 1992 he resumed the position of Slovak prime minister. In view of the simultaneous victory of his main opponent, Klaus, in the Czech lands, the Czechoslovak federation was doomed. After negotiations with Klaus, on 1 January 1993 Czechoslovakia was dissolved.

Mečiar was the first prime minister of the newly independent Slovak state, but soon he had to face inter-party struggles. Due to his autocratic style, the HZDS split twice. In March 1993 a group led by Milan Kňažko left, and a year later a group led by Jozef Moravčík seceded. Also, President Michal Kováč, elected by the ruling majority, increasingly distanced himself from Mečiar. Mečiar’s government could not handle these pressures, and on 14 March 1994 the parliament voted Mečiar out of government. Nevertheless, he managed to force early elections. On 30 September and 1 October 1994 the HZDS won almost 35 percent of the vote and created a new cabinet with the extreme right-wing Slovak National Party and the populist Association of Slovak Workers. Mečiar became prime minister again and held this position from 13 December 1994 to 29 October 1998. His term was marked by an authoritarian style, a violation of democratic rules, and an incoherent foreign policy. Mečiar carried out a purge in an effort to marginalize the opposition. His main target was President Kováč, the only political figure he could not dismiss. Mečiar limited presidential powers and used various forms of pressure to make Kováč resign. These efforts culminated with the kidnapping of Kováč’s son and his deportation to Austria by the special services headed by a trusted aide of Mečiar, Ivan Lexa. Despite these pressures, Kováč did not resign. With the termination of his term, on 2 March 1998 Mečiar took over most of his powers and amnestied those involved in the kidnapping of Kováč’s son. Mečiar performed presidential duties until 29 October 1998.

“Mečiarism” also had negative effects in Slovakia’s foreign relations. Because of the twists and turns in Mečiar’s foreign policy and his undemocratic rule, the country was dropped from the first group of possible candidates to NATO and the European Union. Despite pro-Western declarations, in practice Mečiar forced rapprochement with Russia and sent discouraging signals to the West. In 1997 he manipulated a referendum on Slovakia's entry into NATO. In fact he isolated Slovakia in the international arena. Despite his autocratic style, Mečiar hesitated to falsify the elections of September 1998. Although the HZDS won the largest number of votes, the anti-Mečiar coalition won a majority, and the HZDS was forced into the opposition. Mečiar announced his withdrawal from politics, but when direct presidential elections were announced, he decided to run. In May 1999 he came in second in the first round but lost in the second round to the candidate of the ruling coalition, Rudolf Schuster. Before the parliamentary elections of September 2002, Mečiar raised new fears, since his return to power could have slowed down Slovakia's integration with the Euro-Atlantic structures. In July 2002 Ivan Gašparovič left the HZDS because he was disappointed that his name was not on the list of candidates; he then formed the Movement for Democracy (Hnutie za Demokraciu [HZD]). Gašparovič's departure seriously weakened the HZDS, which won only 19.5 percent of the vote and remained in the opposition. In a referendum in 2003 Mečiar called on his followers to support entry into the European Union, but this did not help him in the presidential elections of April 2004, in which he lost to Gašparovič. (PU)

Sources: ČBS; Kdo byl kdo v našich dějinách ve 20. století, vol. 1 (Prague, 1998); Eric Stein, Czecho/Slovakia: Ethnic Conflict, Constitutional Fissure, Negotiated Breakup (Ann Arbor, 1997); Ján Lid'ák, Viera Koganová, and Dušan Leška, Politické strany a hnutia na Slovensku po roku 1989 (Bratislava, 1999); Marian Leško, Mečiar a mečiarizmus (Bratislava, 1998); Dana Podracká and L'uba Šajdová, Slovenské tabu: Vladimír Mečiar (Bratislava, 2000); Svätoslav Mathé, Slovenská politika v rokoch 1848–1993 (Martin, 2001); Jan Rychlík, Rozpad Československa: Česko-slovenské vzťahy 1989–1992 (Bratislava, 2002).

MEDENIS Janis (31 May 1903, Praulienas–10 May 1961, Murjanos), Latvian writer and poet. In 1922–33 Medenis studied philology in Riga, and from 1927 to 1937 he was secretary of the editorial staff of a multi-volume dictionary of the Latvian language, Latviešu Konversācijas Vārdnīca. Medenis's collections of poems—Torņi pamale (The towers on the horizon; 1926), Tecila (Whetstone; 1933), Verenība (Power; 1936), and Teiksmu raksti (Symbols from legends; 1942)—belong among the greatest achievements of twentieth-century Latvian lyrical poetry. During the Soviet and German occupation of 1940–44 Medenis lived in Latvia. In 1945 he attempted to go to Sweden but was captured by Soviet security forces. He was held for several years in a prison in Latvia, and at the end of the 1940s he was sent to the mines on the Kolyma River. His poem Milky Way is an evocation of the traumatic experiences of that period. In 1955 Medenis was allowed to return to his native land, but he was relegated to total oblivion, and his creative work was passed over in silence. His collection Dienu krāšņums (Beauty of the days) was not published until 1958. Medenis never regained his health and died prematurely as a result of the labor camp ordeals. (WR)

Sources: Rolfs Ekmanis, Latvian Literature under the Soviets, 1940–1975 (Belmont, Mass., 1978); Romuald J. Misiunas and Rein Taagepera, The Baltic States: Years of Dependence, 1940–1980 (Berkeley, 1993).

MEDGYESSY Péter (19 October 1942, Budapest), Hungarian post-Communist politician. The son of a white-collar worker from Transylvania, in 1962–66 Medgyessy studied economics at the Karl Marx Economics University in Budapest, and later he received a Ph.D. there. From 1966 he worked in the Ministry of Finance, heading its price, international finance, and budget departments in the 1980s. From 1982 deputy minister and from 1987 the minister of finance, Medgyessy authored a tax reform. From 23 November 1988 to 3 May 1990 Medgyessy was deputy prime minister in the government of Miklós Németh, responsible for economic liberalization and privatization. In 1990–94 he chaired the Magyar Paribas Bank, connected with a French capital group, and from 1994 to 1996 he was chairman of the Hungarian Bank of Investments and Development (MBFB). From July 1994 to July 1998 Medgyessy was minister of finance again, this time in the government of Gyula Horn. He managed to slightly curb inflation and to accelerate economic growth, as well as to introduce a new pension system. From 1998 to 2001 he chaired the Inter-Europa Bank and the insurance company Atlasz. After the parliamentary elections of April 2002, in which a coalition of the (post-Communist) Hungarian Socialist Party and the Alliance of Free Democrats won a slight majority, on 27 May 2002 Medgyessy became prime minister of the government based on this coalition. In August 2002 the daily Magyar Hírlap disclosed that in 1977–82 Medgyessy had cooperated with Communist counterintelligence. He initially denied this accusation, but when solid proof was presented, he admitted this had been the case; however, the affair hardly damaged his reputation as prime minister. Medgyessy's government played an important role in encouraging Hungarians to vote for accession to the European Union in a referendum in May 2003. Because of a conflict with the Free Democrats, Medgyessy had to resign from the government on 29 September 2004. (WR) Sources: Rudolf L. Tökes, Hungary's Negotiated Revolution: Economic Reforms, Social Change, and Political Succession, 1957–1990 (Cambridge, 1996); Rzeczpospolita, 26 August 2002; www.kancellaria.gov.hu/miniszterelnok/index_e.html; www.cidob.org/bios/castellano/lideres/m-010.htm.

MEIDANI Rexhep (17 August 1944, Tirana), Albanian physicist and politician. In 1966 Meidani graduated in physics from Tirana University and started working at its Department of Physics. In 1973–76 he specialized in spectrometry and magnetic resonance at the Universities of Caen and Paris XI (Orsay). From 1977 Meidani lectured at the university in Prishtina, and in May 1981 he returned to Paris, where in 1984 he received a Ph.D. in the physics of solid substances. In 1987 he became a professor. Accepted by the Enver Hoxha regime, Meidani was fully loyal, so in 1988 he became dean of the Natural Sciences Department, and in 1992, chair of Theoretical Physics. Until 1997 he mostly dealt with research at Tirana University. Well known in the international community of solid substance physicists, he took part in many international conferences and worked as a visiting professor at universities in Cluj (Romania), Siegen (Germany), Portsmouth (UK), and Boston, Massachusetts. In 1990 Meidani was appointed head of the State Electoral Commission. From November 1994 he was active in the Albanian Center for Human Rights, editing its press organ. From July 1996 he belonged to the (post-Communist) Albanian Socialist Party (Partia Socialiste e Shqipërisë [APS]), and a month later he became its secretary general. In the elections of June 1997 Meidani won a seat in the parliament, which elected him president. He assumed the office on 24 July 1997, resigning from the ASP. Meidani strove to strengthen relations with the European Union, supporting the Albanian government's attempts to avoid a spillover from the Kosovo conflict of 1999 and to prevent the penetration of Muslim fundamentalist fighters into Albania. Meidani authored twenty-three books and textbooks, as well as several dozen articles in theoretical physics that were published abroad. He received honorary doctorates from universities in Sofia (Bulgaria) and Salonika (Greece). Meidani's term ended on 24 July 2002. (TC)

Sources: Elez Biberaj, Shqipëria ne tranzicion: Rruga e vështrisë drejt Demokracisë (Tirana, 2001); Józefa Wiśniewska, "Redžep Mejdani," Przegląd Albański, 1997; Europa Środkowo-Wschodnia 1999 (Warsaw, 2000); president.gov.al/biograph.htm.

MEIEROVICS Sigfrids (5 February 1887, Durbe, Courland–22 August 1925, Tukums), Latvian politician, economist, and diplomat. The son of a doctor, Meierovics completed a trade school in Riga in 1908, and in 1911 he graduated from the Department of Trade of the Riga Polytechnic Institute. In 1915 he started working at a bank in Moscow, and in 1916 he moved to Rēzekne, where he worked as a clerk in a food supply department of the Union of Russian Towns on the north front. From February 1917 Meierovics was active in Riga, where he was among the founders of the Peasant Union. In October 1917, along with Janis Cakšte and Latvian deputies to the Duma, he became a member of the Latvian Refugee Committee. In St. Petersburg, this committee worked on (among other things) plans for the autonomy of and social reforms in Latvia. Meierovics was elected to the Presidium of the first Latvian National Assembly, which became the Latvian Provisional National Council (LPNC) on 18 November 1917. He was head of the foreign affairs department of the council.

In January 1918 Meierovics became a member of the first foreign diplomatic mission of the LPNC, sent to establish relations with the Entente states and to gain recognition for Latvia as a sovereign state, independent of both Russia and Germany. The talks, between Meierovics and the ambassadors of Great Britain, France, and the United States, coincided with the signing of the Treaty of Brest-Litovsk, in which Soviet Russia ceded the Latvian territories to Germany. This hindered Latvia's aspirations for independence. To prevent the cession of these territories to Germany, in the summer of 1918 Meierovics left for England, where on 11 November 1918 he succeeded in obtaining the recognition of the LPNC as the government of Latvia and confirming his own status as an informal representative of Latvia. On 19 November Meierovics was formally appointed the first Latvian foreign minister. In 1919 he represented Latvia at the Paris Peace Conference. In July 1919 he returned to Latvia, and in October 1919 he took part in the struggle against the intervention of White Russian troops. From 1920 Meierovics was a member of the Latvian Constituent Assembly, and from 1922, of the parliament. He held the post of foreign minister until January 1924, serving simultaneously as prime minister between 19 June 1921 and 26 January 1923 and between 28 June 1923 and 26 January 1924. He headed talks with the governments of Estonia and Lithuania that led to the creation of the so-called Baltic Entente, and in 1921 he gained de jure international recognition for Latvia. In December 1924 he resumed the post of foreign minister. Meierovics died tragically in a car accident and was buried in Riga. (AG/EJ)

Sources: Emile Doumergue, La Lettonie et la Baltique (Paris, 1919); [A. Tupiņš], Sigfrīds A. Meierovics (Riga, 1925); Latvijas ārlietu ministra Z. A. Meierovica piemiņai (biogrāfija un ģimenes) (Riga, 1925); Divu cilvēku traģēdija (Riga, 1925); Zigfrīda un Kristīnes Meierovics Piemiņas albums (Riga, 1926); Alfreds Bilmanis, A History of Latvia (London, 1952); Gore, "Zigfrīds Anna Meierovics (1887–1925) un Latvijas ceļš uz neatkarību," Latvijas Vēsture, 1993, no. 2; A. Lerhis, "Zigfrīds Anna Meierovics (1887–1925)," Latvijas Vēstures Institūta Žurnāls, 2000, no. 3.

MEKSI Aleksander Gabriel (8 March 1939, Tirana), Albanian archaeologist and politician. Born into an Eastern

Orthodox family, in 1960 Meksi graduated in engineering from the Polytechnic University of Tirana. After two years of work at the water power plant in Shkopeti, he started doing research at the Institute of Cultural Monuments and the Institute of Archaeological Studies, specializing in medieval and Byzantine architecture. In 1988 Meksi received a Ph.D. He co-authored a couple of textbooks for students. He belonged to a group of intellectuals who co-founded the Albanian Democratic Party (Partia Demokratike e Shqipërisë [PDS]) and was Sali Berisha's main rival for its leadership. From April 1991 to March 1992 Meksi was a member of parliament and deputy chairman of its presidium. On 13 April 1992 he became prime minister of the government dominated by the PDS. In September 1992, speaking before the UN General Assembly, Meksi pointed to Serb nationalism as the main obstacle to a resolution of the conflicts in the former Yugoslavia. Meksi's term coincided with an aggravation of conflicts with Albania's neighbors: with Yugoslavia the problem was Kosovo, and with Greece it was the Greek minority in Albania and the trial of members of the Omonia organization. In February 1997 Meksi's government became a target of attacks as a result of the collapse of the financial pyramid schemes. Interviewed by The Economist, Meksi stated that his government did not fear a civil war if the post-Communists caused it. As a result of this interview, he gained the nickname "Aleksander i Vogel" (Alexander the Small). On 1 March 1997 Meksi resigned along with his government. He left the PDS and became engaged in economic activities. After the elections of 2001 Meksi returned to the PDS. (TC)

Sources: Miranda Vickers and James Pettifier, Albania: From Anarchy to a Balkan Identity (New York, 1997); Biberaj Elez, Shqipëria ne tranzicion: Rruga e vështrisë drejt Demokracisë (Tirana, 2001); Bugajski.

MELNYK Andriy (12 December 1890, Volia Yakubova, Drohobych County—1 November 1964, Cologne, Germany), Ukrainian political and military activist. Melnyk studied at the Higher School of Agriculture in Vienna (1912–14), but his studies were interrupted by the outbreak of World War I. In 1914–16 he commanded companies (sotnyas) of the Ukrainian Sich Riflemen. After the battle of Lysonia, he was taken prisoner by the Russians and interned in Tsaritsyn, where he became a close aide to Yevhen Konovalets. Melnyk was one of the organizers of a Ukrainian POW group that was later formed into a military unit. Released toward the end of 1917, Melnyk helped to organize the Sich Riflemen and became commander of one of their battalions. He served on the staff of a regiment, a division, a corps, and a group of the Sich Riflemen. In January 1919 he became chief of staff of the army of the Ukrainian National Republic (UNR). After a short period as a Polish prisoner of war, Melnyk served as inspector of a UNR military mission in Prague from 1920 to 1921. At that time he completed his studies, receiving a diploma in forestry engineering. In 1922 he settled in Galicia. After Konovalets had left the country, Melnyk assumed home command of the Ukrainian Military Organization (Ukrainjska Viiskova Orhanizatsiia [UVO]). In the spring of 1924 he was arrested and sentenced to five years' imprisonment. He was released toward the end of 1928, partly as a result of the efforts of the UNR president, Andriy Livytskyi. Melnyk began working in metropolitan property administration in Lwów (Lviv). He served as president of the Chief Council of the Orly (Eagles) Catholic Association of Ukrainian Youth and was involved with the Moloda Hromada (Young Company) society. In 1934 he became a member of the UVO senior staff. After the assassination of Konovalets in 1938, Melnyk went abroad and became head of the leadership (provid) of the Organization of Ukrainian Nationalists (Orhanizatsiia Ukraïnskykh Natsionalistiv [OUN]). His leadership was confirmed at the OUN Second Grand Assembly in Rome in August 1939.

After a split in the OUN in 1940, Melnyk became head of an OUN faction that came to be known as the OUN-Melnyk Faction (OUN-M). During World War II Melnyk advocated cooperation with the Germans and organized OUN-M mobile units (pokhidni grupy), which were to take over power in the Ukrainian territories after the outbreak of the German-Soviet war. After the German attack on the Soviet Union in June 1941, Melnyk offered military cooperation to the Third Reich, but the offer was turned down. During the war he was kept under house arrest in Berlin. In January 1942, along with Archbishop Andriy Sheptytskyi, Livytskyi, and other Ukrainian activists, Melnyk submitted a memorandum to Hitler demanding an end to German persecutions in the Ukraine. Arrested in 1944 for his attempts to establish contacts with the Allies, Melnyk was imprisoned for a few months in the Sachsenhausen concentration camp. After the war, Melnyk settled in Luxembourg. He was a co-founder of the Ukrainian National Council. In 1947, at the OUN Third Grand Assembly, he was appointed head of the OUN for life. In 1959 he proposed the idea of a world congress of Ukrainians and a Ukrainian union. Melnyk was also an initiator and then the head of a foundation in memory of Konovalets. (GM)

Sources: Encyclopedia of Ukraine, vol. 3 (Toronto, 1993); Entsyklopediia Ukraïnoznavstva, vol. 4 (Lviv, 1994); Andriy Melnyk 1890–1964 (N.p., 1966); Nepohasnyi ohon' viry (N.p., 1974); Ryszard Torzecki, Kwestia ukraińska w Polsce w latach 1923–1929 (Kraków, 1989); Paul R. Magocsi, A History of Ukraine (Seattle, 1996); Orest Subtelny, Ukraine: A History (Toronto, 2000).

MENZEL Jiří (23 February 1938, Prague), Czech screenplay writer, film director, and actor. In 1962 Menzel graduated from the Department of Film and Television of the Academy of Musical Arts in Prague. He made his debut in 1965 with the movies Zločin v dívčí škole (Crime in a girls' school), based on a story by Josef Škvorecký, and Smrt pana Baltisbergra (The death of Mr. Balisberger). Menzel became famous for his film version of Bohumil Hrabal's Ostře sledované vlaky (Closely watched trains; 1966), for which he received an Oscar in 1967. In a masterly way Menzel connected the drama of wartime with the comic happenings of everyday life, perfectly reflecting Hrabal's prose. The movie placed Menzel among the leaders of the Czechoslovak "New Wave." He confirmed his mastery of subtle style and comic expression in the movies Rozmarné leto (Wanton summer; 1967), Zločin v šantánu (Crime in a nightclub; 1968), and Skřivánci na niti (Larks on a string; 1969). During the so-called normalization after 1968 Menzel's films were banned, and he had to distance himself from his works in public. Nevertheless, he rejected an official demand to return the Oscar because it was an award of the "Zionists." Menzel had problems realizing his subsequent films, such as Postřižiny (Hair clipping; 1980), also based on a work by Hrabal; Slavnosti sněženek (Snowflake festival; 1983); Vesničko má středisková (My sweet little village; 1985); and Konec starých časů (The end of old times; 1989). In the 1990s he put Václav Havel's play, Žebrácká opera (Beggar's opera; 1991), on the screen. In 1969–74 Menzel directed plays in Prague theaters—Semafor, Disk, Divadlo na Zábradlí, and Činoherní Klub—and abroad. He played in numerous films and television series, including Hospoda (The inn; 1996). He also published two collections of columns, Tak nevím (Yes, I don't know; 1996) and Tak nevím podruhé (Yes, I don't know for the second time; 1998). In 1988 he co-founded the European Cinema Society. In 1996 Menzel was awarded the Czech Lion for his contributions to Czech cinema. (PU)

Sources: ČBS; Kdo byl kdo v našich dějinách ve 20. století, vol. 1 (Prague, 1998); International Dictionary of Films and Filmmakers, vol. 2 (Chicago and London, 1991); Geoffrey Nowell-Smith, The Oxford History of World Cinema (Oxford, 1996); Josef Škvorecký, All the Bright Young Men and Women (Toronto, 1971); Antonin Liehm, Closely Watched Films (New York, 1974); Michael Stoil, Cinema beyond the Danube (Metuchen, NJ, 1974); Josef Škvorecký, Jiří Menzel and the History of the Closely Watched Trains (Colorado 1982); Peter Hames, The Czechoslovak New Wave (Berkeley, 1985).

MERI Lennart (29 March 1929, Tallinn—14 March 2006, Tallinn), Estonian politician, journalist, and director of documentary movies. Meri's father, Georg Meri, was a diplomat and translator of William Shakespeare's works.

Because of his father's foreign travels, young Meri attended schools in various countries and learned four languages. When the Red Army occupied Estonia in June 1940, the Meris were in Tallinn, and in 1941 they were deported to Siberia. As a teenager Meri worked felling trees and harvesting potatoes. After World War II, the family was allowed to return to Estonia. In 1953 Meri graduated with distinction from the Department of History and Philology of the University of Tartu, but owing to his past, he was not allowed to work as a historian. As a result he worked as a playwright and director of radio plays. He published a number of reports from remote areas of the Soviet Union in which he presented a fascinating and picturesque world, drawing attention to the growing conflict between local communities and the central bureaucracy. These reports, also published abroad, brought him renown and served as screenplays. Meri's major success was the movie Linutee Tuuled (Winds of the Milky Road; 1977). Some of Meri's works were shown only outside the USSR. In 1986 Meri received an honorary doctorate from the University of Helsinki. He also translated the works of Western writers (among others, Graham Greene and Erich Maria Remarque) into Estonian, as well as the works of Alexander Solzhenitsyn. Meri made use of his foreign travels to inform the outside world about the situation in Estonia, and he made numerous contacts with Western politicians.

In the 1980s Meri was more and more explicit in criticizing the Soviet reality. He joined protests against plans to mine phosphates in Estonia because such mining would spell ecological disaster. In 1988 he established the Estonian Institute (EI), aiming at cultural cooperation with foreign countries and helping Estonian youth to study abroad. Foreign branches of the EI became informal outposts of independent Estonia, and after 1991 they turned into Estonian embassies. In the breakthrough years 1988–91 Meri sympathized with the Popular Front, demanding perestroika in Estonia. After the elections of 12 April 1990 Meri became minister of foreign affairs in the government of Edgar Savisaar, with a mission to reconstruct the foundations of Estonian diplomacy. After leaving the foreign affairs post in January 1991, from April 1991 to October 1992 Meri was ambassador to Finland.

In the presidential elections of October 1992 Meri ran as a candidate of the non-Communist camp. His opponents published materials from his student years that implied he had cooperated with the KGB, but this attack produced the opposite effect of what was intended—that is, it consolidated the opponents of the post-Communist candidate, Arnold Rüütel. In the second round, on 6 October 1992, Meri won the presidency. As president, he was more cautious concerning relations with Russia than he had been in the past. Nevertheless, he favored Estonia's accession to NATO and the European Union. In domestic policy Meri opposed granting Estonian citizenship to Russians. He supported (though with some objections) the economic reforms introduced by the centrist and rightist governments. On 20 September 1996 Meri was reelected, despite the fact that the parliament was then dominated by the left. During his second term Meri continued the earlier policies, but under pressure from the European Union, he agreed to a liberalization of the policy toward the Russian minority. In view of the instability of government coalitions, Meri tried to extend presidential powers with regard to the highest-level appointments in the military and central bank. As a result, the opposition accused him of an excessively liberal interpretation of the constitution. After his second term was over on 8 October 2001, Meri retired from politics. (AG)

Sources: Rocznik Europa Środkowo—Wschodnia 1992 (Warsaw, 1994); Mel Huang, "Estonia's Military Musical Chairs Continue," Central European Review, 2000, no. 20; Bugajski; www.president.ee/eng/president.html; www.rulers.com; www.britannica.com/bcom/eb/article.

MERKYS Antanas (1 February 1887, Bajorai, near Rokiskis—March 1955, USSR), Lithuanian politician. Merkys studied law in Dorpat (Tartu) and Kiev. During World War I he served as an officer in the transport section of the Russian Army. In 1918 he joined the then forming Lithuanian Army. Between March and July 1919 Merkys was defense minister, and in 1922 he went into the civil service. He worked as an attorney, was active in the Nationalist League (Tautininku Sajunga) of Antanas Smetona, and was Smetona's secretary for some time. After the nationalist coup, between December 1926 and August 1927 Merkys again served as defense minister; between 1927 and 1932 he was governor of the autonomous region of Klaipeda, and in 1933–39 he held the post of mayor of Kaunas.

On 21 September 1939 Merkys was appointed prime minister and signed a treaty of mutual assistance with the USSR. The treaty ceded bases in Lithuania to Moscow in exchange for the district of Wilno (Vilnius). Despite the conciliatory attitude of Merkys's government, the Soviet blackmail continued, and the Kremlin multiplied threatening incidents and accusations. On 7 June 1940 Merkys was summoned to Moscow. Molotov accused two Lithuanian ministers of hostile activities and Merkys himself of transforming the Baltic Entente into an alliance directed against the USSR. Merkys tried to mitigate the incidents provoked by the USSR, but to no effect. On 14 June the Kremlin submitted an ultimatum urging the punishment of the two government ministers, the creation of a cabinet that could support the objectives of the treaties with the USSR, and Lithuania's consent to the entry of additional Red Army units. Merkys resigned his post, but as President Smetona fled to East Prussia, Merkys performed Smetona's duties for some time. However, he was not recognized in that capacity by the special Soviet supervisor, Vladimir Dekanozov, who announced that Smetona's leaving meant his resignation, and on 17 June Dekanozov appointed Justas Paleckis as prime minister. The new government soon organized new "elections" to the People's Parliament (Seimas), as well as the incorporation of Lithuania into the USSR. On 16 July 1940 Merkys was arrested by the NKVD and deported far inside the USSR, where he died in unknown circumstances. (WR) Sources: EL, vol. 3; Statys Raštikis, Kovose del Lietuvos (Los Angeles, 1957); Bronis J. Kaslas, ed., The USSR-German Aggression against Lithuania (New York, 1973); Georg von Rauch, The Baltic States: The Years of Independence, 1917–1940 (London, Berkeley, and Los Angeles, 1974); Romuald J. Misiunas and Rein Taagepera, The Baltic States: Years of Dependence, 1940–1980 (Berkeley, 1993).

MESIĆ Stjepan (Stipe) (24 December 1934, Orahovica), Croatian politician. In 1961 Mesić graduated in law from the University of Zagreb, and then he returned to his hometown to become its mayor. In the late 1960s he became an MP of the republican assembly. In 1971 he supported liberalization efforts, known as the Croatian Spring, including initiatives aimed at the strengthening of Croatian autonomy. During the repressions that followed, Mesić was sentenced to one year in prison. After his release he ran a building firm. At the end of the 1980s he became involved in the movement that led to the formation of the Croatian Democratic Union (Hrvatska Demokratska Zajednica [HDZ]). From 1990 Mesić was its secretary and was later chairman of its Main Board. After the first free elections, in May 1990 Mesić became prime minister of the Croatian republic, and he represented it in the Presidium of the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (SFRY). Despite Serb protests but in accordance with the constitution, in July 1991 Mesić was elected chairman of the SFRY Presidium and held this position until December 1991, when the SFRY ceased to exist.

After Croatia gained independence, in September 1992 Mesić was elected speaker of the House of Representatives. In 1994, criticizing the authoritarian rule of President Franjo Tudjman and his policies toward Bosnia-Herzegovina, Mesić left the HDZ. As a result, he was recalled from his office. Along with about 20 percent of the HZD members, Mesić formed a new party, the Croatian Independent Democrats (Hrvatski Nezavisni Demokrati [HND]). Since the HND was not successful, in 1997 Mesić and most of its members joined the Croatian People's Party (Hrvatska Narodna Stranka [HNS]), and he became its deputy chairman. Before the January 2000 elections, the HNS created a coalition with three other centrist parties. The coalition won 14 percent of the vote and supported the center-left government of Ivica Račan. Despite the fact that Mesić enjoyed considerable personal authority, Mesić rather surprisingly won the presidential elections of January and February 2000, gaining 41 percent of the vote in the first round (twice the pre-election predictions) and 56 percent in the second round. In October 2002 he testified before The Hague Tribunal for War Crimes in Former Yugoslavia, accusing Slobodan Milošević of such crimes. Mesić authored several works, including Kako smo srušili Jugoslaviju: Politicki memoari posljednjeg predsjednika Predsjedništva SFRJ (How we broke apart Yugoslavia: Political memoirs of the last chairman of the SFRY; 1992). In January 2005 Mesić was reelected president. (AW)

Sources: Tko je tko u Hrvatskoj (Zagreb, 1993); Europa Środkowo-Wschodnia 1991–1998 (Warsaw, 1992–2000); Karen Dawisha and Bruce Parrot, eds., Politics, Power and the Struggle for Democracy in South-East Europe (Cambridge, 1997); Alex J. Bellamy, "Croatia after Tudjman: The 2000 Parliamentary and Presidential Elections," Problems of Post-Communism, 2001, no. 5; Zoran Kusovac, "The Prospects for Change in Post-Tudjman Croatia," East European Constitutional Review, 2000, no. 2; www.predsjudnik.hr/zivotopis.html.

MESSNER Zbigniew (13 March 1929, Stryj [Stryi, now in Ukraine]), Polish Communist activist. In 1951 Messner graduated from the Higher Economic School in Katowice, and from 1950 he worked there as a researcher. From 1953 he belonged to the Polish United Workers' Party (Polska Zjednoczona Partia Robotnicza [PUWP]). In 1961 he received a Ph.D. and in 1969 his postdoctoral degree; in 1977 he became a professor. From 1968 to 1975 Messner was deputy rector, and from 1975 to 1982 rector, of the Economic Academy in Katowice. He authored several Marxist works on the political economy. From November 1980 to December 1983 he was chairman of the Provincial National Council in Katowice. At the Ninth Extraordinary PUWP Congress in July 1981 Messner joined the party's Central Committee (CC) and its Politburo. From early 1982 to late 1983 he was first secretary of the Provincial PUWP Committee in Katowice. In November 1983 he became deputy prime minister and, on 6 November 1985, prime minister. In 1986–88 Messner chaired the Commission for Economic Reform, endorsing the so-called second stage of reform; it was a cosmetic change in the system, which began to show symptoms of structural crisis. In 1988–89 Messner was also a member of the Council of State, and from 1985 to 1989 he was an MP. After the summer strikes of 1988, realizing the depth of the crisis, the leadership of the (Communist) All-Polish Accord of Trade Unions (a rival to Solidarity) made the Messner government resign on 19 September 1988. After he retired from politics in 1989, Messner was head of the Research Board of the Association of Polish Accountants, which enjoyed the monopoly of chartered accountants. (IS/WR)

Sources: Mołdawa; Kto jest kim w Polsce (Warsaw, 2001); Jan Skórzyński, Ugoda i rewolucja: Władza i opozycja 1985–1989 (Warsaw, 1995); Wojciech Roszkowski, Historia Polski 1914–2001 (Warsaw, 2002).

MEŠTROVIĆ Ivan (15 August 1883, Vrpolje–16 January 1962, South Bend, Indiana), Croatian sculptor. Meštrović was born into a peasant family. His father—the only literate person in his village—helped his son to gain an education. In 1899 Meštrović went to Split, where he was apprenticed to a stonemason who noticed his talent. A year later he went to Vienna. Thanks to the help of a rich entrepreneur, he was accepted into the Academy of Fine Arts, from which he graduated in 1905. After joining the Vienna Secession Group (1903), Meštrović could exhibit his works more often. He lived for some time in France and Italy. His works soon gained the appreciation of August Rodin and other artists. Meštrović's sculpture of the 1389 Battle of Kosovo Field won first prize at an international exhibition in 1911, and critics acclaimed him the greatest sculptor of modern times. In 1914 Meštrović was one of the founders of the Yugoslav Committee (Jugoslavenski Odbor), which sought to realize the Yugoslav idea and unsuccessfully tried to dissuade the Entente states from making territorial concessions to Italy at the expense of the South Slavic nations. After World War I, Meštrović settled in the Kingdom of Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes. He stayed away from politics and rejected a senatorial seat offered him by King Alexander I. He worked as a sculptor and architect. He was also a professor and rector of the Academy of Art in Zagreb. In 1924–25 he was in the United States.

During World War II Meštrović refused to cooperate with the Independent State of Croatia, ruled by the Ustasas. Imprisoned in 1941 but released in 1942, he went to Italy and then to Switzerland, where he came down with an illness and was seriously ill for nearly a year. Josip Broz Tito personally invited Meštrović to come back to Yugoslavia, and, by way of an exception, the new Communist authorities would not confiscate his property. However, he refused to return. In 1949 Meštrović donated his houses in Zagreb and Split to be made into museums; these contain his numerous works. In January 1947 he left for the United States, and in 1952 he took American citizenship. He became a professor at Syracuse University, and in 1955 he transferred to Notre Dame University in South Bend, Indiana. Before his death Meštrović visited Yugoslavia to meet with the ailing cardinal Alojzije Stepinac, who had been released from prison. Meštrović is buried in the village of Otavice, where he built his family mausoleum. During the 1991–95 war in the former Yugoslavia this mausoleum was desecrated and damaged. Meštrović created many works on historical, religious, and biblical themes. His most important works include the Kosovo series, My Mother, Self-Portrait, Madonna and Child, Job's Complaint, Desperation, Crucifix, the monument of Bishop Grgur Ninski (Gregory of Nin), two statues of Indians in Chicago, the Tomb of the Unknown Soldier in Avala (near Belgrade), The Victor at Kalemegdan in Belgrade, and the mausoleum of the Račić family. (AO)

Sources: Milan Curcin, Ivan Meštrović: A Monograph (London, 1919); Laurence Schmeckebier, Ivan Meštrović: Sculptor and Patriot (Syracuse, 1959); Dusko Keckemet, Ivan Meštrović (Belgrade, 1983); Ana Adamec, Ivan Meštrović 1883–1962 (Belgrade, 1983); Tadeusz Wasilewski and Waclaw Felczak, Historia Jugosławii (Wrocław, 1985); www.croatia.net/html/mestrovic.

MEZŐ Imre [originally Izsák Ignác Mehrel] (13 December 1905, Ramocsaháza–1 November 1956, Budapest), Hungarian Communist activist, victim of the 1956 revolution. Born into a poor peasant family, Mező worked as a tailor's apprentice. In 1927 he emigrated to Belgium, where he joined the Communist Party of Belgium in 1929. In 1936, along with his wife, he joined the International Brigades and fought in the Spanish Civil War. He was twice wounded. Interned by the French authorities in 1939, Mező served in the French Army from 1940 to 1941 and then helped to organize the resistance movement. In 1943 he took command of an underground unit of foreign Communists organized by the French Communist Party. In August 1944 he fought in the Paris uprising as one of the leaders of the Patriotic Militia. In June 1945 Mező returned to Hungary and began working in the municipal committee of the Hungarian Communist Party (HCP) in Budapest. In 1948 he became head of the Organizational Department of the Budapest Committee of the Hungarian Workers' Party (HWP). From 1950, except for an interval in 1953–54, he served as secretary of the Budapest Committee. In July 1953 Mező became a supporter of Imre Nagy. In July 1956 he joined the Central Committee (CC) of the HWP. A supporter of reforms, in June 1956 he took part in the famous debates of the Petőfi Circle on the state of the Hungarian press, after which the HWP CC banned the activities of the Petőfi Circle. On 23 October 1956, as head of the HWP Budapest Committee delegation, Mező asked the party leadership for permission to organize a demonstration in front of the statue of General Józef Bem. Subsequently, he was appointed a member of the CC Military Commission. On 30 October, when a delegation of insurgents came to negotiate in the headquarters of the Budapest Committee of the party in Köztársaság Square, a gunfight ensued that turned into a siege of the building. The party and security forces who were defending the building shot even at doctors and nurses who were trying to save the wounded. When the defenders gave up the fight and a group of delegates, among them Mező, started to walk out of the building, they were shot at. A few days later Mező died of his wounds. (JT)

Sources: A magyar forradalom és szabadságharc enciklopédiája, CD-ROM (Budapest, 1999); Magyar Nagylexikon, vol. 13 (Budapest, 2001); György Litván, ed., Rewolucja węgierska 1956 roku (Warsaw, 1996).

MICEWSKI Andrzej (3 November 1926, Warsaw), Polish journalist and political activist. In 1949 Micewski graduated in law from Warsaw University. In 1946–56 he worked for the periodical Dziś i Jutro and for the daily Słowo Powszechne, published by the PAX association, a Catholic organization cooperating with the Communist authorities. After October 1956 Micewski distanced himself from the dogmatic Natolin faction, supported by PAX leader Bolesław Piasecki, and from 1957 he was deputy editor-in-chief of the weekly Za i przeciw. In 1960–70 Micewski was active in the Znak movement and was a member of the editorial board of the monthly Więź. From 1967 he worked with Janusz Zabłocki and his Center of Documentation and Social Studies, which chose closer cooperation with the Communist authorities. In 1971–73 Micewski was editor-in-chief of Verum Press; in 1974–87 he was a member of the editorial board of Tygodnik Powszechny; and in 1985–88 he was editor-in-chief of the Vienna monthly Znaki Czasu, which was close to the Polish Episcopate. From 1984 to 1987 Micewski was a member of the Social Council of the Primate of Poland. In 1997–2001 he was an MP, from 1997 to 1999 on behalf of the Polish Peasant Party and later as an independent. Micewski authored a number of books and articles, including such valuable monographs as Współrządzić czy nie kłamać: PAX i Znak w Polsce 1945–1976 (To co-rule or not to lie: PAX and Znak in Poland, 1945–1976; 1978) and Kardynał Wyszyński:

Prymas i mąż stanu (Cardinal Wyszyński: Primate and statesman; 1982). (IS)

Sources: Kto jest kim w Polsce (Warsaw, 1993); Nowa encyklopedia powszechna PWN, vol. 4 (Warsaw, 1996); Antoni Dudek, Państwo i Kościół w Polsce 1945–1970 (Kraków, 1995).

MICHAEL I Hohenzollern-Sigmaringen (25 October 1921, Sinaia), king of Romania. Michael's father was Charles II, king of Romania (1930–40), and his mother was Queen Helen from the Greek ruling family. Soon after Michael's birth, Charles started a romance with Magda Elena Lupescu, and in 1925 he gave up the throne in favor of his son, who was then a minor. After the death of his grandfather, King Ferdinand, on 20 July 1927, Michael was declared king of Romania. Because he was a minor, a regency council was created that included Michael's uncle, Prince Nicolae; the patriarch of the Romanian Orthodox Church, Miron Cristea; and the chairman of the Supreme Court, Gheorghe Buzdugan. When in 1930 Michael's father returned to Romania and took over the throne as Charles II, Michael was deprived of the crown and given the purely symbolic title of grand duke (voievode) of Alba Iulia. After getting his primary education at the Sinaia Palace, Michael continued his education in a special class taught by outstanding Romanian scholars. In 1932 his parents formally divorced, and his mother was forced to leave Romania. In 1939 Michael was appointed a senator and a lieutenant in the Romanian army.

After Romania's humiliating loss of about one-third of its territories to its neighbors, on 5 September 1940 Charles II abdicated and ceded power to General Ion Antonescu. The next day Michael was enthroned for the second time as Michael I. However, the real power remained in the hands of Antonescu and his aides, who allied Romania with the Third Reich. Michael's influence on current affairs was very limited, and it was only in his New Year's speeches that he appeared before the nation. In view of the anticipated defeat of the Third Reich, in 1943 Michael, along with some representatives of the opposition, began secret negotiations with the Allies. Helped by the leaders of the Liberal, Peasant, Social Democratic, and Communist Parties, he tried to make Antonescu change the political line; in case this did not work, he planned to topple him.

On 23 August 1944 Michael invited Antonescu to the royal palace, and since Antonescu refused to change his pro-German policies, Michael ordered his arrest. Then Michael appointed General Constantin Sănătescu as prime minister of a government based on a coalition of the opposition parties, including the Communists. After the Red Army entered Romania, special Soviet envoy Andrey Vyshinsky issued an ultimatum; as a result, on 6 March 1945 Michael was forced to appoint a government headed by Petru Groza and dominated by the Communists, who consistently strove to eliminate the democratic opposition and subordinate Romania to the Soviet Union. Michael opposed these policies, and in 1945–46 he went on a "royal strike," refusing to endorse government decrees. On 8 November 1945, during a demonstration in his honor in Bucharest, the Communists provoked a scuffle that led to bloodshed. In 1947 Michael went to London, where he was unsuccessful in trying to gain Western support. At the end of December 1947 the royal palace was surrounded by Soviet tanks and Communist troops. On 30 December 1947 Michael was forced to abdicate, and in early 1948 he left Romania. He was deprived of Romanian citizenship, and his property was confiscated. Michael left for London, where he made known the circumstances of his abdication, and after a few months he settled in Switzerland. In 1948–89 Michael worked with Romanian émigré circles organized within the Romanian National Committee, but he had no contact with his father. Every year he made radio speeches to the nation.

After the Nicolae Ceaușescu regime was toppled in December 1989, in 1990 members of the Communist-dominated National Salvation Front (Frontul Sălbări Naționale) refused Michael an entry visa to Romania. At the end of 1990 he was granted a visa, but upon his arrival in Romania Michael was arrested and forced to leave the country. In 1992 President Ion Iliescu agreed to Michael's visit for Easter. Michael was welcomed by about one million people when he came to Bucharest. Fearing increased support for the restoration of the monarchy and for the center-right opposition parties, in 1992–96 the post-Communists repeatedly refused Michael the right to return to Romania. In 1997, when the post-Communists lost the elections, Michael finally regained his Romanian citizenship and returned to Romania. He took no part in current politics but was active in advocating Romania's entry into NATO. (LW)

Sources: Dictionar Enciclopedic, vol. 4 (Bucharest, 2001); Biographisches Lexikon, vol. 3; Arthur Gould Lee, Crown against Sickle: The Story of King Michael of Rumania (London, 1953); Andrzej Koryn, Rumunia w polityce wielkich mocarstw 1944–1947 (Wrocław, 1983); Vlad Georgescu, Istoria Românilor de la origini pînă în zilele noastre (Oakland, 1984); Dennis Deletant, Communist Terror in Romania: Gheorghiu-Dej and the Police State, 1948–1965 (New York, 1999); Robert Levy, Ana Pauker: The Rise and Fall of a Jewish Communist (Berkeley, 2000); www.msci.memphis.edu.

MICHNIK Adam (27 October 1946, Warsaw), Polish journalist and politician. Born into a family of Communist activists of Jewish origin, in his school years Michnik took part in "Red scouting," and in 1961 he organized the Club of Seekers of Contradictions, which was dissolved by the Communist authorities. During his studies in history at Warsaw University, Michnik organized numerous acts of contestation and was one of the leaders of the so-called “rangers,” a group of young revisionist activists. In 1965 he was imprisoned for two months, and in 1965 and 1967 his student rights were suspended. In early 1968 Michnik co-organized student protests against the suspension of Adam Mickiewicz’s play Dziady (Forefathers) at the National Theater in Warsaw. He was ousted from the university, and this became a reason for a student demonstration at Warsaw University on 8 March 1968, marking the beginning of the so-called March 1968 events. In 1969 Michnik was sentenced to three years in prison, but he was soon released. He worked as a blue-collar laborer, and then he was secretary to Antoni Słonimski. In 1975 he graduated in extramural historical studies from Poznań University. In 1975–76 Michnik co-organized protests against amendments to the constitution, and he signed the “Letter of 59.” He spent 1976–77 in Western Europe, where he organized support for workers oppressed after the June 1976 protests and for the Committee for the Defense of Workers (Komitet Obrony Robotników [KOR]). Upon returning to Poland, Michnik was imprisoned from May to July 1977. A member of the KOR and later of the Committee of Social Self-Defense–KOR, Michnik was co-author of a program for social organization outside the structures licensed by the Communists; he described the program in Nowy ewolucjonizm (New evolutionism; 1976). In Kościół, lewica, dialog (1977; The Church and the Left, 1993) he advocated cooperation between the secular opposition and the Catholics in their struggle for a pluralist civic society. Michnik wrote a lot for the uncensored press in Poland and for the Western media. From 1978 he co-edited the uncensored Kwartalnik Polityczny Krytyka and co-organized the underground press NOWa. In 1978–81 Michnik was a member of the Society of Scholarly Courses and a lecturer there. He took part in meetings of representatives of the KOR and the Czechoslovak Charter 77. Michnik was frequently arrested for brief periods and beaten several times by the security police.

In 1980–81 Michnik was an adviser in the Mazowsze region of Solidarity. On 13 December 1981 he was interned, and in September 1992 he was accused of an attempt to overthrow the Communist system. In April 1984 he rejected an offer to emigrate, and in July 1984 he was amnestied. He worked with underground Solidarity structures and presses. In February 1985 he was arrested and sentenced to three years in prison, and in July 1986 he was released on the basis of another amnesty. In 1985 in prison Michnik wrote “Takie czasy: Rzecz o kompromisie” (Such times: On compromise), in which he stated that it would be possible to come to terms with the Communists who were ready to recognize Solidarity as a partner. In 1988 he supported the idea of talks between Solidarity leaders and the Communist authorities. At that time Michnik was one of the closest aides of Lech Wałęsa. In 1988–90 Michnik belonged to the Civic Committee of the Chairman of Solidarity, and from February to April 1989 he was one of the key participants of the Round Table Talks. Elected to the parliament on 4 June 1989, he belonged to the Civic Parliamentary Club, and he substantially influenced its line—for example, by working out the idea of “Your president, our prime minister” (July 1989), which became the foundation for the formation of the government of Tadeusz Mazowiecki in August 1989. In 1990 Michnik co-founded the Civic Movement–Democratic Action, which supported Mazowiecki in the presidential elections in fierce opposition to Wałęsa.

Since May 1989 Michnik has been editor-in-chief and ideological godfather of Gazeta Wyborcza, which has gradually become the largest-circulation newspaper in Poland. A pundit with a powerful impact on the thinking and political tactics of the democratic opposition, Michnik has gained a great deal of authority, especially abroad. As a result of a series of polemics and controversial pronouncements (for example, a sympathy toward General Wojciech Jaruzelski, an overestimation of the dangers of rightist populism, easy forgiveness of Communist crimes in the name of society, and criticisms of lustration), Michnik has lost some of his followers. In December 2002, half a year after it happened, he revealed an offer from film producer Lew Rywin that involved corruption; this started a wide-ranging political scandal. Michnik has also authored the following: Szanse polskiej demokracji (Chances for Polish democracy; 1984); Z dziejów honoru w Polsce (From the history of honor in Poland; 1985); Polskie pytania (Polish questions; 1985); Letters from Prison (1985); Diabeł naszego czasu (The devil of our times; 1995); a conversation with Reverend Józef Tischner and Jacek Żakowski: Między panem a plebanem (Between the master and the priest; 1995); and Letters from Freedom (1998). (AF)

Sources: Nasi w Sejmie i Senacie (Warsaw, 1990); Nowa encyklopedia powszechna PWN, vol. 4 (Warsaw, 1996); Jan Skórzyński, Ugoda i rewolucja: Władza i opozycja 1985–1989 (Warsaw, 1995); Janusz A. Majcherek, Pierwsza dekada III Rzeczypospolitej 1989–1999 (Warsaw, 1999); Opozycja w PRL: Słownik biograficzny 1956–89, vol. 1 (Warsaw, 2000); Antoni Dudek, Pierwsze lata III Rzeczypospolitej 1989–2001 (Kraków, 2002).

MIEDZIŃSKI Bogusław, pseudonym “Andrzej Świtek” (22 March 1891, Miastków, near Garwolin–8 May 1972, London), Polish politician and journalist. Miedziński was the son of a manor clerk. After passing his high school final examinations in Siedlce, he studied chemistry at the Technical University of Lemberg (Lwów, Lviv) in 1910–12 and then completed agricultural studies at the Jagiellonian University (1912–14). While in high school, Miedziński began his political activities, participating in a school strike (1905), and in 1906 he became active in the Military Organization of the Polish Socialist Party (Polska Partia Socjalistyczna [PPS]) in Siedlce. In 1907 he joined the PPS–Revolutionary Faction, and in 1910, the Union of Active Struggle (Związek Walki Czynnej [ZWC]) and the Riflemen’s Association. After the outbreak of World War I, Miedziński was one of the co-founders and commanders of the Polish Military Organization (Polska Organizacja Wojskowa [POW]). Until September 1915 he served as commander of the Warsaw district and a member of the POW High Command, subsequently transferring to the First Brigade of the Polish Legions. He fought in many battles, including those of Kukle, Kamieniucha (now Kamenukha, Ukraine), and Kostiuchnówka (now Kostyukhnivka, Ukraine). In June 1916 Józef Piłsudski again assigned him to the POW. In the spring of 1917 Miedziński became second deputy to the commander-in-chief of the POW, and in the summer of that year he became a member of the Convention of Organization A (Konwent Organizacji A), the top elite of the pro-Piłsudski camp. From February to July 1918 Miedziński was in charge of the POW activities in Russia, Ukraine, and Belorussia, where he tried to take over control of the Polish corps in Russia. In October of that year he joined the staff of the POW High Command under the direct command of Commander Edward Rydz-Śmigły, and in early November 1918 he helped to establish the people’s government in Lublin headed by Ignacy Daszyński.

In July 1919 Miedziński became head of the Second Department in the Ministry of Military Affairs and later head of the Second Information Department of the Staff of the Ministry of Military Affairs—that is, intelligence. In October 1920 he became a special task officer in the office of the minister of military affairs, and in January 1922, deputy aide-de-camp general to the commander-in-chief. Miedziński was one of Piłsudski’s most trusted associates. When Piłsudski retired from public life, Miedziński’s role in politics also diminished. In 1922 he was elected to the Assembly on behalf of the Polish Peasant Party–Piast (Polskie Stronnictwo Ludowe–Piast [PSL–Piast]), and after a split in its parliamentary representation, he went over to the PSL–Liberation (Polskie Stronnictwo Ludowe–Wyzwolenie). From 1923 to 1926 Miedziński published extensively in Kurier Poranny and Głos Prawdy, presenting the political line of Piłsudski. Miedziński’s articles, as well as his parliamentary speeches, prepared the ground for the coup d’état of May 1926, as he called for putting an end to party favoritism and praised iron-grip rule. He was also one of the main organizers of the coup, and after its success, he justified it as a necessary step. Miedziński was one of the “colonels”—a group that played a leading role in Poland at that time. From January 1927 to April 1929 he served as minister of post and telegraphs. After embezzlement was uncovered in the ministry he headed, he had to make a public apology. In the elections of 1928, 1930, and 1935 Miedziński was elected to the Assembly on the ticket of the Nonparty Bloc of Cooperation with the Government (Bezpartyjny Blok Współpracy z Rządem [BBWR]). From 1929 to 1938 he edited Gazeta Polska. In 1930 Piłsudski gave a series of interviews to this newspaper, explaining his vision of a new Polish constitution. Gradually, however, Miedziński, who was suspected of favoritism and excessive ambition in the army, lost some of Piłsudski’s trust.

After the death of Piłsudski in 1935, Miedziński regained his influence by forming a friendship with General (later Marshal) Rydz-Śmigły. From 1935 to 1938 Miedziński was the deputy speaker of the Assembly, becoming a senator and deputy speaker of the Senate in 1938. He was one of the authors of the political declaration of the Camp of National Unity (Obóz Zjednoczenia Narodowego [OZN]). He actively contributed to the drafting of the April Constitution of 1935. He had considerable influence with publishers and distributors. In 1934 he became head of the press group Prasa Polska S.A., which he transformed into Dom Prasy S.A. in 1935. Through his associates, Miedziński also controlled several newspapers and the Polish Railway Bookshop Company. One of the most powerful politicians in the ruling camp, he generally preferred to keep out of the limelight. His great ambition and his tactlessness made him unpopular even in sanacja circles. In September 1939 he left Poland. He went to France, where he was completely removed from power. After the capitulation of France, he made his way, via Spain and Portugal, to England (1941); from there he was sent by the commander-in-chief, of the Polish army abroad, General Władysław Sikorski, to South Africa. In 1947 Miedziński settled in England, where he worked at a bakery and was active as a journalist. His extensive Wspomnienia (Memoirs) were published posthumously in Zeszyty Historyczne (nos. 33–37). (WR) Sources: PSB, vol. 20; Album sterników nawy państwa polskiego (Warsaw, 1929); S. Benedykt, “Wspomnienia o Bogusławie Miedzińskim,” Orzeł Biały, 1972, nos. 96–97; “Życiorys Bogusława Miedzińskiego,” Kultura (Paris) 1972, no. 6; Janusz Jędrzejewicz, W służbie idei (London, 1972); Władysław T. Kulesza, Koncepcje ideowo-polityczne obozu rządzącego w Polsce w latach 1926–1935 (Wrocław, 1985); Kto był kim w Drugiej Rzeczypospolitej (Warsaw, 1994).

MIEROSZEWSKI Juliusz (3 February 1906, Kraków–21 June 1976, London), Polish political journalist and writer. After graduating from high school, Mieroszewski studied law at the Jagiellonian University in Kraków, and he graduated from the Higher School of Commerce in Kraków. He published articles in periodicals that belonged to the “Pałac Prasy” (Press Palace) group: Na szerokim świecie, Tempo dnia, and Ilustrowany Kurier Codzienny. He specialized in international affairs. Because he criticized Nazism, he was regarded as a persona non grata in the Third Reich and was refused an entry visa to Germany. After the German invasion of Poland in September 1939, Mieroszewski made his way, via Romania and Turkey, to the Middle East. He served in the Independent Carpathian Rifle Brigade and later in the Second Corps of General Władysław Anders. After World War II, he settled in London and contributed to Wiadomości Literackie.

In 1949 Mieroszewski began a life-long association with the Paris-based Kultura. From 1950, under the pseudonym “Londyńczyk,” he contributed to Kronika londyńska (London chronicle) and Kronika emigracyjna (Emigration chronicle); he was also the author of numerous political analyses in which he represented moderately Socialist and liberal views in response to the changes occurring in the Communist bloc and internationally. At the beginning of the 1950s Mieroszewski supported the American idea of “liberating” Eastern Europe, but realizing its inefficiency, in 1956 he supported the October transformations and Władysław Gomułka as the best choice for Poland. Mieroszewski sought international recognition of the Oder-Neisse border. In the 1960s he supported party revisionism and sketched a prospect of improved relations between Poland and the Soviet Union if Poland’s mediation in the cultural and political rapprochement between the Soviet Union and Europe was successful. He also attached great importance to improving relations with Poland’s closest neighbors: Lithuania, Belorussia, and Ukraine. He was able to foresee the development of a Polish workers’ movement in defense of democratic freedoms and an increased intensity in their struggle for better living conditions. Mieroszewski’s publications include Ewolucjonizm (Evolutionism; 1964); Polityczne neurozy (Political neuroses; 1967); Modele i praktyka (Models and practice; 1970); and Materiały do refleksji i zadumy (Materials for reflection and contemplation; 1976). From the mid-1970s Mieroszewski’s works were often published by the underground press in Poland. Seen as one of the most dangerous ideological “subversives” by the Polish Communist authorities, Mieroszewski had a great impact on shaping the political thought of an entire generation of Polish independent intellectuals because his analyses also reached Poland through Radio Free Europe and other channels. (WR) Sources: Kultura, 1976, nos. 7–8; Bohdan Osadczyk, “Refleksje o śmierci Juliusza Mieroszewskiego,” Kultura, 1977, no. 7; Piotr Wandycz, “O Juliuszu Mieroszewskim,” Zeszyty Historyczne, 1986, no. 78; Rafał Habielski, Życie społeczne i kulturalne emigracji (Warsaw, 1999).

MIERZWA Stanisław (27 January 1905, Biskupice Radłowskie–10 October 1985, Kraków), Polish lawyer and politician. Mierzwa was born into a peasant family. After finishing high school in Tarnów, he studied law at the Jagiellonian University in Kraków, graduating in 1934. Later he did a legal internship as a lawyer trainee. While still in school, Mierzwa became active in social and political life, joining the Lesser Polish Youth Union, an association of peasant youth. He became a local, and later a national, activist of the Polish Academic Peasant Youth and the Union of Rural Youth of the Republic of Poland, and he also contributed to their periodicals. Arrested in 1933 for helping to organize a student strike, Mierzwa was sentenced to two months in prison. In 1932 he joined the Peasant Party (Stronnictwo Ludowe [SL]), and he quickly rose through the party ranks. He was active at the local, regional, and national levels. In 1933 he became a member of the Chief Council, and in 1935, a member of the Chief Executive Committee. He also contributed to the party weekly, Piast. One of the main organizers of the great peasant strike on 15–25 August 1937 and a close political associate of Wincent Witos, Mierzwa belonged to the radical opponents of the camp supporting Piłsudski and the National Party (Stronnictwo Narodowe [SN]).

During World War II Mierzwa was one of the main organizers of the underground peasant movement. In 1940 he joined the district authorities of the underground Peasant Party called Roch (Stronnictwo Ludowe–Roch [SL–Roch]) and helped to edit secret pamphlets. In 1942 he joined the Central Leadership of the Peasant Movement–Roch (Centralne Kierownictwo Ruchu Ludowego–Roch [CKRL–Roch]), and in 1943 he became a representative of the CKRL in the coalition National Unity Council (Rada Jedności Narodowej [RJN]). Mierzwa supported Stanisław Mikołajczyk’s policy to seek compromise with the Soviet Union. Arrested through treachery by the NKVD on 28 March 1945, Mierzwa was taken to Moscow. In June of that year, in a trial of sixteen leaders of the Polish Underground State, he was sentenced to four months in prison. After returning to Poland, he worked as an attorney in Kraków and resumed his political activities, becoming secretary of the Provincial Board of the Polish Peasant Party (Polskie Stronnictwo Ludowe [PSL]) and a member of the PSL Provisional Chief Executive Committee. At a PSL congress in January 1946 Mierzwa joined the Chief Council and the Chief Executive Committee. He was known as a firm defender of the PSL's independence. He was also one of the most important associates of Mikołajczyk. In September 1946, during the election campaign, Mierzwa was arrested along with several other PSL activists from Kraków. On 10 September 1947, in a trial of activists from the PSL and the Freedom and Independence (Zrzeszenie Wolność i Niezawisłość [WiN]) association—the so-called Niepokólczycki trial—Mierzwa was sentenced to ten years' imprisonment and was also disbarred. In 1953 he was released owing to ill health, and in 1954 he was granted a pardon. After 1956 Mierzwa worked as an attorney but did not resume direct political activities. He refused to join the pro-Communist United Peasant Party (Zjednoczone Stronnictwo Ludowe [ZSL]), yet his initiatives, which were primarily aimed at commemorating the memory of Witos, attracted many former members of the SL, SL–Roch, and PSL. After the death of Mikołajczyk, émigré members of those parties regarded Mierzwa as the main authority. Mierzwa did not join the Independent Self-Governing Trade Union of Independent Farmers–Solidarity (Niezależny Samorządny Związek Zawodowy Rolników Indywidualnych–Solidarność [NSZZRI–Solidarity]) because he did not believe in the stability of the new political situation in 1980. (AP)

Sources: Słownik biograficzny działaczy ruchu ludowego (Warsaw, 1989); Alina Fitowa, Stanisław Mierzwa "Słomka" na tle swoich czasów (Wierzchosławice, 1994); Waldemar Strzałkowski, Andrzej Chmielarz and Andrzej K. Kunert, ed., Proces szesnastu: Dokumenty NKWD; (Warsaw, 1995); Andrzej K. Kunert and Eugeniusz Piontek, Proces moskiewski przywódców polskiego państwa podziemnego (Warsaw, 2000).

MIGJENI [originally Gjergji Millosh] (13 October 1911, Shkodër–26 August 1938, Torre Pelice, Italy), Albanian writer, poet, and journalist. Migjeni came from a family of Montenegrin origin. After graduating from a Serbian school in Shkodër, he continued his education at St. John Orthodox Theological Seminary in Monastir (Bitola). Despite this, he remained an atheist throughout his life. Migjeni started work as a teacher at a primary school in Vrake. It was then that he started writing his first literary works and began to publish them in the press in Shkodër. In 1937, as his health deteriorated (advanced tuberculosis), Migjeni left for Italy, where his sister was studying, and died there in a sanatorium. Because of his short, only five-year period of literary activity, he was called a "meteor of Albanian literary life." Migjeni wrote both poetic works and prose sketches. Filled with sorrow and pain, his works focus on the cruelty of human misery. Migjeni combined social criticism with a criticism of capitalism and religion, although his language was full of religious metaphors. The first volume of his poems, Vargjet e lira (Free verse; 1991), appeared posthumously in 1944. The Albanian Communists considered Migjeni a precursor of Socialist realism. They accepted his prophecy of the coming of a new man as a result of a people's revolution, but they rejected the humanitarian version of socialism that Migjeni propagated. (TC)

Sources: Pipa Arshi, Contemporary Albanian Literature (New York, 1991); Ismail Kadare, Ardhja e Migjenit (Tirana, 1991); Rinush Idrizi, Migjeni (Tirana, 1992); Saneja Mazllum, Vetem Itaka mbetet. Tylko Itaka pozostanie: Antologia poezji albańskiej i polskiej XX w. (Warsaw, 1993); Lazer Radi, Nje verë me Migjeni (Tirana, 1998).

MIHAIL [originally Metodij Gogov] (20 March 1912, Novo Selo, near Strumnica–6 July 1999, Skopje), Orthodox archbishop of Ohrid, head of the Macedonian Orthodox Church. Mihail entered a theological seminar in 1927. In 1936 he graduated with distinction from the Theological School of the University of Belgrade. During World War II he worked as a priest in the Macedonian territories and strove to reestablish the archbishopric in Ohrid. In 1945 he chaired a conference of around three hundred Orthodox priests in Macedonia who called for the independence of their Orthodox Church and the independence of their country. Shortly afterwards Mihail was arrested by the Communist authorities. Released after six months, he continued his work. Imprisoned again in 1948, he was released in 1953. From 1953 to 1966 he served as a priest in Skopje, and he subsequently went to Australia, where he established the first parish of the Macedonian Orthodox Church independent of the Serbian hierarchy. Mihail was instrumental in the 1967 proclamation of autocephaly of the Macedonian Orthodox Church; the proclamation was not recognized by other churches. In the following years Mihail made numerous missionary visits to various Macedonian communities scattered throughout the world. After the death of his wife, he was ordained bishop of Vardar in 1988. After Macedonia declared its independence, Mihail became archbishop and metropolitan of Ohrid in 1993. (WR)

Sources: Slavko Dimevski, Istorija na Makedonskata pravoslavna crkva (Skopje, 1989); www.rulers.org.

MIHAILOV Ivan, "Vancho" (26 December 1896, Novo Selo, near Shtip–5 September 1990, Rome), Macedonian revolutionary. Mihailov was born into a family of activists in the Internal Macedonian Revolutionary Organization (IMRO), and he began his career as an aide to Todor Aleksandrov, the man most responsible for keeping IMRO alive during the post-Balkan War years. Mihailov was fanatical in his pursuit of an independent Macedonia, which he envisioned as a Switzerland of the Balkans in a book he wrote: Macedonia: Switzerland of the Balkans (1950). When what was to become the Republic of Macedonia became part of the Kingdom of Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes following World War I, Aleksandrov and Mihailov fought for independence from Yugoslavia and annexation to Bulgaria. Mihailov was a participant in the planning of a June 1923 coup against Bulgarian prime minister Aleksandur Stamboliyski, who was tortured and murdered by Mihailov's associates. In 1924, Aleksandrov was assassinated in a plot that some have linked to Mihailov and others to General Aleksandur Protogerov, IMRO's second in command. A deadly rivalry between Protogerov and Mihailov immediately sprang up, with the organization fracturing into Centralist (Mihailov) and Federalist (Protogerov) camps. The Federalists sought Macedonian autonomy within Yugoslavia. The 1923–34 period was violent in Bulgaria owing in part to IMRO's fraternal strife and in part to the fact that the people of southwestern Bulgaria's Petrich region, a stronghold of IMRO forces, were subjected to IMRO justice and taxation. Gangland-style wars erupted, sometimes even spilling over into the streets of Sofia, Bulgaria's capital, with incursions into Yugoslavia and Greece.

The Bulgarian government was unable to bring order to the chaos wrought by IMRO. Mihailov saw Serbia as the main obstacle to Macedonian independence and union with Bulgaria. While IMRO factions feuded, Mihailov did not attack Bulgaria's Tsar Boris III, even though Boris was seeking to improve relations with King Alexander of Serbia. A ruthless leader, Mihailov cooperated with the Croatian Ustashe of Ante Pavelić, supplying the assassin who was to murder King Alexander in Marseilles in 1934. A bloodless coup led by Bulgarian military leaders and civilian reformers unseated the government and expelled IMRO from Bulgaria in May 1934, destroying its infrastructure rapidly. Mihailov escaped to the West. After some time spent in the United States and Canada, he finally settled in Italy, living in seclusion. He died there peacefully, still promoting Macedonian independence. Mihailov published many articles and books about the Macedonian question and four volumes of Spomeni (Memoirs; 1958–73). (DP)

Sources: Entsiklopediya Bulgariya, vol. 4 (Sofia, 1984); Ivan Katardžiev, Makedonsko nacionalno pitajne 1919–1930 (Zagreb, 1983); Raymond Detrez, Historical Dictionary of Bulgaria (Lanham, Md., 1997); Nadine Lange-Akhlund, The Macedonian Question, 1893–1908 (Boulder, Colo., 1998); Stoyan Pribichevich, Macedonia, Its People and History (University Park and London, 1982).

MIHAILOVIĆ Dragoljub (Draž) (27 April 1893, Ivanjica, Serbia–17 July 1946, Belgrade), Serbian officer, head of the Yugoslav underground army linked with the Yugoslav royal government-in-exile. The son of a teacher, Mihailović entered the Belgrade Military Academy in 1910, but in 1912 his studies were interrupted by the First Balkan War, in which he fought as a corporal. During the Second Balkan War Mihailović was promoted to second lieutenant. In World War I he became famous for his courage in the battle of Štip and was decorated with the Order of the White Eagle. After a truce was called, Mihailović resumed his studies and graduated from the Military Academy in Belgrade. In 1929 he also completed a six-month officer training course in France. In the 1930s Mihailović commanded a regiment in Slovenia and later worked in the General Staff in Belgrade. He also taught tactics at the Military Academy and served as Yugoslavia's military attaché in Prague and Sofia. After returning to his country, Mihailović analyzed the defense capacity and military plans of Yugoslavia. He pointed out that the defense of Yugoslavia's northern borders would be practically impossible and emphasized that it was necessary to set up defenses in the mountainous regions far inside the country. Mihailović wrote a book on guerrilla warfare. He recognized the dangers of the German "fifth column" in Croatia. He also did not deny his pro-British sympathies. In the delicate situation that Yugoslavia was in from 1939 to 1941, Mihailović was briefly kept under house arrest. During the German invasion in April 1941 he was chief of staff of a division that defended Sarajevo.

Mihailović refused to lay down arms, and in early May 1941 in Ravna Gora, he announced the beginning of a guerrilla war. Thousands of soldiers rallied around him, faithful to the royal government-in-exile in London led by Dušan Simović. Mihailović's troops were called Chetniks, to commemorate the Serbian partisans in the struggle for independence against Turkey. Mihailović's strategy, in line with the policies of the government-in-exile and initially consistent with British plans, was based on accumulating forces and weapons for a general uprising to be staged when the German occupation weakened. Meanwhile, Chetnik units carried out sabotage actions, breaking German communication lines and preventing the Germans from confiscating food. Mihailović's resistance to the Germans was recognized in the West, where his contribution to impeding the German offensive in the Soviet Union was emphasized. Time magazine named him "Man of the Year, 1941." From the beginning of the occupation the Chetniks had enemies not only among the Germans, but also among the Croatian Ustashe (led by Ante Pavelić) and the Communists. After the Third Reich invaded the USSR in June 1941, the Communists, led by Josip Broz Tito, also joined the struggle against the occupiers, but they did not change their hostile stance toward Mihailović.

In December 1941 Mihailović was promoted to general. In January 1942 he was appointed minister of war in the Yugoslav government-in-exile, and in June 1942 he became deputy commander-in-chief of the Yugoslav Army. Initially the Chetniks enjoyed the support of Great Britain, but from 1942 on, as the Allies began to make concessions to Stalin, British aid became increasingly nominal. In addition, the United States became more inclined to give credence to Communist reports of Mihailović's collaboration with the occupiers. The Allies were also disturbed by Mihailović's Serbian nationalism, as well as his clashes with the Communist Partisans. At the Tehran Conference in early December 1943, the Big Three accepted the principle that both the Chetniks and the Partisans should receive aid in proportion to their activities. As a result, in February 1944 Winston Churchill in effect took the side of Tito, accusing Mihailović of passivity and contacts with the occupiers. Allied liaison officers denied these accusations, but Churchill's point of view prevailed, and Mihailović's political role diminished. Although until the end of the war Mihailović was a supporter of the Allies, engaging substantial German forces in Serbia and liberating around five hundred Allied prisoners of war, his efforts to establish contacts with the Communists ended in failure. Toward the end of the war Tito's Partisans and secret police were involved not only in the struggle against the Germans, but also in hunting down Chetniks. Occasions of tactical cooperation with the Chetniks were used to disarm and then arrest them. Such was the fate of, among others, Colonel Dragutin Keserović and Colonel Velimir Pelitić, who was Mihailović's special emissary for talks with the Russians.

In April 1945 the Chetniks clashed with the Black Legion of the Croatian Ustashe at Levač Polje. Later, Mihailović mainly fought against Tito's army and police. For nearly one year after the end of the war, Mihailović was hunted by six Communist-led divisions. From the beginning, Tito and his associates admitted their intention to seize and then execute him. Captured by the Communists on 13 March 1946, Mihailović was accused of collaboration with the Croatian Ustashe and with the Germans. His trial began on 10 June 1946 in Topčider. The Communist court rejected the testimony of Allied officers who defended him. Despite protests by Serbian émigrés and by a special U.S. committee for his defense, Mihailović was sentenced to death in a rigged show trial on 15 July of that year. Two days later he was executed. This execution slightly undermined Tito's credibility in the West, but the denunciation of Tito by Moscow and its satellite states (June 1948) soon obscured this crime. (WR)

Sources: Biographisches Lexikon, vol. 3; Albert B. Seitz, Mihailovic: Hoax or Hero? (Columbus, Ohio, 1953); The Trial of Dragoljub-Draža Mihailović (Belgrade, 1946); Tributes to General Mihailovich: Priznanja generalu Mihailovicu (Windsor, Ontario, 1966); Yozo Tomasevich, The Chetniks: War and Revolution in Yugoslavia, 1941–1945 (Stanford, 1975); Matteo Milazzo, The Chetnik Movement and Yugoslav Resistance (Baltimore, 1975); David Martin, ed., Patriot or Traitor? The Case of General Mihailovic (Stanford, 1978); Spomenica dostojna divljenja ko je ubio generala Mihajlovića (London, 1980); Draza Mihailovic Memorial Book, 1946–1976: Dedicated to the Thirtieth Anniversary of the Death of the Leader of the Third Serbian Uprising (Chicago, 1981); Lucien Karchmar, Draža Mihailović and the Rise of the Četnik Movement 1941–1942, vols. 1–2 (New York, 1987).

MIHALACHE Ion (3 March 1882, Topoloveni–5 March 1953, Râmnicu Sărat), Romanian Peasant Party politician. Mihalache was a village teacher in his native village of Topoloveni. In 1912 he founded the newspaper Vremea Nova. He also found a peasant union that was the origin of the Peasant Party in the Old Kingdom of Romania. The party was formed in 1918 in reaction to a speech by King Ferdinand in December 1917, in which he addressed the soldiers and announced a division of the great estates and the distribution of the land among peasant war veterans. As a result of the political revival of Romanian peasants during World War I, the Peasant Party gained much success in the elections of 1919. In the coalition government of Alexandru Vaida-Voievoda (December 1919–March 1920) Mihalache served as minister of agriculture, and he advocated radical agrarian reform. The right opposed his proposals; therefore, in March 1920, King Ferdinand dissolved the government and installed General Alexandru Avarescu as premier. In October 1926, Mihalache became vice-president of the united National Peasant Party (Partidul Național Țărănesc; the so-called Tsaransists), formed by the merger of his Peasant Party with the National Peasant Party of Transylvania. Between 1928 and 1930 Mihalache served as minister of agriculture in the government of Iuliu Maniu, the leader of the party, and in 1930–33 he was minister of interior. He refused to take part in the dictatorial government of King Charles II, and during World War II he was one of the organizers of the underground opposition against the regime of Ion Antonescu.

In August 1944 on behalf of the opposition coalition Mihalache demanded that Antonescu conclude an armistice.

stice with the Allies. After the overthrow of the dictator on 23 August 1944, the Western powers proposed Mihalache as a member of the coalition government, but the Russians and their client, Prime Minister Petru Groza, ordered him to sever his association with Maniu and to split the Tsarunist party. Mihalache rejected these conditions. In the face of increasing Communist dictatorship, he planned to form a government-in-exile with Maniu, but he was captured while attempting to cross the border in December 1946. Deprived of his immunity, on 11 November 1947 Mihalache was sentenced by a military court in a show trial to life imprisonment. He probably died in prison. (WR)

Sources: Encyclopedia Britannica, vol. 6 (Chicago, 1948); Ghita Ionescu, Communism in Rumania, 1944–1962 (London, 1964); Chronological History of Romania (Bucharest, 1972); Andrzej Koryn, Rumunia w polityce wielkich mocarstw 1944–1947 (Wrocław, 1983); Dennis Deletant, Communist Terror in Romania: Gheorghiu-Dej and the Police State, 1948–1965 (New York, 1999).

MIHALOVIĆ Antun (17 July 1868, Feričanci–21 September 1949, Zagreb), Croatian politician. Mihalović studied law in Vienna and Graz. In 1893 he began working in the administration in Osijek and later in Virovitica. In 1901 he became an MP in the Croatian parliament (Sabor). From 1904 to 1907 he served as governor (veliki župan) of the district of Virovitica and the town of Osijek. He resigned this post as a result of a conflict with Ban Teodor Pejačević over the Hungarian railway lines in Croatia. Mihalović was one of the most prominent politicians in the Croatian-Serbian Coalition, which was established after the adoption in October 1905 of the Rijeka (Fiume) Resolution by the Croatian politicians and the Zadar (Zara) Resolution by the Serbian politicians. In these resolutions the signatories declared themselves against Austrian domination and supported the Hungarians in their efforts to gain full independence. As a representative of the Croatian-Serbian Coalition, Mihalović was assigned to the upper house of the Hungarian-Croatian parliament. On 29 May 1917 he became ban (governor) of Croatia, Slavonia, and Dalmatia. His policy to protect the interests of these regions was often criticized by Vienna and Budapest. After the Kingdom of Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes was proclaimed, Mihalović resigned on 20 January 1919. From 1936 to 1941 he held a seat in the Yugoslav Senate. (AO)

Sources: Biographisches Lexikon, vol. 2; Ferdo Culinović, Jugoslavija između dva rata (Zagreb, 1961).

MIJUŠKOVIĆ Lazar (24 December 1867, Pješivci, near Nikšić–1936, Belgrade), Montenegrin politician. Mijušković completed technical studies in Paris. In 1893

he entered Montenegro's diplomatic service. He was one of the close associates of Prince Nicholas (later King Nicholas). In late 1902 Mijušković became head of the Chief State Control, and in late 1903, minister of finance. On 19 December 1905 he became the first prime minister of a government based on the constitution and the parliament. On 24 November 1906 Mijušković resigned as a result of a tariff war with Serbia. He later served as minister of foreign affairs. After the annexation of Bosnia and Herzegovina by Austria-Hungary in 1908, Montenegro took the side of Russia and the countries that were against this annexation. Mijušković negotiated on the issue of annexation in St. Petersburg and Belgrade, strengthening Montenegro's political ties with Russia and Serbia. During the Albanian uprising in 1911 he tried to obtain Russian aid for the Albanian refugees, who were a serious burden on Montenegrin finances. However, after receiving this aid, Montenegro used it to supply the Montenegrin Army with weapons, and King Nicholas attempted to increase his influence in Albania by cooperating with Vienna; as a result, St. Petersburg expressed its discontent. Following the king's example, Mijušković changed his policies and cut his ties with Russia. Hoping for territorial gains in Albania at the expense of Turkey, Montenegro joined the Balkan League but failed to fulfill its ambitions in either of the two Balkan Wars. At the brink of World War I, Mijušković brought about an alliance with Serbia. On 2 January 1916 he again became head of the government, but after the defeat of the Montenegrin forces by the Austro-Hungarian Army, he was forced to resign on 12 May 1916, and, along with King Nicholas, he went into exile. After the monarchy was abolished in Montenegro and the country became part of the Kingdom of Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes, in late 1918 Mijušković settled in Serbia, where he lived until the end of his life. (WR)

Sources: Enciklopedija Jugoslavije, vol. 6 (Zagreb, 1965); John D. Treadway, The Falcon and the Eagle: Montenegro and Austria-Hungary, 1908–1914 (West Lafayette, Ind., 1983); www.rulers.org.

MIKHALCHEV Dimitur (25 December 1880, Lozengrad, Edirne Thrace–18 January 1967, Sofia), Bulgarian philosopher and diplomat. Mikhalchev was born into an affluent middle-class family. While a philosophy student at Sofia University (1901–5), he made his literary debut in the prestigious periodical Misa. From 1906 to 1909 he worked at the universities in Berlin, Freiburg, and Munich. In 1909 he earned a Ph.D. from the University of Greifswald. In 1909 he published Philosophische Studien: Beiträge zur Kritik des modernen Psychologismus (Philosophical studies: Contributions to the critique of modern psychologism), based on his doctoral thesis. In 1910 Mikhalchev became a member of the Kantian Society (Kantgesellschaft), and in 1911 he lectured in St. Petersburg. In 1910 he became an associate professor and in 1915 a full professor of philosophy at Sofia University. He fought in the Balkan Wars. In the autumn of 1913 Mikhalchev was a member of a delegation that was intended to inform Europeans about the tragic results of the Balkan Wars for Bulgaria. From 1923 to 1927 he served as an envoy to Czechoslovakia and later worked at Sofia University. Mikhalchev favored historical materialism in its moderate form and argued with the supporters of dogmatic dialectical materialism. He was a co-founder and editor of Filosofski Pregled (1929–43). From 1934 to 1936 he served as an envoy to the Soviet Union. Again an envoy to Moscow after the coup of 9 September 1944, Mikhalchev took part in the signing of a peace treaty and was a witness to plans for a Balkan federation; however, these plans were not implemented. In 1946 Mikhalchev returned to Bulgaria. As president of the Bulgarian Academy of Sciences, he protested the persecution of scholars who were labeled by the authorities as “bourgeois” and tried to defend them. In 1947 he was forced to retire. In 1953 Todor Pavlov broke up Mikhalchev’s philosophical school on the grounds that it was reactionary. Mikhalchev, whose works were not published, was persecuted and lived in poverty but continued his scholarly work. He studied (among other things) the philosophy of Henri Bergson, traditional logic, relations between dialectics and the philosophy of the Sophists, and pragmatism. In 1981 his Izbrani suchineniia (Selected works) appeared, and in the 1990s many more of his works were published, restoring Mikhalchev to his due place in contemporary Bulgarian philosophy. (WDj)

Sources: Kiril D. Darkovski, “Dimitur Mikhalchev: Opit za intelektualen portret,” in Dimitur Mikhalchev, Izbrani suchineniia (Sofia, 1981); Dimitur Denkov and Dimitur Mikhalchev, Istoriko-filosofski ocherk (Sofia, 1988).

MIKHNOVSKYI Mykola (1873 Turivka, Chernihiv region—3 March 1924, Kiev), Ukrainian politician and ideologue. Mikhnovskyi graduated in law from Kiev University. He helped to found the Brotherhood of Taras in 1891 and the Young Ukraine (Moloda Ukraina) society in 1896. In 1899 he settled in Kharkiv and opened a law practice. Among other things, he acted as defense counsel in political trials. In 1900 Mikhnovskyi wrote the program of the Revolutionary Ukrainian Party (RUP), printed in Lemberg (Lviv, Lwów) as Samostiyna Ukraina (Independent Ukraine); in it independence for the Ukraine was demanded for the first time. In late 1901 and early 1902 Mikhnovskyi was one of the founders of the Ukrainian Popular Party (Ukrainska Narodna Partiya [UNP]), which rallied supporters of a military struggle for independence. In articles and proclamations from 1902–4—including “Robitnycha sprava v prohrami UNP” (1902; The workers’ question in the UNP program; 1902) and “Desiat zapovidii” (Ten commandments; 1903)—Mikhnovskyi formulated the theoretical principles of Ukrainian nationalism. In 1906 he issued a UNP program that foresaw the establishment of a united, independent, and democratic Ukraine encompassing the territory from the Carpathians to the Caucasus—a republic of the working class, with a presidential system, guarantees of social rights for the people, and land for the peasants. In 1903 Mikhnovskyi established a UNP paramilitary organization that carried out several terrorist attacks in Kharkiv (1904) and Kiev (1909). Mikhnovskyi edited the periodicals Samostiyna Ukraina (Lemberg, 1905), Khliborob (Lubni, 1905), Slobozhanshchyna (Kharkiv, 1906), and Snip (Kharkiv, 1912–13).

During World War I Mikhnovskyi was mobilized into the tsarist army. In March 1917 he was the first to propose the idea of establishing Ukrainian military forces. On his initiative, the Ukrainian Military Club and the Military Organizational Committee were founded in Kiev. The aim of these organizations was to form Ukrainian military units. In May 1917 Mikhnovskyi helped to establish the Bohdan Khmelnytskyi First Ukrainian Cossack Regiment. In 1917, as a representative of the Ukrainian Military Club, Mikhnovskyi became a member of the Ukrainian Central Rada (Council) and a member of the Ukrainian General Military Committee. He was among the Council members who advocated that the Ukraine declare independence and that the Council assume full power in the Ukrainian territories; as a result of his views, he came into conflict with the majority of the Council. In the summer of 1917, after an unsuccessful insurrection attempt, Mikhnovskyi was arrested on the orders of Volodymyr Vynnychenko. He was subsequently sent to the Romanian front. In the autumn of 1917 he returned to the Poltava region and helped to establish the Ukrainian Democratic Agrarian Party (Ukrainska Demokratychno-Khliborobaska Partiya [UD-KhP]). During the rule of Hetman Pavlo Skoropadskyi, Mikhnovskyi was in the opposition. He also had a negative stance regarding the Directory, a competitive government center established by the Council. He believed that the Directory was seeking to establish a Socialist order. In early 1919, on the orders of the UDKhP, Mikhnovskyi tried to establish contacts with some commanders of the army of the Ukrainian National Republic (UNR), hoping for their help in controlling the increasing anarchy in the army. Arrested by the Bolsheviks, Mikhnovskyi was to be executed, but he was saved by an attack of troops led by Ataman (commander-in-chief) Matviy Hryhoryiv. In 1920 Mikhnovskyi went to Novorossiysk, from where he unsuccessfully attempted to go abroad. He subsequently worked in cooperatives and schools in Kuban. In the spring of 1924 he returned to Kiev and was arrested by the GPU. According to one version, Mikhnovskyi was executed by a firing squad; according to another version, he hanged himself after being released (this would most probably have been a suicide staged by the GPU). (BB)

Sources: Encyclopedia of Ukraine, vol. 3 (Toronto, 1993); Entsyklopediia Ukrainoznavstva, vol. 5 (Lviv, 1996); Dovidnyk z istorii Ukrainy (Kiev, 2001); Viktor Andriievskiy, Mykola Mikhnovskyi (Munich, 1950); Petro Mirchuk, Mykola Mikhnovskyi: Apostol Ukrainy Derzhavnosti (London, 1960); Mykola Horelov, Peredvisnyki nezalezhnoy Ukrainy (Kiev, 1996); Vladislav Vershiuk and Tatiana Ostashko, Diachi Ukrainy Tsentralnoy Rady: Biografichniy dovidnyk (Kiev, 1998).

MIKHOV Nikola (29 November 1891, Turnovo–1 or 2 February 1945, Sofia), general, regent of Bulgaria. In 1911 Mikhov graduated from the Sofia Military Academy, and later he studied in Germany. He began his career in the army fighting in the Balkan Wars and World War I. During the interwar period Mikhov held various positions, including those of commander of a division, commander of the army, and commander of the Sofia garrison in the 1930s. From 1938 to 1941 he was commander of the Sofia Military Academy. In 1941 he was commander of the Second Bulgarian Army in Macedonia and later commander of the First Bulgarian Army, which was stationed in Sofia. A supporter of rapprochement with Nazi Germany, Mikhov was appointed minister of war by Bogdan Filov (April 1942). In January 1943 he went to Germany to coordinate Bulgaria's military cooperation with the Third Reich, and in August of that year he accompanied Tsar Boris III on his last visit to Germany. After the death of Boris, on a motion by Filov, the National Assembly on 11 September 1943 elected Mikhov one of three regents who were to rule on behalf of the minor heir to the throne, Simeon. Mikhov showed little interest in politics, but his election would ensure the strong support of the army for the Regency Council. In early September 1944 Mikhov still believed that the Third Reich would win the war and was against entering negotiations with the Allies. After an uprising overthrew the regency on 9 September 1944, Mikhov was arrested. At the beginning of 1945, along with the other regents and dozens of other politicians, he was sentenced to death and executed. Mikhov published Dnevnik (Diary; Svoboda, 1944, nos. 91–100; Naroden Soyuz, 1945, nos. 3–7). On 29 August 1996 the Supreme Court quashed Mikhov's sentence. (WR) Sources: Entsiklopediya Bulgariya, vol. 6 (Sofia, 1978); Biographisches Lexikon, vol. 3; Marshall Lee Miller, Bulgaria during the Second World War (Stanford, 1975); Stephane Groueff, Crown of Thorns (Lanham, Md., 1987); Bogdan Filov, Dnevnik (Sofia, 1990); Tasho Tashev, Ministrite na Bulgariya 1879–1999: Entsiklopedichen spravochnik (Sofia, 1999).

MIKLÓS Dálnoki Béla (11 June 1890, Budapest–21 November 1948, Budapest), Hungarian general and politician. Miklós came from a Szekler family of noble origins. His father was a teacher. At seventeen Miklós began to officially use the noble nickname indicating his father's place of birth (Dálnok). After graduating from high school in Sopron (1907), he attended the Ludovika Military Academy in Budapest. In 1910 he was promoted to second lieutenant of hussars. During World War I he served on many fronts. Under the Hungarian Soviet Republic (HSR) in 1919 Miklós served in the city headquarters until June, subsequently becoming a non-commissioned officer. After the collapse of the HSR in August 1919, he was again assigned to the city headquarters. From 1920 to 1921 he studied at the General Staff Academy and subsequently served in the Ministry of National Defense and in various units of the army. In 1929 he was awarded the title of "hero" (vitéz). From 1929 to 1933 he was deputy chief of the military office of Regent Miklós Horthy and subsequently served as military attaché to Berlin until 1936. In 1938 Miklós became commander of the Second Mounted Brigade, and in 1939 he was promoted to general. In 1940 he became commander of the First Armored Corps, at the head of which he took part in the campaign against Yugoslavia and the Soviet Union. In November 1941 he was promoted to major general. In February 1942 he became commander of the Ninth Corps, and in October of that year he was appointed chief aide-de-camp to Horthy and head of his military bureau. On 1 August 1943 he was promoted to lieutenant general.

In August 1944 Miklós took over command of the First Hungarian Army, which was stationed in the northeastern Carpathians. After Hungary's unsuccessful attempt to withdraw from the war (15 October 1944), along with the staff and twenty thousand of his men, Miklós defected to the Soviet side. In November he was involved in cease-fire negotiations in Moscow. The Soviet leaders asked him to become the leader of a provisional Hungarian government that they planned to establish. A member of the Provisional National Assembly that was established in Debrecen, Miklós served as prime minister of the Provisional National Government from 22 December 1944 to 15 November 1945. As head of the government, he complied with the demands of the local Communists and of Moscow, and many a time he endorsed decisions that were disadvantageous to Hungary. In November 1945, as a prominent public figure, Miklós was again invited to join the parliament. Before the 1947 elections, Miklós joined the Hungarian Independence Party, established by Zoltán Pfeiffer, and became a member of its Executive Committee. After the elections of 31 August 1947, the results of which were partly falsified by the Communists, Miklós became a member of parliament. On 20 November of that year, like all the MPs from the Hungarian Independence Party, Miklós was unlawfully deprived of his seat, and then he retired from public life. (JT)

Sources: John F. Montgomery, Hungary: The Unwilling Satellite (New York, 1947); Ferenc Nagy, The Struggle Behind the Iron Curtain (New York, 1948); Magyar Életrajzi Lexikon, vol. 2 (Budapest, 1969); A magyar forradalom és szabadságharc enciklopédiája (Budapest, 1999).

MIKLOŠKO František (2 June 1947, Nitra), Slovak dissident and politician. After completing courses at a technical high school in Nitra, in 1978 Mikloško graduated in mathematics from the University of Bratislava. He worked at the Institute of Cybernetics of the Slovak Academy of Sciences, but in 1983 he was fired for political reasons and then worked as a blue-collar laborer. In the 1970s and 1980s Mikloško was active in the underground Catholic Church. He also published in and helped organize the uncensored press. He was one of the organizers of the “candle demonstration” in Bratislava on 25 March 1988; the demonstration demanded that the authorities respect human rights, allow freedom of confession, and consent to the Church’s appointment of bishops for vacant dioceses. In November 1989 Mikloško co-organized the Public against Violence (Verejnost’ proti Nasiliu [VPN]) and was a member of its coordinating center. As a result of the reconstruction of the Slovak parliament, on 1 March 1990 Mikloško became an MP of the Slovak National Council (SNC). In the first free elections of June 1990 he won a seat on behalf of the VPN and became speaker of the SNC for two years. After the VPN split, Mikloško became one of the leaders of the Civic Democratic Union–VPN. In March 1992 he left it and joined the Christian Democratic Movement (Krest’ansko-Demokratické Hnutie [KDH]). In 1990–92 he took part in talks concerning the new legal foundations of the Czechoslovak relationship; along with Ján Čarnogurski, Mikloško favored an inter-state agreement between the Czech and Slovak republics.

After the Czechoslovak federation collapsed Mikloško was an MP in all subsequent parliaments of independent Slovakia. He was one of the most adamant opponents of Vladimír Mečiar and his policies. In 1996 Mikloško became a member of the KDH Presidium, and in 2000, deputy chairman of the party for economic affairs. In 1997, along with all of the KDH, he joined the Slovak Democratic Coalition (Slovenská Demokratická Koalícia [SDK]), created before the elections of 1998 in order to remove Mečiar from power. As a result of a conflict in the coalition, connected with the plan of Prime Minister Mikulaš Dzurinda to turn the SDK into one party, in 2000 Mikloško, along with other KDH MPs, left the SDK parliamentary club. In the elections of 2002 the KDH ran alone, winning 8.25 percent of the vote. Mikloško authored Nebudete ich môct’ t’ rozvrátiť t’ (You will not be able to crush them; 1991), on the Slovak Catholic Church in 1948–89, and Čas stretnutí (Time to meet; 1996), a collection of reflections on Slovakia’s development after the Velvet Revolution. (PU)

Sources: ČBS; Kdo byl kdo v našich dějinách ve 20. století, vol. 1 (Prague, 1998); Eric Stein, Czecho/Slovakia: Ethnic Conflict, Constitutional Fissure, Negotiated Breakup (Ann Arbor, 1997); Ján Čarnogurský, Videné od Dunaja (Bratislava, 1997); Svätoslav Mathé, Slovenská politika v rokoch 1848–1993 (Martin, 2001); Jan Rychlík, Rozpad Československa: Česko-slovenské vzťahy 1989–1992 (Bratislava, 2002); www.kdh.sk/tvare/zivot_miklosko.htm#.

MIKOŁAJCZYK Stanisław (18 July 1901, Holsterhausen, Westphalia–13 December 1966, Washington, D.C.), Polish Peasant Party politician. Born into a family of miners, Mikołajczyk finished elementary school in Germany. After his family settled in Greater Poland (Wielkopolska, the Poznań region), where it purchased a small farm, he continued his education on his own. Mikołajczyk took part in the Great Poland Uprising against the Germans (1918–19), and in 1920 he fought in the Polish-Soviet war, during which he was wounded. After completing agricultural courses, he worked on his parents’ farm and from time to time in a sugar factory. In 1930 he purchased his own farm. He worked for the development of agricultural associations and rural education; for example, he established an association of rural youth in Strzyżewo. In 1922 he joined the Polish Peasant Party–Piast (Polskie Stronnictwo Ludowe–Piast [PSL–Piast]). In 1927 he co-organized the Great Poland Union of Rural Youth and served as its vice-president (1927–28), subsequently becoming honorary president. From 1930 to 1931 Mikołajczyk was a member of the PSL–Piast Supreme Council. In 1930, on the ticket of the PSL–Piast, he became the youngest MP in the Polish Assembly. From 1931 to 1939 he was a member of the Supreme Council of the Peasant Party (Stronnictwo Ludowe [SL]), and from 1933 to 1939, a member of the SL Chief Executive Committee. When Władysław Kiernik, vice-president of the SL Chief Executive Committee, was in exile, Mikołajczyk substituted for him. He represented a moderate agrarian approach to social reforms, but in the late 1930s he called for parceling out the landed estates without compensation to their owners. Mikołajczyk sought allies against the ruling camp both in the centrist parties and on the right. He was one of the closest associates of Wincenty Witos, whose policies he supported. Mikołajczyk had a negative view of the Polish Socialist Party (Polska Partia Socjalistyczna [PPS]), as well as the National Party (Stronnictwo Narodowe [SN]). From 1936 to 1939 Mikołajczyk was president of the Great Poland Society of Agricultural Associations. In 1936 he called for a platform of centrist opposition forces in the form of the so-called Morges Front. In August 1937, as interim president of the SL, he led an all-Polish peasant strike, for which he was sentenced to four months' imprisonment.

Mikołajczyk fought in the September 1939 campaign and subsequently made his way, via Hungary, to France. He was the president of the SL Foreign Committee, and in December 1939 he became vice-president and acting president of the National Council, which was an advisory organ to the president and to the government-in-exile. On 3 September 1941 Mikołajczyk became deputy prime minister and minister of interior in the government of General Władysław Sikorski. He also served as president of the Committee for Home Affairs. In the structures of the Polish government-in-exile Mikołajczyk was known to have a negative opinion of General Kazimierz Sosnkowski, who represented the pro-sanacja forces. On 14 July 1943, after the death of Sikorski, Mikołajczyk became head of the government-in-exile in London. Faced with the Kremlin's tenacity and the Western Allies' passivity over the Polish issue, Mikołajczyk more and more clearly realized that it would be necessary to reach a compromise with the Soviet Union in order to save Poland's endangered sovereignty. Since the Big Three did not inform Mikołajczyk about the decisions they had reached on the Polish borders at the Tehran Conference (November–December 1943), Mikołajczyk devoted a great deal of fruitless effort trying to negotiate the reestablishment of Poland's prewar borders. Mikołajczyk was among those who decided to start the uprising in Warsaw. At the beginning of August 1944 he attempted to use the threat of an uprising in Warsaw as a trump card in the talks with Stalin in the Kremlin. However, Stalin had imperialistic inclinations and had no interest in assisting the Poles; he not only halted the Soviet offensive, but he also refused to allow Allied planes to supply the Warsaw insurgents, thus allowing the Germans to suppress the Warsaw Uprising. During his second visit to Moscow in mid-October 1944, Mikołajczyk was referred by Stalin to the National Home Council (Krajowa Rada Narodowa [KRN]) and the Polish Committee of National Liberation (Polski Komitet Wyzwolenia Narodowego [PKWN]), but the Allies did not give him any support. Mikołajczyk also learned that the Curzon Line had already been accepted in Tehran. In the face of opposition in the Polish government-in-exile, and also because of the failure of his talks with President Franklin D. Roosevelt, on 24 November 1944 Mikołajczyk resigned as prime minister.

Mikołajczyk realized that it would be necessary to make ever greater concessions to the emerging Communist authorities in order to have a chance to take part in the legal political struggle in Poland; therefore, he recognized the Curzon Line as a basis for the Polish-Soviet border. He also accepted the agreements of the Yalta Conference (February 1945), and in June 1945 he attended a Moscow conference on the establishment of the Provisional Government of National Unity (Tymczasowy Rząd Jedności Narodowej [TRJN]). Mikołajczyk joined the TRJN as deputy prime minister and minister of agriculture and agricultural reforms (28 June 1945–8 February 1947). In July 1945 he attended the Potsdam Conference, and in August 1945 he took part in negotiations leading to the signing of an agreement on the Polish-Soviet border. At that time he succeeded in thwarting a project to build huge Polish-Soviet mixed enterprises but failed to enforce clear rules for the disbursement to Poland of German war reparations, which were to be paid through Soviet agency.

Mikołajczyk strove to consolidate the Polish non-Communist peasant movement. As he saw that the name "Stronnictwo Ludowe" had been arrogated by crypto-Communists, on 22 July 1945 he assumed the post of vice-president of the Provisional Chief Executive Committee of the Polish Peasant Party (Polskie Stronnictwo Ludowe [PSL]), becoming the de facto head of the party owing to Witos's illness. After Witos's death, Mikołajczyk was elected president of the PSL on 21 January 1946. From 1945 to 1946 he was a deputy to the KRN and chairman of the PSL parliamentary representation. He gathered around himself the majority of the political opposition in Poland. In February 1946, during talks with the Communists and the Communist-dominated PPS on the establishment of the electoral Bloc of Democratic Parties, Mikołajczyk rejected the proposal of a bloc in which the Communists offered the PSL 20 percent of the seats, and he demanded 75 percent of the seats for his party. He realized that he had great public support. At that time the PSL had more members than the Communist Polish Workers' Party (Polska Partia Robotnicza [PPR]) and the PPS together. In a referendum of 30 June 1946 the PSL, in opposition to the parties in the Communist bloc, called for a "no" vote on the abolition of the Senate. Three-fourths of the voters followed his recommendation, but the results of the referendum were falsified. During the election campaign the PPR, with the help of the security apparatus, made numerous attempts to destroy the unity within the PSL and organized opposition to Mikołajczyk within the party. The Communists terrorized the activists and the supporters of the PSL.

The rigged elections to the Constituent Assembly on 19 January 1947 gave the PSL only 28 out of the 444 seats. The anti-Mikołajczyk faction, the PSL–Left (PSL–Lewica) increased its activities. Facing the threat of arrest and a political trial, with the help of the American and British embassies, on 21 October 1947 Mikołajczyk secretly left Poland. Reluctantly received by his former associates from the London government, in early 1950 he established the Polish National Democratic Committee, intended as competition to the London government. However, the committee never played any major political role. Mikołajczyk finally settled in the United States. He became president of the PSL-in-exile and chairman of the International Peasant Union. He often spoke on Radio Free Europe. Although he was a champion of moderation and democracy, owing to the course of history in the second half of the twentieth century, Mikołajczyk became a controversial figure, viewed in diametrically opposite ways. The authorities of the Polish People's Republic always maligned him. The Communist-controlled United Peasant Party (Zjednoczone Stronnictwo Ludowe [ZSL], 1949–89) declared him its main enemy. Thus, when in 1990 the leaders of this party recognized Mikołajczyk as their ideological paradigm and renamed their party the PSL, it was historical usurpation. In 2000 Mikołajczyk's ashes were brought to Poland and reburied in the Cemetery of Distinguished Citizens of Great Poland in Poznań. Mikołajczyk's publications include The Rape of Poland (1948), published in Polish by the underground press as Polska zniewolona (1981). (JS)

Sources: PSB, vol. 21; Słownik biograficzny działaczy ruchu ludowego (Warsaw, 1989); Roman Buczek, Stronnictwo Ludowe w latach 1939–1945 (London, 1975); Krystyna Kersten, Narodziny systemu władzy: Polska 1943–1948 (Poznań, 1990); Andrzej Paczkowski, Stanisław Mikołajczyk, czyli kłęska realisty: Zarys biografii politycznej (Warsaw, 1991); Michał Karalus, Chłopak ze Strzyżewa: Młodość Stanisława Mikołajczyka, 1901–1930 (Dobrzyca, 1993); Stanisław Łach, Polskie Stronnictwo Ludowe w latach 1945–1947 (Gdańsk, 1995); Andrzej Albert [Wojciech Roszkowski], Najnowsza historia Polski 1914–1993, vol. 2 (Warsaw, 1995); Roman Buczek, Stanisław Mikołajczyk (Toronto, 1996); Stanisław Stępa, Stanisław Mikołajczyk (Warsaw, 2001).

MIKULIĆ Branko (10 June 1928, Podgradje, near Gornji Vakuf, Bosnia and Herzegovina–12 April 1994, Sarajevo), Yugoslav Communist activist. In 1943 Mikulić joined the Partisans led by Josip Broz Tito and fought in the Seventeenth Brigade. In 1945 he became a member of the Communist Party of Yugoslavia (CPY). He later graduated from an economics school in Zagreb. He served as secretary of the League of Communist Youth of Yugoslavia (SKOJ) in the towns of Gornji Vakuf and Bugojno and subsequently held local-level party posts in Bugojno, Jajce, Livno, and Zenica. In 1965 Mikulić was elected a member of the Central Committee (CC) of the League of Communists of Bosnia and Herzegovina (LCBH). From 1967 to 1969 he was chairman of the Executive Council (prime minister) of Bosnia and Herzegovina, and from March 1969 to April 1978, he was chairman of the CC of the LCBH. From May 1974 to June 1982 Mikulić was a member of the Presidium of the CC of the League of Communists of Yugoslavia (LCY). He was a member of the presidency of Bosnia and Herzegovina (May 1974–April 1978 and April 1982–May 1984). From 19 October 1978 to 23 October 1979 he served as chairman of the LCY CC Presidium. From April 1982 to April 1983 he was chairman of the presidency of Bosnia and Herzegovina. From May 1984 to May 1986 he was a member of the presidency of the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (SFRY). On 15 May 1986 Mikulić became president of the Federal Executive Council (prime minister) of the SFRY. In order to improve the economic situation he sought aid from the International Monetary Fund. This aid was conditional on Yugoslavia's fulfilling numerous requirements, including the curbing of inflation; therefore, the government made a decision to reduce salaries, the money supply, and budgetary expenses. However, inflation continued to rise: it was 190 percent in 1986, 419 percent in 1987, and 1,232 percent in 1988. At the end of 1988 Mikulić decided to resign, but he officially continued to serve as prime minister until 16 March 1989, when he was succeeded by Ante Marković. (AO)

Sources: Who's Who in the Socialist Countries of Europe (Munich, London, and Paris, 1989); Slobodan Stanković, The End of the Tito Era: Yugoslavia's Dilemmas (Stanford, 1981); Susan Woodward, Balkan Tragedy (Washington, D.C., 1995).

MILCZANOWSKI Andrzej (26 May 1939, Równe, Volhynia), Polish lawyer and politician. The son of a prosecutor executed by the NKVD during World War II, in 1962 Milczanowski graduated in law from the University of Poznań. Until 1968 he worked in the county prosecutor's office in Szczecin and until 1980 as a legal adviser in various enterprises. From 1978 he worked with the Intervention Bureau of the Committee of Social Self-Defense–KOR. Milczanowski took part in the August 1980 workers' strikes and became head of the Legal Office of the West Pomeranian Region of Solidarity and head of the Factory Commission of Solidarity in the Szczecin Shipyard. After martial law was introduced, from 13 to 15 December 1981 Milczanowski took part in the Regional Strike Committee, for which he was sentenced to five years in prison. Amnestied after two and a half years, he continued trade union activities in the underground Solidarity. In 1984–88 Milczanowski belonged to the secret Coordination Council of Solidarity's West Pomeranian Region and to the all-national Provisional Coordination Commission; from 1987 he belonged to the National Executive Commission of Solidarity. In the summer of 1988 he led the strike in the Szczecin Shipyard. From December 1988 he belonged to the Civic Committee of the Chairman of Solidarity, and from February to April 1989 he participated in the Round Table Talks.

From May 1990 Milczanowski was deputy head, and from August 1990 to January 1992 head, of the newly organized Office of State Protection. From July 1992 to December 1995 he was minister of interior in the governments of Hanna Suchocka, Waldemar Pawlak, and Józef Oleksy. He held this position on behalf of President Lech Wałęsa, carrying out his political line. Milczanowski opposed the exposure of former collaborators of the (Communist) Security Service (Służba Bezpieczeństwa [SB]) since he believed this would jeopardize current operations of special services. He also opposed the exchange of personnel in these services and the public release of SB documentation. His stance was often criticized by various politicians from the post-Solidarity camp. When Wałęsa lost the presidential elections in 1995, on the eve of the assumption of the presidency by the post-Communist Aleksander Kwaśniewski (21 December 1995), Milczanowski made a dramatic parliamentary speech in which he accused the acting prime minister, Oleksy, of contacts with Soviet and Russian intelligence. The investigation of this matter was suspended, while an investigation concerning Milczanowski's disclosure of state secrets was deadlocked for years. From 1996 Milczanowski worked as a notary in Szczecin. (AF)

Sources: Biała Księga: Akta śledztwa prowadzonego przez Prokuraturę Warszawskiego Okręgu Wojskowego w Warszawie w sprawie wniosków Ministra Spraw Wewnętrznych z dnia 19.12.1995 r. i 16.01.1996 r. (Warsaw, 1996); Opozycja w PRL: Słownik biograficzny 1956–89 (Warsaw, 2000); Antoni Dudek, Pierwsze lata III Rzeczpospolitej 1989–2001 (Kraków, 2002).

MILEWSKI Mirosław (1 May 1928, Lipsk), Polish Communist activist. In 1944 Milewski had already joined the security apparatus created by the Soviets in Poland and took part in its operations in the Suwałki region. In 1945–48 he was a member of the (Communist) Polish Workers' Party, and from 1948 to 1990, the Polish United Workers' Party (Polska Zjednoczona Partia Robotnicza [PUWP]). From 1944 to 1958 Milewski worked in military security and later in the Ministry of Interior in Warsaw, where he was deputy director and director of the Department of Intelligence; from 1971 to 1980 he was undersecretary of state, and from October 1980 to July 1981, minister of interior. In 1957 Milewski formally graduated from the Department of Agriculture of the Main School of Rural Economy in Warsaw. From 1971 he was a brigadier general, and from 1979, a general of division in the Civic Militia (Milicja Obywatelska). From 1974 a member of the Supreme Board and from 1979 deputy chairman of the Association of Combatants for Freedom and Democracy, Milewski advanced in the Ministry of Interior thanks to his close cooperation with the Soviet security apparatus.

From December 1971 to February 1980 Milewski was a deputy member and then a member of the PUWP Central Committee (CC), and from July 1981 he was CC secretary and a member of the CC Politburo. He advocated a crackdown on Solidarity. His departure from the Ministry of Interior and advancement in the party apparatus was connected with the consolidation of power by General Wojciech Jaruzelski. Although Milewski, believed to be a man of the Kremlin, gained overall control of the security forces on behalf of the party leadership, direct control was taken over by General Czesław Kiszczak, connected with Jaruzelski. It is assumed that Kiszczak's group, rooted in military intelligence and counterintelligence, had a hand in the Iron (Żelazo) affair, in which Milewski probably supervised the criminal operations of his functionaries in the West. The personal conflict between Milewski and Kiszczak, as well as a rivalry between two groups, the Legia (the sports club of the military) and the Gwardia (the sports club of the militiamen), continued into the martial law period. It probably culminated with the murder of Reverend Jerzy Popiełuszko in October 1984. In connection with this case, Milewski was dismissed from all party and state functions in May 1985 and expelled from the party in 1986. The mysterious affairs in which he was involved were not explained even after 1989. (IS/WR) Sources: Mołdawa; Krystyna Daszkiewicz, Uprowadzenie i morderstwo ks. Jerzego Popiełuszki (Poznań, 1990); Jerzy Jachowicz, "Złoty wywiad PRL," Gazeta Wyborcza, 11 October 1990; Tadeusz Fredro-Bielecki, Zwycięstwo księdza Jerzego (Warsaw, 1991); Jan Widacki, Czego nie powiedział generał Kiszczak (Warsaw, 1992); Generał Pawłow: Byłem rezydentem KGB w Polsce (Warsaw, 1994); Henryk Dominiczak, Organy bezpieczeństwa PRL 1944–1990 (Warsaw, 1997).

MIŁKOWSKI Stanisław (6 June 1905, Sikorzyce, near Dąbrowa Górnicza–April 1945, Bergen-Belsen), Polish economist and Peasant Party activist. Born into a peasant family, after graduating from high school in Tarnów, Miłkowski completed law studies and a higher cooperative course at the Jagiellonian University in Kraków (1934). In 1926 he joined the Union of Polish Academic Peasant Youth (Ogólnopolski Związek Akademickiej Młodzieży Ludowej) and served as its president from 1929 to 1930. In 1931 he joined the Peasant Party (Stronictwo Ludowe [SL]). In 1934 Miłkowski became a member of the Main Board of the Union of Rural Youth called Wici and served as its deputy chairman from 1935 to 1938. From December 1935 to February 1938 he belonged to the SL Supreme Council, and in August 1935 he joined the SL Chief Executive Committee. In the 1930s he published extensively, becoming one of the main theoreticians of Polish agrarianism. Miłkowski believed that the Poles should follow the example of the Czech agrarians, and he supported unification tendencies in the peasant movement. In 1931 he initiated the development of the ideology of the peasant youth movement. He expounded his concepts in the brochure Agraryzm jako forma przebudowy ustroju społecznego (Agrarianism as a form of reconstruction of the social system; 1934). Miłkowski advocated that large landed estates be parceled out without compensation to their owners, and he supported the development of agricultural cooperatives. He was more critical of capitalism than of socialism or even communism, as he believed that the latter two were the future of the urban economy. He called for the industrialization of agriculture and the deglomeration of cities and advocated that local governments be granted broad powers. He presented his theses in the brochure Walka o nową Polskę (Struggle for a new Poland; 1936). Miłkowski's agrarian ideology gave rise to a programmatic discussion within the SL. Although he criticized the mass-rally-based methods of struggle used by the older generation of Peasant Party members, the SL adopted the majority of his objections as part of its program in 1935. During the Nazi occupation Miłkowski took part in activities of the underground peasant movement organized by the Peasant Party–Roch (Stronictwo Ludowe–Roch [SL–Roch]). Along with Zygmunt Zaremba, he wrote the peasant-Socialist “Program of People’s Poland” (Program Polski Ludowej; 1940–41). He also served as president of the Provisional Cooperative Council. In late August 1944 Miłkowski was arrested in Międzyzlesie, near Warsaw, where he lived. Deported to the camp in Bergen-Belsen, he died there in unknown circumstances. (WR)

Sources: PSB, vol. 21; Zygmunt Zaremba, Wojna i konspiracja (London, 1957); Materiały źródłowe do historii polskiego ruchu ludowego, vol. 4 (Warsaw, 1966); Józef Niećko, Na drodze do Polski Ludowej (Warsaw, 1967).

MILLER Leszek (3 July 1946, Żyrdów), Polish Communist activist and post-Communist politician. Born into a laborer’s family, Miller started working as a blue-collar laborer in the Linen Industry Factory in Żyrdów. A member of the Polish United Workers’ Party (Polska Zjednoczona Partia Robotnicza [PUWP]) from 1969, in 1977 he graduated from the Higher School of Social Sciences at the PUWP Central Committee (CC). From 1982 to 1985 Miller headed the Group for Youth Affairs, and in 1985–86 he was head of the CC Department for Youth, Physical Culture, and Tourism. In 1986–89 he was first secretary of the PUWP Provincial Committee in Skierniewice, and from December 1988 he was CC secretary and head of the CC Commission for Youth and Social Organizations. From July 1989 he belonged to the CC Politburo. Miller took part in the Round Table Talks in 1989, co-chairing the negotiating group for youth affairs. Miller was elected to the parliament in the breakthrough elections of 4 June 1989 and in subsequent elections in 1991, 1993, 1997, and 2001. In August 1989 he belonged to the PUWP working group negotiating the party’s share in the government of Tadeusz Mazowiecki. He also played a major role in the privatization of the holdings of the Communist nomenclatura—for example, through a special economic agency of the PUWP CC.

After the PUWP was dissolved in January 1990, Miller became secretary general of the Social Democracy of the Polish Republic (Socjaldemokracja Rzeczypospolitej Polski [SdRP]). From March 1993 he was its deputy chairman, and from December 1997, its chairman. Miller was suspected of taking part in the transfer of a CPSU loan to the SdRP in violation of Polish currency laws, but an investigation into the matter was discontinued by a post-Communist minister of justice. After the SdRP was transformed into the Democratic Left Alliance (Sojusz Lewicy Demokratycznej [SLD]) in December 1999, Miller became chairman of the party. From October 1993 to February 1996 he was minister of labor and social policy; from February 1996 to October 1997 he was head of the Office of the Prime Minister, and then he was minister of interior and administration. As chairman of the SLD parliamentary club, in 1997–2001 Miller was in sharp opposition to the government of Jerzy Buzek. After the elections of September 2001 brought victory to the SLD, on 4 October 2001 Miller became prime minister of the government based on a coalition of the SLD and the Polish Peasant Party. His government checked the reform of education and the health service and slowed down privatization. In December 2002 Miller finalized the negotiations on Poland's accession to the European Union, confirmed by a referendum in June 2003. In the spring of 2003 he took part in the decision on Polish participation in the war in Iraq. Economic stagnation and high unemployment eroded social support for Miller's cabinet. Political struggles, failed legislation, and repeated scandals within the SLD ranks culminated in a corruption scandal involving SLD member Lew Rywin, who offered the media concern Agora (the publisher of Gazeta Wyborcza) help in changing the law in exchange for a bribe—allegedly in the name of Miller. All this, as well as Miller's escalating conflict with President Aleksander Kwaśniewski brought Miller's ratings to a record low, so on 2 May 2004 he resigned. (IS/WR) Sources: Moldawa; Katarzyna Kęsicka, "Ałganow i pożyczka KPZR," Gazeta Wyborcza, 12 January 1996; Rafał Kasprów, "Wszystkie pieniądze SLD," Życie, 26 February 1998; Andrzej Kulik and Jarosław Knap, "Bagno w Kotlinie," Wprost, 30 August 1998; Janusz A. Majcherek, Pierwsza dekada III Rzeczypospolitej 1989–2001 (Warsaw, 1999); Antoni Dudek, Pierwsze lata III Rzeczypospolitej 1989–2001 (Kraków, 2002); Arnošt Bečka and Jacek Molesta, Sprawozdanie z likwidacji majątku byłej Polskiej Zjednoczonej Partii Robotniczej (Warsaw, 2001).

MILOŠEVIĆ Slobodan (20 August 1941, Požarevac—12 March 2006, The Hague), Serb and Yugoslav Communist activist, president of Yugoslavia. Milošević's father was an Orthodox priest, and his mother a teacher. Both committed suicide, his father in 1962, and his mother in 1972. In 1959 Milošević joined the League of Communists of Yugoslavia (LCY), and in 1964 he graduated in law from the University of Belgrade. During his studies he was department secretary of the League of Communists of Serbia (LCS) and deputy chairman of the Student Union. In 1969–73 he was deputy director and from 1973 to 1978 director of the Tehnogas enterprise. In 1978–83 he was chairman of Beobank, the largest bank in Yugoslavia at the time. In 1984, thanks to the support of Ivan Stambolić, the LCS leader, Milošević became chairman of the LCS Committee in Belgrade. From May 1986 to July 1990 he chaired the Presidium of the LCS Central Committee. In May 1989 he became chairman of the Presidium of the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (SFRY). After the dissolution of the LCY, in July 1990 the LCS joined the Socialist Union of Serbian Parties with the Socialist Party of Serbia (Socialistička Partija Srbije [SPS]), headed by Milošević. In the elections of December 1990 and December 1992 Milošević won 65 and 56 percent of the vote respectively and strengthened his position as president of Serbia and de facto ruler of the new Yugoslavia, which was shrinking as a result of the secessions of its republics. Since according to the constitution Milošević could not run for a third time, on 15 July 1997 the Federal Assembly elected him president of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, consisting of Serbia and Montenegro.

Milošević strove to strengthen the position of Serbs in the SFRY, but his actions in fact led to the country's downfall, to the civil war, and to massive war crimes. The turning point in Milošević's career came on 24 April 1987, when he told the Kosovo Serbs that nobody would conquer them anymore. By appealing to Serb nationalism and by starting an anti-Albanian campaign, Milošević gained popularity among the Serbs. On 28 June 1989 he presided over the celebration of the six hundredth anniversary of the Serbian defeat by the Turks at Kosovo Field. Milošević inspired a demonstration that led to the takeover of power in the autonomous republics of Kosovo and Voivodina by nationalist politicians allied with him. In 1990 the Serbian constitution was changed to limit the autonomy of both regions. This aggravated relations between Serbia and other SFRY republics. Milošević referred to the idea of Greater Serbia and strove to centralize the state against the aspirations of the Slovenes and Croats, who wanted to turn the SFRY into a loose confederation. As a result, on 25 June 1991 Slovenia and Croatia proclaimed their independence. Soon they were followed by Macedonia and Bosnia-Herzegovina, inhabited by large numbers of Serbs. SFRY military intervention in Slovenia and Croatia and Serbian military operations in Bosnia led to a war during which ethnic cleansing and mass murders were recorded on a scale unseen in Europe after World War II. Milošević was largely responsible for this course of events, since he militarily supported Serbian operations in Croatia and Bosnia-Herzegovina. As a result of international pressures (economic sanctions and NATO air raids against Serbia), in 1995 Milošević had to give up his support for the Bosnian Serbs and their leader, Radovan Karadžić, who is accused of war crimes. Milošević took part in peace negotiations and was one of the signatories to the treaties of Dayton Agreement (21 November 1995) and Paris Agreement (14 December 1995), which ended the war in Bosnia-Herzegovina.

Milošević's policies were generally condemned abroad. He was accused of the violation of democratic rules and human rights, as well as war crimes. Nevertheless, in Serbia he continued to be very popular, especially in the countryside, where he was thought a national hero. His wife, professor of sociology Mirjana Marković, played an important political role in the system. The opposition was too weak and split to challenge Milošević's position. Milošević followed a skillful policy of divide and rule—for instance, he attracted one of the opposition leaders, Vuk Drašković, to the government in 1999. By that time

Milošević's ruthless policies toward the Kosovo Albanians had led to another crisis. In view of proofs of serious violations of human rights in Kosovo and the failure of diplomatic efforts to curb these violations, in March 1999 NATO started air raids over the new Yugoslavia. After the conclusion of a peace accord on 9 June 1999, the international community took over control in Kosovo. Although Milošević brought about the fall of the old and the new Yugoslavia, he made use of the NATO raids to consolidate his position at home and to attack the opposition. In May 1999 he was formally accused of war crimes by The Hague International Tribunal for War Crimes in Former Yugoslavia. In September 2000 Milošević lost the presidential election to Vojislav Koštunica. For some time Milošević did not accept the defeat, but finally, under domestic and foreign pressure, on 7 October 2000 he resigned. Although he counted on immunity, on 1 April 2001 he was arrested and handed over to The Hague tribunal. During the trial, which started on 12 February 2002, he was accused of war crimes and genocide, but he died before the end of the trial. (AO)

Sources: Lenard J. Cohen, Serpent in the Bosom: The Rise and Fall of Slobodan Milosevic (Boulder, Colo., 1995); Laura Silber and Allan Little, The Death of Yugoslavia (London, 1995); Warren Zimmermann, Origins of a Catastrophe (New York and Toronto, 1996); Dusko Doder and Louise Branson, Milosevic: Portrait of a Tyrant (New York, 1999); Slavoljub Djukić, Milošević and Marković: A Lust for Power (Montreal, 2001); Bugajski; www.gov.yu/institutions/president/president.html.

MIŁOSZ Czesław (30 June 1911, Szetejnje [Šateiniai], near Kėdainiai, Lithuania–14 August 2004, Kraków), Polish poet and writer. Miłosz graduated from high school in Wilno (Vilnius) in 1929, and he studied law at Wilno University from 1929 to 1934. In 1931 he co-founded the leftist literary group Żagary, and in 1933–34 he edited the periodical Żagary. Miłosz made his literary debut with the volume Poemat o czasie zastygłym (Poem on time standing still; 1933). After graduation, Miłosz received a scholarship from the National Culture Fund. He went to Paris, where he made friends with his relative Oskar Miłosz, who greatly influenced his work. Upon returning to Poland in 1935, Miłosz started working for the Polish radio station in Wilno. His sympathy for the national minorities caused him to lose his job, but from 1937 he worked at Polish Radio in Warsaw. He also published in the periodicals Marchoń and Ateneum and the daily Słowo. In September 1939 Miłosz went to Wilno, already incorporated by Lithuania. He wrote for the dailies Gazeta Codzienna and Kurier Wileński. After the Soviets occupied Lithuania, in the summer of 1940 Miłosz left for German-occupied Warsaw and worked as a caretaker at the university library.

Connected with the underground Socialist group Liberty (Wolność), he did not join the military underground but was active in the cultural underground. After the outbreak of the Warsaw Uprising in August 1944 Miłosz left for Lesser Poland, where he spent the winter of 1944–45 at the estate of friends. After the war he settled in Kraków, publishing in the periodicals Odrodzenie, Przekrój, and Twórczość. He also published Ocalenie (Salvation; 1945). In 1945 Miłosz won an award from the ministry of culture and started working in the Polish consulate in New York. In 1947 he became cultural attaché in the embassy in Washington, D.C., and in 1950 he became first secretary in the embassy in France. In 1948 he published Traktat moralny (Treatise on morality).

In February 1951 Miłosz asked for political asylum in France, becoming the target of a propaganda attack by the Polish Communist authorities; his works were banned in Poland. At the same time political émigrés were very critical of his cooperation with the Communist regime. Miłosz was helped by the Paris monthly Kultura. It was there that he explained his breakaway from the Communist government. In 1951 he published Zniewolony umysł (Captive Mind, 1953), which was also translated into other languages. In 1953 he published a novel, Zdobycie władzy, in French (Polish edition, 1955; Seizure of Power, 1955), for which he received the Prix Littéraire Européen. Thanks to these works, Miłosz won a reputation as a leading critic of communism and pro-Soviet leftist intellectuals. His subsequent works—such as the collections of poems Światło dzienne (Daylight; 1953) and Traktat poetycki (1958; Treatise on Poetry, 2001), the novel Dolina Issy (1955; Issa Valley, 1981), and his memoirs Rodzinna Europa (1959; Native Realm, 1968)—strengthened his literary position. In 1960 Miłosz was given the chair of Polish literature at the University of California in Berkeley. After a series of new volumes of poetry and prose—including a study on Stanisław Brzozowski, Człowiek wśród skorpionów (A man among Scorpions; 1962)—in 1969 Miłosz published the textbook The History of Polish Literature. In the United States he was initially known as the translator of Zbigniew Herbert's works into English, but in the 1970s he gradually won a reputation among English-speaking readers, receiving the prestigious Neustadt International Prize for Literature (1978). Miłosz also published the volume of poetry Gdzie słońce wschodzi i kędy zapada (Where the sun rises and where it sets; 1974); the collections of prose Prywatne obowiązki (Private duties; 1972), Ziemia Ulro (1977; Land of Ulro, 1984), and Ogród nauk (Garden of arts and sciences; 1979); and dialogues with Tomasz Venclova (1979).

In 1980 Miłosz received the Nobel Prize for Literature.

Since this award followed the formation of Solidarity, the Communist authorities in Poland removed the ban on his works. For the first time wider circles of Poles in Poland could not only read his poetry, but frequently could also simply learn his name. The publication of his works followed on a large scale. In June 1981 Miłosz made a triumphant tour of Poland, becoming a symbol of a new cultural freedom and political aspirations. When martial law was introduced in Poland, he chaired the Fund for Aid to Independent Polish Literature and Culture. In the 1980s Miłosz's publications included Nieobjęta ziemia (Unembraced land; 1984); Kroniki (Chronicles; 1987); and the essays and volumes of prose Zaczynając od moich ulic (Starting from my streets; 1985) and Metafizyczna pauza (Metaphysical pause; 1989). In 2002 Miłosz returned to Poland and settled in Kraków.

Miłosz translated a lot into Polish (for example, some books of the Bible) and into English. Starting in the 1990s he also published the collections of poetry Dalsze okolice (Distant neighborhood; 1991) and To (This; 2000); and the volumes of prose Rok myśliwego (1990; Year of the Hunter, 1994), Abecadło Miłosza (Miłosz's ABC's; 1997), Życie na wyspach (Life on the isles; 1997), and Piesek przydrożny (1997; Road-Side Dog, 1998). Miłosz was active in meeting readers and delivering lectures, and he won several awards, such as membership to the American Academy of Arts and Letters and the American Academy of Arts and Sciences (both in 1982); the U.S. president's special award for contributions to American culture; honorary citizenship in Lithuania (1992); the Italian Grinzane Cavour Award (1992); the Polish Nike Award (1998); and honorary doctorates from the University of Michigan (1977), the University of California (1978), the Catholic University of Lublin (1981), New York University (1981), Harvard University (1989), Kaunas University (1992), and the University of Rome (1992). He also received the U.S. National Medal of Arts, as well as the highest Polish and Lithuanian orders. In 1988 Miłosz's Collected Poems were published in the United States. (DT)

Sources: "Teksty," Pamiętnik Literacki (London), 1981, nos. 4–5; Twórczość, 1981 no. 6; Miłosz '51 (London, 1983); Andrzej Walicki, Spotkania z Miłoszem (London, 1985); Jerzy K. Wiatkowski, ed., Poznanie Miłosza (Kraków, 1985); D. Davie, Czesław Miłosz and the Insufficiency of Lyric (Cambridge, 1986); Aleksander Fiut, Moment wieczny: Poezja Czesława Miłosza (Paris, 1987); Renata Górczyńska and Piotr Kłoczowski, eds., Trzy zimy oraz głosy o wierszach (London, 1987); Edward Możejko Between Anxiety and Hope (Edmonton, 1988); L. Nathan and A. Quinn, The Poet's Work: An Introduction to Czesław Miłosz (Cambridge, Mass., 1991).

MILOVANOVIĆ Milovan (17 February 1863, Belgrade–18 June 1912, Belgrade), Serb politician and diplomat. Milovanović studied law in Belgrade and later in Paris, where in 1888 he earned a doctorate. In the same year he was appointed professor at Belgrade University, where he worked from 1888 to 1891. Milovanović took an active part in the drafting of the Serbian constitution of 1888, which introduced modern parliamentarism. In 1891 he joined the Radical Party. From 1891 to 1892 and from 1893 to 1894 he was head of a department in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. From 1896 to 1897 he served as minister of justice. After Alexander Obrenović came to the throne, Milovanović initially sought cooperation between the Radical Party and the king, but soon he began to protest Alexander's absolutist policy. In 1899 Milovanović was sentenced in absentia to two years' imprisonment. Pardoned and rehabilitated the following year, he became an envoy to Bucharest.

From February 1901 to May 1902 Milovanović served as minister of the national economy, and from March to May 1902 he also held the post of finance minister. From 1903 to 1907 he was head of a diplomatic mission to Rome. In 1907 he represented Serbia at the Second Hague Peace Conference, which was an important stage in the development of international law. In July 1908 he became foreign minister of Serbia and held this post until the end of his life. From 4 July 1911 to 1 June 1912 he also served as prime minister. Milovanović was highly esteemed as a diplomat. In October 1908, during the crisis that followed the annexation of Bosnia and Herzegovina by Austria-Hungary, Milovanović managed to avert the looming war with Austria-Hungary. He thought that Serbia could not wage a war against Vienna alone and that the Serbian question should be turned into a European cause and combined with the principle of the European balance of power. He sought rapprochement between Serbia and the Entente and strove for an agreement among the Balkan states. In 1909 Milovanović entered into negotiations with Bulgaria, which led to the signing of a Serbian-Bulgarian treaty of friendship and alliance on 13 March 1912. This was a step toward an alliance between the four Balkan states: Serbia, Bulgaria, Greece, and Montenegro, and it sparked off the First Balkan War. Milovanović's publications include Srbi i hrvati (The Serbs and the Croats; 1895) and Krivično pravo (Penal law; 1889). He published articles in Odjek and Samouprava, periodicals of the Radical Party. In 1894 he founded Delo, another periodical of the Radical Party. Milovanović's publications also appeared in the Paris Journal des débats and Le Temps, in the Vienna Die Zeit, and in other periodicals. (AO)

Sources: Enciklopedija Jugoslavije, vol. 6 (Zagreb, 1965); Biographisches Lexikon, vol. 3; Dimitrije Djordjević, "Pašić i Milovanović u pregovorima za Balkanski savez," Istorički časopis, 1959, nos. 9–10; Dimitrije Djordjević, Milovanović Milovan (Belgrade, 1962); Wacław Felczak and Tadeusz Wasilewski, Historia Jugostawii (Wrocław, 1985).

MILUTINOVIĆ Milan (19 December 1942, Belgrade), Serb post-Communist politician. In 1965 Milutinović graduated in law from the University of Belgrade. During his studies he was active in the Communist student organization and became friends with Slobodan Milošević. Milutinović belonged to the Presidium of the Union of Yugoslav Youth (Savez Omladine Jugoslavije) and joined the League of Communists of Yugoslavia. In 1969–74 he sat on the sociopolitical council of the federal parliament, and from 1977 to 1982 he was secretary (minister) of education and science of the republic of Serbia. From 1983 to 1987 he was director of the National Library of Serbia; then he was head of the Department of Press, Culture, and Information of the Yugoslav Foreign Ministry, and from 1989 he was ambassador to Greece. In August 1995 Milutinović became the new Yugoslavia's minister of foreign affairs and held this position for three years. He was the main Yugoslav negotiator of the Dayton agreement of November 1995 that ended the war in Bosnia-Herzegovina. On 29 December 1997 Milutinović became president of Serbia, replacing Milošević, who became president of Yugoslavia.

From the beginning of February 1999 Milutinović took part in the talks in Rambouillet, where an agreement between Kosovo Albanians and Serbs was being worked out. When the Serbs rejected the draft agreement and when NATO started air raids on the new Yugoslavia (March–June 1999), Milutinović appealed for a stop to the bombing, but to no avail. In May 1999 The Hague International Tribunal for War Crimes in former Yugoslavia accused Milutinović of crimes against humanity during the Kosovo conflict. He was found co-responsible for the military operations of Serb forces terrorizing and expelling Albanians from their homes. In October 2000 Milutinović became deputy chairman of the Socialist Party of Serbia (Socialistička Partija Srbije). He resigned from this position in April 2001, when an investigation was started concerning his participation in the illegal purchase of a villa. Prime minister Zoran Djindjić opposed handing Milutinović over to The Hague Tribunal as long as he held the office of Serbian president, but when his term was over in December 2002, Milutinović surrendered to the tribunal. (AO)

Sources: Richard Holbrooke, To End a War (New York, 1998); Bugajski; www.mfa.gov.yu/history/Ministri/MMilutinovic_s.html; www.un.org/icty/glance/milutinovic.html; www.fact-index.com/m/mil/milan_milutinovic.html.

MINÁČ Vladimír (10 August 1922, Klenovec–25 October 1996, Bratislava), Slovak writer. After graduating from high school in 1940, Mináč studied Slovak and German philology at Comenius University in Bratislava. He participated in the Slovak National Uprising. Arrested by the Gestapo in December 1944, he was imprisoned in concentration camps at Mauthausen and Dachau. After the liberation, Mináč worked as a journalist. From 1956 to 1967 he was a member of the presidium of the Czechoslovak Writers' Union. From 1974 to 1990 he was president of the cultural organization Slovenska Matica in Martin. From 1953 to 1989 he belonged to the Communist Party of Czechoslovakia (CPC); from 1968 to 1971 he was a member of the CPC Central Committee (CC), and from 1971 to 1989 he was a member of the CC of the Communist Party of Slovakia. Mináč served as a deputy to the National Assembly (1964–68), a deputy to the People's Chamber of the Federal Assembly (1969–71), and a deputy to the Slovak National Council (1971–90). After the Velvet Revolution of 1989 he was elected to the Federal Assembly on the ticket of the post-Communist Slovak Party of the Democratic Left (Strana demokratickej ľavice). Mináč made his literary debut with the novel Smrt' t' chodí po horách (Death walks the mountains; 1948), in which he described his experiences during the Slovak National Uprising. In the novel Včera a zajtra (Yesterday and tomorrow; 1949) he depicted the fate of a hero after the war. His subsequent novel, Modré vlny (Blue waves; 1951), was a typical Socialist realist work. The trilogy Generácia (Generation) is considered his best work; it consists of the novels Dlhý čas čakania (The long waiting time; 1958), Živí a mŕtvi (The quick and the dead; 1959), and Zvony zvoní na deň (The bells ring for the day; 1961). It is a synthesis of the transformations in the lives of the Slovaks in 1944–48. In his later works Mináč gave a literary account of the Stalinist period of “errors and distortions” but always stayed within the limits ordained by the authorities. After the collapse of communism, Mináč published several volumes of essays that were critical of the social and national transformations taking place in Slovakia after 1989, including Sub tegmine (Under the plum tree; 1992) and Návraty k prevratu (Returns to the coup; 1993). (PU)

Sources: Encyklopédia slovenských spisovateľ'ov, vol. 2 (Bratislava, 1984); Who's Who in the Socialist Countries of Europe, vol. 2 (Munich, London, and Paris, 1989); Kdo byl kdo v našich dějinách ve 20. století, vol. 1 (Prague, 1998); Reprezentačný biografický lexikón Slovenska (Martin, 1999); Július Noge, Prozaik Vladimír Mináč (Bratislava, 1962); V košeli zo žihľ'avy: Biografické rozhovory Petra Holku s Vladimírom Mináčom (Bratislava, 1999).

MINC Hilary (24 August 1905, Kazimierz on the Vistula–26 November 1974, Warsaw), Polish Communist activist. Minc came from a Jewish lower-middle-class family. While in a gymnasium, he joined the Union of Polish Socialist Youth. During his studies at Warsaw University, in 1922 he joined the Communist Workers' Party of Poland (Komunistyczna Partia Robotniczej Polski [KPRP]). Fearing arrest, he left for France, where he completed law and economic studies in Paris and Toulouse, and he also obtained a Ph.D. in economics. Minc joined the French Communist Party and organized numerous strikes; therefore in 1928 he was ordered to leave France. After his return to Poland he worked as an editor in the Central Statistical Office of Poland.

In September 1939 Minc was in Lwów (now Lviv), and in December 1939 he began lecturing in economics at the university in Samarkand. From 1943 he belonged to the leading organizers of the Union of Polish Patriots and the Bureau of Polish Communists in the USSR, and he was one of the political officers of the First Tadeusz Kościuszko Infantry Division. In August 1944 Minc became a member of the CC and Politburo of the Polish Workers' Party (Polska Partia Robotnicza [PPR]). From July to December 1944 he headed the Economic Office of the Polish Committee of National Liberation (Polski Komitet Wyzwolenia Narodowego [PKWN]), and from December 1944 to March 1947 he was trade minister in the Provisional Government and in the Provisional Polish Government of National Unity. As an advocate of Stalinist central planning, in February 1948 Minc brought about the resignation of Czesław Bobrowski from the Central Planning Office (CPO) and the dissolution of this office. In April 1949 he became head of the State Commission for Economic Planning, which was established in place of the CPO. Throughout this time Minc also presided over the Economic Committee of the Council of Ministers. From March 1947 to April 1949 he was minister of industry and trade. These posts enabled him to play a key role in the introduction of the command economy in Poland. At a congress in December 1948 at which the Polish United Workers' Party (Polska Zjednoczona Partia Robotnicza [PUWP]) was founded, Minc became a member of the party's Central Committee (CC), the Politburo, and the Secretariat of the CC, joining the party's top leadership. In April 1949 he also became deputy prime minister responsible for the economy—and mainly for the implementation of the Six-Year Plan (1949–55). Minc firmly supported accelerated industrialization and the collectivization of agriculture. In 1952, during a mounting anti-Semitic campaign in the USSR, Minc's position in the party leadership was shaken, but after Stalin's death his troubles were over.

In 1955 and 1956 Minc was closer to the Puławianie faction of the PUWP, but because of his leading role under Stalinism, he could not make himself credible as the advocate of a more moderate political line, especially since the policy of intense industrialization, which was associated with him, had brought catastrophic results: the supply and distribution of goods to the public had collapsed. During talks on Władysław Gomułka's return to power, held by the Natolin faction (Natolińcy) and the Puławianie faction after the events of June 1956 in Poznań, Minc's position was already hopeless, and his resignation was a precondition issued by Gomułka. At the beginning of October 1956 Minc was removed from the Politburo and soon dismissed as deputy prime minister. In the spring of 1957, the public prosecutor general, Andrzej Burda, presented the Politburo with charges against top functionaries of the Ministry of Public Security. He also proposed an inquiry against the top representatives of the Stalinist administration, including Minc. However, it was decided that these functionaries should bear "political responsibility" only. In 1957 Minc retired, and in March 1959 he left the CC of the PUWP. (WR)

Sources: Mołdawa; Marek Łatyński, Nie paść na kolana (Warsaw, 1987); Krystyna Kersten, Narodziny systemu władzy: Polska 1943–1948 (Poznań, 1990); Marek Nadolski, Komuniści wobec chłopów w Polsce 1941–1956 (Warsaw, 1993); Andrzej Jezierski and Cecylia Leszczyńska, Dzieje gospodarcze Polski w zarysie do 1989 r. (Warsaw, 1994).

MINDSZENTY József [originally Péhm] (29 March 1892, Csehimindszent, near Szombathely–6 May 1975, Vienna, Austria), cardinal, Primate of Hungary. Born into a peasant family, Mindszenty graduated from St. Norbert Gymnasium in Szombathely in 1902 and from a diocesan seminary in Szombathely in 1912. In 1915 he was ordained, and in January 1917 he became a religion teacher at a high school in Zalaegerszeg. During the revolution of 1918–19 Mindszenty helped to organize right-wing Christian movements in Zalaegerszeg, and because of this he was briefly detained in February 1919. In October 1919 he was appointed parish priest in Zalaegerszeg, becoming a dean in 1921. In 1927 he was made a bishop's representative in the diocesan district of Zala. In 1940 Prime Minister Pál Teleki entrusted Mindszenty with organizing the movement of the National Policy Service in the Transdanubian district. Its aim was to prevent an increase of Nazi influence among the German minority in Hungary. In March 1944 Pope Pius XII appointed Mindszenty bishop of Veszprém. On 31 October 1944, along with the bishops of Székesfehérvár and Győr and the abbot of the monastery in Pannonhalma, Mindszenty sent a memorandum in which the signatories called for an end to the fighting; the memorandum was addressed to Ferenc Szálasi, a Fascist leader and prime minister appointed on Hitler's orders. On 27 November, along with his clerics, Mindszenty was arrested by members of the Arrow Cross Party and was imprisoned in Sopronkőhida, where he was held until April 1945, when the Soviet troops entered Hungary.

On 5 September 1945 Pope Pius XII appointed Mindszenty archbishop of Esztergom, and in February 1946 he elevated him to cardinal. A conservative faithful to tradition, Mindszenty was critical of social and political changes in Hungary. An uncompromising anti-Communist and royalist, he opposed the increasing Communist influence. Because of this, a press campaign was launched against him. Subsequently, on 26 December 1948, he was arrested on charges including his opposition to the secularization of Roman Catholic schools in Hungary. During an investigation of the charges Mindszenty was repeatedly tortured. In February 1949 the People's Court in Budapest sentenced him to life imprisonment on trumped-up charges that included treason and currency smuggling. The UN General Assembly condemned this sentence in a special resolution. In July 1955, under an agreement between the government and the Episcopate, owing to his deteriorating health Mindszenty was transferred to the town of Felsőpetény, where he was kept under house arrest. It was there that he learned about the outbreak of the revolution in October 1956.

On 30 October 1956 Mindszenty was set free, and the following day, under an escort of a special unit of officers from an armored regiment, he arrived at the archbishop's palace on Castle Hill in Buda. Over the following days he received guests from Hungary and abroad and made statements to the press. On 1 November he was visited by Zoltán Tildy and Pál Maléter, who represented the government of Imre Nagy. On the evening of 3 November, in a radio address, Mindszenty exhorted the nation to restore internal and external order and to establish a multiparty society in the "spirit of the national culture" and based on "justly restricted private property." He firmly advocated that national unity be maintained, but he also appealed to the "inheritors of the fallen system" to bring the guilty to a "nonparty" court. He called for the restoration of freedom of worship and insisted that the Catholic Church's institutions and associations be restored to it. Because of the Soviet intervention, Mindszenty did not describe the uprising as a revolution but as a struggle for freedom.

After the second Soviet intervention, on 4 November 1956 Mindszenty took refuge in the U.S. Embassy in Budapest and was granted asylum there. In September 1971, under a tentative agreement among the Hungarian state, the U.S. government, and the Vatican, he could safely leave the embassy to go abroad. Mindszenty settled in Pazmaneum in Vienna. He considered that his task was to give moral support to the Hungarians in exile. Therefore, he traveled extensively and visited places where they lived. In early November 1973 Pope Paul VI asked that Mindszenty resign his position for the sake of the Church's policy of opening a dialogue with Communist countries. Mindszenty refused, and on 8 December the Pope announced that the position of archbishop of Esztergom, the Primate of Hungary, was vacant. Mindszenty's autobiography, Emlékirataim (My memoirs), came out in 1974 and was translated into English (Memoirs, 1974), German, and French. Mindszenty died in a charity hospital in Vienna. In accord with his wishes, he was buried in the basilica at Mariazell. In 1989 he was rehabilitated by the Hungarian authorities. On 4 May 1991 Mindszenty's ashes were brought to Hungary and reburied in the crypt of the basilica in Esztergom. (JT)

Sources: Documents on the Mindszenty Case (Budapest, 1949); Béla Fabian, Cardinal Mindszenty: The Story of a Modern Martyr (New York, 1949); László Varga, Revision of the Sentence against Cardinal Mindszenty (New York, 1955); George Schuster, In Silence I Speak (New York, 1956); József Közi-Horváth, Cardinal Mindszenty: Confessor and Martyr of Our Time (Chichester, 1979); József Török, Mindszenty József emlékezete/szerkesztette (Budapest, 1995); István Mészáros, Ki volt Mindszenty? Cikkgyűjtemény 1944–1998 (Budapest, 1999); A magyar forradalom és szabadságharc enciklopédiája, CD-ROM (Budapest, 1999); Nagy Képes Milleniumi Arcképcsarnok (Budapest, 1999).

MINEV Iliya (5 February 1917, Saranbey [now Septemvri]–11 January 2000, Septemvri), Bulgarian dissident and political prisoner. While a high school student in Pazardzhik, Minev joined the nationalist legionnaire movement led by Khristo Lukov and criticized Marxist views. He graduated from a lycée in Plovdiv and subsequently studied industrial chemistry at the university in Toulouse, France. After returning to Bulgaria, he worked as an engineer. Arrested shortly after the coup of 9 September 1944, he was released after one year. In 1946 Minev was imprisoned again for his opposition activities. The public prosecutor demanded a death sentence for him, but he was condemned to twenty-five years in prison. After a short period of freedom, in 1975 he was sentenced again, initially to six years in prison, subsequently to eight. Minev served his sentence in Pazardzhik, Plovdiv, Stara Zagora, and other places. He spent around three years in solitary confinement and 480 days on hunger strikes. Released in 1983, he was kept under house arrest in Septemvri. Minev never compromised with the authorities, and in 1987 he sent a letter to President Ronald Reagan describing the violation of human rights in Bulgaria; as a result, he was arrested again. After he was released, in January 1988 Minev founded the Independent Association for the Defense of Human Rights, the first anti-Communist organization in Bulgaria. The authorities reacted with repression and confiscated the archives of this association. Thanks to the broadcasts of Radio Free Europe, Minev's two-month hunger strike gained publicity; the authorities capitulated and gave back the archives. However, the security police managed to infiltrate the executive board of this association; as a result, Minev was removed from politics. In 1990 he visited the United States, where he was enthusiastically greeted by political émigrés. One of the longest-held political prisoners of the twentieth century, Minev spent a total of thirty-two years in prison. (WDj)

Sources: "Iliya Minev: In Memoriam," Anti, 14–20 January 2000; Ivan Dochev, Šest desetiletiia borbi sreshtu komunizma za svobodna Bulgariya (Sofia, 1998).

MINIĆ Miloš (28 August 1914, Preljina, near Čačak), Yugoslav Communist activist of Serb nationality. Minić graduated from a high school in Čačak and in 1938 in law from the University of Belgrade. As a student, from 1935 he was active in the Union of Communist Youth of Yugoslavia. In 1936 he joined the Communist Party of Yugoslavia. From 1939 he was a party functionary in Čačak and later in Kruševac. During World War II Minić fought in the Communist guerrilla movement in Western Serbia. From October 1944 he worked in the security apparatus in Belgrade. From March 1945 to 1950 Minić was chief prosecutor of Serbia and a military prosecutor of the Yugoslav People's Army. In this role he acted as the chief prosecutor in the trial of Dragoljub (Draž) Mihailović, who was sentenced to death and executed in 1946. In 1953 Minić entered the Federal Executive Council (Yugoslav government) and became a member of the Executive Council of the Serbian republic. In 1957–62 he was chairman of the Executive Council (prime minister) of the Serbian republic. In 1962 he returned to the Federal Executive Council of Yugoslavia, and in 1963–1965 he was its deputy chairman. Then until 1966 he headed the commission for socioeconomic and political affairs of the Central Committee (CC) of the League of Communists of Yugoslavia. From 1966 to 1967 he was deputy speaker of the federal assembly and chairman of one of its chambers, the Federal Council. In 1967–69 he was speaker of the Serb parliament, and from December 1972 to May 1978 he was deputy chairman of the Federal Executive Council and the federal secretary (minister) of foreign affairs. (AO)

Sources: Enciklopedija Jugoslavije, vol. 6 (Zagreb, 1965); Slobodan Stanković, The End of the Tito Era: Yugoslavia's Dilemmas (Stanford, 1981); www.mfa.gov.yu/History/ministri/MMinic_s.html.

MIRONAS Vladas (22 June 1880, Panemunis–1954, Vladimir), Lithuanian priest and political activist. In 1904, after graduating from the Theological Academy in St. Petersburg, Mironas took holy orders. An old school friend of Antanas Smetona, he became one of the main promoters of nationalism among the Lithuanian clergy. In 1910 Mironas became a parish priest at Valkininkai, and in 1914, a parish priest in Daugai. In 1917 he was elected to the Lithuanian Council (Lietuvos Taryba) and served as its vice-president. Mironas was one of the signatories of the declaration of Lithuanian independence of 16 February 1918. In 1926 he was elected to parliament on the ticket of the Nationalist Union, led by Smetona. After the coup d'état led by Smetona in December of that year, Mironas became one of Smetona's closest associates. In 1929 he became the chief chaplain of the army. On 24 March 1938, during a crisis brought about by a Polish ultimatum, Mironas was appointed prime minister and, against his convictions, he was forced to establish diplomatic relations with Poland. His government lasted until 28 March 1939, when Nazi Germany's occupation of the region of Klaipėda (Memel) led to another crisis. Arrested by the NKVD after the invasion by Red Army in June 1940, Mironas was released in June 1941, when the Germans seized Lithuania. He resumed his work in the parish of Daugai. After Lithuania was again incorporated into the Soviet Union, Mironas was arrested in 1947. He died in prison. (WR) Sources: EL, vol. 3; Saulius Sužiedelis, Historical Dictionary of Lithuania (Lanham, Md., 1997); Aleksandras Merkelis, Antanas Smetona (New York, 1964).

MIRONESCU Gheorghe G. (28 January 1874, Vaslui–1953, Sighet), Romanian lawyer and politician. Mironescu studied philology at the university in Bucharest (1891–94) and later earned a doctorate in law in Paris (1899). In 1918 he became a professor at the School of Law of the University of Bucharest. During World War I he lived in exile in France and conducted propaganda in support of the unification of the Romanian territories. Mironescu was the author of numerous articles devoted to the issue of Romania's unification, and from 1917 to 1918 he edited the newspaper La Roumanie in Paris. After returning to Romania, he worked with the People's Party of General Alexandru Averescu. In 1926 he began to work with the National Peasant Party (NPP). Mironescu was a member of many cabinets, starting with the short-lived government of Take Ionescu (December 1921–January 1922). From 7 to 13 June 1930 Mironescu was an interim head of the cabinet and subsequently a minister in the government established by the NPP (10 October 1930–18 April 1931).

From 1928 to 1931 he was minister of foreign affairs; in 1932, minister of finance; from 1932 to 1933, deputy prime minister; in 1933, minister of interior; and in 1938, minister without portfolio. Mironescu had a good relationship with King Charles II, whose return to Romania Mironescu, as prime minister, had approved in 1930. As minister of foreign affairs, he strove to improve relations with Poland; his efforts were successful, and during a visit of the Polish foreign minister August Zaleski to Bucharest in late October 1929, a conciliation and arbitration treaty was signed. The two countries also agreed that they had “common aims and policy concepts.” From 30 March 1938 until the fall of the royal government, Mironescu served as an adviser to Charles II. In 1939 he was elected a member of the Romanian Academy. Arrested by the Communists after World War II, he died in prison. Mironescu’s publications include Din istoria dreptului privat roman (On the history of Romanian private law; 1896); România fața de războiul european (Romania and the war in Europe; 1915); Aperçus sur la question roumaine (Comments on the Romanian question; 1919); The Problem of Banat (1919); France et Roumanie (1930); and Conversiunea agricolă (Conversion of agriculture; 1932). (FA/TD)

Sources: Ioan Scurtu, Istoria Partidului Național Tărănesc 1926–1947 (Bucharest, 1994); Historia dyplomacji polskiej, vol. 4 (Warsaw, 1995); H. Bułhak, “Polska a Rumunia 1918–1939,” in Przyjaźnie i Antagonizmy: Stosunki z państwami sąsiednimi w latach 1918–1939 (Wrocław and Warsaw, 1977).

MIŠIĆ Živojin (July 1855, Struganik, near Valjevo–20 January 1921, Belgrade), chief of staff and de facto commander of the Serbian Army during World War I. The son of a peasant, from 1876 to 1878, while a student at a cadet school, Mišić fought in the Serbo-Turkish war. In 1885 he commanded a battalion fighting against the Bulgarians. He subsequently studied in Austria. In 1891 he began working for the general staff of the Serbian Army and simultaneously taught at the Military Academy in Belgrade. The revolt of 1903, which put Peter Karadjordjević on the throne, impeded Mišić’s brilliant career. Because the new Serbian authorities did not trust him, he was forced to retire. As a result of the Bosnian crisis, Mišić returned to active service in 1909, assuming the position of deputy chief of staff. He was instrumental in the modernization of the Serbian Army, which proved its military worth during the Balkan Wars. After a victory over the Turks at Kumanovo in October 1912, Mišić was promoted to the rank of general. In July 1913 he contributed to the defeat of the Bulgarians at Bregalnica. In September 1913 he again transferred to the reserves.

With the outbreak of World War I, Mišić resumed his military service, becoming deputy to the chief of staff and commander-in-chief of the Serbian Army, General Radomir Putnik. Mišić was commander of the First Army during the retreat in November 1914 and during a counteroffensive in December 1914, when the Serbs drove the Austrians back to the Sava River and recaptured Belgrade. For his part in the struggle Mišić was promoted to marshal. In the fall of 1915 he tried to persuade the other commanders to start a counteroffensive, but in the face of a Bulgarian invasion he had to withdraw his troops over the mountains toward the Adriatic. During the winter retreat of the Serbian Army, carried out under harsh conditions and known as the “Serbian Golgotha” because of heavy losses among the civilian population that followed the army, Mišić became ill. After a convalescence in France, he returned to the front line in September 1916. At that time the Serbian Army was in a very difficult situation, as it had been driven back to the region of Salonika (Thessaloniki). Mišić led a counteroffensive, recapturing Monastir (now Bitola, Macedonia) and the Kajmakalan region from the Bulgarians. On 1 January 1918 Mišić became chief of staff, and although Prince Alexander Karadjordjević was the formal commander-in-chief, it was Mišić who de facto commanded the Serbian Army. At that time he planned a campaign that, in his opinion, would defeat the Central Powers in the Balkans. He managed to convince Alexander and the French commanders that this campaign was necessary. On 15 September 1918 Mišić ordered the Serbian forces and the Entente troops, which were under his command, to launch an attack from Salonika to the north. The immediate successes of the “Salonika offensive” led to the capitulation of Bulgaria on 29 September and to the capture of Belgrade on 1 November of that year. At the time of the establishment of the Kingdom of Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes, in late 1918 Mišić deployed the Serbian troops in Macedonia and Kosovo, strengthening the Serbian positions in the southern part of the newly established kingdom. Mišić’s Moje uspomene (My memoirs) were published in 1978. (WR) Sources: John Clinton Adams, Flight in Winter (Princeton, 1942); Alan Palmer, The Gardeners of Salonika (New York, 1965); Holger H. Herwig and Neil M. Heyman, Biographical Dictionary of World War I (Westport, Conn., 1982); Djordje Popović, Vojevoda Živojin Mišić i njegovi ratnici (Niš, 1988).

MISIRKOV Krste (18 November 1874, Postol, near Grčka–26 February 1926, Sofia), Macedonian linguist and political writer. Misirkov studied in Sofia, Belgrade, and St. Petersburg, where he established the Macedonian Society. The organization lobbied for the autonomy of Ottoman Macedonia. As president of the Macedonian Society, Misirkov contributed to several periodicals. He is best known for a book published in 1903, Za Makedonskite raboti (On Macedonian matters). In this work he argued for a Macedonian identity separate from that of the neighboring Slavic peoples. He suggested the creation of a Macedonian language based on four regional dialects. Misirkov and his associates became known as the Macedonianists (Makedontskite). A journalist and teacher, Misirkov is regarded as a central figure in the Macedonian national movement's hagiography. (DP)

Sources: Enciklopedija Jugoslavije, vol. 6 (Zagreb, 1965); Blazhe Ristovski, Krste P. Misirkov, 2 vols. (Skopje, 1974); Duncan M. Perry, The Politics of Terror: The Macedonian Liberation Movements, 1873–1903 (Durham, N.C., 1988); Valentina Georgieva and Sasha Konechni, Historical Dictionary of the Republic of Macedonia (Lanham, Md., 1998).

MITROVICA Rexhep bey (1888, Mitrovicë–28 May 1967, Ankara), Albanian politician and journalist. Born into a Muslim land-owning family from Kosovo, Mitrovica finished secondary school in Skopje, where he became active in the Albanian national movement. He was one of the signatories of the declaration of independence proclaimed by the Albanian National Assembly in Vlorë on 28 November 1912. In 1921 Mitrovica was elected MP and joined the Popular Party (Partia Popullorë). In 1921 he became minister of education and held this post in subsequent cabinets until 1924. He established a network of schools throughout the country. As minister, he supported secular schools and state control over private education; this led to a conflict with the Catholic clergy. From 1924 on, after Ahmed Zogu came to power, Mitrovica lived mainly in Vienna and Paris. He was one of the founders of the National Union (Bashkimi Kombëtar). He returned to Albania in 1939, becoming one of the founders of the National Front (Balli Kombëtar) in 1942 and a co-founder of the Second League of Prizren in 1943. From 4 November 1943 to 18 July 1944, after the Italian occupation ended and the German Army marched into Albania, Mitrovica headed a collaborationist government that pledged, among other things, to pay for the stationing of German troops in Albania and for the calling up of around thirty thousand volunteers. The ever-stronger position of the Communist partisans and a mounting economic crisis undermined public trust in Mitrovica's government. According to Mitrovica, his cabinet resigned because it could not work with other government structures, including the Regency Council. In 1944 Mitrovica left the country and, via Italy, went to France. He spent the last years of his life in Turkey. (TC)

Sources: Michael Schmidt-Neke, Entstehung und Ausbau der Königsdiktatur in Albanien (1912–1939): Regierungsbildungen, Herrschaftsweisen und Machteliten in Einen Jungen Balkanstaat (Munich, 1987); Bardhosh Gaçe, Ata që shpallën Pavarësinë Kombëtare (Tirana, 1997); Dokumente te institucioneve gjermane per historine shqiptare 1941–1944 (Prishtina, 1998); Bernd J. Fischer, Albania at War, 1939–1945 (London, 1999).

MITRYNGA Ivan, pseudonym “Serhiy Oreliuk” (1909, Bóbrka, Galicia, [now Bibrka, Ukraine]–6 September 1943, Vilia, Volhynia), Ukrainian journalist and nationalist activist. In the 1930s Mitrynga studied history in Lwów (Lviv) and joined the Organization of Ukrainian Nationalists (OUN). He worked with nationalist publishing houses and edited the paper Het z bolshevyzmom (1938). He was critical of the OUN's Fascist tendencies. He severed his relations with the OUN after the outbreak of the Soviet-German war in 1941. In the Pripet Marshes (Polesie) Mitrynga set up the Ukrainian Revolutionary Party of Workers and Peasants, which merged with a number of other groups to form the Ukrainian People's Democratic Party in 1942. He became aligned with the Polesian Sich and with the so-called First Ukrainian Insurgent Army under the command of Ataman Taras Borovets (Bulba). Mitrynga served as chief of the political and propaganda staff in the Polesian Sich. He was killed in a skirmish either with the Germans or with Soviet guerrillas. Mitrynga wrote a number of political pamphlets, including Hitler i Ukraina (Hitler and the Ukraine; 1939) and Nash shliakh borotby (Our path of struggle; 1940). (GM)

Sources: Encyclopedia of Ukraine, vol. 3 (Toronto, 1993); Ryszard Torzecki, Polacy i Ukraińcy: Sprawa ukraińska w czasie II wojny światowej na terenie II Rzeczypospolitej (Warsaw, 1993); Entsyklopediya Ukrainoznavstva, vol. 5 (Lviv, 1993).

MLADENOV Petur (22 August 1936, Urbabintsi [now Toshevtsi], near Vidin–31 May 2000, Sofia), Bulgarian Communist activist. Mladenov's father, a Communist activist, was killed in 1944, fighting as a deputy commander for political affairs in the Georgi Benkovski partisan unit. In 1949 Mladenov became a member of the Dimitrov Communist Youth League (DCYL), and in 1964, a member of the Bulgarian Communist Party (BCP). He completed studies at the Suvorov School in Sofia (1954) and subsequently studied philosophy at Sofia University. In 1963 Mladenov graduated from the Moscow State Institute of International Relations. After returning to Bulgaria, he became first secretary of the DCYL district committee in Vidin in 1964 and head of the International Relations Department of the Central Committee (CC) of the DCYL in 1966. From 1966 to 1969 Mladenov served as secretary of the DCYL CC. He continued his political career in the BCP and in the government. He was first secretary of the BCP District Committee in Vidin (1969–71), a member of the BCP CC (1971–90), and a deputy member (1974–77) and member (1977–90) of the BCP CC Politburo. Mladenov succeeded Ivan Bashev as foreign minister after the latter died tragically on Mount Vitosha. He served in this position from December 1971 to November 1989, in the governments of Stanko Todorov, Grisha Filipov, and Georgi Atanasov. He also was a deputy to the National Assembly (1971–90).

Mladenov was the leader of the activists who, with the support of Mikhail Gorbachev, engineered a bloodless overthrow of Todor Zhivkov. In an open letter of 24 October 1989 addressed to BCP CC Politburo members, Mladenov accused Zhivkov of deepening the crisis in Bulgaria. When Zhivkov was removed from power (10 November 1989), Mladenov became secretary general of the BCP CC (until 2 February 1990) and chairman of the Council of State (17 December 1989–3 April 1990). He was also appointed chairman of the Constitutional Commission of the National Assembly. At the Fourteenth Extraordinary Congress of the BCP (January–February 1990) Mladenov was elected to the Supreme Party Council (1 February–25 September 1990) and designated chairman (president) of Bulgaria. Following an agreement reached in round table negotiations, on 3 April 1990 the parliament appointed Mladenov president and commander-in-chief of the armed forces. On 6 July 1990 Mladenov resigned these positions under the pressure of student demonstrations sparked off by Mladenov's words: "Tanks had better be used here" (Pro-dobre e tankovete da doidat), uttered on 14 December 1989 to protesters around the National Assembly building. For several months Mladenov unsuccessfully attempted to deny that he had said those words. His resignation ended his political career. Mladenov's publications include Zhivotut: Plusove i minusi (Life: Pluses and minuses; 1992). (JJ)

Sources: Entsiklopediya Bulgariya, vol. 4 (Sofia, 1984); Narodni predstaviteli ot Deveto narodno subranie (Sofia, 1987); Raymond Detrez, Historical Dictionary of Bulgaria (Lanham, Md., 1997); Tasho Tashev, Ministrute na Bulgariya 1879–1999: Entsiklopedichen Spravochnik (Sofia, 1999); Evgeniya Kalinova and Iskra Baeva, Bulgarskite prekhodi 1944–1999 (Sofia, 2000); Angel Tsurakov, Entsiklopediya. Pravitelstvata na Bulgariia: Khronologiya na politicheskiia zhivot 1879–2001 (Sofia, 2001).

MLADIĆ Ratko (12 March 1943, Kalinovnik, Bosnia-Herzegovina), Bosnian Serb general accused of war crimes. Mladić's father was a partisan in the Communist guerrilla army of Josip Broz Tito and was killed while fighting the Croatian Ustashe in 1945. Mladić graduated from the Higher Officers' School with distinction and made a quick career in the army. He commanded armored units in Macedonia and Kosovo, advancing to the rank of general. In 1991 he commanded the Ninth Corps of the Yugoslav People's Army in Knin in Croatia. Under his command, after half a year's siege, the Serb troops captured Vukovar. When the war broke out in Bosnia in 1992, Slobodan Milošević appointed him commander-in-chief of the Yugoslav Army in this republic. Soon Mladić transformed his units into an army of the self-appointed Serb Republic of Bosnia. Supported by Milošević and Radovan Karadžić, Mladić strove to create an "ethnically clean" Serbian state in Bosnia in order to merge it with Serbia and other Serb-dominated territories of the former Yugoslavia. In the summer of 1992 troops commanded by Mladić controlled about 70 percent of the territory of Bosnia-Herzegovina.

Mladić represented extreme nationalism. Compared to him, Bosnian Serbs considered Karadžić a moderate. Mladić enjoyed a high profile among his fanatic soldiers. He called himself a "Balkan Napoleon," while for the Croats, Muslims, and the Western media he was the "butcher of Bosnia." In May 1994 Mladić's daughter, Anna, committed suicide in protest against the massacre of Muslims at Goražde, which had been ordered by Mladić. After the NATO air raids started in 1995 and after Bosnian Serbs began to lose the struggle with the Muslim and Croatian forces, Karadžić accused Mladić of tactical errors and recalled him from command in August 1995; however, under pressure from the officer corps he had to change his mind, and he reinstated Mladić. After the signing of the agreements of Dayton (21 November 1995) and Paris (14 December 1995), Mladić withdrew from public sight. In December 1996, under Western pressure, Biljana Plavšić, who succeeded Karadžić as president of the Serb Republic of Bosnia (which joined the Bosnia-Herzegovina federation), dismissed Mladić from command. In 1995 Mladić was twice accused by The Hague Tribunal for War Crimes in Former Yugoslavia of committing genocide and crimes against humanity. Along with Karadžić, Mladić is held responsible for the siege of Sarajevo (April 1992–May 1995); for the murder of about six thousand Muslims in Srebrenica (July 1995); for rape; for holding thousands of Bosnian Croats and Muslims in concentration camps; and for using UN peacekeeping troops as "live shields" against NATO air raids (May–June 1995). Mladić has continued to live in hiding. (AO)

Sources: Lenard J. Cohen, The Disintegration of Yugoslavia (Boulder, Colo., 1993); Edgar O'Ballance, Civil War in Bosnia, 1992–94 (New York, 1995); Laura Silber and Allan Little, The Death of Yugoslavia (London, 1995); Warren Zimmermann, Origins of a Catastrophe (New York and Toronto, 1996); Richard Holbrooke, To End a War (New York, 1998); David Owen, Balkan Odyssey (New York, 1995); International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia, www.un.org/icty/indictment.

MŁYNÁŘ Zdeněk (22 June 1930, Vysoké Mýto–15 April 1997, Vienna), Czech lawyer, political scientist, and Communist activist. In 1946 Mlynář became a member of the Communist Party of Czechoslovakia (CPC). In 1950–55 he studied in the law department of Lomonosov University in Moscow, where he met (among others) Mikhail Gorbachev. Between 1956 and 1964 Mlynář worked in the Institute of State and Law of the Czechoslovak Academy of Sciences in Prague; from 1963 he was an assistant professor in the Department of Law of Charles University. He wrote many works on the Marxist theory of politics. From 1964 to 1968 Mlynář was secretary of the law committee of the Central Committee (CC) of the CPC, and during the Prague Spring he joined the top leadership of the party. In 1968–69 he was a member of the CC, and between 4 April and 16 November 1968 he was secretary of the CC of the CPC. Mlynář was one of the main representatives of the reformist current; he developed the political part of the CPC's Program of Action, which was passed in April 1968. After the Warsaw Pact invasion, in August Mlynář took part in talks with Soviet leaders in Moscow. In November 1968 he was recalled from his prominent posts for "deviations from the political line of the party"; in September 1969 he was excluded from the CC of the CPC, and in 1970 he was expelled from the party.

In 1970–77 Mlynář worked in the entomological department of the National Museum in Prague. As one of the initiators and first signatories of Charter 77 in January 1977, he was dismissed from work and remained under house arrest until June 1977. He then emigrated to Austria. From 1982 to 1989 Mlynář was president of the Austrian Institute of International Politics in Luxembourg. In 1989 he became a professor of political science at the University of Innsbruck. Mlynář researched the events of the Prague Spring and became an international authority on the crisis of the Communist political systems and on perestroika. In 1989 he returned to Czechoslovakia but did not play a major role in the political transformations after the Velvet Revolution. In the parliamentary elections of 1996 Mlynář was honorary leader of the Leftist Bloc (Levy Blok), and after its electoral failure he resigned from this post owing to health problems. Mlynář became famous for his works Československý pokus o reformu 1968 (The Czechoslovak reform attempt, 1968; 1975); Krise sovětského systému a Západ (The crisis of the Soviet system and the West; 1986); and the memoirs Mráz přichází z Kremle (1978; Nightfrost in Prague: The End of Humane Socialism, 1980). (PU)

Sources: ČBS; Kdo byl kdo v našich dějinách ve 20. století, vol. 1 (Prague, 1998); Gordon H. Skilling, Czechoslovakia's Interrupted Revolution (Princeton, 1976); Vladimír V. Kusin,

From Dubcek to Charter 77: A Study of "Normalization" in Czechoslovakia 1968–1978 (New York, 1978); Vilém Precan, ed., Charta 77 (1977–1989): Od morální k demokratické revoluci; dokumentace (Bratislava, 1990); Alexander Dubcek, Hope Dies Last (New York, 1993).

MŁYNARSKI Feliks (20 November 1884, Gniewczyn, near Przeworsk–13 April 1972, Kraków), Polish economist and politician. Mlynarski was the son of an organist. Expelled from a gymnasium in Jarosław for taking part in a pro-independence organization, he passed his high school final examinations with distinction as an extramural student in Sanok in 1903 and began studying philosophy at the Jagiellonian University in Kraków. In the same year he became a member of the Union of Polish Youth called Zet, and in 1907, a member of the secret National League. An opponent of the pro-Russian orientation in the league, in 1908–9 Mlynarski was one of the organizers of Fronda and one of the initiators of the withdrawal of Zet from the National League. In 1910 Mlynarski became one of the leaders of the secret, academic Independence League. He subsequently helped to establish the Polish Riflemen Squads and then served as their chairman (1913–14). From 1911 to 1912 he took part in the establishment of the Provisional Commission of Confederated Independence Parties and became one of its leaders. In 1911, under the pseudonym "Jan Brzoza," Mlynarski published the brochure Zagadnienie polityki niepodległości (On the pro-independence policy). After the outbreak of World War I, Mlynarski joined the Polish Legions but was assigned to the Military Department of the Supreme National Committee and sent to the United States, where he failed to gain broad support from the Polish émigré community for the cause of independence. After returning to Poland, Mlynarski dealt with economic issues and published several brochures, including Siła nabywcza pieniądza (The purchasing power of money; 1918).

In November 1918 Mlynarski began working at the Ministry of Labor and Social Welfare. In the autumn of 1922 he joined the National Workers' Party. In April 1923 the minister of the treasury, Władysław Grabski, hired him as director of a department in his ministry. Mlynarski became one of Grabski's closest aides and held similar views on the currency and treasury reform. After Grabski left the government, Mlynarski also resigned, but when Grabski became prime minister, he appointed Mlynarski vice-chairman of the Bank of Poland in August 1924. From 1925 to 1927 Mlynarski negotiated a stabilization loan in the United States and Great Britain. Although an agreement about the loan was reached in October 1927, Mlynarski was not treated favorably by the ruling camp after May 1926. After his term ended in 1929, he left the bank and began lecturing at the Warsaw School of Economics (Szkoła Główna Handlowa [SGH]) and became a professor there in 1933. He was also a member of several supervisory boards of banks and companies. As a result of his growing reputation as a financial expert and the author of Gold and the Central Bank (1929), Młynarski became a member of the Financial Commission of the League of Nations in 1929 and held this position from 1929 to 1937. At the end of the 1930s Młynarski drifted to the opposition Morges Front. At that time he published Proporcjonalizm ekonomiczny (Economic proportionalism; 1937) and Totalitaryzm czy demokracja w Polsce? (Totalitarianism or democracy in Poland? 1938).

At the end of October 1939 Młynarski prepared a plan for the establishment of a new banking institution for the part of Nazi-occupied Poland known as the General Gouvernement. As a result, the German authorities offered him the post of chairman of the Bank of Issue in Poland, based in Kraków. In order to enhance the credibility of the new currency, the Germans agreed to make an exception and include the word “Poland” in the name of the bank. After extensive consultations with the Polish independence underground, Młynarski accepted this offer and in January 1940 assumed the post of chairman of the bank. He had to constantly maneuver between pressure from the Nazi authorities and Polish interests, but his work was positively assessed by subsequent delegates of the Polish Government-in-Exile for the Homeland. The Polish zlotys issued by the bank were colloquially called młynarki, after Młynarski.

After the war, Młynarski declared his willingness to work in the new political environment, but instead he was accused of collaboration. However, witnesses unanimously defended him against the accusations, and an investigation into the case was discontinued in November 1946. Młynarski lectured at the Academy of Commerce and the School of Law of the Jagiellonian University in Kraków but was dismissed in 1951. He became the director of the library of the School of Economics in Kraków, and in 1961 he retired. After the war, Młynarski wrote several works but published only Pieniądz i gospodarstwo pieniężne (Money and the monetary economy; 1947) and Wspomnienia (Memoirs; 1971), which were a short version of memoirs kept in the Jagiellonian Library in Kraków. (WR) Sources: PSB, vol. 21; Zbigniew Landau, Plan stabilizacyjny 1927–1930 (Warsaw, 1963); Czesław Madajczyk, Polityka III Rzeczy w okupowanej Polsce (Warsaw, 1970); Zygmunt Karpiński, O Wielkopolsce, złocie i dalekich podróżach (Warsaw, 1971); Zbigniew Landau, “Feliks Młynarski (1884–1972): Zarys życia i działalności na polu finansów,” Finanse, 1973, no. 11.

MŇAČKO Ladislav (28 January 1919, Valašské Klobouky, Zlín district–24 February 1994, Bratislava), Slovak journalist and writer of Czech origin. From his childhood Mňačko lived in Slovakia, where his father worked in the government administration. He attended high school in Turčiansky Svätý Martin. During World War II Mňačko attempted to escape abroad and join the Czechoslovak Army but was arrested by the German police; for two years he was imprisoned in the concentration camp of Hunswinckel and sent to forced labor in a coal mine. Mňačko escaped from there to Moravia and fought in partisan units (1944–45). At the end of the war he was seriously injured. After the war he devoted himself to journalism. He was the editor of the Communist daily Rudé Právo (1945–48) and of the Bratislava Pravda (until 1954); subsequently he became a freelance journalist. In 1956 and 1964 Mňačko briefly served as editor-in-chief of the Slovak weekly Kultúrny život, which was instrumental in the liberalization process in the 1960s. Initially an ardent supporter of communism and a prominent journalist of the regime, from the 1950s Mňačko was increasingly critical of the Communist reality. In the autobiographical book Smrt’ sa volá Engelchen (1959; Death Is Called Engelchen, 1961) he depicted the partisan struggle at the end of World War II. In Kde končia prašné cesty (Where dusty roads end; 1962) and Oneskorené reportáže (1963; Overdue reports; 1963), which sold several thousand copies, Mňačko dealt with the lawlessness of the Stalinist period. In the novel Ako chutí moc (1958; The Taste of Power, 1967) he exposed the regime’s mechanisms.

In August 1967 Mňačko emigrated to Israel in protest against Czechoslovakia’s position on the Arab-Israeli War; as a result, he was deprived of his Czechoslovak citizenship. He returned home in May 1968, but in August 1968, after the Warsaw Pact invasion of Czechoslovakia, he again left his country and settled in Austria. There he wrote two political essays, Agresori (Aggressors; published in German in 1968) and Siedma noc (1990; The Seventh Night, 1969), and eight novels, of which Súdrh Münchhausen (Comrade Münchhausen; 1972) became the most famous. This book, a grotesque allegory of the Communist regime, was the first Slovak book published by Index, an émigré publishing house. Mňačko also authored a number of radio and television programs, mainly produced in Austria and West Germany. In 1990 he returned to Bratislava and protested the separatist aspirations of Slovakia. After the disintegration of the federation, Mňačko moved to Prague. (PU)

Sources: ČBS; Kdo byl kdo v našich dějinách ve 20. století, vol. 1 (Prague, 1998); Reprezentačný biografický lexikón Slovenska (Martin, 1999); H. Gordon Skilling, Czechoslovakia’s Interrupted Revolution (Princeton, 1976).

MOCSONY-STÂRCEA Ion (16 May 1909, Cernăuți), Romanian politician and political prisoner. Mocsony-Stârcea came from a landowner's family. In 1932 he graduated in modern languages from Cambridge University and started working in the Romanian Foreign Ministry. From April to August 1942 he was private secretary to King Michael I and head of his chancellery, and from 4 November 1944, his majordomo. Mocsony-Stârcea was an eye witness to the coup of 23 August 1944. He worked in the Foreign Ministry until the Communist purge of March 1945. On 6 August 1947 he was arrested on his estate of Bulci in the Banat region and forced to testify in the trial of Iuliu Maniu and his aides. In this trial Mocsony-Stârcea himself was sentenced to two years in prison. He served in Craiova Prison from December 1947 to October 1949. Soon he was accused again and imprisoned in Timișoara (November 1949–September 1950). In May 1950 he was taken by the political police, Securitate, and brutally interrogated (he lost all his teeth) in connection with the case of Lucrețiu Pătrășcanu. From March 1952 Mocsony-Stârcea was held in the intelligence interrogation center until Pătrășcanu's trial in April 1954, in which he was sentenced to fifteen years of hard labor. He served the sentence in Aiud, Jilava, Pitești, and Dej. In October 1961 the minister of interior, Alexandru Drăghici, offered him a deal: in exchange for a written record of the coup of 23 August 1944, his imprisonment would be changed to house arrest. Mocsony-Stârcea agreed. In November 1962 he was brought to Câmpulung-Muscel, where he wrote a text that he had to correct several times to make it useful in the power game of the Communist leadership. After two years Mocsony-Stârcea was allowed to leave for Switzerland. (ASK)

Sources: Dennis Deletant, Communist Terror in Romania: Gheorghiu-Dej and the Police State, 1948–1965 (New York, 1999).

MOCZAR Mieczysław [originally Nikolay Demko] (23 December 1913, Łódź–1 November 1986, Warsaw), Communist activist in Poland. Moczar was the son of a peasant of Belorussian origin who served in the tsarist army. His family belonged to the poor class in Łódź, and his father was an activist in the Communist Party of Poland (Komunistyczna Partia Polski [KPP]). Moczar finished primary school and a course in locksmithing. In 1937 he became a member of the KPP. Until the outbreak of World War II he was an active member of the International Organization for Aid to Revolutionaries, and because of this he was sentenced to two years' imprisonment. From 1939 to 1941 he was in the Soviet territories and entered into cooperation with Soviet security services. After the outbreak of the German-Soviet war in June 1941, Moczar made his way to Łódź, where he helped to establish a conspiratorial organization called the Front of Struggle for Our Freedom and Yours (Front Walki za Naszą i Waszą Wolność). In March 1942 Moczar became a member of the (Communist) Polish Workers' Party (Polska Partia Robotnicza [PPR]), as a representative of which he established the seed of the Communist underground. He became commander of the Fifth District of the People's Guard (Gwardia Ludowa [GL]) and commander of the GL in Łódź. In April 1943 the GL High Command appointed him commander of the Lublin district, but after a conflict with Leon Kasman, who had been sent from Moscow, the PPR authorities transferred Moczar to the Kielce region. In April 1944 Moczar became commander of the Kielce district of the People's Army (Armia Ludowa). From January 1945 to May 1948 he was head of the Provincial Public Security Office in Łódź. In 1946 he was promoted to brigadier general. At that time he became known as a cruel persecutor of independence activists. From May to September 1948 Moczar was undersecretary of state in the Ministry of Public Security, and from August 1944 to December 1948 he was a member of the PPR Central Committee (CC). Until 1948 he was seen as Władysław Gomułka's man. During the campaign against so-called rightist-nationalist deviation and after the establishment of the (Communist) Polish United Workers' Party (Polska Zjednoczona Partia Robotnicza; [PUWP]) in December 1948, Moczar dissociated himself from Gomułka and from his former allies. At that time, in a letter to the PUWP leadership, he declared that his—and every true party member's—homeland was the Soviet Union.

Moczar's declarations of loyalty to the PUWP leaders and to the Kremlin allowed him to keep his position in the power hierarchy. In December 1948 he became a deputy member of the PUWP CC. Transferred to the post of chairman of the Provincial National Council in Białystok and in 1952 to the Provincial National Council in Olsztyn, he became deputy chairman of the Warsaw Provincial National Council in 1954. In April 1956 Prime Minister Józef Cyrankiewicz appointed him minister for state farms. At the Seventh PUWP CC Plenum in July 1956 Moczar attacked Stalinist party leaders and became a member of the PUWP CC. At the Eighth Plenum he supported Gomułka's return to the position of first secretary of the CC and the election of Gomułka's closest associates to the Politburo. Appointed undersecretary of state in the Ministry of Interior in December 1956, Moczar became the minister of interior in December 1964. He held this post until July 1968, when he became secretary of the CC responsible for the police and internal armed forces. Promoted to major general in 1963, Moczar became chairman of the Main Board of the influential Association of Fighters for Freedom and Democracy (Związek Bojowników o Wolność i Demokrację [ZBoWiD]) in September 1964. He held this position until 1972. In 1963 he published Barwy walki (The colors of war), probably edited by someone else. Thanks to official propaganda, this book had a total of thirteen printings.

In the 1960s Moczar was the leader of the so-called partisan group in the PUWP ranks. This group promoted an anti-intellectual and anti-Semitic ideology. At the same time, by using patriotic phraseology and appealing to the common experiences of soldiers, Moczar wooed former Home Army soldiers. Moczar was the author of a peculiar chauvinist rhetoric and the main director of an anti-Zionist campaign after the Six-Day War of 1967. The demonstration of power in March 1968 by the Ministry of Interior, which Moczar headed, was seen as a kind of anti-Gomułka putsch, but it is not clear what Moczar's ultimate aims were. In any case, Moscow did not approve of his nationalist rhetoric. In July 1968 Moczar became a deputy member, and in December 1970 a member, of the PUWP CC Politburo. From 1957 to 1980 he was an MP in the Assembly of the Polish People's Republic.

During the events of December 1970 Moczar called for the use of force to suppress worker riots. The fall of Gomułka and the advent of Edward Gierek and his team positioned Moczar as a contender for the party leadership. In mid-April 1971, preempting Moczar's intentions, Gierek dismissed him as head of the police and internal armed forces; therefore, at the end of May of that year Moczar attempted to organize his supporters in Olsztyn. On 25 June 1971 at the Tenth CC Plenum, Gierek successfully counteracted, ousting Moczar from the CC Secretariat. At the Sixth PUWP Congress in December 1971 Moczar left the Politburo and assumed the post of chairman of the Supreme Chamber of Control, a less important role at that time. In 1972 he also lost the post of chairman of the ZBoWiD. Until the events of August 1980 he clearly remained on the political sidelines, although as chairman of the Supreme Chamber of Control, he carefully compiled a dossier on the economic embezzlements committed by top officials of the Gierek administration. The fall of Gierek and a new first secretary of the CC in September 1980 allowed Moczar to again become a top party official. In December 1980 he returned to the PUWP CC Politburo, and in November 1980 he again assumed leadership of the ZBoWiD. He took part in the preparations for the Ninth Extraordinary Congress of the PUWP. Although he supported Stanisław Kania and tried to exploit the Solidarity movement, at the Ninth Congress Moczar did not even join the CC; this meant the end of his career. During the period of martial law he was successively dismissed from all his positions. In March 1983 he ceased to serve as chairman of the Supreme Chamber of Control and was forced to resign as chairman of the ZBoWiD. In July 1983 he also resigned as vice-president of the All-Polish Committee of the National Unity Front. He was offered the post of ambassador to Yugoslavia, but he rejected this offer. Moczar allowed information from the archives he had compiled in the Supreme Chamber of Control to be published, but this did not help him to return to a top position. (WD/WR) Sources: Mołdawa; Jakub Karpiński, Countdown: The Polish Upheavals of 1956, 1968, 1970, 1976, 1980 (New York, 1982); Jerzy Eisler, Marzec 1968 (Warsaw, 1991); Krzysztof Lesiakowski, Mieczysław Moczar "Mietek": Biografia polityczna (Warsaw, 1998); Włodzimierz Janowski and Aleksander Kochański, Informator o strukturze i obsadzie personalnej centralnego aparatu PZPR 1948–1990 (Warsaw, 2000); Jerzy Eisler, Grudzień 1970 (Warsaw, 2000); Dariusz Stola, Kampania antysyjonistyczna w Polsce 1967–1968 (Warsaw, 2000); Marcin Zaremba, Komunizm, legitymizacja, nacjonalizm: Nacjonalistyczna legitymizacja władzy komunistycznej w Polsce (Warsaw, 2001).

MOCZARSKI Kazimierz, pseudonyms "Rafał" and "Grawer" (21 July 1907, Warsaw–27 September 1975, Warsaw), Polish politician. The son of a teacher, after graduating from a high school in Warsaw, Moczarski received a diploma from the Department of Law of Warsaw University in 1932 and subsequently studied at the School of Journalism in Warsaw and at the Institut des Hautes Etudes Internationales in Paris. While a student, he did his military service (1931–32) and completed consular training in the Polish Consulate in Paris. In 1935 Moczarski began working as a counselor at the Ministry of Labor and Social Welfare. In 1937 in Warsaw he helped to establish the Democratic Club, and subsequently he was an activist in the Democratic Party (Stronnictwo Demokratyczne [SD]). A participant in the September 1939 campaign, Moczarski fought in the defense of Warsaw and in other battles. During the German occupation he took part in SD underground activities and worked for the Information and Propaganda Bureau (Biuro Informacji i Propagandy [BIP]) of the High Command of the Union of Armed Struggle and then the Home Army (Armia Krajowa [AK]). In November 1943 Moczarski joined the Command of the Underground Struggle, and in May 1944 he became deputy head of the Command of the Underground Struggle for Warsaw. He considerably contributed to the combating of traitors and Gestapo informers. During the Warsaw Uprising Moczarski was in charge of telegraphic communication for the AK High Command and was the editor-in-chief of Wiadomości Powstańcze. In mid-October 1944 he became head of the revived BIP apparatus. He was a co-author of a proclamation in mid-July 1945 calling on AK soldiers to take up civilian work, as well as an order in a similar spirit issued on 24 July 1945 by Colonel Jan Rzepecki, head of the Delegation of Armed Forces for the Homeland (Delegatura Sił Zbrojnych na Kraj).

Arrested on 11 August 1945 by the (Communist) State Security Office, Moczarski was sentenced to ten years' imprisonment in January 1946. Under an amnesty in February 1947 his sentence was commuted to five years' imprisonment. At the end of his term, despite appeals by his colleagues from the SD, Moczarski was not released. While still serving the sentence, he was subjected to a cruel investigation, the aim of which was to extort testimony against members of the Polish wartime pro-independence underground to incriminate them as collaborators with the Germans. Moczarski described the methods of torture in "List z Centralnego Więzienia w Sztumie" (A letter from the Central Prison in Sztum, Kultura, 1980, no. 53). Although he did not admit to the absurd charges, on 18 November 1952 Moczarski was sentenced to death. After he had waited for his execution for nearly a year, in October 1953 the Supreme Court commuted his death sentence to life in prison. Released during the "thaw" in April 1956 and rehabilitated in December 1956, Moczarski resumed work in the SD. From 1961 to 1965 he was a member of the SD Chief Council and worked on the editorial staff of Kurier Polski. For many years he was an activist in the Community Temperance Committee, and, along with Jan Górski, he published Alkohol w kulturze i obyczaju (Alcohol in culture and customs; 1972). Moczarski became famous as the author of the memoirs Rozmowy z katem (1978, Conversations with an Executioner, 1981), first published in the periodical Odra (1972–74) and in 1977, posthumously, as a book. It was an account of Moczarski's nine-month stay with Jürgen Stroop, annihilator of the Warsaw Ghetto, in one cell of Mokotów Prison. The book, repeatedly republished and translated into many languages, presented a psychological picture of a Nazi war criminal and at the same time—from a psychological perspective—depicted the tragic fate of soldiers of the Polish wartime pro-independence underground. This account also exposed the cruelties of the Stalinist period, which treated a Nazi criminal guilty of genocide and a Polish fighter for independence in the same way. (WR) Sources: Kunert, vol. 1; Kurier Polski, 1975, no. 205; Władysław Bartoszewski and Aleksander Gieysztor, "Rafał," Tygodnik Powszechny, 1976, no. 41; Grzegorz Mazur, Biuro Informacji i Propagandy SZP-ZWZ-AK (Warsaw, 1987).

MOCZULSKI Leszek (7 June 1930, Warsaw), Polish journalist, dissident, and politician. Moczulski graduated from the Academy of Political Science in 1951 and in law from the University of Warsaw in 1952. A member of the (Communist) Polish Workers' Party and (in 1948–50) of the Polish United Workers' Party (Polska Zjednoczona Partia Robotnicza [PUWP]), Moczulski worked for the dailies Trybuna Ludu (1950) and Życie Warszawy (1950–53) and the weeklies Wieś (1953) and Dookoła Świata (1955–59). In 1958 he was accused of having contacts with the Western press, but he was acquitted. Later he worked for the weekly Stolica (1961–77), where he published a lot on the history of interwar Poland and World War II. Moczulski kept in touch with officers of the prewar Polish Army and the wartime Home Army. His first books were Dylematy: Wstęp do historii Europy Zachodniej 1945–1970 (Dilemmas: Introduction to the history of Western Europe, 1945–1970; 1971) and Wojna polska (The Polish war; 1972) on the September 1939 campaign. The latter book was withdrawn from bookstores for political reasons. In 1976 Moczulski was the major author of the "Program of 44" and a "Memorial" to the Communist authorities suggesting systemic change. The co-initiator of a secret organization, the Independence Current (Nurt Niepodległościowy), on 26 March 1977 Moczulski co-organized the open Movement for the Defense of Human and Civic Rights (Ruch Obrony Praw Człowieka i Obywatela [ROPCiO]) and became one of its spokesmen. He edited the uncensored periodical Opinia (1977–78). In the summer of 1978, after a split in the ROPCiO, Moczulski took the lead of one of its splinter groups, and he edited the periodical Droga, where he published his political program, "Rewolucja bez rewolucji" (Revolution without revolution).

On 1 September 1979 Moczulski co-founded the Confederation for Independent Poland (Konfederacja Polski Niepodległej [KPN]), a political party with a pro-independence and anti-Communist program; it referred to the tradition of Józef Piłsudski and was critical of other opposition groups, the Committee for Social Self-Defense–KOR in particular. Moczulski was the KPN chairman. His arrest in September 1980 and his trial, which started in June 1981, played an important role in the extension of the KPN's influence. In October 1982 Moczulski was sentenced to seven years in prison. Amnestied in 1984, he resumed his KPN activities. Arrested again in March 1985, in April 1986 he was sentenced to four years in prison. Moczulski went abroad for medical treatment and established contacts with political émigrés. Upon his return to Poland in 1987, he continued his activities. In 1989 he opposed the Round Table Talks and a compromise with the Communists. In the elections of June 1989 the KPN ran on its own but failed to win any parliamentary seats. In 1990 Moczulski ran for the presidency but gained only 2.5 percent of the vote. Before the elections of October 1991, the KPN advocated de-Communization and protested the decline of the standard of living, winning 8.9 percent of the vote. Moczulski became head of the KPN parliamentary club. In his speeches he sharply attacked post-Communist MPs, recalling the crimes of the Communist system; he demanded a scrutiny of top state personnel, and he criticized liberal economic reforms. He advocated rapprochement with NATO and the Ukraine. In June 1992 Moczulski's name was mentioned by minister of interior Antoni Macierewicz as being among former Communist informers. Moczulski tried to clear his reputation, but his trial went on for years without a resolution. In the elections of 1993 the KPN won 5.8 percent of the vote. Moczulski remained its chairman, but his leadership was questioned and the party lost support. In 1994 and 1996 the party split, and he was marginalized. Moczulski authored a number of works, including the following: Trzecia Rzeczpospolita: Zarys ustroju politycznego (The Polish Third Republic: Outline of the political system; 1984); an extensive interview, Bez wahania (Without hesitation; 1993); Geopolityka (Geopolitics; 1999); and Lustracja: Rzecz o terażniejszości i przeszłości (Lustration: On the present and the past; 2001). (AF)

Sources: Mołdawa; Opozycja w PRL: Słownik biograficzny 1956–89, vol. 1 (Warsaw, 2000); Janusz A. Majcherek, Pierwsza dekada III Rzeczypospolitej 1989–1999 (Warsaw, 1999); Antoni Dudek, Pierwsze lata III Rzeczypospolitej 1989–2001 (Kraków, 2002).

MODZELEWSKI Karol (23 November 1937, Moscow), Polish historian and politician. The naturalized son of the Communist activist Zygmunt Modzelewski (1900–54), Modzelewski graduated in history from Warsaw University (Uniwersytet Warszawski [UW]) in 1959; he received a Ph.D. in 1974, a postdoctoral degree in 1978, and a professorship at the Polish Academy of Sciences in 1990 and at UW in 1994. A member of the (Communist) Union of Polish Youth from 1950, in 1956 Modzelewski was active in a reform youth movement at UW, worked with the Żerań Factory workers' council, and co-founded the Revolutionary Youth Union; in 1957–64 he belonged to the Union of Socialist Youth and the Polish United Workers' Party (Polska Zjednoczona Partia Robotnicza [PUWP]). An assistant professor at the UW History Department (1959–64), in 1962 he co-founded a discussion club that was dissolved by the authorities in 1963. In 1964–65, along with Jacek Kuroń, Modzelewski prepared an "Open Letter to PUWP Members," in which they pointed to the divergence between Communist ideas and practice. In March 1965 Modzelewski was arrested and sentenced to three and a half years of imprisonment. The "Open Letter" was translated into many languages and gained wide publicity in the West. In 1967 Modzelewski was released. He took part in student protests against the ban of Adam Mickiewicz's play Dziady (Forefathers) at the Warsaw National Theater. Arrested on 8 March 1968, Modzelewski was again sentenced to three and a half years in prison.

Released in 1971, in 1972–83 Modzelewski worked at the Institute of Material Culture of the Polish Academy of Sciences in Wrocław. In the fall of 1976 he wrote a "Letter to Citizen E. Gierek," in which he appealed to the authorities to stop the repression that followed the June 1976 workers' protests, and he pointed to the necessity for political and economic reform. From September 1980 Modzelewski was one of the new trade union leaders in Wrocław. He took part in the founding conference of new trade union delegates on 17 September 1980 in Gdańsk, where he suggested an all-national organization and the name "Solidarity." A spokesman for the Solidarity National Coordination Commission (9 November 1980–1 April 1981) and a member of the National Commission elected during the Solidarity congress in September 1981, Modzelewski belonged to its radical wing, criticizing the style of Lech Wałęsa and favoring the creation of a mixed system, combining social self-organization with the leading role of the Communist Party on the national level, a proposal that was meant as a shield against Soviet intervention. After the introduction of martial law, on 13 December 1981 Modzelewski was interned, and in 1982 he was arrested on account of an alleged attempt to overthrow the political system. Amnestied in 1984, he returned to scholarly work. In 1989–91 he was a senator of the Civic Parliamentary Club (Obywatelski Klub Parlamentarny [OKP]). Critical of the Leszek Balcerowicz reforms, which he thought would destroy national industries and impoverish wide circles of society, Modzelewski favored state intervention and a more gradual systemic reform. In November 1989 he co-founded the Group for the Defense of Workers' Rights, and in 1990, the parliamentary club Solidarity of Labor, which left the OKP in 1991. In June 1992 Modzelewski co-founded the Union of Labor (Unia Pracy [UP]) and was its honorary chairman from 1992 to 1995. He left the UP when the party failed to support Kuroń for president. Modzelewski headed Kuroń's electoral committee, and after Kuroń lost the presidential election, Modzelewski withdrew from political life. Modzelewski authored a number of historical works on the Middle Ages, such as Chłopi w monarchii wczesnopiastowskiej (Peasants in the early Piast monarchy; 1987), and on current politics, such as Dokąd od komunizmu (From communism, where? 1993). (AF)

Sources: Nasi w Sejmie i Senacie (Warsaw, 1990); Andrzej Friszke, Opozycja polityczna w PRL 1945–1980 (London, 1994); Jan Skórzyński, Uгода i rewolucja: Władza i opozycja 1985–1989 (Warsaw, 1995); Janusz A. Majcherek, Pierwsza dekada III Rzeczypospolitej 1989–1999 (Warsaw, 1999); Antoni Dudek, Pierwsze lata III Rzeczypospolitej 1989–2001 (Kraków, 2002).

MOISIU Spiro (3 May 1900, Kavajë–12 April 1981, Tirana), Albanian officer and Communist activist. Born into an Orthodox family, Moisiu was related to the famous actor Aleksandër Moisiu. He attended a Greek school in Kavajë, and in 1912 he went to an Albanian school in the same town. From 1914 to 1918 he continued his education at a military school in Austria. After returning to Albania, he joined the gendarmerie. In 1920 he was commissioned at the lowest rank of officer and assigned to a unit that guarded the sessions of the national congress in Lushnjë. As an adjutant to the chief of staff, Moisiu took part in battles against the Serbs in the region of Martanesh in 1921 and subsequently helped to suppress an uprising of the Catholic Mirdytes. In 1923 he served in the garrison in Tirana; from there he was sent to the newly formed Albanian Army. Although Moisiu had taken part in the 1924 revolution, after the victory of Ahmed Zogu, he remained in the army. He commanded a battalion, except in 1935, when he was briefly in charge of the Management of Prisons. In 1938 he was promoted to major. During the Italian invasion in April 1939 Moisiu commanded a battalion in the border region of Shkodër-Shengjin and did not resist the invaders. In the same year he joined the Albanian units established by the Italians and assumed command of the Tommorri battalion, which was part of the Italian Venice division and subsequently of the Ninth Army. Moisiu was arrested by the Italians for refusing to obey an order in November 1940 and sentenced to death for deserting the battlefield. However, the sentence was not carried out, and at the end of 1941 he was released from prison and ejected from the army.

At that point Moisiu moved to Lushnjë and ran a shop there. In October 1942 he assumed command of the local structures of the National Liberation Front and began to form his own partisan unit, which joined the Communist units of Enver Hoxha. Regarded as one of the best organizers of the partisan units, Moisiu became the chief of the General Staff of the National Liberation Army in July 1943. Promoted to general in May 1944, he served as chief of staff until 1946, when he retired.

Summoned by Hoxha, Moisiu resumed military service after Albania severed relations with Yugoslavia in 1948, becoming chief of the Tirana garrison. He served in the army until 1965. From 1945 to 1980 Moisiu was repeatedly elected to parliament and was a member of its presidium. From 1945 to 1964 he served as chairman of the Association for Aid to the Army and Defense of the Homeland (Shoqëria në Ndihme të Ushtrisë e Mbrotjtjes [SHNUM]), an all-national paramilitary organization that was instrumental in the system of totalitarian control in Albania. In 1963 this organization consisted of 170,000 members. (TC)

Sources: Fjalori Enciklopedik Shqiptar (Tirana, 1985); Klaus-Detlev Grothusen, ed., Albania (Göttingen, 1993); Titani Gjergji and Hasani Proleter, Personalitete ushtarake shqiptare në vite 1912–1997, vol. 1 (Tirana, 1997); Vangjel Kasapi, General Spiro Moisiu (Tirana, 2000).

MOJSOV Lazar (19 December 1920, Negotino, Macedonia), Macedonian Communist activist. Mojsov earned a doctoral degree in law at the University of Belgrade. He served as a partisan during World War II and was a member of the Anti-Fascist Assembly of the People's Liberation of Macedonia (Antifašističko vijeće narodnog oslobođenja Makedonije [ASNOM]). From 1948 to 1951, Mojsov was Macedonia's public prosecutor, and in 1953 he was elected president of the Supreme Court. He served as a member of the Assembly of the Republic of Macedonia from 1948 to 1951. He was elected to the Yugoslav Federal Assembly four times between 1945 and 1958 and in 1964 and 1967. Mojsov was a practicing attorney in the Yugoslav Socialist Republic of Macedonia between 1953 and 1958 and served as the director and editor-in-chief of Nova Makedonija, Macedonia's chief daily newspaper at the time. In 1962–66, he was director and editor-in-chief of Borba, a leading Yugoslav newspaper published in Belgrade. Mojsov was appointed Yugoslav ambassador to the USSR and Mongolia from 1958 to 1961, and he again became an ambassador between 1967 and 1969, serving this time in Austria as Yugoslavia's representative on the International Atomic Energy Association. From 1969 to 1974, he was Yugoslavia's permanent representative at the United Nations. Between 1974 and 1978, Mojsov served as deputy federal secretary for foreign affairs, and he became the president of the thirty-second session of the UN General Assembly in 1977. From 1958 a member of the Central Committee and later a member of the presidency of the Central Committee of the League of Yugoslav Communists, Mojsov published on foreign affairs and history. Among other works, he authored Bulgarska radnichka partija (komunista) i makedonsko nacionalno pitanje (The Bulgarian Workers' Party [Communists] and the Macedonian national question; 1948) and Macedonian Historical Themes (1979). (DP)

Sources: Enciklopedija Jugoslavije, vol. 6 (Zagreb, 1965).

MOLNÁR Ferenc (12 January 1878, Budapest–2 April 1952, New York City), Hungarian playwright, writer, and journalist. After completing law studies in Geneva and Budapest, Molnár began working as a journalist and soon won readers with his style and ironic humor. At the same time he began writing novellas and soon afterward novels as well; these included themes and characters from the middle-class life of Budapest. In 1902 Molnár made his debut as a playwright with A doktor úr (The attorney-at-law). His later dramas and comedies were full of lyricism and irony; they include Józsi (1904); Az ördög (1907; The Devil, 1908); and particularly Liliom (1909; Liliom: A Legend in Seven Scenes and a Prologue, 1921), which depicts the Budapest demimonde; A testőr (1910; Guardman, 1924) resembled the writings of Luigi Pirandello. These plays were frequently staged and were enormously popular both in Hungary and abroad. Molnár gained his greatest fame as the author of A Pál utcai fiúk (1907; Paul Street Boys, 1927), a novel for youth that was translated and adapted for film many times; it became part of the canon of world juvenile fiction as a work that exalted in a simple yet intense way the superiority of human reason and will over force and ruthlessness. During World War I Molnár was mostly engaged in short story writing, including fictionalized war reports. After the war he resumed writing plays in the style of the bourgeois burlesque or symbolic drama. From 1930 onward Molnár lived in France, Switzerland, and the United States. Although he visited Hungary only occasionally, many of his plays written at that time were still set in the realities of his homeland, particularly of Budapest. In 1950 Molnár published the autobiographical novel Companion in Exile. (MS)

Sources: Új magyar irodalmi lexikon (Budapest, 2000); Elisabeth M. Rajec, Ferenc Molnár: Bibliography (Vienna, Cologne, and Graz, 1986); István Várkonyi, Ferenc Molnar and the Austro-Hungarian "Fin de Siecle" (New York, 1991); Joel A. Smith, The Romantic Comedy of Ferenc Molnar (Louisville, Ky., 1995); Mátyás Sárközi, Színház, az egész világ: Molnár Ferenc regényes élete (Budapest, 1995); Steven Bela Vardy, Historical Dictionary of Hungary (Lanham, Md., 1997).

MORACZEWSKI Jędrzej Edward (13 January 1870, Trzemeszno–5 August 1944, Sulejówek), Polish Socialist and pro-independence activist. While a high school student, Moraczewski was a member of a secret patriotic self-education group. From 1888 to 1894 he studied in the Department of Engineering at the Technical University of Lemberg (Lwów, Lviv). He was also a member of, and from 1892 the leader of, a secret pro-independence group in Lemberg. In 1894 Moraczewski joined the Galician Social Democratic Party, which in 1897 changed its name to the Polish Social Democratic Party of Galicia and Silesia (Polska Partia Socjalno-Demokratyczna Galicji i Śląska Cieszyńskiego [PPSD]). Moraczewski worked as an editor of the Lemberg biweekly Życie and as a clerk in the Road Office in Lemberg. From 1894 to 1895 he did voluntary military service and then took part in the construction of state railways in Galicia, Dalmatia, and other places. In 1899 he became an activist in the Adam Mickiewicz People's University Society. In 1907 he joined the PPSD board and became an MP on its behalf in the Austrian parliament. From 1907 to 1918 Moraczewski belonged to the Association of Socialist MPs. In 1912 he became affiliated with the riflemen movement of Józef Piłsudski. In August 1914, as a private, Moraczewski joined the First Brigade of the Polish Legions, and in September 1914, as a lieutenant, he served in the commissariat in Kielce, at the headquarters of the Legions. Later he was assigned to the Chief National Committee. In January 1916 he took part in the military operations of the First Brigade in Volhynia, and from July 1916 he served in a sapper company in Modlin. In May 1917 he was detained for his pro-independence activities. After the oath crisis of July 1917, Moraczewski became one of the leaders of the Polish Military Organization (Polska Organizacja Wojskowa [POW]). He also joined the Convention of Organization A (Konwent Organizacji A), where he was in charge of political activities. In October 1918 he became a member of the presidium of the Polish Liquidation Commission (Polska Komisja Likwidacyjna) in Kraków and subsequently a member of the presidium of its successor, the Governing Commission, in Lwów. He was also head of its supplies department. On 7 November 1918 Moraczewski assumed the portfolio of minister of post and communication in the Provisional Government of the Republic of Poland in Lublin.

On 18 November 1918, after Piłsudski's return to Warsaw, Moraczewski became prime minister and minister of communications. He was one of Piłsudski's close associates. Despite the difficult conditions, Moraczewski's government managed, among other things, to introduce an eight-hour workday; set minimum wages and establish social insurance; and introduce an electoral law providing for universal, equal, and direct suffrage, voting by secret ballot, and proportional representation. However, Moraczewski was attacked by various political groups, particularly the National Democrats. After the failure of an attempted coup d'état on 4–5 January 1919, staged by a group of rightist activists (who held Moraczewski captive for some time), Moraczewski resigned, along with the entire government, on 16 January. In the January 1919 elections he was elected to the Constituent Assembly, where he served as deputy speaker and chairman of the Union of Polish Socialist Deputies. At the unification congress of the Polish Socialist Party (Polska Partia Socjalistyczna [PPS]) in April 1919 Moraczewski became a member of the Supreme Council (1919–26) and the Central Executive Committee (1919–23) of the party. Moraczewski fought in the Polish–Soviet war. From 1922 to 1927 he was an MP and served as deputy speaker of the Assembly and deputy chairman of the PPS parliamentary club. From 1920 to 1922 he was deputy chairman of the Railway Workers' Trade Union, and from November 1925 to February 1926, minister of public works.

Moraczewski took an active part in the coup of May 1926, organizing a strike of railway workers and the occupation of the Warsaw East railway station, thus preventing the pro-government troops from moving into the capital. From October 1926 to December 1929 he again served as minister of public works. As the PPS joined the opposition to Piłsudski, Moraczewski resigned his membership in the PPS Supreme Council in November 1926 and was subsequently expelled from the PPS. In January 1927 he resigned his parliamentary seat. In 1928–30 he contributed to the periodical Przedświt, defending his views and the policies of Piłsudski. In October 1928 he joined the PPS–Former Revolutionary Faction, which supported Piłsudski. After the failure of this group in the elections of November 1930, Moraczewski was elected chairman of the Central Association of Class Trade Unions, and in May 1931, chairman of the Central Trade Department of the Association of Trade Unions (Centralny Wydział Zawodowy Związku Związków Zawodowych), which was established as a result of a merger of pro-government trade union organizations. He was also an editor of Front Robotniczy. Moraczewski's views gradually evolved from social solidarity to syndicalism and statism. In September 1939 in Sulejówek Moraczewski organized a citizens' committee for aid to war victims. He was critical of the activities of General Władysław Sikorski. Moraczewski was killed in warfare. His publications include the following: Polityka polska a uwięzienie Piłsudskiego (Polish politics and the imprisonment of Piłsudski; 1918); Projekt rozwiązania trudności gospodarczych w Polsce (A plan for solving the economic difficulties in Poland; 1932); Strajk, bojkot, lokaut (Strike, boycott, lockout; 1933); Rozważania nad położeniem politycznym i gospodarczym Polski (Deliberations on the political and economic situation of Poland; 1938); and (under the initials E. K.) the memoirs Przewrót w Polsce; Część I: Rządy ludowe (Coup in Poland; Part 1: People's rule; 1919). (JS)

Sources: PSB, vol. 21; Prezydenci i premierzy Drugiej Rzeczypospolitej (Wrocław, Warsaw, and Kraków, 1992); Encyklopedia historii Drugiej Rzeczypospolitej (Warsaw, 1999); Encyklopedia Historii Polski: Dzieje polityczne, vol. 1 (Warsaw, 1994); Jerzy Holzer, Polska Partia Socjalistyczna w latach 1917–1919 (Warsaw, 1962); Seweryn Ajzner, Związek Zawodowy 1931–1939 (Warsaw, 1979); Władysław Pobóg-Malinowski, Najnowsza historia polityczna Polski 1864–1945, vol. 2 (London, 1983).

MORAVČÍK Jozef (13 March 1945, Očová, Zvolen region), Slovak lawyer and politician. In 1963–68 Moravčík studied law at the universities in Prague and Bratislava, and then he worked as an assistant professor at the Higher Economic School in Bratislava and in the Bratislava branch of the Chemapol enterprise. In 1972–85 he was assistant professor, then associate professor and chair of economic law in the School of Law at the University of Bratislava; in 1990–91 he became dean of the school. The author and co-author of numerous scholarly works and textbooks in economic law, in 1990–92 Moravčík was a member of the Slovak National Council on behalf of the Public against Violence (Verejnosť proti Nasiliu [VPN]). After its dissolution, he was active in the Movement for a Democratic Slovakia (Hnutie za Demokratické Slovensko [HZDS]). From June to December 1992 Moravčík was a member of the Chamber of the People of the Federal Assembly, and from July to December 1992, minister of foreign affairs of the last Czechoslovak government. After the emergence of independent Slovakia, he was adviser to the prime minister for legislative affairs, and from March 1993 to February 1994 he was minister of foreign affairs.

In early 1994 Moravčík entered into a sharp conflict with the HZDS chairman and prime minister, Vladimír Mečiar. In February 1994, along with Roman Kováč, Moravčík organized a faction called the Alternative for Political Realism, and then he was expelled from the HZDS. As a result, the ruling coalition lost its parliamentary majority, Mečiar's government collapsed, and Moravčík became the new prime minister. He held this position from 16 March to 13 December 1994, when the HZDS won early elections and Mečiar resumed power as prime minister. In April 1994 Moravčík co-founded the Democratic Union of Slovakia, soon renamed the Democratic Union (Demokratická Únia [DU]), which won almost 9 percent of the vote in the elections of September–October 1994 and remained in the opposition. From April 1994 to March 1997 Moravčík was the DU chairman, and in 1994–98 he was an MP. In 1996 he introduced the DU into a coalition aiming at the removal of Mečiar from power after the elections of 1998. In March 1997 Moravčík resigned from chairing the DU, remaining head of its Program Council. He grew skeptical about the Slovak Democratic Coalition (Slovenská Demokratická Koalicie [SDK]), and he did not join it before the elections of September 1998. From December 1998 Moravčík was mayor of Bratislava. (PU)

Sources: ČBS; Slovensko 1996: Súhrnná správa o stave spoločnosti (Bratislava, 1997); Slovensko 1997: Súhrnná správa o stave spoločnosti (Bratislava, 1998); Slovensko 1998–1999: Súhrnná správa o stave spoločnosti (Bratislava, 1999).

MORAVEC Emanuel (17 April 1893, Prague–5 May 1945, Prague), Czech officer, military theorist, and politician. In 1912 Moravec graduated from the School of Mechanical Engineering in Prague. During World War I, as a cadet in the Austro-Hungarian Army, he fought on the Galician front and was taken prisoner by the Russians in 1915. He joined the Czechoslovak Legions and fought in Siberia. In 1920 he returned to Czechoslovakia and served on the staff of the district army command in Užhorod (now Uzhhorod, Ukraine) and later, until 1927, in Prague. From 1927 to 1931 he commanded battalions in Znojmo and Humenné. In 1923 Moravec graduated from the Military College in Prague, and in 1931 he became a lecturer in the history of the armed forces and strategy at this college. In the same year he began working at the General Staff. In 1933 he was promoted to colonel, and in 1936 he took command of a regiment in Prague. One of the main Czech military theorists, Moravec dealt with the sociological aspects of war, the psychology of soldiers, and the influence of politics on Czechoslovakia's defense doctrine and strategy; he devoted two books to these issues: Vojáci a doba (Soldiers and time; 1934) and Obrana státu (Defense of the state; 1935). Moravec contributed military-political commentaries to Lidové noviny and Přítomnost, mainly under the pseudonym "Stanislav Yester." In the 1930s Moravec became more active in politics. He had close links with a political group called Hrad (Castle), led by President Tomáš Garrigue Masaryk, but he already started showing leanings toward authoritarianism.

In September 1938 Moravec commanded a regiment in south Moravia and firmly opposed Czechoslovakia's capitulation to the Munich agreement. On 28 September 1938 he went to Prague and demanded a meeting with President Edvard Beneš, which he was granted. He wanted to persuade the president to defend the country at all costs. After the Munich Pact, Moravec radically changed his views and in 1939 entered into cooperation with the Germans. He believed that collaboration was the only possible solution for the Czech nation under the circumstances and expressed his views in many articles, radio broadcasts, and books. Moravec became a fanatical supporter of Nazism and was in opposition to the government of Alois Eliaš. After Eliaš was imprisoned and then executed and when President Emil Hácha reluctantly agreed to Moravec's candidacy for a ministerial position, in 1942 Moravec became minister of education in the government of the Protectorate of Bohemia and Moravia; he held this post until May 1945, promoting a model of upbringing of youth in the Nazi spirit. In May 1942 Moravec established a Fascist organization called the Board of Trustees for the Education of Youth (Kuratorium pro Výchovu Mládeže). Moravec was one of the most hated dignitaries in the country and the personification and symbol of collaboration. He committed suicide after the outbreak of the Prague Uprising. (PU)

Sources: ČBS; Českoslovenští politici: 1918–1991 (Prague, 1991); Politická elita meziválečného Československa 1918–1938: Kdo byl kdo za první republiky (Prague, 1998); Kdo byl kdo v našich dějinách ve 20. století, vol. 1 (Prague, 1998); Vojtech Masny, The Czechs under Nazi Rule (New York and London, 1971); Jiří Pernes, Až na dno zrady: Emanuel Moravec (Prague, 1997).

MORAVEC František (23 July 1895, Čáslav–26 July 1966, Washington, D.C.), general, chief of Czechoslovak intelligence. Moravec studied at Charles University in Prague. After the outbreak of World War I, he was inducted into the Austro-Hungarian Army and fought on the Russian front. In 1915 he went over to the Russian side and joined the Czechoslovak Legions, with which he fought against the Bolsheviks in Siberia. In 1919 he joined the Czechoslovak Army, which operated on the Slovak front against the Hungarian Red Army. In 1929 Moravec graduated from the Military College in Prague. He subsequently served in a division in Plzeň and in the information department of the military district in Prague. In 1934 he became chief of the Second Department (Intelligence) of the General Staff, and in 1936 he was promoted to colonel. Because Czechoslovakia was at the center of activities of various intelligence networks, the majority of Moravec's work was based on counterintelligence. In this work he showed great professionalism and had good results; for example, he accurately predicted the aggressive steps of the Third Reich. During a visit to Moscow in 1938 Moravec signed an agreement on the exchange of information with the Soviet services.

On 14 March 1939, shortly before the German invasion, along with eleven of his closest associates, Moravec went to London; from there he directed the intelligence of the Czechoslovak government-in-exile. His reports constituted an important contribution by Czechoslovakia to the Allied cause. For example, as early as March 1941

Moravec informed President Edvard Beneš about German plans to attack the Soviet Union. For this reason and also because of the information he provided to the Allies, Moravec figured on a list of people to be arrested after the German invasion of the British Isles. In May 1942, with the help of two of his agents, Jan Kubiš and Josef Gabčík, Moravec organized the successful assassination of Reinhard Heydrich, head of the Reich Central Security Office (Reichssicherheitshauptamt). Both assassins were soon hunted down and killed by the Germans. A few weeks later, as part of the reprisals for Heydrich's assassination, almost all the inhabitants of the Czech village of Lidice were executed, and the village itself was razed to the ground. In 1944 Moravec became general. In May 1945 he returned to Czechoslovakia, becoming chief of military intelligence of the republic. After the Communist coup of February 1948, fearing for his life, Moravec fled to the West and was granted political asylum in the United States. He also served as adviser to the U.S. Defense Department. In 1975 his interesting memoirs, Master of Spies: The Memoirs of General František Moravec, were published in the United States. In 1990 they were published in the Czech Republic under the title Špion, jemuz neverili (A spy who was not believed). (WR)

Sources: ČBS; Eduard Beneš, From Munich to a New War and New Victory (London, 1954); Charles Whitting, The Spymasters (New York, 1976); Jiří Solo, Ve službách prezidenta: Generál František Moravec ve světle archívních dokumentů (Prague, 1994); John Waller, The Unseen War in Europe: Espionage and Conspiracy in the Second World War (New York, 1996).

MORAWSKI Jerzy (11 August 1918, Warsaw), Polish Communist activist. Born into a laborer's family, Morawski studied at Warsaw University. During World War II he was active in the Communist underground. From 1942 he belonged to the Polish Workers' Party (Polska Partia Robotnicza [PPR]), and he edited its periodicals, Trybuna Wolności and Walka Młodych. In 1944–45 Morawski belonged to the Secretariat of the Central Committee (CC) of the PPR for the German-occupied territories, and then he became chairman of the Union of Youth Struggle. In 1945–48 he was its deputy chairman, and until 1949 he was deputy chairman of the (Communist) Union of Polish Youth (Związek Młodzieży Polskiej [ZMP]). In 1949–50 he was secretary of the ZMP Main Board. From 1945 to 1947 Morawski was a member of the National Home Council, and then, until 1965, an MP. From December 1948 he was a deputy member, and from March 1954 a member, of the CC of the Polish United Workers' Party (Polska Zjednoczona Partia Robotnicza [PUWP]). In 1950–52 he was secretary of the PUWP Provincial Committee in Poznań; until 1953 he was deputy head of the Department of Mass Propaganda of the PUWP CC; and then he was deputy head and (from 1954) head of the Department of Propaganda and Agitation of the PUWP CC. During the "thaw," in January 1955 he became CC secretary, and from May to July 1956 he was editor-in-chief of the CC daily, Trybuna Ludu. In 1956 Morawski radically changed his mind on the subject of Władysław Gomułka's return to power. Initially he sharply criticized Gomułka, and then he supported the former PPR leader. In October 1956 Morawski played an important role as one of the "young secretaries" (along with Władysław Matwin) connected with the Puławska faction. From October 1956 Morawski was a Politburo member. From December 1956 (when he left the CC Secretariat) to March 1957 he chaired the CC Commission for Youth Problems, and from May 1957 he was CC secretary again. Morawski left the CC Politburo and Secretariat in January 1960, after Colonel Paweł Monat, connected with the Puławska faction, fled to the West. In 1957–61 Morawski chaired the parliamentary Foreign Affairs Commission. From 1959 to 1963 he was deputy chairman of the Supreme Chamber of Control. During the Fourth PUWP Congress in June 1964 Morawski was dropped from the CC; this meant not only the end of his party career, but also the elimination of the influence of the Puławska people. In 1964–69 Morawski was ambassador to London, and after returning to Poland he worked at the Institute of International Affairs and in journalism. (PK)

Sources: Mołdawa; Włodzimierz Janowski and Aleksander Koczański, Informator o strukturze i obsadzie personalnej centralnego aparatu PZPR 1948–1990 (Warsaw, 2000); Antoni Czubiński, Dzieje Najnowsze Polski 1944–1989 (Poznań, 1992); Andrzej Albert [Wojciech Roszkowski], Najnowsza historia Polski 1914–1993, vol. 2 (Warsaw, 1995).

MÓRICZ Zsigmond (29 June 1879, Tiszacsécse–5 September 1942, Budapest), Hungarian writer and journalist. Móricz's father was a peasant, and his mother was the daughter of a Calvinist pastor. He studied in elite Calvinist high schools in Debrecen, Sárospatak, and Kisújszállási. In 1899 he began to study theology, law, and philosophy at the university in Debrecen, and later in Budapest, but he did not pass his final exams. At the same time he also worked as a journalist. Móricz gained literary recognition as the author of Hét krajcár (1909; Seven Pennies and Other Short Stories, 1988) and Tragédia (Tragedy; 1910), two volumes naturalistically depicting rural life in Hungary, and Sári bíró (Judge Sári), a comedy staged in 1909. In the novels Sárarany (Gold in the mire; 1910), Az Isten háta mögött (A winter behind God's back; 1911), and

A fáklya (1917; Torch, 1931) he also depicted the everyday life of villages and small towns and the futile efforts of the Hungarian intelligentsia to spread education. Thanks to his friendship with Endre Ady, Móricz started writing for the biweekly Nyugat and became one of the leading contributors to this periodical, which played the most important role for Hungarian literature in the first half of the twentieth century.

During World War I Móricz worked as a war correspondent. In his reports and stories he emphasized the drama of a man forced into fighting and killing. He welcomed the republican revolution in Hungary (1918–19). Under the Hungarian Soviet Republic (HSR) in 1919 Móricz was a member of the Directorate of Writers and the author of articles and reports supporting the parceling out of large estates and the establishment of collective farms (kolkhozes). After the fall of the HSR, Móricz had problems getting his works published. Following the suicide of his first wife in 1925, he married the actress Mária Simonyi (1926–37), who played many parts in his dramas. After a period of fascination with the revolution, Móricz became a supporter of educational and economic development and gradual reforms. This attitude was reflected in Erdély (Transylvania; 1922–35), a historical trilogy depicting the harmony of social life, the development of culture, and the strength of a well-governed country, as illustrated by seventeenth-century Transylvania. The novels Légy jó mindhalálig (1920; Be Faithful unto Death, 1969) and Pillangó (Butterfly; 1925)—written in a different mood—praise the beauty of love and faithfulness. In 1929, along with Mihály Babits and Oszkár Gellért, Móricz assumed the editorship of Nyugat. In the 1930s he was drawn to the so-called peasant writers' movement, believing it was a panacea to the increasing popularity of fascism. After becoming the editor-in-chief of Kelet Népe (1939), Móricz drew peasant writers to this periodical. At that time he published Életem regénye (The story of my life; 1939), which included autobiographical elements, and Rózsa Sándor (1941–42), a two-volume historical novel based on the events of the Springtime of Nations in Hungary. Owing to his mastery in the use of elements of expressionism, naturalism, and realism, Móricz is considered one of the greatest Hungarian prose writers of the twentieth century. (MS)

Sources: Tamás Kiss, Igy élt Móricz Zsigmond (Budapest, 1979); Imre Bori, Móricz Zsigmond prózája (Újvidék, 1982); Károly Rádics, Móricz Zsigmond a Nyugat szerkesztője (Nyíregyháza, 1989); Mihály Czine, Móricz Zsigmond (Debrecen, 1992); Steven Bela Vardy, Historical Dictionary of Hungary (Lanham, Md., 1997).

MOROZ Oleksandr (29 February 1944, Buda, near Kiev), Ukrainian Communist activist and post-Communist politician. The son of a poor peasant, Moroz graduated from the Ukrainian Agricultural Academy and from the Higher Party School of the Central Committee (CC) of the Communist Party of Ukraine (CPU). He worked as an engineer and manager. From 1976 he was deputy head, and from 1989 head, of the agricultural department of the Kiev regional party committee. In March 1990, as first secretary of the CPU regional committee in Tarashcha, Moroz was elected to the Supreme Council of the Ukrainian SSR. In cooperation with the opposition from the Ukrainian Popular Movement for Restructuring (Rukh), Moroz encouraged the Communists to vote for the declaration of the state sovereignty of Ukraine of 16 July 1990 and then for the declaration of Ukrainian independence of 24 August 1991. Since the Communist Party was banned in late August 1991, on 26 October 1991 Moroz co-organized the founding congress of a new party—the Socialist Party of Ukraine (Sotsyalistychna Partiya Ukrainy [SPU])—and he became its leader. The SPU took over most of the Communist constituency and stayed in opposition to the governments appointed by presidents Leonid Kravchuk and Leonid Kuchma (October 1992–September 1993). Moroz remained chairman of the party from May 1994 to May 1998.

On 26 June 1994 Moroz ran in the presidential elections and came in third, winning 13.1 percent of the vote. Although his party advocated the elimination of the office of president, in the second round Moroz tactically supported Kuchma. Moroz's evolution toward a Social Democratic program was opposed by a part of the SPU leadership and led to a split in the party in 1996, when Natalya Vitrenko founded the Progressive Socialist Party. In 1994–96, along with Kuchma, Moroz co-chaired the parliamentary constitutional commission, checking Kuchma's ambition to introduce a presidential system of power. Despite his opposition to extended presidential powers, Moroz agreed to a compromise in June 1995 that served as the foundation for the constitution of 28 June 1996. In the March 1998 elections to the Supreme Council the SPU ran in alliance with the Peasant Party of Ukraine and won twenty-nine mandates, becoming the second largest group on the left after the reinvented Communists. Criticizing the economic policies of President Kuchma, on 31 October 1999 Moroz ran for the presidency and came in third for the second time. In the second round he supported Kuchma's rival, the Communist leader Petro Symonenko. In a conflict between Kuchma and the Supreme Council majority in January and February 2000, Moroz supported the anti-presidential opposition and declared himself against a referendum on the extension of presidential powers (16 April 2000). In November and December 2000 Moroz participated in widespread debates in which Kuchma was accused of ordering the murder of an opposition journalist, Georgiy Gongadze. In the elections of March 2002 Moroz was reelected to the Supreme Council. His popularity, especially in Southern and Eastern Ukraine, was due to his combination of anti-market and anti-corruption rhetoric. During the Orange Revolution of the fall of 2004 Moroz supported Viktor Yushchenko. (TS)

Sources: Taras Kuzio and Andrew Wilson, eds., Ukraine: From Perestroika to Independence (New York, 1994); Andrew Wilson, Ukrainian Nationalism in the 1990s (Cambridge, 1997); Bohdan Nahaylo, The Ukrainian Resurgence (Toronto, 1999); Volodymyr M. Lytvyn, Ukraina na mezhi tysyacholit (1991–2000 rr.) (Kiev, 2000); Sharon L. Wolchik and Volodymyr Zvighyanich, eds., Ukraine: The Search for a National Identity (Oxford, 2000).

MOROZ Valentyn (15 April 1936, Kholoniv, Volhynia), Ukrainian dissident and politician. The son of a peasant, Moroz graduated in history from the University of Lviv, and then he worked as a teacher in country schools. From 1964 he taught at pedagogical institutes in Lutsk and Ivano-Frankivsk. Arrested in 1965 for the distribution of uncensored materials, Moroz was sentenced to four years of labor camp in Mordovia. It was there that he wrote Reportazh iz zapovidnyka imeni Beriia (Report from the Beria Memorial Reservation), published abroad and in the uncensored press at home. Released in 1969, Moroz wrote the essays Sered snigiv (In deep snow), Khronika oporu (Chronicle of resistance), and Moysey i Dantan (Moses and Danton). Arrested again in June 1970 as a recidivist, in November 1970 Moroz was sentenced to six years of special prison, three years of labor camp, and five years of forced settlement. His trial resounded widely in the West and at home (forty protests were presented before the Supreme Court of the Ukrainian SSR). From July to November 1974 Moroz went on a hunger strike in Vladimir Prison, demanding a transfer to a camp. His extremely hostile attitude toward the Russians and the Jews and his lack of respect for other prisoners in the Sosnovka Camp in Mordovia led to a conflict among Ukrainian dissidents. A special committee of prisoners reprimanded him and announced a boycott of his works in the samizdat publications. As a result of the hunger strike and Moroz's popularity in the West, in April 1979 the Soviets exchanged Moroz and four other political prisoners for two Soviet spies imprisoned in the United States. At the same time Moroz lost his Soviet citizenship. He settled in America and lectured at Harvard University. Later he moved to Canada, where he worked as a radio commentator. In 1997 he returned to Ukraine and lived in Lviv, lecturing at the university. Moroz authored more than thirty books, including the following: Eseyi, lysty, dokumenty (Essays, letters, and documents; 1975); Bumerang (Boomerang; 1974); Lektsii z istorii Ukrainy (Lectures in Ukrainian history; 1982); Ukraina v 20-u stolitti (Ukraine in the twentieth century; 1992); and Natsionalizm 20-ho stolittia (Nationalism of the twentieth century; 1997). (TS)

Sources: Encyclopedia of Ukraine, vol. 3 (Toronto, 1993); Ludmila Alekseyeva, Istoriya inakomyслиya w SSSR (Vilnius and Moscow, 1992); Ivan Lysiak-Rudnytskyi, Istorychni ese, vol. 2 (Kiev, 1994); Heorhiy Kasyanov, Nezhodni: Ukrainska intelihentsiya v rusi oporu 1960–80 rokiv (Kiev, 1995); Anatoliy Rusnachenko, Natsionalno-vyzvolnyi rukh w Ukraini (Kiev, 1998).

MORUZOV Mihail (3 April 1890, Zebil–27 November 1940, Jilava), head of Romanian military intelligence. The son of an Orthodox priest of the Russian Old Believers, after completing three grades of high school, Moruzov joined the secret police in Dobrudja. He distinguished himself during World War I on the front in Dobrudja and during the incorporation of Bessarabia by Romania in 1918. For example, he abducted Friederich von Mayer, the chief of German military intelligence on the front in Dobrudja and the region of the Black Sea, and he arrested most of the German spies in Dobrudja. Moruzov resorted to deceit to take over command of the Bolshevik forces in Bessarabia in order to thwart their actions against the Romanian forces. During the war he was promoted to chief of intelligence in Dobrudja. Moruzov soon came into conflict with the director of intelligence, Romulus Vornescu, who accused him of being a double agent for the Soviet Union and of large-scale smuggling in Bessarabia and the Danube delta. As the result of an investigation Moruzov was arrested and expelled from the Special Information Services (SIS). He moved to Bucharest, where he lived in poverty.

Thanks to General Constantin Dragu, commander of the military district in Bessarabia to whom Moruzov had rendered important services during the war, Moruzov became head of the SIS in 1929. After King Charles II returned to Romania in 1930, Moruzov won the king's favor. He entered into a close relationship with Ernest Urdereanu, the leading figure of the court camarilla, and took part in its political games. As a result of initiatives to establish cooperation with German military intelligence (Abwehr)—made on the king's orders from 1937—after the defeat of Poland in 1939 Moruzov reached an agreement on cooperation with Admiral Wilhelm Canaris, head of the Abwehr. In this agreement Moruzov pledged to protect the Romanian oilfields but agreed to allow German troops to stay in that area. Moruzov supported the regime of Charles II in combating the Fascist Iron Guard. In 1938 Moruzov ordered that nearly all Iron Guard leaders be executed under the pretext of their having attempted to escape while in transit between prisons. In the summer of 1939, on the orders of the king, Moruzov interned General Ion Antonescu in the Bistrița Orthodox monastery because of Antonescu's contacts with the Iron Guard; this gave rise to Antonescu's hostility toward Moruzov. Impressed by the German expansion, after Premier Armand Calinescu was murdered in September 1939, Moruzov began to seek good relations with the Iron Guard and to support the Iron Guard's rise to power. When in November 1939 Horia Sima, chief of the Iron Guard, and a close associate returned from Germany to Romania and were arrested on the border, Moruzov released them from prison and secretly transported them to the palace, where they held talks with Urdereanu, during which the Iron Guard's participation in the government was discussed. Moruzov employed a group of important Iron Guard leaders in the SIS, which saved them from mobilization for the war. However, when on 5 September 1940 Antonescu came to power (which he shared with the Iron Guard), Moruzov was regarded as an enemy. He was secretly tried and put in prison. Admiral Canaris personally pleaded with Antonescu and Sima on behalf of Moruzov. Both Antonescu and Sima assured him that they did not intend to take Moruzov's life; nevertheless, he was murdered by the Iron Guard in Jilava Prison. (ASK) Sources: Michel Sturdza, The Suicide of Europe (Belmond, Mass., 1968); Paul Stefanescu, Istoria serviciilor secrete romanesti (Bucharest, 1994); Ion Budunescu and Ion Rusu-Sireanu, Descifrarea unei istorii necunoscute, vol. 3 (Bucharest, 1977); Christian Troncota, Eugen Cristescu asul serviciilor secrete romanesti (Bucharest, 1994).

MOŚCICKI Ignacy (1 December 1867, Mierzanów, near Ciechanów—2 October 1946, Versoix, near Geneva, Switzerland), chemist-technologist, president of Poland. Mościcki came from a landed gentry family. He began his secondary school education in Płock and finished it in Warsaw. From 1887 to 1891 he studied chemistry at the Technical University in Riga, where he organized pro-independence educational groups among students and Polish soldiers of the Riga garrison. He also pursued clandestine activities in the (Social Revolutionary) Second Proletariat. After returning home, Mościcki continued these activities in Skierbieszów and Warsaw. Because of his involvement in the production of explosives and in the preparations for the assassination of Josif Hurko, the governor general of Warsaw, Mościcki was threatened with arrest by the tsarist authorities, so in July 1892, along with his wife, he fled to London. Working mainly as a laborer, he was involved with the leadership of the Union of Polish Socialists Abroad and the editorial staff of the periodical Przedświt. It was in London that in 1896 Mościcki met Józef Piłsudski, and from then on he was aligned with his political camp.

In the autumn of 1897 Mościcki moved to Fribourg, Switzerland, where he worked as an assistant professor in the department of physics of the university for four years. In 1900 he developed a method to produce nitric acid on an industrial scale, obtaining nitric oxides by burning air in an electric arc. In 1901 in Fribourg Mościcki became head of a research group in a laboratory designed according to his specifications, and he gained recognition as an outstanding chemist. In 1901 he became a technical manager in the Société de l'Acide Nitrique, a firm that opened a small factory in Fribourg to produce nitric acid. Mościcki is also credited with many inventions in the field of electrochemistry and electrophysics. In 1912 he was given a professorship in physical chemistry and technical electrochemistry at the Technical University of Lemberg (Lwów, Lviv), where he became professor ad personam, and, from 1915 to 1917 he served as dean of the Department of Chemistry. In 1916 Mościcki established the Metan Institute for Scientific and Technical Research, later renamed the Chemical Research Institute. He was also active in the underground Polish Military Organization (1916–18) and the Polish Independence League. In 1917 Mościcki initiated the construction of an ammonium nitrate factory in Jaworzno and became its director. In 1922 he was appointed director of the Nitrogen Compound Factory at Królewska Huta (now Chorzów), recently taken over from the Germans. As a result of the innovations Mościcki introduced, Poland did not need to import nitric compounds. In October 1925 Mościcki was appointed chair of technical electrochemistry at the Warsaw Polytechnic. The holder of forty Polish and foreign patents, Mościcki was granted honorary doctorates by many Polish and foreign universities. A full member of the Polish Academy of Arts and Sciences (Polska Akademia Umiejętności) and the Warsaw Scientific Society and an honorary member of the Academy of Technical Sciences and the Polish Chemical Society, Mościcki authored over sixty works in Polish, French, and German.

On 1 June 1926, on a motion by Piłsudski, the National Assembly elected Mościcki president of Poland, one day after Piłsudski had refused to assume this position. On 2 August 1926, on Piłsudski's initiative, the 1921 constitution was amended (the so-called August amendment), extending the president's powers by granting him the right to dissolve the Lower House (Sejm) and the Senate and to issue decrees that had the force of acts of parliament; such powers gave the president a strong position in the state. Mościcki enjoyed the support of Piłsudski because he was unconditionally loyal to him and concentrated on developing industry. In 1930 Mościcki initiated the construction of a nitrogen compound factory near Tarnów, where the new industrial district was named Mościce. On 6 August 1926 he issued a decree that established the office of inspector general of the armed forces, to which he appointed Piłsudski on 27 August 1926. Piłsudski was also supported by Mościcki in skirmishes with the new parliament elected in 1928. After his seven-year term ended, on 8 May 1933 Mościcki was reelected, despite a boycott by the opposition. On 23 April 1935 he endorsed a new constitution that established an authoritarian system. It granted even greater powers to the president, making him responsible only to God and history.

After the death of Piłsudski in May 1935, under the provisions of the constitution, the role of Mościcki as president increased considerably. He became the leader of the so-called Castle group, the most liberal faction of the sanacja camp. This group wanted to increase the economic potential of Poland through state interventionism. After the so-called group of colonels, led by Walery Sławek, was eliminated from the political game, Mościcki shared power with a group led by Marshal Edward Rydz-Śmigły, and he actually left the political initiative to Rydz-Śmigły. The result of this power sharing was evident in the establishment of the government of Felicjan Sławoj-Składkowski on 15 May 1936. On 10 November 1936 Mościcki appointed Rydz-Śmigły marshal of Poland. Tensions between Rydz-Śmigły and Mościcki flared, though, after the former established the pro-totalitarian Camp of National Unity (Obóz Zjednoczenia Narodowego [OZN]), and especially after Adam Koc's declaration on 21 February 1937 that Poland needed a strong government headed by Rydz-Śmigły as commander-in-chief.

After the outbreak of World War II, Mościcki moved to the village of Błota, near Warsaw, on 2 September 1939. When the German troops approached Warsaw, along with the government and the commander-in-chief, he went to Ołyka (Olyka) in Volhynia, and thence toward the Romanian border. While in Kutry, Mościcki received the news that on 17 September the Soviet troops had invaded Poland; therefore, in order to avoid arrest, along with the government, he decided to leave Poland and crossed into Romania. The Romanian authorities interned him in Craiova. On the night of 20–21 September Mościcki appointed General Bolesław Wieniawa-Długoszowski as president of Poland, but after French protests, Wieniawa-Długoszowski resigned. On 30 September Mościcki finally handed over his office to Władysław Raczkiewicz, who was in France at the time. On 25 December 1939 Mościcki left for Switzerland, as he had Swiss citizenship. Mościcki wrote memoirs that were published by the New York Niepodległość. Mościcki's ashes were brought to Poland and buried in the crypt of St. John's Cathedral in Warsaw. (JS)

Sources: PSB, vol. 22; Kto był kim w Drugiej Rzeczypospolitej (Warsaw, 1994); Prezydenci i premierzy Drugiej Rzeczypospolitej (Wrocław, 1992); Stanisław Łoza, Profesor Ignacy Mościcki, prezydent Najjaśniejszej Rzeczypospolitej Polskiej (Warsaw, 1928); Ignacy Mościcki, Autobiografia (Warsaw, 1993); Sławomir M. Nowinowski, Prezydent Ignacy Mościcki (Warsaw, 1994); Zofia Dobrowolska, ed., Ignacy Mościcki, Ostatni prezydent Drugiej Rzeczypospolitej Polskiej: Bibliografia (Ciechanów, 1991).

MOSDORF Jan (30 May 1904, Warsaw–11 October 1943, Oświęcim), Polish nationalist activist. Born into an intelligentsia family, Mosdorf attended several high schools, graduating from the Jan Zamoyski Gymnasium in Warsaw in 1922. He studied law and later philosophy and history at Warsaw University. He received a diploma in 1928 and subsequently studied at the Ecole des Sciences Politiques in Paris. In 1934 he received a Ph.D. from Warsaw University for a dissertation on August Comte's philosophy of history. Allied with the nationalist movement in his youth, Mosdorf was a member of the secret National High School Organization and later a member of the anti-Semitic Youth Movement of the Great Poland Camp. From 1928 to 1933 he headed the Chief Council of the All-Polish Youth. He was a member of the National Guard, the conspiratorial leadership of the nationalist movement. In 1934, along with a group of young radical activists, Mosdorf left the National Party (Stronnictwo Narodowe [SN]) and became one of the founders of the National Radical Camp (Obóz Narodowo-Radykalny [ONR]), which called for a national revolution. Mosdorf initially acted as the ONR leader. He lost that position after a split initiated by Bolesław Piasecki, who in 1935 established a competition group, the National Radical Movement, the so-called Falanga. Mosdorf also lost the trust of some of his colleagues because he hid from the authorities for a year to escape an arrest following the assassination of Minister Bronisław Pieracki. After 1935 Mosdorf gradually withdrew from the activities of the ONR and devoted himself to journalism.

After the German and Soviet invasions of Poland in September 1939, Mosdorf returned to the SN and was active in the underground propaganda department of the SN Main Board. In December 1939, along with Stanisław Piasecki, he established the underground periodical Walka and then served as its editor. Arrested in June 1940 by the Gestapo and imprisoned in Pawiak Prison in Warsaw, Mosdorf was transported to the Auschwitz concentration camp on 6 January 1941. In the autumn of 1941, along with Professor Roman Rybarski, he established an underground national organization there. He was involved in clandestine teaching and in aiding the Jews. Arrested for his underground work by the camp Gestapo, Mosdorf was executed in a mass execution. Before the war, Mosdorf's views were characterized by extreme nationalism, socioeconomic radicalism, and anti-Semitism. After 1939 he abandoned his extremist views, considering Poland's struggle against its two enemies, Germany and the Soviet Union, as his main goal. The evolution of his views can be traced in his articles in Głos Akademicki, Akademik Polski, Gazeta Warszawska, Myśl Narodowa, Sztafety, Prosto z Mostu, and Walka. Mosdorf also wrote several sociopolitical works, including Akademik i polityka (The academic and politics; 1926) and Wczoraj i jutro (Yesterday and tomorrow; 1938). (MC)

Sources: PSB, vol. 22; Mieczysław Sobczak, Stosunek Narodowej Demokracji do kwestii żydowskiej w Polsce w latach 1918–1939 (Wrocław, 1938); Philip Friedman, Their Brothers' Keepers (New York, 1978); Szymon Rudnicki, Obóz Narodowo-Radykalny: Geneza i działalność (Warsaw, 1985); Jerzy Ptakowski, Oświęcim bez cenzury i bez legend (New York, 1985); Krzysztof Kawalec, Narodowa Demokracja wobec faszyzmu 1922–1939 (Warsaw, 1989); Władysław Sznarbachowski, 300 lat wspomnień. (London, 1997); Leszek Żebrowski, "Jan Mosdorf (1904–1943)," 23 October 2001.

MOSER Anastasya [née Dimitrova] (30 June 1937, Sofia), Bulgarian politician, daughter of Georgi "Gemeto" Dimitrov. Moser spent most of her life in the United States, where her father emigrated in 1945 and where she married Charles Moser, a lecturer in Bulgarian and dean of the Slavic Department at George Washington University in Washington, D.C. She returned to Bulgaria in 1991, joining in the activities of the reactivated Nikola Petkov Bulgarian Agrarian National Union (NP BANU). While the NP BANU leader, Milan Drenchev, demanded that the unification of the peasant movement be preceded by an investigation and dismissal of those compromised by having served the Communists in the satellite BANU, Moser preferred unification to clearing past accounts. In February 1992 she ousted Drenchev from the party leadership and helped in the unification of the two parties, taking over the leadership of the united BANU. In the elections of December 1994 Moser won a seat in parliament, taking the lead of a coalition called the Popular Union (Naroden Sajuz [NS]), which cooperated with the Union of Democratic Forces (UDF) but which remained a separate club. In the parliamentary elections of April 1997 the two groups ran together, which brought them a landslide victory. Moser did not join the Ivan Kostov government, but her influence in the UDF grew. For some time she was even its deputy chairman. Moser did not welcome the return to Bulgaria of the former tsar, Simeon II. She even stated that he might jeopardize democracy, but after a landslide victory by Simeon's party in the elections of June 2001 she announced she was ready to talk about a possible coalition. Despite a significant decline in the UDF's rankings, the BANU managed to exceed the 5 percent threshold and win parliamentary seats, but it stayed in the opposition. In January 2001 Moser was elected chairman of the European People's Party. (AG)

Sources: Raymond Detrez, Historical Dictionary of Bulgaria (Lanham, Md., 1997); Koy koy e v Bulgariya (Sofia, 1998); Bugajski; www.hri.org/news/balkans/bta; www.economist.com/countries/Bulgaria; www.europeanforum.bot-consult.se/cup/bulgaria.

MOSHANOV Stoycho (25 May 1892, Drianovo–10 January 1975, Sofia), Bulgarian politician. The nephew of Prime Minister Nikola Mushanov, Moshanov completed law studies in Aix-en-Provence, France. He fought on the front during World War I, and subsequently he became one of the leaders of the Democratic Party, which he represented in parliament from 1923 to 1934. After the coup of 1934 Moshanov became aligned with the royal court and became minister of education in 1935, but he resigned this post in protest against the government's pro-German line in foreign policy. Although the National Assembly was dominated by supporters of Tsar Boris III, by mobilizing all the opposition parties and taking advantage of the differences of opinion within the government camp, Moshanov succeeded in becoming parliament speaker (1938–39). After the 1940 elections, which were held under police control and in violation of democratic principles, the opposition politicians (including Moshanov) who called for Bulgaria's cooperation with the Western countries were eliminated from the parliament. Moshanov went to Paris and London, where he lived until 1944, maintaining contacts with the Allies in case the fate of the war changed. In August 1944 Moshanov returned to Bulgaria and undertook to conduct negotiations with the Allies on Bulgaria's withdrawal from the war, insisting at the same time on guarantees of Western aid in the case of Soviet aggression. However, because of the Soviet veto, the negotiations ended in failure at the beginning of September 1944. From 1945 to 1947 Moshanov was in opposition to the Communist rule. He mediated in the contacts of Nikola Petkov and Georgi "Gemeto" Dimitrov with the U.S. Embassy. Thanks to Moshanov's help, “Gemeto” managed to escape to the West. Moshanov also attempted to transform the small Democratic Party into a locus uniting other small parties that had attracted the intelligentsia before the war, but his efforts were unsuccessful. Arrested by the Communist authorities and sentenced to a long prison term, Moshanov was sent to the Belene concentration camp. After his release, he died in obscurity in Sofia. (AG)

Sources: Entsiklopedia Bulgariya, vol. 4 (Sofia, 1984); Suvremenna Bulgarska Entsiklopediya, vol. 3 (Sofia, 1994); Marshall Lee Miller, Bulgaria during the Second World War (Stanford, 1975); Jerzy Jackowicz, Partie opozycyjne w Bułgarii 1944–1948 (Warsaw, 1997); www.omda.bg/engl/inf-command/subversion.htm.

MOTHER TERESA OF CALCUTTA [originally Anjeze Gonxhe Bojaxhiu] (27 August 1910 Shkup, Albania, Ottoman Empire [now Skopje, Macedonia]–5 September 1997, Calcutta, India), Albanian nun, famous throughout the world for her services to the destitute. Born into a Catholic family of merchants, at eighteen Teresa went to Dublin and joined the Sisters of Loreto congregation. In December 1928 she took the name Maria Teresa and left for Darjeeling, India, where she spent seventeen years working as a teacher, both at a local school and at a convent school in Calcutta. She taught religion and geography. According to her own account, in 1946, while traveling on a train in Darjeeling, she received a call from God and pledged to devote her life to “the poorest of the poor.” Teresa completed a course in nursing with the Medical Missionary Sisters in Patna, and in 1950 she founded the Congregation of the Missionaries of Charity. The nuns from this congregation pledged themselves to disinterested service to the destitute. Initially the order provided aid to the dying and then also started serving abandoned children and lepers. After 1965 the congregation began opening new centers and missions in various countries around the world. In recognition of her apostolate, Teresa was honored in 1971 by Pope Paul VI, who awarded her the first Pope John XXIII Peace Prize. In 1979 Teresa received the Nobel Prize for Peace, and in 1985 she received the American Medal of Freedom and honorary U.S. citizenship. The government of India also recognized her service and in 1980 awarded her the Jewel of India, the highest award granted to foreigners.

After World War II Albania was ruled by the Communists, who in 1967 declared Albania the first completely atheistic state in the world and decreed punishment for religious practices; thus Teresa was unable to maintain contact with her homeland for decades. Although her family lived in Albania, it was only on 15 August 1989 that she was allowed to go to Albania for a private visit, invited by Nexhmije Hoxha, chairperson of the Democratic Front and the widow of the former president of Albania. Observers consider that this visit had a major influence in changing the state’s attitude toward religion. Although Teresa mainly worked in India, her congregation was known and popular in some East European countries, including Poland, where as early as the 1980s the Missionaries of Charity began to care for the poor and homeless. In March 1991 the Missionaries of Charity established their first center in Tirana, and the following year Teresa received an Albanian passport. Teresa’s publications include My Life for the Poor (1995). Teresa was beatified by Pope John Paul II on 19 October 2003. (TC)

Sources: Edward Le Joly, Mother Teresa of Calcutta (San Francisco, 1983); Lush Gjergj, Mother Teresa: Her Life, Her Works (Brooklyn, 1991); Monique de Huertas, Mère Teresa: Semez l’amour, il germera (Paris, 1993); Roger Royle and Gary Woods, Matka Teresa: Obrazy życia (Warsaw, 1996); Mariola Wozzkowska, “Bogini zaułków,” Przegląd Albański, 1996, no. 1; Anne Sebba, Mother Teresa (New York, 1997); Navin Chawla, Matka Teresa (Warsaw, 1998); Renzo Allegri, Teresa of the Poor: The Story of Her Life (Ann Arbor, 1998); Christian Feldmann, Miłość pozostaje: Życie Matki Teresy z Kalkuty (Warsaw, 1998); Maryanne Raphael, Mother Teresa: Called to Love (Waverly, Ohio, 2000).

MROŹEK Sławomir (29 June 1930, Borzęcin, near Kraków), Polish writer, playwright, and humorist. Mroźek made his literary debut in 1950 in the Kraków weekly Przekrój. Initially strongly involved in communism, he published Socialist realist columns. From the mid-1950s Mroźek worked with the student satirical theater Bim-Bom in Gdańsk. In his first plays—such as Policja (Police; 1958), Indyk (Turkey; 1960), Karol (Charles; 1961), Strip-tease (1961; English edition, 1962), and Zabawa (A party; 1962)—he proved to be a master of absurdist humor, grotesque allegory, and anti-traditionalist provocation. Mroźek continued to contribute to Przekrój, where he published short literary pieces and cartoons. The collections of his satires Stoń (1957; Elephant, 1962) and Wesele w Atomicach (The wedding in Atomic; 1959) consolidated his reputation as a writer pointing to the absurdities of Communist reality in Poland. Saying that something looked as if it had been “taken out of Mroźek” became a proverbial expression. In the West Mroźek’s works were considered close to those of Eugene Ionesco and the theater of the absurd. Mroźek won world renown for the play Tango (1965; English edition, 1968), in which he presented the roots of totalitarianism in the everyday behavior of contemporaries. In 1963 Mroźek went to Italy. In 1968 he spoke against the anti-Semitic campaign of the Polish Communist authorities and against the Warsaw Pact invasion of Czechoslovakia. Until 1989 he lived in France and then, until 1996, in Mexico. From caricaturing reality Mrozek evolved toward a deeper reflection on the psychology of his contemporaries. His later works include Emigranci (Emigrants; 1974), Vatzlav (1979; English edition, 1972), and Ambassador (Ambassador; 1981). Mrozek showed the destruction of values and the ambivalence of human behavior, suspended between primitive carelessness and tragic helplessness, as well as between a desire for full freedom and the necessity for rules. At the end of the 1990s Mrozek returned to Poland. Mrozek's works have been translated into twenty languages and staged in many countries. (WR) Sources: Alek Pohl, Zurück zum From: Strukturanalysen zu Slawomir Mrozek (Berlin, 1972); Jan Błoński, "Mrozek filozof: Próba interpretacji fantastyki współczesnej," Pamiętnik Literacki, 1977, no. 3; Literatura polska: Przewodnik encyklopedyczny, vol. 2 (Warsaw, 2000); Halina Stephan, Mrozek (Kraków, 1996); Małgorzata Sugiera, Dramaturgia Sławomira Mrożka (Kraków, 1997).

MSTYSLAV [originally Stepan Skrypnyk] (10 April 1898, Poltava–11 June 1993, Bound Brook, New Jersey), leader of the Ukrainian Autocephalous Orthodox Church (UAOC). Skrypnyk was a clergyman of the UAOC, established in the Ukraine by a decision of the Directory on 1 January 1919; he was also the nephew of Symon Petlyura. At the end of the 1920s in Poland, Skrypnyk joined a circle of Ukrainian émigrés centered around the Volhynian governor (wojewoda) Henryk Józewski, who, following the concept of Marshal Józef Piłsudski, between 1928 and 1938 implemented a policy of winning the support of Ukrainians for the Polish state. In 1930–39, as a representative of the Ukrainian Volhynian Unification (UVU), which ran in the elections on the ticket of the pro-government Nonparty Bloc of Cooperation with the Government (BBWR), Skrypnyk was a deputy to the Assembly of the Polish Republic. The UVU deputies represented a loyalist line, contrary to most deputies representing the Ukrainian parties from Galicia. In his parliamentary activities Skrypnyk became known as a supporter of the Ukrainization of the Orthodox Church in Poland. He opposed the decisions of Metropolitan Dionisius Valedinsky that preserved the Russian language character of the Orthodox Church. Skrypnyk defended the Orthodox Church's property, threatened by the so-called revindication action, which was conducted by the state between 1938 and 1939. Disappointed with the Polish policy, in 1938 Skrypnyk left the club of the Volhynian deputies and started to work with the opposition Ukrainian Parliamentary Representation of Galician deputies.

During the German occupation, within the framework of the revived Ukrainian autocephalous Orthodox Church (dissolved by the Bolsheviks in 1921), Skrypnyk was ordained bishop of Pereyaslav in 1942 in Kiev. From 1942 to 1943 he was temporarily imprisoned by the Gestapo, and in 1944 he evacuated to Germany, where he continued his activities as bishop until 1946. In 1947–49 he headed the autocephalous Orthodox Church in Canada. From 1950 he lived in the United States, where the synod of the local autocephalous Orthodox Church, established in 1919, appointed him president of the consistory and deputy to Metropolitan Ioan Teodorovych. In 1963 Skrypnyk was an observer at the sessions of the Second Vatican Ecumenical Council. In 1969 he replaced the deceased metropolitan, Nikanor Abramovych, as head of the UAOC in Europe (headquartered in Karlsruhe), and after the death of Teodorovych, he became metropolitan of the entire UAOC (1971).

In the face of the revival of the UAOC in the Ukraine, which came about as a result of a split in the Orthodox Church of the Moscow Patriarchate in June 1990, Skrypnyk became head of the UAOC. In September 1990 he arrived in the Ukraine for enthronement. However, owing to his autocratic style of governing the Orthodox Church and because of his questioning of the canonicity of the election of bishops, he got into a conflict with the bishops. He returned to the United States, while the bishops held an ecumenical council (June 1992) that was supported by the state authorities and that proclaimed the unification of the UAOC and the Ukrainian Orthodox Church. Until then, the Ukrainian Orthodox Church had been subordinated to the Moscow Patriarchate. Not all parishes of the two Orthodox churches recognized the new authorities. The ecumenical council actually acknowledged Skrypnyk as the head of the Orthodox Church and Filaret Denisenko as his deputy, but, as it turned out later, it did so without the latter's consent. Skrypnyk again arrived in the Ukraine; however, he did not find common ground with Filaret (a former exarch of the Moscow Patriarchate in the Ukraine who was suspected of collaboration with the KGB), and he rejected the resolutions of the ecumenical council. Despite Filaret's objections, Skrypnyk was considered head of the Ukrainian Orthodox Church–Kiev Patriarchate until his death. (GM)

Sources: Encyclopedia of Ukraine, vol. 4 (Toronto, 1993); Włodzimierz Mędrzecki, "Ukraińska Reprezentacja Parlamentarna w Drugiej Rzeczypospolitej," in Warszawskie Zeszyty Ukrainoznawcze, vol. 3; Włodzimierz Pawluczuk, Ukraina: Polityka i mistyka (Kraków, 1998).

MUCHA Alfons (24 July 1860, Ivančice, Moravia–14 July 1939, Prague), Czech painter, graphic artist, designer, leading representative of Art Nouveau. After he had failed to gain admission to the Prague Academy of Fine Arts in 1877, Mucha went to Vienna, where he found employment in the production of stage decorations. In 1881 he met Count Khuen-Belassi, who commissioned him to paint frescos in his castles in Hrušovany and Gandegg. The count subsequently sponsored Mucha's studies in Munich. From 1885 to 1887 Mucha studied at the Akademie der Bildenden Künste in Munich. In 1888 he went to Paris, where he studied at the Académie Julian and (from 1889 to 1894) at the Académie Colarossi. He earned a living by taking on various minor commissions, such as painting illustrations for La Vie Populaire and Le Petit Français Illustré. Mucha gained renown in 1894 as the designer of a poster for the play Gismonde, which featured a life-size picture of Sarah Bernhardt, the leading actress of the play. As a result of the poster's success, Mucha entered into a six-year exclusive contract with the actress for the design of posters showing Bernhardt. He also won many commissions to design advertising posters, stamps, calendars, illustrations, and the like. Apart from commissioned work, Mucha ran his own school of drawing (Cours Mucha), and from 1898 to 1900 he helped to organize the 1900 Paris Exhibition, preparing the Bosnia and Herzegovina Pavilion. He also designed jewelry for the Fouquet store in Paris. Around 1900 a "Mucha style" became recognized in Art Nouveau, although Mucha himself opposed the classification of his art as Art Nouveau. In 1904 Mucha moved to the United States, from where he frequently traveled to Paris. In 1910 he returned to Prague.

From 1910 to 1928 Mucha created his greatest works, a monumental series of paintings, Slovanská epepej (Slavic epic), in which his Slavophilism was expressed. The series consists of twenty paintings depicting the major events in the history of the Slavs. Mucha's style reveals the influences of Hans Makart and Eugène-Samuel Grasset. It is characterized by rich ornamentation and a balance between realistic and stylized elements. Elements of Byzantine art can also be seen, particularly in the mosaic backgrounds of the pictures and in richly adorned attire decorated with gold and jewels. (PU)

Sources: ČBS; Joseph S. Roucek, Slavonic Encyclopaedia (New York, 1949); Emanuel Poche et al., Encyklopedie českého výtvarného umění (Prague, 1975); The Dictionary of Art, vol. 22 (London and New York, 1996); Kdo byl kdo v našich dějinách ve 20. století, vol. 1 (Prague, 1998); Brian Reade, Art Nouveau and Alphonse Mucha (London, 1963); Jiří Mucha, Alphonse Mucha: The Master of Art Nouveau (Prague, 1966); Jiří Mucha, Kankán se svatozáří: Život a dílo Alfonse Muchy (Prague, 1969); Jiří Mucha, Alphonse Maria Mucha: His Life and Art (London, 1989); Renate Ulmer, Alfons Mucha (Cologne, 1993); Ann Bridges, Alphonse Mucha (London, 1991).

MUDRYI Vasyi (19 March 1893, Vikno, near Skalat–19 March 1966, Yonkers, New York), Ukrainian social activist and politician. While a university student in Lemberg (Lviv, Lwów), Mudryi served as chairman of the Ukrainian Student Union. From 1917 to 1920 he worked in the administration of the Ukrainian National Republic (Ukraińska Narodna Republika [UNR]), serving as commissar of education and head of Proskuriv County. After returning to Lwów in 1921, Mudryi helped to organize the underground Ukrainian University, for which he served as finance officer and secretary (1921–25). He was also an active member of the Main Board of the Prosvita Society, becoming its vice-president in 1932. From 1921 to 1939 Mudryi was an executive member of the Taras Shevchenko Scientific Society. He was a member of the editorial staff of Dilo, a leading Ukrainian newspaper published in Lwów, and he served as its editor-in-chief from 1927 to 1935. Mudryi co-authored the program of the Ukrainian National Democratic Alliance (Ukraińske Natsionalno-Demokratyčne Obyednannya [UNDO]), which was the largest Ukrainian party in Poland; he served as its vice-president (1926–35) and subsequently its president. In 1935–39 Mudryi was an MP in the Polish Lower House (Sejm). A proponent of the normalization of Polish-Ukrainian relations, he became deputy speaker of the Sejm, a member of the Commission for Foreign Affairs, and leader of the Ukrainian Parliamentary Representation. He also maintained contacts with the Organization of Ukrainian Nationalists (OUN). The policies of the Polish authorities did not facilitate a Polish-Ukrainian agreement; among other things, they prompted the UNDO to submit, on 7 May 1938, a "Declaration on the Situation of the Ukrainian Nation in the Polish State," which included a demand for territorial autonomy in the areas populated by Ukrainians. In December 1938, along with thirteen UNDO MPs and MP Stepan Skrypnyk, Mudryi submitted a request to the Sejm for the establishment of such autonomy. On 2 September 1939, at the last session of the Sejm, he submitted a declaration that the Ukrainian minority would "fulfill its citizen duties of blood and property toward the State."

After the defeat of Poland, Mudryi limited his political activities. Until 1941 he lived in Kraków and then in Lviv, where he worked as a cinema manager from 1942 to 1943. He maintained contacts with the Stepan Bandera faction of the Organization of Ukrainian Nationalists (OUN-B). In June 1941 he joined the Ukrainian National Committee, established by the OUN-B. He also worked with Ideya i Chyn, an underground organ of the OUN-B. In July 1944 Mudryi became vice-president of the Ukrainian Supreme Liberation Council (Ukraińska Holovna Vyzvolna Rada), a political superstructure of the Ukrainian Insurgent Army.

From 1944 to 1948 he was in western Germany, where he revived the UNDO and then served as its leader until his death. He was also president of the Central Representation of the Ukrainian Emigration in Europe. In 1949 Mudryi left for the United States, where he became executive director of the Ukrainian Congress Committee. Mudryi authored numerous articles and brochures on political topics. His publications also include Borotba za ohnyshche ukraiïnskoy kultury v zakhidnykh zemliakh Ukraïny (The struggle for the core of Ukrainian culture in Ukraine's western lands; 1923) and a monograph about Ivan Franko (1957). (GM)

Sources: Encyclopedia of Ukraine, vol. 3 (Toronto, 1993); Kto byl kim w Drugiej Rzeczpospolitej (Warsaw, 1994); Ryszard Torzecki, Kwestia ukraińska w Polsce w latach 1923–1929 (Warsaw, 1989); Ryszard Torzecki, Polacy i Ukraïncy: Sprawa ukraińska w czasie II wojny światowej na terenie II Rzeczypospolitej (Warsaw, 1993).

MÜNNICH Ferenc (16 November 1886, Seregélyes–29 November 1967, Budapest), Hungarian Communist activist. The son of a chemist, after high school Münnich studied law in Kolozsvár (now Cluj in Romania), and in 1910 he earned a doctoral degree. During World War I Münnich did his military service in Máramarosziget in Transylvania. In 1915 he was awarded the Silver Medal for Bravery and was promoted to lieutenant. In October 1915, along with his unit, Münnich was captured by the Russians. He was put in a prisoner of war camp in Tomsk, where he took part in the creation of a Socialist organization among the prisoners of war. In May 1917 Münnich joined the Russian Social Democratic Workers' Party, and later he became a member of the Tomsk organization of the All-Union Communist Party (Bolsheviks). He fought in the Russian Civil War as a commander of the international unit formed by the prisoners of war. In 1918 he became commander of a regiment. For some time he worked in the Cheka in Moscow. In November 1918 Münnich returned to Hungary, and a month later he joined the founders of the Hungarian Communist Party. Under the Hungarian Soviet Republic (HSR) in 1919 he became head of the Organizational Department of the People's Commissariat for Military Affairs, and in April he was appointed political commissar of the sixth division. He took part in the northern campaign and was appointed people's commissar for military affairs, with headquarters in Eperjes (now Prešov in Slovakia) at the territory of the newly created Slovak Soviet Republic. After the fall of the HSR, Münnich emigrated to Vienna, where he joined the faction of Béla Kun.

In March 1921, on the orders of the Communist International, Münnich took part in the so-called March action of Communists in Germany. After the failure of this action, he was arrested, sentenced to one month in prison, and subsequently expelled from Germany. Between 1922 and 1936 he was in the USSR. In 1922 he became president of the Auditing Commission of the Hungarian Oil Syndicate. In 1930 he joined the editorial staff of Sarló és Kalapács, a newspaper of Hungarian Communists in exile, and in 1931–33 he was its editor-in-chief. During the Spanish Civil War Münnich fought as a major in the Twelfth International Brigade, where he became deputy commander of the Forty-fifth Division and was later appointed chief of the general staff of the Fifteenth Spanish Division. In 1938 Münnich became commander of the Eleventh International Reserve Brigade. After the collapse of the Spanish republic in February 1939 Münnich fled to France, where he was placed in an internment camp. Released in 1941 following a Soviet intervention, Münnich returned to the USSR. After the German aggression against the USSR, Münnich trained partisans. Later he fought at Stalingrad. Between November 1942 and 1945 he was editor-in-chief of the Hungarian section of Radio Moscow. He wrote commentaries under the name of Nikolai Fiodorov. It was there that Münnich established closer contacts with Mátyás Rákosi, Ernő Gerő, and József Révai.

In September 1945 Münnich returned to Hungary and was appointed governor of the city of Pécs. Between May 1946 and 1949, as chief commanding officer of the Budapest police, he reorganized the chief command, created the department of economic police, and organized alarm units. Between 1949 and 1956 Münnich was in the diplomatic service: in 1949–50 as head of the legation in Finland, between 1950 and 1954 in Bulgaria, between September 1954 and August 1956 as ambassador to the USSR, and between August 1956 and 25 October 1956 as ambassador to Yugoslavia. In 1949–53 Münnich was also a member of parliament. In September 1956 he was chosen for the committee that prepared a second funeral for László Rajk and his associates. In his funeral speech, Münnich described Rajk's judges as "sadistic criminals who had crawled out of the swamps of personality cults into the daylight."

On 24 October 1956 Münnich was coopted to the CC of the Hungarian Workers' Party. Between 27 October and 3 November he was interior minister in the government of Imre Nagy. On 1 November, along with János Kádár, Münnich secretly went to Moscow, where on 2 and 3 November he took part in a meeting of the Presidium of the CC of the CPSU and in the creation of a puppet government in Hungary. On 4 November 1956 Münnich became minister of the armed forces and public security affairs in the “Revolutionary Government of Workers and Peasants.” In November 1956 he joined the Politburo of the Hungarian Socialist Workers’ Party (HSWP). Münnich helped to organize the armed battalions of the security services and workers’ guard. In February 1957 Münnich was first deputy prime minister, and from 28 January 1958 to 13 September 1961 he was prime minister. Between 1961 and 1965 he was minister without portfolio. Between November 1956 and 1967 Münnich was a member of the CC of the HSWP, and until 1966 he served as a member of the Politburo. (JT)

Sources: Current Biography, 1959; Obituaries from The Times 1961–1970 (Reading, 1975); Lazitch; Magyar Életrajzi Lexikon, vol. 3 (Budapest, 1985); A magyar forradalom és szabadságharc enciklopédiája, CD-ROM (Budapest, 1999); Tankok ellen, száz halálon át: Münnich Ferenc a spanyol polgárháborúban (Budapest, 1976); Három forradalom hőse: Münnich Ferenc válogatott beszédei és írásai (Budapest, 1986).

MUNTERS Vilhelms (25 July 1898, Riga–11 January 1967, Riga), Latvian diplomat. The son of a merchant, Munters graduated from a school of commerce in Riga. Inducted into the Russian Army at the beginning of 1917 but demobilized in October of that year, he returned to Riga in July 1918. From July 1919 to October 1920 he served in the Estonian Army. In 1920 he returned to Latvia, and, encouraged by Zigfrids Meierovics, he began working in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. From 1925 to 1931 Munters was head of the Department for the Baltic States, and from 1931 to 1933, director of the Administrative and Legal Department. In July 1933 he became secretary general of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, and in July 1936, minister of foreign affairs. Munters spoke several foreign languages and was highly intelligent, but he was criticized for his irresolute character. In mid-June 1937 he visited Moscow, where he was received by Stalin. At this visit, which had a ceremonious character, an official announcement was issued stressing that Latvia and the Soviet Union enjoyed friendly relations. During his visits to Berlin in November 1937 and May 1938, Munters rebutted German criticism of legislation introduced by Latvian dictator Kārlis Ulmanis that had limited the freedoms of the national minorities. In September of that year Munters unsuccessfully attempted to obtain German guarantees for Latvia’s neutrality. As head of the Latvian foreign service, Munters was elected chairman of the 101st session of the League of Nations in 1938.

After the collapse of Poland, under the Molotov-Ribbentrop Pact of 23 August 1939, the Kremlin demanded that Latvia, like Finland, Estonia, and Lithuania, allow for the establishment of Soviet garrisons and extra-territorial communication routes across their territories. Munters realized the hopelessness of the situation, and on 5 October 1939, after he made another visit to Moscow, the Latvian government signed a treaty with the Soviet Union under which Soviet bases were established in Liepāja and Ventspils. After the Soviet invasion Munters was dismissed as minister on 21 June 1940. On 16 July he was deported to Voronezh, where he taught foreign languages at the Voronezh Pedagogical Institute. The Soviet authorities wanted him to become a Latvian quisling, but Munters refused. Arrested on 26 June 1941, he was held in prisons in Voronezh, Saratov, Kirov (from 1942), and later Moscow. In 1952 he was sentenced to twenty-five years. Released in 1954 but banned from returning to Latvia, Munters worked as a translator in Vladimir. In 1959 he was allowed to return to Latvia, where he continued to work as a translator. He was the only former minister of Latvia to cooperate with the Soviet KGB, writing articles and books about the “criminal activities” of Latvian émigrés in the West, although it is not clear when this cooperation began. Munters held many awards and distinctions, including the Order of Polonia Restituta of the first and third degrees. He is buried in Riga. (EJ)

Sources: Georg von Rauch, The Baltic States: The Years of Independence: Estonia, Latvia, Lithuania 1917–1940 (Berkeley, 1970); O. Niedra, “Ierēdnis,” Lauku Avīze, 5 October 1990; V. Bērziņš, “Muntera padēls protestē,” Zvaigzne, 1991, nos. 2–3; B. Daukšts, “Muntera oficiālā un neoficiālā vizīte: Padomju Savienībā,” Latvijas Vēsture, 1992, no. 2; R. Ārmanis, “Rusofils, anglofils vai germanofils: V. Munters nacionālsociālistu vērtējumā,” Latvijas Vēstures Institūta Žurnāls, 1993, no. 3; David M. Crowe, The Baltic States and the Great Powers: Foreign Relations, 1938–1940 (Boulder, Colo., 1993); J. Labsvīrs, “Atmiņu skices par Vilhelmu Munteru,” Latvijas Vēstures Institūta Žurnāls, 2000, no. 1; I. Feldmanis, “Latvijas ārlietu ministrs V. Munters par vācbaltiešu attieksmi pret Latviju 1939. gada pavasarī,” Latvijas Vēsture, 2000, no. 4.

MURAVIEV Konstantin (21 February 1893, Pazardzhik–31 January 1965, Sofia), Bulgarian politician. Muraviev fought in both Balkan Wars. In 1918 he joined the Bulgarian Agrarian National Union (BANU). In 1919–20 he was a state security officer in the Aleksandur Stamboliyski regime. A nephew of Stamboliyski, Muraviev served as consul general in Rotterdam and chargé d’affaires in Holland and Turkey. From March to June 1923 he was minister of war. In this role, he proved incompetent, and his incompetence was blamed for Stamboliyski’s fall. After the military coup of June 1923, Muraviev was arrested and sentenced to a long prison term. Released in April 1924, he lived in exile until 1926. In 1927 he became editor-in-chief of the periodical Zemedelsko zname, an organ of the BANU. At the beginning of the 1930s, as one of the leaders of the agrarian right wing of the Vrabcha I group, Muraviev worked closely with Dimitur Gichev. Muraviev served as minister of public education (June 1931–December 1932) and minister of agriculture and state property (December 1932–May 1934) in the coalition governments dominated by the Agrarians. After the coup of 1934, he went over to the opposition, both to the Zveno group and to the regime of Tsar Boris III. In August 1936 Muraviev signed a declaration in which the tsarist governments were denounced as anti-democratic and anti-people, and in June 1937 he was a co-founder of a political amnesty committee. After the death of Tsar Boris, Muraviev supported the September 1943 appeals by democratic groups for new elections, but when new elections were not held, he stated that the election of the new Regency Council was illegal. Muraviev continued to call for the establishment of a broad ruling coalition and was among the opponents of the regime of the three regents. On 7 August 1944 Muraviev signed a declaration addressed to the regents and to the government demanding a change in Bulgaria's foreign policy and calling for an agreement with the Soviet Union.

After Bulgaria's failure to reach an agreement with the Allies and because of the Soviet offensive, Muraviev was appointed prime minister by the regents on 2 September 1944. He invited politicians of the opposition and the pro-Soviet Fatherland Front to join his government, but they refused to cooperate and vehemently attacked his government, preparing to overthrow it. On 4 September Muraviev announced the program of his cabinet; in it he pledged to return to a constitutional form of government, ban Fascist organizations, dissolve the National Assembly and call new elections, grant amnesty to political prisoners, withdraw Bulgarian troops from Serbia, and enter into talks with the Allies. By releasing the opponents of the regents from prison, Muraviev unintentionally helped in the preparations for a pro-Soviet coup. Negotiations with the Allies did not make headway because of the opposition of the Kremlin. The Red Army had already reached the Danube, and Muraviev delayed granting permission for it to march through Bulgarian territory until an agreement was reached with the Soviet Union. Meanwhile, on 5 September the Soviets declared war on Bulgaria. On the same day, without delay, Muraviev's government broke off its ties with Germany, whose troops were retreating from Bulgaria. The minister of war, Ivan Marinov, who by then had started cooperating with the Communists, delayed the announcement of this decision for three days, giving more time to the plotters. On 8 September Soviet troops began to enter Bulgaria unopposed. At the last moment and against the will of the regents, Muraviev declared war on Germany, but it was too late. On 9 September 1944 his government was overthrown by an uprising organized by the Communists and by officers supporting the Zveno group. Arrested by General Marinov, Muraviev was imprisoned for a short time in the Soviet Union, but at the beginning of 1945 he was sentenced in Sofia to life in prison. Released in 1955 but imprisoned again during the Hungarian Revolution in 1956, Muraviev was held in the Belene forced labor camp. Released toward the end of his life, he did not play any political role. His memoirs, Subititia i khora: Spomeni (Events and people: Memoirs), were published in 1992 in Sofia. He was also the author of Dogovorut za mir v Nuyi (The Neuilly Peace Treaty; 1993). In 1996 the Supreme Court in Bulgaria quashed the sentence against Muraviev issued in 1945. (WR) Sources: Kratka bulgarska entsiklopediya, vol. 3 (Sofia, 1963); Biographisches Lexikon, vol. 3; Marshall Lee Miller, Bulgaria during the Second World War (Stanford, 1975); Stephane Groueff, Crown of Thorns (Lanham, Md., 1987); Tasho Tashev, Ministrite na Bulgariya 1879–1999: Entsiklopedichen Spravochnik (Sofia, 1999).

MURAVSCHI Valeriu (1949, Orhei), Moldavian politician. Muravschi graduated in economics from the Polytechnic Institute in Kishinev. From June 1990 he was minister of finance of the Moldavian SSR, and on 28 May 1991, thanks to the support of President Mircea Snegur, he became head of the republican government. As a result of the failure of the Moscow putsch, both Moldavian leaders decided to support the independence of the republic, which the parliament declared on 27 August 1991. At the same time the new state of Moldova was introduced into the Commonwealth of Independent States. Muravschi's government was dominated by the Moldavian Romanians, and some of them thought Moldova should merge with Romania. Muravschi could not overcome the growing ethnic tensions: the Gagauz separatist movement and the secession of the Transnistrian Republic announced by the Russians under the auspices of the Soviet troops stationed on the Dniester River. In order to solve these problems President Snegur forced Muravschi's resignation on 30 June 1992 and was willing to create a multiethnic government. From 1992 Muravschi was an MP, and in 1993 he founded the short-lived Socialist Workers' Party. From 1995 he chaired the Union of Moldavian Banks, and from 1996, the Christian Democratic People's Party of Moldova (Partidul Țăranesc Creștin Democrat din Moldova [PTCDM]), advocating privatization and Christian values. In the elections of February 2001 the PTCDM won 8.2 percent of the vote and 11 percent of the mandates, becoming the third largest faction. In November 2001 it merged with four other groups into the Liberal Party (Partidul Liberal). (WR) Sources: Europa Środkowo-Wschodnia 1992 (Warsaw, 1994); Bugajski, RFE/RL Newslines, 13 November 2002; www.terra.es/personal2/monolith/moldova.htm; www.lupinfo.com/country-guide-study/moldova/moldova51.html.

MUSHANOV Nikola (12 April 1872, Drianovo–10 May 1951, Turnovo), Bulgarian lawyer and politician. After graduating from high school, Mushanov completed law studies in Aix-en-Provence, France and subsequently worked as an attorney in Ruse. He entered politics in 1897, joining the Democratic Party. In 1902 he was elected an MP for the first time. From January 1908 to September 1910 he was minister of education and introduced a reform of the school system. Subsequently, until March 1911, he served as minister of interior in the government of Aleksandur Malinov. A supporter of West European-style democracy, after the victory of the Entente, Mushanov accepted the posts of minister of social welfare, railways, interior, and health in the first agrarian government after the war. He resigned in June 1919 because he opposed the autocratic governments of Aleksandur Stamboliyski. Arrested during the increasing dictatorship of Stamboliyski, Mushanov was not released until the coup of June 1923.

In the 1920s Mushanov worked as an attorney. On 12 October 1931, after the resignation of Malinov, Mushanov became head of a coalition cabinet formed with the Agrarians and the Liberals. On 14 May 1934 he announced his resignation and failed to fulfill the mission of forming a new cabinet. His government was de facto dismissed during the bloodless coup of 18 May 1934, but Mushanov kept his parliamentary seat. He was again elected to the parliament in the 1938 elections, which were manipulated by the tsarist camarilla. During World War II he was in opposition to the pro-German governments of Georgi Kioseivanov and Bogdan Filov, but he accepted the Bulgarian territorial gains of 1940–41: Macedonia, Southern Dobruja, and a part of Thrace. From the beginning of 1943 onwards Mushanov increasingly called for an agreement with the Allies. He maintained correct relations with Soviet diplomats in Sofia but refused to join the Fatherland Front, considering it openly pro-Soviet and hoping that Tsar Boris III would bring about an agreement with the Allies. At the beginning of September 1944 the regents considered entrusting Mushanov with the mission of forming a government, but he eventually joined the government of Konstantin Muraviev as minister without portfolio. After the coup of 9 September 1944 Mushanov was arrested and sentenced to life imprisonment. On the anniversary of the September coup he was released under an amnesty and again joined the Democratic Party, for which he was placed under house arrest in the countryside. Mushanov was murdered by the security services. In 1992 his Spomeni: Dnevnik (Memoirs) were published in Bulgaria. (WR)

Sources: Entsiklopediya Bulgariya, vol. 4 (Sofia, 1984); Marshall Lee Miller, Bulgaria during the Second World War (Stanford, 1975); Stephane Groueff, Crown of Thorns (Lanham, Md., 1987); Jerzy Jackowicz, Partie opozycyjne w Bułgarii 1944–1948 (Warsaw, 1997); Tasho Tashev, Ministrite na Bulgariya 1879–1999: Entsiklopedichen Spravochnik (Sofia, 1999).

MÜÜRISEPP Aleksei (4 July 1902, Valta–7 October 1970, Tartu), Estonian Communist activist. Müürisepp's father was a sailor. In 1908, along with his parents, he was deported into the depths of Russia. He initially lived in Siberia. From 1924 to 1926 he served in the Red Army. Having completed his military service, he joined the Bolshevik party and was assigned to work in the trade unions. After graduating from the Tomsk Railway Electromechanical Engineering Institute in 1937, Müürisepp worked on the railways in Ordzonikidze and Krasnoyarsk (1942–44). He went to Estonia in 1944 and rose rapidly through the ranks of the Communist Party (Bolshevik) of Estonia (CP[B]E), becoming secretary of its Central Committee (CC) (1948–49). After Johannes Käbin came to power, Müürisepp became one of Käbin's closest associates. From 1949 to 1951 he was deputy prime minister; from 29 March 1951 to 12 October 1961 he was prime minister of the Estonian SSR; from 1952 to 1966 he was a member of the CPSU CC; and from 1950 to 1962 he also held the portfolio of minister of foreign affairs of the Estonian SSR. Müürisepp conducted a purge of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the Estonian SSR, expelling many officials who had been trained by Hans Kruus, his predecessor, who was accused of nationalism. After leaving the post of prime minister, Müürisepp became chairman of the Supreme Soviet of the Estonian SSR and deputy chairman of the Supreme Soviet of the Soviet Union. He held these positions until the end of his life. In the final stage of his career, Müürisepp also served as a member of the Audit Commission of the CPSU and the USSR Supreme Soviet. He sat on the CC and on the Politburo of the Communist Party of Estonia until the end of his life. (AG)

Sources: Bolshaia Sovetskaia Entsiklopediia, vol. 17 (Moscow, 1974); Eesti Enstuklopeedia, vol. 14 (Tallinn, 2000); Romuald J. Misunas and Rein Taagepera, The Baltic States: The Years of Dependence, 1940–1970 (Berkeley, 1993); Eero Medijainen, "Foreign Ministry of the Estonian SSR," in Strona, "Okupatsioon Museum," www.okupatsioon.ee/english/overviews/index.html.

N

NAGY Ferenc (8 October 1903, Bisse–12 June 1979, Fairfax, Virginia), Peasant Party politician and prime minister of Hungary. Born into a peasant family, for many years Nagy worked as a farmer. In 1923 he joined the first Party of Smallholders, founded by Istvan Szabó Nagyatádi. In 1929 he published an article on political discrimination against peasants that made him popular in the Hungarian countryside. Since the Horthy authorities disregarded the demands of the peasants, Nagy left the party, which had become an appendage of the system, and with Zoltan Tildy he began to form a new Independent Smallholders' Party (ISP). The party was officially created on 12 October 1930 at a rally in Békés, and Nagy was elected its secretary general. Despite the pressure of the Horthysts, in the 1935 elections the party received 25 percent of the vote but only twenty-three seats in the parliament. Nagy was elected an MP. In September 1941 he also became the leader of the supraparty Peasant Union. After the defeat of the Hungarian Army at Voronezh in 1943, Nagy brought about an alliance between the peasant parties and the Social Democrats, in opposition to the Horthy policy.

On 17 April 1944 Nagy was arrested by the Gestapo in Pécs and was jailed in Budapest. The Horthy prison administration released him when the Arrow Cross Party took over power in mid-October 1944; the shift in administrations probably saved his life. Under the rule of Ferenc Szálasi, Nagy remained in hiding, but in January 1945 he started to revive his party in the Hungarian territory controlled by the Red Army. In the spring of 1945 Nagy became minister of reconstruction in the provisional coalition government and chairman of the National Cooperative Council. On 19 August 1945 he was again elected president of the ISP. After the ISP electoral victory of 4 November 1945, Nagy became president of parliament. When Prime Minister Zoltan Tildy assumed the presidency, on 3 February 1946 Nagy became the head of government. Despite the fact that the Smallholders had an absolute majority in parliament, Nagy's was a coalition government because of the demands of the Allied Control Commission, headed by Marshal Kliment Voroshilov. Deputy Prime Minister Mátyás Rákosi, the leader of the Communist Party, played a special role in this cabinet.

In the summer of 1946 Nagy held talks in Moscow and then in the United States, Great Britain, and France. The Communists, who controlled the departments of security and justice, made repeated attempts to undermine the position of the government and the Smallholders' Party through intrigues. They kept discovering a succession of "plots" against democracy, in which they finally entangled the secretary general of the Smallholders' Party, Béla Kovács. Nagy courageously defended his closest associate but could not prevent his arrest by Soviet services. In May 1947 Nagy went to Switzerland for a short holiday; there he learned that Kovács had been forced to testify against him. Rákosi demanded his resignation as prime minister, threatening that he could not otherwise guarantee the safety of his wife and five-year-old son, who had remained in Hungary. On 2 June 1947 Nagy resigned as head of government; having received an American visa, he left with his family for the United States.

In America Nagy bought a farm in Herndon, Virginia. He belonged to the Executive Committee of the Hungarian National Council, and in 1960 he joined the Hungarian Committee, in which he dealt with foreign affairs. As a representative of the committee, Nagy sat in the Assembly of Captive European Nations and in 1961–62 was its president. In 1948 Nagy published his memoirs, The Struggle behind the Iron Curtain, in the United States. The Hungarian edition came out in his homeland in 1990. (WR) Sources: Peter Horvath, "Communist Tactics in Hungary between June 1944 and June 1947," Ph.D. diss., New York University, 1955; Paul A. Homori, "Soviet Influences on the Establishment and Character of the Hungarian People's Republic 1944–1954," Ph.D. diss., University of Michigan, 1964; Csicsery-Rónay István, ed. *Nagy Ferenc miniszterelnök: Visszamelékezések, tanulmányok, cikkek (összeállította és a bevezetőt írta)*ed. (Budapest, 1995); Eric Roman, Hungary and the Victor Powers, 1945–1959 (New York, 1996); Steven Bela Vardy, Historical Dictionary of Hungary (Lanham, Md., 1997).

NAGY Imre (6 June 1896, Kaposvár–16 June 1958, Budapest), Hungarian Communist politician, leader of the revolution of 1956. Nagy's father was a court servant, an orderly in a comitat (county), and an employee of the telegraph service. After completing four grades of a gymnasium, Nagy was apprenticed to a locksmith. In 1915 he was conscripted into the army, and in the summer of the next year he was taken captive by the Russians. From June 1918 he fought in the civil war with the Red Guards. In February 1920 he joined the Bolshevik party, and in March 1921 he returned to Hungary and worked as a clerk in an insurance company in his hometown. Nagy took part in the work of a local organization of the Hungarian Social Democratic Party, but in 1925 he was expelled from the party. In 1927, because of his Communist activities, Nagy was arrested for a short period. After his release he emigrated to Vienna, but he repeatedly illegally returned to Hungary. On behalf of the Communist Party he organized activity among the peasants, and he was head of the Department for the Countryside for the party. At the Second Congress of the Hungarian Communist Party (HCP) in Moscow in 1930 Nagy was criticized for his "rightist deviation." From 1930 he lived in the USSR. He worked at the Institute for Agrarian Sciences, at the Communist International, at the Central Statistical Office of the USSR, and in 1939–44 he also worked at Moscow radio, where he was the editor of broadcasts in Hungarian. In those years Nagy published many works on agrarian issues. In 1936 he was expelled from the party, but in 1938 he had his membership reinstated.

In November 1944 Nagy returned to Hungary as a member of the leadership of the HCP. From December 1944 he was an MP to the Provisional National Assembly and later to parliament. In the Provisional National Government he was the minister of agriculture and carried out the parceling of land; then he served as interior minister in the coalition government until 20 March 1946. Later, he was one of the secretaries of the HCP. Between 1947 and 1949 Nagy was president of parliament. Between 1944 and 1949 he was a member of the Central Committee (CC) of the HCP and (from 1948) the Hungarian Workers' Party (HWP). In 1945–49 and 1951–55 he was a member of the party's Politburo. Nagy did not support the rapid collectivization of agriculture nor the persecution of "kulaks." Nagy performed a self-criticism, but in 1949 he was openly denounced by Stalin, and he was excluded from the leadership of the party. Until the summer of 1950 Nagy lectured at the Hungarian Agricultural Academy in Budapest. It was then that he was appointed head of the Administrative Department of the CC of the HWP. From 1950 he was a corresponding member, and between 1953 and 1955 a full member, of the Hungarian Academy of Sciences. From December 1950 he was minister of food supply; from January 1952 he held the post of purchasing minister; and from November 1952 he served as deputy prime minister.

After Stalin's death, on 4 July 1953 at the initiative of the Soviet faction of Georgy Malenkov, Nagy became prime minister. He attempted then to implement moderate economic reforms that aimed at the improvement of public provision. For example, the negative attitude toward the individual agriculturalist was moderated, and collectivization was slowed down; moreover, forced labor camps began to be eliminated, and some political prisoners were released. On 18 April 1955 Nagy was dismissed as prime minister, and in December he was also expelled from the party and stripped of his academic degrees. These steps were connected with Malenkov's departure from the post of prime minister of the USSR. Nagy did not want to recant and stuck to his program. He was considered a leading politician of the party opposition against the Stalinists. On 13 October 1956 he was readmitted to the party. His academic degrees were given back to him as well.

On 23 October 1956, at the demands of demonstrators in Budapest, Nagy became a member of the supreme party leadership, and he was reinstated as prime minister. Acting as premier, on the one hand, Nagy wanted the HWP authorities and the Soviet leadership to recognize the main aims of the revolution, but on the other hand, he attempted to curb the demonstrators' demands, which he felt were excessive. As Nagy increasingly identified with the demonstrators, on 28 October he announced a cease-fire, moved for the withdrawal of Soviet troops from Hungarian territory, and declared the introduction of a multiparty system. Despite the cease-fire, Soviet troops continued to arrive in Hungary, so on 1 November Nagy declared Hungary's neutrality and its withdrawal from the Warsaw Pact. On the morning of 4 November the Soviet troops attacked Budapest. Nagy took refuge in the Yugoslav Embassy. On 22 November he left the embassy, as he was granted a safe-conduct by the Soviet-installed provisional government of János Kádár; nonetheless, he was seized by the Soviet services and deported to the town of Snagov in Romania. Arrested there on 14 April 1957, Nagy was returned to Budapest. He did not want to resign as prime minister in favor of Kádár and would not renounce the idea of the revolution; had he done so, it might have saved his life.

By a resolution of the CC of the Hungarian Socialist Workers' Party on 21 December 1956, a political case was instituted against Nagy. After repeated postponements of a trial, on 15 June 1958 the People's Judicial Council of the Supreme Court accused Nagy, as the political leader at the time, of "counterrevolution," of initiating and directing the 1956 events, and of high treason; it then sentenced him to death. Nagy denied all the accusations, and he declined to defend himself. Nor did he ask for a pardon. The sentence was executed in the National Prison in Budapest. Nagy's body was put in an unmarked grave there, and in 1961 his remains were taken to the Rákoskeresztúr Municipal Cemetery and buried in plot 301. In the spring of 1989, under pressure from democratic forces, his remains were exhumed, and on 16 June 1989 they were reburied in the same place, along with the remains of his associates in martyrdom. The funeral ceremonies became a symbolic breakthrough during the democratic transformations in Hungary. (JT)

Sources: The Times, 18 June 1958; The Counterrevolutionary Conspiracy of Imre Nagy and His Accomplices (Budapest, 1958); The Truth about the Nagy Affair: Facts, Documents, Comments (London, 1959); Méray Tibor, Thirteen Days That Shook the Kremlin (New York, 1959); Tóbiás Áron, In memoriam Nagy Imre: Emlékezés egy miniszterelnökre. Válogatta, szerkesztette és a bevezetőket szövegeit írta (Budapest, 1989); Méray Tibor, Nagy Imre élete és halála (Budapest, 1989); Aleksander Nawrocki, Jak zamordowano Imre Nagya? (Warsaw, 1990); 1956 kézikönyve, vol. 3 (Megtorlás és Emlékezés) (Budapest, 1996); Nagy Képes Milleniumi Arcképcsarnok (Budapest, 1999); A magyar forradalom és szabadságharc enciklopédiája, CD-ROM (Budapest, 1999).

NAJDER Zdzisław (31 October 1930, Warsaw), Polish historian of literature and politician. Najder graduated in philosophy and Polish studies from Warsaw University in 1954. In 1969 he received a Ph.D. and in 1977 his postdoctoral degree. He worked at the Institute of Literary Studies of the Polish Academy of Sciences (1952–57), published in Twórczość (1957–81), and lectured in the United States and Great Britain. An outstanding expert on Joseph Conrad, in 1976 Najder founded and until 1981 chaired the Polish Alliance for Independence (Polskie Porozumienie Niepodległościowe [PPN]), a secret organization that published analyses and essays shaping the political thought of the democratic opposition in the spirit of full independence and democracy. Najder worked closely with the Paris monthly Kultura (writing there under the pen name “Socjusz”). From 1977 he was harassed by the security services. When martial law was introduced in Poland on 13 December 1981, Najder was in Great Britain. Warned by the British Foreign Ministry that an investigation concerning the PPN was under way, he stayed in the West. From April 1982 to March 1987 Najder was head of the Polish Section of Radio Free Europe. In May 1983 he was sentenced to death in absentia and deprived of his Polish citizenship. After this sentence was annulled in 1989, Najder returned to Poland in February 1990. He joined the Civic Committee of the Chairman of Solidarity and managed its activities. In October 1990 he became the formal chairman of the committee. As a follower of Lech Wałęsa, Najder played an important role during the so-called war at the top between the followers of Wałęsa and those of Tadeusz Mazowiecki. In 1991 Najder belonged to the Advisory Committee of President Wałęsa. In 1992 he headed the group of advisers of Prime Minister Jan Olszewski, and then he chaired the Civic Institute in Warsaw. In 1992 Najder fell a political victim of the lustration for having signed an agreement to contact the security services in 1958. These contacts had been rare, and he broke them off in 1963. In the 1990s Najder was a professor at the University of Opole. Najder authored Nad Conradem (On Conrad; 1965); Życie Conrada-Korzeniowskiego (The life of Conrad-Korzeniowski; 1980); the collections of essays Ile jest dróg? (How many ways? 1982) and Wymiary polskich spraw 1982–1990 (Dimensions of Polish affairs 1982–1990; 1990); and a diary of the years 1990–92, Jaka Polska: Co i komu doradzałem? (What kind of Poland: What and whom did I advise? 1993). Najder also published, in English, Joseph Conrad: A Chronicle (1983) and Conrad in Perspective (1997), and he edited a number of studies on Conrad. (AF)

Sources: Nowa encyklopedia powszechna PWN, vol. 4 (Warsaw, 1996); Opozycja w PRL: Słownik biograficzny 1956–89, vol. 1 (Warsaw, 2000); Kto jest kim w Polsce (Warsaw, 2001); Antoni Dudek, Pierwsze lata III Rzeczypospolitej 1989–2001 (Kraków, 2002).

NANO Fatos (16 September 1952, Tirana), Albanian politician. The son of a journalist and director of Albanian Radio and Television, in 1975 Nano graduated in economics from the University of Tirana. He worked as an economist in the Elbasan Iron Mill and later at the Institute of Marxist-Leninist Studies of the Central Committee of the (Communist) Albanian Labor Party (ALP). From 1981 he worked as an economist at Priska, but he returned to the institute in 1984, at the same time lecturing in the Department of Economics of the University of Tirana. Nano started his political career in 1990 as general secretary of the Council of Ministers. In January 1991 he became deputy prime minister and minister of foreign trade, and on 22 February 1991, prime minister of the so-called government of reform. In an interview for The Independent he stated, “I am not a Stalinist, I am neither a Maoist nor a follower of Pol Pot. In fact, I am an Albanian and I want to integrate Albania with Europe.” In the short run Nano could not uphold the credibility of the totalitarian party, so on 5 June 1991 he resigned and was elected head of the post-Communist Albanian Socialist Party (Partia Socialiste Shqipërisë [PSS]).

At the first national PSS conference, Nano rejected the idea of a continuation of the ALP line and refused to bear responsibility for Hoxha’s regime and its crimes.” In 1992 Nano was elected an MP from Kuçovë. On 28 February 1993 the parliament, dominated by the Albanian Democratic Party, deprived Nano of immunity, and on 3 April 1994 a Tirana court sentenced him to twelve years in prison for forging documents and the embezzlement of foreign aid funds. In November 1995 the Supreme Court reduced the sentence to four years. Nano served the sentence in Benca Prison, near Tepelene. In August 1996, while still in jail, he was elected the PSS leader again. During a deep political crisis, caused by the collapse of the financial pyramid schemes, on 4 March 1997 President Sali Berisha amnestied Nano. He was elected an MP from the Tepelene district, and after a victorious election, on 23 July 1997 Nano resumed duties as prime minister. On 2 October 1998 he resigned, after demonstrations connected with the death of Azem Hajdari, but he retained the PSS leadership. In February 1999 Nano gave up the PSS chairmanship, but he also caused the resignation of his successor, Pendeli Majko. In January 2002 Nano caused another crisis, forcing the dismissal of another PSS prime minister, Ilir Meta. (TC)

Sources: Elez Biberaj, Shqipëria ne tranzicion: Rruga e vësh-trisë drejt Demokracisë (Tirana, 2001); Miranda Vickers and James Pettifor, Albania: From Anarchy to a Balkan Identity (New York, 1997); Bugajski; www.rulers.org.

NARUTOWICZ Gabriel (17 March 1865, Telshe [Telšiai, Telsze], Samogitia region–16 December 1922, Warsaw), hydraulic engineer, first president of Poland. Narutiwucz came from a landed gentry family. He attended a German classical high school in Libau (Liepāja) from 1873 to 1883 and subsequently studied at the Department of Physics and Mathematics of St. Petersburg University but discontinued his studies for health reasons. In the spring of 1886 he went to Davos, Switzerland, for treatment. In the fall of 1886 he commenced studies at the Department of Civil Engineering of the Technical University in Zurich and graduated with distinction in March 1891. While a student, Narutowicz became loosely affiliated with an émigré group of the Second Proletariat Party; consequently, in 1889 he could not return to his country because the tsarist authorities issued a warrant for his arrest. In 1891 Narutowicz started his professional career. In 1895 he received Swiss citizenship. He soon won international recognition as a water power engineer. In 1907 he was appointed to the chair of Hydropower Engineering of the Technical University, Zurich. He established his own design office, which supervised the construction of water power plants in Austria, Spain, Switzerland, and Italy. He designed the Mühleberg hydroelectric power plant on the Aare River, one of the biggest and most modern hydroelectric plants at that time in Europe. He also designed an electricity plant powered by the water from melting glaciers; such a design was then an absolute novelty. Although Narutowicz's return to Poland prevented the implementation of this project, the idea was put into practice in Switzerland in 1955. In 1911 Narutowicz initiated river engineering works in Galicia. From 1913 to 1920 he held various positions, including that of dean of the School of Engineering at the Technical University, Zurich, and member of the Water Management Commission at the Department of Home Affairs of the Federal Council. He became a Swiss delegate to the International Commission for the Regulation of the Rhine in 1914 and chairman of the commission in 1915.

In 1914 Narutowicz established the Polish Mutual Aid Committee in Zurich, and in 1915 he became a member of the Committee for Aid to War Victims in Poland, which was founded by (among others) Henryk Sienkiewicz. Narutowicz initially supported the notion that Poland should regain independence without siding with any of the states that had partitioned it. He gave lectures and wrote press articles. He was a member of the La Pologne et la Guerre Society in Lausanne and a member of the editorial staff of the Polish Encyclopedia Publishers. He finally became an adherent of the ideas promoted by Józef Piłsudski. Narutowicz was responsible for money sent from the United States for the Polish Legions and was in charge of their press bureaus in Bern and Rapperswil. In January 1917 he expressed in print his disappointment with the policies of the Entente states and expressed his support for the Central Powers. However, he rejected political proposals from Germany. After the outbreak of the revolution in Russia, he again became a supporter of the Entente.

In July 1919 Narutowicz became a consultant to the Polish Ministry of Public Works and participated in various projects, including that of channeling the Vistula River. As minister of public works (June 1920–June 1922), he reorganized his ministry and successfully initiated the enactment of many laws, including pioneering water management and electricity laws. He also brought about the construction of numerous civil engineering projects. From 1920 to 1922 Narutowicz was the first president of the newly established Academy of Technical Sciences, and he was chairman of the National Reconstruction Council in 1921. Appointed by the government as a delegate for the incorporation of the Wilno (Vilnius) region, in 1922 Narutowicz went there to calm the anti-government sentiments. In April 1922 he became Poland's delegate to an international conference in Genoa at which postwar political and economic relations in Europe were discussed. In June 1922 Narutowicz became minister of foreign affairs. He drafted a proposal for the autonomy of Eastern Galicia. Considered a supporter of Piłsudski, to whom he was related by affinity, Narutowicz wanted to tighten relations with Romania and develop economic cooperation with Soviet Russia. He was a member of the Wolność Przywrócona (Restored Freedom) Masonic lodge, which belonged to the Grand National Lodge.

In November 1922 Narutowicz ran in the elections to the Assembly on the ticket of the National Union in the Polish Eastern Territories, a party supported by Piłsudski, but he lost. On 8 December 1922 Stanisław Thugutt, chairman of the Polish Peasant Party–Liberation (Polskie Stronnictwo Ludowe–Wyzwolenie [PSL–Liberation]), proposed Narutowicz as a presidential candidate. Narutowicz initially refused, declaring his support for Stanisław Wojciechowski, but finally he agreed to stand. Narutowicz's candidacy was one of five submitted on 9 December 1922. Elected in the fifth round of voting with support from the left-wing and centrist parties and the national minorities, Narutowicz defeated Count Maurycy Zamoyski, the representative of the right-wing parties. Narutowicz's election met with an attack by the right-wing parties, particularly the National Democrats. Accusations were made that he had been elected by the vote of the national minorities, mainly Jews. Attempts were made to prevent him from taking the presidential oath in the Assembly. Some politicians, including Wincenty Witos, suggested that Narutowicz renounce this election. On 11 December 1922 Narutowicz was sworn in, and on 14 December he took over power from Piłsudski. On 16 December 1922 at the opening of an art exhibit in the Zachęta Society of Fine Arts in Warsaw, Narutowicz was assassinated by Eligiusz Niewiadomski, a mentally disturbed painter and fanatic supporter of National Democracy. Narutowicz is buried in the crypt of St. John's Cathedral in Warsaw. (JS)

Sources: PSB, vol. 22; Kto był kim w Drugiej Rzeczypospolitej (Warsaw, 1994); Tadeusz Hołówko, Prezydent Gabriel Narutowicz: Życie i działalność (Warsaw, 1924); Marek Ruszczyk, Pierwszy prezydent Gabriel Narutowicz (Warsaw, 1967); Franciszek Bernaś, Gabriel Narutowicz (Warsaw, 1979); Prezydenci i premierzy Drugiej Rzeczypospolitej (Wrocław, 1992); Janusz Pajewski and Waldemar Łazuga, Gabriel Narutowicz: Pierwszy prezydent Rzeczypospolitej (Warsaw, 1993); Ludwik Hass, Masoneria polska XX wieku (Warsaw, 1996).

NĂSTASE Adrian (22 June 1950, Bucharest), Romanian lawyer and politician. In 1973 Năstase graduated in law from the University of Bucharest, and then he worked at the Institute of Legal Studies (ILS). In 1978 he also graduated in sociology. In 1987 he received a Ph.D. at the ILS. In 1977–79 and 1984–85 Năstase lectured in international public law at the Academy of Economic Studies in Bucharest. He spent the years 1980–82 on scholarships in Great Britain and Norway. He worked at the UNESCO Department of Human Rights and Peace in London and at the International Institute of Peace Studies in Oslo. A member of the Romanian Association of Scholars, in 1982 Năstase went to France, where he became director of the International Institute of Human Rights in Strasbourg and researcher at the French Society on International Law in Paris. Accepted by the Nicolae Ceaușescu regime, Năstase was loyal to it.

After the fall of Ceaușescu, in 1990 Năstase began a political career in the National Salvation Front (Frontul Sălbări Naționale [FSN]). He became an MP and was foreign minister until December 1992. From 1992 to 1996 he chaired the Chamber of Deputies of the Romanian parliament. After the FSN split in 1992, Năstase remained in the group supporting Ion Iliescu; it created the Democratic National Salvation Front (Frontul Democrat Salvări Naționale), turned in 1993 into the Party of Social Democracy in Romania (Partidul Democrației Sociale din România [PDSR]). In 1993–97 Năstase was the PDSR chairman. In 1994 he lectured on international public law at the Sorbonne in Paris. In 1994 he initiated a parliamentary coalition of the PDSR with extreme nationalists and Communist members of the former nomenklatura. The coalition lasted until the end of 1995. Năstase was one of the closest aides of President Iliescu. When the PDSR lost the elections of November 1996, in 1997 Năstase was elected deputy chairman of his party and a member of the Romanian delegation to the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe. He criticized the NATO air raids on the new Yugoslavia in 1999, as well as concessions of the reform government to the Romanian Hungarians. When the PDSR won the parliamentary elections and Iliescu won the presidency again, on 28 December 2000 Năstase became prime minister. His government announced the creation of a “socially oriented” market economy, a struggle against corruption, and efforts toward Romania's integration into NATO and the European Union. In early 2001 Năstase was elected the PDSR chairman, replacing Iliescu, who resigned from the party.

Năstase authored more than 150 books and articles on international law and international relations, including the following: The Right to Peace (1991); Drepturile omului: Religia secolului viitor (Human rights: The religion of the future century; 1992); Drepturile omului, societatea civilă, diplomația parlamentară: Idei, acțiuni, evoluție (Human rights, civil society, parliamentary diplomacy: Ideas, actions, evolution; 1994); and Lupta pentru viitor (The struggle for the future; 2000). Năstase held numerous positions in Romanian and international research societies, including the Euro-Atlantic Center in Bucharest, the Institute of East-West Security Studies in New York, and the American Association of International Law. (LW)

Sources: Józef Darski, Rumunia: Historia, współczesność, konflikty narodowe (Warsaw, 1995); Tom Gallagher, Romania after Ceausescu (Edinburgh, 1995); Ion Alexandrescu, Ion Bulei, Ion Mamina, and Ioan Scurtu, Enciclopedia de istorie României (Bucharest, 2000); David Phinnemore, Post-Communist Romania (New York, 2001); Bugajski; www.cidob.org; www.rulers.org; www.guv.ro.

NATLAČEN Marko (24 April 1886, Manče–13 October 1942, Ljubljana), Slovene politician. Natlačen completed law studies in Vienna. He subsequently became an activist of the Slovene People's Party and the president of Orel (Eagle), a conservative organization of Slovene Catholic youth. From September 1935 to April 1941 he served as governor (ban) of Drava Province (banovina), which comprised Slovenia. On 6 April 1941, after the German invasion of Yugoslavia, Natlačen established the National Council of Slovenia (Narodni Svet z Sloveniju), which sought autonomy for Slovenia under Italian tutelage. He wanted to extract some political concessions from the Italian occupiers, so he joined the Consultative Council of Ljubljana Province, established by the Italians, but he did not achieve much. Trying to prevent Italian persecutions, Natlačen destroyed the lists—in his possession—that included the names of members and supporters of the Communist Party. Despite his efforts, Natlačen was regarded as a traitor both by the Conservatives and by the Communists, and he was murdered by Communist security agents. (WR)

Sources: Enciklopedija Slovenije, vol. 7 (Ljubljana, 1993); Leopoldina Plut-Progelj and Carole Rogel, Historical Dictionary of Slovenia (Lanham, Md., 1996).

NAZARUK Osyp (31 August 1883, Nahiryanka, near Buchach—31 March 1940, Kraków), Ukrainian lawyer, politician, and journalist. Born into a family of peasants and craftsmen, Nazaruk was refused admission to all high schools in Galicia for taking part in democratic organizations and leftist student groups (1899–1904). In 1902 he finally graduated from high school in Lemberg (Lwów, Lviv), and he later studied in Vienna, earning a Ph.D. in law (1908). Nazaruk was a member of the executive of the Ukrainian Radical Party (URP) from 1905 to 1919 and co-edited Hromadsky Holos from 1916 to 1918. He became famous as a gifted rally speaker. From 1915 to 1918 Nazaruk served as director of the press bureau of the Ukrainian Sich Riflemen's Legion. A member of the Ukrainian National Rada (Council) of the Western Ukrainian National Republic (Zakhidno-Ukrayins'ka Narodna Republika [ZUNR]), he was delegated to negotiate with Hetman Pavlo Skoropadskyi for assistance against Poland. After arriving in the Dnieper region in November 1918, as a member of the Sich Riflemen's Council, Nazaruk participated in the revolt against the hetman's regime in Belaya Tserkov (Bila Tserkva). He held several positions in the first governments of the Ukrainian National Republic (UNR); for example, he directed the Ukrainian Telegraphic Agency and served as minister of press and propaganda. In early 1919 Nazaruk became aligned with Volodymyr Vynnychenko and began to doubt the effectiveness of democracy and evolving toward dictatorship. In mid-1919 Nazaruk became a close associate of Yevhen Petrushevych, dictator of the ZUNR, and he contributed to Strilets, an organ of the Ukrainian Galician Army.

From 1920 to 1922 Nazaruk edited the official periodicals of the ZUNR government-in-exile in Vienna and was subsequently sent to Canada, where he represented this government for the Ukrainians in exile (1922–23). Influenced by Vyacheslav Lypynskyi, Nazaruk definitely abandoned his democratic views. In 1923–26 he was in the United States, where he edited Sich in Chicago and co-edited Ameryka in Philadelphia, both of which were Conservative press organs. After returning to Lwów, Nazaruk became aligned with Bishop Hryhoriy Khomyshyn, and from 1928 to 1939 he served as editor-in-chief of Nova Zoria, a periodical of the Ukrainian Christian Organization. In 1930 Nazaruk was a founding member of the Ukrainian Catholic People's Party (Ukrayinska Katolytska Narodna Partiya), a party of Ukrainian Conservatives in Poland. He promoted the idea of Ukraine as a “synthesis” of the East and the West, expressed in Eastern-rite Catholicism. In the 1930s Nazaruk was the leading journalist of the Ukrainian Catholic press in Poland. He sought cooperation with Polish Conservatives and strove for a change in the Polish government's policies toward the Ukrainians. In October 1939 he moved from Lwów to Warsaw and later to Kraków, where he died. Nazaruk authored his memoirs, Slidamy USS (Tracing the Ukrainian Sich Riflemen; 1916) and Rik na Velykiy Ukraini (One year in the Great Ukraine; 1920); the historical novels Kniaz Iaroslav Osmomysl (1920) and Roksoliana (1930); and sociopolitical brochures and reports. In the memoirs Zi Lvova do Varshavy (From Lviv to Warsaw; 1995), written on the eve of the fall of the Second Republic of Poland, Nazaruk sharply criticized the policies of the Polish state toward national minorities. (TS)

Sources: Ryszard Torzecki, Kwestia ukraińska w Polsce w latach 1923–1929 (Warsaw, 1989); Ivan Lysiak-Rudnytskyi, “Nazaruk i Lypynskyi,” in Ivan Lysiak-Rudnytskyi, Istorychni ese, vol. 2 (Lviv, 1996); M. Shwahulak, “Osyp Nazaruk i jego ‘ucieczka’ przed Sowietami,” in Osyp Nazaruk, Ucieczka ze Lwowa do Warszawy (Przemyśl, 1999).

NAZOR Vladimir (30 May 1876, Postire, island of Brač—19 June 1949, Zagreb), Croatian poet and writer. In 1906 Nazor completed studies in the natural sciences at Graz. In his early volumes—Slavenske legende (Slavic Legends; 1910), Živana (1902), Lirika (Lyric poetry; 1910), Hrvatski kraljevi (Croatian kings; 1912), and Nove pjesme (New poems; 1913)—he drew on national history and sought inspiration from biblical, Greek, Roman, and Slavic mythology. Nazor was regarded as a spiritual leader for the supporters of a common state of Southern Slav peoples, but under the influence of World War I he abandoned the role of bard of the Yugoslav people. For many years Nazor worked in schools in Split, Pazin, Zadar, Koper, Kastav, Zagreb, Sušak, and Crikvenica. After retiring in 1931, he lived in Zagreb. At the end of 1942 he made his way from Ustasha-controlled Zagreb to the Partisans led by Josip Broz Tito. The daring feat of the aged poet became a legend in the Communist movement. In 1943 Nazor became the first chairman of the Zagreb Anti-Fascist Council for the National Liberation of Croatia (Zagrebačko Antifašističko Vijeće Narodnog Oslobođenja Hrvatske [ZAVNOH]). Nazor's war experiences brought about a new period in his writing: he wrote poems about the Partisan movement, including Legende o drugu Titu (The legends of Comrade Tito; 1946). After the war, Nazor served as speaker of the Communist-dominated Croatian National Assembly until the end of his life. Nazor's other major works include the collections Intima (1915), Pjesme ljuvene (Love poems; 1915), Niza od koralja (String of beads; 1922), Pjesme o četiri arhandjela (poems about four archangels; 1927), Pjesme o bratu gavanu i seki siromaštini (Poems about a rich brother and a poor sister; 1931), and Pjesme u šikari, iz močvare i na usjevima (Poems about brushwood, from swamps, and over crops; 1931), as well as novels, including Krvavi dani (Bloody days; 1908), Veli Jože (Big Jože; 1908), and Pastir Loda (Loda the Shepherd; 1938–39). Some of his novellas and stories, including Priče iz djetinstva (Childhood stories; 1924), include autobiographical elements. Nazor also translated literary classics, including William Shakespeare and Dante Alighieri. (AO)

Sources: Tode Čolak, Vladimir Nazor (Belgrade, 1966); Mały słownik pisarzy zachodnio-słowiańskich i południowo-słowiańskich (Warsaw, 1973); Šime Vučetić, Vladimir Nazor: Čovjek i pisac (Zagreb, 1976).

NEDIĆ Milan (20 August 1877, Grocka–4 February 1946, Belgrade), Serbian general and politician. After graduating from a military academy, Nedić distinguished himself as the commander of Serbian units during the Balkan Wars and in World War I. In the Yugoslav kingdom he was the commander of a regiment, a brigade, and an army. Then he was chief of the General Staff and minister for military affairs. In this role he supported a right-wing Serbian organization called Zbor. In 1937 he published his memoirs, Srpska vojska na albanskoj Golgoti (The Serbian Army on the Albanian Golgotha). In April 1941 Nedić was commander in the Yugoslav defensive war against Germany. After the capitulation, on 20 August 1941 he accepted the German offer and became head of the puppet Serbian government. He hoped that it would moderate the German policy of terror toward Serbs and stop the cruelties that the Serbs had suffered at the hands of the Croatian Ustashe. Nedić's collaboration did not help much, although he was able to refuse German demands to send Serbian units to war against the Allies. His administration lacked authority. Both the Chetniks of General Dragoljub (Draža) Mihailović, linked with the Yugoslav government-in-exile in London, and the Communists of Josip Broz Tito commanded greater respect in the region. Before the invasion of Belgrade by the Red Army Nedić fled to Austria but was imprisoned by the Allies and delivered to Tito's Communist government in September 1945. After many weeks of questioning, Nedić allegedly committed suicide by jumping out of a prison window. Most probably, however, the Communists wanted to prevent him from testifying in public hearings. If there were a trial, Nedić might have told about the cooperation of the Communists with the German invaders in the period between April and June 1941, when the German-Soviet friendship was still in force. (WR)

Sources: Milan Nedić, Ratni govori Milana Nedicia srpskom narodu (Belgrade, 1942); Constantin Fotitch, The War We Lost (New York, 1948); Anđelka Cvijić and Milenko Vasović, eds., Milan Nedić: Život, govori, saslušanja (Belgrade, 1991).

NEGOVANI Kristo (1875, Negovani, near Florina–12 February 1905, Negovani), Albanian Orthodox priest and national martyr. The son of a merchant from the Albanian-Macedonian border, Negovani completed five grades of high school in Athens. His father was killed by the Haiduks (frontier guards); therefore, Negovani began to earn his own living at the age of sixteen. He first worked as a village teacher and later as a laborer at the Romanian port of Brăila. It was there that he met representatives of the Albanian revival movement. Encouraged to take up patriotic work, he returned to his native village and was ordained an Orthodox priest. Negovani was one of the first clergymen to celebrate the liturgy in Albanian in his country. He also pursued intensive educational work. He published, among other things, the Albanian-language periodicals Drita and Kalendari Kombiar. Negovani's activities brought him to the attention of Greek and Bulgarian nationalists and the Turkish authorities. In August 1902 the village of Negovani was attacked by Bulgarian partisans and in October 1903 by Greek partisans, who unsuccessfully attempted to discourage Negovani from continuing his work. In 1904 he was briefly detained in Monastir (now Bitola, Macedonia). On 10 February 1905 the village of Negovani was attacked by another unit of Greek andartes, and Negovani was murdered along with dozens of the villagers. Negovani's publications include the verse stories Prishja e Hormovës (The destruction of Hormovës; 1903) and the prose collections I vogli Dho- nat Argjendi (Little Dhonat Argjendi; 1904) and I drunjtë kryq (Wooden cross; 1906). Negovani's importance even increased after his death, as he became a symbol of martyrdom for the national cause. (WR) Sources: Biographisches Lexikon, vol. 3; Dhimitër Fullani, "Papa Kristo Negovani," Bulletin Universitetit Shkopje, 1960, no. 2; Hysni Myzyri, Shkollat e para kombëtare shqipe (Tirana, 1973).

NEJEDLÝ Zdeněk (10 February 1878, Litomyšl, Svitavy district–9 March 1962, Prague), Czech historian, musicologist, and Communist activist. Nejedlý studied history and esthetics at the Department of Philosophy of the Czech university in Prague, and he also privately studied the theory of music. In 1905 he became an associate professor and in 1919 a full professor of music in the Department of Philosophy of Charles University. From 1903 Nejedlý was a member of the Royal Bohemian Society of Sciences and in 1907 a member of the Czech Academy of Sciences and Arts. He was primarily engaged in the music culture of the Hussite period, to which he devoted the monographs Počátky husitského zpěvu (The origins of Hussite songs; 1907) and Dějiny husitského zpěvu za válek husitských (The history of Hussite songs during the Hussite wars; 1913). The author of the four-volume work Bedřich Smetana (1924–33), Nejedlý also dealt with contemporary music and criticism, and he often passed subjective and unfair judgments—for example, concerning Antonín Dvořák and Leoš Janaček. He wrote the extensive but unfinished Všeobecné dějiny hudby (A general history of music; 1916–30), Opera Národního divadla do roku 1900 (The National Theater opera until 1900; 1933), and Opera Národního divadla od roku 1900 do převratu (The National Theater opera from 1900 until the coup; 1936). He also dealt with the history of Czech culture and politics.

Initially Nejedlý was a member of the left wing of the Czech Progressive Party, known as the realist movement, and later he supported the Socialist Party. In 1921 he entered into cooperation with the Communist Party of Czechoslovakia (CPC). In 1924 he established the Society for Cultural and Economic Rapprochement with New Russia. From 1921 to 1930 he edited the cultural and political periodical Var, in which he promoted Communist ideas. In 1932 Nejedlý became chairman of the Leftist Front (Levá Fronta), an organization of the Czech leftist intelligentsia. After the outbreak of World War II, he went to the Soviet Union. He taught at the university in Moscow and at the Institute of History of the Soviet Academy of Sciences. He cooperated with the leadership of the CPC abroad, and in 1941 he became vice-chairman of the All-Slavonic Committee upon his return to Czechoslovakia. Nejedlý served as minister of education (1945–46), minister of labor and social welfare (1946–48), minister of education and art (1948–53), and minister without portfolio (1953). From January to September 1953 he also held the post of deputy prime minister. In 1946 he became a member of the CPC Central Committee (CC), and from 1946 to 1954 he was a member of the CC Presidium. One of the main Stalinist ideologues, Nejedlý became chairman of the Czechoslovak-Soviet Friendship Society in 1948. Nejedlý was the author of the theory of the "continuity of progressive traditions" from Hussitism to communism. He was instrumental in introducing Marxism-Leninism in education, research, and art. His name is associated with the 1948 reform of the school system, which introduced uniform, Soviet-style schools, and with political purges at the universities. From 1945 to 1952 Nejedlý served as chairman of the Czech Academy of Sciences and Arts. After the Czechoslovak Academy of Sciences was established in 1952, he became its chairman and held this post until the end of his life. (PU)

Sources: ČBS: Kdo byl kdo v našich dějinách ve 20. století, vol. 1 (Prague, 1998); A. Sychra, Estetika Zdeňka Nejedlého (Prague, 1956); Vratislav Busek and Nicholas Spulber, eds., Czechoslovakia (New York, 1957); Josef Korbel, The Communist Subversion of Czechoslovakia, 1938–1948 (Princeton, 1959); Vladimír Reisky de Dubnic, Communist Propaganda Methods: The Case of Czechoslovakia (New York, 1960); Edward Taborsky, Communism in Czechoslovakia, 1948–1960 (Princeton, 1961); Zdeněk Nejedlý: Doba-život-dílo (Prague, 1975); F. Červinka, Zdeněk Nejedlý (Prague, 1969); M. Ransdorf, Zdeněk Nejedlý (Prague, 1988).

NEKRASHEVICH Stsiapan (8 May 1883, Danilouka, near Mogilev [Mahilyow]–20 December 1937, Minsk), Belorussian linguist and social activist. Nekrashevich graduated from a teacher training college (1908) and from the Vilnius Teachers' Institute (1913). In 1914 he joined the Russian Army and fought on the Romanian front. After returning home in February 1917, he became involved in politics. He became a member of the Belorussian Socialist Hromada, and after its breakup in the spring of 1918, he joined the Belorussian Party of Socialist Revolutionaries. In the fall of 1917 he went to Odessa, where he organized cultural and educational activities for soldiers and refugees from Belorussia. After the Belorussian National Republic (BNR) proclaimed its independence on 25 March 1918, Nekrashevich became a representative of the BNR government in southern Ukraine. In agreement with the French military, which commanded the Entente forces, he attempted to form Belorussian military units to fight against the Bolsheviks. In 1920 Nekrashevich settled in Minsk and worked at the People's Commissariat of Education. He helped to establish the Institute of Belorussian

Culture and served as its director from 1922 to 1925. From 1926 to 1928 he was head of the Department of Arts of the Belorussian Academy of Sciences and head of the Commission for a Belorussian Dictionary. In 1928 Nekrashevich became vice-president of the Belorussian Academy of Sciences, and in 1929, director of the Institute of Linguistics. Arrested on charges of working for a nonexistent organization, the Belorussian Liberation Union, in 1930 Nekrashevich was sentenced to five years in exile in Siberia. In 1937 he was tried again and sentenced to death. Nekrashevich's publications include the following: Belaruska-raseyski slounik (Belorussian-Russian dictionary; 1925); Raseyska-belaruski slounik (Russian-Belorussian dictionary; 1928); Prahrama dlia zbirannia asablivastsey belaruskikh havorak i havorak perakhodnykh da susednikh movau (A program to study the peculiarities of local dialects of Belorussian and the transition dialects to neighboring languages; 1927); Mova knihi Kasiiana Rymlianina Eramity (The language of the Book of Cassian, the Roman hermit; 1928); and Praekt belaruskaha pravapisu (A project of Belorussian grammar; 1930). (EM)

Sources: MERSH, vol. 24; Entsyklopedyia historyi Bielarusi, vol. 5 (Minsk, 1997); I. Hermanovich, "Ab navukovai dzeinasti S. M. Nekrashevicha"; Vesnik BDU, 1972, series A, no. 3; Vitaut Kipel and Zora Kipel, eds., Byelorussian Statehood (New York, 1988); E. Yofe, "Pershy starshynia Inbelkultu," Spadchyna, 1995, no. 6; Rainer Lindner, Historiker und Herrschaft: Nationsbildung und Geschichtspolitik in Weissrussland im 19. und 20. Jahrhundert (Munich, 1999).

NÉMETH László (18 April 1901, Nagybánya [now Baia Mare, Romania]–3 March 1975, Budapest), Hungarian writer and journalist. Németh was born into a family of teachers and clerks. After graduating from high school in 1919, he studied Romance languages and literatures and medicine at the university in Budapest. After graduating in 1925, he opened a private dental practice. In 1925 Németh won a short story contest organized by the biweekly Nyugat, the most important Hungarian literary periodical of the first half of the twentieth century. From then on he devoted himself mainly to writing and literary criticism, becoming a leading contributor to Nyugat. In 1929 Németh developed tuberculosis. In 1932–37 he was the founder and then editor of and contributor to the periodical Tanú, becoming the leading ideologue of his generation. Németh believed that neither socialism nor capitalism could transform society; rather the moral rebirth of individuals was the only effective way toward an unrestrained association of free, educated, and financially independent people; Németh believed such a transformation was possible through the development of education, science, and art.

Németh described his proposal for this so-called third way in several books, including Magyarság és Európa (The Hungarians and Europe; 1935), A minőség forradalma (The revolution of quality; 1940), and Kisebbségben (In the minority, 2 vols.; 1942). From 1934 to 1935 Németh was in charge of Hungarian Radio's literary desk. In his novels—such as Gyász (Mourning; 1935), Bűn (1937; Guilt, 1966), and Az utolsó kísérlet (The Last Experiment; 1937–41)—Németh juxtaposed his vision of the "third way" with the reality of contemporary Hungary. He also addressed similar issues in his dramas.

Immediately after World War II, Németh concentrated his attention on the interdependences between the government and the nation, on the one hand, and among individuals, on the other. In the novels and dramas of that period he depicted a gallery of characters who, despite yielding to violence, were victorious in moral terms; examples include Széchenyi (1946), Iszony (1947; Revulsion, 1966), and Husz János (Jan Hus; 1948). At the peak of Socialist realism, Németh earned his living working as a teacher and translator. After 1953 he returned to historical writing. He wrote about (among others) Galileo Galilei, Emperor Joseph II, and Gandhi. In 1956 Németh became an executive member of the Association of Hungarian Writers, but he was not directly involved in the 1956 revolution. In 1957 he received the Kossuth Prize, the nation's highest award. In the 1960s he was engaged in writing essays and biographies, such as Sajkódi esték (Evenings at Sajkód; 1961) and Kísérletező ember (Experimenter; 1963). In 1970 Németh had a stroke that put an end to his writing career. Because of his frequent use of psychological analysis and the universality of his reflections, Németh is regarded as one of the greatest Hungarian writers of the twentieth century. (MS)

Sources: Steven Bela Vardy, Historical Dictionary of Hungary (Lanham, Md., 1997); Ferenc Grezsa, Németh László Tanú-korszaka (Budapest, 1990); István Lakatos, Naplóm Németh Lászlóról, 1963–1975 (Tatabánya, 1995); In memoriam Németh László, 1901–1975 (Nagybánya, 1995); István Lakatos, Életrajzi kronológia, vols. 1–2 (Budapest, 1997–98); Németh László irodalomszemlélet, ed. József Máriás (Debrecen, 1999); Tibor Tüskés, Az édenalapító: Írások Németh Lászlóról (Pécs, 2001).

NÉMETH Miklós (24 January 1948, Monok), Hungarian Communist activist and post-Communist politician. In 1971 Németh graduated from the Higher Economic School in Budapest. In 1971–77 he was a lecturer there. He spent 1974–75 on a scholarship at Harvard University. From 1977 to 1981 Németh was deputy head of a department in the State Planning Commission, and in 1976 he joined the Hungarian Socialist Workers' Party (HSWP). From 1981 he worked in the Department of Economic Policy of the HSWP Central Committee (CC); from 1983 he was its deputy head and from 1986, its head. In 1987 Németh became a CC member and CC secretary for economic policy. In May 1988, along with two other reformers, Rezső Nyers and Imre Pozsgay, Németh was included in the CC Politburo, and from June 1989 until the dissolution of the party he belonged to the four-man HSWP Presidium, along with Pozsgay, Nyers, and Károly Grósz.

From 23 November 1988 Németh was prime minister. He was suggested for this position by Grósz, who, assuming the position of the party's general secretary, counted on retaining control of the government. Németh soon realized that Hungary was on the brink of an economic disaster and needed radical change. He made use of the growing freedom within the Soviet policy of perestroika, as well as the confusion in the HSWP ranks, and he initiated systemic changes. He allowed spontaneous privatization, selling state property for a song and giving preferential access to it to party functionaries. During the funeral of Imre Nagy and his aides in June 1989, Németh was one of the four HSWP leaders invited to take part in the ceremony. In September 1989 his government opened the border with Austria to thousands of East German tourists who were escaping to the West. Therefore, along with the foreign minister, Gyula Horn, Németh contributed to the fall of the Berlin Wall. In October 1989 Németh was elected to the leadership of the (post-Communist) Hungarian Socialist Party (Magyar Szocialista Párt [MSP]), but two months later he left the party. An HSWP member of parliament from 1988 to 1990, in the elections of March 1990 Németh won a seat as an independent candidate. He resigned as prime minister on 23 May 1990, when a new cabinet was formed by József Antall, Jr. In 1991 Németh gave up his mandate and became one of the deputy chairmen of the European Bank of Reconstruction and Development in London. In 1999 he received an honorary doctorate from the Higher Economic School in Budapest. Upon his return to Hungary in 2000 Németh tried to return to political life, but in vain. (JT)

Sources: Magyar Nagylexikon, vol. 13 (Budapest, 2001); Ki kicsoda 2000 (Budapest, 2001); Timothy Garton Ash, We the People (Cambridge, 1990); Rudolf L. Tókes, Hungary's Negotiated Revolution: Economic Reforms, Social Change, and Political Succession, 1957–1990 (Cambridge, 1996); Bugajski.

NEYCHEV Mincho (23 March 1887, Stara Zagora–11 August 1956, Sofia), Bulgarian Communist activist. Neychev studied law and philosophy in Switzerland, earning a doctorate in 1908. After returning to Bulgaria in 1920, he joined the Bulgarian Communist Party (BCP). He ran a law practice and was a member of a BCP district committee in Stara Zagora. After an unsuccessful Communist coup in 1923, in which he participated, Neychev defended the Communists who were tried for taking part in the coup. During World War II he was arrested for his Communist activities. He was sent to the Kresto Pole camp, where he spent the years 1941–43. Released, he joined the Fatherland Front. After the coup of 9 September 1944, Neychev began his political career, organizing mass repressions against opponents of the Communist system. As minister of justice (September 1944–April 1946), he even increased show trial sentences passed on members of the prewar Bulgarian elite beyond those demanded by the Communist public prosecutors. As a reward, he was made a member of the Politburo of the BCP Central Committee (1949–54) and minister of foreign affairs (1950–56). From November 1946 to December 1947 Neychev served as minister of education; from 1947 to 1950 he was chairman of the Presidium of the Grand National Assembly and one of the main authors of a draft of the Communist constitution of 1947. Neychev was never brought to justice for his judicial crimes. (AG)

Sources: Entsiklopediya Bulgariya, vol. 4 (Sofia, 1984); Suvremenna Bulgarska Entsiklopediya, vol. 3 (Sofia, 1994); J. F. Brown, Bulgaria under Communist Rule (New York, 1970); Jerzy Tomaszewski, Bulgaria 1944–1971 (Warsaw, 1989); Jerzy Jackowicz, Partie opozycyjne w Bulgarii 1944–1948 (Warsaw, 1997).

NEYKOV Dimitur (21 May 1884, Tulcha, northern Dobrudja–16 February 1949, Sofia), Bulgarian politician. After graduating from high school in Ruse, Neykov studied philosophy at Sofia University but was expelled for taking part in student protests. At that time he was an activist in a student social democratic group. In 1905 he joined the Bulgarian Social Democratic Workers' Party (BSDWP). In 1908 he completed philosophical studies in Munich. After returning to Bulgaria, Neykov worked as a teacher in Dupnitsa and Burgas and as a school inspector in Sofia. He was also active in the cooperative movement, serving as chairman of the Napred (Forward) consumer cooperative in Sofia (1924–35), the Podslon (Protection) savings and building cooperative society, the People's Cooperative Banks Association, and the General Association of Popular Banks. After the end of World War I Neykov was a member of the Central Committee (CC) of the BSDWP (United) from 1919 to 1934 and the secretary of the BSDWP from 1923 to 1926. From 1920 to 1939 he was a deputy to the National Assembly.

Neykov condemned the coup d'état of 19 May 1934 and joined the legal opposition to the government of Tsar Boris III. In 1935 he entered into cooperation with leftist groups, including the Bulgarian Communist Party.

In 1938 he was tried for publicly offending the ruling dynasty of Sachsen-Coburg. In 1939, as a member of parliament, he visited the Soviet Union. Neykov was against Bulgaria's entry into World War II on the side of Germany. He helped to establish the Anti-Fascist People's Front and the Fatherland Front. He became chairman of the Sofia District Committee in 1943 and a member of the National Committee of the Fatherland Front in 1944. After the coup of 9 September 1944 Neykov became minister of trade, industry, and labor in the government of Kimon Georgiev (September–October 1944), minister of trade and industry (October 1944–March 1946), and minister of trade and supplies (March–November 1946). At the same time he strove to tighten relations between the BSDWP and other parties in the Fatherland Front. From 1945 to 1948—that is, until the BSDWP united with the Bulgarian (Communist) Workers' Party—Neykov served as secretary general of the BSDWP. From 1945 to 1946 he edited the periodical Narod. In 1946 he was a member of the Bulgarian delegation to the Paris Peace Conference, which set the terms and conditions of peace treaties with the Third Reich's satellites. From 1945 to 1946 Neykov was a deputy to the National Assembly, and from 1946 to 1949, vice-chairman of the Presidium of the Grand National Assembly. (JJ)

Sources: Entsiklopediya Bulgariya, vol. 4 (Sofia, 1984); Georgi Dimitrov, Suchineniya, vol. 13 (Sofia, 1987); Tasho Tashev, Ministrite na Bulgariya 1879–1999: Entsiklopedichen Spravochnik (Sofia, 1999); Milen Kumanov and Tania Nikolova, Politicheski partii, organizatsii i dvizheniia v Bulgariya i tekhnite lideri 1879–1999: Kratuk spravochnik (Sofia, 1999); Angel Tsurakov, Entsiklopediya: Pravitelstvata na Bulgariya. Khronologija na politicheskiia zhivot 1879–2001 (Sofia, 2001).

NICHOLAS I (7 October 1841, Njegos, Montenegro–2 March 1921, Antibes, France), descendant of the dynasty of Njegoš-Petrović, prince and king of Montenegro. Nicholas was educated in Paris and Trieste. In 1860 he came to the throne after the assassination of his uncle, Prince Danilo II, who was childless. As an outstanding leader and accomplished diplomat, Nicholas transformed his small principality into a sovereign nation. After the wars against the Ottoman Empire (1862, 1876–78), in which Montenegro took an active part, at the Congress of Berlin (1878) Montenegro was doubled in size and recognized as a sovereign state. Nicholas skillfully strengthened his dynastic connections. He won the friendship and support of Tsar Alexander II of Russia, which helped him save the sovereignty of his nation. Nicholas's daughter Elena married Victor Emmanuel III (1896), the future king of Italy. Another daughter, Zorka, married Peter Karadjordjević

(1883), but she died before he became king of Serbia. Two other daughters married Russian grand dukes. In 1905 Nicholas convened the Constituent Assembly and granted Montenegro a constitution, but in 1907 he dissolved the assembly and reassumed an autocratic system of government. In 1907 there was a plot against him. On the fiftieth anniversary of his assumption of power, on 28 August 1910, he declared himself king. After the Balkan War of 1912–13 the territory of Montenegro became considerably larger. During World War I Nicholas supported Serbia against Austria-Hungary. However, the Montenegrin Army of fifty thousand soldiers was unable to resist the Austro-Hungarian offensive and was defeated in January 1916. Nicholas went to Italy and then to France. On 26 November 1918 the National Assembly of Montenegro formally deposed him. Montenegro was incorporated into Serbia, which later became part of the Kingdom of Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes. Nicholas never acknowledged this decision and supported a Montenegrin government-in-exile until his death. (AO)

Sources: Biographisches Lexikon, vol. 3; Barbara Jelavich, History of the Balkans; Twentieth Century, vol. 2 (Cambridge, 1983); John D. Treadway, The Falcon and the Eagle: Montenegro and Austria-Hungary, 1908–1914 (West Lafayette, Ind., 1983); Waclaw Felczak and Tadeusz Wasilewski, Historia Jugostawii (Wrocław, 1985).

NICKELSBURG László (10 April 1924, Budapest–26 August 1961, Budapest), one of the leaders of the 1956 Hungarian Revolution. Nickelsburg's father, a soldier in the Hungarian Red Army in 1919, was imprisoned and died as a result of the prison ordeal, and his mother had to bring up four children on her own. In 1941 Nickelsburg finished a basic vocational school and started working. In 1944 he was inducted into the labor service units but managed to escape and remained in hiding until the end of World War II. His mother and three siblings were deported and died in a concentration camp. After 1945 Nickelsburg worked as a blue-collar laborer, and many times he was declared the most productive worker. In 1953 he became a member of the Hungarian Workers' Party (HWP). On 31 October 1956 he joined the fighters in Baross Square and almost immediately became their leader. He established contacts with other groups of fighters, including those from Corvin Lane, and with the main headquarters of the police in Budapest. After attempts to halt the advancing Soviet armored units failed and when Nickelsburg's group dispersed, he joined the voluntary ambulance service. While rescuing a wounded person, he became wounded himself. On 25 November he fled to Vienna but returned to Hungary on 5 December. Arrested on 14 December, he was soon released because the secret police wanted him to lead them to other members of the revolutionaries. However, Nickelsburg did not want to cooperate; therefore, in February 1957 he was arrested again and sentenced to life imprisonment. In 1959 the Ministry of Interior ordered an additional investigation of the group of fighters from Baross Square. On 15 July 1961 the Supreme Court sentenced Nickelsburg to death without the right of appeal on charges of leading a conspiracy against the “people’s government.” Soon afterwards Nickelsburg was executed as the last victim of the repression unleashed by the János Kádár regime. (JT)

Sources: Magyar Nagylexikon, vol. 13 (Budapest, 2001); György Litván, ed., Rewolucja węgierska 1956 roku (Warsaw, 1996); Attila Szokolczay, Az 1956-os forradalom és szabadságharc (Budapest, 2001).

NICOLSCHI Alexandru [originally Boris Grünberg] (2 June 1915, Kishinyov [Chişinău]–16 June 1992, Bucharest), Romanian secret police officer. Nicolschi came from a Jewish-Russian family from Bessarabia. In 1932 in the then Romanian Chişinău he joined a youth wing of the Communist Party. From 1937 to 1939 he served in the Romanian Army. In September 1940, after the Soviet annexation of Bessarabia, he entered the NKVD service and moved to Cernăuţi (Chernivtsi), where he underwent espionage training in the NKVD foreign intelligence. Subsequently, under the name of “Vasile Ştefănescu,” Nicolschi crossed the Romanian border. Arrested after two weeks of activities, in July 1941 he was sentenced to hard labor for life. He served his sentence in Ploieşti and Aiud. Released from prison after the coup of August 1944, he joined the political police. In the spring of 1945 Nicolschi became deputy head of the Corps of Secret Agents. At that time he personally investigated political prisoners and became particularly notorious for his brutality. Nicolschi was directly responsible for the death of many prisoners. For example, in the summer of 1946 he took part in the killing of Ştefan Foriş, former head of the Communist Party. In April 1947 Nicolschi became inspector general of the secret police. After the establishment of the General Direction of National Security (Direcţia Generală a Securităţii Poporului [DGSP]) in August 1948, he became one of the two deputies to the DGSP head, Gheorghe Pintilie (Bondarenko). One of the main investigators in the case of Lucreţiu Pătrăşcanu, Nicolschi supervised the establishment of a network of concentration camps. From 1949 to 1952 he also implemented a program for the “reeducation” of prisoners through sophisticated methods of destroying their mental health, as well as through the use of drugs.

Notorious for his cruelty, Nicolschi also used the services of many other sadists, including Eugene Turcanu, a prisoner and former Iron Guard member who employed a wide range of physical and mental tortures. In 1953 Nicolschi became director general of the Ministry of Interior. Until 1954 he held a number of posts, including that of head of a technical department that supervised electronic surveillance. (WR) Sources: Marius Oprea, “Alexandru Nikolski,” Cuvîntul, 1992, nos. 112–115; Dennis Deletant, Ceauşescu and the Securitate: Coercion and Dissent in Romania, 1965–1989 (Armonk, N.Y., 1995); Dennis Deletant, Communist Terror in Romania: Gheorghiu-Dej and the Police State, 1948–1965 (New York, 1999).

NIEĆKO Józef (25 March 1891, Kozłówka, near Luartów–30 November 1953, Warsaw), Polish Peasant Party activist. Born into a poor peasant family, Niećko finished only three grades of primary school. In 1912 he joined the National Peasant Union. In 1913 he moved to Warsaw, where he worked on various publication staffs and attempted to write. In 1914 he joined the Polish Military Organization (Polska Organizacja Wojskowa [POW]) and conducted agitation among peasants. Arrested by the tsarist authorities in the spring of 1915, Niećko was placed in the Lublin Castle and then taken to a prison in Moscow. Released in January 1916, he was kept under police surveillance in Nizhny Novgorod. He returned to Poland in December 1918. In June 1919 he co-founded the Central Union of Rural Youth (Centralny Związek Młodzieży Wiejskiej [CZMW]) and then became its head. He developed a self-education movement among peasant youth, promoted modern methods of land cultivation and animal husbandry, and encouraged the establishment of agricultural cooperatives and associations. After the coup of May 1926, Niećko advocated that the CZMW remain independent of the ruling sanacja regime, and subsequently he left the organization. In June 1928 he co-founded the Union of Rural Youth of the Republic of Poland (Związek Młodzieży Wiejskiej Rzeczypospolitej Polskiej [ZMW RP]). From 1930 to 1939 Niećko was head of the ZMW RP Presidium, and from 1929 to 1938, editor-in-chief of the weekly Wici, in which he published many articles. A theorist of agrarianism, his stance gradually evolved from social solidarity to peasant radicalism. In 1931 he joined the Peasant Party (Stronnictwo Ludowe [SL]) and served as a member of its Supreme Council from 1938 to 1939.

After the outbreak of World War II, Niećko took part in the establishment of underground structures of the peasant movement. At the beginning of 1940 he became a member of the Central Leadership of the Roch

Peasant Movement (Centralne Kierownictwo Ruchu Ludowego [CKRL]), taking charge of military affairs. In the fall of 1940 he began to organize the Peasant Guard (Straż Chłopska [SCh])—the future Peasant Battalions (Bataliony Chłopskie [BCh])—and was their political chief. In 1942 he supported a plan for the BCh to take up the struggle against the Germans in defense of peasants who were being forced to leave the Zamość region. For a long time Niećko opposed subordinating the BCh to the High Command of the Union of Armed Struggle (Związek Walki Zbrojnej [ZWZ]—later the Home Army [Armia Krajowa]). However, in December 1942 he signed an agreement on uniting the BCh with the Home Army. During the Warsaw Uprising of 1944, Niećko became a representative of the Peasant Party–Roch (Stronnictwo Ludowe–Roch [SL–Roch]) in the National Unity Council (Rada Jedności Narodowej [RJN]), the underground representation of political parties and groups linked with the Polish government-in-exile in London.

In the fall of 1944 Niećko advocated that the CKRL leave the Home Council of Ministers and the RJN, which were linked with the London government. He called for negotiations with the (Communist) Polish Workers' Party (Polska Partia Robotnicza [PPR]), the National Home Council (Krajowa Rada Narodowa [KRN]), and the Polish Committee of National Liberation. He recognized the Yalta agreements as the basis for negotiations with the Communist-controlled Provisional Government. In mid-1945 Niećko encouraged the BCh and SL–Roch soldiers to come out of hiding. In August 1945 he became second vice-chairman of the Chief Executive Committee of the newly established Polish Peasant Party (Polskie Stronnictwo Ludowe [PSL]), and from 1946 to 1947 he was a member of the PSL Supreme Council. In December 1945 he became a PSL deputy to the KRN. Niećko was among the party members who were opposed to Stanisław Mikołajczyk. Niećko took part in negotiations with the PPR and the Socialists on the establishment of an electoral bloc, and he supported a vote of “three times yes” in the referendum of 30 June 1946. In March 1947, after he had been dismissed from the editorial staff of the monthly Chłopski Świat, Niećko began publishing Chłopi i Państwo, a weekly that was in opposition to the PSL leaders; consequently, he was expelled from the PSL. He then co-founded and in June 1947 became chairman of the Central Committee of the PSL–Left. After Mikołajczyk fled to the West in October 1947 and pro-Communist activists took over the leadership of the PSL, Niećko was appointed chairman of the PSL Provisional Chief Executive Committee. In mid-November 1948 he became chairman of the Chief Executive Committee of the so-called revived PSL, which was subordinated to the Communists. When on 29 November 1949 the remnants of the PSL were merged with the SL, Niećko became deputy chairman of the Chief Executive Committee of the United Peasant Party (Zjednoczone Stronnictwo Ludowe [ZSL]) and chairman of the ZSL Supreme Council. From 1948 to 1953 he was a member of the Council of State, and from 1952 to 1953 he was an MP, supporting, among other things, the collectivization of agriculture. Niećko's publications include O wewnętrzne życie wsi (For the internal life of rural communities; 1930) and Na wiciowych drogach (The roads of the Union of Rural Youth; 1937). (JS)

Sources: PSB, vol. 22; Mołdawa; Słownik Biograficzny Działaczy Ruchu Ludowego (Warsaw, 1989); Encyklopedia Historii Polski: Dzieje polityczne, vol. 2 (Warsaw, 1995); Encyklopedia historii Drugiej Rzeczypospolitej (Warsaw, 1999); Roman Buczek, Stronnictwo Ludowe w latach 1939–1945 (London, 1975); Krystyna Kersten, Narodziny systemu władzy: Polska 1943–1948 (Poznań, 1990); Stanisław Łach, Polskie Stronnictwo Ludowe w latach 1945–1947 (Gdańsk, 1995).

NIEDRA Andrievs (8 February 1871, Tirsas, Livonia–25 September 1942, Riga), Latvian Lutheran pastor and politician. In 1899 Niedra graduated from the Department of Theology of the University of Dorpat (Tartu). He began writing poems and stories of a national character in his early youth. After graduation, he worked as a journalist and literary editor at several Latvian periodicals. From 1903 to 1906 he was editor of the periodical Austrums. In 1905 he opposed the ideas of the revolution. In 1906 he began working as a Lutheran pastor in the diocese of Matisi and from 1908 to 1918 in the diocese of Kalsnava-Vietalva in Livonia. During the offensive of the Red Army in January 1919 Niedra went to Liepāja and became involved in politics, supporting cooperation with the Germans in the struggle against the Bolsheviks. From April to June 1919, after the German coup against the Provisional Government of Kārlis Ulmanis, Niedra served as head of the pro-German government of Latvia. In October and November 1919 he cooperated with the German and White Russian armies, led by Pavel Bermond-Avalov. After Avalov's forces were forced to retreat from Latvia, Niedra went to Germany. From 1921 to 1924 he worked as a Lutheran pastor in Wilno (Vilnius). After returning to Latvia in 1924, he was arrested and sentenced to three years in prison on charges of treason. The sentence was commuted to a ban on his settling in Latvia. Niedra settled in East Prussia and worked as a pastor there. He returned to Latvia during the German occupation, in April 1942, and he died a few months later. Niedra's publications include

Dzīvais mironis (The living corpse; 1924) and the memoirs Mana bērnība un puikaspadi (My childhood and boyhood; 1924). In 1998 Niedra's Tautas nodevēja atmiņas (The memoirs of a traitor to the nation) were published. (EJ)

Sources: J. Asars, V. Dermanis, and Ko Andrievs, Niedra mums sludina (Riga, 1905); V. Eglītis, Andrievs Niedra savā dzīvē un darbos (Riga, 1924); Andrievs Niedra (Veiverlija, 1960); Andrejs Plakans, Historical Dictionary of Latvia (Lanham, Md., 1997).

NIEDZIAŁKOWSKI Mieczysław (19 September 1893, Wilno [Vilnius]–21 June 1940, Palmiry, near Warsaw), Polish Socialist politician. Niwsiałkowski came from a noble family. In 1909 he co-founded the Union of Progressive and Pro-Independence Youth (Związek Młodzieży Postępowo-Niepodległościowej). From 1910 he belonged to the Executive Bureau of this organization and to the editorial staff of Głos Młodych (Voice of youth). From 1912 he studied law at the university in St. Petersburg. In 1914 he joined the Polish Socialist Party (Polska Partia Socjalistyczna [PPS]), becoming head of its District Workers' Committee in Warsaw. From September 1916 to April 1919 Niedziałkowski was a member of the Central Workers' Committee of the PPS. While emphasizing the party's links to the workers, he consistently supported the Polish Military Organization, the Legions, and the position of Józef Piłsudski.

In November 1918 Niedziałkowski took part in negotiations leading to the establishment of the government of Jędrzej Moraczewski. From 18 November 1918, as head of the Assembly Department in the Ministry of Interior, Niedziałkowski was involved in work on the electoral law in the Constituent Assembly. Between January 1919 and 1935 he was an MP, and in 1929–35 he was president of the Parliamentary Union of Polish Socialists (Związek Parlamentarny Polskich Socjalistów). From 1 January 1919 Niedziałkowski headed the government's Constitutional Office. He belonged to the PPS Chief Council (Rada Naczelna PPS) and to the Central Executive Committee (Centralny Komitet Wykonawczy [CKW]) from the time of its unification congress in April 1919 until the dissolution of the party on 28 September 1939. From 1920 Niedziałkowski was secretary general of the PPS. From 1921, he acted as the party's secretary general for foreign affairs, and he was responsible for contacts with Socialist parties abroad and with the Socialist International. He attended the subsequent congresses of the Socialist International. In 1924–31 he was deputy president of the CKW PPS, and in 1927–39 he was editor-in-chief of Robotnik. He also published articles in Przedświt, Trybuna, and Światło. He published (for example) Położenie międzynarodowe Polski i polityka socjalizmu polskiego (1925; The international situation of Poland and the policy of Polish socialism; 1925); Teoria i praktyka socjalizmu wobec nowych zagadnień (The theory and practice of socialism in the face of new issues; 1926); and Do Polski Ludowej (To people's Poland; 1941).

After the May 1926 coup Niedziałkowski initially supported Piłsudski's group (Sanacja). However, he became disaffected toward this regime, as its members became aligned with the landowning groups and inspired actions aiming at a split within the PPS. After 1928 he became one of the leaders of the parliamentary opposition to the sanacja regime. Niedziałkowski was also a co-organizer and ideologist of the center-left opposition (Centrolew). At the Twenty-third Congress of the PPS in 1934 he sought to gain the support of the peasants and the lower middle class for the party's program, and he accepted the idea of an interim dictatorship of the proletariat. He took part in negotiations with the Communist Party of Poland, which resulted in the signing of a non-aggression pact in 1935. However, as early as 1936 he opposed cooperation with the Communists and aimed at closer cooperation with democratic parties. Niedziałkowski was the author of the PPS program of 1937. In the face of the German threat, on behalf of the PPS, he proposed the establishment of a government of national defense, and on two occasions he visited President Ignacy Mościcki to discuss the issue.

In September 1939 Niedziałkowski was active in the civil defense of Warsaw. He was involved, for example, in recruitments to the Workers' Battalions for the Defense of Warsaw. From October 1939 he was a member of the Political Council of the Service for the Victory of Poland (Służba Zwycięstwu Polsce [SZP]) and civil commissioner to the commander of the SZP, General Michał Koraszewicz-Tokarzewski. Arrested by the Gestapo on 22 December 1939 and sentenced to death by a German court martial at Szucha Avenue on 18 February 1940, Niedziałkowski was executed in Palmiry. (PK)

Sources: PSB, vol. 22; M. Śliwa, Myśl polityczna Mieczysława Niedziałkowskiego (1893–1940) (Warsaw, 1980); Antoni Czubiński, Centrolew (Poznań, 1963); Janusz Żarnowski, Polska Partia Socjalistyczna w latach 1935–1939 (Warsaw, 1965); Jerzy Holzer, Mozaika polityczna II Rzeczypospolitej (Warsaw, 1974); Ignacy Wilczek [Jerzy Holzer], "Mieczysław Niedziałkowski," PPN, 1978, no. 22; Andrzej Friszke, O kształt niepodległej (Warsaw, 1989); Lidia Ciołkoszowa, Spojrzenie wstecz (Paris, 1995).

NIEPOKÓLCZYCKI Franciszek, pseudonyms "Franek," "Szubert," and "Teodor" (27 October 1900, Zhytomyr–11 June 1974, Warsaw), Polish pro-independence activist and officer. The son of a carpenter, in 1919 Niepokólczycki graduated from high school in Zhytomyr. From 1918 to 1921 he was a member of the Polish Military Organization (Polska Organizacja Wojskowa [POW]). After graduating from a POW officer training school, he served as a commander of the POW Zhitomir District, a clerk in the Military Department of the POW High Command in the Ukraine, and head of the POW Liquidation Commission. In 1922 Niepokólczycki became an officer in the Polish Army and served in an infantry corps. From 1923 he served in a corps of sappers. He lectured at the Sapper Training Center and worked for the General Inspectorate of the Armed Forces. He took part in the September 1939 campaign as a commander of sappers in the Modlin Army, with the rank of major. On 15 September Niepokólczycki joined the defense of Warsaw. At the end of September he joined the Service for the Victory of Poland (Służba Zwycięstwu Polsce [SZP]), an underground organization that later became the Union of Armed Struggle (Związek Walki Zbrojnej [ZWZ]) and in 1942 became the Home Army (Armia Krajowa [AK]). In the fall of 1939 Niepokólczycki became head of a sabotage unit of the High Command of the SZP and ZWZ, and in April 1940 he became commander of a ZWZ organization for subversive struggle known as the Revenge Union (Związek Odwetu). In 1942 he also became chief of the Sapper Department of the AK High Command. In November 1941 he was promoted to lieutenant colonel. In the autumn of 1942 he helped to establish the Directorate of Sabotage (Kierownictwo Dywersji [Kedyw]), a large subversive-struggle division of the AK High Command. In January 1943 he became deputy commander of Kedyw. He co-designed a program to defend the Warsaw Ghetto, but it was not implemented in April 1943. Niepokólczycki fought in the Warsaw Uprising (August–October 1944); after its failure he was taken prisoner and sent to the officers' POW camp at Woldenberg. In February 1945 he returned to Poland and continued his underground work as deputy commander of the South District of the Delegation of Armed Forces for the Homeland. In September 1945 he joined an underground organization called Freedom and Independence (Zrzeszenie Wolność i Niezawisłość [WiN]), and in November of that year he became chairman of the WiN Main Board. WiN conducted intelligence and propaganda work, trying to limit the partisan struggle to self-defense against Communist security services. Arrested in October 1946, on 10 September 1947 Niepokólczycki was sentenced to death, but the sentence was commuted to life imprisonment. Released in December 1956, from 1958 on he worked in various firms. (TSt)

Sources: PSB, vol. 23; Kunert, vol. 2; Tomasz Strzembosz, Oddziały szturmowe konspiracyjnej Warszawy 1939–1944 (Warsaw, 1983); Henryk Witkowski, Kedyw Okręgu Warszawskiego Armii Krajowej w latach 1943–1944 (Warsaw, 1984); Armia Krajowa: Dramatyczny epilog (Warsaw, 1994).

NIESIOŁOWSKI Stefan (4 February 1944, Kałęczewo, near Łódź), Polish dissident and politician. During his studies in biology at the University of Łódź (1961–65) Niesiołowski was connected with the academic Catholic ministry of Father Hubert Czuma. From 1965 he worked in the Department of Zoology of Łódź University. In 1965, along with the brothers Andrzej Czuma and Benedykt Czuma, Niesiołowski co-founded the Movement (Ruch), a pioneer secret opposition organization. He co-authored its program declaration, Mijają lata . . . (As the years go by . . . ; 1969), advocating the regaining of independence and a respect for human rights. He published in the Movement's Biuletyn from 1969. Arrested and tried for the intention of setting fire to the Lenin Museum in Poronin, in the trial of the Movement in 1971 Niesiołowski was sentenced to seven years in prison. Released in 1974, from 1975 he was engaged in protests against amendments to the constitution (for example, amendments introducing the "leading role" of the Communist Party and an alliance with the USSR). He was also active in the defense of workers oppressed after the riots of June 1976. Connected with the Łódź group of the Movement for the Defense of Human and Civic Rights (Ruch Obrony Praw Człowieka i Obywatela [ROPCiO]), he published in its uncensored press (e.g., Opinia).

In 1980 Niesiołowski was active as an adviser to the workers striking in Łódź. He belonged to the initiators of the Łódź organization of Solidarity, and in 1981 he joined its Łódź Regional Management. He co-founded the weekly Solidarność Ziemi Łódzkiej. On 13 December 1981 Niesiołowski was interned in Jaworz and later in Darłówek. Released after almost a year, he headed a secret Solidarity commission at the University of Łódź. He encouraged publications in the uncensored press and published a lot himself. Under the pen name Ewa Ostrołęcka he published a book, "Ruch" przeciw totalizmowi (The Movement against totalitarianism; 1985). From 1989 Niesiołowski worked in the Łódź Regional Civic Committee. In June 1989 he was elected to the parliament on behalf of the Civic Committee of the Chairman of Solidarity, and in October 1991, on behalf of the Christian National Union (Zjednoczenie Chrześcijańsko-Narodowe [ZChN]), which he co-founded in 1989. Niesiołowski supported his party's coalition with the Democratic Union, which was the foundation of the government of Hanna Suchocka, and several times he intervened to quash conflicts in this coalition. In 1997–2001 Niesiołowski was an MP on behalf of the Solidarity Electoral Action (Akcja Wyborcza Solidarność) coalition, heading the ZChN parliamentary group. Elected to the parliament again in 2005 on behalf of the civic platform (Platforma obywatelska), he was a fierce critic of the law and justice (Prawo i sprawiedliwość) government. In 1979 he received a Ph.D. and in 1990 his postdoctoral degree, lecturing in entomology at the University of Łódź. Niesiołowski authored the memoirs Wysoki brzeg (High shore; 1989) and Prosta droga: O Polskę z Bogiem (Straight road: For a Poland with God; 1993). (PK)

Sources: Nasi w Sejmie i Senacie (Warsaw, 1990); Andrzej Friszke, Opozycja polityczna w PRL 1945–1980 (London, 1994); Dobrosława Świerczyńska, ed., Kto był kim w drugim obiegu? Słownik pseudonimów (Warsaw, 1995); Opozycja w PRL: Słownik Biograficzny 1956–1989, vol. 1 (Warsaw, 2000); Kto jest kim w Polsce (Warsaw, 2001).

NIKLUS Mart-Olav (22 September 1934, Tartu), Estonian dissident and independence activist. In 1957 Niklus graduated from the Physics and Mathematics Department of the University of Tartu. In 1957–58 he worked as a translator and teacher of English. He also published a few articles in ornithology, for which he received awards. In August 1958 he was arrested for sending photos to the West illustrating life in Soviet Estonia. In January 1959 he was sentenced to ten years in prison. While in jail, he translated into Estonian three works by Charles Darwin and the UN Declaration of Human Rights. In 1965 Niklus organized a hunger strike in a Mordovian camp in protest against the living conditions there. Transferred to Vladimir Prison and released in July 1966, he could not find a job relevant to his education, so he worked as a blue-collar laborer and driver. From September 1968 Niklus taught English in the schools. In 1971 he was fired because of his membership in an unofficial anti-alcohol club, but in 1974 he was rehired as an English teacher. In August 1979 Niklus signed the Baltic Appeal, which pointed to the illegality of the Molotov-Ribbentrop Pact, and he lost his job again. In 1980 Niklus was refused the right to emigrate, and in January 1981 he was arrested again and sentenced, along with Jüri Kukk, to ten years of labor camp. He served in the Khristopol Camp in the Tatar ASSR, where he was exposed to chemical and psychiatric experiments. During perestroika, in early 1987 Niklus was transferred to Tallinn, but as he refused to sign an oath of loyalty, he was sent back to the camp in the Ural Mountains. In July 1988 he was released without any preconditions. Niklus's return to Tallinn on 13 July 1988 became an occasion for a patriotic demonstration. (WR) Sources: Baltic News, 1985, no. 3; S. P. de Boer, E. J. Driessen, and H. L. Verhaar, eds., Biographical Dictionary of Dissidents in the Soviet Union, 1956–1975 (The Hague and Boston, 1982); Rein Taguepera, Estonia: Return to Independence (Boulder, Colo., 1993).

NINČIĆ Momčilo (10 June 1876, Jagodina–23 December 1949, Lausanne, Switzerland), Yugoslav diplomat of Serbian origin. After graduating from high school in Belgrade, Ninčić studied law in Paris, graduating in 1899. He worked in the Serbian Ministry of Finance, and in 1902 he became a professor in the Department of Law of Belgrade University. In 1912 he was elected MP on the ticket of the Radical Party. He was a Freemason. From 1915 to August 1919 Ninčić was minister of finance in the government of Nikola Pašić, who was in exile on Corfu from November 1915. After the establishment of the Kingdom of Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes (SHS), Ninčić served in the cabinet of Stojan Protić. At that time he carried out a reform that standardized the monetary system of the state. In the second government of Protić (February–May 1920) Ninčić became minister of justice and later minister of trade and industry. He also held these posts in the cabinet of Milenko Vesnić (May–December 1920). In January 1921 he also assumed the post of minister of foreign affairs in the government of Pašić and held this post in the cabinet of Nikola Uzunović until December 1926, except for an interval between June and October 1924. Ninčić was one of the founders and a driving force behind the so-called Little Entente, which was based on the Yugoslav-Czechoslovak treaty of 14 August 1920, the Czechoslovak-Romanian treaty of 23 April 1921, and the Yugoslav-Romanian treaty of 7 June 1921. In these treaties Yugoslavia, Czechoslovakia, and Romania pledged mutual assistance in the case of a violation of the Treaty of Trianon with Hungary or the Treaty of Neuilly with Bulgaria. Ninčić also sought to strengthen Yugoslavia's position in the face of territorial pressures from Italy, and on 27 January 1924 he signed the so-called Adriatic Pact between Yugoslavia and Italy, in which the two states pledged to remain neutral in the case of an attack by another state. From 1920 to 1926 Ninčić was also an editor of the periodical Novi život.

After King Alexander Karadjordjević established a royal dictatorship in 1929, Ninčić retired from active politics, but he did not protest the king's policies. After the coup d'état of 27 March 1941 and the enthronement of King Peter, General Dušan Simović entrusted Ninčić with the portfolio of minister of foreign affairs. On 30 March Ninčić assured the governments of Italy and Germany that Yugoslav policies would not change, but Germany's attitude to the coup was hostile from the beginning. Seeking support, Ninčić entered into negotiations with Great Britain, and on the night of 5–6 April 1941 he also signed a treaty of friendship and non-aggression with the Soviet Union. However, his efforts did not prevent the invasion of Yugoslavia by the Third Reich on 6 April, and it forced Simović's government, along with Ninčić, to go into exile in Great Britain. In July 1942, along with the king, Ninčić visited the United States, where he signed a lend-lease agreement for Yugoslavia and was given assurances of U.S. support for the Yugoslav government-in-exile. Despite his efforts, Ninčić failed to obtain the Kremlin's ratification of the treaty of April 1941, and at the beginning of January 1943 he resigned. Ninčić died in exile. His publications include Pitanje o svojini zemlje Srba pod Turcima (The issue of Serbian land ownership under Turkish rule; 1913); Spoljna politika Kraljevine SHS 1922–1924 (The foreign policy of the Kingdom of SHS from 1922 to 1924; 1924); Spoljna politika Kraljevine SHS 1925–1926 (The foreign policy of the Kingdom of SHS from 1925 to 1926; 1926); and La crise bosniaque 1908–1909 et les grandes puissances européennes (The Bosnian crisis of 1908–1909 and the great European powers, 2 vols.; 1937). (WR) Sources: Biographisches Lexikon, vol. 3; Constantin Fotitch, The War We Lost (New York, 1948); Vlatko Macek, In the Struggle for Freedom (London, 1957); Ferdo Čulinović, Jugoslavija između dva rata, vols. 1–2 (Zagreb, 1971); Ludwik Hass, Ambicje, rachuby, rzeczywistość: Wolnomularstwo w Europie Środkowo-Wschodniej 1905–1928 (Warsaw, 1984); Michał Jerzy Zacharias, Jugostawia w polityce Wielkiej Brytanii 1940–1945 (Wrocław, 1985).

NOICA Constantin (24 June 1909, Vitănești–4 December 1987, Sibiu), Romanian philosopher and essayist. In 1928 Noica graduated from the Spiru Haret Lycée in Bucharest; one year earlier he had made his literary debut in the periodical Vlăstarul. From 1928 to 1931 he studied literature and philosophy at Bucharest University. From 1932 to 1934 he worked as a librarian at the Department of the History of Philosophy at Bucharest University. At that time he was also a member of the artistic, philosophical, and literary society Criterion. In 1934 Noica moved to Sinaia and began translating works by Descartes and Kant. A supporter of the pro-Fascist Iron Guard, in 1938 Noica left for France, after the regime of King Charles II began to persecute members of this organization. In France he continued his philosophical studies. After returning to Romania, Noica earned a Ph.D. in philosophy in 1940. In the same year he edited one issue of the periodical Adsum, in which he co-authored and published an article-manifesto on the Iron Guard movement. He also contributed to the nationalist dailies Buna Vestire and Cuvântul. From 1941 to 1944 Noica was in Berlin, working for the Romanian-German Institute, which dealt with international relations. In the periodical Izvoare de filosofie Noica published university lectures on metaphysics and logic authored by his mentor, Nicolae (Nae) Ionescu.

In 1944 Noica returned to Romania. After the Communist takeover he was persecuted. From 1949 to 1958 he was kept under house arrest in Câmpulung Muscel, and in 1958 he was sentenced in a political trial to twenty-five years' imprisonment, of which he served six. From 1965 to 1975 Noica founded and then worked for the Center for Logic of the Romanian Academy of Sciences. After retiring, he lived in Păltiniș, a small town in the mountains (1975–87). There he established a kind of private seminary of Romanian intellectuals that was tolerated by the authorities. Noica believed that under the dictatorship of Nicolae Ceaușescu the only possible form of resistance was intellectual opposition and independent philosophical and cultural research. His wide range of interests included the philosophy of culture, axiology, philosophical anthropology, ontology, logic, semantics, and the history of philosophy. Noica wrote a dozen or so books, including the following: Mathesis sau bucurile simple (Science or simple joys; 1934); Viața și filosofia lui René Descartes (The life and philosophy of René Descartes; 1937); Două introduceri și o trecere spre idealism (Two introductions and a transition to idealism; 1943); Devenirea intru ființă: Încercare asupra filosofiei tradiționale (Becoming unto being: An essay on traditional philosophy; 1950); Semnificația culturală a categoriilor lui Aristotel (Cultural significance in Aristotle's categories; 1968); Eminescu sau gânduri despre omul deplin în cultura română (Eminescu or thoughts on the complete man of Romanian culture; 1975); and Sentimentul românesc al ființei (The Romanian feeling of being; 1978). (LW)

Sources: Dictionar Enciclopedic, vol. 4 (Bucharest, 2001); Józef Darski, Rumunia: Historia, współczesność, konflikty narodowe (Warsaw, 1995); Dorina N. Rusu, Membrii Academiei Române 1866–1999 (Bucharest, 1999); www.ssmu.mcgill.ca; http://pages.prodigy.net; www.geocities.com.

NOLI Fan (Theofan) Stylian (1882, Ibrik Tepe, Thrace–13 March 1965, Fort Lauderdale, Florida), Albanian Orthodox bishop and politician. Noli was educated in Turkey, Greece, and Egypt, where he also taught in a Greek school and was introduced to the Albanian national movement. From 1908 to 1912 he studied at Harvard University. In March 1908 in Boston, Noli was ordained bishop of the U.S. Albanian Orthodox Church. In 1912 he founded a pan-Albanian federation, Vatra, which was the leading organization of the Albanian diaspora. Noli was greatly impressed by the American political system. In 1919 the Albanian community in the United States sent him to the National Assembly in Lushnja, where in January 1920 the principles of the Albanian political system were established. After returning to Albania, Noli was appointed bishop of Dürres, and he became active in Albanian public life—for example, he published the periodical Dielli. He used his contacts in America to help Albania gain the status of a member of the League of Nations after World War I. As an Albanian delegate to the League of Nations, Noli protested the occupation of northern Albania by the troops of the Kingdom of Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes (SHS). In November 1921 the Council of Ambassadors established the final shape of the Albanian territory, granting Albania the territories that had been occupied by the SHS, except for Kosovo.

After the first elections of 1921 Noli became head of the People's Party. As the result of a serious crisis brought about by a series of political murders, in the spring of 1924 a revolt arose against the conservative government of Ilias bey Vrioni, in which Ahmed Zogu played the role of éminence grise. On 16 June 1924 Noli became prime minister of a new government that promised basic democratic reforms. However, Noli's policies alienated part of the population. A long-promised land reform was a failure, and no financial assistance came from the League of Nations. At the same time Noli's government set up a tribunal that sentenced many supporters of the previous government to death in absentia and confiscated their property. Noli's social radicalism won him the label of the "red bishop." Noli's establishment of official relations with the USSR confirmed the validity of this title. Noli publicly humiliated his opponents and was reluctant to hold new elections. Under international pressure, he finally agreed to new elections in November 1924. Meanwhile, however, the officers' corps began to openly support Zogu, who, assisted by soldiers from the Russian Army forces of General Pyotr Wrangel and by Zogu's compatriots from the Mati clan, assembled a substantial armed force in Yugoslav territory. On 24 December 1924 Zogu's troops entered Tirana, and Noli fled to Italy.

In March 1925 Noli founded the National Revolutionary Committee (Komiteti Nacional Revolucionar [KONARE]) in Vienna, which established contacts with the Communist International, and some of its members turned to communism. In April 1927 the KONARE was renamed the Committee for National Liberation (Komiteti Nacional Clirimtar). In November 1927 Noli visited Moscow, attending the Congress of Friends of the Soviet Union, but that visit alienated him from communism. In 1930 he abandoned his political activities, and in 1932 he again left for the United States. He settled in Boston, where he conducted pastoral activities and pursued scholarly work, translating Anglo-Saxon literary works into Albanian, among them Shakespeare, Edgar Allan Poe, and George Bernard Shaw. Noli was also the author of the drama Israelite e Filistine (The Israelites and the Philistines; 1907), Historise se Skanderbeut (History of Skanderbeg; 1947), a book about Ludwig van Beethoven, and Autobiography (1960). Noli's works, as well as his translations, contributed greatly to the development of the Albanian literary language. Noli also composed Orthodox music. In 1945 Noli rejected Enver Hoxha's offer to take the post of speaker of the parliament. (TC/WR)

Sources: Biographisches Lexikon, vol. 3; Lame Lefter, Ligjëron Fan Noli (Tirana, 1944); Vehbi Bala, Jeta e Fan S. Nolit: Portret, monografi (N.p., 1972); Idriz Ajeti, ed., Fan S. Noli: Në 100-vjetorin e lindjes, 1882–1982 (Prishtina, 1984); Nasho Jordaçi, Udhëtim me Fan Nolin: Nga Traka në ShBA (Tirana, approx. 1994); Miranda Vickers, The Albanians: A Modern History (London, 1995); Eftim Dodona, Noli i panjohur (Tirana, 1996); Blendi Fevziu, Histori e shtypit shqiptar (Tirana, 1996).

NOSEK Václav (26 September 1892, Velká Dobrá–22 July 1955, Prague), Czech Communist activist. A miner by trade, Nosek was active in the Socialist movement from his youth. Between 1919 and 1921 he was a member of the Marxist wing of the Social Democratic Party, and in 1921 he joined the Communist Party of Czechoslovakia (CPC). From 1924 to 1938 he served as secretary of the Red Trade Unions, and in 1929–36 he was a member of the Central Committee of the CPC. Under the Nazi occupation Nosek was temporarily imprisoned, and after his release in the summer of 1939 he left for London. There he was one of the leaders of the Communist émigrés, and in 1942–45 he served as deputy president of the Czechoslovak National Council (Státní Rada Československa) in London. From 1945 Nosek was a member of the Presidium of the CC of the CPC and an MP. From April 1945 he was minister of interior. In 1945–48 he used his power to suppress his political opponents. He conducted purges of the National Security Corps, replacing people who were not associated with the Communist Party by members of the CPC. Nosek's activities were the direct reason for the resignation of the non-Communist ministers and for the February crisis in 1948, after which the Communists assumed full power in Czechoslovakia. Later, Nosek's position was weakened considerably, especially after the establishment of the Ministry of National Security (1950), which took over most of the powers of the Ministry of Interior. Nosek held the post of minister of interior until 14 September 1953, and then until his death he served as minister of labor. (PU)

Sources: ČBS; Českoslovenští politici: 1918–1991 (Prague, 1991); Vladimír Zďárský, Václav Nosek: Horník-ministr (Prague, 1946); Jitka Klementová, Václav Nosek (Prague, 1987); Karel Kaplan, The Short March: The Communist Takeover in Czechoslovakia 1945–1948 (London, 1987).

NOSI Lef (1876, Elbasan–March 1945, Tirana), Albanian pro-independence activist, linguist, historian, and writer. After graduating from high school in Elbasan, Nosi studied pharmacy in Athens, Greece. At that time he joined the national movement. He corresponded with, among others, Fan Noli. In 1909 in Elbasan he co-founded an Albanian club, Vllaznia, and became its deputy chairman. He also initiated the establishment of an educational group called Aferdita in Elbasan. In 1909 Nosi taught Albanian in the schools, and one year later he founded Tomorri, a periodical that was designed to promote pro-independence ideas. Nosi was one of the co-founders of a congress in Elbasan (September 1909) that debated the issue of standardizing the Albanian language. He also initiated the establishment of a school for teachers of Albanian. Imprisoned by the Turks during the quelling of an Albanian uprising in 1910, Nosi served his sentence in Monastir (Bitola) and Bursa, Turkey. Released in March 1911, he returned to Elbasan and devoted himself to writing a textbook on the Albanian language.

In 1912 Nosi was a delegate from Elbasan to a conference in Vlorë at which, in November of that year, Albanian independence was proclaimed. Nosi became minister of post and telegraphs in the government of Ismail Kemal. He was also a member of a delegation that was sent to Neuwied to ask Prince Wilhelm von Wied to accept the Albanian throne. In 1918 Nosi became a member of the government that was established under Italian auspices in Dürres. He attended the Paris Peace Conference. After returning to Albania, along with a group of renowned Albanian politicians, Nosi was an active member of a patriotic society called Atdheu (Homeland). In the 1923 parliamentary elections Nosi was one of the leading representatives of a group called As i Beut as i Pashës (Without the Beys and Pashas), which ran in Elbasan. After failure in these elections, Nosi retired from politics and became involved in linguistic research. In 1924 he began editing the major documents that illustrated Albania's road to freedom. He also collected folk songs. Nosi returned to politics in October 1943, joining the four-member leadership of the Regency Council, which was established by the Germans. In consequence, the Communists accused him of collaboration with the occupiers. Sentenced to death by the Special People's Tribunal, Nosi was executed by a firing squad. (TC)

Sources: Sejfi Vllamasi, Ballafaqime politike në Shqipëri (1897–1942) (Tirana, 1995); Bardhosh Gaçe, Ata që shpallën Pavarësinë Kombëtare (Tirana, 1997); Bernd Fischer, Albania at War, 1939–1945 (London, 1999).

NOVAKOVIĆ Stojan (3 November 1842, Šabac–3 March 1915, Niš), Serbian historian, philologist, and politician.

Novaković attended a gymnasium in Šabac and a lycée in Belgrade. In 1863 he became a clerk in the Ministry of Finance. He later worked as a high school teacher in Belgrade. From 1872 to 1873 Novaković was a librarian and curator in a museum. In 1873 he became minister of education, and at the end of that year, head of the National Library. In 1874 he was again appointed minister of education and held this post until 1875. From 1875 to 1880 Novaković lectured at the university in Belgrade. From 1880 to 1883 he served as minister of education for the third time and was instrumental in promoting education in Serbia and the development of libraries and museums. In 1865 Novaković became a member of the Serbian Scientific Society (Srpsko Učeno Društvo), and in 1887, a member of the Serbian Royal Academy. In 1880 he helped to establish the conservative Progressive Party (Napredna Stranka) and was a member until its dissolution in 1896. In 1883 Novaković joined the State Council. He served as minister of interior in the cabinet of Milutin Garašanin (1884–85) but resigned in protest against the excessive influence of King Milan I Obrenović on the government's work. In 1885 Novaković opposed the declaration of war on Bulgaria. This war ended in defeat for the Serbian Army. From 1885 to 1892 Novaković was Serbia's envoy to Constantinople. In 1893 he became minister of foreign affairs, and from 25 June 1895 to 17 December 1896 he also held the post of prime minister. Novaković initially supported a pro-Austrian policy but then became a supporter of a pro-Russian orientation. From 1897 to 1900 he again was an envoy to Turkey, in 1899 to France, and from 1900 to 1904 to Russia.

In 1906 Novaković revived the Progressive Party and served as its leader until the end of his life. Although his was the smallest party in the coalition government, he again became prime minister (11 February 1909–21 October 1909) during the international crisis that followed the annexation of Bosnia-Herzegovina by Austria-Hungary, when Serbia was on the brink of war. Novaković was head of the Serbian delegation that negotiated peace terms with Turkey at the London Peace Conference in 1913. He described his political work in Dvadeset godina ustavne politike u Srbiji 1883–1903 (Twenty years of legislative policy in Serbia 1883–1903; 1912). Among hundreds of works by Novaković, the most important are the following: Vaskrs države srpske (The revival of the Serbian state; 1904); Zakonik Stefana Dušana (The legal code of Stefan Dušan; 1898); Istorija srpske književnosti (The history of Serbian literature; 1867); Srpska bibliografija (Serbian bibliography; 1869); Srbi i Turci u XIV i XV veku (The Serbs and the Turks in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries; 1863). (AO)

Sources: Enciklopedija Jugoslavije, vol. 6 (Zagreb, 1965); Biographisches Lexikon, vol. 4; Vasa Cubrilović, Društveni elementi u delima Stojana Novakovića (Belgrade, 1959); Vladimír Stojancević, ed., Stojan Novaković, ličnost i delo: Naučni skup povodom 150-godisnjice rođenja (1842–1992) (Belgrade, 1995); Željko E. Šuster, Historical Dictionary of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Lanham, Md., 1999).

NOVOMESKÝ Ladislav (Laco) (27 December 1904, Budapest–4 September 1976, Bratislava), Slovak poet, journalist, and Communist activist. After graduating from high school, Novomeský worked as a teacher and studied as an extramural student in the Department of Philosophy of Comenius University in Bratislava. In 1925 he joined the Communist Party of Czechoslovakia (CPC). He worked as a journalist for party papers and periodicals, initially for the Bratislava newspaper Pravda chudoby and later for the Prague Rudý večerník, Rudé právo, and Rudá zář. A member of a leftist avant-garde literary group called DAV, Novomeský edited a periodical under the same title from 1935 to 1937. His first collections of poems, including Nedeľ a (Sunday; 1927), belonged to proletarian literature, and his later volumes, including Romboid (1932) and Otvorené okná (Open windows; 1935), included elements of lyric poetry and symbolism. In his later collections, Svätý za dedinou (The saint beyond the village; 1939) and Pašovanou ceruzkou (With a smuggled pencil; 1948), Novomeský addressed current issues and protested against fascism. In 1933 he published the book Marx a slovenský národ (Marx and the Slovak nation).

